11 The fourteenth day of the second month at even they shall keep it, and eat it with unleavened bread and bitter herbs.

which words Moses himself acknowledges the difficulty of the ease; which he could not resolve, till he had first consulted the Divine Majesty about it. Which may teach judges not to be ashamed to confess their ignorance, and take advice on matters dubious; as the Jerusalem Targum here observes. But I see no such good ground for the other part of his observation on this verse; that there being four difficult causes brought before Moses, in two of them he made haste to determine; but in the other two he was slow. Those of the first sort were this, and that of the daughters of Zelophehad (ch. xx.); these he judged presently, because they were pecuniary matters; but the other two (viz. about him that blasphemed, Lev. xxiv. and him that gathered sticks on the Sabbath-day, Numb. xv.) being capital causes, he took longer time to judge; for he put them in ward till the mind of the Lord was known: to teach those that succeeded him in the office of judges, "to make quick despatch in money matters, but to proceed slowly in capital causes." But, as this was no pecuniary cause, so it doth not appear but he took as much time to understand the mind of God in it, as in the other two about blasphemy and Sabbath-breaking: for he went in to consult with him, as he did also in the case of Zelophehad's daughters, whose cause he brought before the Lord (ch. xxvii. 5).

[I will hear what the Lord will command] These words seem to signify, that Moses might go into the holy place when he pleased to inquire of God; where God spake with him in an audible voice (ch. vii. 89), whensoever he desired satisfaction about any doubt. So Abarinel, who in this forsakes the Talmudists: for they fancy, that because God called to Moses, and then spake to him out of the tabernacle (Lev. i. 1), he could never go into the holy place, but when he was called. Which was true only at that time, when the glory of the Lord had newly filled the tabernacle; so that he durst not come into it, till he was invited; but was not a general rule to be observed in all his colloquies with the Divine Majesty (that he should wait till he had a singular call to come to him); for it is plain by this place, that he went in to speak with him, whensoever he had occasion.

Ver. 9.] He brought this case before the Lord, as his manner was in such doubts, and the Lord gave him the following answer; which was to be a rule, not only to these present inquirers, but to all posterity.

Ver. 10. If any man of you—shall be unclean] From hence the Jews observe, that this is a law concerning particular persons only; not concerning all the people, or the major part of them. For, as the Mischna saith in the title Pesachim (cap. 7), if all the people, or the greater part, or the priests, had contracted any defilement, they ought notwithstanding to keep the passover, even in that defilement. But if the lesser part only were defiled, then they that were clean ought to keep it in the first month, and they that were defiled in the second. This they ground upon the very first words of this law (ver. 6), "there were certain men;" and upon these, "if any man of you," &c. From whence, saith Maimonides, this doctrine follows, out of ancient tradition, that "there were some private persons, who were adjourned to the second passover; but if the generality should be defiled by the dead, they were not to be so adjourned, but to sacrifice in that uncleanness." A great deal more to the same purpose may be seen in the forenamed Mr. Selden, lib. ii. De Synedr. cap. 1, n. 3.

[By reason of a dead body,] This case is mentioned instead of all other of like nature. For there was the same reason for those who were unclean by a leprosy; for women in child-bed, or that were menstruous, or those that had a running issue, or had touched a dead carcass. And this some of them ground upon ver. 13, where, speaking of those who should keep the passover, it is said in general, the man that is clean, &c., therefore, he that was any way unclean might not keep it.

[Or be in a journey afar off,] Out of his own country (for it could not be kept anywhere but in Judea, Deut. xvi. 2), or at such a distance that he could not reach the tabernacle upon the day appointed. In the Mischna, indeed, this dereck recho-kah, as it is in the Hebrew (a long way off), is defined to be fifteen miles from Jerusalem, or the place where the tabernacle was. Whence Maimonides saith, "If any man on the fourteenth day of the month Nisan, at sunrising, was fifteen miles or more from Jerusalem, this was a remote way; but if he was not so far from it, he was not comprehended in this remote way; for he might be at Jerusalem time enough in the afternoon to keep the passover that evening; though he went but a slow pace, and that on foot. But I do not take this to be a reasonable explication. Philo hath determined the distance a great deal better, according to the interpretation I mentioned at first, lib. iii. De Vita Mosis, where he saith, the second passover was permitted, τοῖς μακρὰς χάριν ἀποδηρίας χωλινομένοις, &c., "To such who were hindered by their travels into countries a great way off, from sacrificing with the rest of their nation. For it was not their fault that they were deprived of this honour; especially considering that so small a country as Judea could not contain such a populous nation, but sent out colonies into many places." As for those who were only fifteen miles from Jerusalem, they might easily have come to the feast, if not on the fourteenth day, yet the day before; and if this distance had been a good reason to excuse their absence, most of the nation might have stayed away without any danger.

[Yet he shall keep the passover] When that uncleanness is gone, and he is returned to his own country again.

Ver. 11. The fourteenth day] They had a whole month's time given them, to dispose themselves and their affairs, so that they might be able to keep it.

[Eat it with unleavened bread and bitter herbs.] Those Jews who are called Karaites, as Mr. Selden observes in the place before named (n. 7), expressly say, that they were not bound in the second month passover unto more than this; to eat the lamb with unleavened bread and bitter herbs: but they were not obliged to keep the feast of unleavened bread seven days, because they might do that in the passover of the first month: for the unclean are only prohibited to eat the passover, but not to keep the feast of unleavened bread.

If the same persons that could not keep it in the 12 They shall leave none of it unto the morning, nor break any bone of it: according to all the ordinances of the passover they shall keep it.

13 But the man that is clean, and is not in a journey, and forbeareth to keep the passover, even the same soul shall be cut off from among his people: because he brought not the offering of the LORD in his appointed season, that man shall bear his sin.

14 And if a stranger shall sojourn among you, and will keep the passover unto the LORD; according to the ordinance of the passover, and according to the manner thereof, so shall he do: ye shall have one ordinance, both for the stranger, and for him that was born in the land.

15 ¶ And on the day that the tabernacle was reared up the cloud covered the tabernacle, namely, the tent of the testimony: and at even there was upon the tabernacle as it were the appearance of fire, until the morning.

16 So it was alway: the cloud covered it by day, and the appearance of fire by night.

17 And when the cloud was taken up from the tabernacle, then after that the children of Israel journeyed: and in the place where the cloud abode, there the children of Israel pitched their tents.

18 At the commandment of the LORD the children of Israel journeyed, and at the commandment of the LORD they pitched: as long as the cloud abode upon the tabernacle they rested in their tents.

19 And when the cloud tarried long upon the tabernacle many days, then the children of Israel first month, happened again to be unclean in the second, they could not keep it in the third, or the fourth months: for this had been to confound one feast with another; and there is no order for it.

Ver. 12. Leave none of it] This belongs to the eating of the paschal lamb (Exod. xii. 10, 16).

According to all the ordinances] See ver. 3. This is to be understood of all the rites that were proper to the offering, and to the eating of the paschal lamb; but not to the keeping of the seven days of unleavened bread.

Ver. 13. But the man that—forbeareth to keep the passover,] In the first month, which was the time appointed for it.

Shall be cut off] By the hand of the judges, or of God.

Because he brought not the offering] See ver. 7.

That man shall bear his sin.] The punishment of it.

Ver. 14. If a stranger shall sojourn among you,] He speaks of a proselyte, who had not entirely embraced their religion; but was no idolater.

And will keep the passover] Hath a desire to join with you in the solemnity.

According to the ordinance] He was to be circumcised, and his whole family; or otherwise he could not be permitted to keep it (see Exod. xii. 41). If he was made an entire proselyte after the passover in the first month, and before that in the second, it was a question whether he might keep it then or not.

Ye shall have one ordinance,] See Exod. xii. 49.

Ver. 15. On the day that the tabernacle was reared up] This is here mentioned again by Moses, because he is going to speak of their removal from Sinai; which was by the direction and guidance of this cloud, which settled upon the tabernacle when it was first erected (Exod. xl. 34).

The cloud covered—the tent of the testimony:] The words may be exactly rendered out of the Hebrew, “the cloud covered the (mischam, or) dwelling-place of God, upon (or over) the tent of the testimony:” that is, over that part of the tabernacle where the ark was, the cloud appeared visible to all, viz. over the most holy place; where the Lord appeared in a glorious cloud upon the mercy-seat (Lev. xvi. 2).

At even] When it grew dark.

There was upon the tabernacle] Upon that part of it now mentioned.

The appearance of fire,] The same cloud which was outwardly dark, was bright within, and turned that light side towards them in the night; when the cloudy part could not be seen nor be useful to them.

Until the morning.] Till it was day, when the cloud was more serviceable to them than the light.

VOL. I.—76

Ver. 16. So it was alway:] All the time of their continuance in the wilderness (see Exod. xiii. 21).

The cloud covered it by day,] The word by day is not in the original: it being the manner of the Hebrew language to omit a word sometimes in one part of a sentence, which the other part necessarily supplies; as in Ps. lxxxiv. 11, “One day in thy courts is better than a thousand;” i. e. in any other place. And Ps. xci. 7, “a thousand shall fall at thy side (i. e. on thy left hand), and ten thousand at thy right hand.”

The appearance of fire by night,] As the dark side of the cloud appeared by day over the holy place, when they had need of no other light but that of the sun; so the bright part appeared every night, and that like fire; when the cloud, by reason of darkness, could not be seen, nor be serviceable to them for their direction (see Exod. xl. 38).

Ver. 17. When the cloud was taken up] Or went up from off the tabernacle, which it before covered, and appeared higher in the air. From hence to the end of the chapter, Moses gives an account of their removal from Mount Sinai, and the reason of their staying a longer or shorter time in those places to which they removed, all the time of their travels in the wilderness.

Then after that the children of Israel journeyed:] They took down the tabernacle, when the cloud was gone up from it (as had been directed, ch. iv. 5, &c.), and followed the cloud, which went before them, and led them to the place where they were to rest (Exod. xiii. 21).

Where the cloud abode,] Where it stopped its motion, and stood still.

Pitched their tents,] Set up the tabernacle, and encamped round about it.

Ver. 18. At the commandment of the Lord] The motion of the cloud was an indication of the Divine pleasure, that they should move also, and go towards another station: which they did, and went on as long as the cloud moved.

They pitched:] For when the cloud stood still, that was a Divine direction to them to stand still also, and there to fix their station where the cloud stood; which, as soon as the tabernacle was set up again, came down and settled upon it, in its wonted place, over the tent of the testimony (ver. 15).

As long as the cloud abode—they rested] And as long as the cloud rested immovable, in that new place to which it had conducted them, they likewise rested in tents round about it.

Ver. 19. When the cloud tarried long] As it some kept the charge of the Lord, and journeyed not.

20 And so it was, when the cloud was a few days upon the tabernacle; according to the commandment of the Lord they abode in their tents, and according to the commandment of the Lord they journeyed.

21 And so it was, when the cloud abode from even unto the morning, and that the cloud was taken up in the morning, then they journeyed: whether it was by day or by night times did: for Maimonides reckons that they stayed eighteen years in one place.

Then the children of Israel kept the charge of the Lord.] This phrase is used here something differently from the sense it hath, ch. iii. 25, 28, &c., signifying their obedience to God in fixing their abode there, where the cloud rested, till it moved again, though it rested never so long.

Journeyed not.] This is the explication of the foregoing words, "they kept the charge of the Lord;" not daring to stir without the conduct of God, though sometimes they stayed so long in a place, that, no doubt, it was very irksome to those who were very desirous, if not impatient, to be in the land of promise. This is an instance of some regard they had to the Divine Majesty; though they did not fear and reverence him so much as they ought to have done; which appeared by their frequent mutinies and disobedience, mentioned in the following story.

Ver. 20.] If they had a desire to rest awhile longer in some station which was very convenient for them; yet, upon the motion of the cloud, they took down their tents and moved also.

Ver. 21. And so it was, when the cloud—was taken up in the morning, then they journeyed.] That is, if it did not stay a whole day in a place, but settling, in the even upon the tabernacle, it was taken up again the next morning; yet they followed its motion. This is a great instance of their obedience in this particular: for, having rested but one night, they might be weary, and very unwilling to take down their tents and the tabernacle, and travel again the next morning.

Whether it was by day or by night] This is a further instance of their being perfectly guided by God in this matter; that, though they were at rest in their beds, yet, if notice was given of the motion of the cloud, they rose up and went after it. For they were sensible their safety depended upon the protection and guidance of this cloud.

Ver. 22. Or whether it were two days, or a month, or a year, &c.] These words may seem superfluous (saith Maimonides, par. iii. More Nevochim, cap. 50) unto those who do not consider the intention of Moses in this relation; which was, to confute the conceit of profane people, who imagined the reason of the Israelites staying so long in the wilderness was, because they lost their way. For the Arabians, he saith, in his days, still called the wilderness, in which that the cloud was taken up, they journeyed.

22 Or whether it were two days, or a month, or a year, that the cloud tarried upon the tabernacle, remaining thereon, the children of Israel abode in their tents, and journeyed not; but when it was taken up, they journeyed.

23 At the commandment of the Lord they rested in the tents, and at the commandment of the Lord they journeyed: they kept the charge of the Lord, at the commandment of the Lord by the hand of Moses.

they travelled, the wandering desert; fancying the Israelites here bewildered (as we speak), and could not find their way out; but wandered like men in the dark, backward and forward; not knowing which way to turn themselves: therefore the Scripture punctually shows that all their removals (which were irregular), and the time they rested in any place (which was very unequal, being sometimes for eighteen years, sometimes only for one day, or one night), were all ordered by a special direction of God. For which cause all the circumstances of their motion are recited so particularly by Moses. Which shows, also, that the way from Horeb to Kadesh-barnea (on the borders of the land of Canaan) was a plain, known, and beaten road, of about eleven days' journey; which it was not easy for them to miss. And therefore the cause of their going about, and of their staying forty years in the wilderness, is that which Moses relates.

Ver. 23. At the commandment of the Lord they rested, &c.] This is the usual recapitulation of what goes before (see ch. ii. 34, iv. 49, vi. 21); and here was the more necessary, because it gives an account of a most material thing, their long stay in the desert, through which God thought fit to lead them (Exod. xiii. 17, 18).

They kept the charge of the Lord.] Moved or rested according to the direction which God gave them.

At the commandment of the Lord] See ver. 18.

By the hand of Moses.] By his ministry, who told them they were to be guided in their motions by the cloud. And therefore they expected no other commandment but that, the Lord being in that cloud, and telling them by its motion or rest what they should do. And when it did move, no question, it was so leisurely, as that they, their children, and cattle might follow it with ease, and be able to take their necessary refreshment.

It is observable, that in all these verses 18, 20, 23, where it is said they journeyed or rested al pi (at the mouth), which we well translate "at the commandment of the Lord," Onkelos renders it "at the mouth (or commandment) of the Word of the Lord:" which Word he takes to have given to Moses all the commandments he received; for so he translates those words, Exod. xxv. 22. "And there will I meet thee by these; and I will prepare (or appoint) my Word to thee there;" to deliver, that is, the Divine oracles and answers to him.

CHAPTER X.

1 The use of the silver trumpets. 11 The Israelites remove from Sinai to Paran. 14 The order of their march.
29 Ihobab is intreated by Moses not to leave them. 33 The blessing of Moses at the removing and resting of the ark.

1 AND the LORD spake unto Moses, saying,
2 Make thee two trumpets of silver; of a whole piece shalt thou make them: that thou mayest use them for the calling of the assembly, and for the journeying of the camps.

3 And when they shall blow with them, all the assembly shall assemble themselves to thee at the door of the tabernacle of the congregation.

4 And if they blow but with one trumpet, then the princes, which are heads of the thousands of Israel, shall gather themselves unto thee.

CHAP. X.

Ver. 1.] This commandment concerning the trumpets, it is very likely, was given before, but not mentioned till now, when there was an occasion for one principal use of them, viz. the removal of their camp (ver. 11).

Ver. 2. Make thee two trumpets] There were several sorts of trumpets, of different form, among the ancients, as Eustathius shows upon Homer's Iliad Σ. p. 1138, where he mentions six: the second of which was στρογγύλη, "turned up round" like a ram's horn, which, he saith, the Egyptians used (it being found out by Osiris) when they called the people to their sacrifices; χρῶνται δὲ αὐτῇ πρὸς θυσίας καλοῦντες τοὺς ὄχλους δι' αὐτῆς. It was called in their language χρονή. Now in this Moses opposed the Egyptians (which they would do well to take notice of, who make their customs to be of the greatest antiquity); for those which he here ordered to be made were long, such as we use at present. So Josephus tells us, in whom there is a large description of them, lib. iii. Antiq. cap. 11, where he saith they were a cubit long, and narrow, like a pipe; but wider, as ours are, at the bottom.

Though only two be now ordered for present use, it did not hinder their making more hereafter: when both priests and people also were multiplied; see 2 Chron. v. 12, where, in Solomon's time, there were a hundred and twenty priests sounding with trumpets. And Josephus mentions a vast number more (lib. viii. Antiq. cap. 2).

Of silver] These being sacred trumpets, as Josephus frequently calls them, it was fit they should be made of this pure metal; which gave them also a shriller sound.

Of a whole piece] As he did the candlestick (Exod. xxxv. 31), which made them the more firm, and apter to give a certain and distinct sound.

Use them for the calling of the assembly, &c.] These are the two great uses for which they were designed: unto which some think a third is added (ver. 9, see here). It is certain that in ver. 10, another use of them is assigned.

Ver. 3. When they] i. e. The priests (ver. 8).

Shall blow] With an equal and continued sound.

With them] With both the trumpets, as appears from ver. 4.

All the assembly shall assemble] By this kind of sound, with both the trumpets, the people understood that the whole congregation was called to meet together.

At the door] Which seems to have been the usual place where they assembled; and made their meet-

5 When ye blow an alarm, then the camps that lie on the east parts shall go forward.

6 When ye blow an alarm the second time, then the camps that lie on the south side shall take their journey: they shall blow an alarm for their journeys.

7 But when the congregation is to be gathered together, ye shall blow, but ye shall not sound an alarm.

8 And the sons of Aaron, the priests, shall blow with the trumpets; and they shall be to you ing the more solemn, because it was before the Lord.

Ver. 4. If they blow but with one trumpet, then the princes, &c.] If only one trumpet made the sound before mentioned, it was intended to summon only the princes of Israel to attend Moses.

Shall gather themselves] At the door of the tabernacle of the congregation, as was said before.

Ver. 5. When ye blow an alarm] When they did not simply blow with a long, even, and plain blast; but with an interrupted, and a broken or trembling sound: which had, as the Jews say, a plain note before, and after that a quavering. We generally explain it by a tara-ten-tara; but that word (as Dr. Lightfoot observes) signifies a blast, which put the quavering sound before and after, and the plain note in the midst; which is contrary to the Jewish description of it (see Temple Service, ch. 7, sect. 2). Hottinger makes no other distinction between the foregoing sound (ver. 3), called tehiah, and this, called teruah; but that the former was equal, and this was quick and concise (Analect. Dissert. iii. p. 152).

Then the camps that lie on the east parts shall go forward] viz. If this alarm was blown only once (as appears from ver. 6), then the hosts that were under the standard of Judah began to march (see ch. ii. 3).

Ver. 6. When ye blow an alarm the second time, &c.] Having ceased for a while, if the alarm was blown again, then those tribes which were under the standard of Reuben (ch. ii. ver. 10, 11, &c.) began to move, who lay on the south side.

They shall blow an alarm for their journeys] That is, they shall blow a third and fourth alarm, for the moving of the other two standards. So the LXX. rightly explains it, in so many words at length; "Ye shall blow an alarm the third time, and the camps that lie towards the sea (i. e. on the west side) shall take their journey; and ye shall blow the fourth alarm, and they that lie towards the north," &c. In what order the camp of the Levites moved, is related afterward, ver. 17, 21.

Ver. 7.] Here is a manifest distinction between plain blowing and sounding an alarm; which were for different purposes, and accordingly to be used (ver. 3, 5).

Ver. 8. The sons of Aaron—shall blow] None else were permitted to use them, either for calling the assembly together, or for their march, or at their feasts: because God would have the greater regard paid to the sound which was made by his ministers: as if he himself called upon them to attend his summons.

They shall be to you for an ordinance for ever] These trumpets shall be used by you, not only while for an ordinance for ever throughout your generations.

9 And if ye go to war in your land against the enemy that oppresses you, then ye shall blow an alarm with the trumpets; and ye shall be remembered before the Lord your God, and ye shall be saved from your enemies.

you stay in the wilderness, but in future ages, as long as you are a nation.

Ver. 9. If ye go to war in your land against the enemy, &c.] This is thought to be a third use of the trumpets; when they were going to give battle to their enemies. Which may be confirmed from ch. xxxi. 6, and from 2 Chron. xiii. 12. But this doth not exclude another meaning; which is, that they called the people together to fast and pray to God before they went out to battle. For it is certain that a fast was proclaimed by blowing of the trumpet (Joel ii. 15, &c.). Which justifies what Maimonides saith in Taanioth, cap. 1, that they blow with the trumpet, not only when they were in danger from their enemies, but in all other distresses, by famine, or pestilence, &c. For he makes this blowing with the trumpets in this place, to be the same with that precept, Ps. l. 14, "Call upon me in the day of trouble" (More Nevoch. par. iii. cap. 36). The only objection that I can find against this exposition (which is very ancient) is, that Moses speaks here of blowing an alarm with the trumpets; which was not used (ver. 7) for calling the assembly together, but for the motion of the camps (ver. 5). Yet one cannot conceive how they should be gathered together to make an army to fight with their enemies, but by some sort of sound with the trumpet (see Judg. iii. 27, vi. 34), and being met, it is highly probable they called upon God by prayer and fasting for good success; as the latter part of this verse intimates. Besides, these silver trumpets seem to have been used only at the sanctuary; and other trumpets were used when they went to war. For at the siege of Jericho, the priests blew with horns, not with these silver trumpets. Therefore, they may well be thought here to have called them to the sanctuary to pray to God before they went to war; and that by blowing an alarm, whereby they understood the meaning of the summons. And if we may believe the Jews, they used, when the temple was built, to blow an alarm every morning at the opening of the gates of it; particularly at the opening of the east gate, called the gate of Nicanor (as Dr. Lightfoot observes in the place above named); for which, though there was no express command, yet it was grounded on this reason, that the Levites, who were God's host, as they are often called in this book (ch. iv. 3, &c., viii. 24), might be awakened to come and attend their service in the house of God.

Ye shall be remembered before the Lord] He will be merciful to you, and grant your request; as the next words explain it.

Ye shall be saved] Which is to be understood with this condition, "that they turned to him with unfeigned repentance;" which was the proper intention of their prayer and fasting.

Ver. 10. In the day of your gladness.] Here is the fourth use of these trumpets, which were blown when they rejoiced for the good success, suppose, of their arms, or any other great deliverance; like that mentioned Esther ix. 19, when they feasted upon the peace-offerings, which were then offered. And thus it was when Solomon built the temple (2 Chron. v. 12, vii. 6), and at the laying the foundation of the second temple after the captivity (Ezra iii. 10), and at the dedication of the walls of Jerusalem (Neh. xii. 27, 35).

10 Also in the day of your gladness, and in your solemn days, and in the beginnings of your months, ye shall blow with the trumpets over your burnt offerings, and over the sacrifices of your peace offerings; that they may be to you for a memorial before your God: I am the Lord your God.

In your solemn days,] Mentioned in Lev. xxiii. which were proclaimed by sound of trumpet (see there, ver. 2); and there were great feasts upon many of them, at which the Levites, the poor, and the widows were entertained (Deut. xvi. 11; Neh. viii. 10, 12). But they were not all feasts which are there mentioned; for one of those solemn days was a fast, viz. the great day of atonement. And therefore the Hebrew word mode should rather be translated days of assemblies, as our Mr. Thorndike observes; who (in his book concerning the Service of God at religious Assemblies) notes, that Moses here distinguishes three sorts of solemnities. First, "The days of your gladness;" which signifies solemnities to be celebrated with cheerfulness of heart, i. e. feasts. Then, "The solemn days of assemblies" (as he translates it); containing, besides those, assemblies for humiliation, as the day of atonement. And lastly, "The beginnings of your months;" to which there was a peculiar service appointed (ch. xxviii. 11).

In the beginnings of your months,] On the new moons, which the Jews observed, not like those other festivities and days of assemblies, upon which they abstained from all servile work; but with special sacrifices, which God appointed to be offered to him upon them (Numb. xxviii. 11, 14), and with the solemnity of blowing with trumpets (Ps. lxxxix. 3). And they were the more careful to observe the new moons, because their great festivals depended upon them; though they are not reckoned among their festivals or solemn assemblies (Lev. xxiii.), but only the first day of the seventh month was a memorial of blowing of trumpets (ver. 24), which gave occasion, perhaps, for observing all the new moons in the year. And there being no express command for observing the first day of the month, but only for peculiar sacrifices upon it, and blowing of trumpets, some argue from thence, that, in the most ancient times, before the law of Moses, new moons were observed with festival joy (it being plain that they were so in the days of Hesiod); of which, though we can have no certainty, yet it is very probable, that the idolatry of worshipping the sun, moon, and stars, being then in the world, they were wont, at the appearance of every moon, to express much joy, and offer sacrifices to it. From which God intended to preserve his people, by appointing special sacrifices (with blowing of trumpets) to be offered unto himself at that time. And it is manifest the Jews were so observant of the new moons, that they seem to have regarded them next to their Sabbath, as times of religious worship of the Divine Majesty (2 Kings iv. 23; Isa. lxvi. 23; Amos viii. 5).

And thus I find, that among the Athenians (whose laws are observed by many to have been derived from Moses), the first day of the month was ἡσποράτη ἡμέρα, as Plutarch speaks, "a most holy day;" and yet it was not a festival; nor was it consecrated to any particular god, but unto all. And there was a law, ταῖς νουμηνίαις δύναι, "that they offer sacrifices upon the first day of the month;" when they went up to the acropolis (as Demosthenes tells us) to pray for the public welfare of the city, and for their own private happiness (see Sam. Petrus in his Comment. in Leges Atticas, lib. i. tit. 1, p. 85).

11 ¶ And it came to pass on the twentieth day of the second month, in the second year, that the cloud was taken up from off the tabernacle of the testimony.

12 And the children of Israel took their journeys out of the wilderness of Sinai; and the cloud rested in the wilderness of Paran.

13 And they first took their journey according to the commandment of the LORD by the hand of Moses.

14 ¶ In the first place went the standard of the camp of the children of Judah according to their armies: and over his host was Nahshon the son of Amminadab.

15 And over the host of the tribe of the children of Issachar was Nethaneel the son of Zuar.

16 And over the host of the tribe of the children of Zebulun was Eliab the son of Helon.

17 And the tabernacle was taken down; and the sons of Gershon and the sons of Merari set forward, bearing the tabernacle.

18 ¶ And the standard of the camp of Reuben set forward according to their armies: and over his host was Elizur the son of Shedeur.

19 And over the host of the tribe of the children of Simeon was Shelumiel the son of Zurishaddai.

20 And over the host of the tribe of the children of Gad was Eliasaph the son of Deuel.

21 And the Kohathites set forward, bearing the sanctuary: and the other did set up the tabernacle against they came.

22 ¶ And the standard of the camp of the children of Ephraim set forward according to their armies: and over his host was Elishama the son of Ammihud.

23 And over the host of the tribe of the children of Manasseh was Gamaliel the son of Pedahzur.

24 And over the host of the tribe of the children of Benjamin was Abidan the son of Gideon.

25 ¶ And the standard of the camp of the children of Dan set forward, which was the re-

Over the burnt offerings,] Especially the morning sacrifice; at the offering of which the trumpets began to sound (2 Chron. xxix. 27).

Over the sacrifice of your peace offerings;] Which, being sacrifices of thanksgiving, it was very proper to have them attended with the sound of the trumpets.

That they may be to you for a memorial] i. e. That he may graciously accept your offerings, and bless you (as the phrase signifies in the foregoing verse), when he sees his service to be your delight and joy.

I am the Lord your God.] By whose sovereign authority these commands were given; and in the observance of which they might be assured of his blessing.

Ver. 11. On the twentieth day] After their coming out of Egypt, as appears from ch. i. 1.

That the cloud was taken up] In token that they were to begin to move, as the cloud did (ch. ix. 17).

From off the tabernacle] i. e. The most holy place, over which it resided (ch. ix. 15).

Ver. 12. Took their journeys] After the cloud was taken up, it stood still for some time, till they had taken down the tabernacle, and packed up their own tents and household-stuff. Or else, while those under the first standard moved, they took down the tabernacle; but still the three tribes which first moved, upon the going up of the cloud, must have some time allowed to take up their own tents, &c.

Out of the wilderness] Where they had stayed near a year.

The cloud rested] After three days' motion (ver. 33).

In the wilderness of Paran.] Where they had several stations, besides this; which was the midway between the Red Sea and the land of Canaan; and, from the graves of those that lusted, was called Kibroth-hattaavah (ch. xi. 33, xxxiii. 16), where they stayed a month; and from thence went to Hazeroth; and were still in the wilderness of Paran (ch. xii. 16).

Ver. 13. They first took their journey] In the Hebrew words are, "they journeyed at the first;" i. e. at their first removal; which was this.

According to the commandment] Not whether they pleased themselves, but according as God had before directed, when the cloud was taken up; and in such order as he appointed (see ch. ix. 18): and there seems to have been a special direction, by an express command, for this first removal (Deut. i. 6, 7).

Ver. 14.] By this it appears, that the foregoing words, concerning their removal "according to the commandment of the Lord," relate to the order of their march, as well as to the way they went. See, concerning those that marched under his standard, and their commanders (which are here mentioned, and in the two next verses), ch. ii. 1, 3, 5, 7.

Ver. 17. The tabernacle was taken down;] By the Levites (ch. i. 51), who went about this work as soon as the cloud went up from the tabernacle; while the three tribes under the standard of Judah were setting themselves to move.

The sons of Gershon and—Merari set forward,] They immediately followed the three tribes, which encamped on the east of it, under the standard of Judah.

Bearing the tabernacle.] Such parts of it as were committed to each of their charge (see ch. iv. 24, &c., 31, &c.).

Ver. 18.] Of this and the two following verses, see ch. ii. 10, 12, 14.

Ver. 21. The Kohathites set forward, bearing the sanctuary:] That is, the ark, the holy table, the candlestick, &c., and other things belonging to the sanctuary (ch. iv. 15, 16, &c.), which the Kohathites carried in the middle of the four camps, for their greater security.

The other] i. e. the Gershonites and the Merarites before mentioned (ver. 17).

Did set up the tabernacle against they came.] When the cloud rested, the two foregoing camps under the standards of Judah and Reuben rested also; and settled themselves in their tents: which while they were doing, the Gershonites and Merarites (who marched between them) set up the tabernacle, that it might be ready to receive the ark, and the other holy things, which followed immediately, under the care of the Kohathites. This shows the excellent order wherein they always moved; not only without any tumult or confusion, but with such a discipline as signified they were under the conduct of a most skillful leader.

Ver. 22.] After the Kohathites followed three other tribes, who were under this standard: see ch. ii. 18, 20, 22, 24, where all that was needful hath been said of the two following verses.

Ver. 25. Dan] See concerning him, and those mentioned in the two next verses, ch. ii. 25, 27, 29.

ward of all the camps throughout their hosts : and over his host was Ahiezer the son of Amishaddai.

26 And over the host of the tribe of the children of Asher was Pagiel the son of Ocran.

27 And over the host of the tribe of the children of Naphtali was Ahira the son of Enan.

28 Thus were the journeyings of the children of Israel according to their armies, when they set forward.

29 ¶ And Moses said unto Hobab, the son of Raguel the Midianite, Moses' father in law, We are journeying unto the place of which the Lord said, I will give it you : come thou with us, and we will do thee good : for the Lord hath spoken good concerning Israel.

30 And he said unto him, I will not go ; but I will depart to mine own land, and to my kindred.

31 And he said, Leave us not, I pray thee ; forasmuch as thou knowest how we are to encamp in the wilderness, and thou mayest be to us instead of eyes.

32 And it shall be, if thou go with us, yea, it shall be, that what goodness the Lord shall do unto us, the same will we do unto thee.

33 ¶ And they departed from the mount of the Lord three days' journey : and the ark of

Which was the reeward of all the camps] The Hebrew word measseph (which we translate was the reeward) comes from a word which everywhere signifies to gather together, or collect. And therefore is here to be so understood ; and the whole sentence thus rendered : "Then set forward the standard of the camp of Dan, gathering to it all the camps throughout their hosts :"<sup>2</sup> or, "according to their armies," as we here translate the last part of these words (ver. 14, 18, 22). So Forsterus translates it ; the meaning being, that all the rest of the people, who were not a part of the four before mentioned camps, all under twenty years old (who were "not able to go forth to war"), together with the mixed multitude that came with them out of Egypt (Exod. xii. 38), and all the unclean persons, who were shut out of the camp (ch. v. 2), came after this hindermost standard of the children of Dan.

Ver. 28. Thus were the journeyings] In this order they marched, when they removed from one station to another.

Ver. 29. Moses said unto Hobab,] His wife's brother, as Theodoret understands it.

The son of Raguel the Midianite,] The son of Jethro, priest of Midian ; for Raguel and he are thought by many to be the same person (Exod. ii. 18, iii. 1) ; or one was the father, and the other the son, and Hobab was the grandson of Raguel.

Moses' father in law,] These words may either refer to Raguel, who is supposed to be Jethro ; and then it is rightly translated father-in-law : or they may as well refer to Hobab, and be translated brother-in-law ; for so the Hebrew word choten sometimes signifies, a very near kinsman. It cannot, without great straining, be otherwise expounded in Judges i. 16, and iv. 11. After Jethro, therefore, was gone back to his own country (Exod. xviii. 27), Hobab, his son, stayed still with his sister Zipporah, and accompanied Moses all the time he stayed near Sinai, which was not far from Midian, whither he thought to return, now the Israelites were marching away from that neighbourhood ; but Moses was desirous to have his company further, even to the land of promise.

We are journeying, &c.] i. e. To the land of Canaan ; for thither God intended to have brought them shortly after this removal ; as appears from Deut. i. 6, 7.

Come thou with us,] See ver. 32.

For the Lord hath spoken good concerning Israel.] Promised to bestow a noble country upon us for our inheritance.

Ver. 30. I will not go ;] This was his present resolution, till Moses had further persuaded him.

But I will depart to mine own land,] Which he was loth to leave, merely in hope of what the Israelites had not yet in possession.

To my kindred,] With whom all men love to live and die.

Ver. 31. He said,] i. e. Moses replied.

Leave us not, I pray thee ;] Do not persist in that resolution, but be persuaded to go along with us.

Forasmuch as thou knowest how we are to encamp in the wilderness,] He being a borderer upon this wilderness, was well acquainted with every part of it, and the better able to advise them how to secure their camp (for the cloud only served to direct them where it should be pitched), and defend themselves from the people, on all sides, that might be injurious to them ; which made Moses so earnest with him to stay with them, while they had such need of his assistance.

Thou mayest be to us instead of eyes,] To give them advice and counsel in any difficulty they might meet withal in the places where they stayed ; or to direct them how to provide themselves with such things as they wanted : for he, having lived long thereabouts, could not but understand the neighbouring countries. The LXX. understand this passage, as if he desired him to continue to be what he had been hitherto in the wilderness (viz. a good adviser, like his father Jethro), assuring him, they would look upon him as an elder ; that is, have him in great honour.

Ver. 32. If thou go with us,] Not only stay with us, while we are here in the wilderness, but go along with us into Canaan.

Yea, it shall be,] Depend upon it.

That what goodness the Lord shall do unto us, the same will we do unto thee.] Give thee some part of the possession which God shall bestow upon us. Accordingly it appears, that, as Moses prevailed with him to accompany them, so he and his posterity were settled among the Israelites, Judges i. 16, and iv. 11 (where either he or his father is called the Kenite), who lived in tents, not in houses, after the manner of their forefathers in Midian.

Ver. 33. They departed from the mount] viz. Horeb, in the wilderness of Sinai, where they had stayed a long time (Deut. i. 6).

Three days' journey ;] They travelled three days before the cloud settled again upon the tabernacle ; though it stood still sometimes (but did not descend) to give them time for necessary refreshment, and for sleep (see ch. xi. 1).

The ark of the covenant of the Lord went before them] It is said, ver. 21, that the sanctuary was carried between the first two standards and the last two ; i. e. in the midst of the camp, as we expressly read, ch. ii. 17, which Abarinel thinks is to be understood of all their journeys but only this. That was the constant order of their march ; first went the standard of Judah, next that of Reuben ; after this, the tabernacle of the congregation ; then followed the standard of Ephraim ; and last of all, that of the covenant of the Lord went before them in the three days' journey, to search out a resting place for them.

34 And the cloud of the Lord was upon them by day, when they went out of the camp.

Dan. But now, in their first removal, God did them the honour to appoint the ark to go before them, in the front of all the camps; as he did when they passed over Jordan (Josh. iii. 6); that is, in their first and last journeys this extraordinary favour was shown them; but in all the rest the ark went in the midst of them. And thus Aben Ezra upon this place: "This first removal was not like the rest of their removals." But I see no good ground for this exposition. The plain meaning seems to be, that the Lord, as their king and governor, led them by the cloud, which was always over the ark; just as a general leads his army, though he be not in the front of it, but in the midst, from whence he issues out his orders.

To search out a resting place] There was no need of inquiry after a fitting station for them; but he speaks after the manner of generals, who send officers before them, to take up the most convenient quarters for their army (see Deut. i. 33).

Ver. 34. It seems this removal of their camp from Sinai was in the day-time (as sometimes they removed in the night, ch. ix. 21); and the cloud being taken up from off the tabernacle, so moved over the ark as to overspread them all by day, as the pillar of fire was over them by night, to give them assurance of the Divine protection (see note upon Exod. xiii. 21, and Ps. cv. 39).

Ver. 35. When the ark set forward,] There being the letter nun turned the wrong way in the Hebrew word for set forward, as there is in the word for complained, in the first verse of the next chapter; the Jewish doctors fancy it denotes here God's gracious converting his face towards them, at the prayer of Moses; and, in the following story, the people's aversion to God, and ungrateful turning away their hearts from him.

Moses said,] It was his custom to pray in this manner upon such occasions; as R. Levi ben Gersom expounds it.

Rise up,] This is an expression (saith Abarbanel) like that in Isa. xxxiii. 10. "Now will I rise, saith the Lord, and will be exalted," &c., where his taking vengeance upon his enemies is called his rising; according to Job xxxi. 14, "What shall I do, when God riseth up," &c. The next words, "Let thine enemies be scattered," &c., justify this sense.

Lord,] It seems very strange to me, that any should allege this place as a proof that the ark is called Jehovah; when the prayer of Moses is so plainly directed to the Lord himself (who was there in a glorious symbol of his presence), and not to the ark; considering also, that in other places where this very form of speech is used, the Lord and the ark are most manifestly distinguished the one from the other (see 2 Chron. vi. 41, and Ps. cxxxii. 8). And yet an anonymous anti-trinitarian writer (confuted by Joseph de Vcisin fifty years ago), observing that the 35 And it came to pass, when the ark set forward, that Moses said, Rise up, Lord, and let thine enemies be scattered; and let them that hate thee flee before thee.

36 And when it rested, he said, Return, O Lord, unto the many thousands of Israel.

Chaldee here, instead of the Lord, hath the Word of the Lord, is so absurd as to say, that the ark is called the Word; because God (saith he, p. 234), ante illam responsa vel oracula sua dabat, &c., "before the ark gave his answers or oracles, when the priest, in dubious matters, consulted the mouth of the Lord;" which exposition carries its own confutation in it; for, if the high-priest consulted the mouth of the Lord (as he speaks), then, by the Word which gave the answer, must be meant the Lord himself; to whom Moses here directs his prayer, as the Jerusalem Targum excellently paraphrases this verse; "And it came to pass, when the ark was taken up, that Moses lifted up his hands in prayer, and said, Rise now, O Word of the Lord, in the strength of thy power, and scatter the enemies of thy people," &c.

Let thine enemies be scattered;] This is a prayer, that God would put all those to flight (as he had done the Amalekites, Exod. xvii.) who opposed their passage to the promised land; as, after they came thither, they used this prayer (Ps. lxxviii. 1) for his aid against all those who sought to dispossess them of it.

Let them that hate thee flee] This is a repetition of the same prayer, as is usual; for thine enemies, and those that hate thee signify the very same (Ps. xxi. 8, Dan. iv. 19, Luke i. 71).

Ver. 36. When it rested,] As it did wheresoever the cloud stayed, and moved no further.

He said,] He prayed again. So the Jerusalem Targum understands both this and the former verse, "Moses lifted up his hands in prayer, and said," &c. And Jonathan Uzzielides, "Moses stood in prayer, and begged mercy of God, saying," &c.

Return, O Lord, unto the many thousands of Israel.] Which Onkelos thus paraphrases, "Come again, and dwell with thy glory in the midst of us." And so he did; the cloud, wherein the Divine Majesty resided, settling upon the tabernacle, over the ark of the testimony, as soon as it was again pitched. Others translate it, Give rest, O Lord (which the Hebrew words will bear); secure us, that is, in peace against the incursions of our enemies, and all other dangers. R. Levi ben Gersom expounds it, Bring back the Israelites into the land of promise, where their forefathers dwelt when they were few in number; whose posterity was now increased to ten thousand thousands, as the last words are in the Hebrew. And there are those who will have this to be a prayer for their increase and multiplication into many more thousands than they were already. And thus the Jerusalem Targum (who still by the Lord understands his Word), "Return now, O Word of the Lord, from the vehemence of thy anger, and come back to us in thy merciful goodness; bless the myriads, and multiply the thousands of Israelites."

CHAP. XI.

Ver. 1. When the people complained,] Or, as it is translated in the margin, "were as it were complainers," or mutterers. Which words, D. Kimchi, in his Michol, brings as an instance to prove that the particle capth (which we translate as) doth sometimes serve only to signify the truth of a thing, and to confirm it, and imports nothing of likeness. For the discontent of the people did not rest in their minds, but broke out into open murmurings and undutiful complaints. The like he observes Gen. xxv. 31, 33, and Hosea v. 10, "The princes of Judah were like them that remove the bound;" where we make it to signify a similitude, but should only have taken it as a strong affirmation of the truth of the thing (see Theod. Hackspan. Disput. iv. De Locutionibus Sacris, n. 4).

Complained,] Of their long march for three days together, with their little children, cattle, and all their baggage. So it is commonly thought; but I can see no good ground for it. For, no doubt, the cloud stood still (though it did not come down and settle, as I said ch. x. 33), that they might make some convenient rests in their journey; else, how should they gather the manna that fell every night about their tents, and would keep but one day, as we read Exod. xvi. ? I conclude therefore, that this muttering was the beginning of those loud complaints which were made a little after (ver. 4, 5, &c.), because they were not brought by this removal to a place where they might have had other food than manna, of which they now grew weary, having lived upon it near a whole year.

It displeased the Lord;] In the Hebrew, "It was evil in the ears of the Lord;" that is, though it was only a muttering, which did not come to the ears of Moses (as this complaint shortly after did), yet the Lord took notice of it, and was much offended at it; as it here follows.

And the Lord heard it;] Or, when the Lord heard it, he demonstrated he was highly offended, by sending a fire among them.

The fire of the Lord burnt among them,] Some take this phrase, "fire of the Lord," to signify a great fire; as "mountains of the Lord" are high mountains; which came either from heaven like lightning (as in 2 Kings i. 12), or from the pillar of cloud and fire over the tabernacle; where the glory of the Lord appeared sometimes like unto fire.

Consumed them that were in the uttermost parts of the camp.] Where the mixed multitude was (as I observed, ch. x. 25), who came out of Egypt; and may well be supposed to have stirred up the Israelites to complain of their tedious journey, which had not yet brought them near to the land of Canaan. And perhaps some of them lagged behind on purpose, that they might complain of weariness (as some take it), or rather of want of stronger food. But Bochartus hath demonstrated, that this word which we translate the uttermost parts, signifies in all, or throughout. Of which he gives many instances out of Lud. De Dieu, upon Ezek. xxxiii. 1 (see Gen. xix. 4, and xlvii. 2, &c. Hierozoic. par. i. lib. ii. cap. 34). And therefore so it should be here rendered, consumed some in every part of the camp: where they began to make complaints one to another, of their being still in a wilderness.

Ver. 2. The people cried unto Moses;] Of whose power with God they had a great experience: but had reason to distrust their own interest in him, because of their murmuring humour: for it is likely they are the same people that cried now to Moses, who before complained (ver. 1).

When Moses prayed unto the Lord,] As they begged he would.

The fire was quenched.] Went out; and no signs of it appeared. So the Hebrew phrase signifies, it sunk. What number of them was burnt we are not told; it is likely not many, because the terror of it instantly made them deprecate God's displeasure, by Moses their intercessor; which put a stop to it.

Ver. 3. Taberah;] Which, for another reason, was also called Kibroth-hattaavah (ver. 34). They are mentioned, indeed, in Deut. ix. 22, as if they were two distinct places; but it is plain, by the story, that the things which occasioned both these names, happened in one and the same station. And therefore they were only different names for the same place; unless we suppose Kibroth-hattaavah to have been the name of that particular piece of ground in that place where the lusters were buried.

Because the fire of the Lord burnt among them.] This is the reason of the name of Taberah (which signifies a burning), which was imposed on this place, to preserve the memory both of God's judgments and of his mercy.

Ver. 4. The mixed multitude that was among them,] The Hebrew word hasaphsoph is well translated by Bochartus, populū colluviēs undecunq̄ue collecta, "the dregs or scum of the people gathered together from all parts." For the doubling of words increases their sense, in the Hebrew language, and makes the same with the superlative degree in other tongues; of which he gives many instances in his Hierozoic. (par. ii. lib. v. cap. 6). See Lev. xiii. 19, where adamameth signifies exceeding red: as hasaphsoph here doth a very great collection of all sorts of people, both Egyptians and other neighbouring nations, who were invited by their wonderful deliverance out of Egypt, to join themselves to the Israelites, as proselytes to their religion (see Exod. xii. 38). The Jews, in Tanchuma, say, there were forty thousand of them, and Jannes and Jambres at the head of them.

Fell a lusting;] He doth not say for what: and the Jews have taken the liberty to fancy what they please. Some of them say that they lusted after such women, as Moses had lately forbidden them to marry. So the them fell a lusting: and the children of Israel also wept again, and said, Who shall give us flesh to eat?

5 We remember the fish, which we did eat in Egypt freely; the cucumbers, and the melons, and the leeks, and the onions, and the garlick:

paraphrase of Uzielides; "Moses heard the people weeping, because those that were near of kin to them were forbidden in marriage." And he makes as if these proselytes petitioned Moses to abrogate those laws about incest. Such conceits others have indulged to themselves (as Mr. Selden shows, lib. ii. De Synedr. cap. 4, p. 202), when the words (in the end of this verse, and ver. 13, 18), plainly show they lasted for flesh to eat.

The children of Israel also] Though the mixed multitude were the first fomenters of this discontent, yet it ran among the children of Israel throughout the whole camp; and rose so high that they fell into a great passion.

Wept again,] They had shed some tears, it seems, before (when they complained, ver. 1), but now they wept aloud, out of anger, vexation, and grief. Or else this weeping again refers to their first murmuring a year ago, like unto this (Exod. xvi. 3).

And said,] They could not refrain from bursting out into such discontented language; as argued they were extremely angry, or rather enraged.

Who shall give us flesh to eat?] It is an expression of a vehement, impatient desire (mixed with despair) after flesh-meat; which they needed not to have wanted, if they would have killed their cattle, which they brought with them out of Egypt in great abundance (Exod. xii. 38), but they preserved them for breed when they came to Canaan; and if they killed them daily, they would not have lasted long to suffice six hundred thousand people, besides women and children (see ver. 21, 22). Besides this, while they continued in the wilderness, they were not permitted to eat any flesh, but only their share of the peace-offerings that were offered at the altar (Lev. xvii. 3—5). Which lasted, the Jews think, till they came to the land of Canaan, when this restraint was taken off (Deut. xii. 15, 16). And, indeed, the wilderness was so barren a place, that they could there have no great increase of cattle, scarce sufficient for sacrifice. They were angry, therefore, that they were not yet brought to a country where they might have had all sorts of flesh, without killing their own cattle; and have taken their fill of that and all other food (as appears by the next verse) at as easy rates as they had done in Egypt: whereas now they despaired, as I said, of getting any such food; for so such questions as this signify (Psalm cxlii. 5; Isai. liii. 8; John viii. 16).

Ver. 5. We remember the fish,] This shows that all kind of food is comprehended under flesh, for which they longed; particularly this, which is one sort of flesh (1 Cor. xv. 39).

Which we did eat in Egypt freely;] Or, for nothing: for they could easily catch them in the river of Egypt, which abounded with them (Isa. xix. 8), and in the sea also, which was not far from them; wherein was exceeding great plenty of excellent fish.

The cucumbers, and the melons, &c.] None of which grew here in the wilderness, but were there in such plenty and perfection, that they were the common food of the Egyptians: who were noted anciently for the meanness of their diet, as Casaubon observes, in lib. ix. Athenæi Deipnos. cap. 11, p. 674. Some fancy these things were the cheaper there, because the Egyptians durst not eat either fish, or leeks, or onions; as is said by Juvencal, Sat. xv. Pliny, lib.

6 But now our soul is dried away: there is nothing at all, beside this manna, before our eyes.

7 And the manna was as coriander seed, and the colour thereof as the colour of bdellium.

8 And the people went about, and gathered

xix. cap. 6, and Herodotus, lib. ii. cap. 37, where he saith, it was not lawful for the Egyptians to taste of fish. But, in my opinion, these words of the people demonstrate rather, that they were not so superstitious in the days of Moses; for they were not the words merely of the Israelites, but of the mixed multitude, who were the beginners of this mutiny, and of this sort of undutiful language; which, one would think, they put into the mouths of the Israelites, who could not otherwise have had the impudence to magnify their condition in Egypt, where they groaned under the sorest slavery.

It is a strange fancy of one of the doctors in the Talmud (in the title Jona), who by fishes understands harlots; whom this crew of mixed people lusted after.

The onions,] The Hebrew word chatzir properly signifies grass; which being no part of human food, the LXX. here render the word onions; as agreeable to the other words that accompany it. But the learned Ludolphus thinks they had no other reason for it; and therefore, out of the Arabian language, rather interprets it lettuce, or salads, in general, which were most excellent in Egypt (Dissert. De Locustis, par. ii. cap. 14).

Ver. 6. But now our soul is dried away:] They speak as if they were starved; and, as we speak, had neither life nor soul left in them. Such is the vile nature of discontented ingratitude, which makes men that are advanced from a poor to a plentiful condition contemn their present enjoyments, and praise their former wretched state.

There is nothing at all, beside this manna,] They were angry that they were come to a place where they found nothing but that of which they were now grown weary; and therefore speak of it with disdain.

Ver. 7. The manna] Upon this occasion he describes more fully what kind of thing it was which they despised, that it might appear how justly God was displeas'd with them for their ingratitude.

Was as coriander seed,] Not in colour (for that was like bdellium, as it here follows), but in its shape and form, being round (Exod. xvi. 14).

The colour thereof as the colour of bdellium,] Of a pure white colour, and bright like pearl; so that it was very grateful to the eye, as well as pleasant to the taste (see Exod. xvi. 31).

Ver. 8. The people went about,] Round their camp (Exod. xvi. 13).

Gathered it,] Fresh every morning; which made it still more acceptable (Exod. xvi. 18, 19).

Ground it in mills,] Into flour, with a hand-mill.

Beat it in a mortar,] Bruised it with a pestle, in a wooden or stone mortar.

Baked it in pans,] Or else boiled it (as R. Bechai expounds it) in a pot.

Made cakes of it:] Or make cakes of it in an oven, or in a pan; that is, saith the same R. Bechai, it was of such an excellent composition, that it might be dressed divers ways, or eaten as it fell. For, if they would, they might use it, saith he, for food immediately, as they gathered it; or they might grind it, or bruise it, and then either boil it or bake it; and it was agreeable in what way soever it was prepared; which Moses mentions, to show how ungrateful they were to God, who, by one thing, entertained them with great variety.

it, and ground it in mills, or beat it in a mortar, and baked it in pans, and made cakes of it: and the taste of it was as the taste of fresh oil.

9 And when the dew fell upon the camp in the night, the manna fell upon it.

10 ¶ Then Moses heard the people weep throughout their families, every man in the door of his tent: and the anger of the LORD was kindled greatly; Moses also was displeased.

11 And Moses said unto the LORD, Wherefore hast thou afflicted thy servant? and wherefore have I not found favour in thy sight, that thou

The taste of it was as the taste of fresh oil.] When it was newly fallen, it tasted like honey; but when it was prepared by boiling, or baking, it tasted like fresh oil (see Exod. xvi. 31). Or to some it had the taste of honey; to others, of fresh oil. The Jews, indeed, say it had all sorts of tastes, according to every man's desire. So the author of the Book of Wisdom speaks (ch. xvi. 20, 21), from the ancient tradition of the Hebrews: whereby, I suppose, they meant no more, but that it pleased every man's palate; and had in it all that could be desired in any meat; being grateful to the taste of young and old, and refreshed the spirits, and kept up the flesh of their bodies in good plight. For it is not unreasonably observed, by the aforesaid R. Bechai, that it is compared by Moses to fresh oil, which is fat as well as sweet, to show how unjust their complaint was, that they had no moisture left in them, but were dried away (ver. 6).

Ver. 9. When the dew fell—in the night.] There was a great providence of God in this, saith the same Bechai, which sent it in the night, while they slept quietly in their beds; that when they rose in the morning they might find their food ready for them. And thus, saith he, it was when they came to Canaan; the rains were wont to fall in the night season, and not in the day-time; that they might not be hindered from their work in the fields, and in their plantations.

The manna fell upon it.] That is, upon the dew; for it did not fall upon the camp, but round about it (see Exod. xvi. 14). This is a further aggravation of their ingratitude, that they despised this rare food, which came not out of the earth, or the waters, but from above, out of the air; and therefore was more pure and spirituous than cucumbers and leeks, &c., which crude and gross sort of food their depraved minds preferred before this celestial nourishment, which, by falling on the dew, was kept clean and pure for their use.

Huetius observes, that several authors, both ancient and modern, mention manna as a thing which sometimes falls in those countries (particularly in Arabia, and upon Libanus), which they call aerial honey, or dewy honey, and Syrian dew; which was fit for food. But it never fell in such quantity, nor so constantly, every day, for the space of forty years; and so delicious and hearty. All this was miraculous; as was also its melting when the sun shone upon it; and that it putrefied before the next day, except on the Sabbath, and yet kept in an urn many years (see Alnetane Quest. lib. ii. cap. 12, n. 17).

Ver. 10. Moses heard the people weep, throughout their families.] Or, for their families: or, about the state and condition of their families, as some of the Jews understand it, though to a foolish sense (see Selden, lib. ii. De Synedr. cap. 4, p. 203): who they pretended could not live any longer upon manna.

Every man in the door of his tent.] It may be understood of Moses's tent, about which the heads of laid the burden of all this people upon me?

12 Have I conceived all this people? have I begotten them, that thou shouldest say unto me, Carry them in thy bosom, as a nursing father beareth the sucking child, unto the land which thou swarest unto their fathers?

13 Whence should I have flesh to give unto all this people? for they weep unto me, saying, Give us flesh, that we may eat.

14 I am not able to bear all this people alone, because it is too heavy for me.

15 And if thou deal thus with me, kill me, I the several families were gathered; as mutinous soldiers are wont to be, about the door of their chief commander.

The anger of the Lord was kindled greatly.] Which brake forth shortly after, in a great plague upon them (ver. 34).

Moses also was displeased.] The same phrase with that, ver. 1.

It was evil in the eyes of Moses.] i. e. Grieved him so that it made him wish himself rid of the burden of their government.

Ver. 11. Moses said unto the Lord.] I suppose he went into the sanctuary to bewail himself, and pray God to relieve him (see ver. 24).

Wherefore hast thou afflicted thy servant?] By committing this people to his charge.

Wherefore have I not found favour in thy sight.] By granting the prayer which he made at his first call to this office (Exod. iii. 2, iv. 10).

That thou layest the burden of all this people upon me?] i. e. The principal care of such an untractable multitude upon one man, to whom they resorted in all difficulties (Exod. xviii. 22, 26).

Ver. 12. Have I conceived all this people? have I begotten them.] Are they my children, that I should make provision for the satisfaction of all their desires?

Carry them in thy bosom, &c.] Take a tender care of them, as a parent doth of a little infant, and conduct them into Canaan, &c. Nothing can more lively express the affection that princes ought to have for their people (if they have any regard to the will of God), than this Divine command to Moses.

Ver. 13. Whence should I have flesh to give?] It is impossible for me to do what they desire.

For they weep unto me, saying, Give us flesh.] And yet they will not be satisfied without it. He seems to be affected with their weeping, as the most loving parents are with the tears of a sucking child, when it cries for that which they have not for it.

Ver. 14. I am not able to bear all this people alone.] Let me have some joined to me to take part of this trouble with me, and help to manage them in such mutinies: for it is beyond my strength to undergo the toil of hearing all their complaints, and appeasing their tumults. Some may imagine there was no reason for this request; he having several persons already appointed to assist him, by the advice of Jethro (Exod. xviii.). But Rasi thinks those men were burnt in the late fire; because they did not suppress the beginning of this mutiny (ver. 1), but perhaps join in it: and so Bechai. But the true account is rather this, that they were set only to hear and judge smaller causes; all the weighty and difficult causes being still brought before Moses, to whom also the last appeal was made in every cause: which was so great a burden, that he complained for want of help in those great things which lay wholly upon him (see Exod. xviii. 22).

pray thee, out of hand, if I have found favour in thy sight; and let me not see my wretchedness.

16 ¶ And the Lord said unto Moses, Gather unto me seventy men of the elders of Israel, whom thou knowest to be the elders of the people, and officers over them; and bring

Ver. 15. If thou deal thus with me,] If thou leavest me still alone in this office.

Kill me, I pray thee, out of hand,] I shall take it for the greatest kindness to be taken immediately out of the world.

Let me not see my wretchedness.] Live to be a most miserable creature. For to see wretchedness is to be wretched; as to see death is to die (Psalm lxxxix. 48). And what could make such a tender parent as he was more miserable than their perpetual untowardness, together with the intolerable trouble it would give him to see heavy punishments continually befall them for their wickedness, and the enemies of God rejoice in their ruin?

Ver. 16. The Lord said unto Moses,] Here is not the least sign of God's dislike of this expostulation of Moses with God; which seems not very dutiful: because the vexation this stubborn people gave him was really so great, that he had reason to desire to be eased of it: which, though he begged with much earnestness, yet, no doubt, with no less submission to God's holy will and pleasure.

Gather unto me] These words are interpreted by the Talmudists, as if the meaning was, that "they may be a Sanhedrin to my land;" i. e. a holy, perpetual, standing council, to endure throughout all generations. For wheresoever we meet with this word li "unto me," they think it signifies a thing to be established by God to all generations. The examples they allege of it are these: of Aaron and his sons he saith, They shall minister unto me in the priest's office, (Exod. xxviii. 41), and of the Levites he saith (Numb. iii. 12), They shall be mine, or unto me; and of the Israelites (Lev. xxv. 55), Unto me the children of Israel are servants. The like is said of the first-born (Numb. iii. 13), of the sanctuary (Exod. xxv. 18), of the altar (Exod. xx. 24), of the holy ointment (Exod. xxx. 31), of the kingdom of David (1 Sam. xvi. 1), and of the sacrifices (Numb. xxviii. 2, see Mr. Selden, lib. ii. De Synedr. cap. 4, n. 2).

Seventy men of the elders of Israel,] This number is generally thought, both by the Jewish and Christian writers, to be derived from the number of persons that came down into Egypt with Jacob (Gen. xvi. 27), who, saith R. Bechai, were a kind of prototype of this number in future ages. For hence they were governed by so many elders when they were in Egypt, Exod. iii. 16 (where there is no mention indeed made of seventy, but he gathers it from what followed), and those were the seventy whom we find at the giving of the law, a little after they came out of Egypt (Exod. xxiv. 1, 9), who are called nobles, or great men (ver. 11). So that this number was not now first constituted; but rather continued and confirmed.

Whom thou knowest to be the elders] For there were many elders, out of whom seventy were chosen (see Exod. xxiv. 1).

Officers over them;] That is (saith R. Bechai) whom thou knowest to be of the number of those who, when they were officers in Egypt over the people, were beaten by Pharaoh's taskmasters (Exod. v. 14). Which word officers doth not signify men that had any judicial authority; but only such as had an inspection over others, to see they did their work, and them unto the tabernacle of the congregation, that they may stand there with thee.

17 And I will come down and talk with thee there: and I will take of the spirit which is upon thee, and will put it upon them; and they shall bear the burden of the people with thee, that thou bear it not thyself alone.

to give an account of them. But it is very likely they were persons of note, who had more than ordinary understanding and breeding, which advanced them to be inspectors of others. And therefore the Talmudists rightly observe, that the elders and officers here mentioned were, no doubt, men of wisdom and judgment; who knew how to use the authority that was committed to them. And it is not improbable (as some of them affirm) that they were chosen out of those lesser courts which were erected by the advice of Jethro. See Selden in the same place (sect. 5), who at large confutes Baronius and others; who say, that the number of the great Sanhedrin (which derived its original from hence) was seventy-two: and makes it appear they were only seventy; and with Moses, their head, seventy-one (sect. 8). And it is not unworthy our notice, that about the same time (as he observes, sect. 12), that this number of seventy judges was here constituted in the wilderness, the great judicature in Areopagus was constituted among the Greeks, viz., in the reign of Cecrops, the first king of Athens, after the Ogygian flood: when, according to Eusebius, the people of Israel were brought out of Egypt. The Marmora Arundeliana indeed say, this court was erected in the time of Cranaus; but that makes no great difference, for he was the successor of Cecrops. We do not find of what number it consisted, and it is certain it was the highest πάντων τῶν ἐν ταῖς Ἑλλάσι συνεδρίων, "of all the courts among the Greeks." And it is no less observable, that, as that court began about the same time with the constitution of this among the Hebrews, so they both ended in the reign of the emperor Vespasian; as the said Mr. Selden shows in that book (cap. 16, sect. 10).

Bring them unto the tabernacle] That there they might be as it were consecrated unto God; and that the people might know they received their authority from him.

That they may stand there with thee.] As those men who were to be sharers with him in his authority, and were like to him in wisdom, piety, and descent. So Maimonides glosses upon these words in Hilk. Sanhedr. cap. 2, where he saith, none were made members of the Sanhedrin but priests and Levites, and such of the Israelites as were descended from the noblest families; and quotes these words to prove it.

Ver. 17. I will come down] In a visible manner (ver. 25).

Talk with thee there;] To declare (perhaps in their audience), that he appointed them to the office of being the assistants of Moses in the government.

I will take of the spirit which is upon thee, and will put it upon them;] He did not take away from Moses any of the gifts which he had bestowed upon him; nor did he diminish them: but conferred upon these men some of the gifts (which are here meant by spirit), viz., of wisdom, and judgment, and courage; with all others that were needful in a governor. This R. Solomon Jarchi illustrates by the comparison of a great lamp set up in a room, at which many others are lighted, without the least diminution of its light (see further, ver. 25).

They shall bear the burden of the people with thee.] By this it appears it was the spirit of government which God intended to give them, that they might ease Moses, by assisting him, with the same authority

18 And say thou unto the people, Sanctify yourselves against to-morrow, and ye shall eat flesh: for ye have wept in the ears of the LORD, saying, Who shall give us flesh to eat? for it was well with us in Egypt: therefore the LORD will give you flesh, and ye shall eat.

19 Ye shall not eat one day, nor two days, nor five days, neither ten days, nor twenty days;

20 But even a whole month, until it come out at your nostrils, and it be loathsome unto you: because that ye have despised the LORD which is among you, and have wept before him, saying, Why came we forth out of Egypt?

21 And Moses said, The people, among whom I am, are six hundred thousand footmen; and thou hast said, I will give them flesh, that they may eat a whole month.

22 Shall the flocks and the herds be slain for that he had, to hinder or to appease such mutinies as now the people were fallen into.

That thou bear it not thyself alone.] That all the murmurings of the people might not be only against him; but some of their complaints might be diverted unto others: who might also help him in the judging of such causes as had hitherto been reserved to him alone. For it is plain that these seventy persons made a higher court than any of those constituted by the advice of Jethro.

Cornelius Bertram indeed fancies, that these rulers of thousands, hundreds, fifties, and tens, not being sufficient for the business committed to them (though he likewise conceives they had some of their several families joined with them), God appointed these seventy for their assistance, to whom they were to bring all causes which they could not determine, before they troubled Moses with them (lib. De Repub. Jud. cap. 6). But our learned Mr. Thorndike, in his Rights of the Church, ch. 2, hath well observed, that those captains were to be in place only during the pilgrimage of the wilderness; for when they came to the land of promise, the law provided that judges and ministers should be ordained in every city (Deut. xvi. 18), who, if there fell any difference about the law, were to repair to the place where God dwelt, to the successors of Moses, and these seventy, for resolution in it (Deut. vii. 11, 12). For, as he judiciously notes in his Review, p. 69 (suitable to what is here delivered), they were assumed to assist Moses in his great office of judging the hardest causes; and, by that law (Deut. xvii. 8, &c.), were afterwards made a standing court, resident at the place of the tabernacle; to judge the last result of all causes concerning the law, and to determine all matter of right not determined by the letter of the same.

Ver. 18. Say thou unto the people.] All that he said hitherto concerned Moses himself, in answer to his request. Now he tells him what he should say to the people, in answer to their complaint.

Sanctify yourselves.] Here the word sanctify seems to signify no more, but to prepare and make themselves ready to receive what they desired. So the Chaldee expounds it; and so the word is translated by us several times in the book of Jeremiah (ch. vi. 4, xii. 3, li. 28).

Against to-morrow.] He seems at the same time to gratify Moses and satisfy them: for his setting the seventy elders before the Lord, and their eating flesh succeed one another. Or else, he immediately gathered the elders; and the next day the quails came for their food.

Ye shall eat flesh, &c.] You shall have what you long for with such vehemence, that it hath made you utter complaints against the Lord.

Ver. 19. Ye shall not eat one day.] As they did about a year ago (Exod. xvi. 12, 13).

Nor two days, &c.] Not for a short time only.

Ver. 20. But even a whole month.] So long (the Hebrews gather from hence) they stayed in this part of the wilderness of Paran; or rather, a little longer. For they came hither on the twenty-third day of the second month, in the even; on which, if we suppose the fire to have burnt among them (ver. 1), and that the next morning, which is scarce credible, they lusted after flesh, and in a tumultuous manner demanded it of Moses, who promised they should have it; we must allow a little time for the constituting of the seventy elders; and suppose it was done on the twenty-fifth day, and that the next day the quails came (as we translate it), they were two days in gathering them: from whence, if we begin this month, it will appear they stayed here longer than that space.

Until it come out at your nostrils.] Till you be glutted with it, and vomit it up so violently, that it come not only out at your mouth, but at your nostrils.

It be loathsome unto you.] Which was both the cause and the effect of vomiting.

Because that ye have despised the Lord.] Forgetting all that he had done for them, as if it had been nothing; and slighting his servant Moses.

Which is among you.] By a visible token of his glorious presence in the sanctuary, where he dwelt among them (Exod. xxv. 8).

Why came we forth out of Egypt?] As if he had undone them by their delivrance from thence.

Both Onkelos and Jonathan translate this verse in such a manner that one cannot but think they had a notion in their days of more persons than one in the Godhead. For these are the words of the latter of them, "Because you have despised (or rejected, as Onkelos) the Word of the Lord, for glorious is his majesty which dwelleth among us." For I cannot see how the word Memri can signify any thing in this place (whatsoever it may do in some others), but a person equal to Jehovah. And yet the anonymous writer against the Trinity (confuted by De Voisin), hath the strange, unaccountable boldness to pass it by with this silly gloss, Propriè de lege accipi potest, &c. "It may be properly understood of the law, which may be contemned or transgressed:" as if this could be called, "the glorious majesty of the Lord," which dwelt among them. What will not men say or do to serve a cause!

Ver. 21. The people among whom I am.] Over whom I preside, as their governor.

Are six hundred thousand footmen.] Who were able to carry arms; besides women, and children, and slaves, and the mixed multitude; who in all may well be supposed to have made thirty hundred thousand.

And thou hast said, I will give them flesh, that they may eat a whole month.] i. e. How can this be? Which is a downright distrust of God's promise, if we regard merely the words, and do not consider that they were spoken hastily, and something inconsiderately, while his mind was very much disturbed by the tumult which the people made; for which reason a severe notice is not taken of it; but he only put in mind of God's eternal power (ver. 23). Which may make it probable, that they were only words of admiration, how such a provision should be made for such a vast number; and those uttered on a sudden.

Ver. 22. Shall the flocks and the herds be slain for them, to suffice them? or shall all the fish of the sea be gathered together for them, to suffice them?

23 And the LORD said unto Moses, Is the LORD's hand waxed short? thou shalt see now whether my word shall come to pass unto thee or not.

24 ¶ And Moses went out, and told the people the words of the LORD, and gathered the

them, to suffice them?] In the Hebrew the words are, "If the flocks and the herds be slain for them, will they be sufficient for them?" That is, there will not be enough for a whole month. And so the next passage is to be translated, If all the fish of the sea be gathered for them, will they be sufficient for them?

Ver. 23. Is the Lord's hand waxed short?] i. e. I need not tell thee that my power is as great as ever.

For thou shalt see now whether my word shall come to pass] For thou shalt be convinced of it by the speedy performance of my promise.

Ver. 24. Moses went out,] I supposed, ver. 11, that Moses went into the sanctuary to make his addresses to God for relief; and if that be true, then that is the place from whence he now went out. But there is this objection against it, that if he had gone to consult God in the sanctuary (as he did on some occasions, ch. vii. 89), it would not have been said that he went out; but that he came out. For that is the usual expression in this matter. Therefore we may rather think he now went out of his own tent, where the people stood murmuring (ver. 10).

Told the people the words] Both concerning them and concerning himself.

Gathered the seventy men] That is, sent out his summons to them to attend him; though two of them, it appears afterward, did not come (ver. 26).

Set them round about the tabernacle.] That is, required them to come thither, and there place themselves; that the people might understand they received their authority from God; and that from thence he might send his Holy Spirit upon them. For God alone, who was their king, could appoint who should bear rule among them. There also were the great assemblies held (see ch. xxvii. 2).

Ver. 25. The Lord came down in a cloud,] The Shechinah; or Divine Majesty, appeared from heaven in a cloud; or, in the "pillar of the cloud," as it is in ch. xii. 5.

Spake unto him,] As he had promised, ver. 17, declaring, it is likely, the reason and intention of his appearing on this occasion.

Gave it unto the seventy elders;] See there, ver. 17.

When the spirit rested upon them,] i. e. As soon as they received it.

They prophesied,] Either by setting forth the praises of God in such a strain as none else could imitate, or giving such admirable instructions to the people, as manifested they were raised above themselves; or perhaps by declaring things to come (particularly that they should have quails, as we render the word, in great abundance very shortly, as some of the Jews take it), though that could not gain them such credit as the other gifts, till their predictions were fulfilled. And these the Jews call the second degree of prophecy; concerning which Maimonides speaks in his preface to his More Nevoch. but more fully in his second part of it, cap. 45, where he saith, the first degree was that which moved and enabled men to some heroic undertaking, with assurance they were put upon it from God; as to deliver men from tyranny and oppression: which was the Spirit of the Lord that came upon Gideon and Samson, and the rest of the judges seventy men of the elders of the people, and set them round about the tabernacle.

25 And the LORD came down in a cloud, and spake unto him, and took of the spirit that was upon him, and gave it unto the seventy elders: and it came to pass, that, when the spirit rested upon them, they prophesied, and did not cease.

26 But there remained two of the men in the of Israel; who were carried by an extraordinary power to perform such things, as otherwise they thought not themselves fit to undertake. And the second degree was, when a man found a power upon him, exciting him to speak either psalms, or hymns, or wholesome precepts of living; or about political affairs, and civil government, far beyond his natural capacities; and all this waking, and in the full vigour of his senses. This is also called the Holy Spirit; and in this number he places these seventy elders, who were endued with the spirit of Moses, for the government of the people with him, in such measure that they attained to be prophets. Just as in the New Testament the prophets are placed next to the apostles; so these men were next to Moses.

Did not cease.] In which translation we follow the Chaldee paraphrasts, as several others do; but the LXX. translate it, and they added no further (which the Hebrew word will well bear), taking the meaning to be, that they prophesied that day, but not after. And this is the sense of the Talmudists, particularly of Jarchi, who, in his gloss upon this place, saith: "All these elders prophesied only this first time that the Spirit rested upon them, as they stood about the tabernacle; but they did not prophesy after that." The like say several others mentioned by Mr. Selden (lib. ii. De Synedr. cap. 4, sect. 2). And indeed the Spirit was not sent upon them to make them prophets, but to make them governors and judges. And therefore the gift of prophecy, which God gave them for the present, was only to procure them reverence from the people; as an evident sign that they were chosen by God to be coadjutors to Moses, in the exercise of his supreme authority over them. And thus I find Theodoret understood it (Quæst. xx. in Num.). "The seventy did not prophesy beyond this day, ὅτι οὐ προφητείας χάριν ἀλλ' οἰκονομίας, &c., because God promoted them not to prophesy, but to govern: which St. Paul also reckons among other gifts bestowed upon Christians" (1 Cor. xii. 26). Now, that it might appear God had conferred this Divine gift of government upon them, they also prophesied the first day they received it. And I do not see why our translation [did not cease] may not be interpreted to this sense; that is, "they did not cease all that day while they stood about the tabernacle."

Ver. 26. There remained two of the men] Of the seventy elders, whom Moses ordered to appear, and set themselves about the tabernacle. So the Jerusalem Targum: these were "of the number of the seventy wise men, neither did the seventy wise men go from the tabernacle while Eldad and Medad prophesied in the camp." And so R. Levi ben Gersom notes: "It seems to be plain out of the text, that these two were of the seventy elders." Which our translators thought necessary to express by adding those words of the; for in the Hebrew there is no more said, but only there remained two men.

In the camp,] Among the rest of the people; from whom they would not come, out of modesty, saying, They were not equal to such a dignity; as the words are in the Gemara Babylonica, tit. Sanhedrin. Or perhaps they loved a private life; and were afraid of being envied by the people, whom they saw to be so camp, the name of the one was Eldad, and the name of the other Medad: and the spirit rested upon them; and they were of them that were written, but went not out unto the tabernacle: and they prophesied in the camp.

27 And there ran a young man, and told unruly, that it made them decline the burden; as Saul did, when he hid himself among the stuff.

Eldad, and—Medad:] We do not find the names of any other of the seventy elders, but only these two; who, Jonathan saith, were Moses's brothers by the mother's side. And St. Jerome himself mentions such a tradition, that they were his brethren. But there is no certainty of this; nor of what others of the Jews say concerning them (see Selden, lib. ii. De Synedr. cap. 4, sect. 3).

It may be they are mentioned in honour of their virtuous modesty which made them think themselves unworthy of so high a dignity.

The spirit rested upon them:] As it did upon those who were about the tabernacle (ver. 25). Whereby God marked them out to be in the number of those whom he had chosen to be assistants unto Moses.

They were of them that were written, &c.] Whose names Moses put into the summons, which he sent to those whom he judged fit to be advanced to this authority. The Jews (particularly Solomon Jarchi) say, they were chosen by the way of casting lots; and, according to their manner, they tell the story thus, in the place mentioned before in the Gemara:—Moses, say they, was in doubt how he should execute God's command (ver. 16), because, if he did not choose an equal number out of every tribe, it might be ill taken; and if he chose six out of each of the twelve tribes, they would exceed the number of seventy; if but five, they would fall short of it. He resolved, therefore, at last, to choose six out of each tribe, which, in all, were seventy-two persons: and in seventy schedules he wrote the name of elder, but the other two were blanks. Then mixing all these in an urn, he bade them come and draw: and to every one who drew a schedule, that had the name of elder in it, he said, "God hath sanctified thee;" but to him that drew a blank, he said, "God hath not chosen thee." And those two blanks, some of the Jewish doctors say, came into the hands of Eldad and Medad; who therefore, were left behind in the camp. And this conceit our very learned Dr. Lightfoot himself entertained, saying (in his short account of this chapter), "that six of a tribe made up the number of the Sanhedrin (which was chosen), and two over. And those two were Eldad and Medad, who were written for elders, but the lot cast them out; that there might be but seventy. Yet did the Lord honour them with the spirit of prophecy."

But as this whole story of the manner of choosing the elders is very doubtful; so other Jews, of great authority, say, that Eldad and Medad were of the number of the seventy that were chosen. Particularly Jonathan saith expressly, they were of the number of those whose schedules came up with the name of elder in them; but they did not go to the tabernacle because they had no mind to be governors. Nay, the Talmudical gloss upon the forenamed place of the Gemara, saith, that when seventy of the seventy-two had drawn, two of them had blanks: whereby Eldad and Medad knew that the two remaining schedules had the name of elder in them, and therefore would not draw them, because they were sure not to have blanks. The very same, Mr. Selden shows, is in other noted books of theirs. So that it is generally received, they were in the number of those seventy Moses, and said, Eldad and Medad do prophesy in the camp.

28 And Joshua the son of Nun, the servant of Moses, one of his young men, answered and said, My lord Moses, forbid them.

29 And Moses said unto him, Enviest thou which were chosen to be joined with Moses in the government (see lib. ii. De Synedr. cap. 4, sect. 7).

They prophesied in the camp.] Which was a greater thing than if they had prophesied at the tabernacle; denoting them to be men so highly in the favour of God that he would distinguish them from other men wheresoever they were, and not want their service. The Jerusalem Targum relates what each of them foretold (for to that he restrains their prophesying), and what they both foretold but it is not worth the mentioning.

Ver. 27. There ran a young man,] The Jews, who will seem ignorant of nothing, say it was Gershon, the son of Moses, who carried these tidings to his father.

Ver. 28. Joshua the son of Nun,] From whence some conclude, that he was none of the seventy elders; though a man of a most excellent spirit. And indeed this is likely enough, he being to succeed Moses, and so to become the head of them.

The servant of Moses,] Who ministered to him, as a constant attendant on his person (Exod. xxiv. 13).

One of his young men,] The word one is not in the Hebrew, which may be translated "from among his young men," i. e. the rest of those that waited on him.

My lord Moses, forbid them.] Perhaps he thought they could have no authority; not being at the tabernacle: or rather, that their prophesying too much lessened the authority of Moses; by whose consent, and in whose presence, the rest were joined to him; but these two, without his knowledge, and being absent from him, became his consorts in spiritual gifts. This he thought tended to the diminution of his master; for whom he expressed a great honour. The two Targums say that they prophesied of the death of Moses, and the advancement of Joshua to be the leader of God's people; which made Joshua the more concerned to have them suppressed. But this is like the rest of their conceits; several of which are mentioned by Mr. Selden in the place before named, sect. 8.

Ver. 29. Moses said unto him, Enviest thou for my sake?] This shows that Joshua thought it a disparagement unto Moses, that they should have the gift of prophecy bestowed on them, and be no way indebted to Moses for it; as the others were, who were brought by him to the tabernacle, where he presented them to God, as men fit to partake of it; but these two seemed to have no dependence on him for what they received.

Would God that all the Lord's people were prophets,] This shows also that the gift of prophecy was a distinct thing from the gift of government; for he did not wish they might all be made rulers; than which nothing could have been more absurd.

That the Lord would put his spirit upon them.] That they might all break forth, by his inspiration, into his praises: which is a high demonstration of that most excellent spirit that dwelt in Moses; which had nothing of envy, pride, or vain-glory in it: for he sought not himself in the least, but purely the glory of God, and the good of his people; which admirable temper of mind St. James from hence commends to all Christians, when he saith (ch. iv. 5), "Do ye think that the Scripture saith in vain, The spirit that dwelleth in us lusteth to envy? But he giveth more grace."

for my sake? would God that all the LORD's people were prophets, and that the LORD would put his spirit upon them!

30 And Moses gat him into the camp, he and the elders of Israel.

31 ¶ And there went forth a wind from the LORD, and brought quails from the sea, and let them fall by the camp, as it were a day's journey on this side, and as it were a day's journey on the other side, round about the camp, and as it were two cubits high upon the face of the earth.

Where doth the Scripture (by which word the apostles commonly mean the Old Testament) say any thing like this, unless it be in this place! the sense of which is fully expressed by James, as Hermannus Witzius well explains this meaning, "Doth that spirit, whereby we are regenerated and governed, move us to envy or any such like vicious desire? No, far from that; it giveth greater grace, and make us rejoice in the good of our neighbours," &c., as Moses did, when he said, Dost thou envy for my sake? and thereby exciteme to the like envy! Is that suitable to the Spirit that is in us! which I wish God would bestow upon all his people. This agrees with what St. James saith, "But he giveth more grace" (Miscell. Sacr. lib. i. cap. 18, n. 27).

Ver. 30. Moses gat him into the camp.] From the tabernacle where the elders had been presented unto God, and ended with his spirit.

He and the elders of Israel.] That they might exercise their authority jointly with him. And there, I suppose, Eldad and Medad were assumed into the same authority; for we do not read that they were brought to the tabernacle: being sufficiently approved by God in the camp.

Ver. 31. There went forth a wind from the Lord.] At the prayer (it is likely) of Moses and the elders, who promised the people flesh enough, a mighty wind of an extraordinary force was raised beyond the common course of nature. The Psalmist informs us from what quarter this wind blew, when he saith (Psalm lxxxviii. 26), "He caused the east wind to blow in the heaven, and by his power he brought in the south wind:" which some understand, as if sometimes an east wind blew, and sometimes a south: that these quails (as we call them) might be brought from several coasts. But the Hebrews wanting compound words, make use of these two words, to express that which we call a south-east wind. Or, as Bochartus will have it, the Hebrew word kadim, which properly signifies the east, doth sometimes signify the south; and is by the LXX. often so translated; of which he gives a great many instances. And therefore the Psalmist (as the manner of the Hebrew language is) repeats the same thing in other words (see Hierozoic. par. ii. lib. i. cap. 15). And so the famous Ludolphus, both in this commentary upon his Ethiopic History, and his Dissertation De Locustis, saith, they were brought in by a south wind blowing from all points of that quarter.

Brought quails] Nobody, that I have met withal, hath laboured so much to give a clear explication of this whole following discourse as Job Ludolphus, in his most learned commentary upon his Ethiopic History, lib. i. cap. 13, n. 96, where he hath a long discourse (to which I refer the reader) to show that the Hebrews do not take the word selau (here used) to signify quails; but we take that translation of it only from Josephus (see what I have noted on Exod. xvi. 13).

The no less learned Bocar, indeed, hath said a great deal to justify Josephus; and hath shown that Egypt and the neighbouring regions abound still with quails: from whence this wind blew fair to bring them to the Hebrews. And every one knows that there are certain winds called Ornithias, from their bringing great flights of birds along with them. Quails also, he observes, are wont to fly from the southern countries to the northern, in the spring-time (as it now was), and to fall sometimes in such vast quantities as to sink a ship. Notwithstanding all which, and a great deal more which he alleges, with great learning, there are several things said in the following relations, which by no means can be brought to agree to quails; and therefore Ludolphus rather takes selau to signify locusts; by which it is easy to give a plain explication of all that is said of them. It is certain they were not only used for food in those parts of the world, but that some of them were very delicious meat in several countries; for they that have eaten them (see Lev. xi. 22), compare them to young pigeons, or to a fresh herring, or to a crab, or lobster (like to which they are in shape and figure), and they are several ways prepared, and accounted very wholesome food, when they have thrown away the heads, and wings, and legs. Pliny saith that some parts of Ethiopia lived upon them; and that they were preserved fumo et sale, "by being dried in the smoke and salted," for their nourishment, throughout the whole year. Now all that is said in this, and in the following verses, will have a plain and easy meaning (as I said) if we follow this interpretation; but not if we take them for quails, or pheasants, or sea-fowl. As, for example, what was said before, concerning God's sending a mighty wind, is not hard to understand, if we suppose him to speak of locusts; which all authors say are brought with a wind; but it was never heard to bring quails, which cannot fly high, nor far; much less so far as from the sea to the middle of Arabia Petraea. Nor would the locusts have come this way had not this wind brought them from their ordinary course.

From the sea,] viz. From the Red Sea, yet not excluding the Persian Gulf; which must not be understood as if they came out of the sea, but from the sea-coast; and it is very probable out of Africa, where they abound. So the aforesaid Ludolphus expounds it, in his late Dissertation De Locustis, par. ii. cap. 29, &c.

Let them fall by the camp.] Or poured them down upon the camp, as dust or rain falls thick upon the ground. For both these comparisons the Psalmist uses in the place before named (Ps. lxxviii. 27). And this is expressed in Exod. xvi. 13, by covering their camp.

A day's journey on this side, and—on the other] A day's journey, as Bochartus makes account, is at least twenty miles. See the place before named, Hierozoic par. ii. lib. i. cap. 15, p. 105; or, as Ludolphus makes the computation, sixteen miles, in his Dissertation De Locustis, par. ii. cap. 44, &c. Take it either way, it shows there was a vast number of them: for he adds.

Round about the camp.] So that which way soever they went for sixteen or twenty miles together, there lay heaps of them upon the ground; which, if we understand this of quails, cannot be conceived without a heap of miracles. And if we resort to that, what need was there of a wind to bring them, when God must be supposed miraculously to have created them as he did manna. And yet such a quantity of quails was not to be found anywhere, without a miracle, as would cover the heavens forty miles (according to 32 And the people stood up all that day, and all that night, and all the next day, and they gathered the quails: he that gathered least gathered ten homers: and they spread them all abroad for themselves round about the camp.

33 And while the flesh was yet between their teeth, ere it was chewed, the wrath of the Lord

Bochartus) on all sides. But that which would have been on many accounts miraculous, if we understand it of quails, will be found less wonderful, or rather natural, if it be understood of locusts: who come in very great and thick clouds, which darken the sky; as all authors tell us (see Ludolphus, Comment. in Histor. Ethiop. p. 188).

Two cubits high] This interpreters look upon as impossible: for then the quails would have been choked and stifled; if they had been heaped so deep one upon another. And therefore they have devised the addition of a new word; and refer this, not to their falling upon the ground, but to their flying in the air, two cubits high above the earth; that so they might the more easily be taken by their hands. So the Jews and so Val. Schindler in his Lexicon upon the word selau. But, besides that there is nothing of this in the text; and it is contrary to what the Psalmist says, that they fell in the midst of their camp (ver. 28), and that they came down like rain, which always falls upon the ground, there are many other difficulties in this interpretation (as he shows p. 189, and defends what he there asserts in his Dissertation De Locustis, par. ii. cap. 49, 50); and therefore it is better to expound it of locusts; who, though they fall one upon another to a great depth, are not thereby suffocated, by reason of the length of their feet, and the thinness of their wings.

Ver. 32. The people stood up (or rather, rose up) all that day.] They were intent upon the gathering of them for thirty-six hours.

They gathered the quails.] By this it is evident that they gathered something lying upon the ground, and not flying in the air; for we do not gather things there but take or catch them.

He that gathered least] viz. The master of every family for himself, and for those belonging to him. For we are not to suppose that every man in Israel gathered so many as follows.

Gathered ten homers.] A vast quantity if they were quails; which would have served them, not for a month, but for a year or two, as Ludolphus observes (p. 190, of his Commentary on his Ethiop. Hist.), besides, we do not use to measure fowls, but to number them. And therefore Bochart, being sensible of this impropriety, takes the word homer here to signify a heap: which is confuted by Ludolphus in his Dissertation De Locustis (par. ii. cap. 54, 55, &c).

They spread them all abroad] This is another plain indication that they were locusts; which they spread to be dried in the sun: but if they had been quails would have been very preposterous; for it would have made them the sooner stink. Interpreters therefore commonly pass by this, and give no account why they spread them abroad; and the Vulgar Latin omits this word spread: whereas all authors tell us, this is the principal way of preparing locusts, and preserving them for a month or more: which they boiled, or otherwise made fit to eat, when they had occasion (see Ludolphus in his forementioned Commentary; and in his defence of it lately in his Dissertation De Locustis, par. ii. cap. 97, 98, &c.).

was kindled against the people, and the Lord smote the people with a very great plague.

34 And he called the place Kibroth-hattaavah: because there they buried the people that lusted.

35 And the people journeyed from Kibroth-hattaavah unto Hazereth; and abode at Hazereth.

Ver. 33. While the flesh was yet between their teeth,] While they were eating; and therefore were in good health, and had a good stomach.

Ere it was chewed,] Before they had swallowed it. The wrath of the Lord was kindled against the people,] They felt unexpected effects of God's displeasure; being taken, perhaps, with a sudden vomiting, of which they died (ver. 20). This was the conclusion of the month; for so long (he there saith) they should eat flesh.

The Lord smote the people with a very great plague.] He sent a pestilence among them, as Eben Ezra supposes; or, as others think, they wasted away in a consumption: the vomiting, perhaps, continuing so that they could never retain any meat, till they died. This they gather from Ps. cvi. 15, where the Psalmist saith, "He sent leanness into their soul." But Bochartus and Menochius think he burnt them up with a fire from his presence, as at the beginning of this murmuring, ver. 1, where it is said, as it is here, "The anger of the Lord was kindled." But Bochartus grounds this chiefly upon Ps. lxxviii. 21, where it is said, "A fire was kindled in Jacob;" which he refers to this story.

It may seem strange to some, that now they should be punished so heavily, when about a year ago they murmured for flesh as they did now; and he gave it them in the even, together with manna in the morning, without any punishment at all. But it is to be considered, that as it was a greater fault to fall into the same sin again, after God had been so good to them; so they were not in such necessity now, as they were then, when they were really pinched with hunger; whereas now they were fed with bread from heaven: and therefore cried for meat, not out of need, but wantonness. And it may be added, that they were not then so well taught as they had been since; by the giving of the law to them at Mount Sinai, and many other instructions from the house of God.

Ver. 34. Kibroth-hattaavah.] That is, the Graves of Lust: because their wanton appetites threw them into those graves; for there, as it follows, they buried those that lusted.

For there they buried the people that lusted.] Not all that lusted, for then all the people who were guilty of this sin would have been buried; but all that died of the plague, which was inflicted for this sin; who, perhaps, were those that began and headed this mutiny; or were most violent in it.

Ver. 35. The people journeyed] When the cloud was taken up (ch. ix. 17).

From Kibroth-hattaavah] From whence they departed about the beginning of the fourth month, called Tammuz.

Unto Hazereth.] Another place in the wilderness of Paran: but how far from the former station, whether a day's journey or more, we do not find.

Abode at Hazereth.] There the cloud rested, and accordingly there they encamped. But we do not read how long; only we are sure they stayed there at least a week (ch. xii. 15).

CHAPTER XII.

1 God rebuketh the sedition of Miriam and Aaron. 10 Miriam's leprosy is healed at the prayer of Moses. 14 God commandeth her to be shut out of the host.

1 AND Miriam and Aaron spake against Moses because of the Ethiopian woman whom he had married: for he had married an Ethiopian woman.

2 And they said, Hath the LORD indeed spoken only by Moses? hath he not spoken also by us? And the LORD heard it.

3 (Now the man Moses was very meek, above all the men which were upon the face of the earth.)

CHAP. XII.

Ver. 1. Miriam and Aaron spake against Moses] I can see no good reason that can be given why Miriam is put here before Aaron; but because she, it is highly probable, was the beginner of this sedition, and drew her brother Aaron into it.

Because of the Ethiopian woman] Or rather Arabian woman (see Gen. x. 6).

Whom he had married.] Whom most both of the Jewish and Christian writers take to have been Zipporah; though some few fancy he speaks of another woman, whom he had lately married; Zipporah being either dead, or divorced. The only difficulty is, why they should quarrel with him about Zipporah; who, if she had been dead, or divorced, it is not likely he would have married a Cushite, but a Jewish woman. The Hebrew doctors have devised strange stories about his forbearing her company; which may be read in many authors; particularly in Selden, lib. iii. Uxor. Hebr. cap. 26, where he recites many of their opinions about this matter. The most common is, that they were angry at his marriage with a woman of another nation; whom they would have had him put away, and take another wife. So they interpret the following words, "for he had married an Ethiopian woman:" as if his mere marriage with her was the thing which they spake against. Which is not at all probable, if this be meant of Zipporah; for he had been married to her forty years; which, if they had disliked, one would think should have long before now been charged upon him as a fault. I rather think that they were jealous of his being ruled too much by her, and by her relations. For it was by her father's advice that he made the judges, mentioned Exod. xviii. 21, 22, and perhaps they imagined she and Hobab had a hand in choosing the seventy elders lately made, as we read in the foregoing chapter. With which this story being immediately connected, it makes me think it hath some relation to that. For those elders were nominated, it is evident, by Moses alone; without consulting Aaron or Miriam; who, taking themselves to be neglected, in so great an alteration made of the government without their advice, were very angry: and not daring to charge Moses directly with this neglect of them, they fall upon his wife; whom in scorn they call a Cushite or Arabian woman; which in aftertimes were accounted a vile people, as appears from Amos ix. 7. For that country was inhabited by divers nations, mingled together, viz. Ishmaelites, Midianites, Amalekites, and such like: who, from thence, some think, were called by the general name of Arabians; because of their mixture. For Ereb, in Hebrew, signifies a miscellaneous company, or mixture of many people: see Jeremiah xxv. 20, 24, where he calls this very people by this name.

Ver. 2. Hath the Lord indeed spoken only by Moses?] Here it appears that it was really Moses with whom they were offended; who alone had called what men he thought good to be presented unto God, to be constituted by him his assistants in the government (ch. xi. 24).

Hath he not spoken also by us?] Are not we also acquainted with God's mind, being prophets? For so Aaron was made (Exod. iv. 14, 15), and Miriam so acknowledged (Exod. xv. 20). And moreover the prophet Micah (ch. vi. 4) mentions them as conductors of the people, while they were in the wilderness, together with Moses. Which might make them stomach it, that he took no notice of them when he chose the seventy elders, who were to be his coadjutors, but did it of himself.

The Lord heard it.] Observed their ill behaviour towards him; though he himself took no notice of it.

Ver. 3. Now the man Moses was very meek.] This is added as the reason why he passed by the affront they put upon him, and why God avenged it; because he was so exceeding meek and patient (or, as others translate it, so humble and lowly), that he would have been exposed to further affronts, if God had not chastised their insolence. Moses also might think fit to set this down as a confutation of their charge against him, being so far from that pride which they imputed to him, that he did not resent (though he was so very much above them) their unbecoming behaviour towards him; who had conversed immediately with God himself, and been with him in the holy mount many days together; who sent several commands to Aaron, as well as to the people by him alone; which made such a difference between him and all others, that, as it was an unaccountable arrogance in them to equal themselves unto him, so he demonstrated how far he was from being proud of his superiority, by meekly bearing their haughty behaviour towards him.

So little cause there is for their cavils, who from hence argue that Moses was not the author of these books, because he commends himself in them; for this is not so much a commendation, as a necessary account of himself, to show how causeless their charges against him was. To such vindications of themselves the humblest souls may be constrained, by the calumnies of wicked men: as we see not only in St. Paul, but our blessed Saviour, who were put upon glorying and magnifying themselves by the malignity of their enemies (see John x. 36; 2 Cor. vi. 10, 23, &c.). And this is the more allowable, when men know, not only that they write the truth, but that it is notorious to all that are acquainted with them, and cannot be contradicted. The holy writers also are not to be confined to our rules, being moved by the Holy Ghost to set down such things, which, if they had been left to themselves, they would not have mentioned. And men, who have a due reverence to the Holy Scriptures, will look upon this rather as the Holy Ghost's testimony concerning Moses, than Moses's testimony concerning himself. But we have to do now with a generation of men that write upon

4 And the Lord spake suddenly unto Moses, and unto Aaron, and unto Miriam, Come out ye three unto the tabernacle of the congregation. And they three came out.

5 And the Lord came down in the pillar of the cloud, and stood in the door of the tabernacle, and called Aaron and Miriam: and they both came forth.

6 And he said, Hear now my words: If there be a prophet among you, I the Lord will make myself known unto him in a vision, and will speak unto him in a dream.

7 My servant Moses is not so, who is faithful in all mine house.

8 With him will I speak mouth to mouth, even apparently, and not in dark speeches; and these books, not as of a Divine original, but as they do upon common authors.

Ver. 4. The Lord spake suddenly unto Moses,] The Lord thought fit immediately to stifle their insurrection; which might have proved dangerous if it had spread among the people. And perhaps the word suddenly may relate to the manner of his calling to them with a quick and hasty speech, as one provoked and highly displeased.

Unto Aaron, and unto Miriam,] It is uncertain whether God spake to these two by himself or by Moses. It is likely he spake to them all together (while Aaron and Miriam were expostulating with Moses), with such a voice as he was wont to use when he communicated his mind to the prophets.

Come out ye three] It is likely they were all in Moses's tent, whither his brother and sister were come to utter their complaint.

Unto the tabernacle] Which was God's tent, wherein he dwelt among them, and from whence he declared his will to them.

They three came out.] To attend the pleasure of the Divine Majesty.

Ver. 5. The Lord came down in the pillar of the cloud,] The pillar of the cloud, which was wont to be over the most holy place, where the Lord dwelt, came down from thence, and the Shechinah in it, and stood, as it here follows, at the door of the tabernacle.

Stood in the door] As if they would leave them; as it did, ver. 9.

Called Aaron and Miriam,] Who were at some distance, I suppose; and are commanded to come nearer.

They both came forth.] From the place where they were then when he called them; or from Moses with whom they came from his tent, and are now required to stand by themselves.

Ver. 6. Hear now my words,] Mark what I say to you.

If there be a prophet among you,] This doth not make a doubt of it, but supposes that they, and others among the people, were prophets; as they alleged (ver. 2). But God would have them to understand, that he did not communicate his mind to all alike, nor in the same way and manner; but so differently, as to make a remarkable distinction between Moses and others.

Whether there were, in those days, men brought up and trained to be made fit to receive this gift bestowed upon them, we do not know; but in after-times, it is evident, there were certain colleges of prophets, wherein disciples of prophets were bred. Such was that, 1 Sam. x. 5, and xix. 18, &c., where the sons of the prophets, i. e. their scholars or disciples (as Jonathan always translates that phrase) were brought up; and, for the most part, such only were endued with this gift, who were so educated in those schools, in the study of the law and in piety. Though God did not tie himself to dispense it to such persons alone, but bestowed it upon whom he pleased, though they had spent no time in those schools of the prophets. This is apparent, from that proverbial speech, "Is Saul also among the prophets?" (1 Sam. x. 11, and xix. 24). This had been no wonder (as this saying imports), if it had been usual for persons to be endowed with this gift on a sudden, who were never bred up in such a course as led to it. But to show how this came to pass, "one of that place answered and said (as it there follows, ver. 12). But who is their father?" that is, this is no such wonder, if it be considered who makes men prophets, viz. God, who is the father of all the children of the prophets, and therefore may inspire whom he pleases: as he now might have imparted this gift to meaner persons than the seventy elders presented to him by Moses; and made them equal, if he thought fit, with Aaron and Miriam. For this was the case of Amos, in after ages; who was "no prophet, nor a prophet's son (as he himself relates, ch. vii. 14), but a herdsman;" and yet "the Lord took him as he followed the flock, and bade him go and prophesy unto his people Israel."

I the Lord] Here is the original of prophecy; will make myself known unto him, communicate to him my mind and will.

In a vision,] This was one way of discovering his mind to the prophets; by representing things to them, when they were awake, as if they had perceived them by their senses; which at that time were locked up, and all transacted by a Divine operation upon their mind and imagination (see Gen. xv. 1, and Dan. viii. 1, 15). Abarbinel mentions one, who observes, that the word marah (the plural of which, maroth, signifies looking-glasses, in Exod. xxxviii. 8) is a different word from march, which is commonly used for vision; and teaches us, that all the representations made in this way to the prophets, were only as the images of things represented in a glass; in which we behold the outward shape, or shadow, as we may call it, but not the thing itself. And so St. Paul seems to have understood this word (if he alludes to this place, as Grotius thinks he doth) when he saith, Now we see, de' isótoprou iv aivíματι, "through a glass darkly" (1 Cor. xiii. 12).

And will speak unto him in a dream,] This was another way of God's revealing his mind unto the prophets, in their sleep; when they not only saw things represented to them, but also heard a voice. And both these seem sometimes to have been mixed together, or to have followed one another; as in Gen. xvi. 13; Dan. vii. 1, and viii. 16—18. And it is a maxim among the Jews, that there is no degree of prophecy, but it is comprehended under one of these, visions or dreams. So Maimonides, in his More Nevochim, par. ii. cap. 32, and 41, and again, cap. 43, where he saith, "There is no third degree of prophecy besides these two." For as for that Divine Spirit, which moved men to speak of things appertaining to the knowledge of God and his praises, beyond their natural or acquired abilities, without seeing any figures, asleep or awake, though with assurance that it was from God, they will not have it called prophecy; though they acknowledge those parts of Scripture which they call Cetuvim, and the LXX. ἀπόφρασα, i. e. written by the Holy Ghost, were indited by that Divine Spirit; and therefore we cannot reasonably deny those that were inspired by it the name of prophets.

Ver. 7. My servant Moses is not so,] Doth not the similitude of the LORD shall he behold : wherefore then were ye not afraid to speak against my servant Moses ?

9 And the anger of the LORD was kindled against them ; and he departed.

10 And the cloud departed from off the taberreceive my mind in either of those ways ; and therefore is more than a prophet, having it communicated to him in a far more noble and clearer manner, which placed him in a higher rank than any other inspired person.

[Who is faithful in all mine house.] Because he was intrusted (so the word may be understood) with God's whole family ; that is, with all the children of Israel, and faithfully discharged the trust reposed in him, by acquainting them with all God's will, and executing all his commands ; and doing nothing of himself (as now he was falsely accused), but only what God required. This is a high testimony to him ; and the Jews, when they are in the humour of exalting Moses, say he was more faithful than the angels of the ministry : they are the words of R. Jose in Siphri ; and if he had said, as faithful as the angels of the ministry, it might have passed for a good explication.

Ver. 8. [With him will I speak mouth to mouth.] In a most familiar manner, as one friend discourses with another. So it is explained, Exod. xxxiii. 11. From whence Abarbanel, in his Rosch Amana, gathers, that Moses's prophecy differed from others in these four things : first, that God spake to others by a mediator (that is, as he explains it, by some angel), but to him by himself, without the intervention of any other. Secondly, that they never prophesied, but their senses were all bound up, either in visions or in dreams ; whereas he was as perfectly awake, as we are when we discourse one with another. Thirdly, that after the vision was over, they were often left so weak and feeble, that they could scarce stand upon their feet, as appears from Dan. x. 8, 11 ; but Moses spake with the Divine Majesty, without any consternation or alteration ; his conversation with him being like that of one friend with another. And lastly, no prophet but he could understand the mind of God when they pleased ; for he communicated himself to them only when he thought good ; whereas Moses might at any time resort to God, to inquire of him, and receive an answer (see ch. ix. 8). To the same purpose also Maimonides writes, in his book De Fundamentis Legis (cap. vii.).

[Even apparently,] Plainly, clearly, and distinctly ; so that there was no difficulty to apprehend his meaning, nor need of an explication. Thus he proclaimed his name to Moses, Exod. xxxiv. 6, 7.

[Not in dark speeches ;] Or, in parables and enigmatical representations, such as the ladder which Jacob saw in a dream, the boiling-pot which was shown to Jeremiah, the wall, the plumb-line, and the basket of summer fruits which Amos saw ; the beasts which were represented to Daniel, the lamps, mountains, horses, and chariots to Zachariah, the roll of the book which Ezekiel was to eat. By all which the prophet (as Maimonides observes, whose illustrations these are of these words), was given to understand some other thing, which was intended to be made known to him by these figures (More Nevoch. par. ii. cap. 43) ; who, in his book concerning the Foundations of the Law, further observes, that some of these prophets had both the parable (as he calls it) and its interpretation represented to them ; others, the parable only without any exposition ; and to some was only delivered the explication.

[The similitude of the Lord shall he behold.] I am apt to think the word not should be here again repeated (as it must be in some places to make out the sense ; as Prov. xxv. 27), which will make the meaning plainly this, "He shall not behold the Lord in similitudes and resemblances," as other prophets did. For the Hebrew word temunah signifies the shape of a thing represented either to the outward senses or to the imagination, not the thing itself. Therefore it would be to equal Moses with the rest of the prophets to say he should see the similitude of the Lord ; for so did they. Amos, for instance, saith he "saw the Lord standing upon the altar" (ch. ix. 1), that is, some angelical appearance, in a glorious shape. And Eliphaz saith, that "a spirit passed before him, the form (or aspect) whereof he could not discern ;" only the temunah (we render it an image) "was before his eyes" (Job iv. 15, 16). But God did not thus reveal himself to Moses by images and similitudes of things, but spake to him himself, as it goes before, mouth to mouth. Which led Maimonides into the opinion (which he often repeats) that when God is said to speak to any other man, it was by an angel ; and that he never spake to any one himself, but only to Moses. Nor did any man before him say that God spake to him, or that he sent him on a message unto others ; but Moses was the first who had this honour (More Nevoch. par. i. cap. 63, and par. ii. cap. 39).

But if we follow our translation, which should run thus, "But the similitude of the Lord shall he behold," it relates to that wonderful apparition of God to him in the bush (Exod. iii. 6), as Maimonides thinks, More Nevoch. par. i. cap. 5, where he saith, "God poured upon him as much as he could contain," but especially to that revelation which God made of himself to him, when he told him that he could not see his face, but should behold his back parts (Exod. xxxiii. 20, 23), which was a privilege granted to none but him. And thus the similitude of the Lord, or his likeness, signifies the Lord himself (Ps. xvii. ult.). "When thy likeness shall awake (that is, thou thyself appear for me), I shall be satisfied."

[Wherefore then were ye not afraid to speak against my servant Moses?] Who is my prime minister, employed by me in the highest services.

Ver. 9. [The anger of the Lord was kindled] As appeared by what follows.

[He departed.] He withdrew his presence from the door of the tabernacle, immediately before they could make an answer : which was a token of exceeding great displeasure ; as it is in us when we will not so much as hear what men say for themselves, when they have highly and notoriously offended us, and we reprove them for it, but turn away from them.

Ver. 10. [The cloud departed from off the tabernacle ;] It was not merely taken up from it (as it was wont to be when they were to remove their camp), but quite disappeared for a time ; or stood at a great distance from them, till Miriam was removed from the tabernacle, and carried out of the camp : for that was one reason of its departure ; the Divine Majesty not designing to stay where so impure a creature was. And this was also a manifest token of God's high displeasure against them, which moved him to forsake them.

[Miriam became leprous.] Or, "was become leprous ;" a proper punishment for pride and evil speaking ; which was not inflicted upon Aaron, because he was to judge of leprosy, and was not the first in the transgression. And besides, it is likely, God would not have one that was but newly made his high-priest become vile and contemptible.

nacle; and, behold, Miriam became leprous, white as snow: and Aaron looked upon Miriam, and, behold, she was leprous.

11 And Aaron said unto Moses, Alas, my lord, I beseech thee, lay not the sin upon us, wherein we have done foolishly, and wherein we have sinned.

12 Let her not be as one dead, of whom the flesh is half consumed when he cometh out of his mother's womb.

13 And Moses cried unto the Lord, saying, Heal her now, O God, I beseech thee.

White as snow.] Which was a mark of an incurable leprosy, when all the body was overspread with it (Exod. iv. 6; 2 Kings v. 27).

Aaron looked upon Miriam.] As he was bound to do; whose office it was to inspect it, and judge whether it was a leprosy or not (Lev. xiii. 2, &c.).

Behold, she was leprous.] He could not but judge her to have a leprosy, and consequently pronounce her unclean.

Ver. 11. Aaron said unto Moses.] He was made sensible that Moses had greater interest in God than himself, and therefore desires his intercession for them.

Alas, my Lord.] Have pity upon us, miserable wretches.

Lay not the sin upon us.] He supplicates him as his superior, and humbly begs his pardon; and that he would obtain remission of the punishment which they had justly deserved by their sin: for he was afraid he himself might suffer, as he saw she did.

Wherein we have done foolishly.] He prays him to look upon their offence as proceeding from folly and weakness, though in itself a great sin.

Ver. 12. Let her not be as one dead, &c.] For so she was not only legally, being to be separated from the living, but naturally also; this being, as I said, the worst kind of leprosy, which ate into the very flesh, and made her look like an abortive (as it here follows) or still-born child, which had lain long dead, and was half wasted away in its mother's womb.

Ver. 13. Moses cried unto the Lord.] Most earnestly petitioned the Lord for her; such was his meekness and piety. And his crying, perhaps, supposes the Divine Majesty to be gone afar off, if not out of sight.

Heal her now, O God.] For it was beyond any other power but his to recover her.

Ver. 14. If her father had but spit in her face.] An expression of extreme anger, abhorrence, and contempt (Job xxx. 10; Isa. lii. 6).

Should she not be ashamed seven days?] She could not have had the confidence to come presently into his presence; but be ashamed for a great while to look him in the face.

Let her be shut out from the camp.] Much more is it fit that Miriam should avoid my presence, and not presume to come before me; who have set a greater mark of my indignation and detestation upon her. For spite might soon be wiped off; but the leprosy stuck to her, and made her unfit for all conversation with God or man.

14 ¶ And the Lord said unto Moses, If her father had but spit in her face, should she not be ashamed seven days? let her be shut out from the camp seven days, and after that let her be received in again.

15 And Miriam was shut out from the camp seven days: and the people journeyed not till Miriam was brought in again.

16 And afterward the people removed from Hazereth, and pitched in the wilderness of Paran.

Seven days.] Which was the time for legal cleansing from such great impurities (Lev. xiv. 8; Numb. vi. 9, xxxi. 19).

After that let her be received in again.] I suppose she was presently freed from leprosy; but kept out from the camp so long, to declare God's displeasure against her; and to humble her, by exposing her to shame.

Ver. 15. Miriam was shut out from the camp seven days.] That her offence might be known to all, by her open punishment.

The people journeyed not till Miriam was brought in again.] For the cloud was gone which should have directed them in their motions. And besides, this respect, perhaps, was shown unto her because she was a prophetess; and hereby she had time given her to humble herself before God, and to beg his pardon for her sin.

Brought in again.] When one would have expected that such sacrifices should have been offered for her cleansing, as are required in Lev. xiv. But this was an extraordinary case; she being on a sudden miraculously struck with the highest degree of the plague of leprosy, and as suddenly cured by the same hand that struck her.

Ver. 16. Afterward the people removed.] Which shows that the cloud, which departed from the tabernacle (ver. 10) returned again to it, together with Miriam, that it might guide them in their removal to another station; for till it was taken up from the tabernacle, they stirred not from the place where they were (ch. ix. 17, 18).

From Hazereth.] After they had abode there seven days at the least.

Pitched in the wilderness of Paran.] Where they were before (see ch. x. 12), but now were brought into another part of it, called Rithmah, (ch. xxxiii. 18), which was called also by another name, Kadesh-barnea (ch. xiii. 26; Deut. i. 19). Or else we must suppose these two places to have been so very near together, that they might be said to have pitched either in the one or the other. This station was at the foot of the mountain on the south part of Canaan (Deut. i. 20), so that their next removal was to have been into the land promised to them, if they themselves had not hindered, by their renewed rebellion. This removal was in the fourth month of the second year after they came out of the land of Egypt (see ch. xi. 20, 35).

CHAPTER XIII.

1 The names of the men who were sent to search the land. 17 Their instructions. 21 Their acts. 26 Their relation.

1 AND the LORD spake unto Moses, saying,

2 Send thou men, that they may search the land of Canaan, which I give unto the children of Israel: of every tribe of their fathers shall ye send a man, every one a ruler among them,

3 And Moses by the commandment of the LORD sent them from the wilderness of Paran: all those men were heads of the children of Israel.

4 And these were their names: of the tribe of Reuben, Shammua the son of Zaccur.

5 Of the tribe of Simeon, Shaphat the son of Hori.

6 Of the tribe of Judah, Caleb the son of Jephunneh.

7 Of the tribe of Issachar, Igal the son of Joseph.

8 Of the tribe of Ephraim, Oshea the son of Nun.

9 Of the tribe of Benjamin, Palti the son of Raphu.

10 Of the tribe of Zebulun, Gaddiel the son of Sodi.

11 Of the tribe of Joseph, namely, of the tribe of Manasseh, Gaddi the son of Susi.

12 Of the tribe of Dan, Ammiel the son of Gemalli.

13 Of the tribe of Asher, Sethur the son of Michael.

14 Of the tribe of Naphtali, Nabbi the son of Vophsi.

15 Of the tribe of Gad, Geuel the son of Machi.

16 These are the names of the men which

CHAP. XIII.

Ver. 1.] They being now come to the borders of Canaan, the Lord ordered Moses to exhort them to go up and take possession of it, and not to fear nor be discouraged; as we read in Deut. i. 21. But the people (out of a distrust of God's power, as Moses seems to intimate, Deut. ix. 23) desired they might first send some to search out the land, before they attempted its conquest (Deut. i. 22). About which, it is likely, Moses consulted the Divine Majesty, who gave them leave so to do.

Ver. 2. Send thou men.] For their greater satisfaction, God ordered them to have their desire. For there seems to have been a general fear upon them (every one of them coming to Moses with this request, Deut. i. 22) which could not be removed, but by sending some to bring them intelligence what kind of country it was, and what people they had to deal withal (ver. 18—20).

That they may search the land of Canaan.] To make a discovery both of the country and of the inhabitants, and the best way to invade it (Deut. i. 22).

Which I give unto the children of Israel.] To the possession of which God now intended to introduce them. For he had already brought them to the confines of it, and bidden them go up and possess it (Deut. i. 20, 21), but they would needs make this delay, for a discovery of the condition of the country; which was their own contrivance at the first, and not a Divine counsel.

Of every tribe—shall ye send a man.] That there might be no suspicion or partiality in their report.

Every one a ruler among them.] Men of authority and prudence, who might be the more believed; yet not of the highest rank (for such are called by the name of princes, ch. i. 16), but rulers perhaps of thousands, who were very considerable in their tribes: for they are called by the same name in the Hebrew, every one being said to be a nasi and a rosh, a leader and a head in their tribes; which may incline one to think that there were higher and lower persons of this sort, who had the same title in every tribe.

Ver. 3. Moses by the commandment of the Lord.] Which was given him in the fifth month (called Ab, as St. Jerome notes from the Jews) of the second year after they came out of Egypt: it is not certain upon what day; but it is likely in the beginning of the month, which answers to the nineteenth of our July.

Sent them from the wilderness of Paran.] From Kadesh-barnea (ch. xxxii. 8, Deut. i. 19, 20, ix. 23, Josh. xiv. 7).

All those men were heads] So the rulers of thousands and hundreds are called (Exod. xviii. 25), as well as the princes (Numb. i. 16). But these were a lower sort of heads, or great men, in the several tribes of Israel.

Ver. 4. These were their names.] There is little to be observed concerning this verse, and those that follow to the sixteenth, but that it is evident these were not the same men who, in the first chapter of this book, are called the heads and princes of the tribes; being inferior persons, who ruled over some part, not over a whole tribe. The three first tribes also that are here mentioned, sprang from the three eldest sons (for Levi did not make a tribe in Israel) of Jacob: but, in the enumeration of the rest, there is not any order observed, of which I can give an account. Perhaps they being to disperse themselves, when they entered the country they were to search (see ver. 22), and thinking it not prudent to go above two (at the most) in company, cast lots who should be associated: and the first lot fell to those of the tribes of Reuben and Simeon; the next to those of Judah and Issachar; and so to the rest.

Ver. 11. Of the tribe of Joseph.] i. e. Of the other branch of Joseph's family, viz. of the tribe of Manasseh, as it here follows.

Ver. 16. These are the names] He would have their names remembered (which is the reason of this remark), for the sake of those two worthy men, Caleb and Joshua, whose virtue was very illustrious in the midst of a crooked and perverse generation.

Moses called Oshea] So he is called, ver. 8, being named for the tribe of Ephraim.

Jehoshua.] He was called by this name presently after they came out of Egypt (Exod. xvii. 9), when he went to fight with Amalek: whom he having overcome, Moses looked upon it as a token that he should save and deliver the people of Israel, and then called him by this name: which imports something more than Oshea; for that denotes only a prayer for salva-

Moses sent to spy out the land. And Moses called Oshea the son of Nun Jehoshua.

17 ¶ And Moses sent them to spy out the land of Canaan, and said unto them, Get you up this way southward, and go up into the mountain :

18 And see the land, what it is; and the people that dwelleth therein, whether they be strong or weak, few or many ;

19 And what the land is that they dwell in, whether it be good or bad; and what cities they be that they dwell in, whether in tents, or in strong holds ;

20 And what the land is, whether it be fat or lean, whether there be wood therein, or not. And be ye of good courage, and bring of the fruit of the land. Now the time was the time of the firstripe grapes.

21 ¶ So they went up, and searched the land from the wilderness of Zin unto Rehob, as men come to Hamath.

22 And they ascended by the south, and came unto Hebron; where Ahiman, Sheshai, and Talmai, the children of Anak, were. (Now Hebron was built seven years before Zoan in Egypt.)

tion (as Menochius observes), but this carries in it a promise of it. And some think the addition of the first letter in the name of Jehoshua was from the name Jehovah; implying that the Lord would employ him in leading and conducting his people into the land of promise: wherein he was a type of the Saviour of the world, the Lord Jesus (whose name is the same with this), who conducts those who believe on him to a heavenly inheritance.

If I could find the like comfortable signification in the rest of the names of these men, I should think there might be some ground for their opinion, who fancy Moses chose Joshua because there was a good omen in his very name. For all nations took great care that no man should be employed in affairs of moment, whose name carried any unlucky signification in it. So Cicero observes, in his first book of Divination, that the generals of armies, and the censors, took care that none should so much as lead the sacrifices to the altar but who were bonis nominibus, "of names that signified good:" of which the consuls also were very observant, ut primus miles fiat bono nomine, "that the first soldier whom they listed should be of a good name;" such as Valerius, Salvius, Statorius, or the like. On the contrary, the name of Nævius was deemed so bad, that in his Oration pro Quinct. Sext. he saith, "having named the man, methinks I have said enough."

Ver. 17. Moses sent them to spy] That is, when he sent them to spy out the land (as was said in the foregoing verse), he gave them the following directions.

Get you up this way southward,] This south part of Canaan fell afterward to be part of the lot of the tribe of Judah (Josh. xv. 1—3), and was very dry, and consequently barren (Judg. i. 15), and therefore fittest for their entrance to spy out the land unobserved, being less inhabited than the better parts of the country. Besides, it was nearest to the place where they now were encamped.

Go up into the mountain :] Where the Amorites dwelt (Deut. i. 19), together with some Amalekites, and other people (ch. xiv. 43, 45). From whence they were to go down into the valleys.

Ver. 18. See the land, what it is; and the people] These are the general directions which he gave them, to inform themselves both of the country and of its inhabitants.

Whether they be strong or weak, few or many ;] In particular, with respect to the latter, he directs them to inform themselves whether the inhabitants were strong-bodied or feeble; and whether their number was great or small.

Ver. 19. What the land is] And, with respect to the former, he would have them bring an account; first, what sort of country it was, whether healthful and delightful, or unwholesome and unpleasant.

What cities they be] And then how large their cities were, and of what strength.

Whether in tents, or in strong holds ;] Whether they lived in tents, as the Arabians did (and the Israelites while they were in the wilderness), or in houses, and whether they were fortified. Or rather (as we would say in our language), whether in open villages or in walled cities: for so the word mahanaim signifies, not tents (as we here translate it), but hosts or camps (Gen. xxxii. 1), and here towns without walls, as the LXX. interpret it; and the Vulgar, also, only inverting the order of the words, whether in walled towns, or without walls.

Ver. 20. What the land is.] And last of all, what is the soil of the country; whether rich and fertile, or poor and barren; and also, whether it be a woody country, or otherwise.

Be ye of good courage, and bring of the fruit] In which discoveries, there being some hazard, he bids them be confident God would preserve them; so that they might venture to bring away with them some of the fruit which the country produced.

Of the firstripe grapes.] Towards the vintage. Ver. 21. So they went up,—from the wilderness of Zin] Which was on the south of the land of Canaan (ch. xxxiv. 3; Josh. xv. 1, 3), being different from the wilderness of Sin, which lay near to Egypt (Exod. xvi. 1).

Unto Rehob, as men come to Hamath.] The city of Rehob lay in the north of the land of Canaan, and fell to the lot of the tribe of Asher (Josh. xix. 28). And it lay not far from Hamath (which, in aftertimes, was called Epiphania), a city which we very often read of afterward, as the bounds of Judea northward; which Moses saith was unto the entrance of Hamath (ch. xxxiv. 8). So that they took a survey of the whole country, from one end of it to the other, south and north; and also, as they passed along, observed those parts that lay east and west. For they gave an account of the Canaanites, as dwelling "by the sea (which was westward), and by the coast of Jordan," which was on the east (ver. 29). Or, if by the sea we understand not the Western Ocean, but the Dead Sea (as some do); yet it appears by these very words, that they bent their course, as they passed from south to north, unto the western and eastern parts also. For Rehob and Hamath both lay at the foot of Libanus; one to the north-west (towards Sidon), and the other to the north-east.

Ver. 22. They ascended by the south,] In their return from searching the country.

Came unto Hebron ;] That is, some of them. For the word in the Hebrew is not they came (as it is they ascended), but he came; which demonstrates that they did not go all of them together in a company (for that had been dangerous, and might have made them taken notice of), but dispersed themselves; some going to discover one place, some another. And it is a probable conjecture of some of the Hebrew doctors, that Caleb was the man that went to take a view of Hebron; and was so little 23 And they came unto the brook of Eshcol, and cut down from thence a branch with one cluster of grapes, and they bare it between two upon a staff; and they brought of the pomegranates, and of the figs.

24 The place was called the brook Eshcol, because of the cluster of grapes which the children of Israel cut down from thence.

affrighted at the sight of the giants there, that he was the very person that afterward drove them out; and had this place given him for his portion: for it was in the south part of the lot of the tribe of Judah; being formerly called Kirjath-Arba (Josh. xiv. 9, 12, 14).

Where Ahiman, Sheshai, and Talmi, the children of Anak, were.] These were the grandchildren of Arba (from whom Hebron had the name of Kirjath-Arba, i. e. the city of Arba), who was the father of Anak, whose family was more eminent than any other in Canaan; these three sons of his being men not only of great bulk, but prowess and valour. Bochartus thinks (lib. i. Canaan, cap. 1) that Anak signifies as much as the Roman name Torquatus; being like to that Gaul whom Manlius vanquished. And Ahiman signifies as much as, who is my brother? importing there was none to be compared with him. Sheshai he takes to be as much as Sixtus, viz. six cubits high, as Goliath was. And Talmi he derives from talam, "furrow;" as if he seemed in length to equal a furrow in the field. These were the people that made the Israelites tremble; for it is likely their whole family was of a very large stature, though not so big as these. And, indeed, they were so very terrible to all their neighbours, that it became a proverbial saying in those countries, Who can stand before the children of Anak? (Deut. ix. 2).

Hebron was built seven years before Zoan in Egypt.] The Egyptians boasted of the great antiquity of their nation and cities: but Moses shows that Hebron was built before the capital city of their country: for so Zoan was; and called in after ages Tanis; lying not far from that mouth of the river Nile, which from thence was called by Plutarch ταριτικόν ὄσιον. R. Solomon will have it that Hebron was built by Cham, one of the three sons of Noah, and the father of Mizraim; from whom the Egyptians descended. But of this there is no certainty; and the Gemara upon Sota (cap. 7), saith, It is not likely that a man would build a house for his younger son, before he had built one for his elder; for Canaan was the youngest of all the sons of Cham (Gen. x. 6). Yet those doctors are willing to suppose that Cham built both these cities; and therefore interpret the word banah, which is rightly translated built, as if it signified fruitful (according to Gen. xvi. 2), and make the sense to be, that "Hebron was seven times more fruitful than Zoan:" which is very foolish; as, upon other accounts, so on this, that Hebron was a stony place, and therefore not fertile.

Ver. 23. Came unto the brook of Eshcol,] A place which lay in a valley at the foot of the mountain (Deut. i. 24).

Cut down—a branch with one cluster of grapes,] This was done, no doubt, in some private place, upon the southern borders of Canaan; just as they were returning to the camp of Israel again. For it would have given the country too great an alarm, if they had marched in the highway with this bunch upon their shoulders.

They bare it between two] A great many authors mention vine and grapes of an extraordinary bigness

25 And they returned from searching of the land after forty days.

26 ¶ And they went and came to Moses, and to Aaron, and to all the congregation of the children of Israel, unto the wilderness of Paran, to Kadesh; and brought back word unto them, and unto all the congregation, and shewed them the fruit of the land.

in those eastern and southern countries. I need only refer to Strabo, who says, the vines in Margiana, and other places, were so big, that two men could scarce compass them with their arms, and that they produced βέρρον δίαρρον, "a bunch of grapes of two cubits" (lib. ii. Geograph. p. 73, and lib. xi. p. 516). Which is in part justified by Olearius, in his late travels into Persia, book iii., where he saith, not far from Astracan, he saw vines, whose trunks were so thick, that a man could do no more than grasp them about with both his arms. And Forsterus, in his Dictionarium Hebraicum, p. 862, saith, there was a preacher at Nuremberg called Achaiens, who lived as a monk eight years in the holy land (as they call it), who told him upon his sick-bed, that in his time there were clusters of grapes at Hebron of such bigness, that one single kernel was sufficient to quench his thirst a whole day, when he was sick there of a tympany. J. Conradus Dieterus hath collected a great deal more to this purpose out of Leo Africanus and Nic. Radzivillius, and other authors, in his Antiq. Biblicæ, p. 249. And since him the most learned Huetius, in his Questiones Alnetanæ, lib. ii. cap. 12, n. 24, where, among other things, he observes that Crete, Chios, and other islands in the Archipelago, afford bunches of grapes of ten pound weight, sometimes of thirty-six, yea, of forty. And he mentions grapes of a prodigious bigness in the island of Madeira.

Upon a staff;] See ch. iv. 10.

They brought of the pomegranates, and of the figs.] Which grew in the parts nearest to the place where the Israelites were encamped.

Ver. 24. The place was called the brook Eshcol,] That is, when the Israelites got possession of the land, they called this brook (or valley) by the name of Eshcol, in memory of this bunch of grapes, for so Eshcol signifies.

Ver. 25. They returned from searching] Came back to the camp of Israel.

After forty days.] This shows that they did not take a cursory view of the country, but took time enough to make their observations. And the ripe fruit which they brought with them, after they had been forty days from the camp, demonstrates that their return was in the latter end of the sixth month, very near to the seventh; that is, in the end of the year, according to the old style of that nation. For on the fifteenth day of the seventh month God ordered the feast of the tabernacles to be celebrated; a little before which they gathered both their harvest and their vintage (Exod. xxiii. 16, Lev. xxiii. 39, Deut. xvi. 13).

Ver. 26. They went and came to Moses, &c.] They went up the mountain from Eshcol, and came down on the other side of it to Moses and Aaron, and all the congregation (Deut. i. 24, 25).

Unto the wilderness of Paran, to Kadesh;] Unto the place from whence they were sent; which was Kadesh-barnea (see ver. 3, and Deut. ix. 23), which is here in short called Kadesh; but is quite different from that Kadesh we read of afterward (ch. xxi. 1). For that was in the wilderness of Sin; and they did not come to it till the fortieth year after they came out of 27 And they told him, and said, We came unto the land whither thou sentest us, and surely it floweth with milk and honey; and this is the fruit of it.

28 Nevertheless the people be strong that dwell in the land, and the cities are walled, and very great: and moreover we saw the children of Anak there.

Egypt (ch. xxxiii. 37, 38), whereas they were at this Kadesh in the second year; before they were doomed to wander forty years in the wilderness.

Brought back word unto them] Gave a public account before Moses and Aaron of what they had discovered.

Shewed them the fruit] And at the same time presented to them the cluster of grapes, the pomegranates, and figs, which they had brought with them.

Ver. 27. They told him,] They address their relation to Moses, because he sent them (ver. 2).

We came unto the land whither thou sentest us,] I suppose they chose some of their number to speak in the name of the rest: and, first, they give an account of the land, as he required (ver. 19, 20).

It floweth with milk and honey;] Their report of the condition of the land was as honest as could be desired; for they testify it to be such as God promised to bestow upon them (Exod. xxxiii. 3).

This is the fruit of it.] They prove what they say by a sample of the product of it: which was so large, that some of the Jews fancy there were eight men employed to carry this one cluster, as they say in the Gemara Sotæ, cap. 7. Of which the spies make this wicked use, as from thence to tell their brethren, "You see this goodly fruit, how vast it is: but believe us, the inhabitants of the country exceed us, and all other men, in stature, as much as this fruit exceeds all other of the same kind throughout the world." So Wagenseil explains the sense of their discourse in that place, sect. 4.

Ver. 28. The people be strong] This is an account of the other part of the inquiry Moses commanded them to make concerning the inhabitants and their cities (ver. 18).

We saw the children of Anak there.] See ver. 22. All this was true; but spoken in such a manner as to represent the conquest of the country exceeding difficult, if not impossible. So they explain their meaning in downright words (ver. 31), and so the people understood them, Dent. i. 28, where these frightful people are called "the sons of the Anakims:" for they saw not only those three mentioned before (ver. 22), but others also that were descended from them; who, as I there noted, were gigantic persons. So the LXX. translate these words νιοί γιγάντων, and so the Chaldee; and so the Jews use the word Anakim, to signify giants; particularly Benjamin Tudelensis, p. 3, of his Itinerary; where L'Empereur thinks it probable they were called Anakims, a torque quo colla superbe cingebant, "from a collar or chain which they proudly wore about their necks:" for the word Anak properly signifies collum torque cingere (p. 136), "to wreath a chain about the neck." But it is evident they had their name from their progenitor, Anak, the son of Arba: whence he was so called we do not know.

Ver. 29. The Amalekites dwell in the land of the south:] They do not represent the Amalekites as inhabitants of the land of Canaan; but they observe that they lay on the south border of it: where, if they went about to enter, in all probability, that nation (which were their early enemies when they came out of Egypt) would help to oppose them in their attempt as much as the people of Canaan. For that is their intention, in the following report, to show what a stout people they must encounter, which way soever they endeavoured to enter into Canaan.

29 The Amalekites dwell in the land of the south: and the Hittites, and the Jebusites, and the Amorites, dwell in the mountains: and the Canaanites dwell by the sea, and by the coast of Jordan.

30 And Caleb stilled the people before Moses, and said, Let us go up at once, and possess it; for we are well able to overcome it.

The Hittites, and the Jebusites, and the Amorites,] An account of all these see Gen. xv. 20, 21.

Dwell in the mountains:] Which were in the entrance of the land of Canaan, on the south-east part of it. Particularly the Amorites, it is evident, were planted there, upon the mountains of the borders of Canaan (Dent. i. 27, 44). And many of them had made an expedition into the country beyond Jordan, where they had possessed themselves of Bashan and Heshbon, and all the land between the rivers Jabbok and Arnon. For they were a very warlike people, and of great stature (Amos ii. 9), which made these searchers of their land afraid of them; and bid their brethren consider whether they thought they should be able to dispute their passage with them: which they plainly suggest, in their opinion, they could not. For the Jebusites were another mighty people, whom, after the conquest of Canaan, they could not of a long time dispossess of Mount Sion. I need not say how terrible the Hittites were; for it is probable from thence came the word hittha, which signifies a fright and sudden consternation, as Bochartus hath observed in his Phaleg, lib. iv. cap. 36.

The Canaanites] Those who were particularly called by this name: see Gen. xv. 20.

Dwell by the sea,] It is certain that the Canaanites dwelt by the ocean called the Midland Sea, for they seem to have had their names from merchandising, for which that situation was most proper; and for that reason others of them were seated near Jordan. This, I think, is plain from Dent. i. 7. And, besides, the word sea alone commonly signifies that great ocean. But it being plain that they were also seated, as it here follows, upon the river Jordan, it is possible that by sea may be meant, in this place, the Dead Sea, or the Lake of Genesareth, or both of them; because they were near Jordan, which ran into them.

By the coast of Jordan.] Where the Canaanites were also seated, as is evident from Dent. xi. 30. For there were both western and eastern Canaanites, as appears from Josh. xi. 3, and they are frequently joined with the Perizzites (particularly Judg. i. 4), who were a fierce sort of rough people, that dwelt in the woody part of the mountains. So that the intention of the men who made this report was, to represent to the people, that whether they invaded the land by the southern parts or the eastern, they would find both strongly guarded by a mighty people, much superior to them in force: which account, the following verse shows, put the people into a tumult.

Ver. 30. Caleb stilled the people] It is plain by this, that the people understood, by their way of speaking, countenances, and gestures, that the meaning of these men who made this report (which was not false in itself) was, that though the country indeed was very rich and desirable, yet it was impossible for them to drive the inhabitants out of it: which put them into a mutinous disposition, as Caleb perceived by their looks and their muttering; and therefore stepped forth, before it brake out, to quiet their spirits with 31 But the men that went up with him said, We be not able to go up against the people; for they are stronger than we.

32 And they brought up an evil report of the land which they had searched unto the children of Israel, saying, The land, through which we have gone to search it, is a land that eateth up the inhabitants thereof; and all the people that we saw in it are men of a great stature.

his account of the country and inhabitants, in which Joshua, no question, joined with him. It is not indeed here mentioned, because Caleb, perhaps, stood next to those who began to make a commotion, and therefore spake first: but he was seconded by Joshua, we may be sure; because we find him mentioned in the next chapter, and, in the first place, together with Caleb, as endeavouring to appease the tumult. And he is not only exempted from the punishment inflicted upon the people for their rebellion (ch. xiv. 30, 38), but is expressly said to have followed the Lord fully, as well as Caleb (ch. xxxii. 12).

Before Moses.] The Hebrew phrase el mosheh may signify that he stilled them, as they were coming towards Moses in a seditious manner; or quieted them so far as to make them hearken to Moses; or, as we render it, in his presence, when they were ready to fly in his face. One of the doctors in the Gemara being mentioned (cap. 9), saith, that Joshua being about to speak, they bitterly reproached him, and would not suffer him to proceed: and therefore Caleb thought good to give them a great many blanding words, and to call Moses this son of Amram, which looked like contempt of him; whereby he stilled them, and disposed them to listen to him. And then he said, "Is not he the person that brought us out of Egypt; that divided the Red Sea for us to pass through it; that gave us manna from heaven? What if he should bid us make ladders and climb up into the skies, should we not obey him?"

Let us go up at once.] Or, go up immediately, without a stop.

Possess it;] He speaks as if it were already their own (as indeed it was, by God's gift), and they needed only enter and take possession of it.

We are well able to overcome it.] There will be no such difficulty, as these men represent, in the conquest of it.

Ver. 31. But the men that went up with him] The rest of the company that went to search the land; who, if they had not persisted in their unbelief, the people, perhaps, might have been perfectly appeased by Caleb and Joshua.

We be not able] Now they open their minds more plainly, in their reply to Caleb, whom they oppose directly; and declare their opinion downright, that they were not an equal match for their enemies.

To go up against the people;] To beat them out of the mountains which they inhabited.

For they are stronger than we.] These men had no confidence in the promise and power of God, on which Caleb and Joshua relied; but measured all things by human strength.

Ver. 32. They brought up an evil report] In the heat of their opposition, they now disparage the country which they had before praised (ver. 27), and also stretch their report of the inhabitants beyond the truth.

Saying, The land,—eateth up the inhabitants thereof;] Unless we suppose that there was a great plague at this time in the country, as the Hebrews do (who love to excuse their forefathers' sins), this was a gross lie. But take it as they suppose, yet this was a very malignant report. For if they saw the people of the country everywhere, as they passed along, carrying their neighbours to their graves (as the Jews tell the tale), this, which they should have ascribed to the providence of God, who sent this mortality, that they might have fewer enemies to oppose them, and that these spies might pass more freely, and less observed, they most wickedly ascribe to the badness of the air: which being very unhealthy to the natives, might well be thought would be much more so to strangers. Thus bad minds (as the aforesaid Gemara glosses well enough upon this story) turn that which God intends for their benefit into their hurt. And if we had any better authority for this story, the word achal (which we translate eat up) would well enough agree with it. For, as Maimonides observes, in the first part of his More Nevoch. (cap. 30), it is used in the Holy Scriptures concerning any kind of consumption, destruction, or desolation: as here in this book, ch. xi. 1; Lev. xxvi. 33; 2 Sam. ii. 26, &c.

The people—were men of a great stature.] The Hebrew phrase is, "men of measures," ἀνδρες ὑπερμέτρεις, as the LXX. translate it, "men of larger size than the rest of mankind." Which we have no reason to think was true; but having seen the sons of Anak in one part of the country, they imagined all the rest of the people to be near unto their stature. For this is the description of that giant of Gath, mentioned 1 Chron. xx. 6, where he is called "a man of measure;" and 2 Sam. xxi. 20, where he is called in the plural number (as they are here), "a man of measures," ἀνὴρ ὑπερμετρείτης, "a man above the common bigness." And thus very great houses are called "houses of measure" (Jer. xxii. 24).

Ver. 33. There we saw the giants] Men of greater bulk and strength than the biggest of those very great men (see Gen. vi. 4) which they spake of in the foregoing words.

Sons of Anak.] They had mentioned this once before (ver. 23), and now repeat it again; because they were struck with such a terror at the sight of them, that they were always at their tongue's end. Just as Homer mentions, Τρώας τε καὶ Ἑκτόρα, as Bochartus makes the comparison (lib. i. Canaan, cap. 1).

Which come of the giants:] Who were descended from a gigantic race of men; particularly from Arba, who was their grandfather, as Joshua tells us, ch. xiv. 15, xv. 13, 14, &c., where he shows how Caleb drove these Anakims out of their cities, and made them fly to the Philistines; where there were some remainders of them till the days of David. And others of them, perhaps, fled into Greece; for there was a race of men among the Greeks called Ἄνακτες; who, Vossius thinks it probable, might descend from these children of Anak (lib. i. De Orig. et Progressu Idolol. cap. 13).

We were—as grasshoppers.] Their fear magnified them above measure; though, no doubt, they were men of such an extraordinary height, that they might look upon themselves to be as small and contemptible as grasshoppers are compared with us. And such very tall men there are still in some parts of the world as Job Ludolphus observes, in his Commentary upon his Histor. Ethiopica, lib. i. cap. 2, n. 22.

So we were in their sight.] One of the Jewish doctors makes bold to call these men liars: for, though their fear might make them appear as grasshoppers, yet how could they tell, saith he, that they were so in the sight of the children of Anak? Here the Gemarists (in the 33 And there we saw the giants, the sons of Anak, which come of the giants: and we place I mentioned above, cap. 10) endeavour to help them out, by continuing the tale of the great mortality which was then in those countries. Where a funeral-feast (as the manner was) being one day made under certain cedar-trees, which are very shady, the spies got up to the top of them, to hide themselves among the thick boughs; but the people below happening to look up, the spies heard them say, There are men got up into the trees, who look like grasshoppers. But there needs no such inventions, to defend them, when an hyperbole will do it; their plain meaning were in our own sight as grasshoppers, and so we were in their sight.

being this, that the Anakims looked down upon them with the utmost contempt.

By all which it appears that they had not only a sight of the Anakims, but the Anakims also saw them, and looked upon them, it is likely, as they did upon other travellers; who were wont to come thither, either for their pleasure, or to traffic in their country; or in their way to other places; whom it was not their custom to examine strictly, whence they came, and what their business was; but let pass to and fro among them freely.

CHAPTER XIV.

1 The people murmur at the news. 6 Joshua and Caleb labour to still them. 11 God threateneth them. 13 Moses persuadeth God, and obtaineth pardon. 26 The murmurers are deprived of entering into the land. 36 The men who raised the evil report die by a plague. 40 The people that would invade the land against the will of God are smitten.

1 AND all the congregation lifted up their voice, and cried; and the people wept that night.

2 And all the children of Israel murmured against Moses and against Aaron: and the whole congregation said unto them, Would God that we had died in the land of Egypt! or would God we had died in this wilderness!

3 And wherefore hath the LORD brought us unto this land, to fall by the sword, that our wives and our children should be a prey? were it not better for us to return into Egypt?

4 And they said one to another, Let us make a captain, and let us return into Egypt.

5 Then Moses and Aaron fell on their faces before all the assembly of the congregation of the children of Israel.

CHAP. XIV.

Ver. 1. All the congregation] By "all the congregation" may be here meant, all the great men (for so the phrase sometimes signifies), except Caleb and Joshua, and, perhaps, some few others.

Cried;] Shrieked, and made loud lamentations.

The people wept] Which put all the people in tears.

That night.] Which followed after the report made by the spies.

Ver. 2. The children of Israel murmured] As they had frequently done before; but now in a more tumultuous manner.

The whole congregation said] The great men spake in the name of the whole body of the people.

Would God that we had died in the land of Egypt!] In a fit of fury and despair they quite forgot how miraculously God had brought them from thence; and consequently could as easily bring them into Canaan.

Or—in this wilderness!] When several of their brethren were burnt, and smote with a very great plague, in this very wilderness of Paran (ch. xi. 1, 33).

Ver. 3. Wherefore hath the Lord brought us unto this land.] Having vented their passion against God's ministers, they most undutifully accuse him, as if he had dealt deceitfully with them.

To fall by the sword.] Of the children of Anak, who they fancied were irresistible.

Should be a prey?] To the people of Canaan, after all the men of Israel were killed.

Were it not better for us to return] Their rage deprived them of the use of their reason.

Ver. 4. Let us make a captain, and let us return] They knew that Moses would not conduct them thither; and therefore they thought of choosing another leader. But, though they might in a raging fit speak of returning to Egypt, yet it is an amazing thing that they should continue in this madness, and deliberate about it; nay, actually appoint them a captain, as Nehemiah saith they did, ch. ix. 17. For how could they get thither without food! which they could not expect God would send them from heaven, when they had forsaken him. Or how could they hope to find their way, when his cloud, which directed them, was withdrawn from them? Or hope to deal with those that might oppose their passage, if they hit upon the right way? And after all, if they came into Egypt, what entertainment could they look for there, among a people whose king, and princes, and first-born, had lately perished on their account! Nothing can be said in answer to these things, but that outrageous discontent will not suffer men to consider any thing but that which grieves them; and that foul ingratitude and forgetfulness of God's benefits, throws them into such discontents.

Ver. 5. Moses and Aaron fell on their faces] To deprecate God's displeasure; which lately arose against them, upon a less occasion than this (ch. xi. 33), and they might justly fear would now destroy them all, for their incurable infidelity; as Josephus explains it.

Before all the assembly] Some fancy, that their falling down before them, was to beseech them to desist from their murmuring; and to trust in God, who would go before them, and fight for them; as he saith he told them, Deut. i. 29, 30. But falling on their faces being the posture of the most humble supplicants to God, and not to men (as all understand it in other places, particularly ch. xvi. 4, xx. 6), their falling down before the assembly signifies no more, but that in their presence Moses and Aaron humbled themselves deeply before the Divine Majesty; and prayed to him with the greatest earnestness to forgive them, and to bestow a better mind upon them. Which they did in their presence, to awaken them to consider the danger they were in by their heinous sin; that they themselves might cry to him for mercy. For the usual posture of prayer in that na-

6 ¶ And Joshua the son of Nun, and Caleb the son of Jephunneh, which were of them that searched the land, rent their clothes :

7 And they spake unto all the company of the children of Israel, saying, The land, which we passed through to search it, is an exceeding good land.

8 If the LORD delight in us, then he will bring us into this land, and give it us ; a land which floweth with milk and honey.

9 Only rebel not ye against the LORD, neither fear ye the people of the land ; for they are bread for us : their defence is departed from them, and the LORD is with us : fear them not.

tion was standing ; but in very great distress, and anxiety of mind, when they were exceeding solicitous to obtain their petition, they kneeled down, and sometimes fell on their faces ; which was still a sign of greater ardour and concernment, as appears from our blessed Saviour (Matt. xxvi. 39 ; Luke xxii. 41).

Ver. 6. Rent their clothes :] As the manner was, on any sad and doleful occasion ; especially when they heard any man blaspheme the divine Majesty ; in detestation of the impiety, and to declare their sorrow and indignation, and dread of God's judgments ; as appears from Jer. xxxvi. 24, where the stupidity of Jehoiakim and his servants is represented by this, that when they heard the words which the prophet declared in God's name against Judah, " they were not afraid nor rent their garments."

Ver. 7. They spake unto all the company] This showed great courage, that they durst declare their opinion, contrary to the sense of so great a multitude.

An exceeding good land.] This is opposed to what their fellows had said, that it was a land which ate up its inhabitants (ch. xiii. 32). Quite contrary they assure them it was very, very good, as the words are in the Hebrew ; and so expressed by the Chaldee, and the LXX., exceeding, exceeding good : that is, every way desirable ; for thus the Hebrews express the superlative degree.

Ver. 8. If the Lord delight in us, then he will bring us into this land.] If we do not forfeit his favour, he will make us so happy as to drive out the Canaanites, and settle us in the possession of this land.

Which floweth with milk and honey.] As their companions themselves had confessed (ch. xiii. 37).

Ver. 9. Rebel not] By slighting his goodness, by murmuring, and discontented speeches, and talking of going back to Egypt (ver. 2—4).

Neither fear ye the people] This is opposed to what the rest of the spies had said, concerning the mighty power and strength of the inhabitants of Canaan (ch. xiii. 28, 29, 31, &c.).

For they are bread for us :] We shall as easily vanquish them as we eat our meat.

Their defence is departed from them.] In the Hebrew the words are, their shadow ; whereby men being defended from heat in those countries, it signifies the protection which God gives men from those things that might hurt them : which Divine protection, they tell the people, was now withdrawn from the Canaanites, who had filled up the measure of their iniquities (Gen. xv. 16), and now were exposed as a prey to the Israelites.

The Lord is with us :] For, on the contrary, they entreat the people to consider that God, who was departed from the Canaanites, was with them, to aid and assist them in the conquest of the country : and for both these reasons they needed not to fear them. So they conclude their speech, like men of an undaunted spirit, in these words : fear them not.

10 But all the congregation bade stone them with stones. And the glory of the LORD appeared in the tabernacle of the congregation before all the children of Israel.

11 ¶ And the LORD said unto Moses, How long will this people provoke me ? and how long will it be ere they believe me, for all the signs which I have shewed among them ?

12 I will smite them with the pestilence, and disinherit them, and will make of thee a greater nation and mightier than they.

13 ¶ And Moses said unto the LORD, Then the Egyptians shall hear it, (for thou broughtest

Ver. 10. But all the congregation] The Hebrew words col ha edah, as I observed, ver. 1, signifies " all the great men ; the rulers of the rest."

Bade stone them with stones.] Ordered the people to stone them to death ; as they had done, it is likely, if they had not been deterred from the attempt by the appearance of the Divine Majesty. For the Hebrew word amar (as Maimonides observes in his More Nevochim, par. i. cap. 65), is used, not only concerning that which is spoken or thought, but of what is decreed or resolved. And he produces these words as an instance of it, together with Exod. ii. 14 ; 2 Sam. xxi. 16.

The glory of the Lord appeared] The Shechinah which resided within the tabernacle, upon the mercy-seat, now openly appeared, in a bright flaming light, like fire ; and, in all probability, after such an amazing manner, as terrified them from their design. Thus it appeared on Mount Sinai, to fright them from approaching near unto it, Exod. xxiv. 17 (from whence, Moses saith, the Lord thy God is a consuming fire, Deut. iv. 24), and thus it appeared afterward (Numb. xvi. 19, 42).

In the tabernacle] Or rather upon the tabernacle (for in the tabernacle the people could not have seen it, as now they did), over the most holy place ; which the cloud constantly covered, over the mercy-seat, where the Divine Glory dwelt (see ch. ix. 15).

Before all the children of Israel.] Both to fright them, as I said, from their purpose of stoning Joshua and Caleb ; and to show his anger and displeasure at their rebellion, which, it is likely, appeared by the flashes that came from the glorious flame.

Ver. 11. The Lord said unto Moses.] In answer, I suppose, unto his prayer (ver. 5).

How long will this people provoke me ?] Shall I always bear with their most undutiful behaviour ; which will provoke the greatest patience unto anger ?

How long will it be ere they believe me.] Dost thou not see that their unbelief is incurable ?

For all the signs which I have shewed] Since they continue in it, notwithstanding all the wonders I have done, to convince them of my power and faithfulness.

Ver. 12. I will smite them] Send a pestilential disease among them to sweep them away at once, as the fifteenth verse interprets it (see Exod. xxxii. 10).

Disinherit them.] And so deprive them and theirs of the country which I promised to their fathers for an inheritance (Gen. xv. 7). This was not an irrevocable decree, but a threatening which God changed into another severe punishment.

Will make of thee a greater nation] Fulfil my promise to Abraham, by making thee a father of a more numerous people, and more powerful than they whom I reject.

Ver. 13.] It is an abrupt kind of speech, proceed-up this people in thy might from among them;)

14 And they will tell it to the inhabitants of this land: for they have heard that thou LORD art among this people, that thou LORD art seen face to face, and that thy cloud standeth over them, and that thou goest before them, by day time in a pillar of a cloud, and in a pillar of fire by night.

15 ¶ Now if thou shalt kill all this people as one man, then the nations which have heard the fame of thee will speak, saying,

16 Because the LORD was not able to bring this people into the land which he sware unto them, therefore he hath slain them in the wilderness.

ing from the great disturbance which this threatening made in his mind; being as much as if he had said, If thou thus destroy them, the Egyptians, when they hear of it, will triumph; and thou wilt lose all the honour thou hast got, by the wonderful deliverance thou didst work for thy people from their bondage.

Ver. 14. They will tell it] Or rather, they will say to the inhabitants of this land, i. e. the Canaanites, with whom the Egyptians had frequent commerce.

For they have heard, &c.] The word for is not in the Hebrew: and the sense will be more plain if we omit it, and translate the whole thus; "They will say to the inhabitants of this land, they have heard that thou LORD art among this people:" that is, that there was a glorious token of thy presence among us.

That thou LORD art seen face to face,] And spakest to us from Mount Sinai out of that glorious cloud, which there appeared unto all the people (Exod. xix. 18, xx. 1, xxiv. 16, 17; Deut. iv. 12).

Thy cloud standeth over them,] Numb. x. 34.

That thou goest before them,] Exod. xiii. 21.

Ver. 15. If thou shalt kill all this people] Or rather, "but thou hast killed all this people."

As one man,] On a sudden, with one stroke; as if they had all but one life.

Then the nations—will speak, saying,] Of which the nations that have heard the forenamed report of thy majesty will make this construction.

Ver. 16. Because the LORD was not able to bring this people into the land] Because he whom they called Omnipotent, was indeed defective in his power; which at last failed him, so that he could not complete what he had undertaken.

Which he sware] Gen. xv. 17, 18, xxiv. 7.

Therefore he hath slain them in the wilderness.] Killed them all, before they came to the land he had solemnly promised to them; for that was an easier work than to make good his word.

The sum of this argument is, that it would be a great disparagement to the Divine Majesty if he now destroyed this nation; because his enemies would conclude, he had deluded them with false promises, which he wanted power to effect.

Ver. 17. Now,—let the power of my LORD be great,] That is, let it appear to be unlimited by bringing them into the land which he sware to give them (ver. 16), or by pardoning their sin, which had provoked his high displeasure against them (ver. 11). For by power may be meant either that which is properly called by that name, viz., his omnipotence, which can conquer all opposition: or his mercy and clemency, in overcoming his anger, and bearing with an ungrateful people: which agrees very well with 17 And now, I beseech thee, let the power of my LORD be great, according as thou hast spoken, saying,

18 The LORD is longsuffering, and of great mercy, forgiving iniquity and transgression, and by no means clearing the guilty, visiting the iniquity of the fathers upon the children unto the third and fourth generation.

19 Pardon, I beseech thee, the iniquity of this people according unto the greatness of thy mercy, and as thou hast forgiven this people, from Egypt even until now.

20 And the LORD said, I have pardoned according to thy word:

21 But as truly as I live, all the earth shall be filled with the glory of the LORD.

what follows; but both tend to the same meaning, that he would not destroy them, but bestow the land of Canaan upon them according to his intentions.

According as thou hast spoken,] Which will be suitable to thy blessed nature, which thou didst proclaim to me when thy glory passed by me (see Exod. xxxi. 22, xxxiv. 5, 6).

Ver. 18. The LORD is longsuffering, &c.] In these very words (though something more largely) God proclaimed his name to Moses, when he showed him his glory (Exod. xxxiv. 6, 7), where they are explained.

By no means clearing the guilty,] Even these words (according to the interpretation I have there given of them) are a plain argument to move the Divine goodness to pardon their sin. But the next words ["visiting the iniquity of the fathers upon the children," &c.] seem to be directly contrary to the intention of his petition, till it be considered, that they had not now committed idolatry, against which sin, God, in these words, particularly declares his severity; and that Moses did not now plead for an absolute pardon without any punishment at all, but only that he would not destroy the whole nation as one man, and utterly disinherit them, as he seemed resolved to do (ver. 12, 15). This threatening he hoped his gracious nature would incline him to revoke; notwithstanding which he might "visit the sin of the fathers upon the children, unto the third and fourth generation;" that is, punish them and their posterity a long time. And so this latter part of the verse is to be interpreted (according to what I observed, Exod. xxxiv. 7), "in making desolate he will not make quite desolate, though he visit the iniquity of the fathers upon the children," &c.

Ver. 19. Pardon,—the iniquity of this people] So far as not to destroy them utterly.

According unto the greatness of thy mercy,] Which God himself had proclaimed (ver. 18).

As thou hast forgiven this people,] This looks like an argument against them: for they having provoked him so often as they had done since they came out of Egypt, in the space of one year and little more (see ver. 22), and been as often forgiven, it might seem more reasonable that he should now punish them, and not forgive them any more. But he appeals to that long-suffering goodness which he mentions as the prime character of the Divine Nature (ver. 18), which, though it had been exercised by them many ways, yet he hoped would still bear longer with them.

Ver. 20. I have pardoned] Granted thy desire, not to destroy them utterly and altogether (ver. 12, 15).

Ver. 21.] In the Hebrew the words run plainly

22 Because all those men which have seen my glory, and my miracles, which I did in Egypt and in the wilderness, and have tempted me now these ten times, and have not hearkened to my voice;

23 Surely they shall not see the land which I swear unto their fathers, neither shall any of them that provoked me see it:

thus, "As true as I live, and that all the earth shall be (or hath been) filled with the glory of the Lord." For so the Egyptians themselves confessed (ver. 14), that the fame of it was come to them; and afterward he did many more wonderful things when he brought them into Canaan: unto which (if these words be taken in the future tense) he hath respect, when he saith, "as true as that he would in a most glorious manner subdue the Canaanites, not one of these murmuring Israelites should come into that good land."

Ver. 22. Because all those men] The sense would have been clear if we had left out the word because, as we might have done, the Hebrew particle ki being sometimes only an expletive, or if we had translated it that, as it signifies in Gen. xxii. 17, and many other places. For the meaning plainly is, though the words be something intricate, that all the men of whom he is speaking should perish, and not one of them come into Canaan.

Which have seen my glory,] Which appeared to them in the cloud upon Mount Sinai, and resided in the tabernacle.

Miracles which I did in Egypt] Mentioned in the fourth, seventh, eighth, and following chapters of the book of Exodus.

In the wilderness,] Where he divided the Red Sea for them to pass through on dry land, and gave them manna constantly from heaven, with water out of a rock, which followed them whithersoever they went, &c.

Tempted me now these ten times,] That is, very oft, as this phrase ten times signifies (Gen. xxxi. 7, 41; Neh. iv. 12; Job xix. 3). But some of the Hebrews will not be satisfied with this explication, but endeavour to find out precisely just ten provocations of which they were guilty: though, to do this, they are forced to begin with one which fell out before they came to the Red Sea (Exod. xiv. 11, 12), and all the other nine they find in the wilderness (see Pirke Avoth. cap. 5, and Paulus Fagius's Scholia upon it; with Genebrard upon Ps. lxxviii. 46). Mr. Mede hath observed, that "to tempt God, in Scripture language, is to provoke him by some presumptuous fact to anger;" as it were, to try whether he will punish or not; or, in fewer words, to dare God (book i. Discourse 26, p. 153). And the following words in the next verse justify this notion in this place.

Have not hearkened to my voice;] This seems particularly to refer to their disobedience, when he bade them "go up, and possess the land of Canaan;" notwithstanding, they would not go up, but rebelled against the commandment of the Lord their God (Deut. i. 21, 26, &c.).

Ver. 23. Surely they shall not see the land, &c.] The Hebrew particle im, when it follows an oath, is to be simply translated not. And so the words run clearly here, "they shall not see the land which I swear unto their fathers."

Neither shall any of them that provoked me see it.] This is but an explication of the foregoing words, and might have been better translated, "even all that provoked me (by their discontent and murmuring, 24 But my servant Caleb, because he had another spirit with him, and hath followed me fully, him will I bring into the land wherinto he went; and his seed shall possess it.

25 (Now the Amalekites and the Canaanites dwell in the valley.) To morrow turn you, and get you into the wilderness by the way of the Red sea.

&c., ver. 1—3), they shall not see it." This heavy doom was passed upon them on the ninth day of the month Ab (which answers to our July), as Moses Kotzensis reports the opinion of their doctors: on which day, they say, both the first and second temples were levelled with the ground; and Bitter, likewise, a great city, was taken on the same day, in which were many thousand Jews; who, with their king (as they called him) Ben Cosiba, and his whole army, were cut in pieces. And to make this day still more dismal, Turnus Rufus, one of the Roman captains, ploughed up the ground on which the temple and buildings about it stood upon this very day (see Wagenseil upon Gemara Sotæ, cap. 7, sect. 10, annot. 8).

Ver. 24. But my servant Caleb,] He alone is here particularly mentioned, because this is the first proof we read of his sincerity and resolution. But Joshua is as much concerned in this character and promise, whose faith and courage were tried, as soon as they came out of Egypt, by fighting with the Amalekites. And therefore there was no need to speak here of his integrity: though afterward it is expressly remembered, in the very same words used in this place concerning Caleb (ch. xxxii. 12). And here below in this chapter (ver. 30), he is assured of coming into the land of promise as well as Caleb, with whom he joined in opposing the mutinous multitude (ver. 6), where he is named first in that heroic action.

Because he had another spirit] Was otherwise affected (as we now speak), trusting in the power and promise of God, and not at all afraid of the strength of their enemies.

Hath followed me fully,] The Hebrew phrase is, "hath fulfilled after me;" i. e. completed his obedience to me; or fulfilled my will and commands in every thing: being not only full of courage himself, but endeavouring to put it into others (Deut. i. 36).

Him will I bring into the land] Into Canaan: particularly to Hebron, and the parts about it; which were bestowed upon him by the order of Moses himself (Josh. xiv. 9, 13, &c., see ch. xiii. of this book, ver. 22).

His seed shall possess it.] Or, as some translate it, "shall expel it;" i. e. drive out the inhabitants of that place, and the parts adjacent, as we read he and his brother did (Josh. xv. 13—15, &c.).

Ver. 25. Now the Amalekites and the Canaanites dwell in the valley.] These words being read without a parenthesis, in conjunction with those that follow, are very plain, being thus translated; "both the Amalekites and the Canaanites dwell in the valley:" that is, at present lie in wait for you at the bottom of the other side of the mountain. For they were not far from one another (ch. xiii. 29), and the Hebrews use the word jashah for any abode in any place, though it be not a settlement, but for a short time (see ver. 45).

To morrow turn you,] Therefore, do not go forward, as I formerly commanded you, lest you fall into their ambushes; but face about, and return from whence you came, &c. This he bade them do to-morrow, i. e. hereafter; at their next removal: for they did remain some days in Kadesh before they

26 ¶ And the LORD spake unto Moses and unto Aaron, saying,

27 How long shall I bear with this evil congregation, which murmur against me? I have heard the murmurings of the children of Israel, which they murmur against me.

28 Say unto them, As truly as I live, saith the LORD, as ye have spoken in mine ears, so will I do to you:

29 Your carcasses shall fall in this wilderness; and all that were numbered of you, according to your whole number, from twenty years old and upward, which have murmured against me, turned about (Deut. i. ult.). And so the word to-morrow is used in Exod. xiii. 14, for the time to come.

Get you into the wilderness] Into that wilderness which led to the Red Sea, and so to Egypt, whither they desired to return (ver. 3, 4). This command was so grievous to them, that it set them, as I take it, into a new fit of murmuring: which is the occasion of what follows in the next verses, 26, 27.

Ver. 26.] He now speaks unto Aaron, what he only spake to Moses before (ver. 11).

Ver. 27. How long shall I bear with this evil congregation.] It is a short imperfect sort of speech in the Hebrew, such as men use when they are very angry; "how long to this evil congregation," i. e. shall I show mercy: which is the same with bear with them, as we translate it, to supply the sense.

Which murmur] Whom nothing will please, unless they have their own will in every thing.

I have heard the murmurings] This seems to signify that there was a new discontent; which, in all likelihood, arose, because God would not conduct them forward to Canaan: but bade them go back from whence they came: which order he tells them, in the following words, he would never revoke.

Ver. 28. As truly as I live, saith the Lord,] This oath made what he had resolved unalterable.

As ye have spoken in mine ears,] See ch. v. 2.

So will I do to you:] Give you your own wishes, to die in the wilderness; which was exactly fulfilled (ch. xxvi. 65).

Ver. 29. Your carcasses shall fall in this wilderness;] He repeats their own desire.

All that were numbered] Which number was taken about half a year ago; as we read in the first chapter of this book (ver. 3, 18, &c.).

From twenty years old and upward,] Which amounted in all to six hundred and three thousand five hundred and fifty (ver. 46), besides the Levites, who were not numbered at this time, as we read in the next verse, 47. And when they were numbered, their number was not taken from twenty years old; but from a month old and upward (ch. iii. 15). And therefore, the Levites are not comprehended in the heavy sentence here denounced, no more than the children under twenty years old, or the wives of the men that murmured; but only the men of war, who were above twenty years old. And accordingly we find Eleazar, who is mentioned at the numbering of the Levites (ch. iii. 32), alive at the dividing of the land of Canaan (Josh. xiv. 1).

Ver. 30. Ye shall not come into the land,] He would not have them retain the least hope of having this sentence reversed, being established by God's oath.

Concerning which I swear] Not to make these particular men, but the seed of Abraham inhabit it; as Grotius rightly observes (lib. ii. De Jure Belli et Pacis, cap. 13, sect. 3). The land was promised by oath, non personis, sed populo, "not to persons, but to the 30 Doubtless ye shall not come into the land, concerning which I swear to make you dwell therein, save Caleb the son of Jephunneh, and Joshua the son of Nun.

31 But your little ones, which ye said should be a prey, them will I bring in, and they shall know the land which ye have despised.

32 But as for you, your carcasses, they shall fall in this wilderness.

33 And your children shall wander in the wilderness forty years, and bear your whoredoms, until your carcasses be wasted in the wilderness.

34 After the number of the days in which ye people;" viz. to the posterity of those unto whom God sware to give it (ver. 23). Now such a promise, as he observes, may be performed at any time, because it is not tied to certain persons.

Save Caleb—and Joshua] They are excepted, because they had distinguished themselves from the rest, by their eminent faith and courage, in the midst of a perverse generation.

Ver. 31. Your little ones,] All under twenty years old.

Which ye said should be a prey,] He upbraids them with their discontented and distrustful language (ver. 3).

They shall know the land] That is, enjoy it.

Which ye have despised,] See ch. xiii. 32.

Ver. 32.] He repeats it again, to make them sensible of the certainty of it; and, in their own words (ver. 2), to humble and put them to confusion.

Ver. 33. Shall wander] So the Chaldee interpret what in the Hebrew is shall feed, or graze, as sheep do in the deserts. Or rather, after the manner of the Arabian shepherds, who could not stay long in one place, but were forced to remove their tents to another, that they might find pasture for their flocks. So R. Solomon interprets it.

Forty years,] Reckoning from their first coming out of Egypt; from whence they were brought into the wilderness a year and a half ago; and now are condemned to make up their time of wandering in it full forty years.

Bear your whoredoms,] That is, the punishment of their whoredoms; as idolatry is peculiarly called (ch. xv. 39, Exod. xxxiv. 15, Jer. iii. 14), of which they had been guilty presently after they came out of Egypt, when they made the golden calf and worshipped it; and continued other idolatrous practices (Lev. xvii. 5, 7), which God punishes now that he visits their present rebellion. For it was not that alone to which he threatens this punishment, but he reckons with them for all the rest of their iniquities (Deut. ix. 18, 24), especially for the greatest of them all, which he declared he would not forget to punish upon any new occasion (see Exod. xxxii. 34), which they now gave him. It must be acknowledged, also, that other heinous sins are called by this name of whoredoms in Scripture, as well as idolatry (Ps. lxxiii. 26), See Mr. Selden, lib. iii. Uxor. Hebr. cap. 23, p. 489.

Until your carcasses be wasted] This is the third time he reflects upon their foolish wish (ver. 29, 32).

Ver. 34. After the number] See ch. xiii. 25.

Even forty years,] Reckoning the time past, since they came into the wilderness, which was a year and a half: so that the meaning is, they should wander forty years in the wilderness before they got out of it. Which is not to be understood so precisely as to want nothing at all of it: for they came out of Egypt on the fifteenth day of the first month, on the morrow after the passover (ch. xxxiii. 3), and they came into searched the land, even forty days, each day for a year, shall ye bear your iniquities, even forty years, and ye shall know my breach of promise.

35 I the LORD have said, I will surely do it unto all this evil congregation, that are gathered together against me: in this wilderness they shall be consumed, and there they shall die.

36 And the men, which Moses sent to search the land, who returned, and made all the congregation to murmur against him, by bringing up a slander upon the land, 37 Even those men that did bring up the evil report upon the land, died by the plague before the LORD.

38 But Joshua the son of Nun, and Caleb the son of Jephunneh, which were of the men that went to search the land, lived still.

Canaan and pitched in Gilgal, upon the tenth day of the first month of the one-and-fortieth year after their departure from Egypt (Josh. iv. 19); and consequently there wanted five days of full forty years.

Ye shall know my breach of promise.] In the Hebrew the words are no more than these, "ye shall know my breach;" which the ancients understand of God's breaking in upon them, to take vengeance of them for their sin. So the LXX. γινώσεσθε τὸν θυμὸν τῆς ὀργῆς μου, "ye shall know the fury of my anger;" and the Vulgar translates it, ultionem meam, "my vengeance;" that is, you shall find that I am the avenger of iniquity. And it is the same if we understand my breach to signify God's departure from them, who had so shamefully departed from him. Or, according to our translation, it signifies, "a revocation of the blessing promised to them:" which was so nullified, that they were left without any hope of having the like promise of entering into Canaan renewed to them.

Ver. 35. I the Lord have said,] Decreed and pronounced this sentence.

I will surely do it] Break from them; or break in upon them, to consume them, and utterly disinherit this untoward generation.

That are gathered together against me.] Whom they accused, as well as Moses and Aaron (ver. 2, 3).

In this wilderness they shall be consumed.] The repetition of this so frequently (ver. 29, 32, 33), was to convince them the decree was peremptory and irreversible.

Ver. 36. The men, which Moses sent] That is, ten of them.

Who returned,] See ch. xiii. 25, 26.

Made all the congregation to murmur] See ch. xiii. 31, 32, xiv. 2.

Ver. 37. Even those men, &c., died by the plague] Either by the pestilence, threatened ver. 12, or by lightning, or some other sudden death; about which there is a dispute among the Hebrew doctors, in the Gemara on Sota, cap. 7, sect. 11, where some of them say they died of a quinsy, which choked them; or as others, their tongues swelled, and hung out of their mouths down to their navels, and were full of worms, &c. So that their punishment was suitable to their sin (as they conclude); "with their tongues they offended, and in their tongues they suffered."

Before the Lord.] Whose glory appeared upon the tabernacle, before them all (ver. 10), unto which I take these words to relate: signifying that they died in his presence (and perhaps by a flash of fire from thence), on that very day upon which this murmuring was raised by their false report.

39 And Moses told these sayings unto all the children of Israel: and the people mourned greatly.

40 ¶ And they rose up early in the morning, and gat them up into the top of the mountain, saying, Lo, we be here, and will go up unto the place which the LORD hath promised: for we have sinned.

41 And Moses said, Wherefore now do ye transgress the commandment of the LORD? but it shall not prosper.

42 Go not up, for the LORD is not among you; that ye be not smitten before your enemies.

43 For the Amalekites and the Canaanites are there before you, and ye shall fall by the sword: because ye are turned away from the LORD, therefore the LORD will not be with you.

Ver. 38. But Joshua—and Caleb] Here Joshua is mentioned with Caleb, and placed first (as in the sixth verse), as Caleb was in ver. 30. Which shows there was no difference made between them.

Lived still.] This is set down to show God's faithfulness in his promise to them: who, I suppose, were now in the company of the rest of the searchers of the land, before the Lord, and had no hurt, when all the other ten fell down dead on a sudden; which made their preservation the more remarkable.

Ver. 39. Moses told these sayings] Acquainted them with the doom which God had passed upon them.

The people mourned greatly.] Were extremely afflicted at the news: but did not beseech him to pray for them (as at other times, ch. xi. 2), because he had told them the doom was irreversible.

Ver. 40. And they rose up] Or, "but they rose up." In the morning.] The next morning after they were told what God had decreed against them.

Gat them up into the top of the mountain.] They resolved they would go up; or they prepared themselves for it: for they did not yet actually go up; as appears by the following words.

Lo, we be here.] We are ready to do as Joshua and Caleb exhorted us, ch. xiii. 40, xiv. 9. They seem now to be forward, as before they were backward to go to possess the land: which their rising early signified.

Will go up unto the place which the Lord hath promised:] They pretend now to depend upon his promise, and to trust he will make it good.

For we have sinned.] Are sensible of our sin, and repent of it. Or, though we have sinned, yet we hope he will make good his promise.

Ver. 41. Wherefore now do ye transgress] Why do you still continue in your disobedience to God; who commands you to return, and not to go forward (ver. 25).

But it shall not prosper.] You shall not succeed in your enterprise; which these words show they stood ready to take in hand.

Ver. 42. Go not up,] Though they sought the renewal of God's promise with tears (ver. 39), and now were ready to testify their repentance with the hazard of their lives, he would not recall the sentence passed upon them.

The Lord is not among you;] The cloud did not stir to conduct them; by which they might have understood that their attempt was presumptuous.

That ye be not smitten before your enemies.] Who, without God's help, would be too strong for them.

Ver. 43. For the Amalekites and the Canaanites are 44 But they presumed to go up unto the hill top: nevertheless the ark of the covenant of the LORD, and Moses, departed not out of the camp.

there before you,] Either they were removed out of the valley where they were before (ver. 25), or, their main body being there below, they sent a strong party to possess themselves of the top of the mountain, and to make good the pass against the Israelites.

Ye shall fall] Lose your lives in the attempt.

The Lord will not be with you,] This was a powerful reason to check their motion, and to restrain them from their attempt: but, after the manner of obstinate sinners, they go on still in their unbelief; as the next words inform us.

Ver. 44. But they presumed to go up] They audaciously endeavoured to ascend the mountain, against the Divine command: which is a strange instance of hardened infidelity.

The ark—departed not out of the camp,] The cloud stood still over the tabernacle; and therefore Moses, and the Levites, and the ark (which went before them, when they first removed from Sinai, ch. x. 33) did not stir out of the place where they were encamped to conduct them. But this seems to signify that all the other camps, except that of the Levites, i. e. the whole body of armed men, moved without the guidance of God; who would not favour them, because they moved against his express command.

45 Then the Amalekites came down, and the Canaanites which dwelt in that hill, and smote them, and discomfited them, even unto Hormah.

Ver. 45. Then the Amalekites came down, and the Canaanites] With whom the Amorites also joined (see Deut. i. 44).

Which dwell in that hill,] Who had posted themselves there, and possessed themselves of the top of the mountain (ver. 43, and see ver. 25).

Smote them,] Having a great advantage of them that were climbing up the hill: from whence they came pouring down upon them.

Discomfited them,] It is not said how great a slaughter they made of them; but it is likely it was not small, because they chased them a good way. Thus began God's threatening to be immediately fulfilled (that their carcasses should fall in that wilderness, ver. 29), by their own wilfulness.

Even unto Hormah,] A place in the confines of Canaan, near the Dead Sea: so called from the destruction that was here made of the Israelites, and afterward of the Canaanites (ch. xxi. 3; Judg. i. 17). And upon the occasion of this calamity which befel the Israelites, and the great mortality which followed, while they stayed in the wilderness, Moses is thought to have penned the ninetieth Psalm; in which he signifies the life of man was now shortened, and reduced to seventy or eighty years; that is, made but half as long as their forefathers.

CHAPTER XV.

1 The law of the meat offering and the drink offering. 13, 29 The stranger is under the same law. 17 The law of the first of the dough for an heave offering. 22 The sacrifice for sin of ignorance. 30 The punishment of presumption. 32 He that violated the sabbath is stoned. 37 The law of fringes.

1 AND the LORD spake unto Moses, saying,

2 Speak unto the children of Israel, and say unto them, When ye be come into the land of your habitations, which I give unto you,

3 And will make an offering by fire unto the LORD, a burnt offering, or a sacrifice in performing a vow, or in a freewill offering, or in your solemn feasts, to make a sweet savour unto the LORD, of the herd, or of the flock:

CHAP. XV.

Ver. 1.] We read in Deut. i. ult. that "they abode in Kadesh (where the foregoing murmuring was) many days:" during which time (and in the latter part of this second year after they came out of Egypt), it is very probable, all that we read in this chapter, and in the four following, was transacted.

Ver. 2.] These words were not directed to the whole congregation, but to the younger sort, who had not forfeited the favour of God, as their fathers had done; several of which, it is likely, were already dead, according to the doom God had passed upon them; and the rest looked upon themselves as disinherited (ch. xiv. 12): and therefore these precepts were not delivered to them.

When ye be come into the land of your habitations,] When she speaks to the children of the murmurers, whom he promised to bring into the land of Canaan (ch. xiv. 31), and would therefore have well instructed in the manner of sacrificing, wherein God's worship and service very much consisted; which is the reason why he further explains what he had heretofore said about this matter. But hence it appears, that they were not bound to observe these laws till they came to Canaan.

Ver. 3. And will make an offering by fire] This comprehends all the sacrifices which were burnt upon the altar, either in the whole or in part.

Burnt offering,] This was the principal, and most ancient sacrifice of all other; which was wholly burnt upon the altar, every morning and every evening. (Exod. xxix. 40) of which he treats in the first of Leviticus.

A sacrifice] This undoubtedly signifies peace-offerings, as appears from ver. 8, and from the words here following; and likewise from the use of the word sacrifice in other places (Exod. xviii. 12; Lev. xvii. 5, 8), and from this consideration also, that sin-offerings had no meat-offerings attending on them, but only in the case of a leper (Lev. xiv. 10).

In performing a vow,] These words explain what he means by a sacrifice, viz. peace-offerings; which were offered in performance of some vow, or freely of their own accord (Lev. vii. 16, xxii. 21), or by God's command upon their solemn feasts; as it here follows.

In your solemn feasts,] Mentioned Lev. xxiii. (see there, ver. 37, and Numb. xxix. 39).

To make a sweet savour] Lev. i. 9.

Of the herd, or of the flock:] Under the word flock is comprehended both kids and lambs: for the Hebrew words tsen and seh signify both; as many have observed, particularly Bochart in his Hierozoicon (par. i. lib. ii. cap. 42).

4 Then shall he that offereth his offering unto the LORD bring a meat offering of a tenth deal of flour mingled with the fourth part of an hin of oil.

5 And the fourth part of an hin of wine for a drink offering shalt thou prepare with the burnt offering or sacrifice, for one lamb.

6 Or for a ram, thou shalt prepare for a meat offering two tenth deals of flour mingled with the third part of an hin of oil.

7 And for a drink offering thou shalt offer the third part of an hin of wine, for a sweet savour unto the LORD.

8 And when thou preparest a bullock for a burnt offering, or for a sacrifice in performing a vow, or peace offerings unto the LORD :

9 Then shall he bring with a bullock a meat offering of three tenth deals of flour mingled with half an hin of oil.

10 And thou shalt bring for a drink offering half an hin of wine, for an offering made by fire, of a sweet savour unto the LORD.

11 Thus shall it be done for one bullock, or for one ram, or for a lamb, or a kid.

12 According to the number that ye shall prepare, so shall ye do to every one according to their number.

13 All that are born of the country shall do

Ver. 4. Then shall he that offereth] Of any of the forenamed sorts.

Bring a meat offering] As a necessary appurtenance to such sacrifices.

Of a tenth deal of flour] That is, the tenth part of an ephah (as is expressly declared, ch. xxviii. 5), which was an omer (see Exod. xvi. 36).

Mingled with the fourth part of an hin of oil.] See Exod. xxix. 40. In this, such meat-offerings as were accessories to other offerings, and a part of the sacrifice, which went before, differed from those meat-offerings which were not dependent upon a foregoing sacrifice, but offered alone by themselves: for in these latter the oil was only poured upon the meat-offering (Lev. ii. 1, &c.), and not mingled and macerated with the flour; as it is here ordered: and there was this further difference between them, that those meat-offerings which were accessory to other sacrifices, were all burnt on the altar, in honour of God, as Josephus observes, lib. iii. cap. 10, but when a meat-offering was solitary (as we may call it), as the principal offering which a man then made, a little part of it only was burnt upon the altar, and the priest had the rest: as appears from the second chapter of Leviticus.

Ver. 5. Fourth part of an hin of wine] See Exod. xxix. 40.

With the burnt offering or sacrifice.] Whether it were a whole burnt-offering, or a peace-offering (yer. 3), this wine was wholly poured upon the altar; and the priest had none of it.

For one lamb.] It was the same for one kid. If there were more than one, the drink-offering, as well as the meat-offering, was increased; particularly upon the Sabbath (ch. xxviii. 9). And the true reason why meat-offerings and drink-offerings are required to attend upon the burnt-offerings and peace-offerings, was, because these sacrifices were a feast, and are called the bread or food of God (ch. xxviii. 2). And therefore, as bread and wine, as well as flesh, are our refectation, so God required them at his table. And salt, though not here named, was also added (because it was to be omitted in no sacrifice, Lev. ii. 13), as also frankincense; because it is said both yer. 7 and yer. 10, this drink-offering was for a sweet savour unto the Lord; which seems to allude to the fragrancy of frankincense.

This was a thing so well known, that the heathen imitated this practice, in all their sacrifices, which were ever accompanied with a meat-offering: inso-much that Pliny saith, without this mola salsa, no sacrifice was thought to be good: "nullum sacrificium ratum fieri existimant" (lib. xxx. cap. 5). And long before him we meet with it in Homer, in those known words of his,

—ἀλλοχέτας προβάλλοντα

And as for wine, Brentius, in his paraphrase to Leviticus, takes notice of that phrase in him, no less obvious,

—ἐν ᾧ αἶθρον οἶνον

which they not only poured upon the sacrifice, as it stood at the altar ready to be offered, but upon its flesh, when it was burning there: as we find in Virgil, Georg. iv.

"Ter liquido ardentem perfudit Nectare flammam."

And in many other places (see Dillherrus, in his Disert. Specialis de Caeozelia Gentilium, cap. 10).

Ver. 6.] This being a nobler sacrifice than a lamb, a larger meat-offering (and drink-offering also, as appears by the next verse) is required to attend it.

Ver. 7.] Whereas for a lamb a fourth part was sufficient (yer. 5).

Ver. 8. When thou preparest a bullock] This is a sacrifice of the herd, as the former of the flock, mentioned yer. 3.

For a burnt offering, &c.] That is, freewill-offerings; which were one sort of peace-offerings, as those for performance of a vow were the other (see yer. 3): But freewill-offerings are peculiarly called by the name of peace-offerings, because they were the most acceptable of this sort; being offered purely out of love and affection to God, and not as a payment which was due upon a vow.

Ver. 9.] The meat-offerings increased proportionably to the sacrifices upon which they attended: one tenth-deal, with a fourth part of a hin of oil, being sufficient for a lamb (yer. 4), and two tenth-deals, with a third part of a hin of oil, for a ram (yer. 6); but three tenth-deals of flour, and half a hin of oil, is here required to accompany the sacrifice of a bullock.

Ver. 10.] The same was to be observed in the drink-offering: which is larger in this sacrifice than in the two former (yer. 5, 7).

Ver. 11.] He repeats what he had said more distinctly, proceeding from the sacrifice last mentioned unto the first: which (yer. 5) is said to be one lamb; but here explained to comprehend also a kid. For so the last part of this verse runs in the Hebrew; "for a young one (which he calls seh) either of the sheep, or of the goats."

Ver. 12.] This I take to be a general rule, by which these offerings were to be governed; that, proportionable to the number of bullocks, rams, sheep, or goats that were offered, should be the quantity of the meat-offering and drink-offering; for bread and wine must bear proportion to the meat set on the table.

Ver. 13. All that are born] i. e. All Israelites.

In offering an offering, &c.] When they offer any of the forenamed sacrifices (yer. 3).

these things after this manner, in offering an offering made by fire, of a sweet savour unto the LORD.

14 And if a stranger sojourn with you, or whosoever be among you in your generations, and will offer an offering made by fire, of a sweet savour unto the LORD; as ye do, so he shall do.

15 One ordinance shall be both for you of the congregation, and also for the stranger that sojourneth with you, an ordinance for ever in your generations: as ye are, so shall the stranger be before the LORD.

16 One law and one manner shall be for you, and for the stranger that sojourneth with you.

Ver. 14. If a stranger sojourn with you,] There were two sorts of strangers, it is vulgarly known, among the Israelites: some that entirely embraced and professed the Jewish religion, into which they were admitted by circumcision, &c.; others that were permitted to live among them, having renounced all idolatry, but did not submit to their whole religion. The Talmudists expound this place of the former sort.

Or whosoever be among you] One would think this should signify the other sort of strangers; but they make it only an explication of the former: whether he were a proselyte that sojourned for a time, or were settled among them.

And will offer an offering] Any of the forementioned offerings, which could be offered, as is here directed, by none but one that was subject to their law. For though another proselyte, who worshipped the true God, but was not circumcised, might bring a burnt-offering; yet they say it was without a meat-offering and drink-offering; and no peace-offerings were accepted from him.

As ye do, so he shall do.] Offer according to the rules above given; which is farther explained in the following verses.

Ver. 15. One ordinance] viz. About sacrifices.

Shall be both for you] i. e. For you Israelites.

Also for the stranger] Here the LXX. translate it, προσήλυτους προσκείμενους ἐν ἡμῖν, "proselytes that are added, or joined to you;" or are juris vestri participes, as Mr. Selden expounds it (lib. ii. Jure Nat. et Gent. cap. 2, p. 147).

An ordinance for ever, &c.] Never to be repealed as long as your religion lasts.

As ye are, so shall the stranger be] In matters of religion and Divine worship, though not in all civil things: for no proselyte, they think, could be chosen a member of the Sanhedrin, or great council at Jerusalem. The Jews extend these words to the way and manner of being made proselytes, by circumcision, baptism, and sprinkling of blood; as the Jews were originally, they say, initiated into their religion (Selden, lib. i. De Synedr. cap. 3, p. 34).

Ver. 16.] This general rule was made to invite and encourage strangers to become proselytes to the Jewish religion, and to engage the Jews to be kind to them; they being admitted to an ισορρομία, as Philo calls it, an equal privilege with those who were born Jews. Yet this, the Jews say, is to be received with some distinctions; for the laws of Moses, either concerning the duties they owed to God and one to another, or concerning magistracy and marriages; they say, those of the first sort belonged to proselytes, as much as to original Jews, yet with some temperament (as Mr. Selden observes, lib. ii. De Jure Nat. et Gent. cap. 4); but in those of the second sort they had not an equal privilege; for they were not to have any sort of command, either civil or military;

17 ¶ And the LORD spake unto Moses, saying,

18 Speak unto the children of Israel, and say unto them, When ye come into the land whither I bring you, 19 Then it shall be, that, when ye eat of the bread of the land, ye shall offer up an heave offering unto the LORD.

20 Ye shall offer up a cake of the first of your dough for an heave offering: as ye do the heave offering of the threshing-floor, so shall ye heave it.

21 Of the first of your dough ye shall give unto the LORD an heave offering in your generations.

and though they might marry with the Jews, yet not with the priests; and some marriages were permitted to them, which were forbidden to the Israelites (see there, p. 167).

Ver. 17.] These commands were given, in all likelihood, at the same time with the foregoing.

Ver. 18. Speak unto the children of Israel,] See ver. 2.

When ye come into the land whither I bring you,] See there also; only add this, that the Jews acknowledge such kind of offerings, as here follow, and first-fruits were due by the law only from the corn, &c., that grew in the land of Canaan; but, by the decree of their wise men, they were to bring them out of Syria, and out of the land of Og and Sihon; as Maimonides saith in his treatise called Biecurim, cap. 2.

Ver. 19. When ye eat] i. e. When it is ready to be eaten: for they offered it before they ate of it.

Of the bread of the land,] So corn is called (Psalm civ. 14), and the meaning seems to be, that when they made bread of the new corn of the land, they should out of the dough first make a cake, and offer it to the Lord, before they baked bread for their own use.

Ye shall offer up an heave offering] This is explained in the next verse, of offering a cake out of the first dough, whether it were of wheat, or barley, or rye, or oats, or that which they called cusemim (which they describe to be a kind of wheat, or barley, different from that which is commonly known by those names); for of these five kinds of grain, the Talmudists say, this cake was to be offered; and that out of the gleanings, and the sheaf left in the field, and out of the corners of the field.

Ver. 20. A cake of the first of your dough] Not upon the altar; but it was given to the priests, on whom God bestowed all their heave-offerings (ch. xviii. 8), yet they are said to be "offered unto the Lord," because they were heaved, or lifted up to him, as the Creator of heaven and earth; and then given to his ministers, who had it in his right.

As ye do the heave offering—so shall ye heave it.] That is, as the first-fruits of the harvest were given to the priests, and not offered upon the altar, so should this be given them (Lev. xxiii. 16, 17); and so were the first-fruits of their oil and their wine, &c. (Numb. xviii. 12, 13). All which the Jews call the great terumah, or heave-offering.

Ver. 21.] This being a new law, not given before, he repeats it, that they might be the more observant of it: as we may see they were by this; that it was one of the things which rendered a woman infamous (though not so as to give her the bitter water), if she did not separate this cake from the first dough of the new corn to be presented to God; but either made her husband believe she had done it when she had not, or ate it herself; as Mr. Selden observes, lib. iii. Uxor. Hebr. cap. 17, and therefore at this very day

22 ¶ And if ye have erred, and not observed all these commandments, which the LORD hath spoken unto Moses,

23 Even all that the LORD hath commanded you by the hand of Moses, from the day that the LORD commanded Moses, and henceforward among your generations;

24 Then it shall be, if ought be committed by ignorance without the knowledge of the congregation, that all the congregation shall offer one young bullock for a burnt offering, for a sweet savour unto the LORD, with his meat offering, and his drink offering, according to the manner, and one kid of the goats for a sin offering.

25 And the priest shall make an atonement for all the congregation of the children of Israel, and it shall be forgiven them; for it is ignorance: and they shall bring their offering, a sacrifice made by fire unto the LORD, and their sin offering before the LORD, for their ignorance:

the Jews are so nice in this point, that they take enough to make a cake, as soon as the meal is mingled with water. The proportion is not mentioned in the law; but their wise men say, it was to be the forty-fourth part of the whole dough (see Buxtorf. Synagoge. Jud. esp. 34). The cabalists observing that this verse begins with the letter mem, and ends with mem, conclude (after their way), that therefore they were to give the fortieth part, because mem is the numeral letter for forty.

Ver. 22.] Which have been now given concerning sacrifices; for to such commandments these words seem to have respect. Maimonides, in his treatise of the worship of the planets (and the Jews generally), saith this concerns idolatry.

Ver. 23. All that the Lord hath commanded] That is, all the commandments in the book of Leviticus, about such matters of God's worship and service.

From the day that the Lord commanded Moses,] The word Moses is not in the Hebrew, and the sense is plainer without it, as the Vulgar hath translated these words, "from the day he began to command."

Henceforward] Or rather thenceforward, until now; or until he made an end of commanding. So this phrase is used in Lev. xxii. 27, "From the eighth day, and thenceforth," creatures were clean to be offered (see Ezek. xxix. 22).

Among your generations,] In the Hebrew, "to your generations." And so the LXX. εις τας γενεας, "to be observed throughout all generations."

Ver. 24. If ought be committed by ignorance without the knowledge of the congregation,] It is commonly said, that Moses here speaks concerning sins of omission (as we call them), as in Lev. iv. 13, he doth of sins of commission, or doing that which ought not to be done; as here not doing that which ought to be done; for which different sorts of sacrifices are appointed. But others think that he speaks in both places of the same errors; only in that law (Lev. iv. 14), concerning those committed by the whole congregation, here of such as were committed by some lesser number of them, called the congregation; suppose the seventy elders, or the rulers of thousands and hundreds, &c., who are sometimes called by this name (ch. xxv. 7, xxxii. 12, Josh. xxiv. 4). But the Jews generally think Moses here speaks of strange worship, which was to be expiated by this sacrifice of a goat for a sin-offering. And therefore an excellent person of our own, after long consideration of the matter, comes to this conclusion: that in Leviticus he requires a young bullock to be slain for a sin-offering, when the whole congregation, though adhering to the true worship of God in every thing, were led ignorantly to do something against some negative precept (as they call it); to practise, that is, what God had forbidden (so those words seem to import, Lev. iv. 13, 14), but this kid of the goats here mentioned for a sin-offering, together with a young bullock for a burnt-offering, was to be sacrificed, when all the people, forgetting the holy rites prescribed by Moses (which often happened under bad kings), fell by a common error into idolatrous worship; which agrees very well with what is said in the two verses foregoing; where he speaks, as I noted, of not observing these holy rites about sacrifices (see Dr. Outram, lib. i. De Sacrificiis, cap. 14, sect. 2).

That all the congregation shall offer one young bullock] Having neglected these laws ordained by Moses, and worshipped God in a wrong manner, according to the rites used in other countries (or at least mistaking the proper sacrifices and rites belonging to them, which they ought to have offered), this burnt-offering, I suppose, is commanded to be offered, when they saw their error, in token that they returned to God's true religion, and that way of worship which he had prescribed.

With his meat offering,] Prescribed above, ver. 8—10. Which, perhaps, they had neglected to offer formerly with the burnt-offering.

It is well observed by Mr. Thorndike out of Maimonides, that all the congregation (if we understand thereby the whole body of the people), could not possibly offer these sacrifices; but the great consistory offered them as often as they occasioned the breach of the law, by interpreting it erroneously (Rights of the Church in a Christian state, p. 159).

One kid of the goats for a sin offering,] To expiate for what had been done after the manner of the heathen, contrary to the laws of God's worship here delivered by Moses; or otherwise than he directed; from whence it was (which adds much probability to this), that when Hezekiah restored the true worship of God, after the temple had been shut up, and the daily sacrifice omitted, and many idolatrous rites there used, by the ignorance of the people, in the days of his father (2 Chron. xxviii. 24, xxix. 3), he caused seven bullocks to be offered for a burnt-offering; and as many goats for a sin-offering; and so Ezra did at the restoration of the Divine service after they came out of Babylon (Ezra viii. 35). And it makes no difference, that Moses here requires only one of a sort to be offered, whereas Hezekiah offered seven, and Ezra twelve; for this only proves that one was absolutely necessary, but more than one was acceptable: especially when exceeding great errors had been committed in God's worship.

Ver. 25. The priest shall make an atonement] Who had thus committed an error in the worship of God out of ignorance: being misled by the great interpreters of the law; who therefore were to bring this sacrifice in the name of them all. For it is apparent by this, as well as the former verse, that all the congregation were concerned in this sacrifice, as much as in that Lev. iv. 13. And the same appears from the next verse, where he saith, "all the people were in ignorance."

It shall be forgiven them,] Proceeding from an erroneous interpretation of the law, or some other mistake; not from contempt of God and of his laws: for then they were to be utterly cut off (ver. 30, 31).

A sacrifice made by fire unto the Lord,] That is, a burnt-offering: which is not prescribed in Leviticus 26 And it shall be forgiven all the congregation of the children of Israel, and the stranger that sojourneth among them; seeing all the people were in ignorance.

27 ¶ And if any soul sin through ignorance, then he shall bring a she goat of the first year for a sin offering.

28 And the priest shall make an atonement for the soul that sinneth ignorantly, when he sinneth by ignorance before the LORD, to make an atonement for him; and it shall be forgiven him.

29 Ye shall have one law for him that sinneth through ignorance, both for him that is born among the children of Israel, and for the stranger that sojourneth among them.

30 ¶ But the soul that doeth ought presumptuously, whether he be born in the land, or a stranger, the same reproacheth the LORD; and that soul shall be cut off from among his people.

(as I observed before), and therefore was a different sort of offering, for a different offence.

Their sin offerings.] Prescribed in the foregoing verse.

For their ignorance.] Which made them capable of a pardon; though not without these sacrifices.

Ver. 26. It shall be forgiven] He repeats it again, that they might not doubt of reconciliation to him, when they repented as soon as they understood their error, and acknowledged it, and begged his pardon by these sacrifices.

And the stranger] Who were obliged to the same laws with the Israelites, and had the same privileges (ver. 14—16).

Seeing all the people were in ignorance.] It was a common error; and therefore no wonder strangers were carried away with it.

Ver. 27. If any soul] i. e. Any particular person. Sin through ignorance,] Offend in matters of religion; by not observing the rites here prescribed, or by doing contrary to them through mere ignorance. To this, I think, these words are to be limited; wherein they differ from that law, Lev. iv. 27, which speaks of all manner of offences through ignorance.

Then he shall bring a she goat] This sin-offering differs from that in Leviticus (ch. iv. 28), which was only a female kid of the goats.

Ver. 28. The priest shall make an atonement] As he was to do for the whole congregation (ver. 25).

Before the Lord,] These words, before the Lord, seem to me to import, that he speaks of sins committed about the worship of God; and confirms what I have said upon ver. 24. For in Lev. iv. both ver. 13, and ver. 27, he speaks in general of sins committed, either by the congregation, or by particular persons, "against any of the commandments of the Lord," not "before the Lord;" i. e. (as I understand it) in his worship and service.

To make an atonement] He repeats it again to show them that he would no more have a particular person suffer for his error than the whole body of the people.

Ver. 29.] See ver. 15. This must necessarily be meant of a proselyte of justice, as they called him that was circumcised, and undertook to keep the whole law; for he speaks of such, whether natives or others, as erred in not observing all his commandments (ver. 22, 23).

Ver. 30. The soul that doeth ought presumptuously,] Not merely knowingly, but wilfully and audaciously; in contempt of the Divine Majesty and his authority: for so the Hebrew phrase, with a high hand, signifies, as Maimonides observes, in his More Nevochim, par. iii. cap. 41, where he saith, it imports a sin, not only publicly and openly committed, but with pride and insolence; it proceeding, not merely from an ill custom a man hath got of doing amiss, but from an express intention to contradict the law of God, and to set himself in defiance of it: which is the reason of what follows, the same reproacheth the Lord.

Whether he be born in the land, or a stranger,]

Here the word stranger is simply used, without the addition of that sojourneth among them (as in the preceding verse), and therefore Mr. Selden well concludes, that even the proselutes of the gate were concerned in this law (as it related to idolatry and blasphemy), though not in the foregoing; and that they were liable to be cut off by the hand of Heaven; but whether to be punished by the judges or not, it doth not appear (lib. ii. De Jure Nat. et Gent. cap. 11).

The same reproacheth the Lord;] "No man sinned thus (saith Maimonides in the place forenamed), but he who had a settled opinion in his mind, contrary to the law of God; in which he dissented from it. And the common received exposition of this place is, that it speaks of an idolater; because he opposed the chief and principal foundation of the law. For no man worshipped a star or a planet, but he that believed its eternity: which is the most repugnant of all other things to the law of God; which, in the very first words of it, declares, that all the world had a beginning, and was made by Him whom the Jews worshipped." Thus he. But doing any thing with a high hand doth not signify any one certain kind of sin, as the Jews generally fancy (who think he speaks here only of an idolater or blasphemer: see Selden, lib. i. De Synedr. cap. 6, p. 101), but a certain manner of sinning, with despite to the commands of God, and contempt of his authority, in any kind of sin whatsoever. And this Maimonides himself afterward acknowledges, in the words following: "There seems to me to be the same reason in all other transgressions, which are committed contemptuously against any law of God; as, if an Israelite seethed a kid in its mother's milk, or wore heterogeneous garments, or rounded the corners of his head, or his beard, in contempt of the law. For the consequence of this is, that he believes this law not to be true; which, in my judgment (saith he) is the meaning of these words, He reproacheth the Lord."

That soul shall be cut off] No sacrifice could make an atonement for such a man; but he was to die, either by the hand of heaven, or of the judges. Sometimes God saith, he will cut off idolaters, and such as consulted familiar spirits (Lev. xx. 5, 6). Sometimes he only saith certain offenders shall be cut off; as here in this, and many other places. Of which phrase I have given an account, Gen. xvii. 14, where the reader may see the several opinions that have been about it; and that its meaning must be determined by the matter in hand. Accordingly, Maimonides hath judiciously resolved, that, in this place, it signifies cutting off by the hand of the magistrates, as in the case of apostasy to idolatry (Deut. xiii. 13, &c.). Not that all their goods were to be destroyed, and nothing left to their heirs (as when they served other gods); but, though a whole tribe had, with a high hand, transgressed any precept of the law, that is, denied it to be God's law, he thinks they were only to be all killed. Just as all the people thought in the case of the Reubenites, Gadites, and half tribe of Manasseh: who, only building an altar on the other side of Jordan, contrary to God's law, as was imagined, all the rest of the tribes of Israel gathered together, to go up to war against them, and cut them off, Josh. xxii. 11, 12, &c., 22, 23, where they acknowledged they deserved to perish, if they had built an altar for worship, as their brethren thought they had done.

31 Because he hath despised the word of the LORD, and hath broken his commandment, that soul shall utterly be cut off; his iniquity shall be upon him.

32 ¶ And while the children of Israel were in the wilderness, they found a man that gathered sticks upon the sabbath day.

33 And they that found him gathering sticks

Ver. 31. Because he hath despised] This shows the nature of the offence; which was setting at naught God's laws, and denying them to be of divine authority.

Hath broken his commandment,] Not only by doing contrary to it, but, in effect, disannulling it; by rejecting its authority, and affirming he is not bound to observe that precept.

That soul shall utterly be cut off;] They shall have no mercy upon him.

His iniquity shall be upon him.] Not upon those who put him to death; but upon himself.

Ver. 32. While the children of Israel were in the wilderness,] In this part of the wilderness, at Kadesh-barnea, it is very probable (see ver. 1).

They found a man] The Jews, who would not be thought ignorant of any thing, say this man was one of those that presumed to go up to the mountain, when Moses forbade them (ch. xiv. 44). And some of them say expressly, his name was Zelophehad; about the dividing of whose estate a question afterward arose (ch. xxvii. 1, &c.). So the Chaldee paraphrase, ascribed to Jonathan and others, (see Selden, lib. ii. De Synedr. cap. i. n. 9).

That gathered sticks] Or was binding up sticks, which he had gathered, and plucked up by the roots out of the earth; as some of the Jews understand the Hebrew word (Mr. Selden there observes), from Exod. v. 7.

Upon the sabbath day.] This the Jewish doctors would have to be the very next Sabbath after its first institution in the wilderness; which is to make this history misplaced, and the foregoing also, without any necessity.

Ver. 33. They that found him gathering sticks] Admonished him (as the Jews also say) of the unlawfulness of it, and wished him to desist. But he would not hearken unto them; and therefore (as it here follows) "they brought him unto Moses," &c., as one that contemptuously, and with a high hand, had offended God. For they make this an instance of such a presumptuous sin as is mentioned before, ver. 30, 31, which is not improbable. And it appears from hence, that they observed the Sabbath while they were in the wilderness; and therefore did not bring him before Moses on that day, but the next after; or at least he was not judged till the next day.

Brought him unto—all the congregation] Who were now, they fancy, hearing a sacred lecture, when they brought the man before Moses. For he was the chief judge, who was to determine such cases: though we may conceive the seventy elders (who were constituted before this happened, ch. xi. 24, &c.) to have been now sitting, and Moses at the head of them. But he being not deprived of any authority by their creation, who were added only to give him ease, it is more likely this man was set before Moses, as the sole judge of this case. For God speaks to him alone (ver. 35), when he directs what should be done with him. Yet brought him unto Moses and Aaron, and unto all the congregation.

34 And they put him in ward, because it was not declared what should be done to him.

35 And the LORD said unto Moses, The man shall be surely put to death: all the congregation shall stone him with stones without the camp.

36 And all the congregation brought him

Aaron and the elders, it appears by these words, were present (and called here all the congregation), when this offender was brought before him.

Ver. 34. They put him in ward,] By the order of Moses (as they did the man that blasphemed, Lev. xxiv. 12), to secure him, till the mind of God was known how he should be punished.

Because it was not declared what should be done to him.] They knew very well that he was to die; for it had been declared (Exod. xxxi. 14, xxxv. 2), but they questioned what kind of death he should suffer, as the Jews interpret it. For they observe this difference between that case of the blasphemer in Leviticus, and this here of the sabbath-breaker: that there they doubted whether he should be punished by them, or by the hand of Heaven; but here, what kind of death they should inflict upon him. Though there are some (as Mr. Selden there observes, n. 8) who imagine, the question here also was, whether the sense of the law was, that they should expect his punishment from God, or he be put to death by the court of judgment.

Ver. 35. The Lord said unto Moses,] Who went, I suppose, into the sanctuary, to inquire what the pleasure of God was in this matter; as he did in another difficulty (Numb. ix. 8).

The man shall be surely put to death;] By this answer, it seems to me, the question was not, at first, what death he should die; but whether he should be put to death or not: that is, whether the gathering and binding up sticks into a fagot was such a work as is forbidden in the law (Exod. xx.), unto which death was afterward threatened in the places before mentioned. And the resolution was, that he should be put to death, as a man that denied God, the creator of the world; though not in words, yet in fact. For he who did any work on the Sabbath (as Aben Ezra notes upon Exod. xx.), denied the work of creation; though he did not in downright terms deny God himself. For the Sabbath being a sign (as God calls it) that they were the worshippers of him who made all things; the contempt of that was a renouncing of their religion, and therefore deserved to be punished with death; the belief of the creation of the world being the very foundation of the Jewish religion; as the belief of its eternity was the foundation of the pagan. This made the breach of this precept, of keeping the Sabbath strictly (which is more frequently repeated than any other, for the reason forementioned), so heinous a crime, and so severely punished: for by this time a true worshipper of God was distinguished from a profane person and an idolater.

All the congregation shall stone him] This was a punishment inflicted for very enormous crimes (see Lev. xx. 2, xxiv. 12). And this man was condemned to suffer it because he was the first breaker of this sacred law. And he doing it presumptuously (as is supposed from the connection of this story with ver. 30, 31), in contempt of the law; and not desisting from his impiety, when he was admonished to forbear (as I said, ver. 33), it highly aggravated his guilt; being no less than "a reproaching of the Lord, and a despising of his word." Whence the without the camp, and stoned him with stones, and he died; as the Lord commanded Moses.

37 ¶ And the Lord spake unto Moses, saying,
38 Speak unto the children of Israel, and bid them that they make them fringes in the borders of their garments throughout their generations, and that they put upon the fringe of the borders a ribband of blue :

39 And it shall be unto you for a fringe, that vulgar saying of the Talmudists, "He that denies the Sabbath, is like to him that denies the whole law."

Ver. 36.] Not on the Sabbath-day, as I said before; for that was unlawful (as Philo observes), but the next day after; or as soon as Moses had passed sentence upon him.

Ver. 37.] This was spoken, it is most likely, about the same time that the foregoing passage happened, and the commands mentioned in the beginning of this chapter were delivered. For this that follows, is a direction for the better observance of all the rest of God's commandments.

Ver. 38. Fringes] This is the best word we have in our language to express the Hebrew word tzitzith, which imports something of an ornament resembling a flower, as the word tzitz signifies. Of how many threads they consist, and after what fashion they are made by the Jews at this day, see Buxtorf's Synagoga Judaica, cap. 9.

In the borders of their garments.] Or, (as it is in the Hebrew) "in the wings of their garments;" which had four skirts, as appears by Deut. xxii. 12, at the bottom of each of which they were to have a fringe: which seem to have been only threads left at the end of the web unwoven; at the top whereof they put a lace, as it here follows.

Throughout their generations.] To be a perpetual mark of their religion, and put them in mind of their duty.

A ribband] Or, a lace; which both bound the fringe fast at the top, and also made it more conspicuous and observable; which was the intention of it. For by this they were distinguished from all other people who were not Jews; as well as put in mind of the precepts of God, as it follows in the next verse.

Of blue.] Or, as some would have it translated, of purple. But the Hebrew writers say, theceth signifies that colour which we now call ultramarine; as Braunius hath observed (lib. i. De Vestitu Sacerd. Hebr. cap. 13, and Bochart. Hierozoic. par. ii. lib. v. cap. 10, 11).

There is another very learned person, also, who hath more lately shown, out of an excellent MS. in his possession, what the Jews deliver concerning the way and manner of dying this colour: which being not easy to compass, the Jews at this day, instead of this colour, are contented to use white (see J. Wagen-seil upon the Gemara Sota, cap. 2, annot. 8).

Ver. 39. It shall be unto you for a fringe.] Or rather, "it (that is, the ribband) shall be unto you upon the fringe;" or, to the fringe; added to it, to make it the more noted; being of a distinct colour from the fringe, which was of the same colour. And the garment, the Jews say, in the selvage of which these fringes were, was their upper garment, called talith, being a kind of cloak.

That ye may look upon it, &c.] i. e. When they looked down, this fringe and lace which they saw there might put them in mind of the duty they owed to God; who commanded this, not for itself, but to remember them that they were a holy people, bound to God by peculiar laws, which they should be as careful to observe as to wear these fringes. Hence it ye may look upon it, and remember all the commandments of the Lord, and do them; and that ye seek not after your own heart and your own eyes, after which ye use to go a whoring:

40 That ye may remember, and do all my commandments, and be holy unto your God.

41 I am the Lord your God, which brought you out of the land of Egypt, to be your God: I am the Lord your God.

was, that they who pretended to greater sanctity than others, enlarged these fringes (as our Saviour observes, Matt. xxiii. 5), i. e. extended them to a greater length, so that they swept the ground, which made them more observable, as Braunius notes out of the Gemara of Gittin. lib. i. De Vest. Sacerd. Hebr. cap. 3, n. 16, where he also observes, that their superstition grew so much, as with great subtilty to contrive that these fringes might be so wrought, as to denote the six hundred and thirteen precepts contained in the law of Moses; that so they might be put in mind "of all the commandments of the Lord" (see Buxtorf also in the place before named; and Bishop Montague, in his Apparatus, cap. 7, n. 32).

And do them;] Which was the end of remembering them, as that was of their wearing them; though the Jews proved so foolish as to pride themselves in the bare use of their ornaments: i. e. in their being a select people; which ought to have made them more careful to do the whole will of God.

That ye seek not after your own heart] Follow not your own thoughts and imaginations (as Maimonides expounds it, More Nevoch. par. i. cap. 39), or rather, your own desires. Or the word seek may import inventing other ways of serving God, according to their own fancies.

Your own eyes.] Nor follow the example of others; as they were prone to do, it appears, by their making the golden calf, that they might have such a visible representation of God as other nations were wont to have.

After which ye use to go a whoring;] It appears by this, that the foregoing words have a peculiar regard to the worship of God (which he speaks of in the beginning of this chapter), from which, when they departed, they are said to go a whoring from God, unto whom they were espoused.

Ver. 40. That ye may remember, and do all my commandments.] He would not have them think there was any sanctity to be placed merely in wearing these fringes; but they were to be considered only as instruments, to call their duty to remembrance, and excite them to the performance of it. And so the Jews themselves sometimes call them, as Buxtorf observes in the place before named, "means and instruments of observing the precepts."

Be holy unto your God.] By observing all his commandments; especially keeping themselves from idols.

Ver. 41. I am the Lord your God.] Their sovereign and benefactor.

Which brought you out of —Egypt.] He remembers them of the most peculiar obligation they had upon them, to observe this law and all the rest of his precepts.

To be your God.] They were redeemed by him on purpose, when none else could deliver them, that they might acknowledge no other God, but only him to whom they owed their liberty, to serve him.

I am the Lord your God.] This seems to be repeated to encourage them to hope that he would still continue good to them, notwithstanding the rebellion of their fathers, for which he had condemned them to die in the wilderness; where he would preserve them (their children), and at last bring them into Canaan, if they would follow his directions.

CHAPTER XVI.

1 The rebellion of Korah, Dathan, and Abiram. 23 Moses separateth the people from the rebels' tents. 31 The earth swalloweth up Korah, and a fire consumeth others. 36 The censers are reserved to holy use. 41 Fourteen thousand and seven hundred are slain by a plague for murmuring against Moses and Aaron. 46 Aaron by incense stayeth the plague.

tain of the children of Israel, two hundred and fifty princes of the assembly, famous in the congregation, men of renown :

CHAP. XVI.

We have nothing here said to direct us to the time and place when and where this new rebellion happened; but it is very probable (as I said, ch. xv. 1) that it was in some part of the second year after they came out of Egypt, before they removed from Kadesh-barnaa.

Ver. 1. Korah, the son of Izhar,] By this it is evident that Korah was cousin-german (as we speak) to Moses and Aaron; for Izhar (Korah's father) was the second son of Kohath, as Amram (the father of Moses and Aaron) was his eldest son (Exod. vi. 18, 1 Chron. vi. 2).

Dathan and Abiram,] This Eliab was the son of Pallu, the second son of Reuben, as appears from ch. xxvi. 5, 8, 9.

On,] He also was descended from Reuben, as well as Dathan and Abiram (as the next words tell us, sons of Reuben), but of what family it doth not appear. Nor is this man anywhere again mentioned, no, not in the progress of this conspiracy; which inclines me to think, that though he entered into it, yet he afterward withdrew himself, or was so inconsiderable, that no notice was taken of him.

Took men:] The word men is not in the Hebrew; but simply Korah took. Which word took being the first word in the Hebrew text, the whole verse may be thus translated: "Korah the son of Izhar, &c., took both Dathan and Abiram the sons of Eliab, and On the son of Peleth," &c. That is, he drew these into a conspiracy with him. Or, he betook himself to a party, as the Chaldee understands it, he divided himself; with an intention, that is, to make a sedition. But the sense is the same, if we follow our translation, he took men; that is, accomplices or associates with him in his rebellion: by which we may understand the two hundred and fifty mentioned in the next verse.

Ver. 2. They rose up] Made an insurrection: in which Korah seems to have been the ringleader, having drawn the rest into it; which he might the more easily do, because the Kohathites and Reubenites lay encamped on the very same side of the tabernacle (Numb. ii. 10, compared with ch. iii. 29), by which means they had opportunity often to conspire together. Whence R. Solomon makes this reflection, "Wo to the wicked, and wo to his neighbour!" The cause of the insurrection is generally thought, both by Jews and Christians, to have been, that Korah could not brook the preferment of Aaron and his family so high above the rest of the Levites, who were made only their ministers (ch. iii. 6, 9, viii. 19). For he thought this was too great a difference between the children of two brothers, who were of equal deserts. Nay, Aben Ezra thinks, that he wholly disliked the late exchange of the first-born for the Levites. And besides, it may be thought that he stomached the late preferment of Elizaphan, the son of Uzziel, who was the youngest son of Kohath, to be chief of the family of the Kohathites (ch. iii. 30), which he thought rather belonged to himself, who was the son of the second son of Kohath. And finding himself too weak to make an insurrection alone, he persuaded Dathan and Abiram (of the tribe of Reuben), and those in whom they had an interest, to join with him, upon another pretence; that they were descended from the eldest son of Israel, to whom the chief authority in the nation belonged, which Moses had taken upon himself; and likewise preferred the tribe of Judah to the principal place in their encampment (ch. ii. 3), and also the seventy elders to be his assistants, without their advice, and leaving them out of the number.

Such as these may be thought to be the grounds upon which they proceeded: Korah seeking the priesthood, and the sons of Reuben the civil dignity. But it seems to me that the ground of the quarrel was wholly upon the account of the priesthood (as I shall show upon the next verse), and that they struck at Moses only as advancing his brother and his family by his own authority, and not (as they pretended) by God's direction. For as Dathan and Abiram did not appear openly when they had formed this faction (for we find them in their tents, ver. 12, and refusing to come to Moses when he sent for them), so, in the next verse, they seem to speak of nothing but the priesthood: and so Moses understood their meaning, ver. 5, 10, 15.

Before Moses,] In an open defiance of his authority; who, they pretended, had no power to make such alterations as he had done.

With certain of—Israel,] It is not said out of what tribe; but it is likely out of several: if not some out of every tribe, in whom they had any interest.

Two hundred and fifty princes, &c.] The LXX. divide their character into three parts. First, that they were "princes of the assembly, ἀρχηγούς συναγωγῆς, rulers of thousands, and rulers of hundreds," &c. And secondly,

Famous in the congregation,] Which they translate συγκλητικούς βουλευτῆς, "who used to be called to public consultations," when they were to deliberate about weighty affairs. And so several, both ancient and modern, translations, as Mr. Selden hath shown, lib. ii. De Synedriis, cap. 4, n. 10, where he saith, they were called, maxime puto, si non solum, deliberandi causa, "chiefly, if not only, to have their advice." And then lastly,

Men of renown:] Such who had got a great name (that is, fame and credit) among the people, upon these or other accounts. This made the insurrection the more dangerous, that such great persons were engaged and appeared in it.

Ver. 3. They gathered themselves together] The fore-named company came in a body.

them, Ye take too much upon you, seeing all the congregation are holy, every one of them, and the LORD is among them: wherefore then lift ye up yourselves above the congregation of the LORD?

4 And when Moses heard it, he fell upon his face:

5 And he spake unto Korah and unto all his company, saying, Even to-morrow the LORD will shew who are his, and who is holy; and will cause him to come near unto him: even

Against Moses] As an arbitrary disposer of all preferment.

Against Aaron,] Who was promoted by Moses to the office of high-priest; which he himself had discharged before Aaron's consecration; which, perhaps, they made a ground of their quarrel.

Ye take too much upon you,] In the Hebrew the words are rab lachem, "it is sufficient for you:" that is, you have domineered long enough; resign your places to others: for all of us, nay, every man in Israel, is as good as you.

Seeing all the congregation are holy, every one of them.] Here seems to be the root of the quarrel. Before Moses' time every one might offer sacrifice in his own family (as I have often observed), which custom these men would have had still continued; being angry that this high office was confined to one family alone, who were to enjoy all the benefits of it; which were exceeding great. For the priests had a large share in most offerings; and some things wholly to themselves. This is the more probable, because it was so very hard to convince the people that God had settled this dignity, and all the profits belonging to it, in Aaron's family. For though God did a new thing, never heard of before, to demonstrate these people that rose against Moses and Aaron to be seditious, yet it was necessary still to do more. For after the earth had swallowed up Dathan and Abiram, and fire consumed Korah and his company, and a plague destroyed many more of them, the Lord did another miracle (ch. xvii. 8), in making Aaron's rod blossom and bud, and bring forth almonds in one night's time, when all the rest of the rods remained dry sticks: which makes it probable, as I said before, there were some in all the tribes who were engaged in this sedition; and were so deeply infected with the false notions of Korah, that it was necessary to give them all this satisfaction.

The Lord is among them.] The people need no other governor but him, who dwells among them in his tabernacle, where they can present their sacrifices to him themselves without your assistance.

Wherefore then lift ye up yourselves above the congregation,] Since God owns us all for his special and peculiar people, why do you take upon you such high places and dignity above us all? For Moses disposed and ordered all things; and Aaron, by his order, took upon him to be solely God's chief minister in his sanctuary.

Ver. 4. When Moses heard it, he fell upon his face.] With Aaron also, it is likely, as they did lately (ch. xiv. 5). And for the same end (see there), to deprecate God's displeasure (which they might justly think would now rise higher than ever), and to beg his direction what to do in such a dangerous state of things.

Ver. 5. He spake unto Korah.] This shows that Korah was the head of this faction, and Dathan and Abiram did not at the first (I guess from hence) appear with him.

him whom he hath chosen will he cause to come near unto him.

6 This do; Take you censers, Korah, and all his company;

7 And put fire therein, and put incense in them before the LORD to-morrow: and it shall be that the man whom the LORD doth choose, he shall be holy: ye take too much upon you, ye sons of Levi.

8 And Moses said unto Korah, Hear, I pray you, ye sons of Levi:

Saying,] Being risen up from prayer, he made this answer to the seditious people, by order from God, who, no doubt, directed him to this way of suppressing them.

Even to-morrow the Lord will shew, &c.] In the Hebrew the words are "to-morrow (or, in the morning) and the Lord will show." &c. That is, stay but till to-morrow, and it shall appear, without any further delay, whether you or we be in the right. He would keep them in suspense no longer, and yet gave them so much time to consider better, and repent. Some observe that the morning was the time of executing justice, and therefore here appointed.

The Lord will shew] By some visible token.

Who are his,] Or, "who appertain to him;" viz. as his ministers.

Who is holy;] Separated and solemnly consecrated, by his appointment, to the sacred office of priesthood.

Cause him to come near] Make it appear that they are the persons who ought to burn incense and to offer sacrifice. For to come near, is to perform these offices, as may be learnt from Lev. xix. 22, but especially from Lev. x. 3. And the very word cohen denotes it; for it signifies "a minister next to the king."

Him whom he hath chosen] They shall discharge the office of priesthood, whom God himself hath chosen to it, and nobody else.

Ver. 6. This do;] I put you to this trial.

Take you censers,] Perform the office of priests, unto which you pretend a right.

Korah, and all his company;] All the two hundred and fifty men, and whosoever else were in the faction of Korah: whom he orders, no doubt, by God's direction, to execute the office to which they aspired.

Ver. 7. Put fire therein,] As the priests were wont to do.

Before the Lord to-morrow.] At the altar of the incense, as some conceive, before the most holy place. So Menochius. But this is contrary to ver. 18, where we read they "stood in the door of the tabernacle," with their censers, fire, and incense. Nor would the sanctuary contain such a company; or, if it had been large enough, the people could not have seen either their offering or their punishment from the Lord for their sin. Therefore these words before the Lord signify with their faces towards the sanctuary, at the gate of which they stood; for what was done there is said to be before the Lord (Exod. xxix. 42).

The man whom the Lord doth choose.] This comprehends both the man and all his family: so the meaning is, the Lord would declare whether Aaron and his sons should execute the priesthood alone, or Korah and his company be admitted to it.

Ye take too much upon you,] It is the same phrase which we had before, ver. 3, rablachem: you are high enough already; let the station wherein you are suffice you, and aspire not after greater dignity. The following words justify this interpretation.

Ver. 8.] By this and by the foregoing verse it appears, not only that there were some of the Levites in 9 Seemeth it but a small thing unto you, that the God of Israel hath separated you from the congregation of Israel, to bring you near to himself to do the service of the tabernacle of the Lord, and to stand before the congregation to minister unto them?

10 And he hath brought thee near to him, and all thy brethren the sons of Levi with thee: and seek ye the priesthood also?

11 For which cause both thou and all thy company are gathered together against the Lord: and what is Aaron, that ye murmur against him?

this sedition, together with Korah at the head of them, but that they were the chief incendiaries (though others, as I said before, were drawn in to join with them), because Moses addresses himself only to them.

Ver. 9. Seemeth it but a small thing unto you,] Do you take it to be no honour to you.

Hath separated you] Made choice of you, above all other Israelites, to wait upon him in his family, as his domestic servants (Numb. iii. 12, viii. 6, 14).

To bring you near] Though not so near as the priests, yet nearer than all other men, being the sole attendants upon the priests (ch. iii. 6, viii. 10, 11).

To do the service] See ch. iii. 7, 8, particularly the Kohathites were chosen to do the service of the tabernacle, about the most holy things (ch. iv. 4, 19).

To stand before the congregation] See ch. viii. 11, 19.

Ver. 10. And he hath brought thee] Or, "though he hath brought thee" (speaking unto Korah) thus near to him, and all the rest of the Levites thy brethren (see ch. viii. 10, 11, 15, 19).

Seek ye the priesthood also?] Will it not content you that you alone are chosen to minister unto the priests (ch. iii. 6), but you must be advanced to minister unto God in his office?

Ver. 11. Thou and all thy company are gathered together against the Lord:] By whose order Aaron and his sons were appointed to serve him in the office of priests: as was declared when the Levites were taken to minister unto them (ch. iii. 3, iv. 15, 19, 20). And therefore, to rise up against them, was to rise up against the Lord, and oppose his authority, who made them his priests.

And what is Aaron,] Or, "and Aaron, what hath he done?" Wherein is he faulty?

That ye murmur against him?] For taking upon him the office of priesthood; into which he did not intrude himself, but was chosen and appointed by God to do him that service; who would have been angry with him if he had refused it.

Ver. 12. Moses sent to call Dathan and Abiram,] To summon them to the place where Moses now was; which the Jews say was the court of judgment. This shows, that either these men (as I said ver. 2) did not openly appear with Korah and his company against Moses (ver. 3): or, if they did, they retired to their tents, before he rose up from his prayer, to give them an answer.

What became of On we are not informed: for he is neither mentioned here, nor in the following part of this narrative, concerning their sedition; nor any where else in the Holy Scripture.

We will not come up:] They bade the messenger who summoned them to appear before Moses, to tell him plainly that they denied his authority. For that is the meaning of this language, "He hath no authority to 12 ¶ And Moses sent to call Dathan and Abiram, the sons of Eliab: which said, We will not come up:

13 Is it a small thing that thou hast brought us up out of a land that floweth with milk and honey, to kill us in the wilderness, except thou make thyself altogether a prince over us?

14 Moreover thou hast not brought us into a land that floweth with milk and honey, or given us inheritance of fields and vineyards: wilt thou put out the eyes of these men? we will not come up.

15 And Moses was very wroth, and said unto command us, who are none of his subjects; and therefore will not obey him."

Ver. 13. Is it a small thing, &c.] Though they would not come to him, yet they returned him this message: Have we not suffered enough by being brought out of a rich and plentiful country, abounding with all good things, into a barren wilderness, where we are ready to starve? Nothing could be more insolent and ungrateful, than to describe Egypt in the very same language wherein God himself had often spoken of the land of promise; particularly when he sent Moses to tell them, he would "bring them out of the affliction of Egypt," under which they groaned (Exod. iii. 16, 17).

Except thou make thyself altogether a prince over us?] Unless we allow thee to make what laws thou thinkest good, and impose what thou pleasest upon us? A most rude and insolent speech; signifying that they had not shaken off the yoke of bondage, but only exchanged it: and instead of the rich and wealthy oppression of Pharaoh, were come under the poor and hungry tyranny of Moses. For so the next verse imports

Ver. 14. Moreover thou hast not brought us into a land, &c.] Or, certainly, this is not the good land into which thou didst promise to conduct us. It seems to be a sarcastical speech; upbraiding him as if he had put a cheat upon them, and fed them only with good words, to which they would no longer trust.

Or given us inheritance] But told us it shall be bestowed forty years hence, when we are all dead. This still shows they took him for a deluder of them with deceitful promises.

Wilt thou put out the eyes of these men?] Some of them spake this in the name of the rest, who were now with Dathan and Abiram; and the meaning is, Dost thou think to blind us so, that none of us shall discern this imposture? or, shall we suffer thee to lead us about like blind men, whether thou pleasest; sometimes towards Canaan, and now back again towards the Red Sea and Egypt?

We will not come up.] A peremptory resolution, not to own his authority, which they denied at the first (ver. 12).

Ver. 15. Moses was very wroth,] For such behaviour and language was so provoking, that it was no wonder it incensed the meekest man upon earth (ch. xii. 3). Yet the LXX. translate the words, as if he only took it very heavily, ἐβαρυνθήμην σφόδρα, "it made him exceeding sad."

Respect not thou their offering:] He calls the incense which they were about to offer by the name of mincha, which commonly signifies a meat-offering; but sometimes any inanimate thing that was consumed in honour of God, as incense was; and must so signify in this place, for they offered nothing else. And when Moses desires it may not be accepted, he means a great deal the LORD, Respect not thou their offering: I have not taken one ass from them, neither have I hurt one of them.

16 And Moses said unto Korah, Be thou and all thy company before the LORD, thou, and they, and Aaron, to-morrow:

17 And take every man his censer, and put incense in them, and bring ye before the LORD every man his censer, two hundred and fifty censers; thou also, and Aaron, each of you his censer.

18 And they took every man his censer, and put fire in them, and laid incense thereon, and more, that God would give some sign of his dislike to it. Hence it seems plain to me that Dathan and Abiram, as well as Korah, quarrelled at the confining the priesthood unto Aaron's family; for Moses calls this their offering: by the acceptance or rejection of which, this controversy was to be decided.

[I have not taken one ass from them.] This seems to be an appeal to God against their unjust charge, that he acted arbitrarily, and did with them what he listed (ver. 13). From which he was so far, that he declares before God he had not taken, i. e. received by way of gift or reward (so the LXX. and the Vulgar understand it), the smallest thing (for such a single ass was), much less extorted any thing from them.

[Neither have I hurt one of them.] None can say that I have done any kind of evil to them; but contrarily, all good offices. For, that he did not seek himself appeared in this, that he had not advanced his own family to the priesthood, but left them in the number of the other Levites, upon the same level with Korah and his company.

Ver. 16. Be thou and all thy company before the Lord, &c.] He repeats what he had said to him before (ver. 6, 7), only adding, that he would have Aaron also there, together with them. So it follows, "Thou, and they, and Aaron, to-morrow."

[Before the Lord,] i. e. In the court of the tabernacle, see ver. 7, where, by an extraordinary commission from the Divine Majesty, this trial was to be made. And therefore Aaron himself did not now go into the sanctuary to offer incense (which was the proper and only place allowed by the law), but stood with them without; as in another great necessity he offered incense in "the midst of the congregation" (ver. 46, 47). Both which were done by a dispensation from him that made the law.

Ver. 17. Take every man his censer,] Let every man of them stand before the Lord, at the door of the tabernacle, to do the office of priests; to which they pretended as good a right as Aaron and his sons.

[Two hundred and fifty censers;] This shows that the incense being offered by so great a number (as it appears it was, ver. 35), they did not offer it in the sanctuary; which would not contain so many persons.

[Thou also, and Aaron, each of you his censer.] This seems to signify, as if Korah was commanded to stand by Aaron, since he pretended to be his equal; which made the hand of God the more remarkable upon him, when he was struck with lightning, and no harm came to Aaron, who stood by him: but it may be doubted, what way Korah perished.

Ver. 18. They took every man his censer,] That is, the two hundred and fifty men did as they were commanded; but Korah went first to muster up as many as he could get together against Moses (ver. 19), and then seems to have gone to his tent (ver. 24). Herein these men submitted to the way of decision which Moses propounded, though they had so boldly denied his authority. For they could not but think, that God, whom they owned to be among them (ver. 3), would approve of them, if they were in the right, and make good their allegation, that all the congregation were holy, by accepting their incense, as much as Aaron's: to whom they did not deny an equality with themselves; but only a superiority.

[Put fire in them,] From the altar of burnt-offering, which stood in the court, at the door of which they were placed (Lev. i. 5), for Aaron durst not take it from any other place; his sons having lost their lives for offering with strange fire: the remembrance of which, it is likely, deterred these men from doing otherwise; who did not as yet put in the fire, but only took their censers, and put incense in them (which is all that is ordered in the preceding verse), and put fire in afterward.

[Stood—with Moses and Aaron.] As if they were nothing inferior to them.

Ver. 19.] The LXX. translate it, "Korah gathered all his congregation," i. e. all the men of his faction. But the Hebrew words import that he gathered all the congregation of Israel, at least all the great men; who are sometimes called by the name of all the congregation (ch. xiv. 1), whom he got together, that they might be witnesses, at least, of the issue of this trial; though their coming together with Korah and his company, rather than with Moses and Aaron, is too plain an indication that they were inclined, if not to throw off, yet to doubt of their authority.

[Unto the door] Where they themselves stood (ver. 18). And so did Moses and Aaron; but the Israelites that Korah had gathered together stood on his side, appears from the foregoing words, and from ver. 24.

[And the glory of the Lord] The Shechinah, or Divine Majesty, came forth out of the most holy place, where it usually resided.

[Appeared unto all the congregation.] Openly showed itself in the sight of all the people; and, it is likely, in such an amazing manner, as it had done before, (ch. xiv. 10). But where it appeared, we are not told; I suppose in the cloud, which was just over the ark of the testimony (ch. ix. 15); not in the door of the tabernacle, for there Korah and his company stood (see Exod. xvi. 10). And the end of the Lord's appearing was to give sentence in this case; and to declare, by a visible token, whom he accepted as his priests. Thus the glory of the Lord appeared the first time that Aaron and his sons offered sacrifice (Lev. ix. 6, 23).

Ver. 20.] A little before they put fire in their censers.

Ver. 21. Separate yourselves] viz. From Korah and his company, and the people they brought along with them; who seemed to favour them (ver. 19).

[That I may consume them] As he did Korah and his companions.

[That I may consume them] As he did Korah and his companions.

one man sin, and wilt thou be wroth with all the congregation ?

23 ¶ And the Lord spake unto Moses, saying,

24 Speak unto the congregation, saying, Get you up from about the tabernacle of Korah, Dathan, and Abiram.

25 And Moses rose up and went unto Dathan and Abiram; and the elders of Israel followed him.

26 And he spake unto the congregation, saying, Depart, I pray you, from the tents of these Ver. 23. They fell on their faces,] To pray to God, as they had done before (ver. 4).

O God,] The most mighty.

The God of the spirits of all flesh,] Who hast created the souls of all mankind (so flesh often signifies all men, Gen. vi. 13), and therefore searches into their most secret thoughts and inclinations. So these words signify, ch. xxvii. 16.

Shall one man sin,] Korah, who was the chief incendiary and contriver in this sedition.

Wilt thou be wroth with all the congregation ?] Many of which he thought might, through weakness, be seduced into this faction, having no malice at all in their hearts: which God knew perfectly; and therefore he begs of him that he would make a distinction between such as these, and the men that misled them.

Ver. 23.] He bade him rise up, having granted his petition.

Ver. 24. Speak unto the congregation,] Whom Korah had gathered together, and brought along with him to the door of the tabernacle (ver. 19).

Get you up from about the tabernacle of Korah, &c.] Which, it seems, was not far off; or wheresoever it was, there a great number of people was gathered together to see what would be the conclusion of this contest. The word tabernacle is in the singular number; but includes all the tents belonging to these men, as appears from ver. 26. Or, perhaps, they had set up one great tabernacle (for the word here is mishcan, which may be thought to signify more than ohel, a tent, ver. 26), unto which abundance of people resorted, as the place that Korah and the rest had appointed for the general rendezvous (as we now speak) of all their party. For here Dathan and Abiram, it is evident (ver. 27), were with him; but there is no mention at all of On; which makes it probable he had forsaken them, as Moses wished all the people to do; on which condition God promised to pardon them.

Ver. 25. Moses—went unto Dathan and Abiram;] To try, I suppose, if he could reduce them to their obedience, and prevent their ruin. He seems to have had no hopes of Korah, but looked upon him as incorrigible.

The elders of Israel followed him.] Either the seventy elders, who were lately chosen out of the rest (ch. xi. 16), or the whole body of those who were called by that name, and were men of authority, attended upon him, to make this action more solemn; and let Dathan and Abiram see how much Moses was revered by better men than themselves, who refused to come to him (ver. 12, 14).

Ver. 26. He spake unto the congregation,] It seems Dathan and Abiram refused to hear him, as they did to come to him: for here is no mention of any thing he spake to them; but only to the congregation who were gathered about their tents.

Depart—from the tents of these wicked men,] I sup-wicked men, and touch nothing of their's, lest ye be consumed in all their sins.

27 So they gat up from the tabernacle of Korah, Dathan, and Abiram, on every side; and Dathan and Abiram came out, and stood in the door of their tents, and their wives, and their sons, and their little children.

28 And Moses said, Hereby ye shall know that the Lord hath sent me to do all these works; for I have not done them of mine own mind.

29 If these men die the common death of all pose now they were gone to their own tents, where their families were; from which he beseeches the people to remove with all speed. And he doth not mean merely that they should remove their persons from them, but their tents, and their goods, and cattle.

Touch nothing of their's,] Because all belonging unto them was under an anathema which God had passed upon them; that is, was devoted to destruction, and therefore not to be touched (Deut. xiii. 17).

Let ye be consumed] Destroyed with them: who had sinned so grievously, as to fall under the curse before mentioned.

Ver. 27. So they gat up from the tabernacle of Korah, &c.] Where the greatest number of people were gathered together, as I observed, ver. 24. For here is the same word mishcan again, in the singular number, denoting some spacious habitation, where perhaps they held their consultations, and unto which there was the greatest resort.

On every side,] From which we may conclude, that the people had come from all quarters of the camp to these rebels; either to join with them, or out of curiosity to see how things would go.

Dathan and Abiram] With Korah also, it may be thought, because he is mentioned in the beginning of the verse. Yet this conclusion cannot be drawn from thence, for it is not said he was now there; but that it was "the tabernacle of Korah, Dathan, and Abiram;" where they used, I suppose, to meet.

Came out,] From the tabernacle before mentioned.

Stood in the door of their tents,] Of their own tents, where they commonly dwelt.

Their wives, and their sons, and their little children.] With their whole families. This was the highest degree of audacious and hardened infidelity; whereby they declared that they feared not what Moses (who had given the greatest proof he was a man of God) could do unto them.

Ver. 28. Moses said,] Unto all the people of Israel; or to the elders, and as many as could hear him.

Hereby ye shall know] I will now give you an evident demonstration.

That the Lord hath sent me] That I have been commissioned by God to do all the things with which those men find fault; particularly to take upon me the government of them, and to put Aaron and his family into the priesthood, and make the Levites only their ministers, &c. (see ver. 2, 3, 13, 14).

For I have not done them of mine own mind.] In the Hebrew the words are, "and that not out of my heart." It was none of my own device or contrivance; I did it not out of an ambitious desire to be great myself, nor out of private affection to my brother.

Ver. 29. If these men die the common death of all men,] In the Hebrew it is, "as die all mankind:" that is, a natural death, as we now speak men, or if they be visited after the visitation of all men; then the Lord hath not sent me.

30 But if the Lord make a new thing, and the earth open her mouth, and swallow them up, with all that appertain unto them, and they go down quick into the pit; then ye shall understand that these men have provoked the Lord.

31 ¶ And it came to pass, as he had made an end of speaking all these words, that the ground clave asunder that was under them:

32 And the earth opened her mouth, and swallowed them up, and their houses, and all the men that appertained unto Korah, and all their goods.

33 They, and all that appertained to them, went down alive into the pit, and the earth closed upon them: and they perished from among the congregation.

34 And all Israel that were round about them fled at the cry of them: for they said, Lest the earth swallow us up also.

35 And there came out a fire from the Lord,

Or if they be visited after the visitation of all men;] i. e. Such judgments of God come upon them, as are usual and common in the world; viz. a pestilence, the sword, or famine.

Then the Lord hath not sent me.] Then look upon me as an impostor.

Ver. 30. If the Lord make a new thing, In the Hebrew the words are, "if the Lord create a creature;" i. e. do something that was never seen nor heard of in the world before. The Jews, in several of their books (particularly in Pirke Avoth), say, there are ten things which God created after the world was perfected: and they mention the mouth of the earth for one of them; that is, the gaping of the ground, to swallow up these wicked people: which is said to be created, as Ahen Ezra well observes, because by this miracle God altered the course of nature, and did a thing extraordinary.

The earth open her mouth, and swallow them up,] i. e. On a sudden; when there is no earthquake, but all is calm and still; and it swallow up none but them alone.

They go down quick into the pit;] Be buried alive, when they are in perfect health. By this place it is apparent, that the Hebrew word sheol doth often signify the grave; which Bellarmine and others most earnestly contend never signifies so, but hell; which, from hence, he asserts to be in the centre of the earth (lib. iv. De Christo, cap. 10), not observing, that if it signify hell in this verse, and ver. 33, then the houses of these men, and their household-stuff, and all that appertained to them, went down thither, which is very absurd. It is hard also, to think that all their little children went down into hell for their fathers' sin, though they did into the grave.

Then ye shall understand, &c.] You shall be sufficiently convinced that they have unjustly accused me, and brought this destruction upon themselves.

Ver. 31.] He had no sooner done speaking, but immediately what he said was verified, which made it the more remarkable.

Ver. 32. Swallowed them up,] viz. Dathan and Abiram before mentioned (ver. 27), who stood in the door of their tents outfacing Moses.

Their houses,] i. e. All their family; or, as Moses himself hath explained it (Deut. xi. 6), Their households, and their tents, and all the substance that was in their possession.

All the men that appertained unto Korah,] We are not told what became of Korah himself: for it is not said he was swallowed up, but all that appertained to him; i. e. all that were at that time in his tent: his whole family, except his sons, who escaped (ch. xxvi. 11), taking warning, I suppose, from what Moses said (ver. 26): which hath made some think that Korah was at the head of his two hundred and fifty men, who were the great abettors of his faction: who, if he had forsaken them at this trial that was made who were in the right, we may well think would have withdrawn themselves also, and not have stood to it without their chieftain, as we find they did (ver. 35). Yet he is not mentioned there as perishing with them by fire from the Lord: and Moses seems to say (ch. xxvi. 10), that Dathan and Abiram were swallowed up together with Korah; who had as much reason, or more, perhaps, to think it necessary to be with that other company which he had gathered against Moses (ver. 19), and to encourage them to persist in their resolution, than to be with the two hundred and fifty men, who were men of such authority (ver. 2), that they may be thought to have needed none to support them. It may be added also, that the word appertained is not here in the Hebrew (which makes these words sound as if the meaning were only those that were of Korah's family), but simply all the men that were to Korah; i. e. were gathered to him, and were at that time with him: which seems to be an indication that they and he were swallowed up together. How many there were that stayed with him there is not certain; but the generality left him, ver. 27, where it is expressly said, "they gat up from the tabernacle of Korah, Dathan, and Abiram," as Moses had commanded (ver. 24). Which may be taken for a further indication, that he was swallowed up in the tabernacle where he was, or in his own tent after he came out of that tabernacle. But those places, I observed before, may be otherwise understood: that place also, which is the main foundation of this opinion (ch. xxvi. 10), may likewise receive another interpretation, as I shall show when I come thither. And they that are of the other opinion, think his tabernacle, and his family, and all his household-stuff, might be swallowed up, though he himself was not with them, but was burnt by fire with the two hundred and fifty men that offered incense; for Moses bade him take his censer as well as them (ver. 17). Which, since they did, and put fire and incense therein, why should it be thought he did not do the same? It seems to me highly probable that he did, otherwise he would have seemed to distrust his cause: but it must be confessed that it is obscure which way he perished, and therefore it is not fit to contend about it.

All their goods,] All their household-stuff and cattle, and whatsoever was in or about their tents.

Ver. 33. All that appertained] See Deut. xi. 6.

Went down alive] As Moses had foretold (ver. 30).

The earth closed upon them:] This made it the more wonderful, that the earth, having swallowed them all up, had no cleft remaining in it, but closed up again and was as firm as before.

They perished] Were never more seen.

Ver. 34. All Israel—fled at the cry of them:] Though they were at a distance from their tents, (whence they had removed on all sides, ver. 27), yet they heard them shriek so loudly, as they sunk down into the ground, that it put them into a great fright, and made them fly still further off.

Lest the earth swallow us up also,] Some of them were conscious to themselves that they had favoured this and consumed the two hundred and fifty men that offered incense.

36 ¶ And the Lord spake unto Moses, saying,

37 Speak unto Eleazar the son of Aaron the priest, that he take up the censers out of the burning, and scatter thou the fire yonder; for they are hallowed.

38 The censers of these sinners against their own souls, let them make them broad plates for a covering of the altar: for they offered them before the Lord, therefore they are hallowed: and wicked faction; and all of them knew how highly they had lately offended God, by their unbelief and murmuring (ch. xiv.), which might make them justly fear the same fate with their brethren.

Ver. 35. There came out a fire from the Lord,] From the glory of the Lord, which appeared unto all the congregation (ver. 19), as ready to decide the controversy: this fell out either at the same time the earth swallowed up Dathan and Abiram, or immediately after it.

Consumed the two hundred and fifty men] Which was a plain declaration that they usurped the office of priests; and, therefore, were thus punished by God himself for their presumption. It is not certain, whether they were devoured by the fire, or only struck dead, as men are sometimes on a sudden by lightning; and perhaps scorched, as they likewise sometimes are. The latter seems most probable from what follows (ver. 37), and from the like punishment "by fire from the Lord," which is said to devour Nadab and Abihu, and yet their bodies remained entire (Lev. x. 2, 4). This was the more astonishing, because Moses and Aaron, who stood with them at the door of the tabernacle (ver. 18), had no hurt.

Ver. 36.] Immediately after the death of those men.

Ver. 37. Speak unto Eleazar] Who it is likely stood by them, as next successor to Aaron, in the office which was disputed; and therefore, perhaps, employed in what follows rather than Aaron, that his succession might be confirmed. Though others will have it, that it was below the dignity of Aaron to perform such a mean office: and besides, he might have been in danger to be polluted by the dead bodies of the men that were burnt.

That he take up the censers out of the burning,] Out of the place where the men were burnt, as some understand it: or (which differs not much) from among the dead bodies, which were burnt: burning being put for bodies burnt, as captivity (ch. xxi. 1), for those that were carried captive, or made prisoners, as we there translate it. But there is no need of either of these additions; burning signifying the fire which burnt in them, which he orders Eleazar to throw out, that the censers might be brought away.

Scatter thou the fire yonder;] The men were burnt as soon as ever they put fire to the incense in their censers (ver. 18), which, flaming at the door of the tabernacle where they stood (near the altar from whence they took the fire), God commanded to be thrown away without the camp; into that place, I suppose, where they were wont to throw the ashes (Lev. vi. 11); or rather, into some unclean place, where they threw the dust scraped from the walls of leprous houses (Lev. xiv. 41). For it was to show that God abhorred their offering.

For they are hallowed.] Or had fire from the altar put into them; which some think sanctified them. But the plain reason is given in the next verse, bethey shall be a sign unto the children of Israel.

39 And Eleazar the priest took the brassen censers, wherewith they that were burnt had offered; and they were made broad plates for a covering of the altar:

40 To be a memorial unto the children of Israel, that no stranger, which is not of the seed of Aaron, come near to offer incense before the Lord; that he be not as Korah, and as his company: as the Lord said to him by the hand of Moses.

41 ¶ But on the morrow all the congregation cause "they offered them before the Lord:" i. e. they had been employed to a holy use, and that by God's command (ver. 6, 17), and therefore God would not have them hereafter serve for any other.

Ver. 38. These sinners against their own souls,] Who have brought destruction upon themselves by their presumption.

Make them] Either Aaron or Eleazar was to cause them to be beaten into such plates as here follow.

Broad plates for a covering of the altar:] Of burnt-offering, which was covered with brass (Exod. xxvii. 12); but these plates were to be laid upon that covering which it had already, for the end mentioned in the conclusion of this verse. And hereby also the proper covering of the altar lasted the longer.

For they offered them before the Lord,] Presented them before the Lord, when they offered incense in them (ver. 35).

Therefore they are hallowed:] Or holy; that is, I will have them separated, for this reason, to my use alone, and no other. It is a thing worthy to be taken special notice of, that the impiety of the men that offered incense did not discharge their censers of the discriminative respect (as our famous Mr. Mede speaks) due unto things sacred; as these in some sort were, by being presented to the Lord, which made it unlawful to employ them to common uses. For as the Lord himself is that singular, incommunicable, and absolutely Holy One, and his service and worship therefore incommunicable to any other, so should that also which is consecrated to his service, be in some proportion incommunicably used, and not promiscuously and commonly, as other things are (see Book i. Discourse 2, p. 18).

They shall be a sign] That God accepts no sacrifice which is not presented by the hands of the sons of Aaron. This the Levites were to remember, who attended upon the priest, when they saw these plates laid upon the altar of burnt-offering every day.

Ver. 39.] By this it appears these censers were made of the same metal (though it was not said before) that Aaron's censer was of, and wherewith the altar was overlaid. He took them up out of the burning, no doubt, immediately upon the foregoing commands; and as soon as the mutiny was quite quelled, they were employed as Moses had directed.

Ver. 40. To be a memorial,] This explains what is meant by a sign (ver. 35), viz. to put them in mind; or rather, to keep in their memory.

That no stranger,] Though he were an Israelite, nay a Levite, if he were not (as it here follows) of the seed of Aaron, he was reputed a stranger to this office.

Come near to offer incense] Presume to execute the office of a priest in the sanctuary.

That he be not as Korah:] Destroyed in a dreadful manner. By this it appears that Korah perished as well as the two hundred and fifty men; and it is likely, as they did, by fire from the Lord.

of the children of Israel murmured against Moses and against Aaron, saying, Ye have killed the people of the LORD.

42 And it came to pass, when the congregation was gathered against Moses and against Aaron, that they looked toward the tabernacle of the congregation: and, behold, the cloud covered it, and the glory of the LORD appeared.

43 And Moses and Aaron came before the tabernacle of the congregation.

44 ¶ And the LORD spake unto Moses, saying,

45 Get you up from among this congregation, that I may consume them as in a moment. And they fell upon their faces.

46 ¶ And Moses said unto Aaron, Take a censer, and put fire therein from off the altar, and put on incense, and go quickly unto the congregation, and make an atonement for them: for there is wrath gone out from the LORD; the plague is begun.

47 And Aaron took as Moses commanded, and ran into the midst of the congregation; and, behold, the plague was begun among the people: and he put on incense, and made an atonement for the people.

48 And he stood between the dead and the living; and the plague was stayed.

As the Lord said to him] i. e. To Eleazar.

By the hand of Moses.] See ver. 36, 37.

Ver. 41. But on the morrow] An astonishing instance of the incurable hardness and insensibility of some men's hearts; which were not in the least altered by God's terrible judgments and singular mercies; but instantly forgot both.

All the congregation] Not merely the rulers of the people (as this phrase sometimes signifies), but all the people in general (ver. 47), who were incited, it is probable, by that lewd route which Korah had gathered together against Moses and Aaron (ver. 19), some of which were swallowed up, but most of them remained still alive to do more mischief.

Murmured against Moses] In such a mutinous and threatening manner, as demonstrated the contagious nature of a seditious humour, beyond all example: for from a discontented party, who grumbled that they were not preferred suitably to the opinion they had of themselves, it spread itself into the whole body of the people, and so infected them as to kindle a new flame, as soon as the former had been extinguished by such a terrible vengeance, as one would have expected should not have left the smallest spark of this mutinous humour in them.

Saying, Ye have killed the people of the Lord.] So they impudently call those men, whom God himself had declared, by a visible token, to be presumptuous sinners against their own souls. Some imagine they quarrelled with Moses and Aaron, because they had not prevailed with God to pardon them; which they could as well have done as procured this judgment upon them. But the displeasure which God here expresses against this new murmuring, shows this not to be a true excuse for them.

Ver. 42. When the congregation was gathered against Moses] Their murmuring presently proceeded to an insurrection.

That they looked toward the tabernacle] i. e. Moses and Aaron implored help from God, which is implied in their looking towards his dwelling-place.

The cloud covered it.] One would think by this that it had for some time withdrawn itself from the tabernacle, when the dead bodies of Korah's company lay at the door of it.

The glory of the Lord appeared.] To comfort them in this distress; and to show he was ready to support and vindicate them.

Ver. 43.] Perhaps for safety and security; or, to hear what directions God would give them.

Ver. 44.] Out of the tabernacle; before which he stood, waiting for the Lord's orders.

Ver. 45. Get you up] He speaks to Aaron and Eleazar, I suppose, as well as unto Moses.

That I may consume them] As he was inclined to do before (ver. 21), and now had a greater reason.

They fell upon their faces.] To beseech God not to punish the people as they deserved (ver. 22).

Ver. 46. Moses said unto Aaron.] By God's direction.

Take a censer and put fire therein from off the altar.] Near to which they now were (ver. 43).

Put on incense.] Upon the fire; but not till he came into the midst of the congregation (ver. 47).

Go quickly unto the congregation.] With the incense, which regularly was to be offered only at the golden altar within the sanctuary; but now, in this extraordinary case, by God's special order, Aaron is sent with it into the camp, that they might all be witnesses of his power with God, and that, by his authority, he was settled in the priesthood.

Make an atonement for them.] Which was usually performed by the blood of a sacrifice: but there was not time for that; and therefore now it was made by the incense, wherewith their daily sacrifices, morning and evening, were concluded; and was accompanied by the prayers of the people, while the priest, as he offered it, made intercession for them (Ps. cxli. 2). Thus, as St. Jerome glosses, Currens ira Dei, sacerdotis voce prohibebatur; "the Divine anger, coming with full speed upon them, was stopped by the voice of the priest:" which was a notable type of the power of our great high-priest and intercessor with God, the Lord Jesus.

For there is wrath gone out from the Lord.] Who would not wholly grant their prayer for a pardon (ver. 45), but inflicted some punishment upon them.

The plague is begun.] A pestilence, in all probability, of which several immediately died.

Ver. 47. Aaron took as Moses commanded.] A censer, and fire from the altar, with incense ready to be put upon it (ver. 46).

And ran] According to the command of Moses (ver. 46), who bade him go quickly.

Into the midst] Perhaps into the midst of each of the four camps, of Judah, Reuben, Ephraim, and Dan (mentioned in the second chapter), it being broke out everywhere.

Behold, the plague was begun] He saw people die on all sides of it.

He put on incense.] Whereupon he put incense upon the fire which he brought along with him from the altar (ver. 46).

Made an atonement] Interceded with God for them, and obtained what he desired.

Ver. 48. He stood between the dead and the living.] This seems to intimate, that the plague began in the skirts of their camps, and was proceeding into the heart of them, where Aaron stood, as a mediator for those who were not yet smitten.

The plague was stayed.] A stop was put to its progress; which was a further evidence of Aaron's right to the priesthood, by God's appointment; who not only preserved him when he offered incense together with Korah's company (ver. 17), but now makes him an instrument of preserving others from destruction.

49 Now they that died in the plague were fourteen thousand and seven hundred, beside them that died about the matter of Korah.

Ver. 49. They that died—were fourteen thousand and seven hundred.] Who, it is likely, were of the forwardest men to associate themselves with Korah (ver. 19).

Beside them that died about the matter of Korah.]

50 And Aaron returned unto Moses unto the door of the tabernacle of the congregation: and the plague was stayed.

Whose just number is not known; for besides the two hundred and fifty men (mentioned ver. 25), the whole families of Korah, Dathan, and Abiram were swallowed up.

Ver. 50. Aaron returned] To carry back his censor.

The plague was stayed.] Or rather, "for the plague was stayed;" and so, having done his business, he returned to the tabernacle.

CHAPTER XVII.

1 Aaron's rod among all the rods of the tribes only flourisheth. 10 It is left for a monument against the rebels.

1 AND the LORD spake unto Moses, saying,
2 Speak unto the children of Israel, and take of every one of them a rod according to the house of their fathers, of all their princes according to the house of their fathers twelve rods: write thou every man's name upon his rod.

CHAP. XVII.

Ver. 1. The Lord spake unto Moses.] Not long after the plague was stayed. For though there had been enough done to satisfy the people that Aaron was advanced to the priesthood by God's appointment, and not by Moses's affection to his kindred; yet their minds had been so poisoned by Korah and his accomplices, with the contrary opinion, that it was necessary to do still more to root it out. Which was the occasion of what follows.

Ver. 2. Speak unto the children of Israel.] Order them to bring what I require thee to take of them.

Take of every one of them] i. e. Of every tribe.

A rod] Or a staff, as the Hebrew word matteh is often translated: which some take for an ordinary walking-staff, or for the staff which was the badge of their authority, as princes of the several tribes; neither of which seems to me to be true. For what reason have we to think that every man's staff which he commonly used was made of the wood of an almond-tree? as these were, one may probably conclude from the eighth verse. And therefore, I take it, they were now all cut off from some tree of that kind, and it is likely from one and the same tree, that none might fancy there was any difference between them. For the miracle was great enough (which here follows), without supposing, as some do, that these rods were all of some other common wood; and yet Aaron's rod produced almonds, which were not the proper fruit of it: though it must be confessed, that if they were not of the wood of an almond-tree, the wonder was greater that his rod should bring forth almonds; and struck their minds more strongly.

According to the house of their fathers] In the Hebrew it is father, in the singular number; denoting the principal person or patriarch (as we call them), of whose house or family he was to take one rod.

Of all their princes] This explains the meaning more fully, that the prince of every tribe, who was the head of the house of their fathers, should bring these rods. Their names we have in the first chapter of this book (ver. 5, 6, ch. vii. 2, 12, &c.).

Twelve rods.] Besides Aaron's; for so many tribes

3 And thou shalt write Aaron's name upon the rod of Levi: for one rod shall be for the head of the house of their fathers.

4 And thou shalt lay them up in the tabernacle of the congregation before the testimony, where I will meet with you.

there were besides that of Levi. And too great a number of every tribe, in all likelihood, had joined with Korah in their discontented murmurings, at the confinement of the priesthood unto Aaron's family alone; to which they all fancied they had as much right as he. Which is the reason of taking a rod from every tribe; that they might all be convinced that none of them, but he and his family alone, were owned by God for his priests (see ch. xvi. 3).

Write thou every man's name upon his rod.] Either by an incision into the very wood; or with such ink as they wrote withal in those days (v. 22). This he did in the presence of the princes; that they might not afterward suspect any fraud, when they came to take their rods again; but be satisfied they were the very same which they saw noted with their names.

Ver. 3. Write Aaron's name upon the rod of Levi:] Because God had made him the prince of that tribe, by giving him the high-priesthood. And he would have them see, that as no other person in any of the twelve tribes, so no other Levite ought to pretend unto that high office, which he had invested him withal, and him alone.

One rod shall be for the head] One rod was sufficient, because the head of the tribe comprehended the whole tribe, who were all excluded from the priesthood, by the exclusion of him who represented them.

Ver. 4. Lay them up] In the most holy place.

Before the testimony,] i. e. Before the ark; called in many places the ark of the testimony (Exod. xl. 3), because therein Moses put the testimony (or, two tables of stone), and the mercy-seat above it, ver. 20, 21, where the Divine glory resided. Therefore, to lay the rods before the testimony, was to lay them before the Divine Majesty; who intended by them finally to determine the present controversy.

Where I will meet with you.] There he promised to meet with Moses, Exod. xxv. 22, by whom he communicated his mind unto the people. For he neither met with them, nor with Aaron, there, any other way but by Moses. And therefore the Vulgar Latin here translates it, minding the sense rather than the words, "Where I will speak to them." And so the LXX. "By which I will be made known to thee there."

5 And it shall come to pass, that the man's rod, whom I shall choose, shall blossom: and I will make to cease from me the murmurings of the children of Israel, whereby they murmur against you.

6 ¶ And Moses spake unto the children of Israel, and every one of their princes gave him a rod apiece, for each prince one, according to their fathers' houses, even twelve rods: and the rod of Aaron was among their rods.

7 And Moses laid up the rods before the LORD in the tabernacle of witness.

And indeed meeting with them here, is nothing but declaring, or making known his mind to them all, by what was done there upon Aaron's rod. So it follows in the next verse. And for this reason the tabernacle of the Lord is called ahel moed, the "tabernacle of meeting;" not of men's meeting there (as is commonly supposed, by our translating it "the tabernacle of the congregation"), but of God's meeting there with men: for so the Lord himself gives the reason of the name, both here and in Exod. xxix. 42, xxx. 36, where I have noted the same out of Mr. Mede.

Ver. 5. The man's rod, whom I shall choose, shall blossom.] The rods being laid before me, I will tell you whom I have chosen to minister to me in the priesthood, by making the rod upon which his name is written to blossom, when all the rest remain as they were before, without any alteration. This was a kind of new choice (as the words import), whereby God confirmed the choice he had formerly made of Aaron to be high-priest.

I will make to cease from me the murmurings.] And hereby stop all their mouths from murmuring any more about this matter; unless they will oppose me directly, who declare beforehand how I intend to give judgment in this case, and put an end to this dispute.

Ver. 6. Moses spake.] Told them what God had said, that they might be all consenting to this way of decision.

Every one of their princes gave him a rod.] For they could not refuse such a fair proposal.

For each prince one.] Observing herein the commands of Moses; who wrote, no doubt, every man's "name upon his rod," as he was also commanded, ver. 2.

The rod of Aaron was among their rods.] Not one of the twelve, as the Jews fancy; but besides the twelve rods for the twelve tribes (as was directed, ver. 2, and obeyed by them, as the foregoing words tell us), his rod was put among them with his name upon it, as their names were upon their rods. And therefore the Vulgar translates it, having regard to the sense only, "there were twelve rods besides the rod of Aaron;" which the LXX. intended in their translation, Καὶ ἡ ῥάβδος Ἀαρὼν ἀναμίστρον τῶν ῥάβδων αὐτῶν; "and the rod of Aaron in the midst of their rods." And if it were cut from the very same tree with theirs, the miracle became the more remarkable.

Ver. 7. Moses laid up the rods.] Who was by them to declare his choice (ver. 5).

In the tabernacle of witness.] In that part of the tabernacle where the ark was, which had in it the witness or testimony which God gave Moses (Exod. xxv. 21), who alone could go into that place.

Ver. 8. On the morrow.] It is likely God told him he would forthwith show whom he had chosen.

Moses went into the tabernacle of witness.] The most holy place, where the rods were laid up by God's order.

The rod of Aaron.] Which had his name written on it.

8 And it came to pass, that on the morrow Moses went into the tabernacle of witness; and, behold, the rod of Aaron for the house of Levi was budded, and brought forth buds, and bloomed blossoms, and yielded almonds.

9 And Moses brought out all the rods from before the LORD unto all the children of Israel: and they looked, and took every man his rod.

10 ¶ And the LORD said unto Moses, Bring Aaron's rod again before the testimony, to be kept for a token against the rebels; and thou

For the house of Levi.] Or, "to the house of Levi," i. e. whom God had made head of the Levites.

Was budded.] In some places of the rod, I suppose, there was an appearance of buds coming forth; in others, the buds were fully thrust out; and in others, they were opened and shot forth into blossoms; and those blossoms, in other parts, knotted and grown into almonds. Μίγιστρον καὶ τοῖς ἀριστοῖς θάυμα, &c., as Gregory Nyssen speaks in the Life of Moses (p. 185), "the greatest miracle even in the judgment of unbelievers;" who now acknowledged that which before they opposed (ver. 12, 13). For that in one night, a dry stick (as some suppose them all to have been) should produce buds, and flowers, and fruit, when all the rest, which perhaps were cut from the same tree, were as dry as they were before, could not but be very amazing; and, unless they would shut their eyes, make them see the distinction which the Lord made between Aaron, whose name that rod bore, and all the rest of the children of Israel whom the other rods represented.

The heathen did not think such things incredible, as Huetius hath shown in his Quæstiones Alnetanæ (lib. i. cap. 12, n. 24).

Ver. 9. Moses brought out all the rods—unto all the children of Israel.] Before whom they were exposed to open view, that they might see the difference God had made.

They looked, and took every man his rod.] Viewed them, and, taking them into their hands, examined them; and found they were the very same rods which they had delivered unto Moses with their names on them, without any alteration.

Ver. 10. Bring Aaron's rod again.] Which either Moses held in his hand, or delivered it to Aaron (as he did the rest to the several princes of the tribes), who showed it to the children of Israel, with the buds, blossoms, and almonds, upon it: after which God commanded it to be returned unto him.

Before the testimony.] To be laid up in the place where it was before it was thus changed (ver. 4, 7).

To be kept for a token against the rebels.] That it might be produced as a sufficient conviction of their impiety, if any presumed hereafter to rebel against Aaron's authority: or rather, that it might prevent all insurrections against it for the future. For it remained, we find, in the most holy place for some time; as appears both from the apostle (Heb. ix. 4), and from the reason of its being put here, that it might be preserved as a sign or proof of Aaron's authority, and suppress all opposition to it. But how long it continued we cannot tell (for it is not mentioned when the ark was brought into the temple of Solomon, 1 Kings viii. 9), nor is it certain whether it continued in that verdure wherein it now appeared, with the buds, blossoms, and fruit, though it is highly probable it did; because it was to be a testimony that the honour of the priesthood should continue to Aaron's family alone, through all generations.

11 And Moses did so: as the LORD commanded him, so did he.

12 And the children of Israel spake unto

There are those who take this rod which blossomed, and was laid up in the most holy place, to have been the rod of Moses, wherewith he wrought so many miracles in Egypt and at the Red Sea: concerning which the Jews tell very many incredible things; as that it came from a branch of the tree of life, which an angel gave to Seth, who planted it in the wilderness, where Moses found it grown to a tree, and cut this rod from it. For when they came to Marah, and could not drink the waters, because they were bitter, God showed them this tree, that with it he might make them sweet. Upon which tree he afterward placed the brazen serpent, by looking on which the people were healed, &c. Thus the cabalists generally tell this tale; but some of them much otherwise; who say it was given to Adam, and by him to Enoch, and so on till it came to Joseph, in whose house the Egyptians found it when he died, and brought it to Pharaoh; from whom Jethro stole it, &c., with a great deal of such-like stuff: which Abarinel saith is to be understood mystically. But all the ground they have for their fancy, of the rod here laid up being Moses's rod, is from ch. xx. 8, 9, where it is said, that "Moses took the rod from before the Lord," wherewith he brought water out of the rock; and this rod is said (ver. 11), to be Moses's rod. Dr. Owen, upon the Epistle to the Hebrews, follows this conceit, and endeavours to find many mysteries in it. But it is evidently false: for as there is not the least intimation here that it was the rod of Moses, but quite contrary, it is called the rod of Aaron, ver. 6, so it had not been a sufficient argument to convince the infidelity of the Israelites, if Aaron's rod had not been of the same kind with all the rest. For they might have ascribed what came to pass to the singular quality or virtue of that rod, especially if it were Moses's rod (wherewith wonders used to be wrought), and not to a special hand of God appearing to establish the authority of Aaron. And besides, a rod full of blossoms and fruit had been very unfit to be used to smite the rock withal; for which purpose that rod (which seems to have been his pastoral staff) wherewith he smote the rock in Horeb was most proper (Exod. xvii. 5, 6).

Thou shalt quite take away their murmurings from me,] i. e. Silence all their cavils against Aaron and his family; which the Lord here declares he would no longer bear, if they continued in them after this demonstration of his will and pleasure. For here were a great many miraculous things concurred together to convince them, that to oppose Aaron was to oppose God himself. The Jews reckon up eight. First, that Aaron's rod should bring forth buds, blossoms, and fruit, all in one night, when the other rods, which were of the same nature, brought forth nothing. And then, secondly, that the buds brought forth leaves; for so they interpret those words (ver. 8), the rod of Aaron was budded, i. e. brought forth leaves; for the next words speak of its budding, which followed after. And thirdly, that it thrust out leaves before the blossoms, which is contrary to the nature of the almond-tree. And next, that it put forth blossoms all the rod over; as they interpret those words, bloomed blossoms. And then, that a dry stick (as they understand it) should produce fruit, and this fruit almonds, which such trees (they think) as that rod was taken from, did not bear. And further, that it produced ripe almonds, as the Hebrew word shekedim imports. And lastly, that Moses showed the people all these at one view, the leaves, buds, blossoms, and fruit in perfection. By which multiplicity of miracles the dignity of Aaron was so demonstrated, that we do not find they at any time hereafter adventured to rise up against him. For, besides all those wonders now mentioned, it may be, that it was not the season of the year for almonds, nor so much as for the budding of that tree; which made it the more astonishing. But the greatest thing of all was, the continuing of this miracle to future ages; which might well make them afraid to open their mouths again in murmurings against Aaron.

That they die not.] Be not consumed in a moment, as God had more than once formerly threatened (ch. xvi. 21, 45) and now declared, if they did not mend their manners, and cease their murmurings about this matter, he would instantly execute.

Ver. 11. Moses did so;] Both brought the rod again to him, and laid it up before him; and told the children of Israel the reason of it; which occasioned what follows.

Ver. 12. Behold, we die, we perish, &c.] Moses having told them that he laid up the rod for this end, to be a witness against them, that (if they murmured any more) they deserved to be all cut off, as they should certainly be, it moved them to make this doleful complaint, wherein they seem to be convinced of their guilt, and to bewail their miserable state. For the sense of these two verses is, "Some of us died before, and now lately more have perished, and we are all in the same danger; surely we shall never have done dying, till we be all consumed."

Behold, we die,] This seems to relate to those judgments which had passed upon them heretofore.

We perish,] And this to what had very lately happened to Korah, Dathan, and Abiram, with their company, and to those that murmured the next day after (ch. xvi. 49).

We all perish.] This will be the fate of the whole congregation.

Ver. 13. Whosoever cometh any thing near unto the tabernacle] Who was not a priest, and yet approached nearer than God allowed.

Shall die;] So Moses had threatened: and they now believed him, and were afraid withal they should some time or other incur God's displeasure by their rashness.

Shall we be consumed with dying?] They seem to be afraid, lest, for their late murmurings and insurrection after such a heavy punishment for that sin (ch. xvi. 41, 42), God should further plague them, as by this new sign he convinced them they justly deserved; and therefore beg of Moses to entreat God to spare them, and not to go on utterly to destroy them.

1 The charge of the priests and Levites. 9 The priests' portion. 21 The Levites' portion. 25 The heave offering to the priests out of the Levites' portion.

unto thee: but thou and thy sons with thee shall minister before the tabernacle of witness.

CHAP. XVIII.

Ver. 1. The Lord said unto Aaron.] By the hand of Moses, it is most likely, unto whom God was wont to communicate all that he would have delivered, either to Aaron or to the people (ch. xvii. 4). And having done more miracles than one to establish Aaron in the priesthood, he now lets him know that the honour he had done him was an office of great weight and burden, wherein he was to behave himself with great care and circumspection; and withal, he again declares what the duty of the Levites was, together with the priests, from ver. 1, unto ver. 8. And from thence he proceeds to tell them what maintenance he had settled upon both, for their encouragement in doing their duty: as I shall observe in the proper places.

Thou and thy sons and thy father's house with thee] You and the Levites (whom he calls his father's house) who had the charge of the sanctuary.

Shall bear the iniquity of the sanctuary.] If the sanctuary were profaned, through the negligence of the Levites, who were to keep strangers and people in their uncleanness, from entering into it; and if the priests were remiss, and did not take care to see the Levites do their duty, the punishment of such profanation, he tells them, should fall upon them.

Thou and thy sons with thee] i. e. Aaron and the priests alone.

Shall bear the iniquity of your priesthood.] Suffer the punishment of it: if they permitted any person who was not of the line of Aaron to offer incense, or perform any part of the priest's office; or if they themselves should minister in their uncleanness, or having any blemish, or did any thing contrary to the rules of their office.

This was some comfort to the people, who were afraid they should die for every error committed in their approaches to the sanctuary (ch. xvii. 12, 13), for which he assures them he would punish the priests and the Levites, and not them. And it also served to remove the people's envy to the priest, whose dignity they saw accompanied with such great danger.

Ver. 2. Thy brethren also of the tribe of Levi.] This also was a comfort to the Levites, and designed to make them more contented than they had been in their inferior offices, that the priests were to look upon them as their brethren.

Bring thou with thee.] Into the tabernacle.

[Joined unto thee.] As assistants to thee there.

[Minister unto thee.] In such things as I have mentioned (see upon ch. iii. 6).

But thou and thy sons with thee shall minister before the tabernacle of witness.] The words shall minister not being in the Hebrew, some think he still speaks of the Levites, and translate the words thus, "both to thee, and to thy sons with thee (they shall minister as was said before) before the tabernacle of witness." But they that are of this opinion do not consider what is meant by the tabernacle of witness, which signifies the most holy place (see ch. ix. 15, and x. 11), before which the Levites did not minister; but before the "tabernacle of the congregation," as Moses expressly speaks, ch. iii. 7 (see there), where they attended upon the priests in the court of the sanctuary, in which the priests only could minister: as Aaron alone did, upon one certain day only, in the most holy place.

Ver. 3. The charge of all the tabernacle.] Of the outward part of it (see ch. iii. 7, 8), and carry the vessels belonging to the inward part, viz. the sanctuary (ch. iv. 15).

They shall not come nigh the vessels] They were not to touch them when they carried them (ch. iv. 15), nor to see when they were covered by the priests (ch. iv. 19, 20).

The altar.] I take this to be meant not only of the "altar of incense," but also of the burnt-offering: unto which they were not to approach, nor touch it, while they attended upon the priests, who only could minister there. This is justified from Exod. xxix. 37, where this altar is said to be most holy, and whosoever touched it is required to be holy.

That neither they, nor ye also, die.] They for presuming to go beyond the bounds of their office, and the priest for permitting them.

Ver. 4. They shall be joined unto thee.] He would have the priests look upon the Levites as part of that sacred body of men that waited upon God in the tabernacle, though in an inferior office. And, indeed, the very name of Levi imported as much: and denoted them to be adjuncts to some other persons. Accordingly we find, in aftertimes, that as the Levites were a guard on the outside of the temple, so the priests watched within it.

And keep the charge of the tabernacle] See ch. iii. 7, 8. The heaviest part of their service, which is called their burden, is mentioned particularly ch. iv. 3, 4, and the rest of that chapter.

A stranger shall not come nigh unto you.] This seems to relate both to the priests and to the inferior ministers: that none should presume to perform the office of the former, but only the family of Aaron; nor of the latter, who were not of the tribe of Levi. But the Hebrew doctors, particularly Maimonides, by zar (a stranger), understand in this place every one that was not of the seed-male of Aaron: so that the sons of his daughters should not minister. For the sons of Aaron, saith he (Biath Hammikdash, cap. 9), are appointed, and none other, to lay things in order for sacrifice (Lev. i. 5), and to burn the fat of the peace-offerings upon the altar (Lev. iii. 8). His daughters were incapable of it; and so were all those that descended from them. The same may be said of the Levites.

gation, for all the service of the tabernacle: and a stranger shall not come nigh unto you.

5 And ye shall keep the charge of the sanctuary, and the charge of the altar: that there be no wrath any more upon the children of Israel.

6 And I, behold, I have taken your brethren the Levites from among the children of Israel: to you they are given as a gift for the Lord, to do the service of the tabernacle of the congregation.

7 Therefore thou and thy sons with thee shall keep your priest's office for every thing of the altar, and within the veil; and ye shall serve: I have given your priest's office unto you as a

Ver. 5. Ye shall keep] That is, the priests were bound to do what follows.

The charge of the sanctuary.] Where, as they alone were to minister, so they were to take care of all the holy things therein contained (the shew-bread, lamps, &c.), and to cover them when they were to be removed (ch. iv. 5, 6, &c.).

The charge of the altar.] Of burnt-offering; where they only were to offer sacrifice, and to take care of every thing belonging to it (ch. iv. 3, 14).

That there be no wrath any more] That you may by your care and constant admonitions prevent the children of Israel from running into such profanations, much more from such intrusions into the sacred offices as may bring God's most indignation again upon them.

Ver. 6. I have taken—the Levites from among the children of Israel.] See ch. iii. 12, 41, 45, and viii. 6, 16, 18. The Levites are again called their brethren, that the priests might not despise them because they served in a lower condition, but treat them with kindness and brotherly affection.

To you they are given] See ch. iii. 9, but especially ch. viii. 19.

For the Lord,] To assist you in your ministry to the Lord.

To do the service.] This hath been repeated very often (ch. iii. 7, 8, iv. 3, 4, 23, &c., viii. 19, 22, 24), and here is mentioned again that the Levites might be possessed with this opinion, that they were but ministers to the priests, and therefore ought not to presume hereafter to aspire, as Korah did, to the office of priesthood.

Ver. 7. Keep your priest's office] Preserve it to yourselves, and suffer no other person to invade it.

For every thing of the altar,] These words and the following, briefly declare what is meant by the priest's office. First, to offer sacrifice at the altar of burnt-offering, and sprinkle the blood, &c.

Within the veil;] Next, to perform all the service of God, within the sanctuary. For in the Hebrew the words are, "and for within the veil," which is a short form of speech, importing both all that was to be done in the sanctuary by the sons of Aaron, (as burning incense, putting on the shew-bread, and lighting the lamps), and likewise all that was to be done in the most holy place, by Aaron himself, on the day of atonement. For the word paroceth always signifies the inner veil, before the most holy place; the outward veil being constantly called masack; and therefore the exactest translation of the Hebrew words lemibbeth laparoceth is this, "for within the house (i. e. the holy place) for the veil;" i. e. within the veil, in the most holy place.

Ye shall serve:] In these places ye alone shall serve and employ nobody else.

I have given your priest's office unto you,] He would have the Levites to know, that Aaron and his sons had service of gift: and the stranger that cometh nigh shall be put to death.

8 ¶ And the Lord spake unto Aaron, Behold, I also have given thee the charge of mine heave offerings of all the hallowed things of the children of Israel; unto thee have I given them by reason of the anointing, and to thy sons, by an ordinance for ever.

9 This shall be thine of the most holy things, reserved from the fire, every oblation of their's, every meat offering of their's, and every sin offering of their's, and every trespass offering of their's, which they shall render unto me, shall be most holy for thee and for thy sons.

not arrogantly usurped this office of ministering alone at both the altars; but he had freely bestowed it upon them, and appropriated it unto them.

And the stranger] Though a Levite, if he be not of the family of Aaron.

That cometh nigh] Presumes to offer sacrifices at the altar of burnt-offering, or incense at the golden altar.

Shall be put to death.] This is repeated by reason of the late rebellion of Korah and his accomplices, who aspiring to the priesthood, came to a fearful end (see ch. iii. 10).

Ver. 8. Having told him in the foregoing part of the chapter (particularly in the foregoing verse) what should be the work of him and his sons, he proceeds to tell him what recompense he should have for his service at the altar of burnt-offerings and in the sanctuary. Of which he gives him a large account (from this verse to the twentieth), that he might want no encouragement to care and diligence in his employment.

I also have given thee the charge] He bids him observe the large grant which he now makes him, as well as the work he had laid upon him: for by giving him the charge of what follows, he means bestowing them upon him for his own use; with a charge to let none have them but himself.

Of mine heave offerings] See Lev. vii. 34, and below, ver. 11 of this chapter.

By reason of the anointing,] Because thou art consecrated, by being anointed with the holy oil to the office of a priest (Lev. viii. 12).

And to thy sons.] See Lev. vii. 34.

Ver. 9. This shall be thine,] He begins with those things which might be eaten only by the priests themselves.

Reserved from the fire,] From the altar of burnt-offering: for there were some things called most holy, which were their portion, that came not from thence, but out of the sanctuary; viz., the twelve cakes, which were taken off the table, and given to Aaron and his sons every Sabbath-day (Lev. xxiv. 5—9).

Every oblation of their's,] In the Hebrew, all their korban: which is a larger word than zebach: comprehending not only such sacrifices as were killed at the altar (which are properly called zebachim), but all the minchas, or meat-offerings (as we translate it), which were of things inanimate; and the sacrifices of birds also, whose blood was never poured out at the altar. And therefore korban seems here to be a general word, comprehending all the particulars which follow; especially if all be translated exactly, as the words are in the Hebrew.

Every meat offering of their's, &c.] In the Hebrew the words are, "for all their meat-offerings;" which makes the sense plainer, if the whole be thus translated, "All their korban (or oblations) for all their meat-offerings, and for all their sin-offerings, and for all their trespass-offerings;" of all which the priest 10 In the most holy place shalt thou eat it; every male shall eat it: it shall be holy unto thee.

11 And this is thine; the heave offering of their gift, with all the wave offerings of the children of Israel: I have given them unto thee, and to thy sons and to thy daughters with thee, by a statute for ever: every one that is clean in thy house shall eat of it.

12 All the best of the oil, and all the best of the wine, and of the wheat, the firstfruits of them which they shall offer unto the Lord, them have I given thee.

13 And whatsoever is first ripe in the land, which they shall bring unto the Lord, shall be thine; every one that is clean in thine house shall eat of it.

14 Every thing devoted in Israel shall be thine.

had a part. Concerning the meat-offerings, or rather the bread-offerings (for so mincha may most fitly be translated, the sacrifices being flesh, which were not eaten without bread and drink, that were their concomitants), see Lev. ii. 3, 10, vi. 15, 16, where the flesh of the sin-offerings, except those whose blood was brought into the most holy place, is given also unto them (ver. 26), and so are the trespass-offerings also, in the next chapter (Lev. vii. 6, 7). As for burnt-offerings, they were wholly the Lord's; and peace-offerings were not accounted things most holy, but reckoned among the less holy; as appears from ver. 11 of this present chapter.

Which they shall render unto me,] These words relate only to the trespass-offerings, immediately before named: which were attended with a recompense of the wrongs done, either unto the Lord (Lev. v. 15, 16), or unto their neighbours (Lev. vi. 5; Numb. v. 8, 9).

Most holy for thee and for thy sons.] To be used by none else; as it follows in the next verse.

Ver. 10. In the most holy place shalt thou eat it;] i. e. In the place where they performed their sacred office (in that part of the tabernacle next the sanctuary, which is called most holy, in comparison with the rest which were further off, because none might enter into it but the priests alone: see note upon Lev. vi. 16, where it is said expressly, "it shall be eaten in the holy place, in the court of the tabernacle of the congregation." And see ver. 26, and ch. x. 12, 13.

Every male shall eat it.] And none else, as the places before mentioned expressly limit it (Lev. ii. 3, 10; vi. 18, 29, vii. 6).

Be holy unto thee.] Peculiarly separated from the use of all other persons, but only Aaron and his sons.

Ver. 11. This is thine;] Now he mentions the less holy things, as before the most holy; which he bestowed upon him and his whole family.

The heave offering of their gift, with all the wave offerings] That is, the breast of their peace-offerings (which are here called their gift), which was waved before the Lord, and the right shoulder heaved; and then given to the priest for his portion (Lev. vii. 30—31). And so was the right shoulder of the ram, which was offered for the Nazarite (Numb. vi. 19, 20).

I have given them unto thee, &c.] These were not confined to the males only, but might be eaten by their daughters also (Lev. x. 14).

Every one that is clean in thy house shall eat of it.] Not only their wives, and their daughters that were not married, but those who were divorced or widows, and returned to their father's house without children; or had children begotten by a priest (see Lev. xxii. 13), together with their servants also, whether bought with their money, or born in their house; though not hired servants, or mere sojourners (Lev. xxii. 10, 11). But these things were to be eaten in a clean place (Lev. x. 14), somewhere within the camp, as afterward in Jerusalem (Deut. xii. 6, 7, 17, 18); and no unclean person permitted to eat of them (Lev. vii. 20, 21, xxii. 4). And besides, when any Israelite killed on ox, a sheep, or a goat for his own use, he was bound to give the priest the shoulder, the two cheeks, and the maw; as the Jews understand, Deut. xviii. 3.

Ver. 12. All the best of the oil, and—wine, &c.] The Greek translates the Hebrew word cheleb (fat) by μυλός, "marrow," Gen. xlv. 18, but here ἀπαργή, "the first-fruits of the oil," &c. signifying these first-fruits were to be of the very best of all the things here mentioned; which were to be brought in the beginning of the vintage, and of the harvest: the precise quantity of which is nowhere determined; but, they say, it was at least the sixtieth part of the whole: see Exod. xxii. 29, xxiii. 19; Deut. xviii. 4, where he speaks of the first-fruits which every private man was to offer; beside which there was a first-frut offered in the name of the whole congregation (Lev. xxiii. 10, 17). All which belonged to the priests as a reward for their services.

The firstfruits of them—have I given thee.] Our Mr. Thorndike thus distinguishes the two sorts of first-fruits mentioned here, and in other places; the one was to be taken by the priests at the barn and wine-press, as he thinks that here spoken of was: the other was to be brought to the sanctuary, viz. those mentioned Exod. xxii. and xxiii.; Deut. xxvi. 1, 2. The quantity of either of them being in the moderate account, a fiftieth part, as St. Jerome determines upon Ezek. xlv., which is agreeable to the Jewish constitutions in Maimonides, of First-fruits, cap. 2, and of Separations, cap. 3. But the Scripture (Ezek. xlv. 13) requires only the sixtieth part (see Rights of the Church in a Christian State, p. 210).

Ver. 13. Whatsoever is first ripe in the land, which they shall bring unto the Lord, shall be thine;] Some take this to signify the first-fruits of all other things besides corn, wine, and oil, mentioned in the foregoing verse. But it being a different word from that which we translate first-fruits (viz. biccurim, not reshith), it is most likely, he here intends, either the things first ripe (as we translate it) before the rest of the harvest and vintage, or those voluntary offerings of this sort which any one pleased to make; which seem to be intended in these words, "which they shall bring unto the Lord;" i. e. of their own good will, over and above the ordinary first-fruits.

The Jews generally understand by biccurim such things as are ripe before the rest, either in the field or elsewhere; whether they were wheat, barley, or any other sort of grain; or figs, grapes, pomegranates, olives, or dates; which they bound about with a rush, and said, "let this be for the first-fruits:" which every man might bring in what measure he pleased, none being appointed by the law.

Every one that is clean—shall eat] The whole family of the priests, if they were under no pollution (see ver. 11).

Ver. 14. Every thing devoted in Israel shall be thine.] Of those things which the Hebrews call cherem (a thing devoted), Moses speaks in Lev. xxvii. 21, 28. And they were either simply devoted, in such words flesh, which they bring unto the Lord, whether it be of men or beasts, shall be thine: nevertheless the firstborn of man shalt thou surely redeem, and the firstling of unclean beasts shalt thou redeem.

16 And those that are to be redeemed from a month old shalt thou redeem, according to thine estimation, for the money of five shekels, after the shekel of the sanctuary, which is twenty gerahs.

17 But the firstling of a cow, or the firstling of a sheep, or the firstling of a goat, thou shalt not redeem; they are holy: thou shalt sprinkle their blood upon the altar, and shalt burn their fat for an offering made by fire, for a sweet savour unto the Lord.

18 And the flesh of them shall be thine, as the wave breast and as the right shoulder are thine.

19 All the heave offerings of the holy things, which the children of Israel offer unto the Lord, have I given thee, and thy sons and thy daughters with thee, by a statute for ever: it is a covenant of salt for ever before the Lord unto thee and to thy seed with thee.

20 ¶ And the Lord spake unto Aaron, Thou shalt have no inheritance in their land, neither shalt thou have any part among them: I am thy as these, let this thing be a cherem; or with an addition (determining it to a certain use) "let this be a cherem offered by me for holy uses." The first sort was wholly the priests'; but the latter was employed about the temple, or the vessels of it, or the priests' garments. And these devoted things, which became the priests' portion, differed in this from freewill-offerings, that every thing which was offered as a cherem might be eaten only by the priests in the holy place; but other freewill-offerings by the whole family in any clean place.

Ver. 15. Every thing that openeth the matrix] That which first came out of the womb of any creature was to be the priests', if it were a male. If a female were the first-born, and a male followed next, that was not the priests', because it did not open the womb, as the Hebrews expound it (see Exod. xiii. 2).

Ver. 16. Those that are to be redeemed] viz. Of the first-born of men mentioned before (not of unclean creatures, which were to be redeemed by a lamb, Exod. xiii. 13), and that after they were eight days old (Exod. xxii. 30).

From a month old] Then the money was due, but they commonly stayed till the fortieth day, when the woman was purified.

According to thine estimation,] Some think this relates not to what follows, that the priest should set a value upon them (for that was a set rate, five shekels for every one), but to what goes before, that, after a child was a month old, the priest should appoint a day for the payment of the redemption-money; either immediately after the woman had lain in a month, or on the fortieth day, that she might be purified and the child redeemed both together. But it rather refers to what follows: for though the price be determined, yet so it is in another case (Lev. xxvii. 3, 4), and notwithstanding is said to be by the estimation of the priest; because he was to take this money, not according to the quality of the person, but as much of a poor man as of a rich, and not more of a rich man than of a poor.

For the money of five shekels, &c.] Which was the price set upon the first-born, when they were exchanged for the Levites (ch. iii. 46, 47). This redemption of every first-born was a matter of great importance, and therefore so often mentioned, as a very learned friend of mine, Dr. Alix, observes, in his Reflections on the last four Books of Moses, ch. 3. For as the separation of the tribe of Levi to God's service instead of the first-born, whom God spared and preserved in Egypt (of which we read in the third chapter of this book), made every Levite become a living memorial of that great miracle wrought at the Israelites' going out of Egypt; so this law concerning the redemption of the first-born made a further impression upon their minds, of that mighty hand of God which compelled Pharaoh to let the Israelites depart out of his country.

Ver. 17. The firstling of a cow, &c. thou shalt not redeem] For they were clean creatures; and only unclean beasts were to be redeemed (ver. 15).

They are holy] Separated by my appointment for a holy use; viz. to be offered in sacrifice; not redeemed, nor put to any other use.

Sprinkle their blood upon the altar, &c.] Just as they did with their peace-offerings (Lev. vii. 31, 33).

Ver. 18. The flesh of them shall be thine,] The whole body of the beasts (not merely some part of them), after the fat was burnt, became the priests' entirety.

As the wave breast and as the right shoulder] As these parts of the peace-offerings were the priests' (see ver. 11), so that all their family, who were clean, might eat of the flesh of these firstlings, as they did of those parts of the peace-offerings.

Ver. 19. All the heave offerings] He repeats what he had said in the beginning of this discourse (ver. 8), that he had given him all the heave-offerings; which comprehend those mentioned ch. vi. 19, 20.

Have I given thee] Settled upon the priests and their whole family for their support, by an unalterable law (see ver. 11).

It is a covenant of salt for ever before the Lord, &c.] i. e. An everlasting covenant, never to be revoked (see upon Lev. ii. 13). And these things being to be eaten before the Lord, there was a place in the court of the women where they feasted upon them; as L'Empereur observes upon Middoth, cap. 2, sect. 6.

Ver. 20. The Lord spake unto Aaron,] See ver. 1. 1

Thou shalt have no inheritance in their land,] i. e. In the land of the children of Israel, whom he speaks of in the foregoing verse; where, having told him what reward he and his family should have for his service, he bids them be satisfied therewith, and not expect any more. And indeed it was so very liberal a provision, that their desires could not reasonably extend any further. For as they had two sorts of first-fruits (as I observed, ver. 12), so, after a tithe of that which was given to the Levites, there was another tithe of what remained to be spent in sacrificing at Jerusalem: that is, for the most part, upon the priests and Levites, unto whom, and unto the poor, it wholly belonged every third year (Deut. xiv. 22, 28, Exod. xxiii. 19, xxxiv. 20). Add hereunto the first-born, all the sin-offerings, and their share in the peace-offerings, and the skins of the sacrifices (which alone, as Philo observes, were a great revenue), and it will appear it could not be so little as a fifth part of the fruit of the country that came to the priests for their maintenance, as Mr. Thorndike observes in the Rights of the Church in a Christian State, p. 211.

Neither shalt thou have any part among them.] part and thine inheritance among the children of Israel.

21 And, behold, I have given the children of Levi all the tenth in Israel for an inheritance, for their service which they serve, even the service of the tabernacle of the congregation.

22 Neither must the children of Israel hence-

When the land was divided, no fields, or vineyards, &c. were to be given to the priests, nor to any of the tribe of Levi. And, as the Jewish doctors say, they were to have no part among their brethren in the spoil. So Jarchi upon this place, and Maimonides, and others, who endeavour to answer the objection which may be raised against this from the thirty-first chapter of this very book, ver. 28, 29, where a tribute was taken of the prey they got from the Midianites, and given to Eleazar and the Levites. This tribute, say they, was offered because the spoil came by executing God's vengeance upon a land that was not theirs (ch. xxv. 17). But of the land of Sihon and Og (which God bestowed upon them, as he did the land of Canaan), nothing was given to the priests and Levites; for they were admonished to the contrary (as they understand them) by these words, "neither shalt thou have any part among them;" no, not of the spoil.

Certain it is, that of the land of the country they were to have no part, God having otherwise provided for them, that they might attend wholly to his service, and not spend their time in tilling the ground, or feeding cattle, which would have taken up their thoughts very much from their sacred employment. Yet the Levites had certain cities and their suburbs assigned to them, ch. xxxv. 2, &c. (which was executed by Joshua, as God commanded, Josh. xxi. 2, 3), whereby they were dispersed among the tribes of Israel, that they might the better instruct the people in the Divine law (Deut. xxxiii. 10; 2 Chron. xxx. 23; Mal. ii. 4, 5, &c.). By accident also the priests came to have some land (see Lev. xxvii. 20, &c., and my notes there).

I am thy part and thine inheritance] For they were maintained in his house, and lived upon his altar, and fed from his table; as it is explained in Josh. xiii. 14, "The sacrifices of the Lord God of Israel made by fire are their inheritance, as he said unto them:" which is given as the reason why Joshua gave them no inheritance. And see ver. 33, of that chapter, where the Lord God of Israel is said to be their inheritance; who, it appears by the foregoing part of this chapter, and other places, made such an ample provision for them, that if he had given them any part of the land of Canaan together with it, there had been too great an inequality between them and the rest of the tribes of Israel. For without any share in the land, their portion was far richer than that of any other persons whatsoever. I have said enough to prove this already; but it may not be amiss to set it before the reader again a little more distinctly. As they had yearly the first-fruits of the whole country, which were at least the sixtieth part of the fruits it produced; and the tenth part of the tithe given to the Levites (as it follows below, ver. 26), and all freewill-offerings; together with the money which arose out of persons and things devoted unto God; and all the firstlings of cows, sheep, and goats, and the redemption-money for the firstlings of such creatures as were unclean: so they had all the meat-offerings, offerings for sin, and trespass-offerings; together with the breast and shoulder of all peace-offerings, and the skins of all burnt-offerings; and the loaves made of the first dough, and the shew-bread, and (as Josephus and others ex-forth come nigh the tabernacle of the congregation, lest they bear sin, and die.

23 But the Levites shall do the service of the tabernacle of the congregation, and they shall bear their iniquity: it shall be a statute for ever throughout your generations, that among the children of Israel they have no inheritance.

pound Deut. xviii. 3), a considerable part of every beast that was killed for private use; besides the cities and land about them which were assigned to the Levites: which, if well weighed, there will appear a vast difference between the priests and the rest of the people. For the first-fruits alone, if they were not less than the sixtieth part of the product of the country, might seem sufficient, especially if the firstlings be added, the priests not being the sixtieth part of the people; no, nor the hundredth part, as learned men have computed (see Bonfrerius).

Ver. 21. Behold,] Now he gives the Levites notice of the recompense he would make them for their service, as he had told the priests what they should have for theirs. And Aaron hath the delivery of this grant made to them from God, that they might see he did not mind himself, and the interest of his own family only.

I have given the children of Levi all the tenth] See Lev. xxvii. 30, and 2 Chron. xxxi. 5, 6, where they are distinctly mentioned. Aben Ezra thinks the tenth rather than any other part was assigned, because it was a perfect number; ten being in simple numbers the highest to which we can arise, without repeating the numbers under it. For it is (as he speaks) the beginning of the second combination, and the end of the first, whereupon all numbers do depend: which our Mr. Mede hath expressed, in my judgment, far better; who looks upon it as God's favourable dealing with men, in requiring but the tenth, which is in truth the least part of their goods, according to the first division. For when we proceed beyond ten, we begin to make a new division, as eleven is ten and one, &c. But we need not have recourse to such niceties (see upon Genesis xxviii. 22).

For an inheritance,] Instead of a share in the land of Canaan, which other tribes had divided among them. And a larger inheritance this was than any other tribe possessed; for this was the smallest tribe of all, as appears by comparing the account which is given of them in the beginning of this book. For all the males of this tribe, from a month old and upward, were but two-and-twenty thousand (ch. iii. 29), whereas in the tribe of Judah alone there were above threescore and fourteen thousand men of war (ch. i. 26, 27), and yet the Levites had a tenth part of the product of the whole country; and the twelve tribes had only the other nine parts among them. Such a care had God of those who were peculiarly devoted to his service.

For their service which they serve, &c.] As a reward of their service, of which see ch. iv.

Ver. 22. Neither must the children of Israel henceforth come nigh] Or rather, "Therefore the children of Israel must not come nigh," so as to perform any of the offices belonging to the priests and Levites; who were appointed to do every thing belonging to the service of God there, and had their reward for it also appointed.

Lest they bear sin, and die.] Be punished with death; which is often threatened to such presumption.

Ver. 23. The Levites shall do the service] It was their work, and nobody's else; and therefore no other persons were to meddle with it: that is, they alone guarded the tabernacle, and afterward the temple;

21 But the tithes of the children of Israel, which they offer as an heave offering unto the Lord, I have given to the Levites to inherit: therefore I have said unto them, Among the children of Israel they shall have no inheritance.

25 ¶ And the Lord spake unto Moses, saying,

26 Thus speak unto the Levites, and say unto them, When ye take of the children of Israel the tithes which I have given you from them for your inheritance, then ye shall offer up an heave offering of it for the Lord, even a tenth part of the tithe.

27 And this your heave offering shall be reckoned unto you, as though it were the corn of the threshingfloor, and as the fulness of the winepress.

28 Thus ye also shall offer an heave offering unto the Lord of all your tithes, which ye receive of the children of Israel; and ye shall give thereof the Lord's heave offering to Aaron the priest.

opened the gates of it, kept out all strangers (i. e. all but priests and Levites), carried the tabernacle, and its vessels, when they were to be removed, &c.

They shall bear their iniquity:] They shall die for it, if they permit any one else to come there and do their work (see ver. 1).

It shall be a statute for ever—they have no inheritance.] As all other persons were excluded from serving in the tabernacle, so they who served there were shut out from having any inheritance among their brethren. This was made an unalterable law, which provided another separate maintenance for them, by the tithes of all the land; as here it again follows.

Ver. 24. But the tithes—which they offer as an heave offering] That the people might not grudge to pay them the tithes for their service, he represents them as a heave offering which they offered to God, in gratitude to him of whom, as the supreme landlord, they held their land. Not that they were heaved up or waved before the Lord: but they were of the same nature with those things that were so offered to him, i. e. holy things, separate to his uses; all which are called by this name of terumah (ver. 8). And particularly all the offerings which God required to be freely brought, for the building him a sanctuary, are called by this name of terumah, or heave-offering (Exod. xxv. 2, see there).

I have given to the Levites to inherit:] The Israelites gave them to God; and he gave them to the Levites for their inheritance; who had as much right to them, as the other tribes had to their land. Which was the reason he ordered they should have no portion of the land of Canaan with the other tribes, as it here follows; “therefore have I said unto them, Among the children of Israel shall they have no inheritance;” for he had given them the tithes to inherit. But R. Solomon Jarchi observes also, that the Levites themselves had no right to them, till they had taken out the tenth part from their tenth, and given it to the priests; as is here immediately directed.

Ver. 25.] In all the foregoing part of the chapter (ver. 1, 8, 20), the Lord spake unto Aaron (though by Moses), but here his order is particularly directed to Moses; because that which follows would better come from him, than from Aaron; who was employed in acquainting the Levites with the donation God had made of the tithes to them (ver. 21), but it would not have been so proper for him to tell them what was to be given out of the tithes to himself and to the priests.

Ver. 26. When ye take—the tithes] In these words Moses confirms the report which Aaron had made to them, that the tithes of the land should be theirs, and their brethren the children of Israel have no right to them.

Then ye shall offer up an heave offering:] As the Israelites made their grateful acknowledgments to God by offering their tithes to him, for the use of his servants the Levites (ver. 24), so it was but fit that the Levites should be so grateful as to offer to him the tithe of their tithes (as it here follows), for such uses as he should appoint.

Even a tenth part] For the tenth part which God reserved to himself out of the land which he gave the children of Israel, was a kind of rent paid to him their supreme Lord; and he, assigning this rent over to the Levites for their maintenance, thought good notwithstanding to reserve a tithe of this tenth part to himself; that thereby he might, as it were, hold his possession, and keep seisin (as the lawyers speak) of his own inheritance.

Ver. 27. And this—shall be reckoned unto you,] Be accepted by God, as the offerings heaved up to him in the sanctuary are (ver. 23), though it be but the hundredth part of the whole fruit of the land.

As though it were the corn of the threshing floor, &c.] As if you paid such a tithe, as the Israelites do to you, out of all their own fields and vineyards: that is, they were to believe their offerings of this small part to be as acceptable to God, as that of all the tribes of Israel; and that they should have the same right to what remained, when they had done this, as the people had to all the rest of the fruits of the earth, when they had paid the tenth part to the Levites.

Ver. 28. Thus ye also shall offer an heave offering—of all your tithes,] He would have them know that he ordered this, because he would not have the Levites alone offer nothing to him, from whom they received so much; but they also should make him a grateful acknowledgment as well as others.

Ye shall give thereof the Lord's heave offering] It is called so often the “Lord's heave-offering,” that they might the more willingly pay it, out of a thankful sense of what they owed to him, the donor of all.

To Aaron the priest.] This tithe is thought by some to have been designed for the high-priest alone. Two great men in their time were of this opinion, viz. Nicolaus Lyra, and the famous Alphonsus Tostatus. And another very learned person of our own (bishop R. Montague), thinks it not altogether improbable, that such a provision as this might be made for the high-priest and his family, state, and dignity: he being a man of great power and might, only less than the kings of Israel; and the inferior priests having a noble maintenance without this, from the first-fruits and offerings of the people.

But there is nothing to support this, but the mere letter of the text; for Josephus expressly says the contrary (lib. vi. Archæolog. cap. 4), and so do the generality of the Jewish writers, and St. Jerome also, that all the priests had their share in this tenth part by the Levites: which, till it was paid, the Levites might not spend, to their own use, any part of their tithe. And to secure this, “the priest was to be with the Levites when they took tithes” (as we read Neh. x. 37, 38), to take care that they set out a tenth part of them for the priests. Where by “the priest the son of Aaron,” I cannot think is meant the high-priest himself (for that had been below his dignity), 29 Out of all your gifts ye shall offer every heave offering of the Lord, of all the best thereof, even the hallowed part thereof out of it.

but some priest, I suppose, appointed by him, who took care of the concerns of the whole order of priesthood, and particularly of the high-priest's interest; who, it is probable, had a principal share among the rest in this revenue; perhaps a tenth part out of their tenth. But for this I have no authority: though I take it for certain, that when he saith this tenth should be given "to Aaron the priest," the meaning is, that, as it was not for himself alone, but all his sons had a share in it, so he himself was not excluded from an honourable portion of it.

It may seem strange, perhaps, that there is no particular portion set out for the high-priest by himself, if this be not it. But it is to be considered, that all the forenamed provision (from ver. 8, to ver. 20) was made for him in the first place, and for the priests together with him. For so the words run, "unto thee have I given them, and to thy sons" (ver. 8, 9, &c.). And he had this privilege also, that he did not minister by lot, as the other priests did in their several courses, but when he pleased; and might take to himself what sacrifices he thought good to offer (ver. 9, 10), as Maimonides tells us, in Cele Mikdash, cap. 5, where he speaks concerning the high-priest's prerogatives.

Ver. 29. Out of all your gifts] Not only out of their tithes, but out of all their other possessions which God gave them; their fields, for instance, which were in the suburbs of their cities.

Ye shall offer] Make a present to the priests.

Every heave offering] Some portion of every thing God gives you to possess.

Of the Lord,] As a thankful acknowledgment of the Divine bounty to you, upon whom he hath bestowed so many good things (see ver. 28).

Of all the best thereof,] And that not of the refuse, but of the best of the tithe, and other things that were given them: by which is not to be understood, that they were bound to pick out the very best, wheat snopse, and separate it from the worse (which would have been to have given them more than a tenth part), but they were to give the priests as good as they left for themselves. For that was the rule (Lev. xxvii. 32, 33). And it was but reason the priests should have this honourable provision made for them above the Levites, their vocation being more honourable, and their service more noble, in the very sanctuary itself: for which cause this tenth of the tithe of the land was assigned them; which, they being but few in comparison with the Levites, made the allowance to every one of them much greater than to any of the Levites. And yet, as an augmentation to it, they had the first-fruits and their fees, as I said before, out of the sacrifices and other things wholly to their own use.

31 And ye shall eat it in every place, ye and your households: for it is your reward for your service in the tabernacle of the congregation.

32 And ye shall bear no sin by reason of it, when ye have heaved from it the best of it: neither shall ye pollute the holy things of the children of Israel, lest ye die.

Even the hallowed part] The sacred part was the tenth part, which they might not use; it being taken by God for his part (Lev. xxvii. 30). By which all the rest was sanctified to the use of the owner, when this part was taken out of it, which may possibly be here also intended.

Ver. 30. Say unto them,] Tell them the reason why this tenth part must be separated from the rest.

When ye have heaved the best thereof from it,] Taken out the tenth part as an offering to the Lord.

Then it shall be counted unto the Levites as the increase of the threshing-floor, &c.] Then the remainder may be as freely used by them as the corn or the wine of any man's land in Israel, when he had paid his tithe: but till then it was unlawful for him to enjoy it, because God was first to be served. This is made more plain in the next verse.

Ver. 31. Ye shall eat it] After the hallowed part was taken out (ver. 29) all the rest was theirs, to be enjoyed as men do that which is their own.

In every place,] This seems to be said to distinguish these from the holy things given by God to the priests; which, being offered at the altar, were to be eaten only in the holy place; but the tithes, though they were a kind of offering to the Lord, yet not being presented at the altar, might be eaten anywhere, after the tenth part was given to the priests.

Your households,] All their family, servants as well as others, might eat of them, whether they were clean or not. And more than this, they might sell them to strangers, to buy other necessities with the money they yielded, or exchange them for other commodities.

For it is your reward] See ver. 21.

Ver. 32. Bear no sin] Suffer no punishment.

By reason of it,] For eating it, with your households.

When ye have heaved from it the best of it:] When they had taken out the tenth part as sacred to God's uses (ver. 28), they might safely use the rest themselves as they pleased: for God had given it to them for their support, and therefore would not punish them for eating it, as he did those that did eat holy things which did not belong to them.

Neither shall ye pollute the holy things] Nor would there be any danger of polluting the holy things (which God had reserved to himself) by turning them to a common use, as there would have been if they had eaten the tithes, or other gifts, before the tenth part, which was God's, was taken out of them.

Lest ye die,] In the Hebrew it is, nor shall ye die; as those did who meddled with the holy things which God reserved for his ministers alone.

1 The water of separation made of the ashes of a red heifer. 11 The law for the use of it in purification of the unclean.

I AND the LORD spake unto Moses and unto Aaron, saying,

CHAP. XIX.

Ver. 1.] They were both concerned in what follows ; Moses to deliver the command, and Aaron to see it executed.

Ver. 2. This is the ordinance] Or, "the constitution."

Of the law] Which is now passed into a law by God's command ; who had ordered this water of purification to be made some time before, as appears from ch. viii. 7, but now sets down a rule for all posterity to observe in the making of it. It is the rather mentioned now, after the foregoing history, to free the people from that great fear they were in of perishing in their uncleanness (ch. xvii. 12, 13), by showing them a way how to be purified from the greatest pollution, before they approached to the tabernacle.

That they bring thee] At the common charge of the people, because it was for their common benefit.

A red heifer] The Hebrew word parah, which we translate heifer, signifies a young cow ; as par signifies a young bullock, not above two or three years old at most, as Kimchi and others observe.

Without spot,] This the Jews refer to the word red, which goes before, and take it to signify perfectly red, without the mixture of any other colour : for as to any other imperfections, they are provided against in the next words, without blemish : insomuch that Maimonides, in his treatise on this subject, saith, that if this cow had two hairs black or white, it was unfit for this use. From whence other nations, particularly the Egyptians, derived the custom of sacrificing red oxen, as Plutarch tells us in his book De Iside et Osiride, τῶν βοῶν τοὺς κοκκίους κατεργεύουσιν, &c. And he saith they searched them so very narrowly, that if they found one hair black or white, they counted it ἀθύρον, "unfit to be sacrificed:" see Bochartus, par. i. Hierozoic. lib. ii. cap. 39, where he shows this was the most common colour among that sort of creatures in some countries.

No blemish,] See Lev. xxii. 20—22.

Upon which never came yoke.] Had never been employed in ploughing the ground, or any other work : for according to the common sense of all mankind, those creatures which had been made to serve other uses became unfit to be offered to God. Whence Diomedes promises Pallas a cow of a year old,

— ἦν οὐκ ἔω ἐπὶ ζυγῶν ἤγαγεν ἀντήρ,

"which no man hitherto had brought under the yoke" (Iliad, K). And so doth Nestor, Odys. 1, and the like Bochartus observes out of Virgil, Ovid, and others, in his Hierozoicon (par. i. lib. ii. cap. 33).

All this is very plain ; but why a young cow, rather than a bullock (which is commonly appointed in sacrifices), and why one perfectly red, is not so easy to understand. If we had any reason to believe that those superstitions were among the Egyptians in the days of Moses, which were when Plutarch or Herodotus lived, we might very probably say (as some men of learning have), that this precept was given to preserve the Israelites from their religion. For they abhorred to offer a cow, whom they honoured as sacred to Isis. So Herodotus ; they sacrificed males, both old and young, τὰς δὲ θηλάϊας οὐ σφιν ἔξεστε θύειν, "but it is not lawful for them to offer females" (lib. ii. cap. 41). And therefore God, it might be thought, ordered a cow to be burnt rather than a bullock : and for the same cause one perfectly red, because that was a colour odious and abominable to the Egyptians ; who fancied Typhon (the author of all evil in their account) to be of that colour ; and therefore offered him red oxen, as hateful to them as red men and asses were. Thus Plutarch and Diodorus Siculus. In opposition to which, it may be thought that a cow of this colour was acceptable to God, because hated and abhorred by those idolaters : but I look upon what such late writers say as of no authority in this matter. And as there is no proof of any such customs among the Egyptians in Moses' time, so there is a high probability that the whole fable of Typhon was framed out of the story of Moses, as Bochartus hath most ingeniously endeavoured to make out, by many observations out of that book of Plutarch, and other authors (Hierozoicon, par. i. lib. ii. cap. 34, p. 340, 341, &c.).

But supposing the antiquity of those superstitions among the Egyptians to have been as great as some fancy them, I cannot think, that if Moses had had any respect to them, he would have ordered such a great number of sacrifices as we read of in his law, without the least consideration of the colour of any one of them, and only mention the colour of this cow, which was no sacrifice. I rather think this perfect red colour was chosen because of its rarity ; it being hard to find a cow without any the least mixture of other hair. And though it were not a sacrifice, yet being designed to the same end, there was a respect herein to that great expiation which was made by the sacrifice of Christ : with whose blood, though the apostle did not compare the blood of this heifer (because it was not offered), yet he doth compare it with the ashes of this burnt heifer, put into the water of purification. See Heb. ix. 13, where, after the blood of bulls and goats, he mentions "the ashes of this heifer sprinkling the unclean." For they were a more extraordinary sort of purification than any under the law, of which we nowhere read but in this place ; nor of any command for the repeated burning of such an heifer to ashes (as there is for the anniversary sacrifice on the day of atonement), but only of the use of the water made of these ashes as oft as there was occasion. But of this it will be more fit to treat in the following part of the chapter.

Ver. 3. Ye shall give her] They who brought her in the name of the whole congregation were to bring her to Moses, as the foregoing verse directs : and he and Aaron were to deliver her to Eleazar.

Unto Eleazar the priest.] It is commonly thought that Aaron might not be employed in the following work, because it would have defiled him, and made priest, that he may bring her forth without the camp, and one shall slay her before his face.

4 And Eleazar the priest shall take of her blood with his finger, and sprinkle of her blood directly before the tabernacle of the congregation seven times :

him unfit to minister before God for a season; which he was bound to avoid, even when natural affection seemed to require it (Lev. xxi. 11, 12); yet a vulgar priest was not intrusted with this service, but it was committed unto the very next person to Aaron, who was to be his successor, because it was of very great weight and importance.

[That he may bring her forth without the camp,] As a thing exceeding unclean; more impure than any common offering for sin. For the greater the impurity was that was laid upon any sacrifice, the further still off from the sanctuary it was carried. The bullock, for instance, which was offered for a sin committed by the priest, or the whole congregation, was in part offered at the altar, but the far greater part was to be burnt without the camp (Lev. iv. 12, 20). And so was the bullock and goat, offered for all the sins of the people on the great day of expiation (Lev. xvi. 27): and the scape-goat, which was designed for the same purpose, was not so much as burnt, but banished into a land not inhabited, nobody knows whither. All which more particularly represented Christ in his sufferings, as the apostle observes, Heb. xiii. 11, 12, and so did this in part; having something of the nature of a sacrifice in it. For though it was not a sacrifice brought to be slain at the altar, yet it was intended to be used to the same purpose, for the cleansing of the people from the greatest legal defilement.

[And one shall slay her before his face.] Some person appointed by Eleazar (for it was not necessary a priest should do it) was to kill her without the camp. Where it is plain from ver. 5, 8, 9, there were more than one concerned in this office. But it could not be slain unless Eleazar was there; and it was to be done in his presence, who was the chief of the priests, to show that it was intended for God's service, though not offered as sacrifices were at the tabernacle before the Lord. And this is the reason, perhaps, why the care of this heifer is committed to Eleazar, and not to Aaron, because he officiated only at the tabernacle.

Ver. 4. Eleazar—shall take of her blood with his finger,] As they did in expiatory sacrifices (Lev. iv. 6).

[Sprinkle of her blood] In the sprinkling of the blood, as the Jews observe, consisted the very essence of an expiatory sacrifice. Therefore, though this was not a sacrifice, yet it had something of that nature in it, and may be called a piaculum, an expiatory thing; though nothing was called korban, "a sacrifice," but what was offered at the altar, as our Dr. Outram hath most judiciously observed against Abarbanel, who calls this red cow an offering for sin.

[Before the tabernacle] This rite of sprinkling the blood was never used but in sacrifices slain at the altar, in the presence of God; and in this red cow, which was slain in the prospect of the sanctuary; towards which the priest was to look steadfastly while he sprinkled it; otherwise, the Jews say, it was in vain: which shows that the validity of this act, and of the purification to be made by it, was to be expected from the sanctuary. For the blood of that heifer, whose head was cut off to cleanse a city near to which a man was found slain by an unknown person, was not sprinkled; being slain, not in sight of the sanctuary, but in a valley near that city (Deut.

5 And one shall burn the heifer in his sight: her skin, and her flesh, and her blood, with her dung, shall he burn:

6 And the priest shall take cedar wood, and hyssop, and scarlet, and cast it into the midst of the burning of the heifer.

xxi. 3, 4, &c.). And in this the Jews were so curious, that after the temple was built, this blood being to be sprinkled directly before the porch of it, they took care the gate Shushan, which was before it, should have lower battlements than any other gate of the temple had, that the priest might see the face of the porch of the house of God.

[Seven times] This signifies the perfection of the expiation that was to be made by this red cow, on whose ashes the Jews thought so much depended, that they took care the priest, who was to see her burnt, should be put apart in a chamber of the temple (called "the house of stone"), that they might be certain he was free from all pollution by a grave, or a dead corpse. For the ashes of this burnt cow being the great and only cleanser for that defilement, they took suitable care that he should not be defiled who went to burn her. See Dr. Lightfoot's Temple Service, chap. 17, sect. 2, where he describes, out of Maimonides, and others, how solemnly the priest was attended when he went about this work. And the apostle had reason to mention the ashes of this heifer, wherewith the water was made for sprinkling the unclean, as the principal thing that "sanctified to the purifying of the flesh," i. e. taking away bodily defilements: with which he compares the blood of Christ, as infinitely more powerful for the "purifying of the conscience from dead works" (Heb. ix. 13, 14). In which words, dead works, there is a respect (as our Dr. Jackson observes) to the main intention of these ashes, which were for the purification of those defiled by dead bodies. And he seems to me also not to be led by fancy, but by a solid judgment, when he considered these ashes also as a notable figure of the everlasting efficacy of Christ's blood, of which the apostle there discourses. For, if the frequent occasion for the use of the water of purification had not spent all the ashes of the heifer now slain and burnt by Eleazar, they might have been preserved for this purpose, without any danger of putrefaction, for a longer time than the law of ceremonies lasted. For ashes, being well kept, never perish; and therefore are an emblem of immortality. But it must be considered, that the frequent use of these ashes might exhaust the whole stock of them made at this time, and make it necessary the priests should burn another heifer for the same end; as the Jews say they did, though so rarely (as I shall note below), that this burning of a red heifer was not reiterated, if we may believe them, till the destruction of Solomon's temple. Which makes them a more notable figure, though not a perfect one (for no such can be found), of the power of Christ's blood to purify us for ever, without the repetition of it continually; which was the imperfection of the legal sacrifices, that they must be often offered.

Ver. 5.] There was a great pile of wood (to which they set fire immediately after he had done sprinkling), in which this heifer was more entirely burnt than any public expiatory sacrifice before mentioned, ver. 2, (for here the remainder of the blood is ordered to be burnt), because this was of all other things the most unclean, and to be utterly consumed at a distance from the sanctuary.

Ver. 6. Cedar wood, and hyssop, and scarlet,] These three things composed that instrument which the 7 Then the priest shall wash his clothes, and he shall bathe his flesh in water, and afterward he shall come into the camp, and the priest shall be unclean until the even.

8 And he that burneth her shall wash his clothes in water, and bathe his flesh in water, and shall be unclean until the even.

9 And a man that is clean shall gather up the ashes of the heifer, and lay them up without the camp in a clean place, and it shall be kept for

of those who had defiled themselves by the dead; unto whom it was delivered when they had occasion for it. And this word reserved, or kept, imports, that these ashes were not for the use of that generation only, but for all posterity. And as manna (which was commanded in the same form of speech to be kept or reserved in the ark) was a type of Christ, as he was the food of life, or the bread that came down from heaven: so were these ashes kept as an emblem of the everlasting efficacy of his sacrifice. For there is no bodily substance under heaven (as Dr. Jackson speaks, book x. chap. 55) which can be so true an emblem or model of incorruption, as ashes are; for being the remainder of bodies perfectly dissolved or corrupted, they are not capable of a second corruption.

Cast it] He speaks as if these three things being bound together became one.

Into the midst of the burning.] To denote the great virtue which the water, made of the ashes of all these things, should have to cleanse those who were sprinkled with it; one of these things (viz., hyssop) being ordered to be dipped into the water for that purpose (ver. 18).

Ver. 7. The priest shall wash his clothes, &c.] Though we do not find that Eleazar was employed, either in killing or in burning this heifer, which was only to be done in his presence, yet, having touched her blood, he became unclean; and therefore was to use these ceremonies for his cleansing, before he returned to the camp; as Aaron did when he had offered the great sacrifice of expiation, on the day of general atonement (Lev. xvi. 24).

Shall be unclean until the even.] So as not to come into the camp, I suppose, much less to the sanctuary, until sun-set; which was but a short time, considering the greatness of this heifer's impurity; this being the common time of remaining unclean for the smallest defilements (Lev. xi. 24, 25, 27, &c.).

Ver. 8.] This was a general maxim among the Jews, that the bodies of those beasts whose blood was carried into the holy place, polluted those that touched them: which is justified by Lev. xvi. 28. And therefore he that burnt this heifer, whose blood was sprinkled towards it, was to do the same as he that carried the scape-goat into the wilderness was also bound to do (Lev. xvi. 26).

Ver. 9. A man that is clean] Free from any legal defilement.

Shall gather up the ashes] They were the principal ashes, though the ashes of the cedar wood, hyssop, and scarlet wool, were also mingled with them; which, being taken up, were pounded and sifted, as the Jews tell us.

Lay them up without the camp in a clean place.] The Jews say that the heifer, in aftertimes, being burnt on the pitch of Mount Olivet, which was over against the temple, they laid up some part of the ashes in a place near that mount, for the sprinkling of the people; and another part was delivered to the twenty-four courses, for the sprinkling of the priests; and another third part laid up for a memorial in the enclosure of the court of the temple (see Dr. Lightfoot in the place before named). But there is no certainty of this, and it contradicts in part what is here commanded, that they should be laid up without the camp (see ver. 12).

It shall be kept] Laid up, eis διαθήσασθαι, as the LXX. translate it, to be reserved and kept for the use of those who had defiled themselves by the dead; unto whom it was delivered when they had occasion for it. And this word reserved, or kept, imports, that these ashes were not for the use of that generation only, but for all posterity. And as manna (which was commanded in the same form of speech to be kept or reserved in the ark) was a type of Christ, as he was the food of life, or the bread that came down from heaven: so were these ashes kept as an emblem of the everlasting efficacy of his sacrifice. For there is no bodily substance under heaven (as Dr. Jackson speaks, book x. chap. 55) which can be so true an emblem or model of incorruption, as ashes are; for being the remainder of bodies perfectly dissolved or corrupted, they are not capable of a second corruption.

For the congregation] This one heifer, being slain, and its blood sprinkled, and body burnt, afforded ashes enough to season as many vessels of water as the whole people of Israel should need. Wherein it was a notable representation of Christ's blood, shed for the whole world, "to cleanse us from all unrighteousness." Yea, they were sufficient for all the people, for many generations, though they had frequent occasion to use them for legal purification; wherein still they more lively represented the virtue of Christ's one sacrifice, which continues for ever. For the Jews say, this red heifer was killed but nine times, while their state lasted. First, by Eleazar here in the wilderness; which was not repeated till after the destruction of Solomon's temple, i. e. not during the space of more than a thousand years. The second time it was burnt by Ezra, after their return from the captivity of Babylon; and but seven times more, till the destruction of the second temple. Since which they have not adventured to make these ashes, but expect it to be done the tenth time by the king Messias, who, indeed, came to put an end to this and all other legal rites; not after the legal manner, but by offering himself once for all, instead of all other sacrifices or ways of purification.

For a water of separation.] To be put into spring water (which was always accounted more pure than other), by which those persons were to be cleansed, who for their pollutions were separated from the congregation; and those things also which had been defiled were restored to their common use. Ashes, all know, are of great use in scouring things polluted; and the ancient gentiles used them much in their lustrations, as appears from Virgil, Ovid, and many other authors. But the water into which they put them was prepared with magical rites, and, for the most part, was drawn out of some pretended sacred fountain; and sometimes it had a burning torch, taken from the altar, quenched in it; and in some places they put sulphur, and spittle, and other cleansing things, into it. In which, I suppose, at first they imitated this rite prescribed by Moses; but in process of time added many superstitions of their own to it.

It is a purification for sin.] In the Hebrew the words are it is sin; and we add, a purification, to explain the sense. For it was not a proper sacrifice for sin (as this phrase for sin sometimes imports, Lev. iv. 24), but had something of that nature in it (as I observed before), and may be properly said to purify or cleanse men from their sin, i. e. from such legal defilements as are mentioned afterwards. And the congregation of the children of Israel for a water of separation: it is a purification for sin.

10 And he that gathereth the ashes of the heifer shall wash his clothes, and be unclean until the even: and it shall be unto the children of Israel, and unto the stranger that sojourneth among them, for a statute for ever.

11 ¶ He that toucheth the dead body of any man shall be unclean seven days.

12 He shall purify himself with it on the third day, and on the seventh day he shall be clean: but if he purify not himself the third day, then the seventh day he shall not be clean.

13 Whosoever toucheth the dead body of any man that is dead, and purifieth not himself, defileth the tabernacle of the Lord; and that soul shall be cut off from Israel: because the water of separation was not sprinkled upon him, he shall be unclean; his uncleanness is yet upon him.

14 This is the law, when a man dieth in a tent: all that come into the tent, and all that is in the tent, shall be unclean seven days.

it may, in a less proper sense, have the name of a sin-offering, inasmuch as the body of it was burnt without the camp (as the great sin-offering was on the day of atonement), and its blood sprinkled seven times towards the sanctuary, though not shed at the altar; whereby it became a more complete representation of the sacrifice of Christ, especially if we consider, that this "purification" here mentioned doth not signify only one, or a few acts of purification, but a continued purification; the ashes being to be laid up as a treasure or storehouse (to use Dr. Jackson's words) for making as many purifications, or waters of sprinkling, as the Israelites should have occasion to use. For therein consisted the excellence of this purification, that the ashes were not to be made by burning a heifer every time the people had occasion for them; but the ashes of this one sacrifice (as we may call it) was sufficient for the use of many generations. Accordingly the apostle saith our Lord Christ, καθαρσμένων ποικίλαμενος, "having made a purification of our sins (Heb. i. 3), sat down at God's right hand;" which word purification, in that place, doth not signify one act or operation, but implies that by this one act of sacrificing himself, he was consecrated to be a perpetual fountain of purification, being still "the propitiation for our sins."

Ver. 10. He that gathereth the ashes—shall wash his clothes, &c.] This is one of the strange things which the Jews say Solomon himself did not understand (and Maimonides professes he could find no reason of, More Nevochim, par. iii. cap. 47, and the author of Sopher Cosri also ascribes purely to the will and pleasure of God, of which he could give no account, par. iii. sect. 53), that the same thing should both cleanse and pollute, as these ashes did, which polluted him that gathered them, and made those that used them clean from the highest legal pollutions. But this is not strange to those who consider that all those great sacrifices which were offered for sin (which I mentioned, ver. 7), though they purified those for whom they were offered, were very impure themselves, because the sins of men were laid upon them, as all our sins were upon Christ; who, therefore, is said to be "made sin for us (2 Cor. v. 21), that we might be made the righteousness of God," i. e. freed from all sin.

It shall be unto—the stranger, &c.] All proselytes to their religion were to have the benefit of this purification, as well as the Jews, by an unalterable law; by which was figured the propitiation Christ made for the sins of the whole world.

Ver. 11.] This long uncleanness by touching a dead body, was the ground of those strict injunctions to the priests about mourning for their dead relations; which is forbidden, lest they should be hindered too long in their ministration (see Lev. xxi.). He that touched the carcass of any unclean creature, was defiled only until the even (Lev. xi. 24), nor was he longer who touched the bed of him that had an issue, or his seat, &c. (Lev. xv. 5—8).

Ver. 12. He shall purify himself with it] With the "water of separation," mentioned ver. 9. Which seems here to be designed chiefly, if not only, for the purging of this great impurity, by touching any man's dead body.

On the third day,] Then he was to begin his purification, by being sprinkled with it; which makes it probable that these ashes were kept in more places than the Jews mention without the camp (as afterward near Jerusalem), and, it is most likely, in all the cities of the country. For it had been too hard for all the people, nay, impossible for those who were remote, to go to Jerusalem the third day after they were defiled to fetch these ashes; which, therefore, were kept in several clean places, where everybody might easily have them to put into water, and be sprinkled with it. For as there was no sacrifice, so no priest required to make this purification; but any clean person might sprinkle the water (ver. 18, 19).

On the seventh day he shall be clean;] Then his purification was perfected; but not without a new sprinkling on this day (ver. 19).

But if he purify not himself the third day, &c.] If he did not begin his purification on the third day, his sprinkling on the seventh would not make him clean. But it is very probable, that, though he omitted it on the third day, yet, if he purified himself on the fourth or fifth, or any day following, that being reckoned as if it had been the third, when he had made up the number seven, his cleansing might be completed.

Ver. 13. Purifieth not himself,] With the water of separation, in the manner before prescribed (ver. 12).

Defileth the tabernacle] If he approach unto it without this purification.

That soul shall be cut off] He was to die for it if he did it presumptuously.

Because the water—was not sprinkled upon him,] Because he neglected the means of his purification.

He shall be unclean;] Remain in his uncleanness.

His uncleanness is yet upon him.] Not to be purified now by this water of separation, but cut off from the body of the people. This still concerns those that came to the tabernacle presumptuously, being unpurified. If they did it ignorantly, a sacrifice was admitted for their atonement (Lev. v. 3, 6, 17, 18).

Ver. 14. This is the law,] Concerning such defilements as these, by the dead bodies of men.

When a man dieth in a tent;] Wherein they now lived during their stay in the wilderness; and the same law obliged them, when they came to dwell in houses, in the land of Canaan.

All that came into the tent,—shall be unclean seven days.] The meaning seems to be, that every person who came into the tent while the dead body lay there (or before the tent was purified), as well as they who were in it when the person died, should be unclean. For all the goods of the house were not made unclean but only all open vessels.

15 And every open vessel, which hath no covering bound upon it, is unclean.

16 And whosoever toucheth one that is slain with a sword in the open fields, or a dead body, or a bone of a man, or a grave, shall be unclean seven days.

17 And for an unclean person they shall take of the ashes of the burnt heifer of purification for sin, and running water shall be put thereto in a vessel:

18 And a clean person shall take hyssop, and dip it in the water, and sprinkle it upon the tent, and upon all the vessels, and upon the persons that were there, and upon him that touched a bone, or one slain, or one dead, or a grave:

19 And the clean person shall sprinkle upon the unclean on the third day, and on the seventh day: and on the seventh day he shall purify himself, and wash his clothes, and bathe himself in water, and shall be clean at even.

20 But the man that shall be unclean, and shall not purify himself, that soul shall be cut off from among the congregation, because he hath defiled the sanctuary of the Lord: the water of separation hath not been sprinkled upon him; he is unclean.

21 And it shall be a perpetual statute unto

Ver. 15. Every open vessel,—is unclean.] Because the air in the house, which was supposed to be tainted by the dead body, came as freely into such vessels as it did to the dead body. Tho. Aquinas fancies, that this law was made to prevent idolatry: for the ancient idolaters thought, that if a mouse, or a lizard, or such-like thing, which was dedicated unto their idols, fell into a vessel, or into water, they became thereby very acceptable to their gods. And he saith this superstition continued till his days; in which some women were wont to leave their vessels uncovered on purpose, in observance of the nocturnal deities, whom they called Janos (see Prima et Secunda Quest. 102, artic. 5). To abolish which superstition God required, he thinks, all vessels left uncovered, where the dead lay, should be polluted; i. e. not acceptable unto God, nor employed to holy, no, nor common uses. If such customs had been in Moses's days, this might be better applied to what we read in Lev. xi. 32, 33.

Ver. 16. Whosoever toucheth one that is slain with a sword] Or killed any other way, it appears by the words following.

Or a dead body,] Of a man that falls down dead of a sudden, or is executed for his crimes.

Or a bone of a man,] Taken out of a grave, or the grave itself where the dead body lies; as the next words are.

Shall be unclean seven days.] As long as if he had touched the dead body itself.

Ver. 17. For an unclean person] i. e. For the cleansing of one defiled any of these ways.

They shall take of the ashes of the burnt heifer] It is not said what quantity, therefore, I suppose, whether it were little or great it would serve the turn. It is observable, that the ashes of the burnt heifer are here called chattah (sin), which shows they had the virtue of a sin-offering in them (see ver. 9).

Running water shall be put thereto in a vessel:] The ashes being put into a vessel, they were to put pure spring, or at least river water upon them; which became the water of separation.

Ver. 18. A clean person] It is not said a priest; and therefore I suppose any other person, who was not unclean, might do this: as any such person might slay the heifer, and burn her (ver. 3, 5). But in this the Jews were so curious, that their tradition made this extend, not only to a person that was at present clean, but that never had been defiled by a dead corpse in all his life; and therefore tell us what devices they had to keep persons thus clean, for this very end and purpose (see Dr. Lightfoot in his Temple Service, ch. 17, sect. 2).

Shall take hyssop,] When the priests sprinkled the lepers, or their houses, with the blood of a bird killed over running water, he dipped hyssop, cedar-wood, and scarlet-wool in them (Lev. xiv. 4, 6, 7, 49, 50, &c.). But here the sprinkling being made by some neighbour, hyssop alone sufficed; which every one knows was a cleansing herb, and easily procured: instead of which the gentiles, in their superstition, used branches of laurel, or of olive; as we learn from Juvenal and Virgil.

Sprinkle it upon the tent, &c.] For the purifying of all the things, and all the persons above mentioned (ver. 14—16).

Ver. 19. The clean person shall sprinkle upon the unclean] Here he explains what was not so distinctly delivered, ver. 12. And I suppose both persons and things were to be sprinkled on both days, because he saith in general, upon the unclean; which seems to relate to all that is mentioned in the foregoing verse.

On the seventh day he shall purify himself, &c.] This seems to be meant of the clean person who sprinkled the unclean, and by coming near them, was in some sort defiled. But he was not to be purified by the water of separation; but only by washing his clothes, and bathing himself in water; and his uncleanness lasted but till the even, as it here follows in the rest of this verse (see ver. 21).

Ver. 20. The man that shall be unclean,] By a dead body, a bone, or a grave, &c.

Shall not purify himself,] By the water of separation appointed for that purpose.

That soul shall be cut off] As a contemner of this law of God.

Because he hath defiled the sanctuary] This and the following words are only a repetition of what was said ver. 13, for the greater confirmation of it.

Ver. 21. He that sprinkleth the water of separation shall wash his clothes;] Be reputed unclean, until he hath washed his clothes; which I suppose comprehends his body also, ver. 19.

He that toucheth the water of separation] As a man might chance to do, when he mingled the water and ashes together (ver. 17).

Shall be unclean until even.] And wash his clothes, it must be supposed from the foregoing words. For mere staying till even purified nobody, without some rite of cleansing. And there was more reason for him that touched the water, immediately to wash his clothes, than for him who only sprinkled with it.

Ver. 22. And whatsoever] Or, whosoever.

The unclean person toucheth shall be unclean;] He doth not mean, by the unclean person, him who was made unclean by touching the water of separation (for his uncleanness was so slight, that any one would think he should make nobody unclean by his touch), but the unclean person spoken of all along in this chapter; who was defiled by touching a dead body. He whom such a person touched was made unclean, and therefore was to wash his clothes, and not be thought clean until the even.

them, that he that sprinkleth the water of separation shall wash his clothes; and he that toucheth the water of separation shall be unclean until even.

The soul that toucheth it] Or toucheth him.

Shall be unclean until the even.] Not only he whom the unclean person touched, but he who touched the unclean person, or any unclean thing, was to be unclean till the even, and wash his clothes (as I said before) for his cleansing. No other cleansing was necessary for such kinds of uncleanness as these. For sacrifices were required only for the uncleanness of lepers, and of a childbed woman, and of a flux of blood, or seed: all others were purged without sacrifice.

22 And whatsoever the unclean person toucheth shall be unclean; and the soul that toucheth it shall be unclean until even.

By this nice care, which is here taken, about the smallest bodily defilements, God intended (I make no doubt) to make them sensible how necessary it was to preserve inward purity; without which they could not be acceptable to God, though they approached to his sanctuary. For these laws, extending to what was done at home, as well as abroad, were a plain instruction, both that it was not sufficient to be pure in the eyes of men, and that nothing could be concealed from the Divine Majesty, who sees what passeth in secret.

CHAP. XX.

Ver. 1. Into the wilderness of Zin] From Rithmah, or Kadesh-barnea, they came at last into this wilderness, after many removals to other stations, of which Moses gives an account in the thirty-third chapter, from ver. 19, to ver. 36. For God led them, by the cloud, quite back again to the Red Sea (ch. xiv. 25), and from thence brought them into this wilderness of Zin; which is quite different from that mentioned Exod. xvi. called Sin; for this lay on the confines of Idumea, as appears from ver. 14, 15.

In the first month.] Of the fortieth year after they came out of the land of Egypt. For Moses gives an account of the transactions only of the first two years after they came from thence, and of the last: the rest he passeth over in silence, being spent in tiresome journeys; whereby all above twenty years old were consumed, by one disease or other. In those travels he shows how, at several removals (mentioned ch. xxxiii.) they were led back from Kadesh-barnea unto Ezion-Geber (that is, from the north to the south of the shore of the Red Sea), in which journey they compassed the land of Edom many days (Deut. ii. 1), that is, many years. For, from the time they left Kadesh-barnea till they returned back again was thirty-eight years (Deut. ii. 14).

The people abode in Kadesh.] Not in Kadesh-barnea, which was their fifteenth station, and in the confines of the south part of Canaan (ch. xxxiv. 4; Josh. xv. 3), but another Kadesh on the confines of the land of Edom, towards the Red Sea (ch. xxxiii. 36; Deut. ii. 3; Judges xi. 17).

Miriam died there.] Four months before her brother Aaron (ch. xxxiii. 38), and eleven months before Moses; being elder than either of them. For she was near a hundred and thirty years old, as may be gathered from Exod. ii. 4, 7, where it appears she was not a child when Moses was born.

Was buried there.] In Kadesh, where she died. But we read of no mourning for her, as there was for Aaron a little after (ver. 29).

Ver. 2. There was no water] The water that hitherto followed them from the rock in Horeb now failed. Which happening just at the death of Miriam the Jews have a foolish conceit, that as her piety procured it for them, so she being dead, it was taken from them, and was restored again for the piety of Moses and Aaron. It is more reasonable to think, that God suffered the water to be discontinued for a time, that he might try the faith of this new generation, whether they were any better than their rebellious fathers, and withal, to convince them that the water out of the former rock was not contained in it, if he had not produced it, who could bring forth water out of any other place as well as that. Or, they being now going towards Canaan, and near a country where water might be had for money (or they might have found it by digging for it), God thought fit to let the miracle cease; that they might see he would shortly provide for them otherwise. For it is very likely, that, in their last station, where they were before this, at Ezion-Geber (ch. xxxiii. 36), the water that had followed them in all their journeys thither fell there into the Red Sea, and so was swallowed up; they being, as I said, to return towards Canaan, by places where water might be procured without a miracle. For being upon the edge of the land of Edom, when Aaron died, in their next removal (ver. 28, ch. xxxiii. 37), we read expressly that they presently after came to a "land of rivers of water" (Deut. x. 7). And, indeed, not long after they removed from Mount Hor, when Aaron died, we find, in the next chapter to this, that they came to Oboth (ch. xxi. 10), which signifying bottles, it is no unreasonable conjecture, that here they met with water, with which they filled their empty bottles. And, next to that station, they came to Ije-Abarim (ver. 11), "heaps of fords;" or, as the Chaldee expounds it, "the ford of those that pass over:" and then to the valley of Zared (ver. 12), or to the brook Zered, as it is in Deut. ii. 13, 14. And then to the river Arnon (ver. 13), and thence to Beer, where they digged a famous well (ch. xxi. 16—18), which, perhaps, they might have done before in other places, if they had made experiment; for Kadesh spake, saying, Would God that we had died when our brethren died before the LORD!

4 And why have ye brought up the congregation of the LORD into this wilderness, that we and our cattle should die there?

5 And wherefore have ye made us to come up out of Egypt, to bring us in unto this evil place? it is no place of seed, or of figs, or of vines, or of pomegranates; neither is there any water to drink.

6 And Moses and Aaron went from the presence of the assembly unto the door of the tabernacle of the congregation, and they fell where they now were, was in the border of a country inhabited.

They gathered themselves together against Moses] Just as their fathers had many times done; particularly upon such an occasion as this (Exod. xvii. 2, 3).

Ver. 3. The people chode with Moses.] Instead of condoling with him, and comforting him, for the death of his sister and their prophetess (as Abarinel observes), they came in a rude manner to scold at him.

Would God that we had died when our brethren died] By a sudden death, rather than linger away by thirst. They allude to the strokes upon their brethren, ch. xi. 1, 33, xiv. 37, xvi. 32, 35, 46, which one would have thought should have affrighted them from uttering such very discontented language (ch. xix. 2). But nothing will alter those, who will not lay to heart, and preserve in mind, God's mercies and judgments.

Ver. 4.] The very words of their fathers, presently after they came out of Egypt (Exod. xvii. 3).

Ver. 5. Wherefore have ye made us to come up out of Egypt.] They speak as if it had not been their own desire, but that they were persuaded to it by Moses to leave Egypt; who was sent to tell them God heard their sighing, groans, and cries, and would deliver them (Exod. ii. 23, 24, iii. 17). But in a discontented fit, nothing of this was remembered.

To bring us in unto this evil place?] They do not speak of returning to Egypt, as their fathers did (ch. xiv. 3, 4), but they repented that they were come out of it. So shamefully forgetful they were of all God's benefits, who had in a wonderful manner redeemed them from the heaviest slavery, and hitherto provided for them miraculously in the wilderness, which was a better place than such an ungrateful people deserved!

It is no place of seed,] i. e. Of corn.

Or of figs, &c.] Now they complain for want of other things, as well as water: wherein they still imitate their unbelieving fathers (ch. xvi. 14).

Ver. 6. Moses and Aaron went—unto the door of the tabernacle] To pray to God to pardon their sin, and to supply their wants.

Fell upon their faces.] As they had often done before, on other such-like occasions; particularly ch. xiv. 5.

The glory of the Lord appeared] Unto all the people, it is likely; as it had done several times, to silence their murmurings (see ch. xiv. 10, xvi. 19, 42).

Ver. 7. The Lord spake unto Moses.] From that glory which appeared upon the tabernacle.

Ver. 8. Take the rod.] That famous rod wherewith Moses had wrought so many miracles in Egypt, and at the Red Sea, &c.

Gather thou the assembly together.] This word edah signifying sometimes only the assembly of the elders, not of the whole people, it would be uncertain which of them he is bid to gather together (for it is a different word from that which we translate assembly, ver. 6), if the tenth verse had not determined that it was the kahal, or congregation of the people, as the word edah also signifies just before (ver. 8).

7 ¶ And the LORD spake unto Moses, saying,

8 Take the rod, and gather thou the assembly together, thou, and Aaron thy brother, and speak ye unto the rock before their eyes; and it shall give forth his water, and thou shalt bring forth to them water out of the rock: so thou shalt give the congregation and their beasts drink.

9 And Moses took the rod from before the LORD, as he commanded him.

ferent word from that which we translate assembly, ver. 6), if the tenth verse had not determined that it was the kahal, or congregation of the people, as the word edah also signifies just before (ver. 8).

Thou, and Aaron thy brother,] For the people were gathered together against Aaron, in a mutinous manner, as well as against Moses (ver. 2).

Speak ye unto the rock before their eyes;] To the first rock you meet withal (saith Nachmanides), and that is within their sight. For this is not the same rock out of which the former water flowed, as the Jews fancy; but quite different. Their very names are different; that being called Tzur, this Selah. That was in Rephidim, this in Kadesh; two very distant places. Thus Chaskuni; some think this the same with that in Exodus; "but it is not the same history. For the former was in Horeb, this in Kadesh; which is in the extremity of the land of Edom." But whether God pointed him to a rock, which was then in their sight (as he did at Horeb, Exod. xvii. 5, 6), or left him to choose any stony place, is not certain. But it is a mere fancy of some of the Jews, that, because God here bade them speak to the rock, Moses offended God in smiting it. For to what purpose should he take the rod, if he was not to smite the rock with it, as he had done formerly? Just such another conceit there is in Schalsechet Hakkabala; where R. Gedaliah saith, that he had given an account of this sin in another book, which he gathered out of various writers, and found there were twenty-eight different opinions about it: but he preferred this before any of them; that whereas God bade Moses gather the edah together, that is, the assembly of the people (ver. 8), he gathered the kahal; i. e. the congregation of the princes and elders (as he will have it), whose faith needed no confirmation (see Hottinger in his Smegma Orientale, cap. 8, p. 451).

It shall give forth his water.] The Jews puzzle themselves about this expression, which sounds, they think, as if the water was contained in the rock; and Moses only made a gap for it to gush out: but it seems to be spoken in opposition to the waters issuing out of the former rock, which had supplied them hitherto, but now ceased to flow; it being as much as if he had said, This shall give forth water as that did before: now it shall be called the water of this rock; not that of Horeb.

Bring forth to them water] Renew the former miracle.

Give the congregation and their beasts drink.] So that they and their cattle (which they fear will perish, ver. 24) shall be as plentifully provided for as ever.

Ver. 9.] From hence some conclude, that this was the rod of Aaron which blossomed; because he is said to take it "from before the Lord," where Aaron's rod was laid up (ch. xvii. 10). But this rod is so expressly called Moses's rod, ver. 11, which was the 10 And Moses and Aaron gathered the congregation together before the rock, and he said unto them, Hear now, ye rebels; must we fetch you water out of this rock?

11 And Moses lifted up his hand, and with his rod he smote the rock twice: and the water came out abundantly, and the congregation drank, and their beasts also.

12 ¶ And the Lord spake unto Moses and Aaron, Because ye believed me not, to sanctify instrument of bringing the former water out of the rock in Horeb, that I cannot but think this was the very same rod; which being there called "the rod of God" (Exod. xvii. 9), as it is at the first mention of it (Exod. iv. 20), it is very probable, that by God's order it was laid up somewhere before him in the sanctuary; though not before the ark of the testimony. For having been employed in doing so many wonders, it was not seemly it should lie in his own tent, as a common staff; but in the house of God, as a sacred wand. This, indeed, is nowhere mentioned, no more than many other things, which notwithstanding are plainly intimated.

Ver. 10. Moses and Aaron gathered the congregation] As God had commanded, ver. 8.

He said unto them,] Moses, who was the chief actor, said unto them.

Hear now, ye rebels;] The Talmudists fancy that this is the great sin for which Moses and Aaron were denied to go into Canaan, because he called God's people rebels: from whence they have framed this maxim, "He that treats the church contemptuously, which ought to be honoured, is as if he blasphemed the name of God." But they subvert the truth, who build it upon no better foundations. For Moses, the great minister of God, only uses God's own language to their fathers, ch. xvii. 10, where he bids him lay up Aaron's rod, "as a token against the rebels." And if this were a sin, Moses committed it again not long after this, and in a higher strain (which nobody can think he would have done, if it had cost him so dear), when he saith, Deut. ix. 24, "Ye have been rebellious against the Lord ever since I knew you."

Must we fetch you water out of this rock?] In these words, also, some of the Jews (particularly Nachman) think they find the sin of Moses and Aaron; who here (they fancy) ascribe to themselves that which they ought to have acknowledged the work of God alone. But this is without any ground; for the plain meaning of the words is quite contrary; "Is it in our power to bring water out of a rock?" So the Vulgar Latin translates it; it being a speech of those that wonder, like that 1 Kings xxi. 19, "Hast thou killed, and also taken possession?" As if Moses had said, "Strange! that you should think it possible for us to bring you water out of a rock, which is the work only of an omnipotent power!"

Ver. 11. He smote the rock twice:] It seems the water did not gush out at the first stroke; which made him repeat it.

The water came out abundantly.] So that their present necessity was supplied; and they also filled their vessels when they left this place, to serve them till they met with the convenience of water; as they did, I showed upon ver. 2.

Ver. 12. The Lord spake unto Moses and Aaron, Because ye believed me not.] Here interpreters have been much troubled to find what it was for which God was offended at Moses and Aaron: for though the text tells us expressly it was for their unbelief (whereby they gave great scandal, and did not sanctify him as they did formerly, before the Israelites), yet it doth not clearly appear wherein this unbelief declared itself. Abarinel hath collected several opinions of the Jewish doctors about this matter, which are no less than ten; after which he delivers his own, which seems to me as unsatisfactory as the rest were to him: for it is far-fetched, with too much nicety and subtilty, and relies also upon uncertainties. The plainest account of it, I think, is this, which none of them take notice of; that the water now ceasing at the same time that Miriam died, Moses was very sad both for her death, and, perhaps, for the ceasing of the water; and being unexpectedly assaulted by the people, who ought to have had a greater reverence for him, in a time of mourning especially, it was the occasion of a greater commotion of anger and indignation than was usually in him: which gave him such a disturbance in his mind, and so disordered his thoughts that when God bade him take his rod, and go and speak to the rock, he fell into some doubt, whether God would grant them the favour he had done before; either, because they were so wretched a people, that it was not fit God should do any thing for them; or because he thought, perhaps, water might be otherways procured for them. And because of this doubting, I suppose, it might be, that upon the first striking of the rock no water came forth (God also, perhaps, so ordering it, that he might try him); and hereupon his diffidence increased into unbelief, and a settled persuasion they should have no water. His anger also at such a rebellious generation, it is likely, made him the more distrustful, that God would do nothing for them. For both these are mentioned by the Divine writers that touch upon this history, that he did not believe; and that his spirit was so provoked, that "he spake unadvisedly with his lips" (Ps. cvi. 32, 33), which was when he spake those words, ver. 10, "Must we fetch you water out of this rock?" i. e. "is that a likely matter?" They being words of the same sort with those of Sarah, Gen. xviii. 13, "Shall I of a surety have a child, who am old?" that is, "I cannot believe it." And when he saw the water did not come out at the first stroke, he might be so rash as to say, "Now it is plain God will give you none, but let you perish:" or words to that effect.

I know nothing more probable than this; unless the reader likes the opinion of Joseph Abdo better, which is the ninth opinion mentioned by Abarinel. That Moses and Aaron, having had such long experience of God's goodness to this people, and of his readiness to help them, ought not to have gone and made their complaints to God about the want of water (ver. 6), but immediately, of themselves, gone to the rock (being confident of God's power and merey, which had never failed them), and called for water to come out of it. For now the tabernacle was built, and they had God dwelling among them (which they had not when he smote the rock at first), which ought to have bred in them the highest assurance that God would supply them. Dr. Lightfoot hath another conjecture (which I shall propound, that the reader may judge which is most likely), that Moses and Aaron began to distrust God's promise of entering into the promised land, at the end of forty years; imagining, that, if they brought water again out of the rock, it must follow them as long as the other had done. For this he makes the sense of their words, "What, ye rebels! must we bring water out of a rock, as we did at Horeb? Are all our hopes and expectations of getting out of the wilderness come to this? We never fetched you water out of a rock but once; and that was because ye were to stay a long time in me in the eyes of the children of Israel, therefore ye shall not bring this congregation into the land which I have given them.

13 This is the water of Meribah; because the children of Israel strove with the Lord, and he was sanctified in them.

14 ¶ And Moses sent messengers from Kadesh unto the king of Edom, Thus saith thy the wilderness, &c. Now that is gone, must we fetch water out of another rock? O ye rebels, have ye brought it to this pass by your murmurings, that we must have a new stay in the wilderness. Are we to begin our abode here again, when we thought we had been at the end of our travels? At this rate we shall never get out." Whereupon he presently smote the rock twice in a fume; whereas God bade him only speak to it (ver. 8).

To sanctify me] i. e. Openly to assert me to be the Holy One of Israel, faithful to my promises (as well as infinite in power), of which they had given the Israelites occasion to doubt, by declaring some distrust of what God said to them (ver. 8). For these words plainly show that their sin did not consist only in an inward diffidence, but in such outward expressions of it in their anger and impatience, as might be apt to breed unbelief in the Israelites; who were already too prone thereunto. And it is no improbable conjecture of a Jewish doctor (in his book of the Death of Moses), that the Divine Glory not appearing now upon this rock, as it did at Horeb (Exod. xvii. 6), which perhaps they expected; it gave some occasion to their unbelief: which, he thinks, was not so great a sin in itself, as to have deserved the following punishment, had not God, in passing this sentence, had a respect to the excellency and dignity of their persons; in whom a fault of this nature was far more grievous than in an ordinary man.

Ye shall not bring this congregation into the land] They brought them into the land of Sihon, and of Og: but not into Canaan, which was properly the land promised to them.

Ver. 13. This is the water of Meribah;] Called Meribah-kadesh, Deut. xxxii. 51, to distinguish it from that Meribah mentioned Exod. xvii. 7, where the Israelites are guilty of the same crime.

Because the children of Israel strove with the Lord,] Expostulated with him most undutifully, and accused him of unkindness to them (ver. 3, 4).

He was sanctified in them.] The Hebrew doctors differ very much in their opinions about this also, whether he was sanctified in the waters, or in the people of Israel, or in Moses and Aaron. Some fancy it is meant of the waters; viz. that God did himself great honour in bringing waters again out of a rock: and therefore the name of the place was called Kadesh, from his being sanctified there. Thus Chaskuni. But it seems to have been called so before this, being a place well known to the Edomites (ver. 16). The common opinion is, that he speaks of Moses and Aaron: for God's name, saith R. Solomon, is much revered when he doth not spare even his holy ones (Lev. x. 3). But Nachmanides expounds it of the Israelites, before whose face (as he expounds sanctified in them) God's power, and faithfulness, and goodness appeared: and who alone are mentioned in this verse; not Moses and Aaron. But all three opinions in the issue concur in this one, that God made his power, &c., appear in the eyes of all the Israelites, by bringing water out of a rock; and at the same time demonstrated his holiness and impartial justice in punishing his greatest friends for their unbelief.

brother Israel, Thou knowest all the travel that hath befallen us:

15 How our fathers went down into Egypt, and we have dwelt in Egypt a long time; and the Egyptians vexed us, and our fathers:

16 And when we cried unto the Lord, he heard our voice, and sent an angel, and hath brought us forth out of Egypt: and, behold, we are in

Ver. 14. Moses sent messengers] By God's order, as his words seem to import, in Deut. ii. 2—4.

From Kadesh] On the confines of the king of Edom's country.

Unto the king of Edom,] When the Israelites came out of Egypt, Moses speaks of Edom as governed by dukes (Exod. xv. 87), for the successors of Esau at first had no higher title (Gen. xxxvi. 15, &c.). Not long after, it seems, their posterity became kings; and now (nine-and-thirty years after the Israelites' coming out of Egypt) they were still under kingly government. And this king, to whom Moses now sends messengers, the great primate of Ireland takes to have been Hadar, the last of those that Moses mentions, Gen. xxxvi. 39, who, for his inhumanity to the children of Israel, was shortly after punished with death; and the kingdom turned again into the government by dukes. For Moses (as he thinks) writing the book of Genesis in the latter end of his life (or then adding what was necessary to what he had written before), reckons immediately after Hadar several dukes reigning all at one time, in several parts of the country which they had shared among them (see Usser. Chronolog. Sacra, cap. 11).

Thus saith thy brother Israel,] In the language of those times, all that were near of kin called one another brethren: and these two nations descended from two twin brothers.

Thou knowest] For they could not but have received intelligence before this time of such public things.

All the travel that hath befallen us:] How we, and our fathers before us, have travelled from place to place, without any certain habitation (see Ps. cv. 13).

Ver. 15. How our fathers] After several removals from one part of Canaan to another.

Went down into Egypt,] Which was so public a thing (they being invited by Pharaoh, who sent carriages for them), that the Edomites could not be ignorant of it.

We have dwelt in Egypt] See Exod. xii. 40, 41, and what I have observed there.

The Egyptians vexed us] See Exod. i. 11—13, &c.

Ver. 16. When we cried] See Exod. ii. 23—25, iii. 7, 8.

Sent an angel,] See Exod. iii. 2, &c. Maimonides here by angel understands Moses himself; for the prophets are sometimes called angels, i. e. messengers sent from God (Judges ii. 1). This he asserts in the first part, and more than once in the second part, of More Nevochim. But it is very unreasonable to think, that Moses would thus magnify himself to the king of Edom, who understood not such language; and could not but be the more moved to hearken to his embassy, if he believed the Israelites were under the conduct of a heavenly minister, who, as other Jews think, was Michael, the prince of the heavenly host, whom they commonly understand by the angel here mentioned. But many great men, particularly Masius, think this is short of the truth, unless we understand by Michael, the eternal Son of God, who was, as he speaks, "the perpetual prince and director

Kadesh, a city in the uttermost of thy border :

17 Let us pass, I pray thee, through thy country : we will not pass through the fields, or through the vineyards, neither will we drink of the water of the wells : we will go by the king's high way, we will not turn to the right hand nor to the left, until we have passed thy borders.

18 And Edom said unto him, Thou shalt not pass by me, lest I come out against thee with the sword.

19 And the children of Israel said unto him, of the people of God." For though he was then properly made the messenger of the Father, when he took on him our flesh, and dwelt here among us, yet from the beginning it was his constant care to reconcile men to God, and preserve religion among them. So that he might be called the angel of God before he became a man, because God the Father by him communicated with men about all things necessary for their good. And the Jews seem to have had some obscure notion of this: for what else could Moses Gerundensis mean, when he saith, the angel whom Moses saw in the bush was the same whom Jacob calls the God of Bethel, and whom he calls the angel Redeemer? of whom Moses, he saith, speaks in this place, and in Deut. vi. 12. "The Lord brought us out of Egypt." Certain it is, that thus the ancient Christians understood such places, taking the angel here spoken of to be the eternal Logos, or Word, as St. John calls the eternal Son of God: whose sense no man, I think, hath better explained than our Mr. Thorndike, who, though he confesses it to be plain by the Scriptures, that it was always an angel that appeared under the Old Testament, who is sometimes called by the proper name of God (Jehovah), yet this is no prejudice to what the fathers of the church teach, concerning the appearing of the eternal Word; who was that Lord who then assumed some angelical nature, wherein he might appear, to deal with men for a short time; after which he dismissed it, when he had done that business for which he assumed it.

Hath brought us forth] See Exod. xiii. 22, xiv. 19. We are in Kadesh.] Near to Kadesh; for it is not likely they were admitted into the city itself, which gave its name to the adjacent country.

A city] Or town; for it doth not seem to have been a walled place.

In the uttermost of thy border:] In the confines of the king of Edom's country; and belonging, it is likely, to his dominion.

Ver. 17. Let us pass—through thy country;] In our way to the land of Canaan; which God hath promised to give us.

We will not pass through the fields, or—vineyards,] They engaged not to turn aside, as they went along, into any private man's grounds (see ch. xxi. 22).

Neither will we drink of—the wells:] Which any private person had digged for his own use; but only of the rivers, which are common to all creatures.

We will go by the king's high way,] Keep in the common road, which is made for all passengers, by the king's allowance.

We will not turn to the right hand nor to the left,] Out of the road, but go straight on.

Until we have passed thy borders,] Got to the other side of the country of Edom.

Ver. 18. Edom said unto him,] This sounds as if the whole country had joined in the following answer.

Thou shalt not pass by me,] Go through our country (ver. 20).

Lest I come out against thee with the sword,] The king bids them not attempt it, for he would oppose

We will go by the high way: and if I and my cattle drink of thy water, then I will pay for it: I will only, without doing any thing else, go through on my feet.

20 And he said, Thou shalt not go through. And Edom came out against him with much people, and with a strong hand.

21 Thus Edom refused to give Israel passage through his border: wherefore Israel turned away from him.

22 ¶ And the children of Israel, even the their passage with all his forces. He was afraid, no doubt, lest they should seize his country, or spoil it, and therefore would not trust their declarations which they made to the contrary.

Ver. 19. The children of Israel] Who were sent upon this message (ver. 14). Or else some new ambassadors, whom Moses despatched with new entreaties after he understood his denial.

Said unto him,] Gave him new assurances of their honest intentions.

We will go by the high way:] Believe us, we will not step out of the common road.

If I and my cattle drink] Out of the wells before mentioned (ver. 17), which private men had digged, and therefore had a propriety in them.

Then I will pay for it:] For water was commonly sold in those dry countries, where it was very scarce.

I will only, without doing any thing else,] The Hebrew words ein dabar (which we translate, "without doing any thing else"), literally signify in our language, it is no word, i. e. not mere fair promises, but we will perform what we say.

Go through on my feet,] Go through, as fast as we can travel on foot.

Ver. 20. Thou shalt not go through,] He persisted in his resolution; and would not rely on their most solemn asseverations. Yet he consented (as appears by Deut. ii. 28, 29) to furnish them with necessary provisions, both of meat and drink, for their money.

Edom came out against him] For fear they should press into his country, he raised a great and powerful army to oppose them; and showed himself ready to fight them if they moved that way.

Ver. 21. Edom refused to give Israel passage through his border:] Which Grotius censures in his second book De Jure Belli et Pacis, cap. 2, sect. 13, as contrary to the law of nations; by which the highways, as well as the sea and the rivers of all countries, ought to be free for all that have a mind to pass through them upon just occasions. And he gives many examples of such permission out of heathen story; and therefore looks upon the denial of this as just ground of war with Sihon and Og (mentioned in the next chapter, where I shall consider it), as it might have been with Edom and Moab, had not God prohibited it. Nor doth the fear, he thinks, which the Edomites, it is likely, had of letting such a vast number of people pass through their country, alter the case; for no man's fear is to take away another man's right: and there might have been means contrived to remove this fear, by letting them pass through in small companies at a time, or unarmed. He had better have said, in my opinion, by giving hostages on both sides for the performance of conditions: for it might have put the Israelites in as great fear to have gone through in small parties, or if they should have disarmed themselves. But, when all is said, it seems not clear that all men have such a right, as that great man thinks they may claim. For no man can challenge a passage through a private man's ground without his leave; and every prince hath the same dominion in whole congregation, journeyed from Kadesh, and came unto mount Hor.

23 And the LORD spake unto Moses and Aaron in mount Hor, by the coast of the land of Edom, saying, 24 Aaron shall be gathered unto his people : for he shall not enter into the land which I have given unto the children of Israel, because ye rebelled against my word at the water of Meribah.

25 Take Aaron and Eleazar his son, and bring them up unto mount Hor :

26 And strip Aaron of his garments, and put all his territories that a private man hath in his land. There are many examples also, as Gronovius hath observed, of countries which have suffered extremely by granting this liberty (which show that princes have reason to deny it for their people's security), and the examples of those who have granted it, are examples of fact rather than of right; and of such as were not in a condition to refuse what was demanded (see Selden's Mare Clausum, lib. i. cap. 20).

Wherefore Israel turned away from him.] By God's command; who ordered them also to buy what they wanted of the Edomites (Deut. ii. 5, 6). For they stayed some time in Kadesh, by their consent, before they removed; that they might furnish themselves, as they offered, with necessaries, (Judges xi. 17).

Ver. 22. The children of Israel.] For they might not divide into several bodies, lying in several places: but all march together, when the cloud moved, in the order God appointed (ch. x. 13, 14, &c.).

Journeyed from Kadesh, and came unto mount Hor.] Another place upon the edge of the Edomites' country, ch. xxxiii. 37, where they pitched in a part of that mountain which was called Mosera (Deut. x. 6). Whether Mount Hor gave the name of Hori to him, who was the ancestor of Seir, and the first planter of the country, which was afterward conquered by Esau (Gen. xxxvi. 20, 30, Deut. ii. 12), or had its name from him, cannot be determined. But Hori, we are sure, was the first possessor (of whom there is any memory) of this mountain Hor, which was afterward called Seir (from one descended from him), and afterward Edom.

Ver. 23. The Lord spake—in mount Hor.] At the foot of the mount, as appears from ver. 25.

By the coast of—Edom.] See ch. xxxiii. 37.

Ver. 24. Aaron shall be gathered unto his people:] Shall die (ver. 26).

For he shall not enter into the land] See ver. 12. A manifest token that the earthly Canaan was not the utmost felicity at which God's promises aimed; because the best men among them were shut out of it.

Because ye rebelled] By this word rebelled, it appears there was something of obstinacy in their unbelief, mentioned ver. 12.

Ver. 25. Take Aaron and Eleazar his son] Speak to them in my name. For it is expressly said (ch. xxxiii. 38), that they went up "at the commandment of the Lord."

Bring them up unto mount Hor] This shows that they pitched their tents at the bottom of it in a place called Mosera. See Deut. x. 6, where this seems also to have been the name of the whole hill, as well as Hor.

Ver. 26. Strip Aaron of his garments.] i. e. Of his priestly robes (as Josephus rightly expounds it, ἐν ἀρχιερατικῇ στολῇ), mentioned Exod. xxviii. 2, 3, &c., wherewith he was clothed when he was anointed to the office of high-priest (Lev. viii. 7—9), which he put on, I suppose, in the camp, and went up in them to Mount Hor, that he might die gloriously; not in his robes, but immediately after he put them off to be put upon Eleazar his son: and Aaron shall be gathered unto his people, and shall die there.

27 And Moses did as the LORD commanded: and they went up into mount Hor in the sight of all the congregation.

28 And Moses stripped Aaron of his garments, and put them upon Eleazar his son; and Aaron died there in the top of the mount: and Moses and Eleazar came down from the mount.

29 And when all the congregation saw that Aaron was dead, they mourned for Aaron thirty days, even all the house of Israel.

put upon his son. For this stripping him of his robes was in effect the divesting Aaron of his office, that it might be conferred upon his son; which was done as follows.

Put them upon Eleazar his son:] Which was the investing him with the office of high-priest in which he now succeeded in his father's stead, and was by this ceremony admitted to it. The Talmudists say the manner was, first to put on the breeches, then the coat; which being bound about with the girdle, then the robe, upon which was the ephod, and then the mitre and golden crown (see Selden De Successione Pontif. lib. ii. cap. 8).

Aaron shall be gathered unto his people and shall die there.] This was said before, in short, ver. 24, but now the time of his death is expressly declared (immediately after he laid down his office, and had the satisfaction to see his son inaugurated in his room), and the place of it, upon Mount Hor. Of this phrase, gathered to his people, see Gen. xxv. 8, 17.

Ver. 27. In the sight of all the congregation.] That they might all be witnesses of the succession of Eleazar to the office of his father.

Ver. 28. Moses stripped Aaron of his garments.] This Moses did as the minister of God; who now translated the priesthood to another.

Aaron died there in the top of the mount:] And was buried also there (Deut. x. 6). For great and heroic persons were in ancient days usually buried in high places. So Joshua was (ch. xxiv. 30, 33), and Eleazar (Judges ii. 9), and Cadmus and Harmonia; who lived near the time of Joshua, as Bochartus observes in his Canaan, lib. i. cap. 23.

Moses and Eleazar came down from the mount.] After they had seen him laid in his grave by those that attended them.

This fell out in the fortieth year after they came out of Egypt, on the first day of the fifth month; when Aaron was a hundred and three-and-twenty years old, as we read ch. xxxiii. 38, 39, in the new moon of the month, which the Athenians called Hecatombæon, the Macedonians Lous, and the Hebrews called Sabba, as Josephus glosses. But that last word should be Ab, not Sabba, as Jacobus Capellus observes (in his Histor. Sacra et Exotica ad An. 2542), (which answers, he thinks, to the nineteenth of our July. And so the Hebrews say in Seder Olam, "Aaron died on the first day of the month Ab;" upon which there is a fast in their rituals in memory of it.

Ver. 29. When all the congregation saw that Aaron was dead.] i. e. Understood (as the word see is used Gen. xlii. 1), that God had taken him out of the world, as Moses and Eleazar told them; who also came down from the mount with him.

They mourned for Aaron thirty days.] Till the end of the month. For so long their mourning seems, in those days, to have been continued for great persons (as it was for Moses, Deut. xxiv. 8), though a week sufficed for private persons.

All the house of Israel.] Both men and women.

CHAPTER XXI.

1 Israel with some loss destroy the Canaanites at Hormah. 4 The people murmuring are plagued with fiery serpents. 7 They repenting are healed by a brassen serpent. 10 Sundry journeys of the Israelites. 21 Sihon is overcome, 33 and Ug.

1 AND when king Arad the Canaanite, which dwelt in the south, heard tell that Israel came by the way of the spies; then he fought against Israel, and took some of them prisoners.

2 And Israel vowed a vow unto the LORD, and said, If thou wilt indeed deliver this people into my hand, then I will utterly destroy their cities.

3 And the LORD hearkened to the voice of Israel, and delivered up the Canaanites; and they utterly destroyed them and their cities: and he called the name of the place Hormah.

4 ¶ And they journeyed from mount Hor by the way of the Red sea, to compass the land of Edom: and the soul of the people was much discouraged because of the way.

CHAP. XXI.

Ver. 1. And when king Arad the Canaanite,] In the Hebrew the words are thus placed, when the Canaanite king Arad: and so they are in the LXX. and the Vulgar: and Arad may as well signify a place as a person: nay, there seems more reason to translate the words thus, "the Canaanitish king of Arad:" because there was such a city in Canaan, mentioned Josh. xii. 14, and Judges i. 16. One of the sons of Canaan being called Arad (as both the LXX. and the Vulgar translate the Hebrew word Arvad, Gen. x. 18), who it is likely gave his name to this part of the country; the chief city of which was also called after him.

Which dwell in the south,] In the south part of the land of Canaan, towards the eastern angle of it, near the Dead Sea (see ch. xxxiii. 40).

Heard tell that Israel came by the way of the spies;] Which were sent by the king Arad (as many suppose) to bring him intelligence which way the Israelites marched. For it being eight-and-thirty years since the spies sent by Moses went that way; or rather, they going so secretly, that it was not known which way they went, it is thought not probable that Moses speaks of them in this place. But there is no necessity of taking the Hebrew word Atharim to signify spies; but it may as well be the name of a place, as the LXX. understood it, by whom it is translated Ἀθαρηίμ. And, if the situation would agree to it, one might probably conjecture the place was so called from the spies that went from thence by Moses's order to survey the country. For that was a thing so memorable, that, as it could not well slip out of the minds of the people of Canaan, so they found, I make no question, after they were gone, which way they came into their country (though for the present they passed unobserved), and ever after called it "the way of the spies."

Then he fought against Israel,] He marched out of his country with an army; and fell upon the Israelites as they passed that way.

Took some of them prisoners.] He attacked, it is likely, at first, only the skirts of their camp, where he surprised some of them, and carried them away captive, as the words are in the Hebrew.

Ver. 2. And Israel vowed a vow] It was resolved, it seems, that they should engage them; but the Israelites being afraid of them, because they were unexperienced in war, implore the Divine aid by this solemn vow.

If thou wilt indeed deliver this people into my hand,] Give us the victory over them.

Then will I utterly destroy their cities.] They vow to reserve none of the spoil to their own use; but devote it all to destruction. For such was the nature of this vow called cherem (see Lev. xxvii. 29).

Ver. 3. The Lord hearkened] He approved their vow. Delivered up the Canaanites;] The Israelites vanquished their army.

They utterly destroyed them] Utterly devoted them to destruction, according to their vow. For they did not now actually destroy them, they remaining when Joshua came to Canaan, who executed this cherem, or curse, upon them (ch. xii. 14), which, if it had been executed now, they must have entered into the land of Canaan at this time; from whence we cannot imagine they would have returned, to march further about before they got into it; but have gone on to prosecute their victory, by subduing the country, as they had begun.

Hormah.] From the cherem (or herem as some write it) which was pronounced against it; which, when it was put in execution, this name became more proper to it (Judges i. 17).

Ver. 4. They journeyed from mount Hor] Where their camp was pitched, when the king of Arad assaulted them; and whither they returned, after they had overthrown him.

By the way of the Red Sea,] Towards Ezion-Gaber, as we read Dent. ii. 8.

To compass the land of Edom;] Which extended itself unto the Red Sea.

The soul of the people was much discouraged] The word we translate discouraged, signifies two things; to faint, and to breathe short, through the anguish and bitterness of one's spirit (Exod. vi. 9). And secondly, to be angry at, or at least impatient, by reason of some trouble. And so it may be best taken in this place (as Buxtorfius observes, in Histor. Serr. Anei, cap. 1), not simply for their being tired, with a tedious, long, and troublesome march; but that accompanied with no small indignation and wrath: which did not only burn within, but broke out into words of great impatience, as appears by what follows. Whence the Hebrew words ketzar-ruach (short of spirit) signify angry, or hasty, Prov. xiv. 29, and in Job xxi. 4, we translate it troubled, and Zech. xi. 8, loathed; where it had better been translated, "I was angry with them." Now that which made the people thus fret, or faint (if we will have it so interpreted), was the way wherein they were now led, which was about the land of Edom. For when they were come towards Canaan, in the middle of the fortieth year (at the end of which they were promised to enter in and possess it), they are carried back again towards the Red Sea, whither God had sent their fathers after they had brought a false report upon the land (ch. xiv. 25). This made them think, perhaps, that they should never come to Canaan; or, at least, it was tedious to march such a great way about, after they had been kept so long from their inheritance, and were lately in such hopes of it, when Moses demanded a passage into it through the country of Edom.

5 And the people spake against God, and against Moses, Wherefore have ye brought us up out of Egypt to die in the wilderness? for there is no bread, neither is there any water; and our soul loatheth this light bread.

Ver. 5. The people spake against God, and against Moses.] This shows they were in a very great rage, which made them so forgetful of their duty, as to charge God himself with ill conduct: whereas their fathers were wont only to murmur against Moses and Aaron.

Wherefore have ye brought us up out of Egypt?] The Hebrew word heolithunu (made us to go up) is a strange word (as Dr. Lightfoot calls it) in this language; declaring the great fume they were in when they uttered it.

To die in the wilderness?] As if they had said (so Abarbanel explains it), What can we expect or hope for but death from this long stay in the wilderness?

For there is no bread, neither is there any water;] For we want the most necessary things for the support of life (as he also well explains it), which they spake in a rage; for they had both, by a miraculous providence over them. They themselves immediately confess they had manna; and that they lately received water out of a rock. But nothing would satisfy, unless they were brought to a country where bread and water were to be had without a miracle. For the meaning of their complaint was, that God did not deal with them as he did with other people, who (to speak in our phrase) do not live from hand to mouth, as the Israelites did, who had bread given them only to suffice for one day, and no more; and that such bread as they despised. It is likely, also, they began now to want water again, which did not follow them, as formerly, out of the rock; and what they had in their vessels, perhaps, was near spent.

Our soul loatheth this light bread.] As for the bread God bestowed upon them, they were so far from being satisfied with it, that they loathe it, and call it by the scornful name of light bread. So we translate the Hebrew word hakkilkel; which, being the doubling of a word which signifies light or vile in that language, imports as much as very despicable, exceeding vile; or, as the LXX. translate it, very empty; having no substance in it to fill their stomachs. So Abarbanel expounds this passage, "We are tired with long journeys, which require more solid bread than this to support us."

Ver. 6. The Lord sent fiery serpents among the people.] So most of the Jews translate this place; taking seraphim for an adjective (as grammarians speak), and consequently rightly translated fiery. But there are those who take it to signify a peculiar sort of serpents; being added to nechashim (serpents) by way of apposition (as they speak), and signifying such serpents as the Greeks call πυρροσπίς and καυσαυγίς, which Pliny reckons among the sceleratissimi serpentes, "most pernicious serpents" (lib. xxiv. cap. 13). Or, as others will have it, those called δαΐδαϊς, because they made great inflammations in men's bodies, and an unquenchable thirst, being also of a flame colour. But the famous Bochartus hath alleged a great many arguments to prove that they were a sort of serpents called hydrus, because in winter they lived in fens and marshes; which being dried up in summer, they were called cherydrus, because then they lived in dry places, and in the hot season had a most sharp, stinging poison, which, as Nicander saith, made such inflammations as brought upon him that was stung by them, ἀγρυα υπρία, innumerable griefs. See Hierozoicon, par. ii. lib. iii. cap. 13, where he

6 And the Lord sent fiery serpents among the people, and they bit the people; and much people of Israel died.

7 ¶ Therefore the people came to Moses, and said, We have sinned, for we have spoken against shows also they were flying serpents, of which the prophet Isaiah speaks, ch. xix. 29, xxx. 6; and that now was a hot season, wherein they were wont to be most venomous. For Aaron dying the first day of the fifth month (which answers to the nineteenth of our July), and they mourning for him thirty days; after which followed their encounter with the Canaanites, and then this murmuring, and this punishment; it must fall out in the latter end of August, when the dog-days were going out (see Vossius De Orig. et Progressu Idolol. lib. iv. cap. 56).

They bit the people;] This Aben Ezra and others think was a punishment suitable to their sin, which was evil-speaking against the Lord, by calumniating his providence. For Solomon compares a calumniator to a serpent, which bites if he be not charmed (Eccles. x. 11).

It is a strange fancy of Fortunatus Licetus, that Moses here speaks of a disease bred in the body which in children is called dracunculus, and not of the biting of serpents from without (lib. De Ortu Spontaneo Viventium, cap. 51). For which there is no ground at all; and, on the contrary, nothing more certain, than that, in Arabia, and Egypt, and other countries of Africa, there are such serpents as are here described. Yet Bartholinus seems to think that this opinion may be defended against Ezekiel de Castro, who confuted it (see Epistol. Medic. Centur. i. Epist. 32).

Much people of Israel died.] The whole wilderness, through which the Israelites marched so many years, was full of fiery serpents and scorpions, as Moses's words import, Deut. viii. 15, which makes it the more wonderful, that we never hear of their being bitten and killed by them until now. But it is to be considered that they were protected by the cloud from this, and from all other dangers (as the Hebrews well observe), which now withdrew its shadow from them, and let in the serpents upon them. Or rather (as Moses here expressly saith), God, who had hitherto kept them off, now sent them, and, perhaps, brought them from remote parts of the wilderness to infest the whole congregation.

Ver. 7. The people came to Moses, and said, We have sinned.] It doth not appear whether they were immediately sensible of their sin, and confessed it, upon the biting of the serpents and the direful effects of it, or stayed till there had been a great mortality among them. It is likely they instantly made their addresses to him; but before a remedy was found out, by erecting the brazen serpent, many of them perished.

Proy unto the Lord, that he take away the serpents from us.] In the Hebrew the words are, "take away the serpent," in the singular number; about which the Jews make a great many curious observations, as if there was one evil angel that governed them all. And if there be any truth in this observation, we Christians cannot but think these words point to "the old serpent the devil," who lost his sting by the lifting up of Christ on the cross; as the brazen serpent, it here follows, was lifted up for the cure of the biting of those serpents. But the simple truth is, that in this language the singular number is often used collec- the LORD, and against thee; pray unto the LORD, that he take away the serpents from us. And Moses prayed for the people.

8 And the LORD said unto Moses, Make thee

tively for the plural; as in Exod. viii. 6, "The frog came up and covered the land," i. e. a vast multitude of frogs. And so Moses speaks in the place just now named, Deut. viii. 15, where he calls this wilderness wherein they travelled, "a place of a fiery serpent and scorpion;" i. e. saith Jonathan, full of such creatures.

Moses prayed for the people.] Here R. Bechai and others observe the great meekness and charity of Moses, and thence draw this instruction: that he of whom any one asks pardon for an offence, ought not to be hard-hearted, but ready to forgive. Thus Abraham prayed for Abimelech, Gen. xx. 17, Job for his friends, ch. xlii. 10. It would be a sin to do otherwise (1 Sam. xii. 19, 20, 23).

Ver. 8. The Lord said] In answer to his prayer.

Make thee a fiery serpent.] The figure of one of those serpents which bite the people. Abarbinel thinks that upon Moses's prayer the serpents were removed; but still there remained many among the people sorely afflicted by the venomous effects of their biting, for whose cure God graciously gave this direction.

It is something strange, that any learned Christian should so much admire the Egyptian learning as not to forbear the mention of their incantations of serpents, when they speak of this relation which Moses makes concerning the brazen serpent which God ordered him to set up. Yet Sir John Marsham (in his Chronicon, sect. 9), when he comes to treat of this station of the Israelites at Tsalmona, hath a long discourse to show how famous the Egyptians and other nations were in this sort of magic; and thus concludes it, that Moses, putting this brazen serpent upon a perch, non tam serpentes igneos incantabat ne nocerent, quam eorum venenum extinguebat, "did not so much charm these serpents that they should not hurt, as extinguish their venom." This seems to me a scabby intimation, that Moses had their practices in his mind, but went beyond them. He should have said, Moses abominated their wicked arts (if they had any such in those days), and directed the Israelites to look up to God for healing. So the Jews themselves, particularly Aben Ezra, who takes notice that some superstitious people fancied that this serpent was a talisman, made to receive I know not what influence from the stars. But God forbid, saith he, God forbid we should have any such thought! This was made by the Divine order; the reason of which let us not scrupulously search: they thought, that is, there was something extraordinary in it, as Jonathan plainly declares in his paraphrase of the last words of this verse: "he shall be healed if he direct his heart to the name of the Word of the Lord:" where no Christian can forbear to think of our blessed Saviour, the eternal Word, who was prefigured (as I shall show in the following verse) by the erecting of this serpent here mentioned upon a pole, that all might look upon him and live.

Set it upon a pole.] So high that every one in the camp might see it. For the word signifies such a pole as made their ensign or banner, to which all the army was to resort. Concerning this word nes, see Bootius, lib. ii. cap. 4.

When he looked upon it,] The Jews generally have so much understanding as to say, that the mere beholding of it did not cure them; but that they were to look up to God (as the Scripture speaks) when a fiery serpent, and set it upon a pole: and it shall come to pass, that every one that is bitten, when he looketh upon it, shall live.

9 And Moses made a serpent of brass, and they beheld it, and expect a cure from him. So the author of the Book of Wisdom, ch. xvi. 7, "He that turned himself towards it was not healed by the thing which he saw, but by thee, that art the Saviour of all." And therefore he calls it, in the foregoing verse, "A sign of salvation, to put them in remembrance of the commandment of the law."

Shall live.] Be cured, and restored to perfect health: which the Jews think the greater miracle, because naturally it would have made the inflammation greater. So Nachmanides: This rather would have increased the disease; for they who are bit by venomous beasts (according to the prescriptions of physicians), must not see the image of the beast by whom they are bitten: but this was commanded by God, that the Israelites might know both their disease and their medicine came from God, who made that whose aspect was hurtful to be the means of their cure.

Ver. 9. Moses made a serpent] Whence this place seems to have been called Zalmonah (ch. xxxiii. 41), which imports an image, similitude, or resemblance of a thing represented by it. And another place thereabouts, as Dr. Lightfoot observes, called Maaheh Akrabim, seems to have had its name from the same thing, it signifying "the going up of scorpions," Josh. xv. 3.

Of brass.] Polished, that it might resemble a serpent of a flaming colour; and being very glittering, it might be the better seen far and near. So several of the Hebrew writers, particularly Nachmanides and Abarbinel, who observe, that God did not bid him make a serpent of brass, but only a saraph (ver. 8), i. e. a resemblance of a flaming serpent: which could not be made so well of any other metal as of brass; those saraphs (which we render fiery serpents) being fiery red, like copper or brass: of which there was a good store not far off from this place; for the next station to Zalmonah, where they now were, was Punon, or Pinon, as Moses tells us, ch. xxxiii. 42, a place belonging to the Edmonites (who had an ancient duke of this name, Gen. xxxvi. 41. 1 Chron. i. 52) famous for mines of brass, as Bochartus shows out of several of the fathers; who speak of χαλκῶν μέταλλα ἐν φαινοῖ. From whence Moses, perhaps, had this brass (Hierozoicon, par. ii. lib. iii. cap. 13).

Put it upon a pole,] As he had been directed in the foregoing verse.

If a serpent had bitten any man,] Which was not present death, but conceived an inflammation, and such ulcers (as some conceive) as were incurable.

When he beheld the serpent of brass, he lived.] Though naturalists say the sight of brass was hurtful to those who were bitten, yet hence they received their cure: as the sight of Christ crucified naturally filled his crucifiers only with anguish, when they beheld him whom they had pierced, and were convinced he was their Messiah; but by the grace of God, became their only salvation through faith in him.

The Hebrews cannot but acknowledge a mystery in this brazen serpent, as Moses Gerundensis calls it; which our Lord Christ himself hath explained in his discourse with Nicodemus (John iii. 14): "As Moses lifted up the serpent in the wilderness, even so must the Son of man be lifted up; that whosoever believeth in him should not perish," &c. Where he doth not compare himself to the brazen serpent put it upon a pole, and it came to pass, that if a serpent had bitten any man, when he beheld the serpent of brass, he lived.

10 ¶ And the children of Israel set forward, and pitched in Oboth.

11 And they journeyed from Oboth, and

(for what likeness can there be found between the serpent and the Seed of the woman; or how should light be forshadowed by darkness? as Dr. Jackson speaks), but he compares the lifting up of this serpent on the pole, with his lifting up, or crucifixion on the cross; for so he himself expresses his death, and the manner of it (John xii. 32), "And I, if I be lifted up from the earth, will draw all men unto me." And their looking on the serpent in the wilderness, as evidently represented men's believing on Christ; and their cure, the powerful virtue of Christ's death to preserve all those that believe on him from perishing (as he speaks in the place named before), and procure for them everlasting life. For by his death, our Saviour "destroyed him that had the power of death, that is, the devil" (as the apostle's words are, Heb. ii. 14), which was notably represented in this brazen serpent put upon a pole; which was not a figure of Christ, but of the old serpent himself (the devil), as wounded, bruised, and dead, by the lifting up of Christ upon the cross; where he entirely disarmed him of all his power to hurt us.

I cannot tell whence Justin Martyr concluded this brazen serpent to have been made in the form of a cross, as he saith it was in his Second Apology; unless we conceive it to have been made with wings at the bottom of its neck, which might give it that figure. But his observation in his book against Trypho (p. 322, 338) seems very considerable; that there must be some mystery in it, that God, who forbade all manner of images, should now command one to be made: of which, he saith, one of the Jews confessed he could never hear a reason from their doctors; who cannot understand it, till they believe in Christ and him crucified; whose victory over the devil, by his cross and passion, was herein most lively represented. I shall only add, that this "lifting up the brazen serpent," was a thing so public and so well known to all neighbouring nations, that the fame of it, in all likelihood, went into India; where they still set up an idol in form of a writhed serpent upon a perch six or seven feet high, which they solemnly worship; and carrying it along with them in their travels, set it up every morning for the company to pay their adoration to it. So Tavernier relates in his travels to that country, p. 28. And see the present Lord Archbishop of Canterbury's excellent treatise of Idolatry, p. 351, &c., with Huetius's Demonstr. Evang. p. 96, and his Questiones Alnetanæ (cap. 12, n. 25), where he shows the talismans, in all likelihood, were an imitation of this serpent: of which the Jews were so fond, that they burnt incense to it in the days of Hezekiah, and had done so we know not how long (see 2 Kings xviii. 4). Which may make it the less wonder, that the poor Indians should worship a serpent upon a pole, when they that should have understood better committed such a foul idolatry, as to do Divine honour to the figure of the greatest enemy of God and of mankind.

Ver. 10. The children of Israel set forward.] After they had been at two other places; which Moses now omits for brevity's sake, because he intended hereafter to give an exact account of all their removals at one view; which he doth in the thirty-third chapter of this book (see ver. 41, 42).

Pitched in Oboth.] Where, it is probable, they pitched at Ije-abarim, in the wilderness which is before Moab, toward the sunrising.

12 ¶ From thence they removed, and pitched in the valley of Zared.

13 From thence they removed, and pitched on the other side of Arnon, which is in the wil-found water; of the want of which they complained (see ch. xx. 2).

Ver. 11. Journeyed from Oboth, and pitched at Ije-abarim.] Not that Mount Abarim where Moses died (ch. xxvii. 12), but another place in the confines of Moab, as it here follows (see what I have observed, ch. xx. 2).

In the wilderness which is before Moab.] Called the wilderness of Moab, Deut. ii. 8.

Toward the sunrising.] On the east part of it, as Jephthah observes, a great many years after this, that "they came by the east side of the land of Moab" (Judges xi. 18).

Ver. 12. From thence they removed.] As they were about to remove from this last place, they received a command from God not to meddle with the country of Moab (Deut. ii. 9), which is the reason (as Abarbanel observes) that Moses here sets down briefly, whence and whither they went, and where they pitched; that it might appear they did not transgress that command.

Pitched in the valley of Zared.] Or, as some translate it, in Nachal-Zared; which is called Dibon-Gad, ch. xxxiii. 45. For this place had two names (as the same author observes), and it was just eight-and-thirty years since the spies went up to survey the country, from Kadesh-barnea till their passing this brook, as we translate it, Deut. ii. 14. But I take Dibon-Gad rather to have been a place which lay upon the brook Zered.

Ver. 13. Pitched on the other side of Arnon.] The Hebrew word meheber may be translated on this side, or, on the other side. And some think they were now on this side of the river, and not yet gone over it. Nor did they immediately come hither from their former station; but first to Almon-Diblathaim (ch. xxxiii. 46), which is also called Beth-Diblathaim in the wilderness of Moab, Jer. xviii. 22, and Diblah, Ezek. vi. 13. And then, passing by Ar, in the confines of Moab, and approaching to the country of the children of Ammon, God commanded them not to invade the Ammonites, being descendants from Lot, as well as the Moabites (Deut. ii. 18, 19, 37), but to pass over the river Arnon (Deut. ii. 24), to that side of it which belonged to the Amorites. For this river, at that time, divided the Moabites from the Amorites, as it here follows.

In the wilderness that cometh out of the coasts of the Amorites.] Runs by the wilderness of Kedemoth, unto which the Amorites extended their dominion (Deut. ii. 26).

For Arnon is the border of Moab, between Moab and the Amorites.] This river flowed from the mountains of Arabia, where it had its rise, and fell into the Dead Sea (as Josephus saith, lib. iv. Antiq. ἑρῖζον τὴν τε Μωαβίτην καὶ Ἀμορίτην, "bounding the country of the Moabites, and of the Amorites;") the country of Moab lying on one side of it, and that of the Amorites on the other. For though the Moabites formerly possessed the country on both sides of Arnon, as far as Heshbon, yet the Amorites had driven them out of that part of it which lay next to them; and made the river the boundary of their two kingdoms (ver. 26, 27). This Moses recites the more exactly, that it might appear the Israelites invaded none of the Moabites' possessions, but what was now pos-derness that cometh out of the coasts of the Amorites: for Arnon is the border of Moab, between Moab and the Amorites.

14 Wherefore it is said in the book of the wars of the Lord, What he did in the Red sea, and in the brooks of Arnon, 15 And at the stream of the brooks that goeth down to the dwelling of Ar, and lieth upon the border of Moab.

16 And from thence they went to Beer: that is the well whereof the Lord spake unto Moses, Gather the people together, and I will give them water.

17 ¶ Then Israel sang this song, Spring up, O well; sing ye unto it:

18 The princes digged the well, the nobles of the people digged it, by the direction of the lawgiver, with their staves. And from the wilderness they went to Mattanah:

essed by the Amorites: by which Jephthah defended the right of the children of Israel, in future times, against the Ammonites, who pretended this country belonged to them (Judges xi. 13—15, &c.)

Ver. 14. In the book of the wars of the Lord.] A proof of this Moses thought good to allege out of an authentic record in those countries, containing the history of all the wars that had been in those parts; which are here called the wars of the Lord, because he is the great Governor of the world (as Abarbinel interprets it), "from whom and by whom are all things, who putteth down one, and setteth up another (as the Psalmist speaks) at his good pleasure." This book, he thinks, was written by some of the wise men of those nations (and so thinks Nachmanides), who, looking upon this conquest made by Sihon as a very memorable thing, put it down in their Annals; which, after the way of those countries, were written, he thinks, in a poetical manner. There are those who are of opinion, that this book was written by Moses himself; who left in it directions to Joshua how to proceed in the wars of the Lord, when he conquered Canaan. So Dr. Lightfoot conjectures: and Boniferius doth not much differ from him. But I take the former account to be the more probable, that Moses justifies what he writes concerning this conquest out of their own books; which he quotes just as St. Paul, in the New Testament, doth one of the Greek poets.

What he did in the Red sea.] These are the words of the book, out of which he quotes a small fragment: and the marginal translation of them is most proper, Vaheb in Supheh, only the word eth is omitted; which makes the sense to be this, "against Vaheb in Supheh;" that is, he came (some such word must be understood) against Vaheb (a king of the Moabites), and overthrew him in Supheh, a place in the frontiers of Moab (see Deut. i. 1). Others understand by Vaheb the place where Sihon gave the Moabites this blow; which he did by falling upon them on a sudden, with a terrible fury. So Nachmanides understands these words besuphak; he stormed the city, and made a furious assault, when they thought not of it: for Supheh signifies a whirlwind, or stormy tempest (Isa. v. 28).

In the brooks of Arnon.] The same Nachmanides takes the word veeth, which we translate and in, to signify rather and with; and these being still the words of the book before mentioned, the sense is this: In the same manner he smote the brooks or torrents of Arnon; upon which he fell like a tempest, and carried all before him.

Ver. 15. At the stream of the brooks] None, I think, hath given a better account of these words than the same Nachman, who by eschad hannechalim (which we translate the "streams of the brooks"), understands either a cliff from whence the torrents flowed (as Ashdod and Happisgab, Deut. iii. 17, are the hills from whence the springs gushed), or the valley through which the torrents ran; where they made a great broad water, which is here called an effusion of torrents, as R. Levi ben Gersom interprets the Hebrew words, eschad hannechalim.

That goeth down to the dwelling of Ar.] Which extends itself as far as Ar, a city of Moab (ver. 28). R. Levi ben Gersom takes the word shet (which we translate dwelling) to signify a place as well as Ar, towards which these torrents bent their course.

Lieth upon the borders of Moab.] Which leaeneth or belongeth unto Moab, being in the border of that country.

Thus far are the words of the book of the wars of the Lord: and the meaning of them is, that the king of the Amorites took all these places by a sudden, furious invasion; which Moses therefore punctually recites, to show that the country of the Moabites now reached no further than Arnon: all the brooks, or torrents, and all the effusions of water as far as Arnon (i. e. all the country about them), being taken from them by the Amorites, in whose possession it now was, and, perhaps, had been a long time. And therefore the Israelites took nothing from the Moabites when they conquered this country (as was said before), nor from the Ammonites neither; part of whose country the Amorites also had got from them (Deut. iii. 11), and the Israelites took from the Amorites, when they conquered Sihon and Og; and it fell to the share of the Gadites (Josh. xiii. 25).

Ver. 16. They went to Beer.] A place which took its name from the pit, or well, which was here digged by God's order, as the next words tell us.

That is the well whereof the Lord spake unto Moses.] That is, saith Abarbinel, that place was remarkable for the well that God gave us, of his own accord, without our petition; which he prevented by bidding Moses dig it for us.

Gather the people together, and I will give them water.] Which they now again wanted, being removed from the river Arnon; but did not murmur about it, as they had done formerly: and therefore God most graciously, when he saw their distress, provided it for them.

Ver. 17. Then Israel sang this song.] This extraordinary kindness of God, which prevented their prayers, and gave them water out of his own good pleasure alone (as Abarbinel speaks), transported them with such joy, that it made them express their thankfulness in this song.

Spring up, O well.] As soon as they saw Moses and the princes thrust their staves into the earth, and the water began to bubble up, they said, with a loud voice, Come up, O well; that is, let waters flow abundantly to satisfy us all.

Sing ye unto it.] Or, as it is in the margin, answer unto it. The manner of the Hebrews was anciently to sing their songs of praise alternately, as appears from Exod. xv. 20. And so one company having said, Spring up, O well (which it is likely they repeated often), they called to the rest to answer to them; which they did, I suppose, in the following words.

Ver. 18. The princes] i. e. The seventy elders, and heads of the tribes.

19 And from Mattanah to Nahaliel: and from Nahaliel to Bamoth:

20 And from Bamoth in the valley, that is in the country of Moab, to the top of Pisgah, which looketh toward Jeshimon.

21 ¶ And Israel sent messengers unto Sihon king of the Amorites, saying,

22 Let me pass through thy land: we will not turn into the fields, or into the vineyards; we will not drink of the waters of the well: but

Dugged the well,] Very easily, only turning up the earth with their staves.

The nobles of the people dugged it,] The other side of the choir, perhaps, took up the song again, repeating the sense of what the former company had said.

By the direction of the lawgiver,] Or, "together with the lawgiver," who began the work, and whose example they followed.

With their staves,] With no more labour but only thrusting their staves into the ground and turning up the earth. For, as R. Levi ben Gersom takes it, the ground here being sandy and very soft, was easily penetrated, though they were not likely to find water in it. But they believing Moses, and following his direction, God sent it copiously unto them; and with no more pains than a scribe takes when he writes with his pen. For so he translates the Hebrew word mechokek (which we render lawgiver) a scribe, or doctor of the law.

From the wilderness] Mentioned ver. 13.

They went to Mattanah:] This and the place following are otherwise named in the thirty-third chapter, as the forenamed ben Gersom understands it. But others think these were no stations (which alone Moses gives an account of in the thirty-third chapter), where the Israelites pitched their tents, but places through which they passed, till they came to the station from whence they sent to Sihon for leave to pass through his country.

Ver. 19. From Mattanah to Nahaliel, &c.] This, as well as the place next mentioned in this verse, seems to have been on the borders of Moab.

Ver. 20. From Bamoth in the valley,] Rather "from Bamoth (which signifies a very high place) to the valley." Or, as it may be translated, "from Bamoth, a valley (that is, there is a valley) in the field of Moab, &c.," unto which they came next; for some such thing must be understood.

That is in the country of Moab,] Or near to it.

To the top of Pisgah,] Or, to the beginning (as the Hebrew word rosh may be interpreted) of the high Mount Pisgah; that is, they pitched at the foot of it, where the mountain began: which mountain was a part of the mountains of Abarim, as appears from Deut. xxxii. 49, xxxiv. 1.

Which looketh toward Jeshimon.] Or, "towards the wilderness." For so R. Levi ben Gersom interprets it; to a land that was shemumah, untilled and desolate, viz. to the wilderness of Kedemoth: where they pitched and settled their camp; and from thence sent messengers to Sihon.

Ver. 21.] These messengers were sent from the wilderness of Kedemoth, which was in the skirts of his country (Deut. ii. 26), or lay just upon it: for there was a city of this name in that country, which was given to Reuben, in the division of the land (Josh. xiii. 18).

Ver. 22. Let me pass through thy land:] They do not seem to desire a passage through the midst of his country, but only the extreme parts of it; which would have shortened their journey to the fords of Jordan.

we will go along by the king's high way, until we be past thy borders.

23 And Sihon would not suffer Israel to pass through his border: but Sihon gathered all his people together, and went out against Israel into the wilderness: and he came to Jahaz, and fought against Israel.

24 And Israel smote him with the edge of the sword, and possessed his land from Arnon unto Jabbok, even unto the children of Ammon: for

We will not turn into the fields, &c.] This is the very same civil message which they sent to Edom (ch. xx. 17). By whose example they pressed Sihon to grant them, at least, as much as the Edomites and Moabites had done (see Deut. ii. 28, 29).

Ver. 23. Sihon would not suffer Israel to pass] This shows that they asked only to pass through the skirts of his country (see Deut. ii. 30).

Sihon gathered all his people together,] He not only refused to grant their request; but came in a hostile manner, with all the forces he could raise, to oppose their passage over Arnon.

Went out against Israel into the wilderness:] From whence they sent their friendly message to him, ver. 21, which Moses, in Deut. ii. 26, calls, "words of peace."

He came to Jahaz,] A city, it is probable, belonging to the Moabites; whither the Israelites, perhaps, retreated, when Sihon denied them a passage through his country. For Isaiah plainly mentions Jahaz, as a place either in the country of Moab, or near it (ch. xv. 4), and Jeremiah also, calling it Jahazah (ch. xlvi. 21).

Fought against Israel,] Who had orders from God, not to decline the battle (as they did with the Edomites and the Moabites), and were assured of victory (Deut. ii. 31). For they were Amorites, whose country God promised to Abraham (Gen. xv. 21), being part of the Canaanites, whom they were commanded to destroy; for they were descended from one of the sons of Canaan (Gen. x. 16): which made this war with them to have a just ground; not because they denied the Israelites a passage through their country, against the right of nations, as Grotius thinks (which was but the occasion, not the ground of the war), but because they were one of the seven nations condemned by God to destruction, whose land he bestowed upon the Israelites (Josh. iii. 10), and because Sihon came out armed against them, beyond the bounds of his own dominions; and fell upon them, when they had given him no provocation.

Ver. 24. And Israel smote him] Utterly overthrew his army; and, putting them all to the sword, made themselves masters of his country.

Possessed his land] For they destroyed all the inhabitants, men, women, and children (Deut. ii. 33, 34).

From Arnon unto Jabbok, even unto the children of Ammon:] This is a brief description of the extent of Sihon's country; which reached from the river Arnon, the bound of the Moabites' country on the south (ch. xxii. 36), unto Jabbok, which was the bound of the Ammonites' country on the north (Deut. iii. 16, Josh. xii. 2, xiii. 10). But they meddled with no place that lay upon the river Jabbok, which belonged to the Ammonites; for that God had forbidden (Deut. ii. 37). By which Jephthah (as I observed), two hundred and sixty years after this, justified the title of the Israelites to all the country here mentioned; which they took not from the Ammonites, or Moabites, but from the Amorites, who the border of the children of Ammon was strong.

25 And Israel took all these cities: and Israel dwelt in all the cities of the Amorites, in Heshbon, and in all the villages thereof.

26 For Heshbon was the city of Sihon the king of the Amorites, who had fought against the former king of Moab, and taken all his land out of his hand, even unto Arnon.

27 Wherefore they that speak in proverbs were the owners of it when they conquered it (Judges xi. 13, 15, 22, 23.) For Sihon had got half of their country, as well as part of the country of Moab, as appears from Deut. iii. 11, and from Josh. xiii. 25, where it is plain, Joshua gave the Gadites half of the country of the children of Ammon, which was now taken from the Amorites, who had dispossessed them. Josephus describes it as lying between three rivers, like an island: for the banks of Arnon were the bounds of this region on the south side; and Jabbok on the north, which running into Jordan lost its name; and the western tract of it was washed by Jordan itself: and on the east part it was surrounded with the mountains of Arabia.

The border of the children of Ammon was strong.] This is not mentioned here as a reason why the Israelites did not set upon their country (for they were expressly forbidden to do it, Deut. ii. 19), but why Sihon conquered none of the Ammonites' country beyond Jabbok (as he did all from Arnon thither), because their frontiers on that side of the country were very strong, by the fortifications, which it is likely they had made upon the river.

Ver. 25. Israel took all these cities.] All the cities of that country which lay between Arnon and Jabbok: some of which are named, ver. 30.

Israel dwelt in all the cities of the Amorites.] Having destroyed the former inhabitants, as I noted before, Deut. ii. 34.

In Heshbon.] Even in their royal city.

In all the villages thereof.] In Hebrew the daughters; as villages and castles are called, which depend upon the metropolis, as daughters on their mother.

Ver. 26. Heshbon was the city of Sihon the king of the Amorites.] He had made this the seat of his kingdom, after his conquest of this country: which Moses observes (together with what follows), that it might appear to posterity, they invaded no part of the Moabites' territories, or of the Ammonites', but what was in the quiet possession of the Amorites, who had taken this country from them, and, perhaps, in a just war, and long enjoyed it.

Who had fought against the former king of Moab, &c.] It is not certain that this Sihon, whom the Israelites now vanquished, had dispossessed the Moabites of this country; but more likely some of his ancestors, who were all called by the name of Sihon (as the kings of Palestine were all called Abimelech, Gen. xx. 2, xxvi. 1, and the kings of Egypt called Pharaoh), who had fought not with the present king of Moab, but with one of his predecessors, and conquered him and his country.

The former king of Moab.] These words are not to be understood as if he fought with the king of Moab who immediately reigned before Balak, but, as I said, with some of his predecessors. So the LXX. τὸ πρότερον, that heretofore was king of Moab: and in the Hebrew the words are literally, "the king of Moab, the first;" perhaps, of the present race.

Ver. 27. They that speak in proverbs] In the Hebrew the words are, "wherefore the proverbialists;"

say, Come into Heshbon, let the city of Sihon be built and prepared:

28 For there is a fire gone out of Heshbon, a flame from the city of Sihon: it hath consumed Ar of Moab, and the lords of the high places of Arnon.

29 Woe to thee, Moab! thou art undone, O people of Chemosh: he hath given his sons that escaped, and his daughters, into captivity unto Sihon king of the Amorites.

that is, the poets, whose composesures, in those days, were very sententious.

Soy.] Have this song in their mouths: which seems to have been composed by some of the Amorites, upon the victory which Sihon got over the Moabites; particularly upon the taking of Heshbon, which, I suppose, he besieged immediately upon the routing of their army. This Moses thought good to insert in his history, as an evidence that this country belonged to the Amorites when the Israelites subdued it. Thus he quotes a common saying about Nimrod, to justify what he writes of his greatness (see Gen. x. 9).

Come into Heshbon.] The words either of Sihon calling to his people, or of the Amorites exhorting one another to go to Heshbon, and help to repair the ruins that had been caused in it by the war, that it might become the royal city of their country. For that is the meaning of the following words.

Let the city of Sihon be built and prepared.] Let that place which Sihon hath chosen for his seat be built up again, and made fit for his reception.

Ver. 28. For there is a fire gone out of Heshbon.] Now the poet rises into a rapture, and prophesies the conquest of the whole country by the army of Sihon marching out of Heshbon. For in the prophetic language, the desolations made by war are compared to fire and to the flames, which consume all they come near, (Amos i. 7, 10, 12, 14, ii. 2, 5).

A flame from the city of Sihon.] This is but a repetition (as the manner is) of what was now said in other words; expressing the certainty of this presage.

It hath consumed Ar of Moab.] He speaks as if he already saw the thing done which he foretold, though it never came to pass. For they did not conquer Ar, which remained in the possession of Moab in Moses's time, as appears from Deut. ii. 9, 18, 29. But, in his poetical heat (or fury, as they speak), he exults, as if they had actually taken the capital city of Moab. For so Ar was; and afterward called Rabbath, and Rabbath-moab, i. e. the great city of Moab, to distinguish it from Rabbath-Ammon, i. e. the great city of the Ammonites. For so we find in Stephanus (De Urbibus), Παρζαθμοαμα (it should be Παρζαθμοαβα, as Bochartus hath truly corrected it, in his preface to his Phaleg), which he calls πόλις ἐπιτὴ Παλαοστίνης ἢ νῦν Ἀρεμόντις. For, as I said, was the old name of it (Deut. ii. 29; Isa. xvi. 1), from whence came the name of Ἀρεμόντις, which it retained in later ages.

The lords of the high places of Arnon.] The masters or owners (as the word baale may be translated) of the high places, &c., i. e. those that dwell in the strongest forts of the country; or, as some fancy, the priests of the places are here meant; or, rather their temple where Baal was worshipped. For we find a place in this country called Bamoth-Baal (Josh. xiii. 17), "the high places of Baal." And it is evident, this poet triumphs in this Ἐναύτιον over their gods and their religion, as well as over them.

Ver. 29. Woe to thee, Moab!] He goes on to foretell the calamity of the whole country.

30 We have shot at them; Heshbon is perished even unto Dibon, and we have laid them waste even unto Nophah, which reacheth unto Medeba.

31 ¶ Thus Israel dwelt in the land of the Amorites.

32 And Moses sent to spy out Jaazer, and

Thou art undone, O people of Chemosh.] So he calls the Moabites, who served (as the Chaldee translates it) or worshipped Chemosh as their god: for so we read he was, Jer. xlviii. 7, 13; 1 Kings xi. 7; Judg. xi. 24, which St. Jerome thinks differs from Baal-Peor only in name (see Vossius De Orig. et Progr. Idolol. lib. ii. cap. 8). Some take Chemosh to be Saturn; particularly Scharastanius: the manner of whose worship see in Dr. Pocock's excellent annotations in Specim. Hist. Arab. p. 316. I shall only add, that as the Moabites are called the people of Chemosh, because they worshipped him as their god, so the Israelites are called the people of the Lord, and the people of God, because they worshipped the Lord alone (Jud. v. 11; 1 Sam. xiv. 13). For in the days of paganism, as Mr. Mede observes, every country, nay, every city, had its proper and peculiar gods, which were deemed as its guardians and protectors; from whence the nations themselves are expressed by the name of their gods. That is evident from this place; but it is not so plain, that when God threatens to deliver up Israel to serve other gods, he means giving them up into the hands of the people of strange countries; which he takes to be intended in Deut. iv. 28, xxviii. 64; Jer. xvi. 16, &c. (see book iv. p. 977). And so he thinks the words of David may be expounded, (1 Sam. xvi. 19). "They have driven me out this day from abiding in the inheritance of the Lord, saying, Go serve other gods;" i. e. banished me into the country of idolaters. See book iii. p. 823, where this is more largely explained.

He hath given his sons that escaped, and his daughters into captivity] This is a manifest triumph over their god Chemosh, who was not able to save his worshippers (whom he calls his sons and his daughters, i. e. his children) who were under his protection. No, he could not so much as preserve those that escaped the fury of the sword, but they were afterward taken captive, to make up part of the triumph of Sihon king of the Amorites.

Ver. 30. We have shot at them; Heshbon is perished even unto Dibon.] The Hebrew words vanniram abad Heshbon ath Dibon, may as well, if not better, be translated, their light is perished (or taken away) from Heshbon unto Dibon. So Forsterus in his Lexicon, and the Tigurin version, and others. That is, their glory is gone from one end of the country to the other: for Heshbon and Dibon were two famous places in this territory (Josh. xiii. 17). And some think this is the place called Dibon-Gad, ch. xxxiii. 45, which was the more noted, because there Nebo, one of their gods, was worshipped: for in Isaiah xv. 2, Dibon is mentioned as one of their high places; and there Nebo is lamented, i. e. their god which was there worshipped; whence Hesychius saith, Δηβών (which, no doubt, is this Dibon) τόπος Ἰνθα ἱδρωταί: πόν Μοαβιτών, "a place where the Moabites had a temple" (see Selden De Diis Syris, Syntagn. 2, cap. 12).

Nophah.] Another place in that country, as appears by the words following.

Which reacheth unto Medeba.] That is, the territories of Nophah extended as far as Medeba, which was certainly a place in the country of Moab (Isa. xv. 2). But the word reacheth is not in the Hebrew; they took the villages thereof, and drove out the Amorites that were there.

33 ¶ And they turned and went up by the way of Bashan: and Og the king of Bashan went out against them, he, and all his people, to the battle at Edrei.

34 And the Lord said unto Moses, Fear him and the words without it may be thus truly translated, "and as far as Medeba." For so the Hebrew participle asher is sometimes used, to signify simply and, as Eccles. vi. 12, asher mi, and who can tell, &c., so here asher ad, and unto, &c.

And here I think fit to note, that it is likely these verses were some part of the history of those countries: for a poetical way of writing was in use before prose, as Strabo tells us, lib. i. Geograph. p. 18, where he saith, ὁ πεικός λόγος ὁ γε κατεσκευασμένος μῦθος τοῦ ποιητικοῦ. Πρώτιστα γὰρ ἡ ποιητικὴ, &c. "All set or artificial speech, (whether historical or rhetorical) was but an imitation of poetical compositions," the ancients knowing no other: Cadmus, and Pherecydes, and Hecataeus, being the first who brought in this form of writing now in use (see Salmasius in Solinum, p. 841, and Cuperus in his Apotheosis Homeri, p. 55). However, this is certain, that they who would instruct the people put their lessons into verse, as Strabo there shows; where he says, p. 15, οἱ παλαιοὶ φιλοσοφίαν εἰνὰ λόγουσι πρώτην τὴν ποιητικὴν εἰσαγάσαναι, &c., "the ancients call poetry the first philosophy, forming our lives from tender years, teaching good manners, governing the passions and actions with pleasure:" for which cause the Greeks instituted their children in their cities by poetry, ὡς ἀρχαγωγίας χάρις διέποντες φιλοῦς ἀλλὰ σωφρονισμοῖ, "not merely for the sake of bare delectation, but to form them to sobriety."

Ver. 31.] This he mentions again to make it the more observed, that this was the country of the Amorites, into which the children of Israel entered, not of the Moabites, who had been expelled out of it, as was notoriously known, there being a song in everybody's mouth which continued the memory of it.

Ver. 32. Moses sent to spy out Jaazer.] Another city formerly belonging to Moab, but now in the possession of the Amorites, which the Israelites did not take at the first; but after they had conquered all the country before mentioned, they sent some men to bring them intelligence which way it was best to attack that city also, and the country about it. It was not far from Mount Gilead (2 Sam. xxiv. 5, 6; 1 Chron. xxvi. 31), and both of them were famous for good pasture, and therefore given to the tribes of Reuben and Gad, who had much cattle (ch. xxxii. of this book, 1, 2, 4, 35, 36). After the ten tribes were carried captive from their own land, it fell into the hands of the Moabites again, as may be gathered from Jer. xlviii. 32.

Took the villages] As well as the city itself. Drove out the Amorites] If it had not been possessed by them, they would not have meddled with it.

Ver. 33. They turned] Or returned (as the LXX. have it) from Jaazer.

Went up by the way of Bashan.] A famous mountain (Psalm lxxviii. 15) lying more northerly than the country of Sihon, and belonging also to the Amorites, where was very rich pasture, and an excellent breed of cattle (Deut. xxxii. 14; Psalm xxii. 12), and stately oaks (Ezek. xxvii. 6).

Og the king of Bashan] The whole country of which he was king had its name from that mountain, not: for I have delivered him into thy hand, and all his people, and his land; and thou shalt do to him as thou didst unto Sihon king of the Amorites, which dwelt at Heshbon.

and was called "the kingdom of Og in Bashan," Deut. iii. 10, where he is said, as well as Sihon, to be "a king of the Amorites" (ver. 8), and (ver. 11) that he was "of the remnant of the giants," or of the Rephaim, who were a mighty people in that country of Bashan (see Gen. xiv. 5), which in after ages was called Batanæa.

Went out against them,] To oppose their passage.

He, and all his people,] With all the men of war in his country.

To the battle at Edrei.] A city near that country, afterward called Adara, as St. Jerome tells us in his book De Locis Hebraicis. He offered the Israelites battle, which, by God's order, they accepted.

Ver. 34. The Lord said unto Moses,] That he might report it to the people.

Fear him not:] They had reason to be courageous (and not affrighted, because he was a giant), having lately overcome a mightier king than he, of which God puts them in mind in the end of this verse.

35 So they smote him, and his sons, and all his people, until there was none left him alive: and they possessed his land.

For I have delivered him into thy hand, &c.] For their greater encouragement he adds his promise, on which he bids them rely, as if they saw it already done, that he would give them the victory over Og and all his forces, and bestow upon them his country. This history Moses reports more at large, Deut. iii. 1—3, &c.

Ver. 35. So they smote him,] After they had overthrown him and his army, they pursued the victory till they had destroyed all the people of the country; some part of which held out longer than the rest (as appears from ch. xxxii. 39, &c.), but at length was wholly subdued by Jair, the son of Manasseh, who had all the region of Argob given him for his pains (ch. xxxii. 41, Deut. iii. 14).

They possessed his land.] Wherein were sixty walled cities, besides a great many small towns (Deut. iii. 4, 5; Josh. xiii. 30). All which was given to the half tribe of Manasseh (Deut. iii. 13; Josh. xiii. 29, 30; 1 Kings iv. 13).

CHAP. XXII.

Ver. 1. The children of Israel set forward,] In what month of the fortieth year this which follows fell out we cannot tell, but it is likely in the seventh; when they removed from the mountains of Abarim (ch. xxi. 20, xxxiii. 48).

Pitched in the plains of Moab] Which had formerly belonged to the Moabites, from whom it took its name: but had been taken from them by the Amorites; and now was in the possession of the Israelites.

On this side Jordan] Unto which river this plain extended: and they pitched near to it, from Beth-Jesimoth unto Abel-Shittim (ch. xxxiii. 49), where they stayed, till under the conduct of Joshua they came to Jordan, and passed over it (Josh. iii. 1).

By Jericho.] Rather against Jericho, as the LXX. translate it: for Jericho was on the other side of Jordan, directly opposite to the place where they now pitched. And therefore the Vulgar Latin translates, or rather paraphrases it, "where Jericho is situated beyond Jordan:" i. e. passing the ford, they came directly to Jericho.

Ver. 2. Balak] Who was king of the Moabites at this time; and descended, it is likely, from the ancient kings of that country (ch. xxi. 26).

Saw all that Israel had done to the Amorites.] To Sihon and Og, the "two kings of the Amorites," (as they are called, Deut. iii. 8), who were such near neighbours to Balak, that he not only saw, but considered (as the word implies) what a speedy conquest the Israelites had made of their country.

Ver. 3. Moab was sore afraid of the people,] Lest they should expel them out of their country, as they had done the Amorites: for they knew nothing of God's command to the Israelites, not to disturb them in their possessions. Some imagine, but I see no good ground for it, that they were afraid the Israelites should get possession of the land of Canaan, unto which they thought themselves perhaps to have a better title; being descended from the eldest daughter of Lot, who was the son of Abraham's elder brother; for Abraham was the youngest son of Terah. But nobody can see any right that this descent gave Lot or his children; there being no promise made of it by God to any person, but Abraham and his posterity.

Because they were many:] Too strong for the Moabites to deal withal; having conquered those who had been too hard for them, and taken a great territory from them (ch. xxi. 26).

Moab was distressed.] As Moses in his song, after they had passed the Red Sea, foretold they would be (Exod. xv. 15).

Ver. 4. Moab said] By messengers, which were sent (it is most likely) by the king and the princes of the country.

Unto the elders of Midian,] Who were their neighbours and confederates. The title of elders, it appears by this, was given in other nations, as well as among the Israelites, to the greatest persons in their countries: or the Israelites, after their manner, so called men everywhere, who were in high authority. For these persons who are here called elders, are called kings, ch. xxxi. 8, and princes, Josh. xiii. 21. In like manner they, who in the seventh verse of this chapter are called "the elders of Moab," are round about us, as the ox licketh up the grass of the field. And Balak the son of Zippor was king of the Moabites at that time.

5 He sent messengers therefore unto Balaam the son of Beor to Pethor, which is by the river of the laud of the children of his people, to call in the next verse called "the princes of Moab." Which, it is evident, was the ancient language among the Egyptians (Gen. i. 7, unless we suppose Moses, as I said, to have spoken in the language of the Jews), and, it is very likely, was also the ancient language of Phœnicia, and the countries thereabouts; and perhaps in much remoter parts. For it is a known story, that when the Phœnicians fled before Joshua, and forsook the land of Canaan, they fixed in Afric; where they left this name of elders among the Carthaginians (see Mr. Selden, lib. i. De Synedr. cap. 14, p. 567, &c.).

[Midian,] This is not the country wherein Jethro was a prince; for that was not far from Mount Sinai, as appears from Exod. iii. 1, whereas this was remote from that place, adjoining to the Moabites, and near to Palestine: though it is very probable the people of both these countries were descended from Abraham, by one of the sons he had by Keturah (Gen. xxv. 2).

[Lick up all that are round about us,] i. e. Devour us and all our neighbours (or our whole country, unless we join together to oppose them.

[As the ox licketh up the grass,] They use this metaphor, to signify how easily the Israelites would conquer them, without a timely, resolute, and unanimous opposition; and likewise what a universal desolation they would make. For the words are in the Hebrew, the green of the field, i. e. not only the grass, but the leaves of trees, which oxen eat, as Bochartus observes out of the Scripture, as well as other authors (Isa. xxvii. 20). And to lick up is not lightly to touch with their tongue, but to eat and consume (see Hierozoicon, par. i. lib. ii. cap. 31).

[Balak—was king] He was mentioned before, ver. 8, but here recorded to have been king of the country; who endeavoured to secure himself, by the assistance of his neighbours and allies; unto whom he sent this embassy, to advise with them what course it was best for them to take for their common safety.

[Ver. 5. He sent messengers] The result of the treaty with Midian was, that with joint consent they should send ambassadors, of each nation, and of the same quality, on the following message, ver. 7. And this counsel, it is likely, was given by the Midianites; for Balak saith nothing of it by his messengers: but it was resolved on when they came there, as the most effectual means for their security. This, I think, the word therefore imports.

[Unto Balaam] A famous soothsayer, or diviner, as he is called in Josh. xiii. 22. That is, one who pretended to foretell future things, and discover secrets, &c. though not by good and allowable arts, but such as were absolutely prohibited to God's people (Deut. xviii. 10). He had been formerly a good man, and a true prophet, till, loving the wages of unrighteousness, he apostatized from God, and became a roseem, which we translate a diviner; that is (saith Aben Ezra) an astrologer; who, observing when men were under a bad aspect of the stars, pronounced a curse upon them; which sometimes coming to pass, gained him a great reputation. But this is not the import of that word, as I shall show in its proper place. Let it suffice now to observe that the Jews are so much him, saying, Behold, there is a people come out from Egypt: behold, they cover the face of the earth, and they abide over against me:

6 Come now therefore, I pray thee, curse me this people; for they are too mighty for me: peradventure I shall prevail, that we may smite of this opinion, that he had been a better man than he was now, that they take him, as St. Jerome observes, to be the same person who, in the book of Job, is called Elihu. But Origen and some others think he was no prophet, but only one of the devil's sorcerers, of whom he went to inquire; but God was pleased to put the devil by, and give what answer he thought fit: which Balaam himself plainly discerned, and therefore calls himself, "He who heard the words of God," &c. On which side the truth lies, we shall be able to judge, when we come to consider what passed between God and him, in the following history.

[Son of Beor] Who was also called Bosor, as some gather from 2 Pet. ii. 15, though that place may have another interpretation.

[Pethor,] A city in Aram, or Mesopotamia (ch. xxiii. 7; Dent. xxiii. 4). This was the ancient name of the place; which in aftertimes the Syrians called Bosor, by an easy change of two letters, which is very usual. So Grotius understands those words (2 Pet. ii. 15). Βαλαάμ τοῦ Βοσόρ, "Balaam (not the son, but) of the city of Bosor."

[Which is by the river of the land of the children of his people,] i. e. Near to Euphrates; which is commonly in these books called by the name of the river (Gen. xv. 18, and many other places). This determines Aram (which was the name of several countries thereabouts) to signify that which is called in Scripture Aram Naharaim; that is, the Aram which lay between the two famous rivers of Euphrates and Tigris. The former of which was called, by way of eminence, the river (though the other also was eminent), because it was nearest and best known to the Israelites. And Ptolemy mentions a city called Pachoria in his time, upon this river, which some take to be Pethor. And it is very probable that Abraham, before he came into Canaan; lived hereabout (Gen. xxiv. 4, 10; Josh. xxiv. 2). And here Jacob also served for his wife, and begat all the patriarchs, except Benjamin (whence the Israelites acknowledged their father to have been a poor Aramite, or Syrian, as we translate it, Dent. xxvi. 5), by which means some relics of true religion still remained in this country, though mixed with a great deal of superstition.

[To call him,] To invite him to come to them.

[There is a people come out from Egypt,] Which all the power of Pharaoh could not hinder.

[They cover the face of the earth,] Are exceeding numerous.

[They abide over against me,] Lie encamped not far from me, and are ready to invade my country.

[Ver. 6. Come now] They were to speak in the name of the king of Moab (whose words these are said to be, ver. 7), there being no king, perhaps, at this time in Midian, but several little princes, who are called kings (ch. xxxi. 8).

[Curse me this people,] It seems they had an opinion in those days, which prevailed much in aftertimes, that some men had a power, by the help of their gods, to blast not only particular persons, but whole armies; so that they should not be able to effect their designs. This they are said to have done, sometimes only by bare words of imprecation; of which there was a set form among some people, which Æschines calls δοροζομένην ἄραν, "the deter-them, and that I may drive them out of the land: for I wot that he whom thou blestest is blessed, and he whom thou cursest is cursed.

7 And the elders of Moab and the elders of Midian departed with the rewards of divination in their hand; and they came unto Balaam, and spake unto him the words of Balak.

minate curse." Sometimes they also offered sacrifices, and used certain rites and ceremonies, with solemn charms: a famous instance of which we find in the life of Crassus; where Plutarch tells us, that Atteius, tribune of the people, made a fire at the gate, out of which Crassus was to march unto the war against the Parthians: into which he threw certain things to make a fume, and offered sacrifices to the most angry gods, with horrid imprecations upon him; which, he saith, according to ancient tradition, had such a power, that no man, who was loaded with them, could avoid being undone.

They are too mighty for me:] I am not able to deal with them without thy help.

Peradventure] But I hope, &c. For the Hebrew word אין is not a particle of doubting, but of hoping: "Non est particula dubitantis, sed bene ominantis et sperantis;" as Forsterus observes (Isa. xxxvii. 4; Zeph. ii. 3).

Drive them out of the land:] I hope, by the conjunction of thy curses with my sword, I may be able to destroy them; or at least to drive them out of this country.

He whom thou blestest is blessed, &c.] The ancient prophets had such power with God to obtain great blessings from him, for others, as appears by the story of Abraham and Abimelech (Gen. xx. 10), and of Jacob, who blessed Pharaoh (Gen. xlvii. 7), and afterward all his own sons. And no doubt their imprecations were as powerful, when there was a just cause for them; according to what we read, 2 Kings ii. 24. And it is likely, while Balaam (who was a prophet, as appears by what follows, and is so called by St. Peter), continued a good man, he blessed and cursed no other way, but by prayer to God, and by imprecations in his name: which was imitated by other great men, particularly by king Cambyses in his speech to the Persians, recorded by Herodotus, in Thalia, cap. 65, where he saith, "If you do what I require, then let your land bring forth plentifully; and your wives and your flocks be fruitful, and yourselves enjoy your liberty: but if ye do not, τὰ ἐναντία τούτοις ἀρόμαι ὑμῖν γενέσθαι." "I imprecate the quite contrary things to these to fall upon you." But when Balaam degenerated into a false prophet, and became a diviner, then he used spells and enchantments (as is plain by this history), and such rites and ceremonies as were the invention of wicked spirits; which Pharaoh's magicians, the Jews fancy, made use of to stop the Israelites at the Red Sea (see Exod. xiv. 3).

Ver. 7. The elders of Moab, and—of Midian] I take these two nations to have been ancient confederates; but the Jewish tradition is, that they had been always at enmity, and now reconciled by a common danger; just as two mastiffs (so they explain it), who are continually fighting, when they see the wolf set upon one of them, join together for their defence; because, if he devour the one, the other will not long survive him.

Departed with the rewards of divination] It was the custom among God's people, when they came to consult with a prophet, to bring him a present; as appears from 1 Sam. ix. 7, 8. And, indeed, from ancient time men were not wont to approach great persons without one (see Gen. xliii. 11, 25, 26).

8 And he said unto him, Lodge here this night, and I will bring you word again, as the Lord shall speak unto me: and the princes of Moab abode with Balaam.

9 And God came unto Balaam, and said, What men are these with thee?

10 And Balaam said unto God, Balak the son

They came unto Balaam,] Delivered their message; having first, as the manner was, made him a present.

Ver. 8. Lodge here this night,] That was the time, it seems, wherein he was wont to receive answers to his inquiries; either in a dream, or by apparitions, or some other way. There are those who think he now began to betray the naughtiness of his heart, in taking time to advise about this matter; which, if he had been a faithful servant of God, he would instantly have rejected with disdain. And it is likely enough, by what follows, that he was as desirous of their money, as they were of his imprecations.

I will bring you word again, as the Lord shall speak] You shall have my answer, according to the directions which the Lord shall give me. By this I take it to be evident, that he was not a stranger to the true God, with whose name it is certain he was acquainted: and, it is probable, had received revelations from him, till he became a covetous mercenary prophet, and addicted himself to superstitious rites and ceremonies; making use of teraphim, perhaps, which had been of ancient practice in his country, and worshipping God, perhaps, by other images. See Gen. xxxi. 19, 24, 30, 49, where it is evident that Laban had still communication with the Lord, though he used teraphim, and calls them his gods. Which perhaps put that idle conceit into the head of some of the Jews, that it was one and the same person, who is there called Laban, and here Balaam: who falling, as I said, into idolatrous practices, was forsaken by God, and delivered up to the impostres of evil spirits; though he still continued to inquire of the Lord, who was pleased, at this time, to make his mind known to him, for the preservation of his people Israel.

The princes of Moab abode with Balaam.] As did those of Midian also; who are mentioned in the foregoing verse. Though some of the Jews have a fancy that the elders of Midian went away (which they give as the reason that they are not here mentioned) as soon as they heard Balaam say, he would address himself for advice unto the Lord; who they knew would be favourable to Israel. And on the other side, some Christians have been of opinion, that he addressed himself to the Lord, only to try if he could draw him by his charms to take part with the Moabites: just as the Romans, when they laid siege to a city, endeavoured, by all means they could invent, to persuade the tutelal gods of that place to forsake it, and come over to their side: which rite is described by Macrobius.

Ver. 9. God came unto Balaam,] As he is said to have done unto Abimelech in a dream, Gen. xx. 3, where I observed that Maimonides makes a distinction between God's coming to a person, and his speaking to him; but that cannot be made use of here; for God did both come and speak to Balaam, as appears from ver. 32, 35, where we read, the angel of the Lord spake to him. And here it will be fit to note, that all nations, of whom we have any knowledge, have been possessed with this opinion, that God was wont to appear frequently unto men; especially, cum recentes à Deo essent (as Seneca speaks in Epist. xc.), "when they were newly come out of his hand:" and that he also was pleased to reveal his mind and will unto them, by some means or other; of Zippor, king of Moab, hath sent unto me, saying,

11 Behold, there is a people come out of Egypt, which covereth the face of the earth: come now, curse me them; peradventure I shall be able to overcome them, and drive them out.

12 And God said unto Balaam, Thou shalt not go with them; thou shalt not curse the people: for they are blessed.

13 And Balaam rose up in the morning, and said unto the princes of Balak, Get you into your land: for the LORD refuseth to give me leave to go with you.

14 And the princes of Moab rose up, and they went unto Balak, and said, Balaam refuseth to come with us.

15 ¶ And Balak sent yet again princes, more, and more honourable than they.

16 And they came to Balaam, and said to him, Thus saith Balak the son of Zippor, Let nothing, I pray thee, hinder thee from coming unto me:

17 For I will promote thee unto very great particularly by his angels, whom he sent on messages to them, as long as there was any goodness left among them. This is most admirably expressed by Catullus:

"Præsentem namque ante domos invisere castas
Sæpius, et sese mortali ostendens cœtu
Cœlicolæ, nondum spreta pietate, solabant."

See Huetius in his Quæstiones Alnetane, lib. ii. cap. 12, n. 1, 2. And indeed no account can be given, how it came into the head of Homer, and other poets, to bring in the gods appearing so oft as they do, upon every occasion, if God had not been wont, in ancient time, to manifest himself, not only to the Israelites, but to other nations also, especially before the distinction of this people from them. So he did to Abimelech, Laban, &c., as well as to Abraham, Isaac, and Jacob. For, as Dr. Jackson hath well observed (in his first book upon the Creed, ch. 11), if they had never read nor heard of any such thing, all the wits in the world, had they beat their brains never so much, could not have thought of bringing the gods in a visible shape upon the stage, or interlacing their poems with their frequent apparitions: nor can any other account be given, how this came to be the common belief of the world, from one end of it to the other, that the gods revealed their mind to men; the philosophers, as well as ordinary people, in the east, west, north, and south, making no doubt of it: for Abaris Hyperboreus, and Zamolxis Geta, were no less famous in the north, than the Egyptian prophets were in the south.

But when mankind degenerated, and corrupted themselves by all manner of wickedness, then God forsook them, and permitted evil angels to take the place of the good, and plunge mankind further into all manner of filthiness; especially into abominable idolatries. So that Balaam, who, I question not, had at first familiarity with God and his holy angels, abusing this honour God had done him, in making him a prophet, by employing it to serve his vile covetousness, God gave him up to the delusion of evil spirits; of whom he learnt enchantments. But at this time God was pleased again to appear to him himself, for the good of his people Israel, and to overrule all his bad inclinations: inasmuch that Moses says at last he did not go, as he had done, to seek enchantments (ch. xxiv. 1), but gave up himself wholly, for the present, to the conduct of God's Spirit, as I shall there observe.

And said,] By an angel, as Maimonides interprets it (More Nervoeh. par. ii. cap. 41).

What men are these with thee?] He asks this question, partly to prove Balaam, whether he would tell him the truth of their business; and partly to make way for the following direction.

Ver. 10. Balaam said unto God,] To whom (it appears by this) and to the way wherein God communicated himself, he was not a stranger.

Balak—hath sent unto me,] This shows the embassy was sent principally in his name; the Midianites only joined in it (ver. 5).

Ver. 11.] This verse contains only a brief report of the message that was sent him; to which he desired God would tell him what answer he should return.

Ver. 12. God said unto Balaam,] By an angel (ver. 9, and ver. 35).

Thou shalt not curse the people.] He not only forbids him to comply with Balak's desire, but gives him such a reason as was likely to prevail with him, if his prohibition was not sufficient; that it was impossible, with all his enchantments, to reverse the blessing which God had bestowed upon this people.

Ver. 13. Get you into your land.] He seems resolved to obey God, rather than comply with them; and therefore despatched them, as soon as he could, with the following answer.

The Lord refuseth to give me leave to go with you.] He acquaints them only with half of God's answer; for he omits the reason, which was the principal thing: though it may be thought to be implied: that if the Lord, on whose pleasure he pretended to depend, refused to let him go, it was in vain to attempt to curse them.

Ver. 14. The princes of Moab rose up,] They did not stand to dispute the matter with him, or to importune him; which shows that he had given them a peremptory denial.

Balaam refuseth to come with us.] They report his answer as imperfectly as he did God's; saying not a word, that the Lord refused to let him come. They were loath, perhaps (as the manner of such persons is), to deliver unwelcome news to their master.

Ver. 15.] He being ignorant of the true cause of his refusal, imagined that Balaam thought himself slighted; and expected a greater number of persons, and of greater quality, should have been sent to him. For prophets, in ancient time, were men highly esteemed; as not only sacred persons, but who had a great interest in God; of whom they could obtain whatsoever they desired. God himself thought this sufficient to keep Abimelech from injuring Abraham, to acquaint him that he was a prophet (Gen. xx. 3). And therefore they were called men of God; being thought, by the very gentiles, to be full of some numen or other; whereby they became "interpreters of the gods" (as they called them), who ministered ἐν μέσσοις θεῶν καὶ ἀνθρώπων, "between the gods and men:" inasmuch that women, when they became prophetesses, had very great authority; as we find in Deborah, who calls herself a mother in Israel (Judges v. 7): and therefore all such persons were under the special protection of Heaven (Ps. cv. 15).

Ver. 16. Thus saith Balak] They seem to speak of their master in a higher style than the former ambassadors did, ver. 7, where it is only said, "They spake unto him the words of Balak."

Let nothing—hinder thee from coming] Yet they submissively beseech him, in their master's name, not to suffer any thing to keep him from coming to him; for he thought, perhaps, that Balaam might be detained by other more profitable employments.

honour, and I will do whatsoever thou sayest unto me: come therefore, I pray thee, curse me this people.

18 And Balaam answered and said unto the servants of Balak, If Balak would give me his house full of silver and gold, I cannot go beyond the word of the LORD my God, to do less or more.

19 Now therefore, I pray you, tarry ye also here this night, that I may know what the LORD will say unto me more.

20 And God came unto Balaam at night, and said unto him, If the men come to call thee, rise up, and go with them; but yet the word which I shall say unto thee, that shalt thou do.

Ver. 17. I will promote thee] He imagined, it is probable, that Balaam looked upon the rewards of divination, which he sent him, as not sufficient encouragement; and there he promises him to advance him to some high preferment in his court.

I will do whatsoever thou sayest unto me.] And moreover, he promises to bestow an estate, as great as he would desire, to support his new dignity.

Come therefore,] They add importunity to their earnest request.

Curse me this people.] Having heard (as David Chytraeus understands this) that the Israelites conquered their opposers by prayers, rather than by arms (as they had done Pharaoh and the Amalekites), the king of Moab thought he might prevail against them by the same means.

Ver. 18. Balaam—said unto the servants of Balak,] To the messengers whom he had sent, who, it appears by this, were principal officers in his court (ver. 15). For the servants of Pharaoh are called "the elders of his house," Gen. 1. 7.

I cannot go beyond the word of the Lord my God,] This is not the language of one who is a stranger to the true God; for no prophet in Israel ever spake of him in more familiar terms than these, the Lord my God. And for the present, the command of God seems to have suppressed his covetous and ambitious desires, so that he durst not yield to them; though it appears, by what follows, he was strongly inclined to follow them.

Ver. 19. Tarry ye also here this night,] Take a lodging with me, as your predecessors did (ver. 8).

That I may know what the Lord will say unto me more.] Whether the Lord will alter his mind, as he hoped he might; otherwise he would have rested in the first answer he received from God, and not tried again if he could prevail by his importunity to get leave to go; as these great promises of riches and honour made him desire.

Ver. 20. God came unto Balaam at night,] Notwithstanding which God was pleased again to visit him with his presence; at least by one of his angelic ministers.

If the men come to call thee,] Press thee again to comply with them.

Rise up, and go] Since thou hast such a mind to go, follow thy inclinations. These words seem to be spoken angrily, though not sarcastically, as some would have them, like those, 1 Kings xxii. 15.

The word which I shall say unto thee, that shalt thou do.] Some take these words to be not so much a command as a prediction; that he should not be able to say a word but what he was ordered by God.

Ver. 21. Balaam rose up—and saddled his ass,]

21 And Balaam rose up in the morning, and saddled his ass, and went with the princes of Moab.

22 ¶ And God's anger was kindled because he went: and the angel of the LORD stood in the way for an adversary against him. Now he was riding upon his ass, and his two servants were with him.

23 And the ass saw the angel of the LORD standing in the way, and his sword drawn in his hand: and the ass turned aside out of the way, and went into the field: and Balaam smote the ass, to turn her into the way.

24 But the angel of the LORD stood in a path of the vineyards, a wall being on this side, and a wall on that side.

Commanded his ass to be made ready; for he had servants to wait upon him (ver. 22). And great persons in those countries were wont to ride upon asses; of which we find examples before this, in Abraham (Gen. xxii. 1), and in Moses (Exod. iv. 20), and, in aftertimes, the judges of Israel were thus mounted (Judges v. 10), and their children (ch. x. 4, xii. 14).

And went with the princes] They set out, perhaps, together; or he desired them to go a little before, and he would follow them. For it appears by the following part of this relation, that he did not make a part of their train; but travelled, at least some part of the way, with his two servants alone.

Ver. 22. God's anger was kindled because he went.] This may seem strange, since he had a permission to go along with them: but the meaning is not, that God was displeased because he did as he was permitted; but because he went so readily (without offering to stay at home, as he had been commanded at first), and because he carried along with him an evil mind, desirous to get the money and the honour that was proffered him; and consequently with an inclination to curse Israel, and with hopes that he might, by some means or other, compass that wicked end. This is plainly signified by the angel's words, ver. 35, where he permits him still to go on, but with a caution not to attempt to speak a word otherwise than he bade him. This is more plainly evident from Deut. xxiii. 5.

The angel of the Lord] The same angel, which is thought to have spoken to him, ver. 12, 20.

Stood in the way] In the very path wherein his ass was going.

For an adversary against him.] To stop his proceedings, that he might not go on in his sin, and perish, as R. Solomon glosses.

Now he was riding] He was in his journey upon the road, but separated from the rest of the company; having only his own two servants with him, who waited on him.

Ver. 23. The ass saw the angel] The Lord, saith the same R. Solomon, let the ass see what his master could not, his mind being blinded by his converse with demons: or rather, God deprived him, for the present, of the power of seeing what stood just before him.

His sword drawn] Threatening to kill him if he went forward.

The ass turned aside] Out of the road wherein they were travelling.

Went into the field.] Which lay on the side of the highway.

Balaam smote the ass,] As the manner is still, when such creatures are unruly.

Ver. 24. The angel of the Lord stood in a path of the 25 And when the ass saw the angel of the Lord, she thrust herself unto the wall, and crushed Balaam's foot against the wall: and he smote her again.

26 And the angel of the Lord went further, and stood in a narrow place, where was no way to turn either to the right hand or to the left.

27 And when the ass saw the angel of the Lord, she fell down under Balaam: and Balaam's anger was kindled, and he smote the ass with a staff.

vineyards,] It is uncertain whether the ass turned into the way again, or went on in the field, till they came to these vineyards.

A wall being on this side, &c.] In a very narrow passage.

Ver. 25. When the ass saw the angel,] Which opposed him here again, as he had done in the broad highway.

Thrust herself unto the wall,] To avoid the angel.

Crushed Balaam's foot] The angel and his drawn sword, which it is likely he brandished, took up so much of the way on both sides, that there was not room for the ass to pass without going too close to the wall.

He smote her again,] Being very angry at her untowardness.

Ver. 26. The angel—stood in a narrow place,] Through which Balaam was to pass.

Where was no way to turn] Where the angel took up the whole passage, and left no space on either side for the ass to go.

Ver. 27. When the ass saw the angel] And no way to avoid him.

She fell down under Balaam,] Being unable either to turn back, the way was so narrow, or to go forward, because the angel filled up all the passage.

He smote the ass with a staff,] Harder than he had done before.

Ver. 28. And the Lord] By his angel, as Bochart interprets it.

Opened the mouth of the ass,] Which naturally is a dumb creature, having no organs of speech; but, by an extraordinary power of God, who made man's mouth, had her tongue so moved to the palate, teeth, and lips, and the air was so compressed within her mouth, as to form words as plain as we speak.

She said unto Balaam,] That an ass should, by the power of God, be made to speak, one would think should not seem incredible to Christians, when heathens did not disbelieve such things, but received them as undoubted truths. Witness what they say of the ass upon which Bacchus rode, and the ram of Phryxus, and the horse of Achilles and Adrastus, and the bull of Europa, and the lamb in Egypt when Borchoris reigned there, and the elephant of Porus in India; all which are reported to have spoken: and vast numbers of other instances are heaped up by two eminently learned Frenchmen, Bochartus in his Hieroicozon, par. i. lib. ii. cap. 14; and Huetius in his Alnetanæ Questiones, lib. ii. cap. 12, n. 26; which things are alleged out of their books, not to prove all such stories to be true, but that they thought them true, and thought it did not exceed the power of their gods to effect such things. Nor could they except against the Bible, because of the strange things there reported, the like wonders being commonly believed among themselves; which, if they were devised by the gentile writers, it was, in all likelihood, out of this sacred history; that they might not seem to come behind the Jews 28 And the Lord opened the mouth of the ass, and she said unto Balaam, What have I done unto thee, that thou hast smitten me these three times?

29 And Balaam said unto the ass, Because thou hast mocked me: I would there were a sword in mine hand, for now would I kill thee.

30 And the ass said unto Balaam, Am not I thine ass, upon which thou hast ridden ever since I was thine unto this day? Was I ever wont to do so unto thee? And he said, Nay.

in any thing which might give credit to their own religion.

If Maimonides had been acquainted with such things as these, he would not have said, that all this which happened to Balaam in the way to Balak, was done in a prophetic vision (par. ii. More Nevochim, cap. 42), which is the conceit of R. Levi ben Gersom also, who compares this with what we read, Hosea i. 3, &c., concerning the prophet's taking a wife of whoredoms, &c., and denies the literal sense, merely because he could not imagine how an ass should be made to speak; no, nor could he, or any man else, tell how such a representation could be made to the prophet's imagination in a vision, but by the power of God; to whom the one was as easy as the other.

What have I done unto thee,] There was some cause; for his foot was crushed, and he fell with her: but the ass could not help it.

Ver. 29. Balaam said unto the ass,] One would have expected that he should have been astonished, and struck as dumb as the ass naturally was, to hear her speak so plain, and expostulate with him: but he was in a rage, or rather fury; so that for the present he did not consider any thing, but her untoward crossness. St. Peter observes so much, when he saith the dumb ass rebuked "the madness of the prophet;" where the word παροργισια is unusual in the Greek language, signifying that he was beside himself, not knowing what he said or did; partly out of anger, and partly because he was possessed with an eager desire and hope to serve Balak, and get the riches and honour he promised him, now that he had got leave of God to go to him.

Because thou hast mocked me,] Or, as the Arabic version, printed at Paris, translates it, thrown me in the dirt. But they seem to have read the word otherwise than it is in the Hebrew; where it signifies either mocking, or exposing to scorn and laughter.

I would there were a sword in mine hand,] This shows the height of his rage, to be thus crossed in his designs; and, as the Jewish doctors take it, the height of his folly also; that he should pretend to be able to destroy the whole congregation of Israel with his enchantments, who needed a sword to kill a poor ass.

Ver. 30. Am not I thine ass,] This does not prove that the ass understood what Balaam said, and thereupon returned this pertinent answer; but that the same Power which made the ass speak at first, continued to form such an answer as might convince Balaam of his error.

Upon which thou hast ridden ever since I was thine] The Hebrew words will not bear this sense; but are exactly rendered in the margin of our Bibles, ever since thou wast, that is, a rider; ever since thou beganst to ride, as Aben Ezra expounds it. Whence many render it, "from thy youth;" which may be supposed to be a long time; Balaam, in all likelihood, being now no young man, but for many years a famous prophet.

Was I ever wont to do so unto thee?] Hast thou not 31 Then the LORD opened the eyes of Balaam, and he saw the angel of the LORD standing in the way, and his sword drawn in his hand: and he bowed down his head, and fell flat on his face.

32 And the angel of the LORD said unto him, Wherefore hast thou smitten thine ass these three times? behold, I went out to withstand thee, because thy way is perverse before me:

33 And the ass saw me, and turned from me these three times: unless she had turned from me, surely now also I had slain thee, and saved her alive.

34 And Balaam said unto the angel of the LORD, I have sinned; for I knew not that thou stoodest in the way against me: now therefore, if it displease thee, I will get me back again.

had sufficient experience, in so many years as I have served thee, of my sure going? As much as to say, Thou shouldst have thought some unwonted cause had forced me to do three times what I never did before.

He said, Nay.] He could not but allow the truth of what was spoken by the ass.

Ver. 31. The Lord opened the eyes of Balaam,] He was not blind before; but his eyes were held as the eyes of the men of Sodom were, who could not see Lot's door, though they found their way to their own home (Gen. xix. 1).

He saw the angel of the Lord standing in the way,] He understood the true cause of the ass's turning aside and falling under him.

He bowed down his head,] He first bowed his head, and then his whole body, in token of his most profound reverence.

Ver. 32. Wherefore hast thou smitten thine ass these three times?] This serves to teach us, saith Maimonides, not to use cruelty towards beasts, but to treat them gently and mercifully (More Nevochim, par. iii. cap. 17), or rather as another of them makes the angel to say to Balaam, If I am commanded to reprove thee for thy injustice to thy ass, how much more for thy wicked intention to destroy a whole nation? But the drift of this speech seems to be, to reprehend the brutish stupidity of the prophet, in not apprehending some extraordinary hand of God, which turned his ass aside so oft, and at last made her speak.

I went out to withstand thee,] I was the cause of thy ass's turning out of the way, and falling down, by my standing in the path to oppose thee, and stop thy proceedings (ver. 23).

Because thy way is perverse before me.] His intentions and purposes were not sincere and honest; for pretending to obey God, he designed, if he could, to serve Balak. The word we translate perverse signifies perplexed and intricate in the Arabian language: and so Bochartus thinks it should be translated here.

Ver. 33. The ass saw me, and turned from me,] I was merciful unto thee, in letting the ass see me, which saved thy life, as it here follows.

Unless she had turned from me, surely now also I had slain thee,] It had cost thee thy life if the ass had gone forward, and thy life alone; for I would not have done any hurt to her.

Ver. 34. I have sinned,] It is not certain that this refers to any sense he had of the perverse disposition of his heart; for it may have respect only to his outrageousness against his ass, which he confesses was without cause.

For I knew not that thou stoodest in the way] Or rather, "but I knew not," &c., for this seems to be said

35 And the angel of the LORD said unto Balaam, Go with the men: but only the word that I shall speak unto thee, that thou shalt speak. So Balaam went with the princes of Balak.

36 ¶ And when Balak heard that Balaam was come, he went out to meet him unto a city of Moab, which is in the border of Arnon, which is in the utmost coast.

37 And Balak said unto Balaam, Did I not earnestly send unto thee to call thee? wherefore camest thou not unto me? am I not able indeed to promote thee to honour?

38 And Balaam said unto Balak, Lo, I am come unto thee: have I now any power at all to say any thing? the word that God putteth in my mouth, that shall I speak.

in excuse of himself, from his ignorance that the ass was turned out of the way by the angel.

If it displease thee, I will get me back,] He would not understand the angel right, who did not find fault with his going to Balak, but with his going with such bad intentions.

Ver. 35. Go with the men,] As God had before bidden him (ver. 20), and did not send the angel to forbid what he had allowed.

The word that I shall speak unto thee, that thou shalt speak,] These words are something different from those in ver. 20, importing both that he should not presume to speak a word but what he ordered, and that he should not forbear to speak what he bade him.

So Balaam went with the princes] Whom he overtook after this stop, either at the place where they lodged, or where they stayed for him; but he did not tell them what he met withal in the way.

Ver. 36. When Balak heard that Balaam was come,] By some messenger sent before to acquaint him with his coming.

He went out to meet him] Partly out of joy, and partly out of respect to him.

Unto a city of Moab,] This city seems to have been Ar (ch. xxi. 15).

Which is in the utmost coast,] He did him the honour to meet him at the very entrance of his country; and did not think it sufficient to send some of his court to receive him.

Ver. 37. Did not I earnestly send unto thee to call thee?] After this compliment was paid to Balaam, the king could not forbear to let him know, he did not think himself well used by him, whom he had earnestly entreated to come to him, and at the first he would not.

Wherefore camest thou not] As soon as I sent for thee.

Am I not able indeed to promote thee to honour?] Dost thou doubt of my power to make thee a great man, if thou gratifiest me in my desire? And his readiness he showed by this honourable reception of him.

Ver. 38. Lo, I am come unto thee,] Say no more of that; but be satisfied that I am now come.

Have I now any power at all to say any thing?] Yet he would not have him expect that he should do all that Balak desired, or he himself was inclined to do; for he was under a higher overruling Power, which he could not gainsay.

The word that God putteth in my mouth, that shall I speak,] He seems to acquaint him that he had received such a command from God (ver. 35), and he must be obedient.

39 And Balaam went with Balak, and they came unto Kirjath-huzoth.

40 And Balak offered oxen and sheep, and sent to Balaam, and to the princes that were with him.

Ver. 39. Balaam went with Balak.] This did not discourage the king of Moab from carrying Balaam along with him into his country; where he hoped he might be persuaded to do as he would have him.

They came unto Kirjath-huzoth.] The royal city, it is likely; for it signifies in our language the city of streets; that is, a large city, which had many streets and (consequently) inhabitants in it.

Ver. 40. Balak offered oxen and sheep.] In thankfulness that he had procured Balaam's assistance, as he hoped, against his enemies.

And sent to Balaam.] They were such sacrifices as the Jews called peace-offerings; of which the offerers had a share for themselves and for their friends: and the sacrifices being over, Balak invited Balaam to come to the feast he made thereupon.

And to the princes] The princes, I suppose, of Midian, and of Moab, who were sent on the embassy to him, and had succeeded in it (ver. 7, 15).

Ver. 41. On the morrow.] Having rested one night

41 And it came to pass on the morrow, that Balak took Balaam, and brought him up into the high places of Baal, that thence he might see the utmost part of the people.

after his journey, Balak would have him go about his business, and see what he could do for him.

Balak took Balaam.] Into his chariot.

Brought him up into the high places of Baal.] All nations worshipped their gods in high places; and Baal was the god of this country; who was worshipped in more high places than one; unto all which he brought Balaam, that he might see where he could take the fullest view of the Israelites, and which of them would be fittest for his purpose. These high places were full of trees, and very shady (as I observed, Lev. xxvi. 30), which made them the fitter both for the solemn thoughts and prayers of such as were devout, and for the filthy inclinations and intentions of the wicked. Baal was the name of several gods, both male and female, as our Selden shows in his Syntagma ii. De Diis Syris, cap. 1. And I suppose Chemosh, the god of Moab, is here called by this name (signifying a lord), though that great man seems to take it for Baal-Peor (cap. 2, of that book).

He might see the utmost part of the people.] i. e. All their armies, to the very skirts of their camp.

CHAPTER XXIII.

1, 13, 28 Balak's sacrifice. 7, 18 Balaam's parable.

1 AND Balaam said unto Balak, Build me here seven altars, and prepare me here seven oxen and seven rams.

CHAP. XXIII.

Ver. 1. Build me here] Upon one of the high places; which Balaam, it is likely, pitched upon as fit for his purpose.

Seven altars.] The number seven was much observed, we find among the Hebrews, by God's order (see Lev. iv. 6), but we never read of more than one altar built by the patriarchs, when they offered their sacrifices; nor was more than one allowed by Moses. Therefore in this there was something of the heathen superstition; who, worshipping the sun (who is principally meant by Baal), offered also to all the seven planets: unless we allow the conjecture of Fortunatus Seacchus, who imagines, that as Moses erected twelve pillars, according to the number of the children of Israel, when he entered them into the covenant of God (Exod. xxiv. 4), so Balaam ordered seven altars to be erected, according to the number of the principal houses of Moab (Myrothec. Sacr. Elæochrysm, par. ii. cap. 59). But there is no ground for the conceit of Abarinell, who, in his preface to Leviticus (sect. 4), saith, Balaam ordered this in emulation of the seven acceptable altars to God, built by seven men famous for piety; viz. Adam, Abel, Noah, Abraham, Isaac, Jacob, and Moses. There is more certainty in this, that these altars were erected in honour either of the Most High, or of the greatest of their gods: for according to the account which both Festus and Servius have given us of the ancient times, they sacrificed to the celestial gods only upon altars (which were so called, because they were ære altæ, built high and lofty"), whereas to the terrestrial they sacrificed upon the earth; and to the infernal gods, in holes digged in the earth.

2 And Balak did as Balaam had spoken; and Balak and Balaam offered on every altar a bullock and a ram.

Prepare me here seven oxen and seven rams.] To offer one of each upon the several altars, as it follows ver. 2. This number was used by pious persons, both in these days (Job xli. 8), and in aftertimes (1 Chron. xv. 26).

Ver. 2. Balak did as Balaam had spoken.] Caused the altars to be built (which was done, either of stones, or of turf), and the sacrifices to be brought.

Offered on every altar a bullock and a ram.] Kings, in ancient times, were priests also; as appears by Melchizedek: but perhaps Balak only presented the sacrifices to be offered for him, and for his people; and Balaam performed the office of a priest. The only doubt is, to whom these sacrifices were offered. I suppose each of them had their several intentions: Balak supplicating Baal by them; and Balaam making his prayer to the Lord, though with such superstitious ceremonies, it is likely, as were used by the worshippers of Baal; in one of whose high places these sacrifices were offered. But it may also be supposed, that Balaam telling Balak he could not effect any thing without the Lord, the God of Israel, persuaded him to join with him at present in his worship, that they might prevail with him to withdraw his presence from the Israelites: for there is no reason to think, that Balaam would go to inquire of the Lord, when he had sacrificed to other gods; and it appears evidently from ver. 4, that he pretended to sacrifice unto God; and would not have presumed surely to tell him so, if he meant otherwise.

3 And Balaam said unto Balak, Stand by thy burnt offering, and I will go: peradventure the LORD will come to meet me: and whatsoever he sheweth me I will tell thee. And he went to an high place.

4 And God met Balaam: and he said unto him, I have prepared seven altars, and I have offered upon every altar a bullock and a ram.

5 And the LORD put a word in Balaam's mouth, and said, Return unto Balak, and thus thou shalt speak.

Ver. 3. Balaam said unto Balak,] When he had laid the pieces upon the altars.

Stand by thy burnt offering,] Attend thy sacrifice, and pray to God to accept it. By this it appears, that these sacrifices were of a different nature from those mentioned in ch. xxii. 40, being burnt-offerings which were wholly consumed. And one of them seems to have been offered particularly for Balak, which he calls his burnt-offering; as the rest were for the princes of Moab, who, it is likely, stood by them representing all the people.

And here it is to be observed, that, in old time, before the law of Moses was given, burnt-offerings served for all purposes in Divine worship; whether they gave thanks for blessings, or deprecated evil things, or prayed for good. Thus Noah, when he returned thanks to God for his preservation in the ark, "offered burnt-offerings" (Gen. viii. 20). And when Job besought God to pardon his sons (ch. i. 5), and his friends (ch. xlii. 8), he offered sacrifices of this sort: and so did Balak and Balaam here use them, to procure blessings upon Moab, and a curse upon Israel.

I will go:] By myself, into some private place, to consult with God, and to exercise his enchantments (as may be gathered from ch. xxiv. 1), whereby he thought he might prevail for such a power as he desired, of cursing the people of Israel.

Peradventure the Lord will come to meet me:] He durst not be confident, because he had lately opposed his proceeding (ch. xxii. 31), in a rightful manner.

Whatsoever he sheweth me:] Whatsoever he reveals to me, either by word or otherwise.

I will tell thee.] Deal faithfully with thee, and conceal nothing from thee.

He went to an high place.] Or rather, into a valley: for he was now in a high place when he sacrificed, and did not go into another high place, but down into the plain (as the Hebrew word properly signifies), where he might, in some solitary retirement, address himself to God, and expect his presence with him. So we translate it in the margin, he went solitary. Therefore, if we retain the other translation, it must be understood of some part of the high place, where he might be solitary, viz. into the grove, which high places seldom wanted. In these high places they built their temples, and had their oracles: as we learn from Justin, lib. xxiv. cap. 6, where he saith, the temple of Apollo positum est in monte Parnasso, &c., "was seated upon the mountain Parnassus:" and from Pausanias, who, speaking of the cave of Trophonius in Bœotia, saith, ἔστι δὲ τὸ μαντεῖον ἐνερὶ τὸ ἄσος ἐπὶ τοῦ ὄρους, "the oracle is in a grove upon a mountain." The like might be observed of other oracles: which may countenance this conjecture, that some such pretended oracle might be in this high place, where Balaam went for direction from God.

Ver. 4. God met Balaam:] Appeared unto him, as he had been wont to do in other places, ch. xxii. 9, 20, where the word Elohim is constantly used, as it is

6 And he returned unto him, and, lo, he stood by his burnt sacrifice, he, and all the princes of Moab.

7 And he took up his parable, and said, Balak the king of Moab hath brought me from Aram, out of the mountains of the east, saying, Come, curse me Jacob, and come, defy Israel.

8 How shall I curse, whom God hath not cursed? or how shall I defy, whom the LORD hath not defied?

9 For from the top of the rocks I see him, here and everywhere else, till we come to ver. 16, which strengthens the opinion, that the Lord hitherto spoke to him only by an angel.

He said unto him,] i. e. Balaam said unto God, when he saw him appear.

I have prepared seven altars, &c.] This shows he sacrificed unto God, and not unto Baal: and he represents it to God that he might be moved thereby to condescend to his desire. For sacrificing was a form of supplication, as we find in other places, particularly 1 Sam. xiii. 12, and that which he begged of God was, in all likelihood, that he would give him power to curse Israel.

Ver. 5. The Lord put a word in Balaam's mouth,] Told him what he should say. And therefore (saith Maimonides), he spake by the Spirit of God: which he makes account was the second degree of prophecy. Whence that description Balaam gives of himself, "He hath said, who heard the words of God" (par. ii. More Nevochim, cap. 45).

Thou shalt speak.] He commanded him to speak unto Balak, at his return to him, as he was instructed, and no otherwise. The words he bade him speak, are those that we read below (ver. 7, 8, &c.).

Ver. 6. Lo, he stood by his burnt sacrifice,] He found him in the very same posture wherein he left him (ver. 3), which shows Balaam did not go far, nor stay long before he returned; and that Balak was earnest in his supplications.

He, and all the princes] Who were concerned in the good success of his negotiation.

Ver. 7. He took up] A Hebrew phrase for speaking aloud.

His parable.] Or, prophetic speech; which was sometimes delivered in parables, properly so called: that is, not in plain words, but in apt figures and resemblances (concerning which see Maimonides, par. ii. cap. 43). But here the word parable signifies (as it doth in the book of Job) a weighty speech expressed in sublime and majestic words, Job xxvii. 1, xxix. 1.

Balak—hath brought me from Aram,] See ch. xxii. 5.

Out of the mountains of the east,] The country of Mesopotamia lay eastward of Moab: and that part of it towards Arabia was stony and mountainous (see Bochartus in his Phaleg, lib. ii. cap. 6).

Curse me Jacob, and come, defy Israel.] Two different expressions for the same thing; only the latter word (which we translate defy) imports something of fury; because he would have had him curse them in such a prophetic rage as should have the most direful effects upon them.

Ver. 8. How shall I curse, whom God hath not cursed? &c.] As much as if he had said, Balak desires of me that which is impossible. In the Jerusalem Targum this verse is thus paraphrased: "How shall I curse the house of Jacob, when the Word of the Lord hath blessed them? or how shall I diminish the family of Israel, when the Word of the Lord hath multiplied them?"

and from the hills I behold him: lo, the people shall dwell alone, and shall not be reckoned among the nations.

10 Who can count the dust of Jacob, and the number of the fourth part of Israel? Let me die the death of the righteous, and let my last end be like his!

11 And Balak said unto Balaam, What hast thou done unto me? I took thee to curse mine enemies, and, behold, thou hast blessed them altogether.

Ver. 9. For from the top of the rocks] Upon which he then stood, when he spake these words.

I see him,] As Balak desired he might (ch. xxii. 41), though for another purpose; that he might curse them.

From the hills I behold him:] The same thing again, in other words, according to the manner of the eastern people. And both these may relate, not only to the present view he had of the camp of Israel, but to their future settlement in their own land; wherein they were represented to him as dwelling securely, under the special protection of the Almighty.

The people shall dwell] In the land of Canaan.

Alone,] Not mingled with other nations, but separated from them by different laws, religion, and manners. It seems also to import their security and safety, by the situation of their country, and God's care of them.

Shall not be reckoned among the nations.] Be a peculiar people by themselves; and therefore not liable to the power of my curses, like other nations. All this came to pass, partly by the natural situation of their country, which was surrounded with high mountains, and rocky precipices, so that the coming to it was very difficult; but more especially by their rites and customs; and particularly by their diet, which restrained them from common conversation with other nations, because they could not eat of their food (swine's flesh, for instance, which was a delicate dish among the gentiles, was an abomination to the Israelites). By which means they were the better secured from learning the religion of the gentiles, having so little communication with them, that they were called by Diodorus Siculus, and others, an un-social people, and thought to have an enmity to the rest of the world.

Ver. 10. Who can count the dust of Jacob,] This may refer either to their present, or their future increase; which was so great, that they might be compared to the dust of the earth, or the sand on the sea-shore, which is without number. Hereby he confirmed the promise made by God to Abraham, Gen. xiii. 16, and to Israel, ch. xxvii. 14, where he saith expressly, "Thy seed shall be made as the dust of the earth."

The number of the fourth part of Israel?] Any one of their camps, every one of which was grown to a vast number: for the whole host of Israel was divided into four camps, under the standard of Judah, Reuben, Ephraim, and Dan (as we read in the second chapter of this book), one of which camps lay more plainly before him than the rest, viz. that on the west, under the standard of Ephraim.

Let me die the death of the righteous,] By the righteous he means Israel, who were now a people free from idolatry, which was the great crime of those days; and he desires either to be as happy as they in the other world, or that he might not die an immature and violent death, but enjoy such a long life here as was promised to them. The author of Sepher Cosri

12 And he answered and said, Must I not take heed to speak that which the Lord hath put in my mouth?

13 And Balak said unto him, Come, I pray thee, with me unto another place, from whence thou mayest see them: thou shalt see but the utmost part of them, and shalt not see them all: and curse me them from thence.

14 ¶ And he brought him into the field of Zophim, to the top of Pisgah, and built seven altars, and offered a bullock and a ram on every altar.

takes it in the former sense; alleging this place as a proof that a future state was believed in ancient times, though not so clearly expressed in the prophetic writings, as other things are: for there is a certain prayer, saith he, of one that prophesied by the Holy Ghost, who desired that he "might die the death of the righteous" (par. i. sect. 115).

And let my last end be like his!] Or, "let my posterity" (for so the word we here translate last end often signifies, Ps. cix. 13, Dan. xi. 4), or, "those that come after me," be like unto his descendants.

Ver. 11. What hast thou done unto me?] This is very surprising.

Behold, thou hast blessed them altogether.] Thou hast not only frustrated my desires in not cursing them, but, quite contrary, hast pronounced great blessings upon them. For so the Hebrew words signify, "Blessed them with blessings."

Ver. 12. Must I not take heed to speak that which the Lord hath put in my mouth?] He had told him so before, more than once (ch. xxii. 23, xxiii. 3), and now makes him judge, whether it was safe for him to disobey the Lord to comply with his desires.

Ver. 13. Come, I pray thee, with me unto another place,] He thought Balaam gave him a reasonable answer; and, therefore, gently entreats him to make a trial, whether God would be pleased to be more favourable to his desires if he sought him in some other place. For whatsoever Balaam thought of this matter, Balak was possessed of a superstitious fancy, that the very place or prospect had been a cause concurrent to produce the contrary effect to what he desired, and therefore entreated he would come with him to another, where he might not see too many of them at once.

From whence thou mayest see them:] It seems this was thought necessary to make their curses effectual; that they should have a sight of those whom they cursed, and that they should look upon them.

The utmost part of them,] The skirts of their camps.

And shalt not see them all:] He imagined, perhaps, that Balaam was afflicted at the sight of their multitude, and therefore durst not meddle with them.

Curse me them from thence.] He seems to desire him to curse only that small parcel of the Israelites whom he saw in the utmost part of the camp, hoping he might by degrees get them all, in like manner, destroyed.

Ver. 14. He brought him into the field of Zophim,] Or, as some translate it, unto Sede-Zophim; a place by the very name apt to enchant a superstitious mind with expectation of success, as Dr. Jackson speaks. It is thought by some to be so called from the watchers that were placed here, which the word Zophim imports.

To the top of Pisgah,] A very high mountain in the country of Moab, from whence one might see a great way, and take a view of all the parts of Canaan (Deut. iii. 27, xxxiv. 1, 2, &c.). But on that side of 15 And he said unto Balak, Stand here by thy burnt offering, while I meet the LORD yonder.

16 And the LORD met Balaam, and put a word in his mouth, and said, Go again unto Balak, and say thus.

17 And when he came to him, behold, he stood by his burnt offering, and the princes of Moab with him. And Balak said unto him, What hath the LORD spoken?

18 And he took up his parable, and said, it whither Balak brought him, Balaam could not see much of the camp of Israel. It is likely he thought by bringing him to a place so exceeding high, he should be nearer heaven, and so procure a more favourable audience than before.

Built seven altars, &c.] As he had done before at Balaam's desire, in another high place (ver. 1, 2), for there only he imagined their sacrifices would be acceptable. From hence Conradus Pellicanus concludes Balaam to have been a worshipper of the true God (as Jethro was), because he still continues to offer only such clean creatures as were wont to be sacrificed to him by his own people.

Ver. 15, Stand here by thy burnt offering.] The same direction which he had given before (ver. 3).

While I meet the Lord yonder.] In a place to which he pointed. Balaam made a peradventure of it before, whether the LORD would come to meet him or not (ver. 3), but now he confidently expects it; though he endeavoured (it appears from ch. xxiv. 1), still to compass his bad ends by his enchantments.

Ver. 16, The Lord met Balaam.] This is never said before, but only that God met him (by his angel, as the Jews interpret it), which I take to be much short of what is here said, that the LORD himself now met him; that is, there was a glorious appearance of the Shechinah to him (though not in such lustre, I suppose, as when it appeared to Moses), which so amazed him, that after this he never went so much as to inquire what he should say or do: for, though he doubted, perhaps, of what the angel said, yet now he was fully assured the Israelites must be blessed.

And put a word in his mouth.] Instructed him what he should say to Balak.

Go again unto Balak, and say] viz. All that we read ver. 18—20, &c. which is a great deal more than he had said before.

Ver. 17, He stood by his burnt offering, &c.] See ver. 6.

What hath the Lord spoken?] He was more solicitous to know his doom than he was before, when he asked no such question; and plainly demonstrated that he believed Balaam went to inquire of the LORD.

Ver. 18, Took up his parable.] See ver. 7.

Rise up, Balak, and hear;] If this word rise up hath respect to the outward reverence which was wont to be shown to all messages brought from God (which was expressed by rising up to receive them, as appears from the story of another king of Moab, Judges iii. 20), then, after the sacrifice was ended at which they stood, Balak sat down until Balaam could be ready to acquaint him with the mind of God. But it may have respect only to the mind, and signify, stir up thyself to attend; awaken thy thoughts, and listen to what I say.

Hearken unto me,] The same thing repeated with more earnestness: for to give ear, as the word is in the Hebrew, imports something more than merely to hear; viz. diligent and earnest attention of mind to what is spoken.

Rise up, Balak, and hear; hearken unto me, thou son of Zippor:

19 God is not a man, that he should lie; neither the son of man, that he should repent: hath he said, and shall he not do it? or hath he spoken, and shall he not make it good?

20 Behold, I have received commandment to bless: and he hath blessed; and I cannot reverse it.

21 He hath not beheld iniquity in Jacob, neither hath he seen perverseness in Israel: the

Ver. 19, God is not a man, that he should lie;] Do not imagine that God is like to one of us: he can by no sacrifices, or prayers, or other means, be induced to break his word; and therefore it is in vain for me any longer to importune him to curse Israel, when he hath said he will bless them.

Neither the son of man.] An usual variation of the expression of the same thing (Ps. viii. 4).

That he should repent;] Alter his mind, when he hath absolutely resolved any thing. Balak seems to have fancied, that by the change of the place where he sacrificed (ver. 13), he might procure a change of the Divine counsels.

Hath he said, and shall he not do it?] What should hinder? for he wants no power to execute his will; and he cannot be moved to revoke his word by better information; nor can any thing happen which he did not foresee, to make him do otherwise than he intended.

Or hath he spoken, and shall he not make it good?] This is the same with the former, after the prophetic manner of speaking, Omnia per juga repetendo (as Conradus Pellicanus glosses) ad exaggerationem: only the foregoing words may be thought to refer to his threatenings, and these to his promises.

Ver. 20.] In these words he applies the general proposition, in the foregoing verse, to this particular case: God hath ordered me to pronounce a blessing upon Israel, for he himself hath blessed them; and I can neither reverse that blessing, nor go against his order.

Ver. 21, He hath not beheld iniquity in Jacob, neither hath he seen perverseness in Israel.] Both the word aven (which we translate iniquity) and the word amal (which we translate perverseness) signify frequently in Scripture the highest wickedness, viz. idolatry. And so Onkelos here understood it, when he thus paraphrased these words: "I see that there are none who worship idols in the house of Jacob, nor any servants of trouble and vanity (so they called idols) in Israel." And accordingly the Vulgar Latin expressly translates this verse thus, "There is no idol in Jacob, nor is there any image seen in Israel:" which seemed so clear a truth to Jolannes Forsterus, a famous professor of the Hebrew tongue in the beginning of the Reformation, that, in his explication of both these words in his Lexicon, he saith, "From this place all the prophets borrow these phrases, and translated them to express impiety, i. e. idolatrous worship, devised according to men's own humours and desires, and by the instinct of the devil: for Moses was the fountain of all the prophets." Thus he writes upon the word  $\text{יָרָא}$ , and he repeats it again upon the word  $\text{לֹא}$ . So that this is the reason Balaam gives why God had blessed, and he could not curse them, because they were free from idolatry; unto which, unless they could be seduced, there was no hope that God would deliver them unto the power of their enemies: for which reason Balaam afterward counselled this prince to entice them to this sin by angry women, as the only way to move God to be angry with them.

There are indeed a great many that take these words in the common sense, for all manner of sin, which God is said not to see in this people, i. e. so as to mark it out for punishment; for though they were many ways great offenders, yet he had such an indulgent kindness to them, that he would not correct them for every sin which they committed. But this returns to the former exposition; that they were safe as long as they kept themselves from the great transgression, that is, idolatry.

The Lord his God is with him.] They worshipping God alone, were therefore under his special care and protection. Onkelos renders it, "the Word of the Lord his God is his help." And so the Jerusalem Targum.

The shout of a king is among them.] God being their king, he prophesies that they should always triumph over their enemies: for he alludes to the shouts which are made when a king or great captain returns victorious with the spoils of those he hath vanquished. So the meaning of the whole verse is this, in brief: Since they do not worship idols, but cleave to the Lord their God, and serve him alone, he is present with them, not only to preserve them from their enemies, but to give them glorious victories over them.

Ver. 22. God brought them out of Egypt;] That they might be his worshippers and servants, which if they continue he will not desert them. For God brought them forth from thence that they might be his peculiar people, and he their King and their God, as he often saith himself, Lev. xi. 45, xxii. 23, xxv. 38; Numb. xv. 41, all which places are observed by the author of Sopher Cosri (par. ii. sect. 50).

He has as it were the strength of an unicorn.] Some would have this referred to God, who brought them out of Egypt by a mighty power; because he speaks in the plural number of those to whom the former sentence belongs. But this is no good reason; for the Scripture frequently varies the number, when the same person is spoken of. And in ch. xxiv. 8, it is expressly said, "God brought him (i. e. Israel) out of Egypt; and he hath the strength," &c., which every one allows is spoken of the Israelites, who are said to have the strength of this creature, with whom they are compared; or rather the height, as the Hebrew word certainly signifies, Ps. xcv. 4, "The strength of the hills (or rather, the heights of the hills, as it is in the margin) is his also;" and Job xxii. 25, "The Almighty shall be thy defence, and thou shalt have plenty of silver." So the sense led our interpreters to translate the Hebrew word reem, which may be literally here rendered great heaps of silver. These are the only places where this word is found. The only difficulty is, what creature it is which is here called reem; which we translate (as many others have done) an unicorn: which, though most now take to be a fabulous creature that is not in being, yet Tho. Bartholians, in his Anatomical Histories (Centur. ii. Histor. 51), tells us, that an ambassador from the king of Guinea to the duke of Courland, assured him, at Copenhagen, that there is a beast in Africa of the bigness of an ordinary horse, very swift and fierce, which hath a horn in its forehead about three spans in length; the dead carcass of which he had seen, though never one alive. But if this be supposed to be true, it is not the creature here meant; for it is plain by the Scripture that the reem hath two horns, Deut. xxxiii. 17), where we read of the horns of the unicorn (as we translate it), to which the two tribes of Ephraim and Manasseh are compared (see also Ps. xxii. 27). Therefore the famous Bochartus, after a long discussion of other opinions, thinks it most probable that the reem is a kind of goat, which the Arabians called algazel, and is now called gazellas; which is a tall creature (some of them as high as a stag) with long and sharp horns. So that Balaam foretells the Israelites should be as eminent among other people as the reem was among other kinds of goats. Unless we will think it refers to what the Arabians observe, that it is proper to this animal to carry his head very high, and to erect his ears, which is an excellent emblem of the people of Israel; who being lately oppressed in Egypt, were asserted by God into a state of liberty, and raised to a great height of glory, in order to be advanced unto a higher (Hierozoicon, par. i. lib. iii. cap. 27). At this Onkelos seemed to have aimed, when he translates these words thus, "fortitude and exaltation are his;" taking reem not for a proper name but for an appellative, as if it were derived from ranam, which signifies to exalt. I shall only add, that there is one who refers these words neither to God nor to the Israelites, but to Egypt before mentioned; as if the sense was, Though the Egyptians were as strong as a unicorn, they were not able to detain the Israelites any longer in bondage to them; but God brought them thence with a mighty hand and outstretched arm: so Joseph. Hispanus (lib. iii. Ikaurim, cap. 8).

Ver. 23. Surely there is no enchantment against Jacob, neither is there any divination against Israel:] Neither I, nor anybody else, have power to hurt them, by all the secret arts of sorcery and soothsaying which are practised in the world. It is not proper here to mention the various sorts of them; but it is manifest, from ancient history, that these curious arts (as St. Luke calls them) had got a kind of sovereignty in the eastern nations, who for many ages were much addicted to them. One of our own church hath said many excellent things concerning the original of this sorcery and idolatry, which commonly accompanied each other; to whom I refer the reader (see Dr. Jackson's Original of Unbelief, &c., cap. 19). The Vulgar Latin takes these words as if they were spoken in praise of the Israelites, that there were no enchantments or divinations used among them, nor any other diabolical arts, which were forbidden by their law in several places. From these they being as free as from idolatry (mentioned ver. 21), they were secure of God's favour to them. And so we acknowledge, in the margin of our Bibles, the words may be translated, "There is no enchantment in Jacob, or among them:" from which God intended in all ages to preserve them by the prophets he raised up to them. And thus R. Solomon expounds this verse, either to signify that they could not be cursed, because they were not given to enchantments and divinations; or that they needed not to make use of diviners and magicians, having all that was needful for them to know revealed to them by God's prophets, and by urim and thummim, &c.

According to this time it shall be said—What hath God wrought!] The LXX. translate the first words κατά καιρὸν, "when time shall be;" or, upon all occasions: not only now, but in future ages, men shall relate with admiration what God hath wrought for this people; not only in bringing them out of Egypt, but in conducting them into Canaan; in drying up Jordan, as he did the Red Sea; and subduing the Canaanites, as he overthrew Pharaoh and his host, &c. If there be any difference between Jacob and Israel, the former signifies this people when they were in their low estate, and the latter, when they were eminently exalted: in both which God did wonderful things for them, which astonished all that observed.

Ver. 24. Behold, the people shall rise up as a great lion.] The Hebrew word labi certainly signifies a lioness, which is no less, but rather more fierce than a lion, and so represented by Herodotus (lib. iii. cap. 103), and many other authors mentioned by Bochartus in his Hieroicoicon (par. i. lib. iii. cap. 1).

Lift up himself as a young lion.] The Hebrew word ari is used in general for any lion whatsoever, without respect unto age. They that would have it signify a younger sort, take it for a lion full grown and adult (as they speak), of a middle age, between cephir, which signifies a young lion, and sachel, which signifies an old. And the Israelites are here said to rise up, and to lift up themselves, like to these fierce creatures, to signify their assaulting their enemies with an undaunted courage.

He shall not lie down until he eat of the prey.] Which lions rend and tear with their claws and teeth, irresistibly and speedily. So the Hebrew word tereph (which we render prey) imports; the flesh of beasts torn in pieces.

Drink the blood of the slain.] He alludes to the ravenousness of lions; and signifies the entire and perfect victory the Israelites should win over their enemies. For this prophecy hath a peculiar respect to the conquest of the Canaanites under the conduct of Joshua.

Ver. 25.] It seems he thought his blessings to be as powerful as his curses; and therefore desires him to forbear both, if he could not have what he desired.

Ver. 26.] As I cannot do any thing against the mind and will of God, so I must do as he bids me (ver. 3, 12).

Ver. 27. Come,—I will bring thee unto another place.] Still he fancies, according to the superstition of those days, there might be something unlucky in the place, that made his prayers unsuccessful; which might prove acceptable in another. For, as the Syrians imagined in future ages, that some gods were powerful in the hills who could do nothing in the plains (1 Kings xx. 23, 28), so, it seems, there was such a conceit at this time in these countries, that some gods delighted more in one hill than they did in another; for he still brings Balaam to another high place. Such a conceit we see remains to this day in the Romish church, where the lady and the rood of one place are thought far more powerful, and therefore more frequented than those of another.

Peradventure it will please God that thou mayest curse me them.] He said nothing of God's permission before (ver. 13), but now was convinced his consent was to be gained; and would not despair of it, but thought it possible that very thing might seem right and good in his eyes (as the Hebrew phrase here is) in a new place, which displeased him in both the former.

Ver. 28. Unto the top of Peor.] This was the most famous high place in all the country of Moab; where, as Mr. Selden conjectures, Baal had a temple, and was worshipped; and thence called Baal-Peor. So Theodoret and Suidas Βίβλ. ὁ Κρόνος, Φεγγυρ δὲ ὁ τόπος ἐν τῷ ἱμαῦτο. "Beel signifies Saturn, and Phegor (or, as we pronounce it, Peor) the place where he was worshipped." Just as the Greeks called Jupiter by the name of Olympius, and Mercurius of Cylenius, &c. And, in all likelihood, by Beth-Peor (Deut. xxxiv. 6), which in English is the house of Peor, in the land of Moab, is meant the temple of Baal which stood upon the mountain, for so the word Beth signifies frequently among the Hebrews, not an ordinary house, but the house of some god; as Beth-Ashtaroth (1 Sam. xxxi. 10), and Beth-Baal (1 Kings xvi. 32). And there is often mention of Beth-shemesh in the holy writings (Joshua xv. 10, Judges i. 33, and many other places), which signifies "the temple of the sun;" from whence the word Baïasmas, among the Arabians upon the Red Sea, which Stephanus (De Urbibus) expounds, ὁ οἶκος τοῦ ἡλίου, "the house of the sun" (see Syntagma l. De Diis Syris, cap. 5).

Ver. 29.] He orders the very same sacrifices he did at first, without any difference (ver. 1), either not knowing any other method of obtaining their desires, or thinking it in vain to devise any other.

Ver. 30. Balak did as Balaam had said.] He was wholly governed by Balaam in this; and though he changed the place, made no alteration in the sacrifice, which was as complete and perfect as any in those times offered.

Here is no mention made of the time when these things were done; but we may be certain all the three forementioned solemn sacrifices, in the three several places, were not offered upon one and the same day. And superstitious people, as all histories tell us, having been as curious in the choice of days as well as places, it is probable that Balak picked out some day or hour which he thought might be more lucky to him than the foregoing.

CHAPTER XXIV.

1 Balaam, leaving divinations, prophesieth the happiness of Israel. 10 Balak in anger dismisseth him. 15 He prophesieth of the Star of Jacob, and the destruction of some nations.

1 AND when Balaam saw that it pleased the LORD to bless Israel, he went not, as at other times, to seek for enchantments, but he set his face toward the wilderness.

2 And Balaam lifted up his eyes, and he saw Israel abiding in his tents according to their tribes; and the spirit of God came upon him.

CHAP. XXIV.

Ver. 1. When Balaam saw that it pleased the Lord] Of which he had given him a double proof, ch. xxii. 5, &c., 16, &c.

He went not, as at other times,] See ch. xxii. 3, 15. To seek for enchantments,] This implies that he had hitherto, in the process of his business, used some wicked arts to effect his ends, or desired to be directed to them; but being not able to obtain any thing, but commands cross to all his designs, he gave himself up wholly to the conduct of God's Holy Spirit, and did not so much as offer to seek for enchantments. In the Hebrew the words are, to meet with enchantments; unto which he hoped to be directed, that he might be able to curse Israel: for though he addressed himself to the true God (whom he calls the Lord, ch. xxiii. 26), yet it was in a superstitious way; with such rites and ceremonies of worship, as were not of God's appointment; but either devised by evil spirits, or very grateful to them; whereby he hoped to be shown by what means he might disable Israel, and deliver them into the hand of Balak. For the ancient magic derived from Zoroaster was nothing else, as Plato pretends (in Alcibiade i.) but the knowledge of Divine things, and the right way of worshipping God: and Apuleius saith the same of it, that it was diis immortalibus accepta, colendi eos ac venerandi pergnara, &c., "a science acceptable to the immortal gods, very skilful how to worship and honour them; being pious, and knowing in Divine things;" which sufficiently betrays this Divine knowledge (as they call it) to be impious; for Zoroaster instructed his disciples in the worship of the fire, as an emblem, at the best, of the sun; which they looked upon as a visible image of this invisible God, and upon that account worshipped it. After his time, it is manifest, this heavenly knowledge, as they esteem it, degenerated into more uncouth rites, and wicked arts, whereby they pretend to be able to make the gods do what they pleased. Pliny mentions an herb (lib. xxiv. cap. 17), which he saith the magicians used, quum Deos velint evocare, "when they would call out the gods," and draw them to their purpose. In which power they so gloried, that the witch in Apuleius threatened the gods themselves with the greatest mischief; and boasted she could deprive the stars of their light; and by her charms control, not only the moon, but the sun himself, and the gods of all sorts. And as for mankind, nothing is more known than those magical words, deovere, defigere, obligare; which are proper to the black art, as Salmasius observes (upon Solinus, p. 1091), which, by incantations, deprecations, direful execrations, herbs, fascinations, so confounded the mind of him who was thus devoted (as they term it), that he could remember nothing of what he was about, nor discharge any function of nature. The several species of it are mentioned by Maimonides, who saith the Zabii pretended to exercise this power, not only over particular persons, but over whole provinces, by certain words, and actions, and things, which nobody can understand to have any virtue in them (More Nevochim, par. iii. cap. 37).

He set his face toward the wilderness,] He stirred not from the place where the sacrifice was offered as he had been wont to do, but only looked towards the wilderness, where the Israelites lay encamped (ch. xxii. 1).

Ver. 2. Balaam lifted up his eyes,] To look round about him.

He saw Israel abiding in his tents, &c.] In the order God had appointed in the second chapter of this book, ver. 52, where he commands them "to pitch their tents, every man by his own camp, and by his own standard throughout their hosts."

The spirit of God came upon him,] From whence Maimonides concludes, he was a prophet of the second rank who spake by the Holy Ghost (More Nevochim, par. ii. cap. 45).

Ver. 3. He took up his parable,] He pronounced what follows with a loud voice, that all might hear. For so the Hebrew words may be interpreted, "he lifted up his parable" (see ch. xxiii. 7).

Balaam—hath said,] Though the Spirit of God came upon him, which suggested the words mentioned, ver. 5—7, &c., yet it did not alter the temper and disposition of his mind; which was no less vain and ambitious than it was covetous, and possessed with a hatred of the Israelites; as appears by the counsel which he gave, at last, how to ruin them: this vanity seems to be expressed in these, and in the following words, wherein he magnifies himself more than the Spirit of God.

The man whose eyes are open] Who when he was awake received revelations from God, which was an extraordinary favour; for commonly he appeared to men in a dream. Others translate it, "whose eyes were shut," i. e. who was in a trance or ecstasy, so that he saw nothing with his bodily eyes, but only with his mind. The Jerusalem Targum thus paraphrases these words (which shows he looked upon them as a boasting of himself), "The man said, who was honoured above his brethren; to whom that was revealed, which was hidden from all the prophets."

Ver. 4. Which heard the words of God,] Mark what he saith, who delivers the words which he received from God.

Which saw the vision of the Almighty,] With whom he was so familiar, that he himself, at last, appeared to him in a vision (ch. xxiii. 16), as at first he appeared to him by an angel (ch. xxii. 35).

Falling into a trance,] There being in the Hebrew only the word nophel, which signifies falling, we supply the sense by adding into a trance; lest any one should think he fell to the ground, or fell asleep; which seems not to be the meaning; but that he was in a rapture, perceiving nothing by his outward senses. Yet the forementioned Targum takes it as if he had fallen flat on his face; and the LXX. translate it, "he saw the vision of God in sleep;" according to that, Gen. xv. 12, "a deep sleep fell upon Abraham;" where the word naphela is thought by some to give a good explication of nophel in this place.

Having his eyes open.] His mind being then possessed with a clear apprehension of things, which God revealed to him, when his senses were all locked up, and could discern nothing.

Ver. 5. How goodly are thy tents, O Jacob, and thy tabernacles, O Israel!] The same thing expressed in different words; which was an usual elegancy in those countries: wherein he declares his admiration of the beautiful order in which he saw them pitched in the plains of Moab.

Ver. 6. As the valleys are they spread forth.] This refers either to the tabernacles, which extended themselves on either side of a wide space, which, like a valley, lay between; or rather, to the Israelites themselves, whom he compares to the fruitful valleys which abound with water: for the Hebrew word signifies either valleys or brooks.

As gardens by the river's side.] Which were far more green and flourishing, cool and pleasant, than those that lay in dry places.

As the trees of lign aloes.] Growing in those gardens, or by the river's side; which perfumed the air by their sweet odours. For there are two sorts of aloes observed by the ancients; the one a tree which was very odoriferous, called καλαμος Ινδικος, and Ερυθραϊος, growing in India and Arabia; and the other a plant or herb, out of which was pressed a purging juice: the former is often joined with myrrh in the Holy Scripture, and was burnt as a perfume, and called by the ancients ξυλαρός (as Salmasius observes in his Exercit. Plin. upon Solinus, p. 1053, 1054, &c.), which is the lign or wood-aloes here spoken of. And Plutarch, in his Symposiacs (lib. vi. cap. 7), saith, some were wont to colour their wine, ἢ ἀλόαις, ἢ κυναμώμοις, "either with aloes, or with cinnamons" (which is meant of this wood-aloes), which gave the wine a pleasant taste.

Which the Lord hath planted.] Which grew naturally of themselves (solo Dei nutu, as Bochartus glosses), without any labour, care, or art of men used about them.

As cedar trees beside the waters.] The cedar was one of the most goodly trees in those countries, upon many accounts, particularly for its fragancy; the Greeks being wont to burn the wood of it upon their altars, as the same Salmasius there observes (p. 951, 952). By all these metaphors, Balaam sets forth the present and future prosperity of the Israelites, and their fame, which spread itself into all nations round about: and seems to be represented by the sweet odours here mentioned.

Ver. 7. He shall pour the water out of his buckets,] I take this to be meant of God's pouring down rain abundantly, out of the clouds, upon the valleys, garding shall be higher than Agag, and his kingdom shall be exalted.

8 God brought him forth out of Egypt; he hath as it were the strength of an unicorn: he shall eat up the nations his enemies, and shall break their bones, and pierce them through with his arrows.

9 He couched, he lay down as a lion, and as a dens, and trees, unto which the Israelites are compared; signifying that they should be exceedingly blessed by him: for they stood in need of nothing more than rain in those countries.

His seed shall be in many waters.] Or, "by many waters;" i. e. be sown in a ground well watered, and consequently bring forth a plentiful crop (Isa. xxxii. 20). There are those who refer both these to their numerous posterity; procreation of children being sometimes expressed in Scripture by the metaphors of waters, and fountains, and cisterns, as every one knows. And both the LXX. and Onkelos interpret this of one particular person that should arise of their seed. For thus the former of them renders this part of the verse; "There shall come a Man out of his seed, who shall rule over many nations." And the latter of them paraphrases in this manner; "There shall be a great King, who shall be anointed of his children, and shall have dominion over many people;" which the Jerusalem Targum saith expressly is Christ: for thus this verse begins in that paraphrase: "A king shall arise out of his sons, and their Redeemer from among them," and thus concludes; "and the kingdom of the king Messias shall be magnificently exalted."

His king shall be higher than Agag.] This seems to have been the name of all the kings of the Amalekites (for we read of one called Agag long after this time, 1 Sam. xv. 8, 9), as Abimelech was the name of the Philistine kings, and Pharaoh of the Egyptian. And at this time, no nation thereabouts was in greater reputation than the Amalekites (ver. 20), who thought themselves able to obstruct the Israelites' passage into Canaan; and gave a very early proof of the high opinion of their own power and prowess, by attacking the Israelites as soon as they came out of Egypt. Balaam therefore foretells the king of Israel should be the greatest of all other (for he was acquainted with none higher than Agag); which some think hath a peculiar respect to their first king Saul, who subdued the Amalekites, and took Agag captive. But his successor was far greater than he; and the Jews themselves think this hath its full completion in the Lord Christ.

His kingdom shall be exalted.] They shall increase and multiply, till their kingdom be greatly enlarged; as it was in the days of David and Solomon, who were but shadows of the great king Messiah.

Ver. 8. God brought him forth out of Egypt;] All the power of Egypt could not detain them in slavery; but they came out from thence with a strong and high hand (Exod. xiii. 9, xiv. 8), and are grown a mighty people. See the foregoing chapter (ver. 22), where this hath been explained.

He shall eat up the nations] Utterly destroy the seven nations of Canaan.

Shall break their bones,] So that they shall never recover their strength.

Pierce them through with his arrows.] Having given them their deadly wound: or, as some translate the Hebrew words, "break their arrows in pieces;" i. e. quite disarm them.

Ver. 9. He couched, he lay down] He prophesies that the Israelites, having conquered the Canaanites, great lion: who shall stir him up? Blessed is he that blesseth thee, and cursed is he that curseth thee.

10 ¶ And Balak's anger was kindled against Balaam, and he smote his hands together: and Balak said unto Balaam, I called thee to curse mine enemies, and, behold, thou hast altogether blessed them these three times.

11 Therefore now flee thou to thy place: I thought to promote thee unto great honour; but, lo, the Lord hath kept thee back from honour.

12 And Balaam said unto Balak, Spake I not also to thy messengers which thou sentest unto me, saying,

13 If Balak would give me his house full of should settle in their land, and take their rest, and live securely: which he speaks of with such confidence, as if it were already done.

As a lion, and as a great lion.】 See ch. xxiii. 24, the signification of ari and labi.

Who shall stir him up?】 Give them any disturbance. It is observed of lions, that they do not betake themselves to remote or secret places, when they go to sleep; but lie down anywhere (as Oppianus describes them, lib. iii.), as if they understood, that let them sleep where they pleased, nobody durst meddle with them (see Bochartus in his Hierozoicon, par. i. lib. iii. cap. 2), and therefore being applied to the Israelites, signifies such an absolute and secure possession of the land of Canaan, that none should have the boldness to assault, or give them any disquiet: which came to pass chiefly in the days of David and Solomon.

Blessed is he that blesseth thee, &c.】 These are the very words wherewith Isaac concluded his blessing of his son Jacob (Gen. xxvii. 29), which God now confirmed from the mouth of one of their enemies, who spake, at this time, by his Spirit.

Ver. 10. Balak's anger was kindled against Balaam.】 He could no longer forbear to express his indignation, to be thus treated by Balaam (whom he had sent for a great way, and entertained for some time), and therefore stopped him from proceeding, for the present, any further in his prophecy.

And he smote his hands together.】 A token of vehement anger (Ezek. xxi. 17).

Balak said unto Balaam.】 It is likely he was so full of wrath, that he could not speak presently, but expressed it only in his looks and actions.

I called thee to curse mine enemies, &c.】 Thou hast not said one word to my purpose, but all quite contrary.

These three times.】 Though I have been at great expense, and built altars, and offered many sacrifices, in three several places; but at what distance of time, one from another, doth not appear.

Ver. 11. Therefore now flee thou to thy place.】 Get thee home immediately, and stay not a moment longer here; for that is imported in the word flee, which indicates that he could not endure the sight of him, while he remained thus angry: and, as he banished him his presence, so he commanded him to make all possible haste out of his country.

I thought to promote thee unto great honour.】 And to bestow as much wealth upon him as he desired; which is included in the word honour (ch. xxiii. 17).

Lo, the Lord.】 Whom thou pretendest to obey.

Hath kept thee back from honour.】 By not permitting thee to comply with my desire. It is uncertain whether these words were spoken in anger and scorn, or seriously and in good earnest; believing he was silver and gold, I cannot go beyond the commandment of the Lord, to do either good or bad of mine own mind; but what the Lord saith, that will I speak?

14 And now, behold, I go unto my people: come therefore, and I will advertise thee what this people shall do to thy people in the latter days.

15 ¶ And he took up his parable, and said, Balaam the son of Beor hath said, and the man whose eyes are open hath said:

16 He hath said, which heard the words of God, and knew the knowledge of the most High, which saw the vision of the Almighty, falling into a trance, but having his eyes open:

hindered by the Lord's will and pleasure from cursing Israel; which he had more reason to believe, than he had to hope he might obtain liberty to curse them (ch. xxiii. 27), and therefore was, without all reason, in this passion against Balaam.

Ver. 12. Balaam said unto Balak.】 Prayed Balak to hear him patiently a few words before he departed.

Spake I not also to thy messengers—saying.】 Did not I, before I saw thee, tell those that came to invite me to thee, the very same which I told thee afterward.

Ver. 13. If Balak would give me, &c.】 So he told his messengers (ch. xxii. 18).

Of mine own mind.】 According as I please.

What the Lord saith, that will I speak.】 So he told Balak himself (ch. xxii. 38). All which he recalls to his mind, to show him that there was no cause for his anger, he having performed as much as he undertook; which was to follow God's directions, as he had done strictly. And it is likely, that by this just representation of what had passed between them, he brought Balak to a cooler temper, so that he suffered him to go on, to deliver what follows.

Ver. 14. And now, behold, I go unto my people.】 And now I will obey thee, as well as God, and be gone to my own country.

I will advertise thee, &c.】 But before I go, permit me to give thee some advice. So the Hebrew word jaalz constantly signifies, "to give counsel." And so the Vulgar here translates it; but took it for the wicked advice, which we read, in the next chapter, was executed after Balaam's departure, and of which he was certainly the author (ch. xxxi. 16), and therefore thus translates the next words, "What thy people shall do unto this people." But the Hebrew text and the LXX. are directly contrary unto this; being as we translate the words, "What this people shall do to thy people." Therefore Onkelos, to take in the foregoing sense, without altering the latter part of the verse, puts in one word, and makes the whole run thus: "I will give thee counsel what to do, and (will show thee) what this people shall do to thy people in the latter days." And the Jerusalem Targum more largely and plainly, "I will advise thee what thou shalt do to this people; make them to sin: otherwise thou shalt not have dominion over them; but this people shall not domineer over thy people in the latter end of days."

In the latter days.】 In future ages. This shows the foregoing words do not speak of what Moab should do to Israel by his advice; for that was done as soon as he was gone.

Ver. 15. Balaam, the son of Beor hath said.】 This was the preface to his foregoing prophecy (see ver. 3).

Ver. 16. He hath said, which heard the words of God, &c.】 This verse also is the same with the fourth, only a few words added, "And knew the knowledge

17 I shall see him, but not now : I shall behold him, but not nigh : there shall come a Star out of Jacob, and a Sceptre shall rise out of Israel, and shall smite the corners of Moab, and destroy all the children of Sheth.

18 And Edom shall be a possession, Seir also of the Most High;" which he adds, to show his intimate acquaintance with the supreme Lord of the world. For he speaks of God in the very same style which Moses doth, calling him both El and Schaddai, and Elijon, and Jehovah; which demonstrates that he was not a stranger to the true God, though corrupted with bad affections, and addicted also to foul superstitions.

Ver. 17. I shall see him,] Or, I do see him (for the future tense is often used for the present); that is, he saw the person of whom he was going to speak, represented to him in a vision.

But not now] He saw him not as in being, now at present, but to come in future times.

I shall behold him, but not nigh:] The same thing in other words; but more plainly telling them, they must not expect this person in their time, nor in the next generation, but in remoter ages.

There shall come a Star out of Jacob,] A star denotes a great person; and being understood to be spoken of Christ, it denotes his celestial original. And both Onkelos, and Jonathan, and the Jerusalem Targum take the Messiah to be here meant; and so doth R. Moses Haddarsan, and Bereschith Rabbath, and a great many Christian interpreters (as Huetius observes, in his Demonstr. Evang. propos. vii. sect. 9), particularly Eusebius and Cyril of Alexandria: who, in his eighth book against Julian confutes his exposition of these words, which is this: Τουδ' ουτι τω Δαβιδ προσήκει και τοις απ' εκεινου, προδρόμων εστι αυτου. "That this belongs to David, and to his successors, is sufficiently manifest." To which St. Cyril replies, that if Balaam had spoken of David, and the kings of Israel, he would have said, "There shall arise stars out of Jacob," &c., whereas he speaks of one alone, ομον εν αστροις εκπροτην, "as very illustrious among the stars;" which, it is evident, can be none but Christ. Unto which I shall add the words of a later writer of the Jewish nation, R. Isaac, in his Illumin. Fidei, set forth not long ago by the learned Wagensell, where he argues, this cannot be understood of David, or any other king of Israel, because none of them ever reigned all over the earth (i. e. over all the children of Sheth, whom none of them destroyed), but it is meant, he concludes, of the Messiah; who is compared to a star, because of the perennity of his kingdom, and the splendour of his dominion, and his great acts throughout the world, p. 72 and 80, where he makes this a prophecy of one kingdom alone to be in the world, viz., that of the Israelites, who are called "the people of the saints of the Most High," Dan. vii. 87, which is true enough, if he had understood the right meaning of Israelites; who are those, not after the flesh, but after the spirit.

It is not fit to conclude this without one observation more: that so long ago as the time of the Emperor Adrian, this was understood by the generality of the Jews to be a prophecy of the Messiah. For they followed one whose name was Chocob (i. e. a star), to whom the famous R. Akiba (a doctor, who, they say, had four-and-twenty thousand scholars) applied these words of Balaam, and calling him Barchocob, i. e. "the son of a star," anointed him their king, and carried a sword before him, crying, "Behold the very king Messiah!" This is reported by the Jews themselves in Tzenach David, and several other books: all which, I think, doth not hinder, but that king David may be hereby signified in the first sense; though as a type of the Messiah, the great son of David, in whom it was completed.

A Sceptre shall rise out of Israel,] This some think may first have a respect to David, and then to the Messiah, the king of Israel. But the Chaldee paraphrast refers the whole to Christ, whose words are these, "A king shall arise out of the house of Jacob, and the Messiah shall be anointed of the house of Israel." Nor is it any wonder that Balaam should prophesy of him so many years before he was born; and so plainly, that Moses himself doth not speak in plainer terms: but it is to be looked upon as the effect of God's infinite goodness, who would not have those, that were not of the seed of Abraham, to be wholly ignorant of what he intended to do for all mankind. And this was necessary to be plainly told them, because otherwise they would not have understood it.

Smite the corners of Moab,] The latter part of this prophecy, Huetius thinks, belongs to David, as the former part to Christ: which was the opinion of Maimonides, who divided the prophecy between them. And this was indeed literally fulfilled in David, who subdued the Moabites entirely, as we read 2 Sam. viii. 8; Ps. lx. 8, cviii. 9. Some translate these words, "he shall smite through the princes of Moab." So the LXX., τοις αρχηγουσιν Μοαβ: which doth not alter the sense. And it is no unusual thing with the prophets when they intend to speak of something nearer to them, to be transported by the Spirit of God, to speak of things a great deal more remote. As Balaam, first foretelling a great Ruler should come out of Jacob, here speaks of the greatest of all, above fourteen hundred years after this time; and then of David, who reigned about four hundred years after this.

Destroy all the children of Sheth.] They who interpret this of David, take Sheth to have been some great person in that country, or some place of great note, the inhabitants of which are here threatened to be destroyed. But these are mere conjectures, which have no foundation in history; whereas, if we understand it of Christ, and translate the first word, not he shall destroy, but (as Castalio and others do), he shall rule over, that sense is very remarkable; it being a prophecy, that, in the times of the Messiah, there shall be no longer such a distinction as God now made between the Israelites and other nations by the peculiar laws he gave them at their entrance into Canaan), but all mankind, who are equally descended from Seth, shall be united under his government. And thus not only Lyranos, and Abulensis, and others interpret it, but Onkelos also, whose words are, "He shall have dominion over all the sons of men:" for he thought it reasonable, by the children of Sheth, to understand all mankind who were propagated from him, who succeeded in the place of Abel that was killed; all the seed of Cain perishing in the flood.

Ver. 18. Edom shall be a possession,] So it was in the days of David (2 Sam. viii. 14).

Seir also shall be a possession] This was a famous mount in the country of Edom (Gen. xxxvi. 8), and being the strongest part of the country, may signify here, that no place should be able to hold out, though never so strongly fortified by nature or art. And so we read they all became David's servants, 2 Sam. viii. 14; 1 Chron. xviii. 13.

For his enemies;] i. e. For the Israelites.

Israel shall do valiantly,] For they subdued in those shall be a possession for his enemies; and Israel shall do valiantly.

19 Out of Jacob shall come he that shall have dominion, and shall destroy him that remaineth of the city.

days many other countries; as we read in the fore-named chapters (2 Sam. viii. 1 Chron. xviii.).

Ver. 19. Out of Jacob shall come he that shall have dominion.] This may relate to Christ as well as to David, in whom it was literally fulfilled. And so Balaam observes, that (ver. 16), it is said of Balaam that he "knew the mind of the Most High," for he prophesied of the Messiah, when he said, "out of Jacob shall one come that shall have dominion." The word jerd, as the Masora notes, is used only here, and in Psalm lxxii. 8, where the Psalmist describes, the universal kingdom of Christ in these words, "He shall have dominion from sea to sea, and from the river unto the end of the earth.

Shall destroy him that remaineth of the city.] Not only rout them in the field, but take their defenced cities: and it is likely, he particularly aims at some great city, and best fortified, which was the metropolis, and the strongest hold in the kingdom; such a one there was in Edom, as the Psalmist suggests (Ps. lx. 9).

Ver. 20. When he looked on Amalek,] On the country which the Amalekites inhabited.

He took up his parable.] See ver. 3.

Amalek was the first of the nations;] The most eminent among the neighbouring nations, or one of the most noble, as Bochart renders it, gens una è nobilissimis.

But his latter end shall be that he perish for ever.] This God commanded Saul to execute (1 Sam. xv. 3), according to the doom passed upon them, after their fight with Israel (Exod. xvii. 14, 16), and he lost his kingdom for doing his work imperfectly; which the Vulgar Latin takes to be the meaning of the seventh verse of this chapter. Onkelos paraphrases the whole verse in this manner: "Amalek was the beginning of the wars with Israel, therefore his end shall be to perish for ever." The Jerusalem Targum more plainly, "The Amalekites were the first people that made war against Israel; and in the latter days they shall make war against them," &c.

Ver. 21. He looked on the Kenites,] He standing now upon the top of Peor, which was, it is likely, the highest place of the country (for which reason Balak brought him thither, after he had tried other high places, ch. xxiii. 28), might see a great way, and possibly behold the very rocks wherein the Kenites dwelt. But what people are meant by this name, is not clearly evident: for there were a people called Kenites, who were part of the nation that inhabited the land of Canaan (Gen. xv. 19): these cannot be here intended; for they were too far off from this place. And as for the Kenites mentioned in Judges i. 16, iv. 11, who dwelt among the Israelites when they came into Canaan, they had as yet no fixed state, but were with them in the wilderness. Therefore it is likely, they were some of the kindred of Jethro (originally derived from the same family that he was of), who remained in Midian; and adjoined so close to the country of the Amalekites, that they are said to dwell among them (1 Sam. xv. 6). For it is plain, the word Keni in Hebrew is the name of a people, not of a particular person: and there might be a great many of them; some in Canaan, others in Midian; and of these 21 And he looked on the Kenites, and took up his parable, and said, Strong is thy dwellingplace, and thou puttest thy nest in a rock.

23 And he took up his parable, and said, Alas, who shall live when God doeth this!

24 And ships shall come from the coast of latter, some went with the Israelites into Canaan when they conquered it, and others remained still in their own country; they seem all to have been descended from one Ken, or Kain, mentioned Judges iv. 11, (as Scaliger conjectures in his Elenchus Trihæres, cap. 23) Jethro's posterity being but one family of this people.

Strong is thy dwelling place.] They were but a small people, who dwelt upon steep mountains.

Thou puttest thy nest in a rock.] This is but a further description of their country in other words: for nest signifies their habitation; only it seems to import that their dwelling was little, in craggy mountains, where they looked upon themselves as very safe and secure, the access to them being very difficult: and from hence, I suppose, they were called Shelanites (as both the Jerusalem Targum and Onkelos here term them instead of Kenites), i. e. peaceable people; because nobody meddled with them, nor they with any body.

Ver. 22. The Kenite shall be wasted,] By little and little diminished.

Until Asshur shall carry thee away captive.] Till at last they were all carried away by the Assyrians, when they overran Syria (2 Kings xvi. 9).

Ver. 23. He took up his parable, and said,] Having rested awhile, he sighed, and said aloud (see ver. 3).

Alas, who shall live when God doeth this!] What miserable times will those be, when the Assyrians shall overrun a great part of the world! how few will escape their devastation! or, who would not desire rather to die, than live in those days!

But some, I observe, refer this not to what goes before, but to what follows; which relates to the desolations made by the following empires, especially the Roman.

Ver. 24. Ships shall come from the coast of Chittim.] Whether this prophecy hath respect (in the word Chittim) to the Greeks or to the Romans, or to both, it was plainly fulfilled, as the learned Huetius observes. But it must be noted, that not only St. Jerome, but Onkelos, and Jonathan, and the Jerusalem interpreter, and the Arabic, understand by Chittim the country of Italy, or some part thereof. And Bochartus proves, by many arguments, that the people of that country did descend from Chittim (see Gen. x. 4). Yet it is not likely that Chittim, being the son of Javan who peopled Greece, went so far at first from the rest of his brethren; but his children peopled some part thereabouts: from whence, in aftertimes, when they were increased, they sent colonies into Italy; particularly Macedonia is called by the name of Chittim, in the Book of Maccabees (1 Mac. i. 1, viii. 5); and therefore I take the Greeks under Alexander to be here intended in the first place, and then the Romans in the next; each of them fulfilling the several parts of this prophecy.

Shall afflict Asshur,] This was done by Alexander, who overthrew the Persian empire, which ruled over the Chaldeans and Assyrians. So Theodoret understands the word Chittim, to signify Alexander and his Macedonians, whose country was anciently called Chittim, and shall afflict Asshur, and shall afflict Eber, and he also shall perish for ever.

Maxétria, as Hesychius tells us, they being a mixture (as Mr. Mede probably conjectures in his forty-eighth Discourse, p. 377), of the sons of Madai and Chittim. The Romans, indeed, afterward overthrew the Greek empire, but we do not read that they made war against the Assyrians till the time of Trajan, who subdued them, and reduced them into a province, as Dio relates (lib. lxxviii.).

Shall afflict Eber.] This was done by the Romans, not by the Grecians. For we are to understand by Eber, the Hebrew nation, called the children of Eber, Gen. x. 21. So the LXX. translate it, τοὶ Ἑβραῖοι; the name of Hebrews being as plainly derived from Eber, as that of the Jews from Judah. Now they were not afflicted by Alexander in his conquests, but rather kindly treated by him: and therefore this cannot be meant of the Greeks; unless we will think it fulfilled in the time of Antiochus, who descended indeed from the Macedonians, but did not come from that country; nor did he afflict them long, much less make them desolate, as the Romans under Vespasian and Titus did; which seems to be here intended.

He also shall perish for ever.] This doth not refer to Eber, but to the nation that afflicted him, viz. the Roman empire; which he prophesies shall not always afflict others, but at last be utterly destroyed itself. Aben Ezra, indeed, refers it to the kingdom of the Seleucidæ, or the Greek empire: but R. Isaac, before mentioned, thinks the destruction of the Romans is intended in this prophecy; only he fancies it is to be accomplished by a Christ not yet come.

Ver. 25. Balaam rose up, and went] As Balak had commanded him (ver. 11).

And returned to his place.] Unto his country, viz. Mesopotamia. But he was detained by the Midianites in his passage thither: among whom he was slain, as we read in the thirty-first chapter: for men are said to do that which they design and endeavour to do (Exod. viii. 18; Numb. xiv. 40). If this be not the meaning, then, after he came to his own country, he returned to the Midianites, at their entreaty, or by his own inclination; and (either as he was going home, or when he came back) gave that impious counsel which was executed not long after this, as we find in the next chapter: for that he was the author of it, we are assured by three Divine writers (see 2 Pet. ii. 15; Jude, ver. 11; Rev. ii. 14).

It is a strange exposition which Baal Hatturim gives of his going to his place; that is, saith he, he went down into hell. But it may serve to confirm the common interpretation of that which is said of Judas, Acts i. 25.

Balak also went his way.] To Kiriah-Huzoth, I suppose, mentioned ch. xxii. 39.

CHAPTER XXV.

1 Israel at Shittim commit whoredom and idolatry. 6 Phinehas killeth Zimri and Cozbi. 10 God therefore giveth him an everlasting priesthood. 16 The Midianites are to be vexed.

1 AND Israel abode in Shittim, and the people began to commit whoredom with the daughters of Moab.

2 And they called the people unto the sacrifices of their gods: and the people did eat, and bowed down to their gods.

CHAP. XXV.

Ver. 1. Israel abode in Shittim.] A place in the plains of Moab (where they lay, while the forementioned things were transacted, ch. xxii. 1), called Abel-Shittim, ch. xxxiii. 49, but it is usual to cut off the former part of a place's name, for shortness' sake: as in this very book (ch. xxxii. 38), Baal-meon for Beth-Baal-meon, as it is called, Josh. xiii. 17, and Hermon commonly for Baal-Hermon; and Nimrim for Beth-Nimrim. To which may be added, Salem for Jerusalem (Ps. lxxvi. 3). This station was the last which the Israelites made, while they remained in the wilderness; in which the rest of the things that follow, to the end of the book of Deuteronomy were done.

The people began to commit whoredom] Both bodily and spiritual; into which they fell not long after Balaam was gone from Balak: though not all the people fell into this guilt, but a great many of them: as appears from what follows (ver. 4—6).

With the daughters of Moab.] And of Midian also, as we learn from ver. 6, 17, 18. But those of Moab are here alone mentioned; because, it is likely, they began this wicked practice. I see no ground for what Greg. Nyssen saith, that the Israelites having vanquished the Moabites in a battle, fell in love with the captives which they had taken, being overcome by lust, when they had been victorious in war; as he speaks, lib. De Vita Mosis, p. 186. It is something more probable, that the prophecy of Balaam being spread abroad among the Moabites concerning the great blessings God designed to bestow upon the Israelites, particularly that of the Messiah, it might excite in the women of Moab a desire to have children by the men of Israel, that they might partake in their blessings; unto which they might think they had some title, being descended from the eldest daughter of Lot, the son of Abraham's brother. This might pass for truth, if it were not very evident from the following story, that the daughters of Moab exposed themselves, by Balaam's counsel, to the lust of the Israelites, that by this means they might seduce them to idolatry, and so make them lose the blessings intended for them. For that this was done by Balaam's advice, there is no doubt (see ch. xxxi. 16). And the Jews have also a conceit that he ever had been an enemy unto Israel, being one of Pharaoh's privy-council, who advised him to drown their children; as the tale is told in the Talmud, in the title Sanhedrin, cap. ult. But this is to make him to have been now of a greater age than we have reason to believe (viz. two hundred and ten years old, according to their own computation), and quite contrary to what others of them say, that he lived but half his time, according to the Psalmist (Ps. lv. 23).

Ver. 2. And they] That is, the daughters of Moab. Called the people] Invited them to a feast: for the ordinary charms unto idolatry, were good victuals and bad women.

Unto the sacrifices of their gods.] To eat of the sacrifices which had been offered to their gods, particularly to Baal-Peor. These feasts upon their sacrifices were very magnificent among the heathen, being

3 And Israel joined himself unto Baal-peor: and the anger of the LORD was kindled against Israel.

4 And the LORD said unto Moses, Take all the heads of the people, and hang them up before the LORD against the sun, that the fierce anger of the LORD may be turned away from Israel.

accompanied with music and dancing, and sometimes pompous processions, which enticed youthful minds to partake of them. Here the Israelites, casting their eyes upon the daughters of Moab (which doubtless on this occasion appeared in the best dress and richest ornaments), were smitten with their beauty, and courted their enjoyment; who would not yield to this motion, but upon condition that they would first worship their gods; whereupon, pulling a little image of Peor out of their bosom, they presented it to the Israelites to kiss it, and desired them to eat of the sacrifices that had been offered to him. Thus the Jewish doctors tell the story. And indeed it hath been observed by the writers of the church, that women have been the most dangerous seducers of men from the true religion; being from the beginning the spreaders of the old heresies. For Simon Magus advanced his heresy, Helena meretricis adjutus auxilio, "being assisted by the help of the harlot Helena." Nicolaus of Antioch also, choros duxit fœmineos. The famous Marcion sent before him some Roman ladies to prepare his way. Apelles, Montanus, Arius, Donatus, did all take the same course; as St. Jerome shows in his book Adversus Pelagianos.

The people did eat.] Which was an act of idolatry (as to eat of the Lord's sacrifices was an act of Divine worship), whereby they owned themselves the servants of the gods of Moab (see Exod. xxxiv. 15).

Bowed down to their gods.] This was still a more plain act of idolatrous worship, expressly forbidden by God in the second commandment.

Ver. 3. Israel joined himself unto Baal-peor.] This seems to signify, that they were devoted to the service of this idol in great affection; with which they performed the forenamed actions. The Jews commonly take this Baal-Peor to have been no better than a Priapus; and the worship of him to have consisted in such obscene practices, or postures at least, as are not fit to be named. Particularly their great commentary upon Numbers saith, that the Israelites being unwilling to enjoy their women upon those terms, they told them they needed only to uncover their nakedness before Baal-Peor, which was all the worship required of them: unto which they easily submitted. This Maimonides relates for a truth, that his worship consisted in revealing their secret parts before him (More Nevochim, par. iii. cap. 45). But Solomon Jarchi goes further, making this worship to consist in actions as ridiculous as they were beastly. All which seems to me very unlikely, and so it doth to several men of great judgment, particularly Mr. Selden; who thinks, with great probability, that Peor (as I observed before, ch. xxiii. 26), being the name of a mount in the country of Moab, the temple of Baal stood upon it (by whom some understand Saturn, others the sun, which is most likely), and thence he was called Baal-Peor, because there he was especially worshipped; as Jupiter was called Olympius, because he was worshipped in a famous temple, which stood on the mountain Olympus. And every one knows, that anciently they chose the highest mountains, before all other places, for the Divine service; insomuch, that at Jerusalem the temple was set upon the hill of Sion, which the Psalmist saith God preferred before all other places (Ps. lxxviii. 68). Or Peor, perhaps, was the name of some great prince (as the same Mr. Selden conjectures), translated into the number of the gods: for the Psalmist saith (Ps.

cvi. 28), that when they worshipped Baal-Peor, they ate the sacrifices of the dead; which seems to signify, that in him they worshipped some dead man, who perhaps was the first institutor of this worship, whatsoever it was. Another great man of our own nation hath said much to strengthen this opinion; having shown at large, that the ancient heathens were wont to deify the souls of men, and canonize them after death: and these were called Baalim, being accounted an inferior sort of deities, who they fancied were ministers for them to their celestial gods (see Mr. Mede, book iii. p. 724, &c.). Yet it must be acknowledged, that there are others of great note who take all for truth which the Jewish writers report concerning the filthy worship of Baal-Peor, and imagine that fornication was a part of it; as in future times it was both among the Greeks and Romans, in the worship of some of their gods. For what the Jews found then practised, they fancied was done in these early days; but it was observable, that the more ancient the books of the Jews are, which speak of this matter, the less they say of the impurities in the service of Baal-Peor. For example, the Jerusalem Talmud had none of that lewd stuff in it, which Solomon Jarchi, upon this place, took out of the Babylonian; which was composed long after the former.

The anger of the Lord was kindled against Israel.] As appeared immediately, by the severe punishment he inflicted on them, both for their idolatry and for their fornication.

Take all the heads of the people, and hang them up.] The plain meaning seems to be, that he should take, i. e. cause to be apprehended, "the heads of the people," i. e. the rulers of thousands and hundreds, and other principal persons in their tribes, who had been guilty of the foul idolatry before mentioned; and by hanging them up, put a stop to the people's lewdness, when they saw these great men made public examples of God's displeasure. For it is very likely, more of the princes of the people were guilty besides Zimri; especially if it be true, which the Samaritan Chronicle affirms, that the daughters of the chief men of Moab were sent finely dressed to allure the Israelites; and one of the king's daughters among the rest. But, though the LXX. and the Vulgar, and Symmachus, thus understand it, that he commanded the heads of the people to be hanged up; yet a great many other ancient translators, and many famous doctors, take the word atham (them whom he commanded to be hanged up) not to refer to the heads of the people, but to such as had joined themselves to Baal-Peor; and they interpret the foregoing words, as if he had bid him "take unto him (i. e. to his assistance) the heads of the people," as they think he did, as is related in the next verse. The judges indeed, there mentioned, seem to be distinct from "the heads of the people;" and Moses did not take them to his assistance, but commanded them to do their duty. Yet it must be acknowledged that there is a great current of interpreters which runs the other way; as if Moses was commanded to order the judges to assemble and call before them such as were suspected; and having examined the fact, accordingly proceed against them, and punished such as had offended. Thus the Samaritan copy reads it expressly, and so Onkelos, and the paraphrast called Uzielides, and the Jerusalem Targum, and the Arabic translation of Saadia Gaon: and both the Talmudists and Karaites

5 And Moses said unto the judges of Israel, Slay ye every one his men that were joined unto Baal-peor.

6 ¶ And, behold, one of the children of Israel came and brought unto his brethren a Midianitish woman in the sight of Moses, and in the sight of all the congregation of the children of Israel, who were weeping before the door of the tabernacle of the congregation.

agree in this sense, as Mr. Selden shows at large, lib. ii. De Synedriis, cap. 1, n. 10, and Job. Coch upon the Gemara of the Sanhedrin, cap. 4, sect. 4, where he observes that Aben Ezra, and Solomon Jarchi thus interpret it, and takes the meaning to be certain, that the heads of the people should divide themselves into several courts of judgment, and examine who had committed idolatry; and after conviction cause them to be hanged. For there is great reason to think the constitution of judges, by Jethro's advice, continued all the time they were in the wilderness; who might easily find out the guilty in their several divisions.

Before the Lord] i. e. Before the sanctuary; as men who had forsaken the worship of their God, and by his sentence were adjudged to die.

Against the sun,] Openly, that all the people might see, and fear to sin. So both R. Solomon and Aben Ezra expound it. For this was a peculiar mark of the Divine displeasure against idolaters and blasphemers, that they should be hanged up, and publicly exposed, after they had suffered death. For none were hanged alive among the Hebrews; but first stoned (which was the common punishment of the forenamed offenders), and then hanged up in the eyes of all; as R. Solomon expounds this phrase against the sun.

That the fierce anger of the Lord may be turned away] By their zeal to vindicate the Divine honour.

Ver. 5. Moses said unto the judges] Some take these for the seventy elders, mentioned ch. xi. 25.

Slay ye] By hanging them up, as some understand it. But the Hebrew word imports killing with the sword; which they commanded their officers to do, with the assistance of such as abhorred the wickedness of their neighbours.

Every one his men] The seventy elders, being appointed to be coadjutors to Moses in the government, made a division of the people, it is most likely, into so many districts: and each of them having the charge of one, all the people therein are called his men; of whom he was to give an account.

That were joined unto Baal-peor.] Who were so well known, that there was no danger of slaying the innocent.

Ver. 6. And, behold.] This which follows is the more wonderful, if the judges had already begun to execute the foregoing command; and argues Zimri to have been very impudently wicked, who thought himself so great a man, that no judge durst meddle with him.

One—brought unto his brethren] In the camp of Israel, or into the tent where his own family dwelt.

A Midianitish woman] By which it appears that both nations, Moab and Midian, were in this plot against Israel.

In the sight of Moses,] A high contempt of his authority: and of God's also, whose servant Moses was.

In the sight of all the congregation] This seems to be a further aggravation of his sin, that he was not content to go to the women who invited them (ver. 2), but brought one of them along with him into the camp of Israel; and this he did before the face of all the people, as well as of Moses; and that when they were mourning for this sin, as it here follows.

7 And when Phinehas, the son of Eleazar, the son of Aaron the priest, saw it, he rose up from among the congregation, and took a javelin in his hand;

8 And he went after the man of Israel into the tent, and thrust both of them through, the man of Israel, and the woman through her belly. So the plague was stayed from the children of Israel.

Who were weeping before the door] This shows, that though there were great numbers engaged in this defection, yet the generality of the people clave unto the Lord, and bewailed the wickedness of their brethren, most earnestly imploring God's mercy towards them.

Ver. 7. When Phinehas,] A man of great authority, being next to the high-priest, whom he succeeded in his office, as he did Joshua (if we may believe some writers) in the government of all Israel.

He rose up] His spirit (as St. Luke speaks of St. Paul) was stirred in him; and being inspired with a holy zeal was moved to do what follows.

From among the congregation,] Who were weeping at the door of the tabernacle; or rather, from among the judges with whom he was assembled, being one of them: so Jonathan; he rose up from the midst of the Sanhedrin." For, as Bonav. Cornel. Bertramus thinks, Eleazar, after the death of Aaron, appointed his son Phinehas to be prince of the Levites; which he thinks appeared, not only from his rising up here, from the midst of the judges of Israel, but from the embassy, wherein he was employed by Joshua, unto the Reubenites, &c., beyond Jordan, Josh. xxii. 14, and from 1 Chron. ix. 20, where he is said to be ruler over the Korahites;" which signifies, he thinks, such a pre-eminence as Eleazar himself had over the Levites, while his father Aaron lived (De Reput. Jud. cap. 15). And indeed the Psalmist saith, that Phinehas stood up "and executed judgment" (Ps. evi. 39), which seems to import that he acted as a judge, but by an extraordinary motion: which made him kill the offenders with his own hands, without a judicial process against them.

Took a javelin in his hand;] Or a sword, as Josephus calls it; which he snatched out of the hand of Moses, as the tradition is in Pirke Eliezer, cap. 47.

Ver. 8. He went after the man of Israel into the tent.] It is an unusual word in the Hebrew which we translate tent; importing a private, secret place like a cave, as kubba or kobba is thought to signify, which the Arabians call alcobba; from whence comes the word alcove; which signifies, as Bochartus observes, conclave camerati operis, quo lectus circumdatur; "a room of arched work, which encloses a bed in it" (see his Hierozoicon, par. i. p. ult.).

Thrust both of them through,] This he did, saith Philo, προσθαζαντος Μωϋσως, "by the command of Moses;" but should rather have said, by a Divine investigation; which he followed, when the rest of the judges were afraid (as some conceive) to meddle with so great a man as Zimri was. And upon this fact, the Jews ground that which they call the judgment of zeal, which authorized them, who were full of zeal, to punish such as blasphemed God, or profaned the temple, &c., in the presence of ten men of Israel, without a formal process against them. Thus Matthias killed a Jew who sacrificed after the manner of the Greeks (1 Macc. ii. 24); and three hundred others were killed by their countrymen, as is related 9 And those that died in the plague were twenty and four thousand.

10 ¶ And the Lord spake unto Moses, saying,

11 Phineas, the son of Eleazar, the son of Aaron the priest, hath turned my wrath away in the book commonly called the Third Book of Maccabees. And upon the pretence of such zeal, St. Stephen was stoned, and St. Paul intended to be killed, &c. as Grotius observes (lib. ii. De Jure Belli et Pacis, cap. 20. sect. 9. and see Selden De Jure Nat. et Gent. lib. iv. cap. 4). But this judgment (as they call it) seems not to be well grounded upon the fact of Phineas, who was a public person, and had an extraordinary motion, not to be imitated by private men; nor was it followed till the latter times of the state of that nation.

Through her belly.] The Vulgar hath it, "through her secret parts." And so the Jews in Pirke Eliezer (cap. 47), and in other books, such as Pesikta and Siphri; where they make many miracles to have concurred in this fact; particularly, they say, that the relations of Zimri going to fall upon Phineas for killing their prince, the angel of the Lord smote them, and cut them off.

So the plague was stayed.] It seems a pestilential disease (as Josephus calls it) swept away many of the offenders, who could not so speedily be punished by the judges: but it stopped immediately upon this pious act of Phineas.

Ver. 9. Those that died—were twenty and four thousand.] There were but twenty and three thousand who died of the plague itself, as the apostle tells us (1 Cor. x. 8), but there were a thousand more taken off in the plague time, or during the plague, as the Hebrew words may be read: for, in the twenty and four thousand, Moses comprehends all those who were killed by the sword, in the day of the plague (as the phrase is ver. 18), whereas St. Paul reckons those only who died of the pestilence, as many have observed, particularly Bochartus (lib. ii. Hieroz. cap. 34. par. 1.). It is probable, that from hence it was, that the author of the Samaritan Chronicle took up a conceit, that the king of Moab sent twenty-four thousand damsels to seduce the Israelites; as Hottinger reports his words, in his Smegma Orientale (cap. 8. p. 418).

Ver. 10. ] After the plague was stayed, it is likely, Moses went into the tabernacle to give God thanks for his mercy to his people; and then he spake to him what here follows.

Ver. 11. Phineas,—hath turned my wrath away.] Though they wept and mourned before the door of the tabernacle, yet that did not prevail so much for mercy as this heroic act of justice.

While he was zealous for my sake.] With a fervent and courageous affection vindicated the Divine honour, by a speedy punishment of those notorious offenders.

That I consumed not the children of Israel in my jealousy.] Did not proceed to destroy them by the pestilence, when I was so highly incensed against them. For it is observed by Herodotus himself in his Euterpe, that τῶν μεγάλων ἀδικημάτων μεγάλαί εἰσι καὶ τιμωρίαι παρὰ τοῦ Θεοῦ, "for great crimes there are as great punishments sent from God;" which is necessary for the public good: for unless, by such means, a stop be put to open impurities, to murders, and such like crimes, not only all civil society will be overturned, but nations become so wicked, that they will be fit for nothing but to be rooted out, by the Divine vengeance, as the Canaanites were. Thus from the children of Israel, while he was zealous for my sake among them, that I consumed not the children of Israel in my jealousy.

12 Wherefore say, Behold, I give unto him my covenant of peace:

13 And he shall have it, and his seed after

Cicero discourses (Philip. viii.). In corpore, si quid ejusmodi est, quod reliquo corpori noceat, &c. "In the body, if there be any thing which hurts the rest of the body, it is necessary to cut it off, or to burn it, that some one member, rather than the whole body perish: and so it is in the body of the commonwealth:" ut totum saluum sit, quicquid est pestiferum amputetur; "that the whole may be preserved, let that which is infectious be lopped off."

Ver. 12. Wherefore say,] Unto Phineas, or unto all the people.

Behold, I give unto him my covenant of peace.] The word peace, in Scripture, comprehends all manner of blessings; and therefore this is a solemn promise and engagement to make him and his family prosperous: the particular blessing which he entails upon him, following in the next verse. But some will have this to signify, that he should be the great reconciler of God to his people, and make peace between them hereafter, as he had done at present. Philo seems to think this and the priesthood to be two distinct things; when he saith, "God crowned his piety διτταῖς δωρεαῖς, εἰρήνη καὶ ἱεροσύνη, with two gifts, peace and the priesthood." And the Jews make peace to consist in a long life of prosperity; which was fulfilled in Phineas' person, who lived till the latter times of the judges (Judg. xxi. 28). Pirke Eliezer interprets it, "He gave him the life of this world, and of the next."

Ver. 13. He shall have it, and his seed after him,] It shall continue in his family.

Even the covenant of an everlasting priesthood.] This is the particular happiness which God settled upon him and his posterity, as long as their state lasted; which was with some limitation, it appears by this, that after some successions in the line of Phineas, the priesthood came, for a time, into the family of Eli, who was descended from Ithamar the youngest son of Aaron: the reason of it is not mentioned in the Scripture; but some great sin, it is reasonable to suppose, provoked God to set aside the line of Eleazar for some years, till Eli's sons also became so wicked, that the priesthood was taken from them, and restored in the days of Solomon to the posterity of Phineas, with whom it continued as long as the priesthood lasted. What sin this was, and when committed, we do not know. Some of the Hebrew doctors are so bold as to say, it was because Phineas would not absolve Jephthah from his vow, as Mr. Selden observes (lib. i. De Success. in Pontif. cap. 2). But as there is no ground for this and such-like fancies, which others of them have, so it is more probable that some of Phineas' successors offended, rather than he himself; his posterity for four generations holding the priesthood, before it was translated to Eli, as Josephus and others (mentioned by Selden in the place before named) make account.

Ægidius Camartus, in his book De Rebus Eliæ, cap. 3. sect. 5. and Cornel. Bertram, cap. 15. De Rebus Jud. imagine, that in those confused times, none of the priests were found fit to administer the affairs of the nation, but Eli alone; and therefore he was appointed by God to it, as appears from 1 Sam. ii. 30. But L'Emperour, in his annotations upon Bertram, well observes, that it being the constant course of God's proceedings, to continue his mercies him, even the covenant of an everlasting priesthood; because he was zealous for his God, and made an atonement for the children of Israel.

14 Now the name of the Israelite that was slain, even that was slain with the Midianitish woman, was Zimri, the Son of Salu, a prince of a chief house among the Simeonites.

15 And the name of the Midianitish woman that was slain was Cozbi, the daughter of Zur;

he was head over a people, and of a chief house in Midian.

16 ¶ And the Lord spake unto Moses, saying, 17 Vex the Midianites, and smite them:

18 For they vex you with their wives, where-

to the Israelites, according to his promise, while they were obedient, but to take them away when they became disobedient; it is highly reasonable to conclude there was some great offence given to God by some of the race of Phineas, which was the cause that they lost this dignity; but so constant was God to his promise, that he preserved his line in a continued succession of twelve persons, from Phineas to Azariah, who "executed the priest's office in the temple that Solomon built in Jerusalem," as we read 1 Chron. vi. 4. to the 10th: from which time, to the captivity of Babylon, there were nine more, as we read there in the following verses: and after the end of the captivity, unto the time of Antiochus Eupator, the Jews reckon fifteen more, the last of which, Onias, was killed by Lysias: and after him there were eight of the family of the Asmonæi; the last of which, Aristobolus, was killed by Herod, who after that made whom he pleased.

Because he was zealous for his God,] God, who searches the hearts, saw that this motion proceeded not from any private passion, but out of pure love and fervent affection to him, and from indignation to see his Divine Majesty so affronted. For zeal is a mixed affection of love and anger.

Made an atonement] Procured a pardon for all his brethren, ἀποκατέστη καὶ ἰδελοργῶ ποιῶν (as Philo expresses it), "by his uncommanded and spontaneous diligence" to vindicate God's honour, flowing from his sincere devotion to God's service.

Ver. 14. The name of the Israelite that was slain,] God would have his name stand upon record, partly to make it infamous, and partly to do honour to Phineas, who durst venture to set upon a man who had so great an interest in his tribe, as is mentioned in the next words.

Zimri, the son of Salu, a prince] Not the chief of the whole tribe, but of a great family in that tribe.

Of a chief house among the Simeonites.] In the Hebrew the words are, "of a house of a father." For the tribes were divided into families, and these into houses, every one of which had a head or chief (see the first chapter of this book, ver. 2), and Zimri was one of those principal persons, though not prince of all the Simeonites.

Ver. 15. The name of the Midianitish woman that was slain was Cozbi, the daughter of Zur;] This is set down also, to show how little Phineas feared the great men, either in Israel, or elsewhere: for Zur is reckoned afterward as one of the kings of Midian (ch. xxxi. 8), or princes (Josh. xiii. 21).

He was head over a people, and of a chief house in Midian.] The Hebrew word umoth (which we translate people) signifies nations; so that if we translate these words exactly, they sound thus, "he was head of nations, of a house of a father in Midian;" that is, chief of divers families, who all sprung from the same father or original in that country.

Ver. 16. Some time after this, though not long (as appears from ch. xxxi. 1, 2), but a little before Moses' death.

Ver. 17. Vex the Midianites,] Among whom this pernicious contrivance was hatched: for Balak being so incensed against Balaam, that he bade him begone, in all haste out of this country (ch. xxiv. 11), Balaam would not stay to propound unto him this mischievous advice which was in his head, but went to the Midianites, and there discovered it; which was the same thing, he knew, as if he had acquainted Balak with it, there being a great friendship between the two nations (ch. xxxii. 4). It is likely, also, that the Midianites were the first that advised Balaam should be sent for, which made their guilt the greater: but the Moabites did not escape, though (for Lot's sake, perhaps, Dent. ii. 9.) their punishment was deferred till future times, as Balaam prophesied (ch. xxiv. 17), and they were also excluded, by a law made immediately after this, from the society of the Israelites, for this very fact (ch. xxiii. 3, 4).

Smite them:] With the sword: as we find they did, ch. xxxi.

Ver. 18. For they vex you with their wives,] Have sorely distressed you by their subtle devices.

Wherewith they have beguiled you in the matter of Peor,] Drawn you in to commit foul idolatry. Here Peor, which was a mountain in Moab, where Baal had a temple (as I observed, ch. xxiii. 28), is used for the idol itself, which was there worshipped, being a contraction of Baal-Peor: and so it is, ch. xxxi. 18. Josh. xxii. 17.

In the matter of Cozbi,] And into lewd filthiness with idolatrous women.

The daughter of a prince of Midian,] By whose consent, no doubt, she went upon this wicked design; that, by her noble garb and attendance, she might the more powerfully entice the great men of Israel to idolatry.

Their sister,] Whom the whole family were content to prostitute, that they might compass the destruction of the Israelites: but by sister may be meant one of the same country or nation; the same kind of language being used among them that was among the Jews; who called one another brethren and sisters (being descended from the same stock), as Christians did all those that were of their religion.

Which was slain] When so many thousands fell by the pestilence.

For Peor's sake,] For worshipping Baal-Peor; into which they were inveigled by the women, who invited them to a feast, and there, by their charms, excited another fleshly appetite in them, which they would not let them satisfy, unless they would both eat of their sacrifices and worship their idol: and perhaps they told them it was not lawful for them to consent to their desire, unless they would be of their religion.

CHAPTER XXVI.

1 The sum of all Israel is taken in the plains of Moab. 52 The law of dividing among them the inheritance of the land. 57 The families and number of the Levites. 63 None were left of them which were numbered at Sinai, but Caleb and Joshua.

1 AND it came to pass after the plague, that the LORD spake unto Moses and unto Eleazar the son of Aaron the priest, saying,

2 Take the sum of all the congregation of the children of Israel, from twenty years old and upward, throughout their fathers' house, all that are able to go to war in Israel.

3 And Moses and Eleazar the priest spake with them in the plains of Moab by Jordan near Jericho, saying,

4 Take the sum of the people, from twenty years old and upward; as the LORD commanded Moses and the children of Israel, which went forth out of the land of Egypt.

5 ¶ Reuben, the eldest son of Israel: the children of Reuben; Hanoch, of whom cometh the family of the Hanochites: of Pallu, the family of the Palluites:

6 Of Hezron, the family of the Hezronites: of Carmi, the family of the Carmites.

7 These are the families of the Reubenites: and they that were numbered of them were forty and three thousand and seven hundred and thirty.

8 And the sons of Pallu; Eliab.

9 And the sons of Eliab; Nemuel, and Dathan, and Abiram. This is that Dathan and Abiram, which were famous in the congregation, who strove against Moses and against Aaron in the company of Korah, when they strove against the LORD:

CHAP. XXVI.

Ver. 1. After the plague,] Mentioned in the foregoing chapter, ver. 9. 17. though some fancy it refers unto all the plagues that had swept away all the former generation, except two persons. It is likely this may be done in the eighth month of the fortieth year, after they came out of Egypt.

The Lord spake unto Moses and unto Eleazar] As God had formerly joined Aaron with Moses (Numb. i. 1. 17. ii. 1. iv. 1. &c.), so now Aaron being dead, he joins his son Eleazar with him, to show that he succeeded not only in his place and office, but also in his authority.

Ver. 2. Take the sum of all the congregation] They had been twice numbered before this; once, before the building of the tabernacle, in the first year after they came out of Egypt, when they paid every man half a shekel towards it (Exod. xxx. 11. 13. xxxviii. 25), and again, when they were to be encamped, in the second month of the second year (Numb. i. 1. 2, &c.). And now, all those men who had been then numbered (thirty-eight years ago) being dead (as appears from ver. 64. of this chapter), God commands them to be numbered a third time; partly, that he might demonstrate his faithfulness to his word, in multiplying them vastly, notwithstanding all their provocations (for their number was within eighteen hundred and twenty as many as they were at the last muster), and partly that the land they were now going to possess, might be the more easily divided among the tribes in just and equal proportions.

From twenty years old and upward, &c.] All this is explained in the first chapter, ver. 2. 3.

Ver. 3. Moses and Eleazar the priest spake with them] With the heads of the several tribes; who, it is likely, were to assist in this numbering, as they did in the former (Numb. i. 4. 16. 17).

In the plains of Moab] See ch. xxii. 1.

Ver. 4. Take the sum of the people,] These words are not in the Hebrew; but some words of this kind are to be understood, that they spake with them about numbering the people, "from twenty years old and upward," as it here follows.

As the Lord commanded Moses] He bade them proceed according to the directions God had formerly given, in the second month of the second year, after they came out of Egypt (Numb. i. 1).

Ver. 5, 6. Reuben, the eldest son of Israel:] This numbering being performed as the former was, Moses uses more concise language in the account he gives of it; as he doth in the foregoing verse, and in this, and those that follow; where he sets down the number of every tribe, and the families from whence they sprung, without saying, "Those that were numbered of the tribe of Reuben were," &c. as he doth, Numb. i. 21, &c.

The children of Reuben; Hanoch,] The four sons of Reuben (whose families here follow) are mentioned both in Genesis xvi. 9. and in Exodus vi. 14. and are here mentioned again; because he intends to set down the names both of the children and grandchildren of one of his sons, which he did not before.

Ver. 7. These are the families of the Reubenites:] The word we translate families, rather signifies nations (gentes) or kindreds, as we translate it, Ps. xxii. 27. For all that sprung from those seventy persons who came with Jacob into Egypt, are called by this name of mispeoth, which the LXX. here translate δῆμοι, people; which were divided into houses, as the Hebrews call them, and those houses into particular persons: this is plain from Josh. vii. 14. where, for the discovery of him that had sinned in the accursed thing, God commanded the Israelites to be brought by their tribes, and then that tribe by the families belonging to it; and that family which the Lord took by households; and that household man by man.

They that were numbered of them, &c.] This being compared with Numb. i. 21. it appears that this tribe was less than it was eight-and-thirty years ago, by near three thousand men: for some whole households had been destroyed, as it follows, ver. 9.

Ver. 8. The sons of Pallu;] He speaks in the plural number, when there was but one son of Pallu, which is very usual in the Scripture language (see Gen. xix. 29. xxi. 7. xlvii. 7. and in this very chapter, ver. 42).

Eliab.] He doth not say from him came the family of the Eliabites; for he made only a household in the family (as we call it) of the Palluites.

Ver. 9. The sons of Eliab; Nemuel, and Dathan, and Abiram.] The same must be observed of these, that families did not spring from them; but they were households belonging to the family of the Palluites.

This is that Dathan and Abiram,] They are here again mentioned; partly to set a new brand upon them, for their insolent rebellion against Moses, and partly to show how the Reubenites came to be so diminished.

[Famous in the congregation.] See ch. xvi. 2.

[Who strove against Moses—in the company of Korah.] They joined with Korah, who seems to have been the chief incendiary; for he is mentioned first in ch. xvi. 1.

[When they strove against the Lord.] Who had appointed Aaron alone to be the high-priest, and his sons to minister in the priest's office; which these men would have usurped, ch. xvi. 11. where it is said expressly, "they were gathered together against the Lord."

Ver. 10. The earth opened her mouth, and swallowed them up together with Korah. These words seem to import, that Korah was swallowed up with Dathan and Abiram, as I have observed upon ch. xvi. 32 (see there). But it must be acknowledged, that these words may receive another interpretation, and that very natural, in this manner: "The earth opened her mouth and swallowed them up" (viz. Dathan and Abiram, and the rest, mentioned ch. xvi. 32), and then the next words with Korah, may be thus translated, "and as for Korah (who was the great incendiary), when that company died," i. e. he died when the company which offered incense died: for there is in many places a defect of a word, to be supplied from the word that follows. This is a very easy construction, and agrees with the Psalmist, Ps. cvi. 17. where he mentions only Dathan and Abiram's company as swallowed up; and then adds (ver. 18), "A fire was kindled in their company (i. e. in the other company of rebels), and the flame burnt up the wicked;" viz. Korah, and those that were with him.

[What time the fire devoured two hundred and fifty men.] See ch. xvi. 35. If the interpretation now mentioned of the foregoing words be admitted, then Korah must be added to the number of the two hundred and fifty men; which Moses takes occasion to explain in this place.

[They became a sign.] A monument of God's displeasure against those that affront his ministers; to give warning unto all posterity not to follow their pernicious courses.

Ver. 11. The children of Korah died not. As those of Dathan and Abiram did; but their family continued famous in David's time: for perhaps they left their father, and "departed from the tents of those wicked men;" as Moses by God's command exhorted the congregation (ch. xvi. 21. 26), and they obeyed (ver. 27).

Ver. 12, 13. The sons of Simeon after their families &c. His sons are reckoned up here just as they are Gen. xlvi. 10. and Exod. vi. 15. only one of them, viz. Ohad, is here omitted; because, either he had no children, or his family was extinct before this time. The first of them also, viz. Nemuel, is there called Jemuel; and Jachin, in 1 Chron. iv. 21. is called Jarib; there being some reason, in process of time, for such alterations.

Ver. 14. These are the families of the Simeonites, &c. There was a wonderful decrease of this tribe in the space of thirty and eight years: for they were fewer by above thirty-seven thousand than they were at the last numbering (see ch. i. 23). Many of them, it is probable, being in the same crime with Zimri, and the plague falling most heavily upon this tribe, whom Moses in Deut. xxxiii. doth not bless.

Ver. 15–17. Gad They are reckoned here next to the Simeonites, because they lay encamped next to them, under the standard of Reuben (Numb. ii. 10, 11, &c.).

[Zephon.] They are reckoned up in the same manner, Gen. xlvi. 16. only he that is here called Zephon, is there called Ziphon; and Ozni is there called Ezbon; and Arod called Arodi.

Ver. 18. Gad This tribe also was less by above five thousand than before (ch. i. 25).

Ver. 19. Sons of Judah were Er and Onan. These were his eldest sons, but died without issue before the children of Israel went down into Egypt, as it here follows (see Gen. xxxviii. 1, 2, &c.).

Ver. 20.] Now he reckons those of his sons who made families, which were three: as we read also, Gen. xlvi. 12.

Ver. 21.] Here he numbers two of Judah's grandchildren, as he did one of Reuben's, ver. 6. only with this difference, that these two made families in Israel, which his grandson did not; they being substituted instead of Er and Onan, who died without children. Or rather, the family of Pharez growing very great, there was a subdivision made of it into the other families, who were all still Pharezites (for Pharez had no other children but these two, to make a family of that name), but called by these two names of Hezronites and Hamulites, because the Pharezites were grown too big to be one family, and therefore parted into two.

Ver. 22. Judah This tribe was very numerous before, above all the rest; and now this new generation, which sprung up instead of the old (who were all destroyed except Caleb), exceeded them two thousand. So faithful was God to his promise, that this should be a most powerful tribe (see Numb. i. 27).

Ver. 23. Issachar] He and Zebulun are mentioned next, because they lay encamped together, under the standard of Judah (see Numb. ii. 5—7).

Tola] A wonderful fruitful family, and very valiant: there being of this one family twenty-two thousand and six hundred men in the days of David (1 Chron. vii. 2).

Pua] He is called Phuvah, Gen. xli. 13.

Ver. 24. Jashub] Who is called Job in the same place.

Ver. 25.] This tribe also was exceedingly increased; being near ten thousand more now than they were at their first numbering (ch. i. 29. ii. 6).

Ver. 26. Zebulun] There is no change in their names; which are the same, without any alteration, as when they went into Egypt (Gen. xli. 14).

Ver. 27.] This tribe likewise was increased above three thousand since the former numbering (see ch. i. 31). And so the whole camp of Judah was mightily augmented, as that of Reuben was diminished.

Ver. 28. Joseph] See Gen. xli. 20.

Ver. 29. Manasseh: of Machir, &c.] This was the only son; but those descended from him, by a usual manner of speaking, are called Manasseh's sons also, being his grandsons. Some think indeed that Manasseh had other sons, which they gather from Gen. i. 22. but, if he had, their families were extinct; but none but Machir and his posterity had any inheritance in the land of Canaan, Josh. xvii. 1, 2. where the grandchildren are called his children.

Machir begat Gilead] They were not a distinct family from the Machirites, but the very same; Machir having no son but Gilead. Therefore that family, which at first was called Machirites, was afterwards called Gileadites: or it was indifferently called either by the one or the other.

Ver. 30. Jeezer] Called Abiezer, Josh. xvii. 2.

Jeezerites] The posterity of Gilead grew so numerous, that his sons made families, and not only households; so that the name of Gileadites being too general to distinguish them all, they were called, at length, by the name of his sons.

Ver. 31, 32. Asriel] This, and all the rest that follow, are mentioned as the sons of Gilead; for each of whose children there was a lot in the land of Canaan (Josh. xvii. 2).

Ver. 33. Zelophehad the son of Hephher had no sons, but daughters] Whose case is considered in the next, and in the last chapter of this book; where they are ordered to have an inheritance among their father's brethren, but to marry into their own tribe. And their posterity, I suppose, were called after their grandfather's name, Hephherites: for such a family there was, as Moses tells us in the foregoing verse.

Ver. 34.] If this be compared with ch. i. 35. it will appear that this tribe was increased above twenty thousand: which is the greatest increase of any other; and made good the prophecy of Jacob concerning the children of Joseph (Gen. xlix. 22).

Ver. 35. Ephraim] He is mentioned after Manasseh, because he was his younger brother, yet, in their encampment, this tribe had the standard under which Manasseh marched (Numb. ii. 18, &c.)

Shuthelah] He is mentioned first also in 1 Chron. vii. 20. where the next son Becher is called Bered; and Tahan called Tabath. For time is wont to make great alterations in the names of persons and places.

Ver. 36. Sons of Shuthelah: of Eran, the family of the Eranites] He had, it seems, but one son, whose children (after the usual manner of speaking before noted) were called the sons of Shuthelah; though they made a distinct family, under the name of Eranites.

Ver. 37.] Though this proved a very numerous tribe in future times, yet, for the present, they were fewer by eight thousand than they were in the former numbering (ch. i. 33), which makes Moses' prophecy, a little after this, the more remarkable, Deut. xxxiii. 17, where he makes the Ephraimites ten to one, in comparison with the Manassites.

Ver. 38. Benjamin] This tribe also was under the standard of Ephraim, and therefore mentioned here together with him and Manasseh. When they went into Egypt, the sons of Benjamin were no less than ten (Gen. xli. 21), half of which either had no children, or they were all extinct before this time; for here are only five named.

bel, the family of the Ashbelites of Ahiram, the family of the Ahiramites :

40 And the sons of Bela were Ard and Naaman : of Ard, the family of the Ardites : and of Naaman, the family of the Naamites.

41 These are the sons of Benjamin after their families : and they that were numbered of them were forty and five thousand and six hundred.

42 ¶ These are the sons of Dan after their families : of Shuham, the family of the Shuhamites. These are the families of Dan after their families.

45 Of the sons of Beriah : of Heber, the family of the Heberites : of Malchiel, the family of the Malchielites.

46 And the name of the daughter of Asher was Sarah.

47 These are the families of the sons of Asher according to those that were numbered of them ; who were fifty and three thousand and four hundred

48 ¶ Of the sons of Naphtali after their families : of Jahzeel, the family of the Jahzeelites : of Guni, the family of the Gunites :

49 Of Jezer, the family of the Jezerites : of Shillem, the family of the Shillemites.

50 These are the families of Naphtali according to their families : and they that were numbered of them were forty and five thousand and four hundred.

51 These were the numbered of the children of Israel, six hundred thousand and a thousand seven hundred and thirty.

52 ¶ And the Lord spake unto Moses, saying,

53 Unto these the land shall be divided for an inheritance according to the number of names.

Bela,] The two first, Bela and Ashbel, are there named as they are here : but the next, Ahiram, is there called Ehi, and in 1 Chron. viii. 1, Ahara ; such alteration doth time make in names.

Ver. 39. Shupham,] He is called Muppim in Gen. xvi. 21. and Hupham is there called Huppim.

Ver. 40. Sons of Bela were Ard and Naaman :] Though five of his sons were dead without issue, yet two of his grandsons, descended from his eldest son, made distinct families in Israel. And the son of one of them was called after the name of his uncle, the youngest son of Benjamin (Gen. xvi. 21), whose name was Ard ; and in 1 Chron. viii. 3, (by a small transposition of letters) is called Adar.

Ver. 41.] This tribe was grown to be ten thousand more than they were at the last numbering (ch. i. 37).

Ver. 42. These are the sons of Dan] Thus he speaks, though he had but one (see ver. 8).

Shuham,] Called Hushim, by a transposition of letters, Gen. xvi. 23. Just as the same tree is called almugim 1 Kings xii. 8, and algumim, 2 Chron. ii. 8. And the same city in which Joshua was buried, called Timnath-Serach, Josh. xxiv. 30, and Timnath-Cheres, Judg. ii. 9. And, to come still nearer, the same man is called Rechum, Neh. xii. 3, and Cherim, ver. 15, of the same chapter.

Dan,] That is, from these Shuhamites came all the rest of the families of this tribe, which are not here mentioned ; but into which this family was subdivided when it grew very great, as it appears from the next words.

Ver. 43. All the families of the Shuhamites,] This shows there were more than one of them who had names from some of the children of Shuham.

Were threescore and four thousand and four hundred,] A vast number to spring from one man ; when Benjamin, who had ten sons, wanted almost twenty thousand of this number : which is seventeen hundred more than were in this tribe at the last numbering (ch. i. 39).

Ver. 44. Asher] They all retain the same names which they had when they went into Egypt (Gen. xvi. 17). Only he that is here called Jesui, is there called Ishui ; and another son there mentioned is here omitted ; his family, I suppose, being quite extinct.

Ver. 45. Beriah :] Instead of him, whose family was quite lost, the youngest son of Asher (Beriah) had two families sprung from him.

Ver. 46. Sarah,] Or Serah, as she is called, Gen. xvi. 17. He doth not say that a family sprang from her, which Corn. Bertramus (cap. 6. De Republ. Jud.) seems to think probable, instead of some that were lost ; but she was a woman, it is likely, as eminent in this tribe as any of her brethren for some virtue or other : insomuch, that the cabalists, in the ancient book Zohar, parting the heavenly region, where the souls of holy women are, into four palaces, make four great women to be a kind of presidents for them, viz. Pharaoh's daughter, who educated Moses ; and this Serah, the daughter of Asher ; with Jochabed, the mother of Moses, and Deborah, the famous prophetess (see Selden, lib. ii. De Jure Nat. et Gent. cap. 4).

Ver. 47.] This tribe also fructified exceedingly, wanting but a hundred of twelve thousand more than they were at the last numbering (ch. i. 41).

Ver. 48, 49. Naphtali, &c.] There are four of them whose names were not at all changed since they went into Egypt (see Gen. xvi. 24).

Ver. 50.] They wanted eight thousand of their number (Numb. i. 43). These two tribes, Asher and Naphtali, are mentioned together with Dan, because they were encamped under his standard (Numb. ii. 25, 26, &c.).

Ver. 51.] That is, the whole number amounted to this sum ; which was but eighteen hundred and twenty less than they were when they were last numbered, thirty-eight years ago (ch. i. 46). So great was the goodness of God, and such his faithfulness to his word, that, when he destroyed all the former generation (who were above twenty years old), he multiplied their posterity so fast, in that space of time, as to make them equal, in a manner, to those that went before them.

Ver. 52.] After the people were thus numbered, and every family, and the persons it contained, exactly known, then the Lord ordered as follows.

Ver. 53. Unto thee] i. e. These families before named.

51 To many thou shalt give the more inheritance, and to few thou shalt give the less inheritance: to every one shall his inheritance be given according to those that were numbered of him.

by 55 Notwithstanding the land shall be divided by lot: according to the names of the tribes of their fathers they shall inherit.

The land shall be divided] i. e. The land of Canaan, into which they were going.

For an inheritance] Not to be alienated from those families.

According to the number of names.] Of the persons in the several families, from twenty years old and upwards (ver. 2). So that minors, who had not attained the age of twenty years when this account was taken, the Jews say, were not to have any share in the land, though they were come to that age at the time of the distribution of it among them. But those minors had possessions, as heirs of their fathers, according to the families.

Ver. 51. To many thou shalt give the more inheritance, and to few—the less inheritance:] That is, order Joshua to assign them a share in the land, proportionable to the number of persons in every tribe: some of which were far greater than others, and therefore to have more land, proportionable to the largeness of their families. But this was not measured merely by the number of acres, as we speak, but by the goodness of the soil: for a little ground, in a rich country, would maintain more persons than twice as much in a barren. So Josephus, lib. v. Antiq. cap. 1, where, after he had said that Joshua made a distribution of the land, κατὰ μέγεθος ἐκάστης τῶν φυλῶν, “according to the bigness of each tribe;” he adds, that in doing this, τιμητοῖς μᾶλλον ἢ μετρητοῖς τοὺς πλῆρους εἶμαι δεῖν, “it was necessary to consider rather the value than the measure of every portion;” and gives this reason why the tribe of Benjamin had so narrow a portion allotted them, because the ground was so very fertile about Jerusalem. Στενωτάτος ὁ πλῆρος οἶτος διὰ τὴν τῆς γῆς ἀρετὴν, “This lot was very strait, because of the goodness of the soil.”

To every one shall his inheritance be given] That is, to every family.

According to those that were numbered of him.] According to the account that had been now taken; not considering who might be born after this (and thereby increase a family), or die (and thereby diminish it) before the division of the land was made. For several died, we may well think, in the wars with the Canaanites, and others were born before the country was conquered.

Ver. 55. The land shall be divided by lot:] When it was divided into so many equal shares as there were tribes (a due respect being had to their number), they were not to choose which share they would have; but that was to be determined by lot. The manner of which they say was this: two urns being placed before him that drew the lots, in one of which were scrolls of parchment, containing the names of the twelve tribes of Israel, and in the other, the portions of land; he first put in his hand into the urn wherein were their names, and drew out one, suppose that of Judah; and then he put his hand into the other urn, and drew out the portion that fell to his share. Or, perhaps, there was only one urn, wherein were the several portions of land; and they began suppose with the eldest son of Israel, viz. Reuben; and pulling out a scroll, said, “This is the portion of Reuben;” and so with the rest. But which soever way they proceeded there were two distributions made, one of the whole country into twelve parts; and another of each of those parts among the several families that were in each tribe (see Sclden De Successionibus ad Leges Hebr. cap. 21, 22.)

According to the names of the tribes of their fathers they shall inherit.] This seems to justify what I now said, that they first named the tribe whose lot they would draw out; and that contained his inheritance. But, after all this, it might happen that some of their lots were too scanty for their number, and others too large: in which case, Eleazar, and Joshua, and the rest appointed for this office (ch. xxxiv. 17, &c.), ordered some portion to be taken from those who had too much, and given to those who had too little for their families. This appears from Josh. xix. 9, where a portion out of the lot of Judah is ordered for Simeon; because the one was too large, and the other too small: and the same may be said of Dan, ver. 47.

Ver. 56. According to the lot shall the possession thereof be divided] The first words, which we translate “according to the lot,” being, in the Hebrew, al pi hagoral, which literally signify “according to the mouth of the lot” (which is no more than “as the lot shall declare”), the Jews have a conceit, that the land was divided, not merely by lot, but by urim and thummim, which Eleazar the priest then put on (as the Talmud describes it in Bava Bathra); and two urns standing before him, in one of which were the names of the twelve tribes, and in the other the names of the portions of land, he looked by the Holy Ghost upon the urim and thummim, and said, Let such a tribe come up; which being done, he said again, Let such a portion of land come up for this tribe; by which means all the people (before whom this was done) were satisfied that their portion was allotted to them by God; and all cause of murmuring and contention taken away. Thus R. Solomon and others mentioned by Buxtorf in his Hist. Urim et Thummim, cap. 3, and Martinus Mauritius in his late Treatise De Sortitione Veter. Hebr. cap. 29. sect. 4, 5, where he observes, how ancient the way of dividing goods and lands by lot was in other countries. But there was no need of this solemnity; the division of the land by God’s order, after the manner of lots, sufficiently showing, it was not by man’s directions but by God’s that such a share fell to them.

Between many and few.] Every tribe having its land assigned them by the lot, it was then divided among the several families, in the same manner (as these words seem to signify), and then every household had their share allotted them, according to the number of persons that were in them; which if they were many, had a greater share; if few, a less. By which means every man had reason to rest satisfied, because such was his lot; that is, such was the good pleasure of God, who directed the lots; as we learn from Josh. xviii. 6. 8. 10. where we read expressly, that in the division of the land, he “cast lots for them before the Lord in Shiloh,” that he might order every one his portion.

Ver. 57. Levites] It was fit an account should be taken of this tribe also, that it might be seen how God had blessed them, as well as the rest of the tribes of Israel, with a numerous issue; though he had cut off, 58 These are the families of the Levites: the family of the Libnites, the family of the Hebronites, the family of the Mahlites, the family of the Mushites, the family of the Korathites. And Kohath begat Amram.

59 And the name of Amram's wife was Jochebed, the daughter of Levi, whom her mother bare to Levi in Egypt: and she bare unto Amram Aaron and Moses, and Miriam their sister.

60 And unto Aaron was born Nadab, and Abihu, Eleazar, and Ithamar.

61 And Nadab and Abihu died, when they offered strange fire before the Lord.

62 And those that were numbered of them were twenty and three thousand, all males from a month old and upward: for they were not in the space of thirty-eight years, all the former generation, from twenty years old and upward.

Of Gershom,] The principal families in this tribe were three, descended from the three sons of Levi, Gershom, Kohath, and Merari; whose names were not at all altered since their coming out of Egypt until this time (Gen. xlvi. 11. Exod. vi. 16).

Ver. 58. These are the families of the Levites.] The three forenamed were the principal families, divided into those lesser families which here follow.

Libnites,] Descended from Libni the eldest son of Gershom; who had another son, whose family is here omitted (viz. Shimi), though mentioned Exod. vi. 17. But in this place Moses doth not give a full account of all the families of the Levites, nor is it given in exact order, because they were to have no inheritance in the division of the land; which was the reason that all the families of the other tribes are set down so punctually.

Hebronites,] From Hebron, one of the sons of Kohath (Exod. vi. 18. Numb. iii. 19).

Mahlites,—Mushites,] From the two sons of Merari, who were called Malih, and Mushi (Exod. vi. 19. Numb. iii. 20).

Korathites,] From the great-grandchild of Levi (Exod. vi. 21. Numb. xvi. 1).

Ver. 60.] See Exod. vi. 23, where he tells the name of their mother.

Ver. 61. Nadab and Abihu died, when they offered strange fire before the Lord.] See Lev. x. 2, and the third chapter of this book, ver. 4. But Eleazar (who was the eldest next to them) was now alive, and numbered among the children of Israel, because there was no inheritance given them among the children of Israel.

63 ¶ These are they that were numbered by Moses and Eleazar the priest, who numbered the children of Israel in the plains of Moab by Jordan near Jericho.

64 But among these there was not a man of them whom Moses and Aaron the priest numbered, when they numbered the children of Israel in the wilderness of Sinai.

65 For the Lord had said of them, They shall surely die in the wilderness. And there was not left a man of them, save Caleb the son of Jephunneh, and Joshua the son of Nun.

made high-priest; and it is likely Ithamar also, being under twenty years old, when the people murmured upon the report of the spies; and so not cut off with that wicked generation (ch. xvi. 29).

All this is here recounted, to show that the tribe of Levi was preserved, by the blessing of God, as well as the rest of the Israelites; though they were to have no inheritance in the land of Canaan.

Ver. 62. Twenty and three thousand,] So they were a thousand more than at the last numbering (ch. iii. 39).

They were not numbered among the children of Israel,] But by themselves, for the reason following.

Because there was no inheritance given them among the children of Israel.] For God was their inheritance, as he told them, ch. xviii. 20, &c. And therefore they were ordered not to be numbered thirty-eight years ago, no more than now (Num. i. 49, &c.). The Jews are something curious in their observations upon these words, "among (or in the midst of) the children of Israel:" from whence they conclude, that the Levites might have lands out of the bounds of the land of Canaan, though not within it, among their brethren.

Ver. 63.] By a special command of God (ver. 1, 2, &c.).

Ver. 64.] See the first chapter of this book, ver. 1, 2, &c., so exactly were God's threatenings fulfilled, as well as his promises.

Ver. 65. They shall surely die in the wilderness.] He had pronounced this irreversible sentence upon the whole congregation, ch. xiv. 23, 28, 29, where he swears they should not enter into the land of Canaan, because they had brought or entertained an evil report of it (see also Deut. ii. 14, 15).

Save Caleb—and Joshua] Whom God promised to spare, because they were of another spirit (ch. xv. 24, 30, 38). And their survival was as remarkable an instance of the truth of God's word, as the death of all the rest.

CHAPTER XXVII.

1 The daughters of Zelophehad sue for an inheritance. 6 The law of inheritances. 12 Moses, being told of his death, sueth for a successor. 18 Joshua is appointed to succeed him.

I THEN came the daughters of Zelophehad, the son of Hopher, the son of Gilead, the son of Machir, the son of Manasseh, of the families of Manasseh the son of Joseph: and these are the

CHAP. XXVII.

Ver. 1. Then came the daughters of Zelophehad, &c.] Who are mentioned before (ch. xxvi. 33), just as they are here; only their genealogy is here more fully set out, that their father was the grandson of Manasseh the son of Joseph, from whom he was lineally descended, but left no sons behind him. Now these names of his daughters; Mahlah, Noah, and Hoglah, and Milcah, and Tirzah.

2 And they stood before Moses, and before Eleazar the priest, and before the princes and all the congregation, by the door of the tabernacle of the congregation, saying,

3 Our father died in the wilderness, and he was not in the company of them that gathered themselves together against the Lord in the company of Korah; but died in his own sin, and had no sons.

4 Why should the name of our father be done away from among his family, because he hath no son? Give unto us therefore a possession among the brethren of our father.

5 And Moses brought their cause before the Lord.

6 ¶ And the Lord spake unto Moses, saying, young women hearing Moses say (as he doth in the foregoing chapter), that the Lord commanded the land of Canaan should be divided among those that were now numbered: and observing that only males from twenty years old were numbered (ver. 2), presently apprehended, that they, being females, were excluded from having any inheritance among the Israelites (and so the family of the Hephertites, ch. xxvi. 32, would be extinguished). This was the ground of what follows: whereby it appears, that every body was immediately acquainted with the laws which Moses received from God; and that there was a faithful register kept of every one that was born in every family and tribe, to prevent all disputes about the true heirs to men's estates.

Ver. 2. Stood before Moses.] To represent before him, and the rest of the judges, who were now assembled, the case which I have mentioned.

Before Moses, and before Eleazar, &c.] These made up the greatest court of judicature that at any time sat. For by princes are meant either the heads of the tribes, or the highest of the judges appointed Exod. xviii. called "the heads of the people," ver. 25. And by "all the congregation" is meant the seventy elders mentioned in this book (ch. xi. 24). For they are called col ha edah (the whole congregation, and sometimes only edah, the congregation), as R. Solomon observes (see Bertram De Republ. Jud. p. 72). Now at the head of all these sat Moses, and next to him Eleazar the priest.

By the door of the tabernacle.] Near to which this august assembly, it is likely, was wont to sit when they met together; that Moses might presently, if there were occasion, go and consult with God himself in any difficult matter that came before them. And thus Mr. Selden observes, out of Maimonides, that in future times the great Sanhedrin followed the tabernacle, sitting sometimes in one place, sometimes in another, according as that was settled. As (after they came to Canaan) it was first at Shiloh, then at Mizpeh, and afterward at Gilgal, Nob, Gibeon, the house of Obad-Edom; till at last it was fixed in Jerusalem (lib. ii. De Syned. cap. 15. n. 4). As concerning that which the Talmudists say, concerning the proceedings in this case of Zelophehad's daughters, nothing certain can be determined. But they give this account of it: that they first brought this cause into the courts appointed by the advice of Jethro (Exod. xviii. 21), and began with the rulers of ten, who knowing not what to say to them, they went to those of fifty, and from thence to the centurions, and at last to the chiliarchs: none of which durst adventure to give judgment, but referred the cause, by reason of its difficulty, to Moses; who brought it to the Shechinah, as they speak, i. e. to the Divine Majesty (Seld. ib. cap. 16. n. 1).

Ver. 3. Our father died in the wilderness.] Among the rest mentioned ver. 64, 65, of the foregoing chapter. They seem to have drawn up their cause in the form of a petition; or, as Mr. Selden speaks, in the legal phrase, presented a libel to the court, containing the entire matter of their petition, and that artificially enough.

He was not—in the company of Korah.] They use the very words of Moses concerning that rebellious company (ch. xvi. 11), and instance in this sin rather than any other; either to show that their father had a due regard to the authority of Moses (who they hoped therefore would be the more favourable to his posterity), or rather, to insinuate, that he was not guilty of such a crime, as might make men justly forfeit what they had for their children, as well as for themselves. For all the family of Dathan and Abiram perished; and it is taken notice of as a singular mercy, that the children of Korah did not (ch. xxvi. 10, 11).

But died in his own sin.] i. e. For his own sin: which God had declared should not affect the children (ch. xiv. 31). For to that general sin, in which all the people were engaged, these words seem to refer. And so it was his own sin, not with respect to the rest of the people (for they were all alike guilty), but with respect to his children; it being a personal guilt, in which they were not concerned.

The Jews commonly say that Zelophehad was the man that was stoned for gathering sticks on the sabbath-day: for which they have no authority, but a fancy of R. Aquiba, who is sharply reproved for it by another considerable rabbi, who saith it is a rash judgment; for if it were true, since the Scripture conceals it, he ought not to have revealed it: but hath reproached a just man, for any thing that appears (see Selden, lib. ii. De Syned. cap. 1. sect. 2).

And had no sons.] As was found when the people were numbered (ch. xxvi. 33).

Ver. 4. Why should the name of our father be done away.] One family of the tribe of Manasseh, viz. the Hephertites, being in danger to be wholly extinguished. R. Judah will have the word name in this place to signify as much as hereditary possession; and so he thinks it signifies, Deut. xxv. 6, as Mr. Selden observes out of Pesikta (lib. De Successionibus, cap. 14).

Because he hath no son?] Merely for want of issue male, when he hath left many daughters.

Give unto us therefore a possession.] Let us come in for a share among those that are descended from Manasseh: which if they did, the name of their father could not be thereby preserved, but by the son of one of these daughters taking upon him, not the name of his father that begat him, but of his mother's grandfather, viz. Hephert; which was ordered afterward by a general law (Deut. xxv. 6).

Ver. 5. Moses brought their cause before the Lord.] This was too difficult a cause (though there seemed to be a great deal of reason on their side) to be judged by the great court before mentioned; and therefore it was referred to Moses alone, as other weighty causes used to be (see ch. xv. 32. xxv. 4): for neither Eleazar, nor any other person (before whom it was brought, ver. 2), are here mentioned as the judges of this matter. And he durst not judge it, though the equity appeared very plain, without bringing it before the Lord for his direction, which he could have upon all important occasions (Exod. xxv. 22. Numb. vii. 89).

Ver. 6.] This shows that the cause was devolved

7 The daughters of Zelophehad speak right: thou shalt surely give them a possession of an inheritance among their father's brethren; and thou shalt cause the inheritance of their father to pass unto them.

8 And thou shalt speak unto the children of Israel, saying, If a man die, and have no son, then ye shall cause his inheritance to pass unto his daughter.

9 And if he have no daughter, then ye shall give his inheritance unto his brethren.

10 And if he have no brethren, then ye shall give his inheritance unto his father's brethren.

11 And if his father have no brethren, then ye shall give his inheritance unto his kinsman that is next to him of his family, and he shall possess it: and it shall be unto the children of Israel a statute of judgment, as the Lord commanded Moses.

12 ¶ And the Lord said unto Moses, Get thee up into this mount Abarim, and see the land which I have given unto the children of Israel.

13 And when thou hast seen it, thou also shalt be gathered unto thy people, as Aaron thy brother was gathered.

14 For ye rebelled against my commandment in the desert of Zin, in the strife of the congregation, to sanctify me at the water before thy upon Moses alone; for the Lord tells him, and no other person, how it should be determined.

Ver. 7. The daughters of Zelophehad] The Lord approves of their claim, and gives a sentence in their favour.

Give them a possession] Because the word for them in the Hebrew is of the masculine gender, some think it signifies, they were to be considered as if they had been sons.

Cause the inheritance of their father to pass unto them.] So that they were to enjoy what would have fallen to his share had he been alive; ob indutum defuncti patris personam, as the lawyers speak; "because they stood in the place of their dead father, and represented his person." And accordingly they put in their claim at the division of the land, and had their portion therein, according to this decision (Josh. xvii. 2, 3, &c.). How the portion was divided among them, according to the Hebrew doctors, Mr. Selden shows at large in his book De Successionibus in bona defuncti, cap. 23.

Ver. 8. Speak unto the children of Israel.] Upon this occasion he passes this special case into a general law, to be hereafter observed.

If a man die, and have no son, &c.] It being but reason, as Maimonides observes (More Nevochim, par. iii. cap. 42), that what a man leaves should come to his family, and to those who are of next kin to him: for the nearer any person is to us, we are inclined, by natural affection, to have the greater regard to him. But all this is to be understood of land: as for money, and moveable goods (which were of his own getting), the father might dispose of them, by his will, to whom he pleased.

Ver. 9. If he have no daughter, &c.] Unless his father was alive, who, undoubtedly, the Jews say, was the next heir; but not mentioned, because it was not necessary; or, as some say, because it was too sad a thing to speak of a father's burying all his children without issue. See Selden, De Succes. in bona defuncti, cap. 12, where he observes, that, according to the rule, ver. 11, it must come to the father, because he is next of kin to it. And therefore the Jews interpret this, as if Moses had said, "If he have no daughter, ye shall give his inheritance to the next of his kindred (to his father for instance), and afterward ye shall give it to his brethren," i. e. the children of his father. And the same is to be said of the grandchildren; unto whom the brethren of a father dying without issue are heirs. For the grandfather stands in the same relation to a father that a father doth to his son.

Ver. 11. If his father have no brethren, &c.] To his brother's children, or to those who are descended from them, or from his father's brethren. But no consideration was to be had of his mother's kindred (as the Jewish lawyers say), who could never be capable of the inheritance: which they gather, not only from these words, which determine the inheritance to his family (i. e. the family of the father before mentioned, not to the family of the mother), but from the frequent mention of the father of misepachoth, which we translate families, or rather kindreds of the fathers, in the books of Moses, Chronicles, Ezra, and others. From whence this solemn maxim of the Talmudists, "The family or kindred of the mother, is never called by the name of kindred:" that is, it hath not the effect of a kindred in successions to inheritances. Which is the same with that in the ancient book Siphri, "Families follow the fathers;" as Mr. Selden observes in the place before mentioned; who in the next chapter (cap. 13), gives an example, drawn up by Maimonides, of such a succession out of the Holy Scriptures. Amram had two sons, Aaron, and Moses, as we read Exod. vi. 20. If they had both died without issue, Miriam their sister had inherited. And if she had died in like manner, the inheritance of the family would have reverted to Kohath, the father of Amram: or he being dead, to his three sons, the brethren of Amram, viz. Izhar, Hebron, and Uzziel, as the heirs of Kohath. And there would have been no consideration of primogeniture; both because none of them was the first-born, and because the inheritance was not in the possession of their father, at the time of his death, &c.

A statute of judgment.] A law whereby to determine such matters in future times, and to be observed inviolably; so that no father should have power to make any other settlement; but if either by word or writing he declared his will to be that his son should not inherit, his act was null and void: as the Jewish lawyers resolve from these very words, "a statute or decree of judgment," i. e. as I said, a rule whereby to judge of succession into inheritances. If therefore a man made a will, wherein he declared his daughter or brethren, &c. should not inherit, in case he had no son, it was void, because contrary to this law (see Selden, De Successionibus, cap. 24).

Ver. 12. Get thee up into this mount Abarim.] Either these words were spoken after all that follows here, and in the book of Deuteronomy, or they were repeated again when he had repeated his laws, and enforced them by many excellent discourses, and taught them that famous song, Deut. xxxii. where, in the conclusion of it (ver. 49), it is said, that every day he bade him go up this mount Abarim. And there we learn also, that Abarim was a long tract of mountains, one of which was called Nebo; and the very top of it called Pisgah (see Deut. xxxiv. 1).

See the land] Take a full view of it, as he did from that high neighbouring mountain (Deut. iii. 17. xxxiv. 1—4).

Ver. 13.] Upon Mount Hor, as we read in this book, ch. xx. 23, 24.

eyes: that is the water of Meribah in Kadesh in the wilderness of Zin.

15 ¶ And Moses spake unto the LORD, saying,
16 Let the LORD, the God of the spirits of all flesh, set a man over the congregation, 17 Which may go out before them, and which may go in before them, and which may lead them out, and which may bring them in; that the congregation of the LORD be not as sheep which have no shepherd.

18 ¶ And the LORD said unto Moses, Take thee Joshua the son of Nun, a man in whom is the spirit, and lay thine hand upon him;

19 And set him before Eleazar the priest, and before all the congregation; and give him a charge in their sight.

20 And thou shalt put some of thine honour upon him, that all the congregation of the children of Israel may be obedient.

21 And he shall stand before Eleazar the priest, who shall ask counsel for him after the judgment of Urim before the LORD: at his word

Ver. 14. For ye rebelled against my commandment] See ch. xx. 1. 12. 24, where all this verse is explained.

Ver. 15.] He did not speak those words which follow, immediately after God bade him go up Mount Abarim and die; but first desired he might be permitted to go over Jordan, &c. (Deut. iii. 24—26). Unless we can think that he made the prayer there mentioned as soon as the sentence was passed upon him, at the waters of Meribah, which doth seem not so likely.

Ver. 16. Let the Lord, &c.] As soon as he found that God was resolved he should not conduct the people into Canaan, he was concerned for nothing, but for a fitting person to take that charge upon him. For he had a most generous public spirit, wholly intent upon the good of this people.

The God of the spirits of all flesh.] Who hast not only made the souls of all men, but knowest their dispositions (see ch. xvi. 22), and understandest who are fit for this weighty employment.

Set a man over the congregation.] To be chief ruler and governor of the people in my place.

Ver. 17. Which may go out before them, &c.] If the latter part of these words be not a mere repetition of the former (as is usual), then the one relates to the conduct of war, and the other to the management of all their civil affairs. And both of them seem to be a metaphor from shepherds watching over their flocks.

That the congregation—be not as sheep which have no shepherd.] Having none to govern and to take care of them. This is a description of the most miserable condition a people can be in, and became a proverb among the Hebrews (1 Kings xxii. 17. Zech. x. 2. xiii. 7. Matt. ix. 36).

Ver. 18. Take thee Joshua] Who had been a long time servant unto Moses, and attended upon his person (Exod. xxiv. 13), well known to Moses, and perfectly acquainted with his administration.

A man in whom is the spirit,] Of courage and prudence, and the fear of God, with all other gifts necessary in an excellent governor: among which Onkelos reckons the spirit of prophecy; which is not unlikely.

Lay thine hand upon him.] Which was a ceremony usual in blessing (Gen. xlviii. 14, &c.) and in setting men apart and consecrating them to an office (ch. viii. 10). Upon which followed a more abundant measure of the Spirit, as appears from Deut. xxxiv. 9.

Ver. 19. Set him before Eleazar the priest, and before all the congregation;] Being all assembled for this purpose, that all might acknowledge him for the designed successor of Moses, and be witnesses of all that Moses commanded him.

Give him a charge] He told him before them all what God expected from him; and bade him be not afraid to execute it. See Deut. xxxi. 7, 8, where he sets down the words of this charge; unto which God presently after added one of his own (ver. 14, 15. 23).

Ver. 20. Put some of thine honour upon him.] Communicate some of thy authority to him at present; and not let him be any longer as thy minister, but as an associate in the government. The word we translate honour being glory in the Hebrew, it made Onkelos and other Hebrew doctors imagine these words have respect to that splendour which shone in Moses' face after he came down from the mount: some of which they suppose was imparted unto Joshua, to make him appear more venerable in the eyes of the people. And R. Menachem observes, that it is not said, impart thy glory, but of thy glory to him. From whence came that ancient saying, "the face of Moses shone like the sun, but Joshua's only like the moon." This might have passed for truth, or at least that hereby was meant some great increase of illustrious gifts of mind, which procured him such reverence as Moses had, if it had been said that God put some of Moses' glory upon him; whereas Moses is commanded to do it, which makes the first sense most reasonable.

That all the congregation—may be obedient.] That the people may begin to submit to his authority, and learn to obey his commands, as well as thine.

Ver. 21. He shall stand before Eleazar the priest, &c.] For the encouragement of Joshua to undertake this charge, he assures him he shall never want direction from God what to do when he was in any doubt, but, in the manner he prescribed, most certainly receive it. And what is here said concerning him, belongs to all their succeeding governors. And it is observed by Maimonides, and other Jewish doctors, that the high-priest stood before the kings of Israel out of great respect to them: but no king is said to stand before the high-priest, but only in this case, when he was to consult the holy oracle; that it might appear the honour was given not to the priest, but unto the Divine Majesty, whom he consulted by the priest.

Who shall ask counsel for him, after the judgment of Urim] Because the word thummim is here wanting, some understand these words as if he had said, the high-priest shall ask counsel for him, by the "illumination of the Spirit of God." So Conradus Pellicanus. But the word thummim, in all likelihood, is here to be understood, though not expressed, being always joined with urim (except in this and one other place, where urim only is named, after a short manner of speaking), in Exod. xxviii. Deut. xxxiii. Ezra ii. Neh. vii. For they were inseparable from "the breast-plate of judgment," as it is called Exod. xxviii. 30 (see there), with which the high-priest appeared before God when he consulted him in great affairs concerning the public safety, more especially in times of war; of which we have many instances in Judg. i. 1. xx. 18. 1 Sam. xiv. 18. xxviii. 6. David, indeed, is said to consult God by the ephod, but it must be observed that the breast-plate was annexed to it; which Abiathar brought along with him when he fled from Saul, who commanded the priests to be slain, 1 Sam. xxii. 2. 9. xxx. 8. 2 Sam. v. 19. And it is further to be noted, that though David thus frequently consulted God this way, being engaged in wars, yet we never read that Solomon asked counsel by it, being a peaceable king.

shall they go out, and at his word they shall come in, both he, and all the children of Israel with him, even all the congregation.

22 And Moses did as the LORD commanded him: and he took Joshua, and set him before Grotius also observes, that Joshua now, and the kings of Judah afterward, therefore stood before the priest, that they might be near to the urim and thummim, which he had upon his breast; without which he could not receive any answer (De Imperii Sum. Potest. &c. cap. 6).

Before the Lord;] The high-priest never inquired by urim and thummim, but standing before the Lord; that is, before the ark, where the Shechinah was.

At his word shall they go out, and—come in.] That is, saith Grotius, in the place forenamed, at the word of the Lord, “by the judgment of urim,” which goes just before. Others, “at the word of the priest:” which comes to the same. And this the Hebrew doctors understand concerning the people of Israel making war; which is wont to be meant in Scripture by the words going out and coming in. And they distinguish between the war that was made by the Divine commandment (against the seven nations of Canaan, and against Amalek), and that which was voluntary against any of their neighbours, or others, as there should be reason. In the former case, they think there was no need to ask whether they should make war or not, because it was commanded; and Joshua and the kings afterward did it when they pleased. But in the other, they were not to make war without this Divine order (see Selden, lib. iii. De Synedr. cap. 12. n. 4). But it is plain from Judg. i. 1. that they consulted the Lord also in the first sort of war (with the people of Canaan), how to manage it to the best advantage.

Both he, and all the children of Israel with him, even all the congregation.] By the first word [he] the Jews understand Joshua, and all the succeeding princes of Israel, who were bound to advise with God by urim and thummim before they made war. And by the next words [all the children of Israel with him] they understand the priest that was particularly anointed to go with the people to war (Deut. xx. 2). And by the last words [the whole congregation] they understand the seventy elders, or the great Sanhedrin. So Maimonides, Abarinell, and a great many others, expound these words (as Mr. Selden shows in the same place), from which they have framed this general maxim, that no private man might consult this oracle, “but the king, and the head of the great Sanhedrin, and he that was appointed by all the people in their name.” And that col ha edah [all the congregation] signifies frequently the great assembly of the elders and judges (see also Bertram. De Repub. Jud. p. 72).

Here the Jews start a difficulty, as they account it, why we never read in the whole book of Joshua, that he consulted the Lord after this manner; but as soon as ever he was dead they did (Judg. i. 1). From whence Abarinell concludes, that Joshua was bound to do this only at the first entrance upon his office, that all Israel might know he was Moses' successor, and that God was with him: but that afterward the spirit of prophecy rested upon him, and conducted him without this oracle. But if nothing was done that is not recorded in the Scripture, he might as well have said that Joshua never consulted the oracle at all, for we do not read he did, though he be here so ordered. R. Levi ben Gerson, therefore, seems to me to speak more reasonably, when he says that those words in the beginning of the book of Judges do not import that they did not consult God by urim in the life of Joshua, but only that after his death the children of Israel would not adventure to proceed in the war of Canaan without the same direction.

Eleazar the priest, and before all the congregation :

23 And he laid his hands upon him, and gave him a charge, as the LORD commanded by the hand of Moses.

And there is something else which they might have observed from this verse, with great reason, which is, how much inferior Joshua was to Moses, though he succeeded him in the conduct of the people. For Moses never made use of the urim and thummim to consult God by the high-priest, but went directly and immediately to God himself; whereas Joshua was not admitted to such familiarity; nor had he such frequent revelations from God as Moses had. Yet sometimes God vouchsafed him the honour to speak to him, as we find in the beginning of Joshua, ch. iii. 7. iv. 1. 15, &c. And there was a most illustrious appearance of God to him before Jericho (ch. v. 13, &c.).

Ver. 22.] According as he was ordered, ver. 18, 19. In this we see the great integrity, the sincere humility, and self-denial of Moses, that he readily submitted to have the government of Israel translated from his own family and tribe unto another, who was of the tribe of Ephraim, whereby his own children were reduced to a mean condition, being not so much as priests, but mere Levites. This demonstrates he acted not from himself, because he acted not for himself; but was contented to have the supreme authority placed where God pleased, both in church and state, and to leave his own family in an inconsiderable employment. This shows him to have had a principle which raised him above all other lawgivers, who always took care to advance their own families, and establish them in some share of that greatness which they themselves possessed. This likewise demonstrates, that the future rulers of this nation had no temptation to advance the credit of Moses beyond what it really was, since they were not descended from him, but were of other tribes.

Ver. 23.] He did all things which the Lord required to create him his successor, as the Jews speak: for thus (by laying on of hands) they in aftertimes made a man a member of the Sanhedrin, both of the great and of the small; which continued to the time of the destruction of the second temple; as Mr. Selden shows (lib. ii. De Synedr. cap. 7. n. 1).

And this solemn designation of Joshua to the government by the Divine authority, was a clear indication that God continued to be their king, as he became in a special manner when he brought them out of Egypt (as I observed upon Exod. iii. 10), and he still reserved it to himself to appoint governors under him out of what tribe he pleased; as he did Joshua at this time out of the tribe of Ephraim; and not Caleb, who was of the tribe of Judah, and also a man as valiant as he was virtuous (Josh. xiv. 11). For there was no tribe that could lay claim unto this dignity without the gift of God. And this is one of the principal reasons, why the government of this people, before they had kings, was, as Josephus calls it, Θεοκρατία (that is, “the empire of God”), because he stirred them up judges to rule them when he pleased; which being of his immediate appointment, are so far acknowledged by him, that when they were weary of Samuel's government and desired a king, God declared, that it was not Samuel, but himself, whom they rejected. And another reason was (as our Mr. Thorndike observes), because God, by his oracle of urim and thummim, prescribed how they were to proceed in their public affairs (Review of the Rites of the Church. p. 133).

Offerings are to be observed. 3 The continual burnt offering. 9 The offering on the sabbath, 11 on the new moons, 16 at the passover, 26 in the day of first fruits.

CHAP. XXVIII.

Ver. 1.] Having numbered the people, and appointed his successor to bring them to their inheritance (which he had ordered to be divided among them, proportionable to the number of each tribe), nothing more was necessary than to persuade them to be truly religious, whereby they might be preserved in the enjoyment of it. Unto which Moses is commanded to direct them in this and in the following chapters; which may be thought to have been delivered also in the eighth month of the last year of their travels in the wilderness.

Ver. 2. Command the children of Israel,] These commands had been given before, but are here repeated, because this was a new generation, who either had not heard them when they were first delivered eight-and-thirty years ago; or, at least, had need to have their memories refreshed. Some things also are now more particularly explained concerning the sacrifices which were to be offered at certain times: and they are reduced into a certain order; some being daily, others weekly, others monthly, and some anniversary; all which were of such importance, that Moses, being shortly to leave them, thought good to repeat most of them once more in the book of Deuteronomy.

My offering, and my bread] The word and is not in the Hebrew; but the words are, my offering, my bread. which Isaac Abarinell thus excellently explains: Concerning offerings for sin, and trespass-offerings, and the rest, I shall not need to admonish you: but concerning my daily sacrifices, which properly of themselves are my own oblation, my daily bread, or my food (which the Divine presence, dwelling among them, required, Exod. xxix. 42. 44. 45). And so others by the word bread understand meat or food in general, as we translate it, ver. 24, though it may have a particular respect to the meat-offering, which was made of meal, and always accompanied the burnt-offerings, which seem here to be peculiarly meant; though some think these words relate to all the sacrifices, some part of which was God's portion.

For my sacrifices made by fire,] The whole burnt-offerings are most properly called ische ("sacrifices made by fire"), being all consumed upon the altar; where the heavenly fire burnt continually, ready for that purpose.

For a sweet savour unto me,] So the burnt-offering is called, Lev. i. 9. 13. 17 (see there). I shall only add the paraphrase of the Jerusalem Targum, which is this, "My offering of bread which ye offer on the altar, doth not the fire devour it? And yet it is acceptable to me from you, as an odour in which I am well-pleased."

Shall ye observe to offer unto me] Be very careful to see it duly performed: this being the food (saith Abarinell), which, to speak after the manner of men, was offered by God's fire, upon his own altar, for his dinner and supper.

In their due season.] For that reason this sacrifice was to be constantly offered, saith the same author, that the Divine fire which came down from heaven to consume the sacrifices might not be disappointed, and burn there in vain without any thing to do.

From this place the Jews endeavour to make out their custom of having stationary men, as they call them, to attend the daily sacrifice: taking month ["in its season"] as if it had been month ["in its stations"], but chiefly relying upon the first words of this verse, "command the children of Israel," who could not all be present at the daily sacrifice, and therefore some particular persons were chosen to represent all the rest. For they thought it very indecent to have a sacrifice made for a man, and he not to stand by it; and therefore the first prophets ordained twenty-four courses of men, chosen out of the priests, Levites, and people, to stand in the temple, when the daily sacrifice was offered in the name of all Israel; and pray that God would accept it for them, as if they were all present. This account the Mischna gives of them in Taanath, and other places; where they say these men were held so necessary, that it was a usual speech among them, Without stations the world could not stand. For without sacrifices, that is, the worship of God, the world would be undone; and sacrifices could not be maintained without stations (see Lightfoot in his Temple Service, ch. 7. sect. 3).

Ver. 3. This is the offering made by fire] That offering which he peculiarly speaks of is the daily sacrifice; which was appointed long ago, before the tabernacle was set up (Exod. xxix. 38, 39, see my notes there). And add this, that God's promise to meet them there (ver. 42, 43), and afterward to dwell among them (ver. 45), seems to depend upon this constant service which he expected should be paid to him; which if neglected, he withdrew himself from them.

Two lambs of the first year without spot] This is expressly required in Exod. xxix. 38. Only here it is added, without spot, or perfect in its kind; which was required in all sacrifices, particularly in the first lamb which they offered, when they came out of Egypt (Exod. xii. 5, see there).

Ver. 4.] The very words in Exod. xxix. 39.

Ver. 5.] This is also there explained, Exod. xxix. 40.

Ver. 6. It is a continual burnt offering,] To be con-ordained in mount Sinai for a sweet savour, a sacrifice made by fire unto the LORD.

7 And the drink offering thereof shall be the fourth part of an hin for the one lamb; in the holy place shalt thou cause the strong wine to be poured unto the LORD for a drink offering.

8 And the other lamb shalt thou offer at even: as the meat offering of the morning, and as the drink offering thereof, thou shalt offer it, a sacrifice made by fire, of a sweet savour unto the LORD.

9 ¶ And on the sabbath day two lambs of the first year without spot, and two tenth deals of flour for a meat offering, mingled with oil, and the drink offering thereof:

10 This is the burnt offering of every sabbath, beside the continual burnt offering, and his drink offering.

tinued throughout all your generations every day; as it is expressed Exod. xxix. 42. For it was in the nature of a daily prayer to God, that he would graciously continue his mercy unto Israel (as Abarinel observes), and increase their corn, wine, and oil, which they acknowledged hereby they received from him.

Which was ordained in Mount Sinai] There Moses received both this law, and all the rest (which are mentioned in the book of Exodus), concerning the service of God, and the place where it was to be performed, and his ministers, &c. And this sufficiently shows, that he speaks here to those who were so young at the first institution of these laws, that they gave the less heed to them, or had forgotten them. And there are those who think that for eight-and-thirty years they had disused them; which they gather from Deut. xii. 8. But I do not take it to be likely, that sacrifices were wholly omitted during that space; though perhaps not so regularly performed as when they came to Canaan. For to suppose that, is to suppose that the fire from heaven either went out, or burnt continually to no purpose; and that the Divine Majesty had no entertainment set upon his table; and consequently did not keep house, and dwell among them all that time: in short, that there was no worship of God at the tabernacle. All these arguments may convince any man, there were offered at least the daily sacrifice, morning and even, and those on the sabbath.

For a sweet savour,] See Exod. xxix. 41.

Ver. 7. The drink offering thereof shall be the fourth part of an hin for the one lamb:] So it was ordained also in Mount Sinai, as appears from the same Exod. xxix. 40. And in this very book there is a general rule given to this new generation, that this should be the least quantity of wine which should be offered with a burnt-offering, or peace-offering (see Numb. xv. 5). Which was a thing so constantly practised, that the heathen never sacrificed, but they poured wine upon the flesh, as it flamed upon the altar. For though water was sometimes poured upon the sacrifices, yet Nonnus saith (lib. iv. Dionysiac.), it was when men knew not the use of wine; for after that was found out, they never sacrificed without it (see Fort. Scacchus Myrothec. 2. cap. 42).

In the holy place] Upon the altar of burnt-offerings, which stood in the holy place, near to the door of the tabernacle (Exod. xxix. 42).

Shalt thou cause the strong wine to be poured unto the Lord] The Hebrew word shecar commonly signifies any sort of strong drink, but here the noblest and most generous wine; for it was not lawful to use any other liquor in their sacrifices. The heathens had this reverence to their gods, that they always offered to them the most excellent wine they had; which appears by these words we meet with so often in Homer (both in his Iliad and Odyssey) of men's pouring out upon their sacrifices, — ἄδρακα οἴνου, or black wine, of the deepest colour, red as blood; which was the richest of all other. And Herodian, speaking of the vast profuseness of Heliogabalus, who offered hecatombs of oxen every morning with great multitudes of sheep, upon which he heaped all manner of spices, adds this also (lib. v.), οἶνον τε τοῦ παλαιωτάτου καὶ καλλίστου πολλοὺς ἀμφορέας προξίων, &c. "pouring on many flagons of the oldest and most excellent wine on the altars;" so that rivers of wine and blood ran mixed together.

Ver. 8. The other lamb shalt thou offer at even, &c.] All the foregoing verses relate to the morning sacrifice; and this only briefly prescribes, that the other lamb should be offered in the same manner at even, with the very same meat-offering and drink-offering. And as no sacrifice was to precede the morning burnt-offering, but it was to be offered first: so this at even was to conclude all the sacrifices of the day, and none to be offered after it.

A sweet savour unto the Lord.] As acceptable to him as the morning sacrifice.

Ver. 9. On the sabbath day two lambs of the first year] He doth not mean, that, whereas every morning and evening they offered one lamb, on the sabbath-day they should offer two; but that there should be two lambs offered on the sabbath, over and above the daily offering, as appears from ver. 10. Whether one of them were to be offered in the morning, and the other added at the evening sacrifice, it is not said: but it is most probable the sacrifices on the sabbath were so ordered. For the Jews say, that, at the time of this additional sacrifice in the morning of the sabbath, they sang at the temple the song of Moses (Deut. xxxii.), dividing it into six parts, and singing one part every sabbath; so that in six weeks they had finished it, and then began again. And at the evening sacrifice they sang that song of his Exod. xv. at which time the priests sounded the trumpets three times more than they did at the ordinary songs.

Two tenth deals of flour for a meat offering, mingled with oil, and the drink offering thereof,] As the burnt-offerings were doubled on this day, so a double quantity of flour is ordered for the meat-offering that attended the burnt-offering (for only a tenth part of an ephah, ver. 5, was offered on other days), and consequently there was to be as much more oil and wine than daily. And here it may be fit to note, that, as soon as the drink-offering was poured out, then the song before mentioned began, with the trumpets and other instruments of music; but not till then: for the burnt-offering was not perfect, till the drink-offering, which was to accompany it, was offered; whereby it was completed (see Dr. Lightfoot in his Temple Service, ch. 7. sect. 2).

Ver. 10.] The daily sacrifice was not to be omitted on the sabbath, but this was to be added to it; and, thence, by the Jews, called musaph. Of which sort there were seven more, which were to be added to the sacrifice of the day; viz. that in the new moon (ver. 11), at the passover (ver. 19), and the feast of Pentecost (ver. 26), in the beginning of the year (ch. xxix. 1), on the day of expiation (ver. 7), on the feast of tabernacles there were peculiar sacrifices for seven days together (Lev. xxiii. 35), and on the last day of the feast another (Numb. xxix. 35—37). All these were called musaphim, or additional sacrifices to the daily sacrifice.

11 ¶ And in the beginnings of your months ye shall offer a burnt offering unto the LORD; two young bullocks, and one ram, seven lambs of the first year without spot;

12 And three tenth deals of flour for a meat offering, mingled with oil, for one bullock; and two tenth deals of flour for a meat offering, mingled with oil, for one ram;

13 And a several tenth deal of flour mingled with oil for a meat offering unto one lamb; for a burnt offering of a sweet savour, a sacrifice made by fire unto the LORD.

Ver. 11. In the beginnings of your months] This solemn sacrifice seems to have been ordained by God, to prevent the idolatry which was usual among the gentiles; who worshipped the new moon with great rejoicings when it first appeared. Otherwise, the first day of every month was no festival; but only a day on which extraordinary sacrifices were offered with blowing of trumpets, as seems to be directed ch. x. 10 (see there): which was usual at all solemn sacrifices (as I noted before), otherways the feast of blowing with trumpets was only on the new moon of the seventh month, and no other. And therefore it is observable, that there is no mention made of the first day of the month among the festivals appointed in Lev. xxiii., and consequently servile work was lawful on this day; and nothing more required but only the following sacrifices. The Jews at this day say, this solemnity was appointed rather for the women than the men (for which they give a fabulous reason), who are bound to abstain from all works; but the men only from the most laborious, such as ploughing the ground, &c. (see Buxtorf's Synag. Judaica, cap. 23.)

Two young bullocks, and one ram, &c.] All these were burnt-offerings, which were offered besides the daily sacrifice, and besides the two lambs, if the first day of the month fell out to be a sabbath. In which case, and all others, where several solemnities met together on the same day, the daily sacrifice was offered first, and then the rest of the sacrifices peculiar for that day were to be performed, every one in its order. As for example, if the sabbath and new moon, and the feast of trumpets, fell out on the same day, they began with the daily morning sacrifice; after which followed the sacrifices proper to the sabbath; and after that the sacrifice appointed on the new moon; and then, those that belonged to the feasts of trumpets; and all was concluded with the evening sacrifice, as Abarbanel observes in his preface to the book of Leviticus.

Ver 12. Three tenth deals of flour.] That is, three tenth parts of an ephah (ver. 5).

For a meat offering,] i. e. For each bullock there was to be this proportion of flour; which is exactly according to the general rule before given (ch. xv. 9.)

Two tenth deals of flour,] This is the proportion there prescribed for a ram, as the other for a bullock (ch. xv. 6).

Ver. 13. A several tenth deal of flour mingled with oil, &c.] Unto each of the seven lambs before mentioned (ver. 11), a meat-offering was to be joined in less proportion than the other, according to the rule there given (ch. xv. 4).

For a burnt offering, &c.] See ver. 6.

Ver. 14. Their drink offerings] See ch. xv. 10.

Third part of an hin unto a ram,] See there, ver. 7.

Fourth part of an hin unto a lamb,] See there, ver. 5.

5. They that allegorize these things, think the new moon signifies the resurrection to a new life in the other world, where every one shall receive a reward

14 And their drink offerings shall be half an hin of wine unto a bullock, and the third part of an hin unto a ram; and a fourth part of an hin unto a lamb: this is the burnt offering of every month throughout the months of the year.

15 And one kid of the goats for a sin offering unto the LORD shall be offered, beside the continual burnt offering, and his drink offering.

16 And in the fourteenth day of the first month is the passover of the LORD.

17 And in the fifteenth day of this month is the feast: seven days shall unleavened bread be eaten.

according to his measure. Thus Procopius Gazæus; in whom they that think such expositions useful may find entertainment.

This is the burnt offering of every month] There are more sacrifices appointed on the new moons, than on the sabbath itself; because they returned seldomer. And the gentiles multiplying sacrifices on such occasions, if the Jews had not been thus employed in the worship of God, they might have been tempted to pay their services to idols.

Ver. 15. One kid of the goats for a sin offering] This sacrifice of a goat for a sin-offering, saith the same Procopius, is coupled with the rest, being a shadow of the passion of Christ, for whose sake all our sacrifices are acceptable unto God the Father.

Unto the Lord] It is well observed by Grotius, that these words "unto the Lord" were added, to put them in mind at this time of the right object of worship; when they were in danger to offer sacrifice to the moon, after the manner of the heathens. This is the more to be regarded, because a goat being appointed to be offered at two other solemnities, and to be offered for a sin-offering (ver. 23. 30), it is not said "unto the Lord" (though certainly so intended), because there was no danger at those times to direct their sacrifices to a wrong object, as there was upon the new moons; when the heathen offered a goat unto the moon, it being a creature whose horns are like to those of a new moon. R. Bechai long ago observed this: "A goat (saith he) was offered to extirpate the religion of those who worshipped the moon; which makes the Scripture say expressly unto the Lord." And Maimonides more largely in his More Nevochim, par. iii. cap. 46, where, after he had taken notice of the difference between sin-offerings and burnt-offerings, the latter of which being wholly burnt might be properly said to be unto the Lord, whereas sin-offerings were commonly eaten by the priests; he adds, that "this sin-offering is peculiarly said to be unto the Lord, lest any one should think this goat to be a sacrifice to the moon, after the manner of the Egyptians: which was not necessary to be said of the goats offered at other solemn times, because they were not in the beginning of the month, nor distinguished from other days by any natural sign, but only by the appointment of the law; which uses these words concerning this goat peculiarly, to pluck out of men's thoughts those inveterate and pernicious opinions of the gentiles; who had long sacrificed to the moon at this time, as they did to the sun at his rising, and when he entered into the several signs."

Beside the continual burnt offering, &c.] This is so often particularly mentioned, lest any should imagine it might be spared, when there were such liberal offerings of several kinds.

Ver. 16.] See Exod. xii. 6. 18. Lev. xxiii. 5, where it is called the Lord's passover (see Exod. xii. 27).

Ver. 17. In the fifteenth day—is the feast;] The fourteenth day at even the feast of the passover was 18 In the first day shall be an holy convocation; ye shall do no manner of servile work therein :

19 But ye shall offer a sacrifice made by fire for a burnt offering unto the LORD; two young bullocks, and one ram, and seven lambs of the first year: they shall be unto you without blemish :

20 And their meat offering shall be of flour mingled with oil: three tenth deals shall ye offer for a bullock, and two tenth deals for a ram;

21 A several tenth deal shalt thou offer for every lamb, throughout the seven lambs :

22 And one goat for a sin offering, to make an atonement for you.

23 Ye shall offer these beside the burnt offering in the morning, which is for a continual burnt offering.

24 After this manner ye shall offer daily, throughout the seven days, the meat of the sacrifice made by fire, of a sweet savour unto the LORD: it shall be offered beside the continual burnt offering, and his drink offering.

25 And on the seventh day ye shall have an holy convocation; ye shall do no servile work.

26 ¶ Also in the day of the first fruits, when ye bring a new meat offering unto the LORD, after your weeks be out, ye shall have an holy convocation; ye shall do no servile work :

27 But ye shall offer the burnt offering for a kept, as appears from Exod. xii. 14. But on the fifteenth day began another feast, called "the feast of unleavened bread" (see Lev. xxiii. 6).

Seven days.] See Exod. xii. 15. xiii. 6, 7. Lev. xxiii. 6.

Ver. 18.] See Exod. xii. 16. Lev. xxiii. 7.

Ver. 19. Ye shall offer a sacrifice] The solemnity was ordained before, and offerings also in general prescribed to be made seven days (see Lev. xxiii. 8), but the particular sacrifices not set down till now.

Two young bullocks, &c.] The same sacrifices which were appointed to be offered upon every first day of the month (ver. 11).

Ver. 20.] The very same which were appointed on the first day of every month (ver. 12).

Ver. 21.] Just as it was in the forementioned sacrifice (ver. 13). And though the drink-offerings be not mentioned, they must be understood to be the same; because they always accompanied the meat-offerings of burnt-sacrifices, which were not complete without them.

Ver. 22.] As it was in the new moon (ver. 15). But meat and drink offerings did not accompany offerings for sin, save only in the case of a leper; who was to bring three offerings, a sin-offering, a trespass-offering, and a burnt-offering for his cleansing, with three tenth parts of an ephah of flour (Lev. xiv. 10, &c.).

Ver. 23.] There are two things that are here to be remarked; that these offerings (as I noted before) should not put by the continual burnt-sacrifice, but be added to it; and that all these were offered in the morning, after the daily morning sacrifice; and were not part of the evening sacrifice, which concluded all.

Ver. 24. After this manner ye shall offer daily,] Upon every one of the days of unleavened bread (ver. 17), which, though it was a great expense, yet was but a fitting acknowledgment of God's wonderful goodness to them, in bringing them out of the land of Egypt, with all their flocks and their herds; which was the foundation of all their happiness afterward, by making them a free people.

The meat of the sacrifice made by fire,] Here is the very same word with that ver. 2, where he calls this sacrifice his lechem, which we there translate his bread, but here very properly, his meat or food: which was set upon his table (the altar), every day, and by his fire from heaven consumed; which, according to the language of men, was called his eating of it: as the heathen gods also are said to eat the fat of their sacrifices (Deut. xxxii. 38).

Of a sweet savour unto the Lord:] Very acceptable to him: as hath been often observed.

It shall be offered beside the continual burnt offering,] There is the greatest care taken (by the frequent repetition of this), that they should not think to save their daily sacrifice by these others; which were to be added to it, and not to supply the place of it (see ver. 15).

Ver. 25.] This last day of the feast was equal to the first (Lev. xxiii. 7, 8), and is called "a feast unto the Lord," Exod. xiii. 6.

Ver. 26. Also in the day of the first fruits,] Called "the feast of harvest, the first-fruits of their labours," Exod. xxiii. 16, and the feast of weeks, when they brought the first-fruits of wheat-harvest (Exod. xxxiv. 32. Deut. xvi. 10). The Jews in their writings, commonly call this feast by the name of atzereth, and so doth the Chaldee paraphrase upon this place; though Abarinel observes, that this alone, of all the three great feasts, is never called so in the Holy Scripture. It is hard therefore to tell, why the Jews call it so in a singular manner; but our learned Dr. Lightfoot hath made several probable conjectures about it; one of which (and most pertinent to this place) is, because there was a restraint, as the word signifies, upon the people, from bringing their first-fruits till this feast. If any did, they received them not from them, but laid them by till this day came (see Temple Service, ch. 14. sect. 4).

When ye bring a new meat offering] Mentioned Lev. xxiii. 16, which were two loaves made of their first corn, ver. 17, where they are called "the first-fruits unto the Lord."

After your weeks be out,] That is, the seven weeks which they were to number from the morrow after the sabbath (Lev. xxiii. 15), i. e. after the first day of unleavened bread: when they offered another sort of first-fruits (which must be carefully distinguished from those here mentioned), viz. of the barley-harvest which began at the passover; when they were to bring "a sheaf of their first-fruits unto the priest" (Lev. xxiii. 10), the presenting of which sheaf was an introduction to harvest, and procured them liberty to begin to put the sickle into the corn; which now, after seven weeks, they reaped, and carried in at this feast, when they brought these new first-fruits unto the Lord. All which is a description of that which in the New Testament is called the "feast of Pentecost;" being fifty days, as we read there in Leviticus, after the other great feast.

An holy convocation;] See Lev. xxiii. 21.

Ver. 27. Ye shall offer the burnt offering] Over and above the burnt-offering which was prescribed to be offered with the two loaves before mentioned (Lev. xxiii. 18), unto which this was an additional sacrifice, plainly distinct from it.

Two young bullocks, &c.] The very same that were ordered to be offered upon every new moon, and every day of the feast of unleavened bread, ver. 11.

sweet savour unto the LORD; two young bullocks, one ram, seven lambs of the first year;

28 And their meat offering of flour mingled with oil, three tenth deals unto one bullock, two tenth deals unto one ram.

29 A several tenth deal unto one lamb, throughout the seven lambs;

19, &c. whereas that in Leviticus is "one young bullock, two rams, and seven lambs."

Ver. 28.] The very same that is prescribed to accompany the burnt-offering on the new moon, and in the feast of unleavened bread (ver. 12. 20).

Ver. 29.] So it is ordained before in the former cases (ver. 13. 21).

Ver. 30.] Besides the kid prescribed for the same purpose, when the two loaves were offered (Lev. xxiii. 19), which was accompanied with "two lambs for a sacrifice of peace-offerings." So that there were a great many sacrifices offered at this famous festival; though it did not last so long as that of the passover.

Ver. 31. Ye shall offer them beside the continual burnt offering.] He still takes care that this daily sacrifice should not be omitted, by reason of such a number of other sacrifices, which were to attend upon it, but not to put it by (ver. 10. 15. 23).

(They shall be unto you without blemish)] This might have been sufficiently understood, from what was said of the daily offering (ver. 3) and of all the other prescribed in this chapter (ver. 11. 19). But, lest any profane person might think there was no need to be so

30 And one kid of the goats, to make an atonement for you.

31 Ye shall offer them beside the continual burnt offering, and his meat offering, (they shall be unto you without blemish) and their drink offerings.

scrupulous about these sacrifices, because it is only said, "two young bullocks, one ram, and seven lambs of the first year" (ver. 27), these words are also here added, to take away all doubt; "they shall be unto you without blemish," i. e. as perfect as all the rest are ordered to be.

It is observable, that there is not so much as one peace-offering ordered in all this chapter, which was a sort of sacrifice that was most for the benefit of those that brought it to the altar; but all burnt-offerings (except a few sin-offerings), which were wholly for the honour of God, and acknowledgment of his sovereign dominion over them, and the duty they owed him. And as the sin-offerings were shadows of that great sacrifice of God's own Son, which was one day to be offered for the sins of men, out of his infinite love to them; so the whole burnt-offerings (which were always of the most perfect creatures, the finest flour, the choicest fruits of the earth, and the best liquor) were shadows of that excellent degree of piety, which the Son of God intended to bring into the world; which would move men, out of love to God, to give themselves wholly up to him, and devote all they had, even their own lives, to his service.

CHAP. XXIX.

Ver. 1. In the seventh month.] Which was anciently the first month of the year; but now the seventh, reckoning from that wherein the passover was kept: which for a special reason was made the first (see Exod. x. 2).

Ye shall have an holy convocation.] So it was ordained before, Lev. xxiii. 24, 25.

It is a day of blowing the trumpets.] In that place of Leviticus it is called "a memorial of blowing of trumpets" from morning until evening; which the Jews fancy was to awaken them to repentance, upon the great day of expiation, which followed on the tenth day of this month. But it was manifestly intended quite contrary, to excite them unto joy and gladness: for zichron teruah is a memorial of jubilation, triumph, and shouting for joy; the word teruah being never used in Scripture, but for a sound, or shout of gladness; as the Chaldee word jabbaba, which is here used by the paraphrast, always signifies. And this agrees with their notion, who think it was a special remembrance of the creation of the world, at which the angels rejoiced. Or, it might be ordained to stir up the people to a grateful remembrance of all God's benefits the year past. Whatsoever was the cause, certain it is, this seventh month was very famous on this account, that more solemn days were to be kept in it than in all the year besides; and upon that account, the people might be awakened, by this blowing of trumpets, to observe them aright.

Ver. 2. Ye shall offer a burnt offering.] Over and above all other sacrifices, which were heretofore ordered upon this day, as appears from ver. 6.

One young bullock, &c.] This is less than was appointed upon the foregoing festivals (ch. xxviii. 19. 27), because those very sacrifices were also to be offered upon this day, on another account; as I shall observe on ver. 6.

Ver. 3.] This is the proportion appointed, by a general rule, for all sacrifices of this kind (see the fifteenth chapter of this book, ver. 6. 9).

Ver. 4.] So it is there appointed (ver. 4).

Ver. 5.] As is appointed in the foregoing festivals (ch. xxviii. 15. 22. 30).

his meat offering, and the daily burnt offering, and his meat offering, and their drink offerings, according unto their manner, for a sweet savour, a sacrifice made by fire unto the Lord.

7 ¶ And ye shall have on the tenth day of this seventh month an holy convocation; and ye shall afflict your souls: ye shall not do any work therein:

8 But ye shall offer a burnt offering unto the Lord for a sweet savour; one young bullock, one ram, and seven lambs of the first year; they shall be unto you without blemish:

9 And their meat offering shall be of flour mingled with oil, three tenth deals to a bullock, and two tenth deals to one ram,

10 A several tenth deal for one lamb, throughout the seven lambs:

11 One kid of the goats for a sin offering; beside the sin offering of atonement, and the continual burnt offering, and the meat offering of it, and their drink offerings.

12 ¶ And on the fifteenth day of the seventh month ye shall have an holy convocation; ye shall do no servile work, and ye shall keep a feast unto the Lord seven days:

13 And ye shall offer a burnt offering, a sacrifice made by fire, of a sweet savour unto the Lord; thirteen young bullocks, two rams, and fourteen lambs of the first year; they shall be without blemish:

Ver. 6. Beside the burnt offering of the month, and his meat offering.] It was appointed before, that in the beginning of every month there should be a burnt-offering offered of two bullocks, &c. (ch. xxviii. 11, 12.) which was not to be omitted in the beginning of this month; but these other sacrifices added to the offerings of every new moon: which made this a greater new moon than any other; being the first moon of the old civil year.

The daily burnt offering.] With which the solemnity of the day began; and then followed the proper sacrifices belonging to it.

According unto their manner.] Or, in the order which God appointed: which I observed before (on ch. xxviii. 11.) was this: that, first, the daily burnt-sacrifice was offered; then the sacrifices appointed for the first day of every month; and then those appointed for this first day of the seventh month.

For a sweet savour.] Which was acceptable to the Divine Majesty, when performed according to his directions.

Ver. 7. An holy convocation.] This solemn assembly is ordered twice before in this book of Leviticus (ch. xvi. 29. xxiii. 27.), and here repeated, perhaps, for the sake of Eleazar and Joshua, who were newly advanced to their several offices, that they might take special notice of it, and see it observed.

Ye shall afflict your souls.] That was the special intention of it (as we read in both the forenamed places), that they might receive the benefit of the atonement on this day made.

Ye shall not do any work therein.] It was to be observed as strictly as a sabbath (Lev. xvi. 31. xxiii. 32), wherein they were to abstain not merely from servile work, but from all manner of work whatsoever (Lev. xvi. 29. xxiii. 28. 30).

Ver. 8. Offer a burnt offering—for a sweet savour.] Endeavour to procure acceptance of the rest of the sacrifices of the day, with this whole burnt-offering, besides the daily sacrifice; as it follows (ver. 11).

One young bullock, &c.] The same that were appointed on the foregoing solemnity, ver. 2. (except the monthly offering, ver. 6.) to which was added another ram for a burnt-offering (Lev. xvi. 5), as a devout acknowledgment that they owned him alone for their sovereign Lord.

Ver. 9, 10.] The meat-offering attending these burnt-offerings was to be in the same proportion as before ordered (ver. 3, 4).

Ver. 11. One kid of the goats.] As was appointed in the foregoing solemnity (ver. 5).

Beside the sin offering of atonement.] Mentioned Lev. xvi. 9, &c. whose blood was carried by the high-priest into the most holy place; which was done in no other sacrifice but that, and the bullock which was offered as a sin-offering for the family of Aaron on the same day (Lev. xvi. 11).

And the continual burnt offering, &c.] These were no more to be omitted on the great day of atonement, than on any other day; but the service of the day was to begin with the continual burnt-offering; and then followed the burnt-offerings, with the meat and drink-offerings belonging to them, and the sin-offering here prescribed; and then the sacrifice of atonement, and all that is ordered in the sixteenth chapter of Leviticus, for the expiation of the sins of all the people of Israel: which sacrifice the present Jews now wanting, and yet being sensible of the necessity of some satisfaction, but not believing in our blessed Saviour, who hath fully made it for all mankind; they are in a lamentable plunge, and are put to most wretched shifts to devise something to supply the place of the sacrifice of atonement, which was wont to be made for them. One is their own death; it being the continual prayer of every one of them upon their death-bed, "Let my death be the expiation for my sins." Another is (which is so absurd, that Leo Modina saith they do not use it now in Italy, nor in the eastern countries), the killing of a white cock (if one can be got) by the men, and a white hen by the women, on the eve of this day, saying, "Let this cock be an exchange for me; let it come in my stead; let it be my expiation; let it die, but I and Israel live happily;" as Buxtorf shows in his Synagog. Judaica, cap. 25. Which I should not here mention, were it not to show, that they have the very same notion still of a sacrifice for sin (even now that they can only make an imitation of it), which we have of the sacrifice of Christ, who was put in our place, and offered himself to God in our stead; and that it ought to be pure and innocent, which is offered instead of a sinner.

Ver. 12. An holy convocation.] See Lev. xxiii. 35.

And ye shall keep a feast unto the Lord seven days.] viz. The feast of tabernacles (Lev. xxiii. 34), which was after the harvest and vintage (Deut. xvi. 13), and kept seven days with great joy and gladness of heart; but they were not bound to abstain from servile work all this time, but only on the first day and on the seventh.

Ver. 13. Ye shall offer a burnt offering.] The same kind of sacrifice which was prescribed on the other festivals, to be offered up wholly in honour of God: but here is a far larger proportion than in any other solemnity.

Thirteen young bullocks, &c.] On the other festivals two bullocks sufficed (ch. xxviii. 11. 19. 27), and on the festival in the beginning of this month only one was appointed; but here are thirteen; and so they continued to be offered seven days successively, with 14 And their meat offering shall be of flour mingled with oil, three tenth deals unto every bullock of the thirteen bullocks, two tenth deals to each ram of the two rams,

15 And a several tenth deal to each lamb of the fourteen lambs :

16 And one kid of the goats for a sin offering; beside the continual burnt offering, his meat offering, and his drink offering.

17 ¶ And on the second day ye shall offer twelve young bullocks, two rams, fourteen lambs of the first year without spot :

18 And their meat offering and their drink offerings for the bullocks, for the rams, and for the lambs, shall be according to their number, after the manner :

19 And one kid of the goats for a sin offering; beside the continual burnt offering, and the meat offering thereof, and their drink offerings.

20 ¶ And on the third day eleven bullocks, two rams, fourteen lambs of the first year without blemish ;

21 And their meat offering and their drink offerings for the bullocks, for the rams, and for the lambs, shall be according to their number, after the manner :

22 And one goat for a sin offering; besides the continual burnt offering, and his meat offering, and his drink offering.

23 ¶ And on the fourth day ten bullocks, two rams, and fourteen lambs of the first year without blemish :

24 Their meat offering and their drink offerings for the bullocks, for the rams, and for the lambs, shall be according to their number, after the manner :

25 And one kid of the goats for a sin offering; beside the continual burnt offering, his meat offering, and his drink offering.

26 ¶ And on the fifth day nine bullocks, two rams, and fourteen lambs of the first year without spot :

27 And their meat offering and their drink offerings for the bullocks, for the rams, and for the lambs, shall be according to their number, after the manner :

28 And one goat for a sin offering; beside the continual burnt offering, and his meat offering, and his drink offering.

29 ¶ And on the sixth day eight bullocks, two rams, and fourteen lambs of the first year without blemish :

30 And their meat offering and their drink offerings for the bullocks, for the rams, and for the lambs, shall be according to their number, after the manner :

31 And one goat for a sin offering; beside the continual burnt offering, his meat offering, and his drink offering.

32 ¶ And on the seventh day seven bullocks, two rams, and fourteen lambs of the first year without blemish :

33 And their meat offering and their drink offerings for the bullocks, for the rams, and for the lambs, shall be according to their number, after the manner :

34 And one goat for a sin offering; beside the continual burnt offering, his meat offering, and his drink offering.

35 ¶ On the eighth day ye shall have a solemn assembly: ye shall do no servile work therein :

36 But ye shall offer a burnt offering, a sacrifice made by fire, of a sweet savour unto the Lord: one bullock, one ram, seven lambs of the first year without blemish :

the decrease only of one bullock every day, till on the seventh day only seven bullocks were offered, which in all made seventy bullocks. The rams also and the lambs were in a double proportion to what was usual throughout the whole festival; which was a vast charge, but more easy at this time of the year than any other, because now their barns were full, and their winepresses overflowed; and their hearts might well be supposed to be more enlarged than at other times, in thankfulness to God for his great benefits. Yet this very gross, troublesome, and expensive way of serving God, made the best men among them groan, and long for the coming of Christ; in whose days, their own doctors say, "no sacrifices shall remain, but those of thanksgiving, and praise, and prayer." With which they have been forced to be content for above sixteen hundred years; and, instead of these additional sacrifices unto the daily, have added peculiar prayers (which they also call musaphim) unto the common prayers they used every day (see Buxtorf concerning the feast of the new moon, in his Synagog. Jud. cap. 22).

Ver. 14, 15, &c.] The same proportions which are ordered, by a general rule, to every sacrifice of a bullock, and of a ram (ch. xv.).

Ver. 16.] There is no augmentation of the sin-offering; but it is the same with that on other festivals (ver. 5). And all these sacrifices, it appears by this, were to be added to the daily sacrifice.

Ver. 17.] Here one bullock less, than on the day before, is ordered to be offered; and so on every succeeding day there is still a decrease of one bullock; which is all the difference between the offerings on the seven days of this feast, upon every one of which there was the same number of rams and lambs, without any diminution. Which Moses thought fit to set down distinctly from this verse to the thirty-fifth, that there might be no mistake. But little need be noted upon them.

Ver. 18.] Prescribed ver. 14, 15.

Ver. 35. A solemn assembly.] There is a peculiar word here used to denote this to be a great day, as I noted upon Lev. xxiii. 36 (see there).

Ye shall do no servile work] It was to be observed as the first day of the feast of tabernacles, both of them being called a sabbath, Lev. xxiii. 39.

Ver. 36. Ye shall offer a burnt offering.] Here is a peculiar sacrifice appointed upon this day, in the same terms as upon the first day of the feast of tabernacles (ver. 13).

One bullock, &c.] But though this was an extraordinary day, and a distinct festival (as I showed upon Lev. xxiii. 39), yet here are fewer sacrifices prescribed on this day, than upon any of the foregoing seven. For on every one of them two rams were offered and fourteen lambs; and here but half so many: and seven bullocks were the fewest that were offered upon any of those days (and on the first day thirteen), but here only one. By which God consulted, perhaps, the weakness of mankind, who naturally grew weary both of the charge and of the labour of such services, when they were long continued ; and therefore he made them every day less toilsome and expensive ; and put them in mind, likewise, that the multitude of sacrifices did not procure their acceptance with God ; and in length of time they would come to nothing, and be utterly abolished, to establish something better in their room.

37 Their meat offering and their drink offerings for the bullock, for the ram, and for the lambs, shall be according to their number, after the manner :

38 And one goat for a sin offering ; beside the continual burnt offering, and his meat offering, and his drink offering.

Ver. 37.] In such proportions as God had before ordained in the fifteenth chapter of this book, in the beginning of it ; as I have often observed.

Ver. 38.] This is never omitted upon any festival (ch. xviii. 15. 22. 30. xxix. 5. 11. 16. 19, &c.), to put them in mind, that, after all their services, they stood in need of forgiveness.

Ver. 39. These things ye shall do (or offer) unto the Lord in your set feasts.] All these feasts were fixed and stated at certain times ; on which God was to be worshipped after the manner here prescribed in these two chapters. For all these offerings (except one sin-offering, upon each set day) were wholly burnt-offerings (as I have already observed), which may properly be said to be done, that is, offered unto the Lord ;

39 These things ye shall do unto the Lord in your set feasts, beside your vows, and your free-will offerings, for your burnt offerings, and for your meat offerings, and for your drink offerings, and for your peace offerings.

40 And Moses told the children of Israel according to all that the Lord commanded Moses.

neither people nor priests having any share in them.

Beside your vows, &c.] Besides these, every man might offer other burnt-offerings ; either in performance of a vow, or freely, out of his affection to God (see ch. xv. 3).

For your meat offerings.] There are five several sorts of meat-offerings ; which were left to every man's free-will, to bring as he pleased. See the second chapter of Leviticus, where they are described.

For your peace offerings.] These are described in the third chapter of that book ; a great number of which, it is likely, men offered voluntarily upon all the forementioned festivals ; for otherwise they would have had no means to feast with God at his house, nor to entertain their friends and neighbours, as the custom was at such times of public rejoicing ; which they did upon that part of the peace-offerings which was given them, after the fat was offered to God, and the wave-breast and heave-shoulder given to the priest (Lev. vii. 15, &c. 34).

Ver. 40.] He acquainted all the people (by the heads of their tribes, perhaps, of whom we read in the beginning of the next chapter) with all these commands of God, which concerned his worship and service.

CHAPTER XXX.

1 Vows are not to be broken. 3 The exception of a maid's vow. 6 Of a wife's. 9 Of a widow's, or her that is divorced.

1 AND Moses spake unto the heads of the tribes concerning the children of Israel, saying, This is the thing which the Lord hath commanded.

2 If a man vow a vow unto the Lord, or swear an oath to bind his soul with a bond ; he shall not break his word, he shall do according to all that proceedeth out of his mouth.

CHAP. XXX.

Ver. 1. Moses spake unto the heads of the tribes] There were wont to be extraordinary assemblies of these, or other great men, upon special occasions, as Mr. Selden observes (lib. ii. De Synedr. cap. 14. n. 4), who are sometimes called, as they are here, "the heads of all the tribes, and the elders" (Deut. v. 23), and, in other places, "the heads of the people" (Deut. xxx. 5), "the whole congregation of the children of Israel" (Josh. xviii. 1. xxii. 12), "the chief of all the people" (Judg. xx. 2), "all Israel" (1 Sam. vii. 5), "all the princes of Israel, the princes of the tribes" (1 Chron. xxviii. 1), "all the elders of Israel, and heads of the tribes, and chief of the fathers" (2 Chron. v. 2), "the counsel of the princes and elders" (Ezra x. 8). And it is commonly said by the Hebrew doctors, concerning such assemblies, that "whosoever the children of Israel were met together, or the greater part of them, there the Shechinah" (that is, the Divine Majesty, or the Holy Ghost, as they sometimes speak) "was wont to rest."

Concerning the children of Israel.] Acquainted them with a matter which concerned all the people ; willing them to communicate it to them.

This is the thing which the Lord hath commanded.]

It is very probable there had been some case proposed to him about vows ; concerning which he here gives such rules, as might direct them in time to come.

Ver. 2. If a man] It is reasonable to think that this includes the other sex also ; provided they be in their own power, and not subject to another, and be in their right mind.

Vow a vow unto the Lord.] Promise solemnly unto God something that is for his honour and service ; for that seems to be meant by "unto the Lord : " as, that he will offer some sacrifice at the feast above mentioned, more than is prescribed ; or afflict his soul on some other day, besides the day of atonement (see ver. 13).

Or swear an oath to bind his soul] Whether it be a simple vow, or bound also with a solemn oath ; which made a double obligation, by calling God to witness the sincerity of his intentions.

He shall not break his word.] In the Hebrew it is, "he shall not profane his word ;" for it being solemnly passed to God, it made him vile and contemptible if he did not keep it. The Jewish doctors very prudently advise their scholars not to accustom themselves to make vows, but to content themselves with doing what the law commands, and abstaining

3 If a woman also vow a vow unto the Lord, and bind herself by a bond, being in her father's house in her youth;

4 And her father hear her vow, and her bond wherewith she hath bound her soul, and her father shall hold his peace at her: then all her vows shall stand, and every bond wherewith she hath bound her soul shall stand.

5 But if her father disallow her in the day that he heareth; not any of her vows, or of her bonds wherewith she hath bound her soul, shall stand: and the Lord shall forgive her, because her father disallowed her.

6 And if she had at all an husband, when she vowed, or uttered ought out of her lips, wherewith she bound her soul;

7 And her husband heard it, and held his peace at her in the day that he heard it: then her vows shall stand, and her bonds wherewith she bound her soul shall stand.

8 But if her husband disallowed her on the day that he heard it; then he shall make her vow which she vowed, and that which she uttered with her lips, wherewith she bound her soul, of none effect: and the Lord shall forgive her.

9 But every vow of a widow, and of her that is divorced, wherewith they have bound their souls, shall stand against her.

10 And if she vowed in her husband's house, or bound her soul by a bond with an oath;

11 And her husband heard it, and held his peace at her, and disallowed her not: then all from what it forbids; but if they did make them, to look upon it as a high affront to God not to perform them.

He shall do] If the thing be lawful, and possible. And if he appointed no time for the doing of it, he was to think himself obliged to do it presently, without delay (Deut. xxii. 21).

Ver. 3. If a woman also vow a vow] As most interpreters think the word man, in the foregoing verse, comprehends women, who were in as perfect liberty as the men he speaks of; so the word woman here comprehends all men, who are in the same circumstances with those women, whom he here directs in their vows: whom he considers in a threefold state; before they are married, and after marriage, and in their widowhood.

Bind herself by a bond,] By an oath, wherewith she confirms her vow; as it seems to be interpreted, ver. 10. 13.

Being in her father's house in her youth :] That is, being a part of his family, and still under his government, and not married. For the father's power lasts no longer, as Grotius observes (lib. ii. De Jure Belli et Pacis, cap. 5. n. 7). In which condition likewise are all sons, who remain in their father's family, undisposed of in marriage: and all servants, who are manifestly in subjection to their masters; and therefore could no more resolve to do what they pleased, than the women here mentioned.

Ver. 4. And her father hear her vow, and her bond] The first of these may relate to her simple vow; and the next to an oath wherewith she binds it, to make it firmer: which her father is supposed to hear, either when she spake the words, or when she acquainted him with her vow, as in duty she was bound to do.

Her father shall hold his peace at her :] If he did not declare that he disallowed what she had promised, it was supposed he consented to it: unless he said he would take time to consider, and neither allow nor disallow for the present; in which case, in all reason, she was to wait for his resolution.

Then all her vows shall stand, &c.] It was not in his power afterward to disannul any of them, if he did not contradict them when he was told of them, or after the time he had taken for deliberation.

Ver. 5. If her father disallow her in the day that he heareth :] As soon as he comes acquainted with it.

Not any of her vows, or of her bonds—shall stand :] Though she had bound her vows with an oath, they were not to be performed, when her father had declared his will to the contrary.

The Lord shall forgive her,] The not performing her vow shall not be imputed to her as a sin.

Because her father disallowed her,] Whose consent was supposed to be necessary, before the vow could be binding; she being, while a part of his family, under his power, and not her own. Some have fancied, that when her father was dead the vow revived, because then she was at her own disposal; but it is plain, her father wholly disannulled the vow, when he did not approve it; so that it could not recover a force it never had, being made without his consent.

The same is to be said of a guardian, who was supposed to be in the place of a father, when he died and left his children to his care. And this power was fit to be reserved to parents (as a late learned man, Puffendorf, observes), not only lest women, in their imprudent years, should undo themselves, by vowing more than their fortunes could bear; but also, lest the paternal estate should be burdened by such vows, or the necessary affairs of the family hindered. So that this power did not flow from positive laws, but from natural reason; nobody that is subject to another having any right to dispose of those things which are under that power to which they are subject.

Ver. 6. If she had at all an husband, when she vowed,] Was a married woman, or espoused to a husband, though still in her father's house (as it appears from ver. 10, this must be interpreted), when she made this vow, then it was to be considered, not what her father, but her husband (under whose power she now was) should determine about it.

Or uttered ought—wherewith she bound her soul :] Said any thing, which she confirmed by an oath.

Ver. 7. And her husband heard it,] Either was present when she spake it; or she told it him afterward.

And held his peace at her] Said nothing to signify his disallowance of it (see ver. 4).

Her vows shall stand,] As before (ver. 4).

Ver. 8.] See ver. 5, where there is the same case of a daughter under the power of her father, as here of a wife under the power of her husband.

Ver. 9.] The reason of this is so plain, that one would think it need not to have been mentioned, because such women were wholly in their own power, being free from their husbands. Therefore it is very probable he speaks here of a widow, or divorced woman, returned to her father's house (as the manner frequently was, Lev. xxii. 13), who might be supposed to recover his ancient power over her, to disannul her vows, as he might before she was married: which is here absolutely condemned; for though she lived with him, she was her own woman (as we now speak), and might dispose of herself and her goods as she pleased, without his consent.

Ver. 10.] i. e. Engaged herself in a vow, and perhaps confirmed it with an oath, while she and her husband lived together, or before she was divorced from him.

Ver. 11.] She was bound, in this case, to make them her vows shall stand, and every bond wherewith she bound her soul shall stand.

12 But if her husband hath utterly made them void on the day he heard them; then whatsoever proceeded out of her lips concerning her vows, or concerning the bond of her soul, shall not stand: her husband hath made them void; and the Lord shall forgive her.

13 Every vow, and every binding oath to afflict the soul, her husband may establish it, or her husband may make it void.

14 But if her husband altogether hold his good after he was dead, or she was divorced from him.

Ver. 12.] Then, when she was in her own power, by his death, or by a divorce, she was not bound to make them good; because, when she made them, her husband, under whose power she then was, had utterly made them void.

Ver. 13. To afflict the soul.] This shows what the matter of these vows frequently was; to abstain from such or such meats, though in themselves lawful; or to fast, and eat nothing at all on other days, as well as on the great day of expiation; which was the only fast ordained by the law of Moses.

Her husband may establish it, or—make it void.] There is an excellent discourse of Maimonides, in his Mere Nevochim (par. iii. cap. 48), to show that this is most reasonable; where he observes, that, as the law prohibited some meats, so pious people sometimes vowed to forbear such as were not prohibited; that by this means they might learn contentment with a little, or continence, and give a check to an immoderate appetite. From whence the saying among the doctors, that “Vows are the hedge of separation;” i. e. a great guard to a holy life. But since, through the vehemence of their affections and passions, many women are prone to act unadvisedly, if vows were wholly in their power, great inconveniences, dissensions, and confusions, might arise in families, whilst this sort of meat is lawful to the husband, but not to the wife; this permitted to the daughter, but prohited to the mother. For which reason (saith he) this authority was given to the governors of families; in all things to order them, as they saw would be for their profit, or detriment.

Ver. 14. But if her husband] Or, for if her husband. Altogether hold his peace] When he knew what she had vowed; as it follows in the end of the verse.

He establisheth all her vows.] His silence was to be interpreted a consent to allow what she vowed. There was no need to add the contrary; which is here to be understood: that if he said he did not allow them, then they should not bind her.

Ver. 15. If he shall any ways make them void after that he hath heard them] Hinder her from performing her vow, after he had given his consent, by saying nothing against it, when he heard her make the vow.

Then he shall bear her iniquity.] God will punish him, not her, for not performing the vow. Paulus Fagius thinks the meaning is, that if the first day he heard of her vow he did not disannul it, but attempted to do it the next day, or the third day after, he should bear the blame, if the vow was not made good.

Ver. 16.] It is likely some differences arose in some families about these matters; and therefore these laws were made for the settling the power of husbands over their wives, and parents over their children, while they were young, and continued a part of their family.

Ver. 16.] It is likely some differences arose in some families about these matters; and therefore these laws were made for the settling the power of husbands over their wives, and parents over their children, while they were young, and continued a part of their family.

CHAPTER XXXI.

1 The Midianites are spoiled, and Balaam slain. 13 Moses is wroth with the officers, for saving the women alive. 19 How the soldiers, with their captives and spoil, are to be purified. 25 The proportion whereby the prey is to be divided. 48 The voluntary oblation unto the treasury of the Lord.

1 AND the Lord spake unto Moses, saying,

2 Avenge the children of Israel of the Midianites: afterward shalt thou be gathered unto thy people.

3 And Moses spake unto the people, saying, Arm some of yourselves unto the war, and let them go against the Midianites, and avenge the Lord of Midian.

CHAP. XXXI.

Ver. 1. The Lord spake unto Moses.] Not long before his death, as appears from the next verse.

Ver. 2. Avenge—Israel of the Midianites.] This had been commanded before, but no time set for it; which now is determined. The Moabites are not mentioned; because the Midianites seem to have been the first or chief contrivers of that mischief which befell the Israelites, by the enticements of their women (see ch. xxv. 17, 18).

Afterward shalt thou be gathered unto thy people.] When he had given a few other directions, concerning their possessing the countries already conquered, and the land of Canaan (ch. xxxii. xxxiv. xxxv.), and providing for the Levites there (ch. xxxvi.). God had warned him to prepare for his death before this (ch. xxvii. 12), but he first let him have the satisfaction of seeing the Midianites punished; and gave him some time to settle the public affairs, and to make also a long exhortation to the Israelites, to observe all that he had commanded them.

Ver. 3.] He speedily put his command in execution; which might possibly be in the ninth month of the fortieth year.

Arm some of yourselves] He doth not at first determine the number; but as many as pleased might offer themselves voluntarily, to be ready to obey him.

Let them go—and avenge the Lord of Midian.] The Lord bade him “avenge the children of Israel!” (ver.

4 Of every tribe a thousand, throughout all the tribes of Israel, shall ye send to the war.

5 So there were delivered out of the thousands of Israel, a thousand of every tribe, twelve thousand armed for war.

6 And Moses sent them to the war, a thousand of every tribe, them and Phinehas the son of Eleazar the priest, to the war, with the holy instruments, and the trumpets to blow in his hand.

7 And they warred against the Midianites, as the Lord commanded Moses; and they slew all the males.

8 And they slew the kings of Midian, beside the rest of them that were slain; namely, Evi,

2), but Moses bids them "avenge the Lord;" for they had the same interest, and were both injured at the same time, and by the same means. And as God was so gracious as to resent the evil done to Israel, so Moses, in duty and gratitude to God, thought himself bound rather to consider the dishonour that was done to him, whose war this was; not only because undertaken by his command, but in his quarrel (with those who had drawn the Israelites to idolatry), and for the sake of his people.

Ver. 4.] When a great many, perhaps all the people, appeared ready to go to war, he ordered that only a select number should be sent, of a thousand out of each of the twelve tribes.

Ver. 5. So there were delivered—a thousand of every tribe.] Their officers picked out this number from among the rest; or they were chosen by lot for this service; or they stepped out and offered themselves volunteers (as we speak), which the twenty-seventh verse may seem to countenance, where they are called "those that took the war upon them."

Twelve thousand armed] This was but a small number, compared with the whole nation of the Midianites (who had five kings, ver. 8). But God would have them rely more upon him than upon the multitude of a host; and let them see, by their success against this people, that they needed not fear the conquest of Canaan.

Ver. 6. Moses sent them to the war.] He gave them their commission to fight the Midianites.

Them and Phinehas] Who was not their commander-in-chief (or their general, as we now speak), for it did not belong to the priestly office to conduct armies: and it is said expressly in the words following, he went "with the holy instruments," &c. to be ready to perform all such sacred offices as should be required by the general, who, it is most likely, was Joshua. It is true, indeed, that Phinehas was a man of great courage, and had lately performed a singular piece of service, which had won him great reputation. This hath made some think, he was the fitter to go and to avenge the Lord on Midian, as he had begun to do (ch. xxv. 8). In aftertimes also, in the days of the Maccabees, who were of the family of the priests, the armies of Israel were led by them against their enemies. But then it must be considered, that they were also the supreme governors of the people, and there were no other.

With the holy instruments.] By which Jonathan understands the urim and thummim; which some think Phinehas carried along with him, wherewith to consult the Divine Majesty, in case of any difficulty that might arise about the management of the war. And to make out this, they suppose Eleazar to be old and crazy, or labouring under some infirmity; which was the reason that Phinehas his son was substituted in his room to perform this office (see our very learned Dr. Spencer, Dissert. De Urim et Thummim, cap. 6. sect. 2). But this may be justly doubted, whether Phinehas being only the son of the high-priest, and not yet capable of that office, could be substituted to perform this great charge, which belonged to the high-priest alone. Nor do we find any warrant for consulting the Lord by urim and thummim, but only before the most holy place (see ch.

xxvii. 21). And therefore it seems to me far more likely that he means the ark, which was wont to be carried, in following times, into the field, when they went to fight with their enemies (1 Sam. iv. 4, 5. xiv. 18. 2 Sam. xi. 1). Yea, Joshua himself, not long after this time, ordered the ark to be carried, with priests blowing the trumpets before it, when he surrounded Jericho (Josh. vi. 4. 6, 7, &c.). And therefore the "holy instruments" being here joined with "the trumpets to blow in his hand," it makes it the more probable, that the ark may be here meant; there being also something in this very book to countenance this opinion (see ch. xiv. 4, but especially ch. xxxii. 20. 22).

But it must be confessed that it is never thus expressed in any other place of Holy Scripture, but always called the ark of God, or of the covenant, or the testimony, or the like. And therefore, perhaps, they give the truest sense of these words, who take the following words to be an explication of them: that is, the trumpets were the holy instruments, which he carried in his hand.

The trumpets] Which he delivered to the priests who followed him, to sound an alarm when they went to fight, according to the direction, ch. x. 8, 9; and as the practice was in future ages (2 Chron. xiii. 12).

Ver. 7. They warred against the Midianites.] It is not certain whether the Midianites came out of their country to give them battle; or they first broke into their country, and then fought their army.

As the Lord commanded Moses] One would think this meant no more, but that they obeyed the commandment of God before mentioned (ver. 2). But the Jews think he hath respect to another particular commandment, which they say was given by Moses, when they went out to this war; that they should not, when they besieged any city, begird it quite round, but only on three sides; leaving one naked, that the besieged might flee away, if they pleased; by which means effusion of human blood was prevented. So Guil. Shickard observes out of Siphri in his Mischpat Hammelech, cap. 5. Theor. 18; and Mr. Selden since him, lib. vi. De Jure Nat. et Gent. cap. 15, where he shows they understand this of all wars but those against the seven nations in Canaan and Amalek; towards whom this kindness was not shown, as appears by the siege of Jericho. But the laws about managing wars, which are mentioned in the book of Deuteronomy, do not seem to have been yet given; though the Jews fancy this law was now given about Midian, and observed ever after.

They slew all the males.] Who were in this fight, and did not save themselves by flight.

Ver. 8. They slew the kings of Midian.] Little kings, called princes, Josh. xiii. 21, where they are said to be dukes of Sihon, i. e. great men tributary to Sihon, while he continued king of the Amorites. But after the Israelites had conquered him, they took, perhaps, the title of kings.

Beside the rest of them that were slain.] They made not only a great slaughter of the people, but killed their chief commanders, who led them on.

Evi, and Rehem, and Zur, &c.] They are particularly named, that all their neighbours might be satisand Rekem, and Zur, and Hur, and Reba, five kings of Midian: Balaam also the son of Beor they slew with the sword.

9 And the children of Israel took all the women of Midian captives, and their little ones, and took the spoil of all their cattle, and all their flocks, and all their goods.

10 And they burnt all their cities wherein they dwelt, and all their goodly castles, with fire.

11 And they took all the spoil, and all the prey, both of men and of beasts.

12 And they brought the captives, and the prey, and the spoil, unto Moses, and Eleazar the priest, and unto the congregation of the children of Israel, unto the camp at the plains of Moab, which are by Jordan near Jericho.

fied of the truth of this history. And he that is called Zur, is thought to have been the father of Cozbi, whom Phinehas slew.

Balaam—they slew with the sword.] He had seen such good success of his wicked counsel (which he gave either as he went home, or returning again to them: see ch. xxiv. ult.) that, presuming the Israelites were forsaken of their God, he adventured to go along with the Midianites unto this battle; hoping he might curse the Israelites, now that iniquity (i. e. idolatry) was found among them; which he could not do while they were free from it. Thus he perished by his own wicked devices; and was so far from having his wish, that he might "die the death of the righteous" (that is, live long), that (as the Jews say) he was slain in the thirty-fourth year of his age. The doctors in the Gemara of the Sanhedrin (cap. 11, sec. 11) ask, "What did he here?" To which R. Johanan makes answer, "He went to receive his reward for the death of the twenty-four thousand Israelites which he had procured (ch. xxv. 9). And thus, saith another, "it happened unto him, according to the proverb, The camel went to desire horns, and they cut off his ears."

Ver. 9. Took all the women of Midian captives, and their little ones,] After they were masters of the field (as we speak) by the overthrow of their armies, they fell upon their cities; and, according to the ancient custom in the most bloody wars, they killed only the men, but no women nor children (Gen. xxxiv. 25. 1 Kings xi. 16). And so the law of God afterward required they should do, when they took any city that did not belong to the Canaanites (Deut. xx. 13, 14), who were utterly to be destroyed, ver. 16, 17, where he saith, "Thou shalt save nothing alive that breatheth."

Took the spoil of all their cattle, &c.] As belonging to them, by the right of conquest, in a just war.

Ver. 10.] Made the country desolate, that they who fled might have no encouragement to return again; nor be able, without great hazard, to settle themselves there, where they had not a fortress left to defend them. This was but a necessary care; notwithstanding which they had peopled the country again so well, in the space of about two hundred years, that they were able to oppress the Israelites; as we read Judges iv. 1.

Ver. 11.] They had possessed themselves of them before (ver. 9), but now they carried them away.

Ver. 12. They brought the captives, and the prey, and the spoil,] Here are three different words to express their booty, which they brought to the camp of Israel: the first of which signifies the women and children that were taken; the second, the cattle and the flocks

13 ¶ And Moses, and Eleazar the priest, and all the princes of the congregation, went forth to meet them without the camp.

14 And Moses was wroth with the officers of the host, with the captains over thousands, and captains over hundreds, which came from the battle.

15 And Moses said unto them, Have ye saved all the women alive?

16 Behold, these caused the children of Israel, through the counsel of Balaam, to commit trespass against the Lord in the matter of Peor, and there was a plague among the congregation of the Lord.

17 Now therefore kill every male among the little ones, and kill every woman that hath known man by lying with him.

(though sometimes it includes in it men and women); and the third their money and goods.

Unto Moses, and Eleazar the priest, and unto the congregation] Unto the seventy elders, and princes of the tribes, who were assembled with them (see ch. xxix. 1), as it seems to be expounded in the next verse.

At the plains of Moab,] From whence they marched against Midian; and had been encamped there a great while (ch. xxii. 1. xxvi. 3. 63).

Ver. 13. Hearing they were returned victorious, they went to congratulate them before they came into the camp; for which there was also another reason, mentioned ver. 19. This shows that Eleazar was not so infirm as some suppose; and affords an argument to strengthen their opinion, who think Joshua was now general of the host; otherwise he would have been mentioned, together with Moses and Eleazar, as going to meet them; being chosen his coadjutor, and therefore superior to all the princes that are here joined with them.

Ver. 14.] Who were more to blame than the soldiers, whose duty it was to obey, not to give orders, which they received, no doubt, from the officers, to kill only the men. Here now is an argument to the contrary, that Joshua did not command in chief; but this being only a detachment (as they now speak) from the host of Israel, was led by some inferior officer, the first captain of thousands, perhaps; for if Joshua had been there, Moses would have expostulated with him, or rather, there would have been no cause for this rebuke; he being a man in whom was the spirit (ch. xxvii. 18).

Ver. 15. Have ye saved all the women alive?] Unless he had commanded them to be killed, one cannot see that they deserved to be chidden; because they proceeded according to the rules of all worthy warriors, who killed only those who could bear arms against them. But either he had given some directions who should be killed, or he expected they should have considered, that the women had killed more by their blandishments, than their husbands could do by their arms (for they had not killed one man, ver. 49), and therefore should have been destroyed, as the most mischievous; for so it follows in the next verse.

Ver. 16. Behold,] Reflect upon what is lately past, and consider.

These caused the children of Israel,—to commit trespass] By these they had been inveigled into a heinous sin, and made obnoxious to a very heavy punishment, which God inflicted upon them on that account. For though the Moabitish women had a great hand in it (ch. xxv. 1), yet those of Midian seem to have been the chief seducers (ver. 6. 17, 18), and, perhaps, he feared might be so again.

18 But all the women children, that have not known a man by lying with him, keep alive for yourselves.

19 And do ye abide without the camp seven days: whosoever hath killed any person, and whosoever hath touched any slain, purify both yourselves and your captives on the third day, and on the seventh day.

20 And purify all your raiment, and all that is made of skins, and all work of goats' hair, and all things made of wood.

Ver. 17. Kill every male] That the nation might be extirpated, as far as lay in their power.

Kill every woman that hath known man.] For these, it is to be supposed, had been the most instrumental in the crime before mentioned; either by prostituting themselves, or their daughters, to the lust of the Israelites; and thereby drawing them to idolatry: in which sin they were so settled, that there was no hope of reclaiming them; but they might rather (if they had been saved alive) have enticed the Israelites to commit the same again.

Ver. 18. All the women children, that have not known a man—keep alive] Being young, there was some hope they might be brought off from idolatry, and become proselytes to the true religion.

For yourselves.] To be sold as slaves to any other nation, or to be kept as servants, or taken to be their wives, after such preparation as the law required (Deut. xxi. 16, 17, &c.). This was a peculiar case, whereto a middle course was held between those that were of the seven nations of Canaan, and those that were not. If they were not of those seven nations, the Israelites might take the women and little ones unto themselves (Deut. xx. 14, 15), if they were, every thing that breathed was to be destroyed (ver. 16, 17). But here the Midianites, being guilty of a very great crime against the Lord, and against his people, are punished more heavily than other nations; though not so heavily as those of Canaan were to be: for they killed all the women that were not virgins, as well as all the males, both little and great; but spared the rest, together with the cattle, &c. Such an execution was made, in after times, upon one of the cities of Israel, upon a high contempt of public authority, in a very great exigency (Judges xxi. 11). There is a rule in Deut. xx. 10, that when they came to fight against any city, they should proclaim peace to it; and if they should accept it, they should only make the inhabitants tributaries to them. From whence a question arising, whether this extended to the seven nations of Canaan? it is resolved by Maimonides, that it did; which he proves from Josh. xi. 19, 20. But so great was the sin of this people, that they neither sent offers of peace to them now, nor were they to make any peace with them hereafter (Deut. xxiii. 6). And the reason is there given; because they hired Balaam to curse them: which is as true of the Midianites as of the Moabites. Notwithstanding which, Maimonides determines, that though the Israelites did not send messengers of peace to them: yet if they, of their own accord, sent to desire peace of the Israelites, they were not to reject them (see Cuneus De Hebr. Repub. lib. ii. cap. 20).

Ver. 19. Abide without the camp seven days:] As unclean persons. For though it was lawful to kill men, in a just war against them, yet διὰ τὴν ἀναίτην καὶ κοινὴν συγγένειαν (as Philo speaks), "because of the most ancient and common kindred between all

21 ¶ And Eleazar the priest said unto the men of war which went to the battle, This is the ordinance of the law which the Lord commanded Moses;

22 Only the gold, and the silver, the brass, the iron, the tin, and the lead, mankind," it was fit men should use some purification to cleanse themselves from that which looked like a crime, though it was none.

23 Every thing that may abide the fire, ye shall make it go through the fire, and it shall be clean; nevertheless it shall be purified with the water of separation: and all that abideth not the fire ye shall make go through the water.

Whosoever hath killed any person.] The whole army that went to the war, were to stay without the camp seven days; and such of them as had had their hands in blood, or had touched a dead body, though killed by another, were to use a special purification; which was made by the water of separation, mentioned ch. xix. 9, &c.

Your captives] Or the prey that they had taken; of garments, and other things, mentioned in the next verse: and so the word is translated ver. 26. For we cannot think that the persons they had taken, being gentiles, were to be purified with that water which was peculiar to the Jews.

On the third day, and on the seventh] So the law was, ch. xix. 11, 12. And such purifications were common among the Gentiles, especially the Greeks, upon the like occasions, as Mr. Selden observes (lib. iv. De Jure Nat. et Gent. cap. ult. Grotius, lib. ii. De Jure Belli et Pacis, cap. 24. n. 10). To whom add our late learned Dr. Spencer, lib. iii. dissert. 3. sect. 1, where he takes this to have been a custom, derived from ancient time, before the law of Moses (which may be questioned): and Bonfrerius, upon this place, hath alleged the very same proofs, and several more; particularly this out of the scholiast upon Sophocles, in his Ajax Mastigoph. Ἰδὸς ἦν τοῖς παλαιῖς ὅτε ἡ φόνος ἀνθρώπων, &c. "it was the custom among the ancients, when they either killed a man," or made any other slaughter, to wash their hands in water, εἰς κάθαρσιν μιάσματος, "for the purification of the defilement."

Ver. 20. Purify all your raiment, &c.] With the same water of separation (or else by washing them in running water, as the manner was in other cases, (Lev. xi. 32, 33), for they might all be supposed to be defiled by dead bodies, and so come under the law (ch. xix. 14).

Ver. 21.] This law was to be observed hereafter by those who went to war; for though the law before was, as I observed, that he who touched a dead body should be purified with the water of separation, yet nothing is there said of him that killed a man in war, but did not, perhaps, touch his body; which now is brought under the same rule.

Ver. 22, 23. Only the gold, &c. ye shall make it go through the fire, &c.] All sorts of metals were to have this peculiar sort of purification; which the other things (mentioned ver. 20), would not endure. And the same Bonfrerius observes, this was a way of purification among the gentiles as old as Homer's time; but they used sulphur with it. For so he makes Ulysses call to the old women to bring him sulphur, and then fire, that he might fume the house wherein the woers had been killed. Which is observed by Fort. Scacchus also, Myrothec. 2. cap. 30, where he also notes, that Ovid gives a long account why these two, fire and water, were chosen for the instruments 24 And ye shall wash your clothes on the seventh day, and ye shall be clean, and afterward ye shall come into the camp.

25 ¶ And the LORD spake unto Moses, saying,

26 Take the sum of the prey that was taken, both of man and of beast, thou, and Eleazar the priest, and the chief fathers of the congregation:

27 And divide the prey into two parts; between them that took the war upon them, who went out to battle, and between all the congregation:

28 And levy a tribute unto the LORD of the men of war which went out to battle: one soul of five hundred, both of the persons, and of the heeves, and of the asses, and of the sheep:

29 Take it of their half, and give it unto Eleazar the priest, for an heave offering of the LORD.

30 And of the children of Israel's half, thou shalt take one portion of fifty, of the persons, of all manner of beasts, and give them unto the Levites, which keep the charge of the tabernacle of the LORD.

31 And Moses and Eleazar the priest did as the LORD commanded Moses.

32 And the booty, being the rest of the prey which the men of war had caught, was six hundred thousand and seventy thousand and five thousand sheep,

33 And threescore and twelve thousand heeves, of purification, lib. iv. Fastorum; where he saith particularly of fire,

"Omnia purgat edax ignis, vitiumque metalli Excoquit."—

Nevertheless it shall be purified] On the third day, I suppose, before it went through the fire.

All that abideth not the fire ye shall make go through the water.] All things that could abide the fire, were to be purified, both by that and by the water of separation. And such things as could not abide it, were to be purified, not merely by sprinkling them with the water of separation, but by making them go through the water.

Ver. 24.] Thus he that sprinkled an unclean person with the water of separation, was bound to purify himself (ch. xix. 19).

Ver. 25.] After they were purified, and come into the camp.

Ver. 26. Take the sum of the prey that was taken.] In the Hebrew the words are, "take the sum of the prey of the captivity;" which, it is plain by what follows, signifies the sum of the prey, and of the captives. For all that they took was of three kinds (ver. 12), the persons called captives; the beasts, which are called the prey; and money and goods (such as are mentioned ver. 20, 21), which are called the spoils.

Both of man and of beast.] Here an account is ordered to be given of two parts of what had been taken; but nothing said of the third (which was the spoils), out of which they who had it made a voluntary oblation (ver. 50, 53).

Chief fathers] The same, perhaps, with the "heads of the tribes," ch. xxx. 1.

Ver. 27. Divide the prey] By this partition, a far larger share was given to every one of the warriors, who were but twelve thousand, than to any of their brethren, who were near six hundred thousand: for they had hazarded themselves, which the others had not; who, notwithstanding that, enjoyed some fruit of their labours; because it was a common cause in which they engaged, and the rest seem to have been ready to fight, as well as they (ver. 3). This division was made by a special direction of God, but was not the rule in after ages; as appears from 1 Sam. xxx. 24, 25, nor had been in ancient times, as the Jews interpret Gen. xiv. 24 (see Selden, lib. vi. De Jure Nat. et Gent. cap. 16. p. 747).

Ver. 28. Levy a tribute unto the Lord, &c.] The Lord was their sovereign, and therefore had a tribute due to him, out of that which they had taken in war: as a grateful acknowledgment that they owed their success to him.

Both of the persons,] i. e. Of the women and the children.

Of the heeves, and of the asses, and of the sheep.] The Hebrew word tzon signifies goats as well as sheep; and both being here intended, the LXX. express them both. Here is no mention of camels, which it seems their country was not stocked withal at this time: see ver. 34, and what I have noted upon Gen. xxxvii. 25. This tribute to God was but a very small proportion, in comparison with what their kings challenged in following times, if we may believe the Talmudists; who say, they had all the gold and silver, and such rich things that were taken, and half of the rest of the prey, which was divided between them and the people (see Selden in the place above named). But anciently they had only the tenth part (see Gen. xiv. 20).

Ver. 29. Give it unto Eleazar] For the maintenance of the priests, among whom this part of the tribute was divided. And it was just a tenth part of what the Levites had, as they had a tenth part of their tithes, which was paid them for their constant support. So the law was, ch. xviii. 21, 24, 26, &c. which was observed in this levy; which is called trumah, as the offering for the making of the sanctuary is called Exod. xxv. 2, where we translate it, as here, a heave-offering.

Ver. 30. Of the children of Israel's half, &c.] A far larger share is demanded of the people (ten times as much as was paid by the soldiers) because they came more easily by it, without any pains or danger. And they pay it in a very just proportion to the number of those who went to the war, and of those who stayed at home, but were able to go to war, who were above six hundred thousand (ch. xxvi. 2, 51), of which twelve thousand, who were employed in this expedition, were the fiftieth part.

Give them unto the Levites.] Who were far more numerous than the priests, and therefore had a greater proportion of the tribute.

Which keep the charge] See ch. i. 50. iii. 6—8.

Ver. 31.] This command is peculiarly to Moses, (ver. 25), but Eleazar was to assist him in the execution of it (ver. 26), and accordingly they took the sum of the prey both of man and beast, and divided it between the soldiers and people; and levied a tribute upon each for the Lord, who ordered it to his ministers.

Ver. 32. The booty,] i. e. Besides what was necessarily spent for their subsistence during the war, and while they lay out of the camp (ver. 19).

Was six hundred thousand and seventy thousand and five thousand sheep.] A vast stock; far exceeding the number of men of war which were in Israel.

31 And threescore and one thousand asses,
35 And thirty and two thousand persons in all, of women that had not known man by lying with him.

36 And the half, which was the portion of them that went out to war, was in number three hundred thousand and seven and thirty thousand and five hundred sheep :

37 And the Lord's tribute of the sheep was six hundred and threescore and fifteen.

38 And the beeves were thirty and six thousand; of which the Lord's tribute was threescore and twelve.

39 And the asses were thirty thousand and five hundred; of which the Lord's tribute was threescore and one.

40 And the persons were sixteen thousand; of which the Lord's tribute was thirty and two persons.

41 And Moses gave the tribute, which was the Lord's heave offering, unto Eleazar the priest, as the Lord commanded Moses.

42 And of the children of Israel's half, which Moses divided from the men that warred, 43 (Now the half that pertained unto the congregation was three hundred thousand and thirty thousand and seven thousand and five hundred sheep,

44 And thirty and six thousand beeves,

45 And thirty thousand asses and five hundred,

46 And sixteen thousand persons;)

47 Even of the children of Israel's half, Moses took one portion of fifty, both of man and of beast, and gave them unto the Levites, which kept the charge of the tabernacle of the Lord; as the Lord commanded Moses.

48 ¶ And the officers which were over thousands of the host, the captains of thousands, and captains of hundreds, came near unto Moses :

49 And they said unto Moses, Thy servants have taken the sum of the men of war which are under our charge, and there lacketh not one man of us.

50 We have therefore brought an oblation for the Lord, what every man hath gotten, of jewels of gold, chains, and bracelets, rings, earrings, and

Ver. 33. Threescore and twelve thousand beeves.] It seems their country had good pasture in it, as well as sheep-walks: for, as Arabia Felix, it is certain, had agros latissimos et fertilissimos, (as Pliny speaks, lib. vi. cap. 25), "most spacious and fertile fields;" so Arabia Petraea (in which Midian was) did not wholly want them.

Ver. 34. Threescore and one thousand asses.] The countries about Judea abounding with camels also, particularly Arabia, in which Job had a great number, it may seem strange that we read of none here; especially since they had vast numbers in following times (Judg. vi. 5; vii. 12), and the Ishmaelites (with whom they were associates in trade) had them long before this time (Gen. xxxvii. 27. 36). But it is likely they did not yet find it for their profit to feed camels (of which they learnt to make a traffic afterward), no more than mules, of which we read nothing here, nor indeed in Judea, till the times of David. It may be supposed, that, if they had camels, they were of that kind called dromedaries, which were famous in this country in after-ages (Isa. lx. 6), and that the people, who escaped the slaughter, fled away upon them: and that there were other beasts in this country, besides beeves, and asses, and sheep, and goats, seems to be plain from ver. 30, where, after the mention of these, he adds of all manner of beasts, he should take a portion for the Levites; but of camels or dromedaries, I suppose, none were found.

Ver. 35. Thirty and two thousand persons in all, &c.] It appears by this to have been a very populous country, in which were so many virgins.

Ver. 36.] There is no difficulty in this, or in the following verses; this being exactly the half of the whole number of sheep mentioned ver. 32.

Ver. 37.] Which is exactly one in five hundred, out of this half of the booty; as God ordered, ver. 28.

Ver. 38.] The very same proportions are observed here, as in the sheep, which appears by comparing this verse with ver. 33. And the two next verses (39, 40), give the same account of the asses and the persons, which were as exactly divided; and the Lord had the same portion of them, as ver. 34, 35, compared with these, demonstrate.

Ver. 41.] This is recorded to show how faithful Moses was in performing obedience to God's commands (ver. 29), and far from desiring the smallest portion for himself out of so great a booty, which, if he had acted by his own private spirit, he would scarce have avoided.

Ver. 42.] There is nothing here, nor in the following verses, to ver. 48. but a repetition of what was said concerning the other half before mentioned; to show that the same exactness was observed both in the division of the prey among the people, and in taking out of it such a portion as God assigned to the Levites; which was one out of fifty; as out of the men of war's part, one out of five hundred (ver. 28. 30).

Ver. 48.] The first words of this verse seem to suppose, that there were other great officers, as well as the general, who were above the captains over thousands, and the captains over hundreds: which is very probable.

Ver. 49. Thy servants, &c.] The greatest men speak with the greatest reverence to Moses; who was in the place of God.

Have taken the sum of the men of war] Made a muster of them (as we now speak) at our return from the war.

There lacketh not one man of us.] A wonderful victory; which shows the war was the Lord's (ver. 3), who struck such a terror into them, that one would think they turned their backs, and did not strike a stroke against the Israelites.

Ver. 50. We have therefore brought an oblation] For the uses of the sanctuary; either in purchasing sacrifices, or maintaining God's ministers, &c. For korban signifies every thing that is given to God, though not sacrificed upon the altar.

What every man hath gotten,] All of them offered something to the Lord out of the spoil he had gotten, according to the piety of ancient times (Gen. xiv. 20). For we find no precept in the law for this; and yet it was constantly practised by David in after times (2 Sam. viii. 11, 12), and by the officers of his army (1 Chron. xxvi. 26, 27), and by other men, Samuel, Saul, Abner, &c. (ver. 28, &c.).

Jewels of gold,] Vessels, as the Hebrew word tablets, to make an atonement for our souls before the Lord.

51 And Moses and Eleazar the priest took the gold of them, even all wrought jewels.

52 And all the gold of the offering that they offered up to the Lord, of the captains of thousands, and of the captains of hundreds, was sixteen thousand seven hundred and fifty shekels.

signifies, or all manner of ornaments made of gold; the particulars of which follow, viz. chains, bracelets, &c. but the Jerusalem Targum takes these jewels (as we translate it) to have been the golden attire about the heads of their women.

Chains,] These are commonly thought to have been the ornaments of their arms. But they may as well be thought to have been used about their legs, or their necks.

Bracelets,] These, it is apparent, were ornaments about their wrists or hands (Gen. xxiv. 47. Ezek. xvi. 11).

Rings,] They were ornaments of the fingers (Gen. xli. 42. Esther iii. 10).

Earrings,] Nothing more common in those countries, especially among the Midianites and Ishmaelites; as we find, Judg. viii. 24—26, where there is a different word used to express this ornament; yet the word hagil, here used, certainly signifying something round, and the ornaments encompassing the arms and other parts, being before mentioned, it cannot well be thought to denote any thing but rings in the ears. And so we translate it, Ezek. xvi. 12.

Tablets,] Some ornaments about the breasts (see Exod. xxxv. 22).

To make an atonement] For the guilt of which Moses accused them, ver. 14, or any other, which had contracted in the war.

Ver. 52.] It hath been observed before, that three thousand shekels made a talent: and therefore their offering amounted to above five talents and a half.

Ver. 53. The men of war had taken spoil,] Or rather, "had taken the spoil," mentioned ver. 12, of which

53 (For the men of war had taken spoil, every man for himself.)

54 And Moses and Eleazar the priest took the gold of the captains of thousands and of hundreds, and brought it into the tabernacle of the congregation, for a memorial for the children of Israel before the Lord.

part of the booty no division was made between the men of war and the people (ver. 26), but they kept it entirely to themselves, and now very gratefully made a present of a very considerable part of it to the Lord: see ver. 12, where the word spoil is used strictly for a part of the booty, distinct from the other two, the captives and the prey; and so it signifies here.

Ver. 54. Moses and Eleazar—look the gold] This was said before, (ver. 51), and therefore the sense here is, that having received it as an offering to the Lord, they brought it into the tabernacle of the congregation; as it here follows in the conclusion of this verse.

Of the captains of thousands and of hundreds,] It was not their oblation only, but the oblation of every one of the men of war (ver. 50, 51). But the commanders received it from the common soldiers, and presented it unto Moses and Eleazar, from the whole host.

For a memorial] That God might be mindful of them, i. e. propitious to them, who were so grateful to him for his benefits.

The Jerusalem Targum upon ver. 50, fancies these officers to have represented to Moses their great chastity, when they made this offering; saying, "We broke into the chambers and closets of the kings of Midian; and there we saw their beautiful and charming daughters, from whom we took the golden ornaments upon their heads, and in their ears, and on their arms, their fingers, and breasts; but did not cast a wanton look upon one of them:" and therefore they hoped this oblation they made would rise up for them, in the day of the great judgment, as a reconciliation for their souls before the Lord.

CHAPTER XXXII.

1 The Reubenites and Gadites sue for their inheritance on that side Jordan. 6 Moses reproveth them. 16 They offer him conditions to his content. 33 Moses assigneth them the land. 39 They conquer it.

1 Now the children of Reuben and the children of Gad had a very great multitude of cattle: and when they saw the land of Jazer, and the land of Gilead, that, behold, the place was a place for cattle;

2 The children of Gad and the children of

CHAP. XXXII.

Ver. 1. The children of Reuben and—Gad] Here the children of Reuben, who was Jacob's first-born, are mentioned in the first place; but in the rest of the chapter (ver. 2. 6. 25. 29. 33), the children of Gad are constantly first mentioned, because they were the first movers of that which follows, as the Hebrews conjecture.

Multitude of cattle:] More than any other tribe.

When they saw the land of Jazer,] Which was lately taken from the Amorites, after they had slain Sihon their king (ch. xxi. 32). This city and country belonging to it, were near to the spring of the river Arnon; and there is frequent mention of it in the book of Joshua, and in Isa. xvi. 8, 9. and Jer. xlviii. 34.

Gilead,] A noble country, so called from the mountain Gilead, which bounded it on the east, as Jordan did on the west, the river Jabbok on the south, and Mount Libanus on the north.

The place was a place for cattle;] Which in the fourth verse is called "a land of cattle," ארץ קציר-קרפון, as the LXX. translate it, "fit for feeding of cattle;" being famous for pasture and other grazing ground. For Bashan was in this country (Deut. iii. 12, 13), where every one knows the largest and fattest oxen were bred (Ps. xxii. 12), and sheep also (Deut. xxxvii. 14), and therefore is joined with Gilead (Micah vi. 14), which, being woody and mountainous in some parts of it, was no less famous for breeding goats (see Cant. iv. 1), which delight to browse on such trees as Mount Gilead abounded withal (see Bochartus in his Hierozoic. par. i. lib. ii. cap. 51).

Reuben came and spake unto Moses, and to Eleazar the priest, and unto the princes of the congregation, saying,

3 Ataroth, and Dibon, and Jazer, and Nimrah, and Heshbon, and Elealeh, and Shebam, and Nebo, and Beon,

4 Even the country which the LORD smote before the congregation of Israel, is a land for cattle, and thy servants have cattle :

5 Wherefore, said they, if we have found grace in thy sight, let this land be given unto thy servants for a possession, and bring us not over Jordan.

6 ¶ And Moses said unto the children of Gad and to the children of Reuben, Shall your brethren go to war, and shall ye sit here ?

7 And wherefore discourage ye the heart of the children of Israel from going over into the land which the LORD hath given them ?

8 Thus did your fathers, when I sent them from Kadesh-barnea to see the land.

9 For when they went up unto the valley of Eshcol, and saw the land, they discouraged the heart of the children of Israel, that they should not go into the land which the LORD had given them.

10 And the LORD's anger was kindled the same time, and he sware, saying,

11 Surely none of the men that came up out of Egypt, from twenty years old and upward, shall see the land which I sware unto Abraham, unto Isaac, and unto Jacob ; because they have not wholly followed me :

12 Save Caleb the son of Jephunneh the Ke-

Ver. 2. Gad and—Reuben] Neither here, nor in the foregoing verse, is there any mention of the children of Manasseh (half of which had their portion in this country), because they were neither the contrivers nor movers of this ; but it is most probable had a lot assigned them here, because these countries were too much for the other two tribes alone ; and they of Manasseh had much cattle also.

Came and spake unto Moses, &c.] Who were wont often to assemble to despatch public affairs (ch. xxvii. 2. xxx. 1).

Ver. 3. Ataroth,] A place which was part of the portion of Gad ; as appears by ver. 34.

Dibon,] This is mentioned as a place in the kingdom of Sihon, ch. xxi. 30. and was given to Gad also ; as we read ver. 34.

Jazer,] See ver. 1. and 35. where we find this also belonged unto Gad.

Nimrah,] Called Beth-Nimrah, ver. 36. and given to the same tribe. It is usual, I observed before, for the Hebrews to cut off the first part of the names of places, for brevity's sake (ch. xxv. 1) but this place is elsewhere called at length Beth-Nimrah, Josh. xiii. 27. where it is mentioned as a part of Sihon's kingdom, and signifies as much as domus pardorum, a habitation of leopards : so Bochartus, who observes, that when both Isaiah xv. 6. and Jeremiah xlvi. 34. speaks of the waters of Nimrim, they mean this very place, which was given to Gad ; but, in the days of those prophets, mentioned as in the country of the Moabites ; who had usurped upon their neighbours the Gadites, and taken this place from them, as they had done Jazer also ; as appears from the place above mentioned (Isa. xvi. 8, 9. Jer. xlvi. 34).

Heshbon,] The principal city of Sihon, king of the Amorites (ch. xxi. 26—28), and was given to the Reubenites (ver. 37).

Elealeh,] This is frequently mentioned with Heshbon, as a place adjoining to it (ver. 37. Isa. xvi. 9).

Shebam,] Called also Shibmah, ver. 37. and Sibmah, Isa. xvi. 8, 9. Jer. xlvi. 31. where it appears to have been a place famous for vines ; and in the days of that prophet was fallen into the hands of the Moabites, as were Heshbon and Elealeh also.

Nebo,] Which was given to the Reubenites (ver. 38).

Beon,] There is no mention of this place anywhere else ; but it is probable was part of the Reubenites' portion, being mentioned together with other places that were given unto them ; and possibly may be the place called Baal-Meon (ver. 38), which they changed into Beon, because of the name of Baal ; but the Moabites, when it fell into their hands, restored part of its old name, calling it Beth-Meon (Jer. xlvi. 23).

Ver. 4. Even the country which the Lord smote before the congregation] And gave it to them for a possession, as he intended to do the land of Canaan (see ch. xxi. 24, 25).

Is a land for cattle,] Is very fit for us (ver. 2).

Ver. 5. If we have found grace in thy sight,] A phrase often used by humble petitioners ; even by Moses himself, when he speaks to God, ch. xi. 15.

Let this land be given unto thy servants] The Israelites in common possessed it hitherto, as belonging to them all (ch. xxi. ult.) but they desire to have it assigned to them, as their particular portion.

Bring us not over Jordan,] We desire nothing in the land of Canaan.

Ver. 6.] Can you think it reasonable, that the rest of the tribes should fight still for what they are to possess ?

Shall ye sit here ?] And you take up your rest here, and settle in their conquests, which they have already made !

Ver. 7.] He seems to have suspected that mere cowardice, and a vile love of ease, made them desire to stay where they were, and go no further : which ill example might dishearten all the rest of their brethren, and make them have the same inclination to settle in the land they had conquered ; and not engage in a war with the Canaanites.

Ver. 8. Thus did your fathers,] i. e. They disheartened all their brethren.

When I sent them from Kadesh-barnea] See ch. xiii. 3. 26.

Ver. 9. When they went up unto the valley of Eshcol,] Men do not go up into a valley ; therefore the meaning is, they went up to search the country (as it is said they did, ch. xiii. 21, 22), and went on in their search, till they came to the valley or brook of Eshcol, ch. xiii. 23, where they cut down a branch with a cluster of grapes, to show what fruit the country afforded.

Saw the land,] Had taken a full view of the country. They discouraged the heart of the children of Israel,] Represented the people and the cities to be so strong, that they should not be able to deal with them (ch. xiii. 28, 29).

That they should not go into the land] And, therefore, persuaded them not to attempt to possess themselves of it. For they said expressly, “ We are not able to go against the people, for they are stronger than we ” (ch. xiii. 31).

Ver. 10.] See ch. xiv. 21. 28.

Ver. 11. None of the men, &c.] See ch. xiv. 22. 29. 35.

Shall see the land] See ch. xiv. 23.

nezite, and Joshua the son of Nun: for they have wholly followed the LORD.

13 And the LORD's anger was kindled against Israel, and he made them wander in the wilderness forty years, until all the generation, that had done evil in the sight of the LORD, was consumed.

14 And, behold, ye are risen up to your fathers' stead, an increase of sinful men, to augment yet the fierce anger of the LORD toward Israel.

15 For if ye turn away from after him, he will yet again leave them in the wilderness; and ye shall destroy all this people.

16 ¶ And they came near unto him, and said, We will build sheepfolds here for our cattle, and cities for our little ones:

17 But we ourselves will go ready armed before the children of Israel, until we have brought them unto their place: and our little ones shall dwell in the fenced cities because of the inhabitants of the land.

18 We will not return unto our houses, until the children of Israel have inherited every man his inheritance.

19 For we will not inherit with them on yonder side Jordan, or forward; because our inheritance is fallen to us on this side Jordan eastward.

20 ¶ And Moses said unto them, If ye will do this thing, if ye will go armed before the LORD to war,

21 And will go all of you armed over Jordan

Have not wholly followed me.] See there, ver. 22.

Ver. 12. Save Caleb] See ch. xiv. 24.

The Kenazite,] A great deal has been said by many to prove that Caleb is called a Kenazite, because his father's name was Kenaz. And this they prove, because Othniel's father was Kenaz, and he was Caleb's brother (Josh. xv. 17), his younger brother (Judg. i. 13. iii. 9). So that their father must have two names, Kenaz and Jephunneh. But it is very strange, if this be true, that Caleb is nowhere called the son of Kenaz, but constantly the son of Jephunneh (even there where Othniel is just before called the son of Kenaz, 1 Chron. iv. 13. 15), nor is Othniel anywhere called the son of Jephunneh, but always of Kenaz. And, indeed, there is a demonstration against this opinion; for Othniel married Caleb's daughter, which by the law of Moses was utterly unlawful, whatsoever the practice might have been before the law was given. Therefore, others think it more probable, that Othniel was one of his brother's younger sons (for uncles and nephews are often called brethren, as Abraham and Lot were), and that from this brother, whose name was Kenaz, Caleb is also called a Kenazite: but this is very absurd; for the name of Kenazzi in the Hebrew, denotes the descendants from one who gave this denomination to the family; which one brother could not do to another. It is most probable, therefore, that Kenaz was some common ancestor both of Othniel and Caleb, from whom Othniel's father took also his name. Accordingly we find Jephunneh called a Kenazite in Josh. xiv. 14, where it is said, that "Hebron became the inheritance of Caleb the son of Jephunneh the Kenazite."

Wholly followed] Fully, ch. xiv. 24. 30. 38.

Ver. 13. The Lord's anger was kindled] He had said this before (ver. 10), but repeats it again, to make them the more sensible of a thing that was done thirty-eight years ago; and to deter them from giving him the like provocation.

He made them wander in the wilderness forty years,] See ch. xiv. 31—33. xxvi. 54, 65.

Ver. 14. Behold,] Mark what I say.

Ye are risen up in your fathers' stead, &c.] Are multiplied to as great a number as your fathers, only to succeed them in their sins, and thereby bring down still more heavy punishments upon the nation.

Ver. 15. If ye turn away from after him,] As your fathers did; who refused to go and possess the good land which he had bestowed upon them.

He will yet again leave them in the wilderness;] Lead them back again into the desert, where your fathers perished; and there forsake you.

Ye shall destroy all this people.] Who, following your example, will refuse to go over Jordan (ver. 5), to take possession of the land of Canaan.

Ver. 16. They came near unto him,] As petitioners are wont to do when they are assured of their integrity, and hope to obtain their request (Gen. xlv. 19).

We will build sheepfolds] There are five words in the Hebrew language for folds for sheep and cattle; and signifying a place fenced in, that they might lie safely and be defended from wild beasts. And so this word gedera plainly imports (see Bochartus in his Hierozoic. par. i. lib. i. cap. 45).

Cities for our little ones.] Which stood in need only of repairing and fortifying (ver. 17), for they already dwelt in those cities of the Amorites (ch. xxi. 25).

Ver. 17. We ourselves will go ready armed] That is, a considerable number of them, as many as should be thought necessary (Deut. iii. 18), in all forty thousand (Josh. iv. 12).

Our little ones shall dwell in the fenced cities] Where it was necessary to leave some men to guard them from their bad neighbours, and to take care of their cattle.

Because of the inhabitants] That is, the Moabites, who were the ancient owners of this country (ch. xxi. 26), and the Edomites, who had shown no goodwill to the Israelites, as they passed through the wilderness.

Ver. 18. ] Be settled in the possession of the land of Canaan, as we desire to be in this country.

Ver. 19. We will not inherit with them on yonder side Jordan,] We will not desire any share in the country beyond Jordan, though it lie near to us; nor in that country which lies still further westward.

Because our inheritance is fallen to us on this side] We look upon this as our inheritance (with which we shall be fully satisfied), here in the land of Gilead: which lay eastward of Jordan, and of the land of Canaan.

Ver. 20. If ye will do this thing,] Be as good as your word.

If ye will go armed before the Lord to war,] To go "before the Lord," was to go before the ark; which was the symbol of God's presence, over which his glory resided. And it is to be observed, that these two tribes, Reuben and Gad (together with Simeon) always lay encamped before the sanctuary; as appears from the second chapter of this book, ver. 10. 14—17. And accordingly, when the camp removed, they marched immediately before it; as is particularly noted, ch. x. 18—21. So that here he requires them only to hold their usual place, when they went to the war against the Canaanites; and accordingly it is expressly said, they did (together with half the tribe of before the LORD, until he hath driven out his enemies from before him, 22 And the land be subdued before the LORD: then afterward ye shall return, and be guiltless before the LORD, and before Israel; and this land shall be your possession before the LORD.

23 But if ye will not do so, behold, ye have sinned against the LORD: and be sure your sin will find you out.

24 Build you cities for your little ones, and folds for your sheep; and do that which hath proceeded out of your mouth.

25 And the children of Gad and the children of Reuben spake unto Moses, saying, Thy servants will do as my lord commandeth.

26 Our little ones, our wives, our flocks, and all our cattle, shall be there in the cities of Gilead:

27 But thy servants will pass over, every man armed for war, before the LORD to battle, as my lord saith.

Manasseh, who were joined with them) "pass over before the Lord unto battle." Josh. iv. 12, 13.

Ver. 21. And will go all of you] As many as shall be required, and can be spared (ver. 17).

Until he hath driven out his enemies] Not only bring us into Canaan, but continue with us, till we have expelled the inhabitants of that country: which he encourages them to undertake, by representing the Canaanites as the enemies of the Lord, who would therefore fight for them.

Ver. 22. The land be subdued before the Lord:] By this expression, and that in the foregoing words, it appears that the ark was carried along with them to the war every where till it was ended; as it was when it began, at the taking of Jericho (Josh. vi. 6, 7, &c.).

Afterward ye shall return, and be guiltless, &c.] Not only be free from all blame in this desire, but have what you desire.

Before the Lord.] By his order and appointment.

Ver. 23. If ye will not do so,] If this be not your intention; or if you go back from your word.

Behold.] Observe what I say.

Ye have sinned, &c.] Your guilt is exceeding great, and shall be most certainly punished, as it deserves.

Ver. 24.] As for the rest of their proposals, about their children and cattle, he consented to them, without any exception.

Ver. 25. The children of Gad and—Reuben spake unto Moses.] The word for spake, in the Hebrew, being jozer, in the singular number, instead of jomru, in the plural, their doctors take it for an indication that some one principal person spake in the name of all the rest. But there is no need of this; for the singular number in this language is often used for the plural; and they never spake all of them together, but some one in the name of their brethren. And it had been better, if they had observed, that this signifies one and all (as we now speak) were of the same mind.

Thy servants will do as my lord commandeth.] And as they themselves had proposed (ver. 17).

Ver. 26.] Here they promise to leave all that was dear to them in this country, and go to serve their brethren.

Ver. 27.] We ourselves will go and fight for our brethren. It hath been often said (ver. 17. 21), that this doth not signify all the men of war among them should go, but as many as could be spared, and as

28 So concerning them Moses commanded Eleazar the priest, and Joshua the son of Nun, and the chief fathers of the tribes of the children of Israel:

29 And Moses said unto them, If the children of Gad and the children of Reuben will pass with you over Jordan, every man armed to battle, before the LORD, and the land shall be subdued before you; then ye shall give them the land of Gilead for a possession:

30 But if they will not pass over with you armed, they shall have possession among you in the land of Canaan.

31 And the children of Gad and the children of Reuben answered, saying, as the LORD hath said unto thy servants, so will we do.

32 We will pass over armed before the LORD into the land of Canaan, that the possession of our inheritance on this side Jordan may be our's.

33 And Moses gave unto them, even to the children of Gad, and to the children of Reuben, were thought sufficient. For it is manifest, the far greater half of them were left in this country to defend their wives and children, and look after their flocks and herds; as will appear by computing all the men of war that were found in the tribes of Gad and of Reuben, which were above fourscore and four thousand (ch. xxvi. 7. 18), to which, if we add half the tribe of Manasseh (who were, in all, above fifty-two thousand), there were much above a hundred thousand men able to bear arms; and not above forty thousand of them marched into Canaan, as was before observed.

Ver. 28.] He left this in charge with the principal persons, who had the government of affairs under him; particularly with Joshua, who was not unmindful of it, but remembered these tribes what Moses had said when he was about to attempt the conquest of Canaan (Josh. i. 13, 14, &c.).

Ver. 29. Moses said unto them.] He repeats to these great men, who were to see it executed, what he had said to the Gadites and Reubenites themselves (ver. 21, 22).

Then ye shall give them the land of Gilead for a possession:] They had not a right to it till they had performed the condition upon which it was granted, viz. till their brethren were in possession of their inheritance in the land of Canaan.

Ver. 30. If they will not pass over] Perform their promise, ver. 17.

They shall have possessions among you in the land of Canaan.] Take what falls to their share there; and this country be disposed of, as God shall order.

Ver. 31.] They confirm what they had promised to Moses, ver. 25, and here take all that he had said, as spoken by the order of God, who bestowed this land upon them on the condition often mentioned.

Ver. 32. We will pass over armed] This they offered at first of themselves (ver. 17), and solemnly promised, when Moses accepted their proposal (ver. 27), and again here ratify and confirm it before Eleazar, and Joshua, and all the princes (ver. 28).

That the possession of our inheritance] Which we have desired to have for our inheritance.

On this side Jordan] They were now in the land of Gilead, and so might properly call it "on this side Jordan;" but when they were in the land of Canaan, it was said to be "on that side Jordan."

May be our's.] Settled upon us and our posterity.

Ver. 33. Moses gave unto them.] Not an absolute and unto half the tribe of Manasseh the son of Joseph, the kingdom of Sihon king of the Amorites, and the kingdom of Og king of Bashan, the land, with the cities thereof in the coasts, even the cities of the countries round about.

34 ¶ And the children of Gad built Dibon, and Ataroth, and Aroer, 35 And Aroth, Shophan, and Jaazer, and Jogbehah,

grant, but a conditional; if they did as they engaged (ver. 29—31, &c.).

Even to the children of Gad, and—Reuben, and unto half the tribe of Manasseh] This half tribe is not mentioned before, because they did not put in any claim till they saw how those of Gad and Reuben would succeed in their petition; which being granted, it is likely that thereupon they represented also what store of cattle they had; and that the country would be more than enough for those who had desired it. This being found to be true, Moses thought fit to give them a portion of it, rather than any other; because the children of Machir, the son of Manasseh, had, by their valour, subdued part of this country (ver. 39. Josh. xvii. 1).

The kingdom of Sihon—and the kingdom of Og] See ch. xxi. 24. 29. Which were the first countries that the Israelites possessed; and were the first that were carried captive out of their land (2 Kings xv. 29).

The land, with the cities thereof, &c.] The land with the cities, within such a compass or limits; and all the towns within that circuit.

Ver. 34. The children of Gad built Dibon and Ataroth,] Repaired and fortified these towns, which are mentioned before, ver. 3, for they were not destroyed, but only their inhabitants (Deut. ii. 34, 35), and if they had, there was not time now to rebuild them. Thus Jeroboam is said to have built Shechem (1 Kings xii. 25), which was a city before, but gone to decay; and Azariah to have built Elah (2 Kings xiv. 22), which he restoreth to Judah as a city formerly belonging to them.

Aroer,] A city of the Amorites, upon the brink of the river Arnon; as Moses tells us, Deut. ii. 36, iii. 11, iv. 48. It formerly belonged to the Moabites, but was taken from them by Sihon.

Ver. 35.] We do not read of any of these towns elsewhere, but only of Jaazer, which seems to be that called Jazer, ver. 3.

Ver. 36. Beth-nimrah,] Called, ver. 3, Nimrah for shortness' sake; as (it may be further observed) Jemini is put for Benjamin, Esther ii. 5, Sheba for Beersheba, Josh. xix. 2, where we find these two mentioned; but they do not signify two several cities, but are two names for one and the same city; as if he had said Beersheba, which is also called Sheba. This is clear to a demonstration; for otherwise there would be more than thirteen cities in the tribe of Simeon, contrary to ver. 6. of that chapter.

Beth-haran,] A place, some say, between Dibon and Jordan.

Fenced cities: and folds for sheep.] All these cities the children of Gad fortified, and built folds for sheep in the pastures near to them.

Ver. 37. Reuben built] Repaired and fortified; as I said ver. 34.

Heshbon and Elealeh,] Mentioned above, ver. 3.

Kirjathaim,] A place where a giant-like people formerly dwelt, called Emims, Gen. xiv. 5. who 37 And the children of Reuben built Heshbon, and Elealeh, and Kirjathaim, 38 And Nebo, and Baal-meon, (their names being changed,) and Shibmah: and gave other names unto the cities which they builded.

39 And the children of Machir the son of Manasseh went to Gilead, and took it, and dispossessed the Amorite which was in it.

40 And Moses gave Gilead unto Machir the son of Manasseh; and he dwelt therein.

were expelled by the Moabites, as they were by the Amorites.

Ver. 38. Nebo,] This city is mentioned in Jer. xviii. 2. when it was fallen again into the possession of the Moabites, as was also Kirjathaim. It seems to have been near Dibon, mentioned together with it, Isa. xv. 1. At least there were in these places two famous temples; for the destruction of which, the prophet represents the people making lamentation. So the LXX. ἀπολείπει ὁ Νεβών, οὗ ὁ βωμὸς ἱμῶν, "Nebo is destroyed where your altar is." And Hesychius saith of Δερεβών, (i. e. Dibon), that it was τόπος ἔνθα ἰδρύεται ἱερὸν Μοαβιτῶν, "a place where a temple of the Moabites was built." And St. Jerome suspects that there was an oracle at this place; the word Nebo importing prophecy, or divination, as he speaks.

Baal-meon,] Another place, where, it is likely, Baal was worshipped; which made them change the names of these places, as it here follows.

Their names being changed,] For Nebo, as well as Baal, was the name of a god; as we learn from Isaiah xlvi. 1. and seems to have been an Assyrian deity; there being footsteps of it in the names of several great men there; such as Nebuchadnezzar, Nebuzardan, and many others. And it is not unlikely, that they therefore changed the names of these cities into some other, because they would abolish all remainders of idolatry in this country, according to the precept, Exod. xxiii. 13. that they should not take the name of their gods into their mouth; but, notwithstanding this, they still retained their ancient names; as appears from Josh. xiii. 17. Ezek. xxv. 9. so hard it is to alter any thing for the better!

Gave other names unto the cities which they builded.] If this refer to all the cities here mentioned, it is manifest they either retained or recovered their former names: for we read of them in all future times; particularly in the fifteenth and eighteenth chapters of Isaiah; and Kirjathaim is mentioned in the place I now quoted out of Ezekiel.

Ver. 39.] Here Gilead is used in a strict sense, not so largely as before, ver. 1. 26. 29. where it is taken for all the country on that side Jordan where Gilead was; but here, for a part of it about Mount Gilead. This is plain from the next verse; and Gilead the son of Machir, one would think, was the person that took it (Josh. xvii. 1).

Ver. 40.] i. e. To the children of Machir (for he was dead long ago), who had a considerable portion of that half of the land of Gilead, which was given to the half tribe of Manasseh. For one half was given to the Reubenites and Gadites, and the other half to them, Deut. iii. 12, 13. where Gilead signifies all that country properly so called; neither so much as the whole territory, which these tribes demanded, ver. 1. nor so little as was given to Machir, ver. 15. where Moses says, "And I gave Gilead unto Machir;" i. e. to that family of Manasseh, which were properly called Machirites, Numb. xxvi. 29. and to that family descended from his son, which from him were called Gileadites. For as Manasseh had only this son Machir, so Machir had only Gilead; but he had many (ch. xxvi. 30—32), who all raised families. And as to the Machirites (and I suppose the Gileadites) was given a portion in this country (Josh. xiii. 29, 30, &c.), so Joshua gave to the rest an inheritance in the land of Canaan (ch. xvii. 2). And he gives a reason, in the foregoing verse, why he gave Gilead and Bashan to the posterity of Machir, because they were a warlike people, inheriting their father's valour, who was a man of war; and therefore fit to be placed in the frontiers of that country.

Ver. 41. Jair the son of Manasseh] One of the posterity of Manasseh, by his mother's side; for he was the grandson of Gilead, the son of Machir, by his daughter (1 Chron. ii. 21, 22), but his father was of the tribe of Judah. It seems he joined with the children of Machir in their expedition against Gilead (mentioned ver. 39), and was so successful, that he took several small towns in that country, and so had his inheritance among the children of Manasseh, on this side Jordan, where they now were. There were threescore of them in the whole, which were afterward called cities (Josh. xiii. 13. 1 Kings iv. 23), but he had only twenty-three for his possession (1 Chron. ii. 22, 23).

Havoth-jair.] That is, the "habitation of Jair."

42 And Nobah went and took Kenath, and the villages thereof, and called it Nobah, after his own name.

For havah is a dwelling, as Bochartus observes in his Phaleg, lib. iv. cap. 29. And among the Arabians the word Havoth properly signifies many tents orderly disposed in a ring or circle; which in those countries made that which we call a village. For havah in their language signifies to compass. The same he observes in his Hieroz. par. i. lib. ii. cap. 44. p. 466.

Ver. 42. Nobah] Who he was we find in no other place; but an eminent person, no doubt, in some of the families of the Manassites; either of the Machirites or the Gileadites. For they only, as I take it, inherited on this side Jordan.

Went and took Kenath.] At the same time, I suppose, that Jair took the towns above mentioned; of which this was one (1 Chron. ii. 23). But, though Jair was the chief conductor of that expedition, yet he kept, as I said, only twenty-three towns to himself: the rest were given to them who accompanied him, of whom, it is probable, Nobah was one.

Called it Nobah, after his own name.] But it retained its old name also: for St. Jerome says, in his time there was a city called Canatha, in the region of Trachonitis, not far from Bosra.

Thus this country being settled upon these two tribes and a half, the land of Canaan was divided, by God's command, for an inheritance to the remaining nine tribes, and the other half of the tribe of Manasseh (Josh. xiii. 7).

CHAPTER XXXIII.

1 Two and forty journeys of the Israelites. 50 The Canaanites are to be destroyed.

1 THESE are the journeys of the children of Israel, which went forth out of the land of Egypt with their armies under the hand of Moses and Aaron.

CHAP. XXXIII.

Ver. 1. These are the journeys] A brief recapitulation of the travels of the children of Israel through the wilderness; whereby the wonderful providence of God over them appears, in their protection and preservation, from the time they departed out of Egypt, till they came to the borders of the land of Canaan.

With their armies] For they marched in an orderly manner, as armies do (see Exod. xii. 41. 51. xiii. 18).

Under the hand of Moses and Aaron.] By whom they were conducted, as the ministers of God (Exod. xii. 1. 28. 50).

Ver. 2. Moses wrote their goings out] Every removal which they made from the place where they were, unto another whither they journeyed.

By the commandment of the Lord.] This may refer either to their journeys (which were by God's commandment, ch. x. 13), or rather to Moses' writing this epitome of their travels, of which God ordered him to give a distinct account: which was no unnecessary work, but most useful to posterity; there being no history extant in the world, as David Chytraeus well observes (except that of the birth, life, death, and resurrection of Christ), which contains so many wonderful instances of Divine providence, as this of bringing the children of Israel out of Egypt, and leading them through the Red Sea, and through the wilderness; concerning which Maimonides hath an excellent discourse in his third part of More Nevochim, cap. 50, the substance of which is this: that it being impossible any miracles should continue throughout all generations, due care should be taken that the memory of them be not lost, but faithfully preserved by the history and narration of them in future times. Now there being no greater miracle than the subsistence of the children of Israel in the desert for forty years; a desert full of scorpions and serpents, destitute of water, uninhabited, through which no man had been wont to pass, as Jeremiah speaks, ch. ii. 6, where they ate no bread, nor drank wine, or strong drink (Deut. xxix. 6, &c.). God would have the particular places set down distinctly where they pitched in that howling wilderness; that all men might be satisfied (who would take the pains to examine things), by what a marvellous providence such a multitude of people were fed every day for forty years together; and none might be able to cavil and say, that they travelled through a country good enough, and pitched in habitable places, where they might plough, and sow, and reap; or where they might have herbs and roots for their sustenance; or where manna ordinarily came down from the clouds for men's support:

2 And Moses wrote their goings out according to their journeys by the commandment of the Lord: and these are their journeys according to their goings out.

These are their journeys] As if he had said, hav-

3 And they departed from Rameses in the first month, on the fifteenth day of the first month; on the morrow after the passover the children of Israel went out with an high hand in the sight of all the Egyptians.

4 For the Egyptians buried all their firstborn, which the Lord had smitten among them: upon their gods also the Lord executed judgments.

5 And the children of Israel removed from Rameses, and pitched in Succoth.

6 And they departed from Succoth, and pitched in Etham, which is in the edge of the wilderness.

7 And they removed from Etham, and turned again unto Pi-hahiroth, which is before Baal-zephon: and they pitched before Migdol.

8 And they departed from before Pi-hahiroth, and passed through the midst of the sea into the wilderness, and went three days' journey in the wilderness of Etham, and pitched in Marah.

9 And they removed from Marah, and came unto Elim: and in Elim were twelve fountains of water, and threescore and ten palm trees; and they pitched there.

10 And they removed from Elim, and encamped by the Red sea.

11 And they removed from the Red sea, and encamped in the wilderness of Sin.

12 And they took their journey out of the wilderness of Sin, and encamped in Dophkah.

13 And they departed from Dophkah, and encamped in Alush.

14 And they removed from Alush, and encamped at Rephidim, where was no water for the people to drink.

ing received this commandment from God, this is a true and exact account, which here follows, of their travels from place to place.

Ver. 3. They departed from Rameses] See Exod. xii. 37. Here, in all likelihood, they sacrificed the paschal lamb, and were preserved from the destroying angel; which made this place very remarkable: for they seem to have been all summoned hither, to meet here as in a common rendezvous (as they now speak), to be ready to march away when God gave the word of command.

In the first month,—on the morrow after the passover] Which they had kept in Egypt on the fourteenth (Exod. xii. 46).

Went out with an high hand] Exod. xiv. 8.

In the sight of all the Egyptians.] Who thrust them out (Exod. xii. 39).

Ver. 4. For the Egyptians buried all their firstborn,] They were so terrified with the sudden death of all their first-born, that they pressed them to be gone, lest they should be slain also (Exod. xii. 33). And were so employed in mourning for them, and giving them decent burial, that they thought not of pursuing the Israelites till some days after.

Which the Lord had smitten] At midnight, between the fourteenth and fifteenth days (Exod. xii. 29).

Upon their gods also the Lord executed judgments.] Which still more astonished them (Exod. xii. 12. xviii. 11. 2 Sam. vii. 23), just as he did with Babylon afterward (Isa. xxi. 9).

Ver. 5.] Exod. xii. 37. Here they received the command to set apart all the first-born unto the Lord, in memory of God's sparing them when he slew all the first-born of the Egyptians (Exod. xiii. 1. 12. 13, &c.).

Ver. 6.] See Exod. xiii. 20, where it immediately follows, that they were conducted hither by a miraculous cloud, which ever after led them in all their journeys.

Ver. 7. From Etham, and turned again unto Pi-hahiroth.] So it is expressly recorded, Exod. xiv. 2. Hither they were led on purpose, that they might see the wonderful power and goodness of God, in a place where they had high mountains on each side of them, and the army of Pharaoh behind them, and the Red Sea before them, through which God made them a passage, rather than let them fall again under the Egyptian tyranny. Here is also the singular number for the plural, in the word turned again (as was observed before in another word, ch. xxxii. 25), but the observation of the Hebrew doctors upon it seems to be frivolous, "That with one heart they did what Moses commanded."

Ver. 8. Passed through the midst of the sea] See Exod. xiv. 23. Where Pharaoh and his host were drowned; as they could not but call to mind when they read this brief history: which, it might be expected, would also call to remembrance their own distrust of God, notwithstanding which he most graciously delivered them (Exod. xiv. 11, 12, &c.).

Wilderness of Etham.] Called in Exod. xv. 22, "the wilderness of Shur:" where they were very much distressed for want of water.

Pitched in Marah.] Where God obliged them by a new miracle, in making the bitter water sweet (Exod. xv. 23. 25).

Ver. 9. And came unto Elim:] See Exod. xv. 11.

Ver. 10. And encamped by the Red sea.] Not by that part of it, where they lately came out of it; but by a more southerly part of it, where it bends towards Arabia. For the Red Sea, which Ptolemy calls the Arabian Gulf, runs a long way, like the Adriatic, now called the Gulf of Venice, or the Baltic Sea, as David Chytræus observes; who compares these three together as much of a length, and all in some places broader, and some narrower. This station is not mentioned in the book of Exodus.

Ver. 11.] Exod. xvi. 1, where manna first began to rain upon them, with which God fed them forty years.

Ver. 12.] This and the next station (Alush) are not mentioned in Exodus; because nothing remarkable (it is supposed) fell out in these two places, as there did in the next; and they made no long stay there.

Ver. 13.] The Jewish doctors find something remarkable here, though Moses saith nothing of it. For, as the sabbath was first commanded at Marah, which was their fifth station, so it was first observed here at Alush, as they fancy, which was their tenth. And more than that, this was the only sabbath, in their opinion, which they exactly kept; the very next being profaned (see Selden, lib. iii. De Jure Nat. et Gent. &c. cap. 11, and lib. ii. De Synedr. cap. 1). The author of Sefher Cosri saith, the ancient tradition is, "that at this place the manna first descended" (par. li. sect. 20).

Ver. 14. Encamped at Rephidim.] See Exod. xvii. 1.

Where was no water] And thereby an occasion given to the Almighty Goodness to show his wonderful power, in bringing water out of a rock for them (ver. 5, 6). And here also "Amalek lay in wait for Israel, in the way when they came out of Egypt (1 Sam. xv. 2), and smote some that lagged behind (Deut. xxv.

15 And they departed from Rephidim, and pitched in the wilderness of Sinai.

16 And they removed from the desert of Sinai, and pitched at Kibroth-hattaavah.

17 And they departed from Kibroth-hattaavah, and encamped at Hazeroth.

18 And they departed from Hazeroth, and pitched in Rithmah.

19 And they departed from Rithmah, and pitched at Rimmon-parez.

20 And they departed from Rimmon-parez, and pitched in Libnah.

21 And they removed from Libnah, and pitched at Rissah.

22 And they journeyed from Rissah, and pitched in Kehelathah.

23 And they went from Kehelathah, and pitched in mount Shapher.

24 And they removed from mount Shapher, and encamped in Haradah.

25 And they removed from Haradah, and pitched in Makheloth.

26 And they removed from Makheloth, and encamped at Tahath.

27 And they departed from Tahath, and pitched at Tarah.

28 And they removed from Tarah, and pitched in Mithcah.

29 And they went from Mithcah, and pitched in Hashmonah.

30 And they departed from Hashmonah, and encamped at Moseroth.

31 And they departed from Moseroth, and pitched in Bene-jaakan.

32 And they removed from Bene-jaakan, and encamped at Hor-hagidgad.

33 And they went from Hor-hagidgad, and pitched in Jotbathah.

34 And they removed from Jotbathah, and encamped at Ebronah.

16), but were vanquished by Joshua in a pitched battle (Exod. xvii. 8, 9, &c.). And here Jethro also came to see Moses, and gave him advice about the government of the people with more ease both to himself and them (Exod. xviii).

Ver. 15.] Exod. xix. 1. 2. This was forty-seven days after they came from Rameses, on the first day of the third month: three days after which (viz. on the fiftieth day after they came out of Egypt) God gave them his law from Mount Sinai; where Moses was called up to him, and stayed with him twice forty days; and was instructed there how to make the tabernacle, and set it up when it was made, with all the furniture belonging to it. All sorts of sacrifices were ordered while they remained in this place; priests consecrated; laws given about clean and unclean things; and about marriages, and feasts, and the year of jubilee, with several other things, mentioned in the book of Leviticus. Here also the people were numbered: their encampment ordered; a second passover kept; laws given about the water of jealousy and the Nazarites, with several other matters; and then, after they had lain here eleven months and twenty days, they are commanded to leave this famous station; the most remarkable of all other (Numb. x. 11, 12).

Ver. 16. Kibroth-hattaavah.] A place in the wilderness of Paran, three days' journey from Mount Sinai, Numb. x. 23, xi. 34, where there was a dreadful slaughter of the people, that wantonly despised manna, and lusted after flesh. Yet here God was pleased to vouchsafe to send his Spirit upon the seventy elders, for the assistance of Moses.

Ver. 17. And they departed from Kibroth-hattaavah, and encamped at Hazeroth.] See ch. xi. 35, where Miriam was punished for her envy at Moses, ch. xii. 1. 10.

Ver. 18. Rithmah.] A place also in the wilderness of Paran, as appears from this book (ch. xii. 16), and was not far from Kadesh-barnea, from whence the spies were sent to search out the land of Canaan (see ch. xiii. 26). In which place they lay a long time (Deut. i. 46).

Ver. 19. Rimmon-parez.] This and the following stages are nowhere else mentioned: and seem to have all been in the wilderness of Paran before spoken of; which was a very long tract of ground, from Elana, a port in the Arabian Gulf, to Kadesh-barnea; which, as David Chytraeus computes it, was thirty German miles.

Ver. 20. Libnah.] This and the rest to ver. 31, are places of which, as I said, we nowhere else read, and so can give no account of them. They were all uninhabited, and out of the road of all travellers; and perhaps had no names till they were given by the Israelites: who encamped in so many various places (sometimes in mountains, as appears from ver. 23, and sometimes in the plain), that they might be taught, that God was alike present everywhere to protect, defend, and provide for them; even there where no man dwelt. The Jews make this use of their travels, here recorded by Moses, through so many unknown places, by which he brought them at last to Canaan; to keep up their spirits under this long captivity (as they call it) wherein they now are, and have wandered uncertainly from mountain to mountain, from kingdom to kingdom, from banishment to banishment (as they themselves speak), till their Messiah come to redeem them: which he will do, when their eyes are opened to see what one of their ancient rabbins (Moses Hadarschan) hath told them, as he is quoted by Paulus Fagius, that "the Redeemer was born before him who reduced Israel into this last captivity."

Ver. 31. In Bene-jaakan.] In Deut. x. 6, Moses seems to say the quite contrary, that they "took their journey from Beeroth of the children of Jaakan to Mosera." But there he may be thought to speak of a different place, as Drusus notes upon those words: or if he doth not, it is no wonder if, while they wandered in this tedious wilderness, they went backward and forward from Bene-jaakan to Moseroth, which he mentions in Deuteronomy; and from Moseroth back again to Bene-jaakan, which he mentions here.

Ver. 32. Hor-hagidgad.] This place was also called Gudgodah, Deut. x. 7, if Moses speaks there of the same places he doth here.

Ver. 33. Jotbathah.] Called Deut. x. 7, Jotbath.

Ver. 34. Ebronah.] All their removals mentioned from ver. 16, to this and the next place, are an account of their wanderings in the wilderness, from the second year after their coming out of Egypt till the fortieth; in which time all the congregation, above twenty years of age, were consumed, and buried in some part or other of this great desert.

Ver. 35. Ezion-gaber.] A place on the Red Sea, unto which they were brought before they ended their travels (1 Kings ix. 26. xxii. 18). It had its name from the snagged rocks, like to the backbone, which stretched out a great way on that shore, as Bochart observes: which rocks made this part so dangerous, 35 And they departed from Ebronah, and encamped at Ezion-gaber.

36 And they removed from Ezion-gaber, and pitched in the wilderness of Zin, which is Kadesh.

37 And they removed from Kadesh, and pitched in mount Hor, in the edge of the land of Edom.

38 And Aaron the priest went up into mount Hor at the commandment of the Lord, and died there, in the fortieth year after the children of Israel were come out of the land of Egypt; in the first day of the fifth month.

39 And Aaron was an hundred and twenty and three years old when he died in mount Hor.

40 And king Arad the Canaanite, which dwelt in the south in the land of Canaan, heard of the coming of the children of Israel.

41 And they departed from mount Hor, and pitched in Zalmonah.

42 And they departed from Zalmonah, and pitched in Punon.

43 And they departed from Punon, and pitched in Oboth.

44 And they departed from Oboth, and pitched in Ije-abarim, in the border of Moab.

45 And they departed from Ije-abarim, and pitched in Dibon-gad.

46 And they removed from Dibon-gad, and encamped in Almon-diblathaim.

47 And they removed from Almon-diblathaim, and pitched in the mountains of Abarim, before Nebo.

48 And they departed from the mountains of Abarim, and pitched in the plains of Moab by Jordan near Jericho.

49 And they pitched by Jordan, from Beth-jesimoth even unto Abel-shittim in the plains of Moab.

50 ¶ And the Lord spake unto Moses in the that it was forsaken in aftertimes, and Elah frequented as a safer harbour (see lib. i. Canaan, cap. 44). It is not recorded how long they remained in any of these places; but it is likely a considerable time in some of them; for they spent thirty-eight years in these removals.

Ver. 36. The wilderness of Zin, which is Kadesh.] See ch. xx. 1. He doth not mean Kadesh-barnea, which was on the borders of Canaan; but another Kadesh, in the skirts of this wilderness, towards the south, not far from the port I now mentioned (which the Greeks call Elana), on the border of Edom; where Miriam died, and where water was brought out of a rock (see ch. xx. 8. 14. 16).

Ver. 37. Mount Hor.] See ch. xx. 28.

Ver. 38. At the commandment of the Lord.] See ch. xx. 23, 24, 27. Deut. xxxii. 50. The Hebrew doctors are too conceited in their observation, that, because it is said of him, and of Moses, that they died al pi (at the mouth) of the Lord, the Lord took their souls out of their bodies with a kiss. But Maimonides endeavours to make a sober sense of this, by making their meaning to be, that they "expired with the transcendent pleasure of Divine love" (More Nevoch. par. iii. cap. 51).

Died there.] A few months before his brother Moses.

Ver. 39.] He was just eighty and three years old, when he and Moses first went with a message to Pharaoh (Exod. vii. 7). By which it appears, that they were not long in working all the miracles in Egypt, before they brought the people forth; for now, forty years after, he was but a hundred and twenty-three years old.

Ver. 40. And king Arad.] See ch. xxi. 1.

Heard of the coming.] Had news brought him, that the Israelites were coming towards his country; whereupon he went out to oppose them; and God gave them (as we read there) a glorious victory over him. This shows that Moses intended, in the recital of all these places where they had been, to bring to remembrance the most remarkable passages of God's providence over them; and some of which he expressly sets down.

Ver. 41. Zalmonah.] We read in the twenty-first chapter of this book, ver. 4. that they journeyed from Hor to compass the land of Edom, but are not told there where they pitched; which is here supplied, the name of the place being Zalmonah; which carries in it the signification of an image; and therefore, here, perhaps, the brazen serpent was erected (see ch. xxi. 9).

Ver. 42. Punon.] Where Bochartus rather thinks the brazen serpent was set up; because after Moses hath given us the history of that, he saith, they set forward and pitched in Oboth (ch. xvi. 10), which was the place of their abode next to Punon, as it here follows, Hierozoic. par. i. lib. iii. cap. 12. in the latter end of it.

Ver. 43. Oboth.] See ch. xxi. 10.

Ver. 44. Ije-abarim.] See ch. xxi. 11. This name is translated in the margin, "heaps of Abarim;" which may possibly signify many heaps of stone, which lay not far from the mountains of Abarim (ver. 47).

Ver. 45. Dibon-gad.] Here half the name of the first place is omitted; as is usual when the names are long. This may seem not to agree with ch. xxi. 12. where it is said they removed from thence, and pitched in the valley of Zered; near unto which, in all probability, was this Dibon-gad. See what I have noted there.

Ver. 46. Almon-diblathaim.] See ch. xxi. 13.

Ver. 47. The mountains of Abarim, before Nebo.] We read nowhere when they came to this mansion; but it is plain they were not far from it, when God bade Moses to go into one of these mountains, and take a view of Canaan (see ch. xxvii. 12). But this followed their last mansion; and therefore it is most likely this is the place mentioned, (ch. xxi. 20.) See there; where I have observed other places mentioned, ver. 18, 19. of which there is no notice taken in this catalogue. But they seem to have been places where they only touched, and made no encampment in them; which is the thing of which Moses here gives an account.

Ver. 48. Plains of Moab.] See ch. xxii. 1.

Ver. 49. Beth-jesimoth.] A place where there was a temple, in all likelihood, to some deity: for so Beth denotes in many compositions; as Beth-Peor (the house or temple of Baal on the top of Peor), Beth-Astaroth, and Beth-Baal-berith (Judges ix. 4), and Beth-Shemesh is often mentioned; where the sun was worshipped. And possibly Jesimoth may be the same with Jeshimon (ch. xxi. 20).

Abel-shittim.] Called simply Shittim, ch. xxv. 1. which some fancy had the name of Abel added to it, (which signifies mourning), because of that lamentation which was made there, by some, for the grievous sin there committed; and by others, for the heavy punishment inflicted in that place. But it seems to plains of Moab by Jordan near Jericho, saying,

51 Speak unto the children of Israel, and say unto them, When ye are passed over Jordan into the land of Canaan;

52 Then ye shall drive out all the inhabitants of the land from before you, and destroy all their pictures, and destroy all their molten images, and quite pluck down all their high places:

53 And ye shall dispossess the inhabitants of the land, and dwell therein: for I have given you the land to possess it.

54 And ye shall divide the land by lot for an inheritance among your families: and to the have been anciently called Abel-Shittim, before this time (see there).

Ver 50.] After he had prepared them for their entrance into Canaan, he ordered the first and principal work they should there undertake.

Ver 51.] Accordingly Moses did deliver this command unto them (Deut. vii. 1, 2).

Ver 52. Drive out all the inhabitants] Not suffer them to dwell in the land any longer; but either destroy, or expel them; because they were abominable idolaters, devoted to extermination (Exod. xxiii. 33. Deut. xx. 16—18), by whom the Israelites would have been in danger to be corrupted, if they were not rooted out.

Destroy all their pictures,] Or their temples, or houses of worship, as Onkelos interprets it. But others (particularly the Jerusalem Targum), understand it of the idols or statues set up in those temples; or some representations of their gods (see concerning the Hebrew word maskith, Lev. xxv. 1).

Their molten images,] Exod. xxiii. 24. xxxiv. 13. for if they suffered them to remain, they might be enticed to worship them. These were idols, perhaps, in public places, or private houses, out of their temples.

Quite pluck down all their high places:] They could not throw down the mountains, upon which the people of Canaan worshipped; but the meaning is, that they should cut down the groves which were there planted, and demolish all the altars that stood in them. For there were no other temples, at first, but these groves upon mountains; where the ancient heathen worshipped the sun, moon, and stars: unto which they thought the mountains approached nearer than the rest of the earth; and therefore their sacrifices there would be most prevalent. But of this I have said enough elsewhere.

Ver. 53.] Yet he did not intend they should dispossess the old inhabitants all at once, but by degrees; as he himself saith in Exod. xxiii. 29, 30. Deut. vii. 22.

Ver. 54. Divided the land by lot] Follow the directions I have already given for the dividing of the land, after the old inhabitants are expelled (ch. xxvi. 53, 55).

more ye shall give the more inheritance, and to the fewer ye shall give the less inheritance: every man's inheritance shall be in the place where his lot falleth; according to the tribes of your fathers ye shall inherit.

55 But if ye will not drive out the inhabitants of the land from before you; then it shall come to pass, that those which ye let remain of them shall be pricks in your eyes, and thorns in your sides, and shall vex you in the land wherein ye dwell.

56 Moreover it shall come to pass, that I shall do unto you, as I thought to do unto them.

To the more, &c.] See ch. xxvi. 54. 56.

Ver. 55. If ye will not drive out the inhabitants] At the first they could not drive them all out; nor was it God's design, as I before observed. Therefore Joshua would not attempt it while he lived; but left several nations, or part of them, unsubdued (Judges ii. 21. 23), of which he himself takes notice a little before he died, Josh. xxiii. 4. 7. where he warns them to have nothing to do with them; promising them that God would in time expel them quite (ver. 5). But when the Israelites grew slothful and cowardly, and negligently suffered the people of Canaan to dwell among them, and made friendship with them (as they did after Joshua and all that generation were dead), then followed what is here threatened in the next words.

Those which ye let remain] Voluntarily permit to live among you, without endeavouring to dispossess them.

Shall be pricks in your eyes, and thorns in your sides,] Bring very sore calamities upon you: as grievous and as mischievous as a wound made in the eye, which is a most tender part; or in the side, when a thorn sticks and festers in it. Some are so curious, as, by the first part of these words (pricks in your eyes), to understand their being stimulated to idolatry, by beholding their rites of religion and manner of worship: and the next they take to signify the effect of it in sharp punishments, which should befall them for their forsaking God. Joshua threatened the same before he died, ch. xxiii. 13. Of which an angel, or messenger of the Lord, minded them, Judges ii. 3. And so it came to pass, as we read there, ver. 14. and throughout that whole book.

Shall vex you] Make you very uneasy, nay, sigh and groan, in the good land which God gives you, by reason of their oppression (Judges ii. 18. iv. 3. vi. 6, &c.).

Ver. 56. I shall do unto you, as I thought to do unto them.] As I purposed to do unto them; i. e. make you their slaves; as they were to several people whom they served many years, Judges iii. 8. 14. vi. 2. and many other places. Or make you flee before them; and at last expel you from the land I give you.

1 The borders of the land. 16 The names of the men which shall divide the land.

naan; (this is the land that shall fall unto you for an inheritance, even the land of Canaan with the coasts thereof:)

Ver. 2. Command] Charge them to take notice of this.

When ye come into the land] Having spoken to them concerning their dispossessing the Canaanites, and di-

3 Then your south quarter shall be from the wilderness of Zin along by the coast of Edom, and your south border shall be the outmost coast of the salt sea eastward :

4 And your border shall turn from the south to the ascent of Akrabbin, and pass on to Zin : and the going forth thereof shall be from the south to Kadesh-barnea, and shall go on to Hazar-ad'car, and pass on to Azmon :

5 And the holder shall fetch a compass from

Azmon unto the river of Egypt, and the goings out of it shall be at the sea.

6 And as for the western border, ye shall even have the great sea for a border : this shall be your west border.

7 And this shall be your north border : from the great sea ye shall point out for you mount Hor :

8 From mount Hor ye shall point out your border unto the entrance of Hamath ; and the goings forth of the border shall be to Zedad :

viding their land among their tribes ; it was fit to describe the bounds of their country, that they might know whom they were to destroy, and into whose possessions they were to enter.

Canaan, with the coasts thereof.] The land beyond Jordan ; and the limits or bounds thereof.

Ver. 3. Your south quarter shall be from the wilderness of Zin.] Mentioned in the foregoing chapter, ver. 36.

Along by the coast of Edom.] Which bordered upon this wilderness (ch. xx. 1. 14).

Your south border shall be the outmost coast of the salt sea.] From the very tongue of it, as it is expressed, Josh. xv. 2. where it appears this was the portion of the tribe of Judah. The Salt Sea is that which is called sometimes the Dead Sea, and in other authors, Lacus Asphaltites (see Gen. xiv. 3). The Hebrews call all great lakes by the name of seas ; and this is called the Salt Sea, because the water of it is very salt, or, as some express it, bitter ; and the Dead Sea, propter aquæ immobilitatem, as Justin speaks, lib. xxxvi. "because of the immovableness of the water," which is never stirred by the greatest winds (see Vossius De Orig. et Progr. Idolol. lib. ii. cap. 68).

Eastward.] Where the eastern and southern borders meet.

Ver. 4. Your border.] That is, this south border.

Shall turn.] Not go on in a straight line ; but bending towards the west.

From the south to the ascent of Akrabbin.] Or, to Maale-Akrabbin, a mountain on the south end of the Dead Sea (Josh. xv. 3. Judges i. 36), so called, as Bochart conjectures, from the vast multitude of scorpions found here ; from which mountain also, it is probable, the region called Acrabatena, near to Idumea, had its name (1 Macc. v. 3). See Hierozoicon, par. ii. lib. iv. cap. 29.

Pass on to Zin.] Either to a place called Zin, or part of the wilderness of Zin ; which lay on the south of the land of Canaan (ch. xiii. 21).

From the south.] That is, still on towards the south ; as appears from what goes before and follows after.

To Kadesh-barnea.] From whence the spies were sent to search out the land ; and are said expressly to have gone up by the south, ch. xiii. 22. 26.

And shall go on to Hazar-addar.] Or, to the village of Addar, as the Vulgar Latin renders it ; which seems to be justified by Josh. xv. 3, where it is simply called Addar. There is indeed a place called Hezron joined with it, which may be thought to be the same with Hazar ; but so is another place also called Karkaa ; both which may as well be thought to be here omitted, for brevity's sake.

And pass on to Azmon.] A place lying on the west end of the mount of Edom.

Ver. 5. And the border shall fetch a compass.] There shall be a greater turn than that mentioned ver. 4, bending still more westward.

From Azmon unto the river of Egypt.] By the river Ægyptus is properly understood Nile : and so Jonathan here renders the Hebrew word Nahal (river) by Nilus : which may seem to have taken its name from the word Nahal ; which the ancients did not pronounce as we now do, but called it Nel, as we find in Epiphanius ; from whence Nilus was very easily made, as Bochartus observes, Hierozoic. par. ii. lib. v. cap. 15. But if Nile be here meant, it must be the more northerly mouth of it, where Pelusium stood (see Gen. xv. 18).

And the goings out of it shall be at the sea.] This border ended at the sea, called the Great Sea, in the next verse.

Ver. 6. And as for the western border, ye shall even have the great sea.] That is, the Mediterranean, or Midland Sea, which lay on the west of Judea ; and is called by the Hebrews the Great Sea, in comparison with the Lake of Gennesaret and Asphaltites, which they also called seas.

For a border.] On the west, as it here follows.

This shall be your west border.] From the river of Egypt as far as Zidon, which was a part of the promised land, as appears from Josh. xiii. 6. Judg. i. 31. All the cities, indeed, on the shore of this sea were held by the Philistines and others, till the time of David ; but the Israelites had a right to them. And the famous Rabbi Juda understands these words, as if they should have the western ocean itself for their portion, as well as the land adjacent to it : for so he explains these words, as if Moses had said, This shall be your western border ; viz. the border of the sea, and the isles near unto it. And the Jerusalem Targum more plainly, "And let the Great Sea be your border, i. e. the ocean, and the isles thereof, and the cities, and the ships with the ancient waters, that are in the midst of them." See Selden, in his Mare Clausum, lib. i. cap. 6, where he alleges this as a proof that men anciently thought they might have a dominion over the sea, as well as the land.

Ver. 7. From the great sea.] From the Mediterranean, which lay on the west.

Point out for you.] Mark out for your direction.

Mount Hor.] Not that mount where Aaron died ; for that was on the south of the land of Canaan, towards Edom ; but this was diametrically opposite, on the north of it : and therefore must, in all likelihood, be some part of Mount Libanus, which, with Antilibanus (more towards the Great Sea), bounded the promised land on the north. But there were several parts of Mount Libanus which were called by several names ; and probably one of them was called Hor, because of its eminency or height above the rest. So the Vulgar translates it ; reading, I suppose, the Hebrew, not Hor hahar, i. e. "Hor the mountain," but Har hahar, "the mountain of mountain," i. e. the highest mountain. The Jews generally by this Mount Hor understand Amanus, which is a part of Taurus (as Mr. Selden observes in the place before named), which the Jerusalem Targum calls more briefly Mannus.

Ver. 8. Unto the entrance of Hamath.] There were

9 ¶ And the border shall go on to Ziphron, and the goings out of it shall be at Hazar-enan: this shall be your north border.*

10 And ye shall point out your east border from Hazar-enan to Shepham :

11 And the coast shall go down from Shepham to Riblah, on the east side of Ain; and the border shall descend, and shall reach unto the side of the sea of Chinnereth eastward :

12 And the border shall go down to Jordan, and the goings out of it shall be at the salt sea :

this shall be your land with the coasts thereof round about.

13 And Moses commanded the children of Israel, saying, This is the land which ye shall inherit by lot, which the LORD commanded to give unto the nine tribes, and to the half tribe :

14 For the tribe of the children of Reuben according to the house of their fathers, and the tribe of the children of Gad according to the house of their fathers, have received their inheritance; and half the tribe of Manasseh have received their inheritance :

two Hamaths; one called by the Greeks Antiochia, the other Epiphania. The former called Hamath the Great, Amos vi. 2, to distinguish it from the latter, which is the city that is always meant, when we read the bounds of Judea were to the entrance of Hamath northward; as here and ch. xiii. 21. For it is certain, as Bochart observes, they did not reach to Antiochia, but came near to Epiphania (lib. iv. Phaleg. cap. 36). And this makes it probable, that Hor, as I said before, may be a promontory of Libanus; because in Josh. xiii. 5, Hermon is joined with the entrance of Hamath, as Hor is here. Now Hermon was certainly a part of Libanus: by some called Sirion; by others Senir (Deut. iii. 9), and by others Sion (Deut. iv. 48).

Zedad.] Which in Ezekiel's time was reckoned the northern border (together with Hamath from the Great Sea; just as it is here (Ezek. xlvii. 15, 16).

Ver. 9. Ziphron.] Another town in these parts; of which I find no mention anywhere else.

Hazar-enan.] Here it ended; which was a place that retained its name till Ezekiel's time (ch. xlvii. 17). David Chytraeus seems to have given a full account of this northern border in a few words. It extended, saith he, from the Mediterranean, by the mountains of Libanus, to the fountain of Jordan; in which tract are the towns of Hamath, Zedad (in the tribe of Naphtali), Ziphron (in the same tribe at the foot of Libanus), and Hazar-enan, which he takes to signify a village at the fountain, viz. of Jordan.

Ver. 10. Hazar-enan.] From the fountain of Jordan, as was said before.

To Shepham.] A place not far from thence; for the river Jordan was certainly the eastern limits.

Ver. 11. And the coast.] The limits or bounds.

From Shepham to Riblah.] A place, no doubt, near to Jordan; with which river the eastern limits go along. St. Jerome takes Riblah to be Antiochia; but that was in Syria, to which the promised land did not reach.

The east side of Ain.] The Vulgar reads it "the fountain of Daphne." And, indeed, Ain signifies a fountain; and both Jonathan and the Jerusalem Targum takes Riblah for Daphne; as they do Shepham before mentioned for Apamia. But this is only a vain conceit of the Jews, who would extend their bounds beyond what God gave them. For it is certain the land of Canaan never extended to these places, as Bochart observes, lib. i. Canaan, cap. 16. And therefore Daphne (which was in the suburbs of Antiochia) cannot be here meant, unless we understand another place, mentioned by Josephus (lib. iv. De Bello Judaico, cap. 1), which lay near the lake of Semechonites, through the middle of which Jordan ran. And then Ain must signify another fountain of Jordan, for it had more than one. And thus David Chytraeus explains this part of the verse, and the foregoing; The eastern bounds were the river Jordan, near to which were these places; Enan, which had its name from the fountain of the river; and Shepham, not far from thence; Riblah, which was also near to Jordan, lying between the lake of Semechonites and Gennesaret.

Reach unto the side of the sea of Chinnereth eastward.] To the east side of this sea, or lake, which had its name from a city so called, Josh. xix. 35, and a country, 1 Kings xv. 20, or else it gave them their names: for David Chytraeus will have it called Chinnereth, from the Hebrew word cinnor, which signifies harp, or lute, the lake being of that shape and figure, about four German miles long, and two and a half broad. It is called the sea of Galilee, or Tiberias, in the gospel.

Ver. 12. The border.] i. e. This eastern border.

Shall go down to Jordan.] That is, to the river which was eminently so called (and was on the east part of Canaan, Gen. xiii. 11), for it was very small till it came to the lake of Gennesaret before mentioned. From whence, being augmented by several torrents and rivulets, it ran in a wider stream, till it fell into the Salt or Dead Sea (see Bonfricius out of Josephus, lib. iv. De Bello Judaico, cap. 1).

Salt sea.] There was the end of this border; where it met with the southern, as was observed above (ver. 3).

This shall be your land.] As was said before (ver. 2), therefore they were not to extend their right any further; this being the country he promised Abraham, when he bade him lift up his eyes, and look from the place where he was, "northward, and southward, and eastward, and westward, and walk through the length of the land, and breadth of it," which he assures to his posterity, Gen. xiii. 14—17, which now he lays out for them, with the exact limits of it, in all those four quarters.

Ver. 13. This is the land which ye shall inherit by lot.] He repeats it so often, that they might know what people they were to dispossess, and with whom they might make friendship; and not to extend their desires beyond the bounds of God's gracious grant to them. By which they were placed in a very fertile and pleasant country, bounded, as appears by the foregoing description, on the south (ver. 4, 5), by great mountains, which sheltered them from the burning air of the deserts of Arabia; on the west, by the Midland Sea, which sent to them refreshing breezes; and on the north, by Mount Libanus, which kept off the colder blasts from that quarter; and on the east, the delightful plains of Jordan, abounding with palm-trees, especially about Jericho, which yielded them a great revenue.

Unto the nine tribes and to the half tribe.] This he had not said plainly before, though it was necessarily inferred, from his granting to two tribes and a half their inheritance beyond Jordan.

Ver. 14.] Upon condition they performed their promise, to help the rest of their tribes to win their inheritance in Canaan. So those words are to be 15 The two tribes and the half tribe have received their inheritance on this side Jordan near Jericho eastward, toward the sunrising.

16 And the LORD spake unto Moses, saying, 17 These are the names of the men which shall divide the land unto you: Eleazar the priest, and Joshua the son of Nun.

18 And ye shall take one prince of every tribe, to divide the land by inheritance.

19 And the names of the men are these: Of the tribe of Judah, Caleb the son of Jephunneh.

20 And of the tribe of the children of Simeon, Shemuel the son of Ammihud.

21 Of the tribe of Benjamin, Elidad the son of Chislon.

22 And the prince of the tribe of the children of Dan, Bukki the son of Jogli.

23 The prince of the children of Joseph, for the tribe of the children of Manasseh, Hanniel the son of Ephod.

24 And the prince of the tribe of the children of Ephraim, Kemuel the son of Shiptan.

25 And the prince of the tribe of the children of Zebulun, Elizaphan the son of Parnach.

26 And the prince of the tribe of the children of Issachar, Paltiel the son of Azzan.

27 And the prince of the tribe of the children of Asher, Abihud the son of Shelomi.

28 And the prince of the tribe of the children of Naphtali, Pedahel the son of Ammihud.

29 These are they whom the LORD commanded to divide the inheritance unto the children of Israel in the land of Canaan.

understood, I observed xxxii. 33, "Moses gave unto them the kingdom of Sihon," &c.

Ver. 15.] By the gift of God, as they themselves understood it, xxxii. 31. The bounds of which the Jerusalem Targum here undertakes to set down, and makes them extend eastward as far as the great river Euphrates; having respect, I suppose, to Gen. xv. 18, and Exod. xxiii. 30, where he sets down the utmost bounds of the countries he intended to bestow upon them in future times (see there), but here only describes the limits of that land, which they were to enjoy in present possession; and was all that God granted to Abraham, when he brought him out of Chaldea, and made his first promise unto him (Gen. xii. 1. 7. xiii. 14, 15. 17. xv. 7).

Ver. 16.] Having told them what they should divide, it was proper to appoint some persons to take care to see the division made.

Ver. 17. These are the names] Though the land was to be divided by lot, yet it was fit there should be some persons to oversee the business, and take care there should be no fraud in the drawing of them: and when they were drawn, to prevent all quarrels, by determining what portion those who had too much should give to those who had too little (xxvi. 54, 55).

Eleazar—and Joshua] These were the principal persons concerned in this great affair; who were so conscientious therein, that they did it in the presence of God, at the door of the tabernacle (Josh. xviii. 6. 8. 10. xix. 51).

Ver. 18. Prince of every tribe,] They are called in the place last named, "the heads of the fathers of the tribes of the children of Israel."

Ver. 19. Of the tribe of Judah, Caleb] I have nothing to observe upon this and the following verses, to the end of the chapter, but that the tribes are not mentioned in such order as they were at their first numbering (i. 5, 6, &c.), or at their second (xxvi. 5, &c.), yet great exactness and a particular direction of God may be noted in their placing here; for they are set down according to their situation which they had afterward in the land of Canaan; as if Moses foresaw who should be next neighbours one to another. For Judah having his inheritance given him first (Josh. xv.), Simeon, who is here next mentioned, was so near him in the land of Canaan, that he had a portion given him out of the lot of Judah, which proved too large for that tribe (Josh. xix. 9. Judg. i. 3. 17). Then Benjamin, who here follows, in the third place, was so near to Judah, that they never separated when the ten tribes were rent from them. Dan was not far from Judah; and the children of Joseph also were their neighbours. And the rest of the tribes, Zebulun, Issachar, Asher, Naphtali, are set down here just in the order wherein their lots fell to them in Canaan (Josh. xix. 10. 17. 24. 32). An evidence that Moses was guided by a Divine Spirit in all his writings.

CHAPTER XXXV.

1 Eight and forty cities for the Levites with their suburbs and measure thereof. 6 Six of them are to be cities of refuge. 9 The laws of murder. 31 No satisfaction for murder.

1 And the LORD spake unto Moses in the plains of Moab by Jordan near Jericho, saying,

CHAP. XXXV.

Ver. 1.] See xxii. 1. Hitherto nothing had been said of the Levites; but that they should have no lot in the land of Canaan. But now God provides that they should have habitations assigned them to dwell in, though they had no fields, nor olive yards, &c. as the rest of their brethren had. They might, indeed, have been able to purchase houses for themselves out of the tithes, and other things, which God had long ago bestowed upon them for their portion: but it was not fit that God's ministers should be left without any certain dwelling. And besides, God would have them live comfortably, and not only have houses, but a little ground about them, for their more commodious subsistence.

2 Command the children of Israel, that they give unto the Levites of the inheritance of their

Ver. 2. Give unto the Levites of the inheritance] Out of their share that shall fall to them in the land of Canaan, and on this side Jordan.

Cities to dwell in;] That they might not be in danger to wander up and down to seek a habitation.

Suburbs for the cities round about them.] Some ground lying round about their cities, the reason of which is given in the next verse.

possession cities to dwell in; and ye shall give also unto the Levites suburbs for the cities round about them.

3 And the cities shall they have to dwell in; and the suburbs of them shall be for their cattle, and for their goods, and for all their beasts.

4 And the suburbs of the cities, which ye shall give unto the Levites, shall reach from the wall of the city and outward a thousand cubits round about.

5 And ye shall measure from without the city on the east side two thousand cubits, and on the south side two thousand cubits, and on the west side two thousand cubits, and on the north side

Ver. 3. The cities shall they have to dwell in;] That they may build houses for themselves to dwell in. Which did not make it unlawful for them to hire or purchase houses in any other city, particularly at Jerusalem, or the place where the tabernacle was settled; for we find in Scripture many proofs of their dwelling in other cities, beside these which are here assigned to them. And, in like manner, other people, with their permission, might dwell with them in these cities, without any breach of this law.

The suburbs—shall be for their cattle,] To afford pasture for their oxen and sheep.

For their goods,] The Hebrew word signifies, not only all kinds of household stuff, but whatsoever was necessary for them and their cattle without doors.

For all their beasts,] Horses, asses, mules, and all sorts of living creatures, as the Hebrew word signifies. But it was not lawful for them to build houses in these fields, nor plant vineyards, nor sow corn; but they were given them only to make their dwellings more sweet; and that they might have the convenience of cattle about them, for provisions, and all other uses.

Ver. 4. The suburbs of the cities, which ye shall give unto the Levites,] To be their possession, by as good and full a right, as their brethren of the other tribes had in their lands, which fell to them for their inheritance by lot: see Lev. xxv. 31—33, where they themselves are disabled to alienate either the houses or fields of their cities. But if they sold a house, it was to revert at the jubilee; and the fields they could not so much as sell till that time.

Shall reach from the wall of the city and outward a thousand cubits round about,] This space was for their out-houses; as stables, places for hay and straw, and such-like things, and perhaps for gardens of herbs and flowers. The Gemara, upon the ninth chapter of Sota, sect. 9, saith, that, under the second temple, the Levites had no suburbs; which were not restored to them after the captivity of Babylon. But there being great care taken that the people shall pay all the "tithe of their ground unto the Levites" (Neh. x. 37), it is unreasonable to think that care was not taken for places to lay them in.

Ver. 5. Ye shall measure from without the city] It is not said, as in the foregoing verse, from the wall of the city; therefore I take it to signify from the outside of the suburbs before mentioned.

On the east side two thousand cubits, &c.] So there was in the whole three thousand cubits round about the city: a thousand for the suburbs, properly so called; and two thousand more for their pasture, called properly, "the fields of the suburbs," Lev. xxv. 34. This is the most natural and easy explication of this place.

The city shall be in the midst,] So that there was exactly, every way, such a circuit of ground about it.

The suburbs of the cities,] Here the word suburbs two thousand cubits; and the city shall be in the midst: this shall be to them the suburbs of the cities.

6 And among the cities which ye shall give unto the Levites there shall be six cities for refuge, which ye shall appoint for the manslayer, that he may flee thither: and to them ye shall add forty and two cities.

7 So all the cities which ye shall give to the Levites shall be forty and eight cities: them shall ye give with their suburbs.

8 And the cities which ye shall give shall be of the possession of the children of Israel: from them that have many ye shall give many; but comprehends the fields also. And Maimonides saith, that, by the constitution of the elders, they set forth also a burying-place for every city beyond these limits: for they might not bury their dead within the suburbs or fields; which they ground upon the foregoing verse, which appoints them for other uses (Schemita ve Jobel, cap. 13).

Ver. 6. Six cities for refuge,] Three in the land of Canaan, and three on the other side Jordan (ver. 14), the names of which are set down, Josh. xx. 7, 8, and those on the other side Jordan were set apart by Moses himself before he died (Deut. iv. 43). The reason of their being called cities of refuge is given in the next words.

For the manslayer,] Such a manslayer as is afterward described; who killed another against his will.

That he may flee thither:] And there be preserved and kept in safety, if he was not found guilty of wilful murder. The cities of the Levites were appointed for this purpose, rather than any other, because they were a kind of sacred places, inhabited by sacred persons. And here men might spend their time better than in other cities, being among God's ministers; who might make them sensible of the negligence which men were commonly guilty of in such cases, and of such sins as they might have otherwise committed.

To them ye shall add forty-two cities,] Which had all the same privilege, if we may believe the Hebrew doctors; but not equally with the six. For in the six a manslayer was to have a house to dwell in for nothing; but in the other forty-two, he was to pay for it. And the Levites could not refuse him entrance into the six; but as for the rest it was in their choice whether they would receive him or not. Thus Maimonides, out of their ancient authors. See Selden, lib. iv. De Jure Nat. et Gent. juxta Discipul. Hebr. cap. 2, where he observes, that the altar also was a place of refuge, according to Exod. xxi. 14, but with many exceptions; both with relation to the parts of the altar, and to the persons who fled thither, and to the quality of the offence, and their stay there; which very much lessened the privilege of this refuge.

Ver. 7.] Accordingly we read Joshua gave them so many, Josh. xxi. 41. Thirteen of which the priests had; and the rest the Levites. And in the days of the Messiah (whom they vainly still expect), other cities shall be added to them (saith Maimonides), which shall belong to the Levites.

Ver. 8. The cities—shall be of the possession] And so it is said, Josh. xxi. 3, that "the children of Israel gave unto the Levites, out of their inheritance, these cities and their suburbs." Where we read also, they were given them by lot, as the children of Israel had their inheritance given them.

From them that have many ye shall give many, &c.] According to the rule in distributing their inheritances to the Israelites, xxxiii. 54.

According to his inheritance which he inheriteth.] from them that have few ye shall give few : every one shall give of his cities unto the Levites according to his inheritance which he inheriteth.

9 ¶ And the Lord spake unto Moses, saying,

10 Speak unto the children of Israel, and say unto them, When ye be come over Jordan into the land of Canaan ;

11 Then ye shall appoint you cities to be cities of refuge for you ; that the slayer may flee thither, which killeth any person at unawares.

12 And they shall be unto you cities for refuge from the avenger ; that the manslayer die not, until he stand before the congregation in judgment.

13 And of these cities which ye shall give six cities shall ye have for refuge.

14 Ye shall give three cities on this side Jordan, and three cities shall ye give in the land of Canaan, which shall be cities of refuge.

15 These six cities shall be a refuge, both for

Thus they gave nine cities out of the two tribes of Judah and Simeon (Josh. xxi. 16), and but four out of Benjamin, which was a small tribe (ver. 18), out of the tribes of Issachar and Asher, four apiece (ver. 28, 31), and out of Naphtali, no more than three (ver. 32).

Ver. 9.] This being a matter of great importance, that guiltless men should not suffer, nor the guilty escape punishment, the Lord gives Moses further direction about it, as he promised he would in Exod. xxi. 13.

Ver. 10. Speak unto the children of Israel.] Repeat this command to them ; which God himself repeated to Joshua, xx. 1, 2.

When ye be come—into the land of Canaan ;] When they had possession of it, and divided it, and were settled in it : so it is explained Deut. xix. 1, 2.

Ver. 11. Then ye shall appoint—cities of refuge] This seems to signify, that all the cities of the Levites were in some sort a protection to the manslayer, as I said upon ver. 6. Such places the temples were among the Athenians, as Sam. Petrus observes in Leges Atticas, p. 12, 13, yet not all of them ; for he can find only six ; that of Mercy, and that of Eumenides and Minerva, and those dedicated to Theseus (one of them within the city, the other without the walls), and that in Munychia.

Which killeth any person at unawares.] Or, as it is Josh. xx. 3, unwillingly, Deut. xix. 4, ignorantly ; that is, besides his intention, having no such design, nor hatred to him, as is there expressly said, and here below (ver. 22). This is repeated ver. 15. And the instances of it are such as these, mentioned by Georg. Ritterhusius De Jure Asylosum, cap. 4. If a man cutting wood, the hatchet flying from the helve, should hit a man, and kill him ; or a huntsman shooting at a deer in a thicket should kill a man, whom he did not see lying there : an example of which we have in Adrastus, mentioned by Herodotus, lib. i.

Ver. 12. Cities for refuge from the avenger ;] From him who had a right to call a murderer to account for the blood he had shed, and is therefore called "the avenger of blood," ver. 19, who, being stimulated with anger and grief for the death of a near relation, might, in a heat of rage, hastily kill him who was not guilty of murder. And therefore this provision is made for the preservation of an innocent person against the violent prosecution of the avenger. In the Hebrew, the word for avenger is goel, which signifying a redeemer, plainly denotes that the next of kin to him that was slain is here meant. For to that person belonged the right of redemption of estates (Lev. xxv. 25), and of marrying the wife of a kinsman deceased without issue (Ruth iii. 12, 13). And consequently such a person, that is the nearest of kin, is here intended to be the revenger of blood ; and therefore no man might undertake this office, but he alone who was the next heir to him that was slain ; as Mr. Selden observes, lib. iv. De Jure Nat. et Gent. cap. 1. p. 469. Grotius observes the like custom among the ancient Greeks, of private men taking revenge for the death of their relations or friends (lib. ii. De Jure Belli et Pacis, cap. 20. sect. 8. n. 6).

That the manslayer die not,] By a sudden heat of passion. This was a merciful provision (as Maimonides observes), both for the manslayer, that he might be preserved, and for the avenger, that his blood might be cooled, by the removal of the manslayer out of his sight, by his flight to another place (More Novechim, par. iii. cap. 40).

Until he stand before the congregation] The city of refuge protected him that fled thither, Salvo tamen juris et justitiæ examine (as the lawyers speak), "yet so that the matter should be brought to a fair trial before proper judges." They of the city of refuge examined him before his admittance into the place (Josh. xx. 4). But they were not judges, nor could they examine witnesses. And therefore he was delivered, upon demand, to the senate, or court of judgment, of that city where the fact was committed, that they might try whether he were guilty or not of wilful murder. So the Hebrews understand the word edah, congregation, in this place, (as in many others), to signify the Sanhedrin of Twenty-three, as Mr. Selden observes (lib. ii. De Synedr. cap. 5. n. 2, and lib. iii. cap. 8. n. 3). And as by congregation is meant the court where causes were tried, so it is reasonable to interpret it of that court which sat in the city where the fact was committed, and not that in the city of refuge, because there the witnesses were ; and it is expressly said, ver. 25, that if the congregation found him to be innocent, he should be "restored to the city of refuge." Which evidently supposes he was not judged there, but in another place ; and none so proper as that before mentioned.

Ver. 13. Six cities shall ye have for refuge.] They might flee unto any other cities of the Levites ; but in these six they were most certain to find protection (see ver. 6). And the best provision was made for the manslayer's easy and safe flying thither : for the ways that led thither were to be made very plain and broad (thirty-two cubits wide), and to be kept in good repair ; for which they alleged (in the title Macchoth, cap. 2. sect. 5), those words Deut. xix. 3, "Thou shalt prepare the way," &c. And two students in the law were to accompany him ; that if the avenger of blood should overtake him, before he got into the city, they might endeavour to pacify him by wise persuasions ; and that he might not miss his way to the place whither he intended to flee, there were posts erected where two or three ways met, with this inscription, MIKLAT, i. e. "the city of refuge," to direct him into that road which led to it. A certain day also was appointed, which was the fifteenth of February, for the repairing of the highways, and of the bridges, which might have been broken by the winter rains or floods.

Ver. 14.] This seems not to be an equal partition ; the land of Canaan being far bigger than the territory beyond Jordan ; for it contained above three parts of four of the tribes of Israel. But it is to be considered, the children of Israel, and for the stranger, and for the sojourner among them: that every one that killeth any person unawares may flee thither.

16 And if he smite him with an instrument of iron, so that he die, he is a murderer: the murderer shall surely be put to death.

17 And if he smite him with throwing a stone, wherewith he may die, and he die, he is a murderer: the murderer shall surely be put to death.

that the country beyond Jordan was as long as the land of Canaan, though not so broad: and they also beyond Jordan might flee to any of the cities in Canaan, if they were nearer to them. And besides, God commanded those in Canaan, if he enlarged their coast, to add three cities more, besides these (Deut. xix. 8, 9).

Why six cities are appointed for this purpose, and no more; and why three on one side of Jordan, and three on the other, Philo alleges some mystical reasons: but so far-fetched, that I do not think fit to mention them.

Ver. 15. These six cities shall be a refuge.] They all began to be so at the same time, according to the Talmudists. For till those three in Canaan were set out, these three on the other side Jordan (though set out by Moses before they went into Canaan, Deut. iv. 43.) did not receive any manslayer. Which they prove in the forenamed title, Maccoth, cap. 2. sect. 4. from these very words, "these six shall be cities of refuge;" that is, when the other three were appointed, then they all received those that fled to them.

And for the stranger, and for the sojourner] Both strangers and sojourners had renounced idolatry, but had not equally embraced the Jewish religion; yet both of them had the same share in this benefit, with the native Israelites; it being a natural right, that every man who was innocent should be protected. The difference between a stranger and a sojourner hath been often observed, particularly upon Lev. xix. 33, 34. Numb. xv. 15, 16.

That every one that killeth any person unawares may flee thither.] That is, every one before mentioned, whether Israelites, strangers, or sojourners. But as for such as were mere gentiles, and not so much as proselytes of the gate, if they killed another, though a gentile, they had not the benefit of this law; because they were not suffered to dwell among them, though they trafficked in the country. And if a proselyte at the gate killed an Israelite, or one that was circumcised, he also, if we may believe the Jewish doctors, was denied protection in these cities. But if he killed one like himself (i. e. a proselyte of the gate), then he had the same privilege with the Israelites, as they explain it (see Selden, lib. iv. De Jure Nat. et Gent. cap. 2. p. 477).

Ver. 16. And if he smite him] Or rather, "but if he smite him."

With an instrument of iron,—he is a murderer] For it was to be presumed, that he who ran at a man with a sword, or any such weapon, intended to do him a mischief; though perhaps he had no malice to him beforehand, but did it in a passion.

So that he die.] He never going abroad after he was wounded (Exod. xxi. 19, 20).

The murderer shall surely be put to death.] Be taken away by the judges, though he were in a city of refuge; and, the fact being proved, condemned to die for it.

Ver. 17. If he smite him with throwing a stone.] In 18 Or if he smite him with an hand weapon of wood, wherewith he may die, and he die, he is a murderer: the murderer shall surely be put to death.

19 The revenger of blood himself shall slay the murderer: when he meeteth him, he shall slay him.

20 But if he thrust him of hatred, or hurl at him by laying of wait, that he die;

21 Or in enmity smite him with his hand, the Hebrew it is, "with a stone of the hand." That is, say the Jews, with a great stone that fills the hand; not with a small stone, with which he could not be presumed to intend to kill him; though he chanced to do it, by hitting him in the eye, or some other very tender part.

Wherewith he may die.] With a stone big enough to kill him.

And he die.] So that it appears he died of that blow.

He is a murderer.] He is as guilty as the fore-named person, who smote with an instrument of iron; and his fleeing to the city of refuge shall not protect him from death.

Ver. 18. If he smite him with an hand weapon of wood,] Such as a baton (as we now speak), or a club, or any such kind of instrument, as is likely to kill him.

Wherewith he may die, &c.] It made no difference with what kind of weapon or instrument he was killed, whether it were of iron, wood, or stone; if he were killed wittingly and knowingly, it was murder; and the guilty person was to suffer for it. Aul. Gellius hath collected the names of the several weapons, which were mentioned in ancient history; of which there are near thirty (lib. x. Noct. Attic, cap. 25), one of which, called ligula, he is pleased to explain, being then not common; and saith, it was a little sword, in the form of a tongue, like our poniard, I suppose, or dagger, or long knife; which was a dangerous weapon; because men might hide it under their clothes, and kill others while they were in familiar discourse with them.

Ver. 19. The revenger of blood himself] See ver. 12.

Shall slay the murderer.] This is thought by many to be a mere permission, not a precept; but the Jews think otherwise: that the next kin (i. e. the heir of him that was slain) stood bound to do his endeavour to avenge his blood. If he would not (saith Maimonides), or if he was not able; or if no such avenger was to be found (i. e. the murderer himself was the next heir, or the man slain was a proselyte of justice without issue), he was to be prosecuted, and put to death, by the court of judgment, and that by the sword (see Selden, lib. iv. De Jure Nat. et Gent. cap. 1).

When he meeteth him he shall slay him.] He was not bound to stay for the sentence of the court, but might kill him wheresoever he found him (see ver. 31).

Ver. 20. But if he thrust him of hatred, &c.] Or rather, "for if he thrust him," &c., that is, if by any other means, besides those mentioned, ver. 16—18, he killed a man wittingly, either by pushing him down violently from a high or steep place; or throwing him into the water; or hurling a stone at him; or letting any thing fall down upon his head, though never so slily; if death followed, and it appeared he bore a hatred to him, he was to suffer death, as in the former cases (see Deut. xix. 11). Now this was a sufficient proof of hatred to him; if being a neigh-that he die, he that smote him shall surely be put to death; for he is a murderer: the revenger of blood shall slay the murderer, when he meeteth him.

22 But if he thrust him suddenly without enmity, or have cast upon him any thing without laying of wait,

23 Or with any stone, wherewith a man may die, seeing him not, and cast it upon him, that bour, and they having some difference, he had not spoken to him for three whole days together.

Ver. 21. Or in enmity smite him with his hand, that he die.] If he gave him only a blow with his fist, of which he died, and it was proved he had enmity to him, it was sufficient to make him a murderer; and it warranted the avenger of blood to kill him, or obliged him to prosecute him, so that the city of refuge should not save him.

The revenger of blood shall slay the murderer.] The civil law declared him to be unworthy to enjoy the inheritance of one that was murdered, if he neglected to prosecute the person that killed him in some court of justice. But the Jewish law allowed, or rather required, a great deal more; that the next of kin should kill the murderer with his own hands, if he met him. And thus the Abyssines, at this day (as Ritterhusius observes out of Alvarez), deliver the murderer into the hands of the next kinsman, to torture him. The reason of which law, among the Jews, was (as the same Ritterhusius observes, De Jure Asylorum, cap. 4), because they being all descended from one and the same stock, and equally taking of the same right, they were all concerned in the shedding of the blood of any one of them, especially they who were nearest to him in blood, who seemed to be all struck at and injured in him. So that the law, with great reason, allowed them to avenge the blood of him that was slain. With which these verses of Ovid, he thinks, agree:

Cumque pater tibi sit, jura tuere patris.”

Ver. 22. If he thrust him suddenly without enmity.] Killed him (after the manner before mentioned, ver. 20), in a violent passion, having no such intention, and being perhaps highly provoked by him, or by chance, as we speak, and unawares, it being proved that there was no enmity between them, no signs of hatred before this fact.

Or have cast upon him any thing.] Happen to hit him with any thing, without design to hurt him (see Exod. xxi. 13. Deut. xix. 5).

Ver. 23. Or with any stone.] See ver. 17.

Seeing him not.] Throwing it at something else, or playing with it; and having no thought of him, because he did not see him.

Was not his enemy.] Not having any quarrel with him, not threatening, or any other way discovering that he sought to do him mischief.

Ver. 24. Then the congregation.] That is, the judgment to whom the trial of such causes belonged: see ver. 12. where I observed, that the elders of the city of refuge judged whether the manslayer, who fled thither, should be received or not, upon a summary hearing of the cause, and such examination as they could make at present. But the full examination of it was reserved to the judges of the place where the fact was committed.

Shall judge between the slayer and the revenger of blood.] They sent for him out of the city of refuge, to he die, and was not his enemy, neither sought his harm:

24 Then the congregation shall judge between the slayer and the revenger of blood according to these judgments:

25 And the congregation shall deliver the slayer out of the hand of the revenger of blood, and the congregation shall restore him to the city of his refuge, whither he was fled: and he shall be brought before them; who heard what could be alleged against him, and what he could say for himself.

According to these judgments.] Upon trial they proceeded to give judgment according to the foregoing rules; which, in brief, are these: if a man had no intention to kill another, but it was purely involuntary, he was to be acquitted. If there appeared any design upon his life, or such hatred and enmity as might move them to conclude he had an intention to kill him, he was to be put to death. But here the Hebrew doctors (as Mr. Selden observes) distinguish the killing of a man into three kinds: the first was, when, though it was from pure ignorance and error, yet there was some negligence in it, which a prudent man might have avoided. The second, when a man kills another ignorantly, and cannot be blamed for any negligence, because such a thing seldom happens. An example of the first they make to be, when a man, coming down a ladder, falls upon another and kills him. An example of the second, when going up a ladder, a man happens to do the same. The former is more frequent, and therefore they say hath some kind of blame in it; the other seldomer, and therefore hath none. A third kind, when a man kills another out of ignorance and error also; but it approaches nearer to voluntary murder: as when a man, intending to kill one man, happens to kill another with a stone, or otherwise. In none of these cases, they say, the court of judgment could put any man to death. And the cities of refuge were not provided for the second or third sorts, but only for the first; and that when the man died presently, and did not lie and languish of the wound; for if he did, it might be supposed he died by his own negligence, or otherwise, as well as by the wound. In which case, there was no need that the man who wounded him should flee to the city of refuge; nor could the avenger of blood meddle with him, no more than he could with a father, when he gave his son, or a master, when he gave his scholar, correction, and happened to kill him. The same was the case of him, whose office it was to arrest men, by public authority, and bring them before the judges, if he struck a man that refused to go along with him, and killed him (see Selden, lib. iv. De Jure Nat. et Gent. juxta Disciplin. Heb. cap. 2).

Ver. 25. The congregation shall deliver the slayer.] If the court found the man was killed casually, as the person accused pretended (Josh. xx. 4), then they charged the avenger of blood not to prosecute any further.

Both here and in the foregoing verse, and in the next words to these, by congregation is meant the judges of the city (as I observed, ver. 12), who were to determine in the presence, and in the behalf of the people, whether the manslayer were capable of the privilege of the city of refuge or not; as we read, Josh. xx. 46. Now these things (as a very learned person of our own argues), which were done by the elders (or judges), being said to be done by the congregation, or assembly of the people, in whose behalf abide in it unto the death of the high priest, which was anointed with the holy oil.

26 But if the slayer shall at any time come they were done; it is no wrong to the Holy Scriptures, when we say, that which they report to have been done by the church was acted by the chief power of the apostles and elders, with the consent of the people. For it is manifest in the New Testament, that in the apostles' time all the public acts of the church were passed at the public assemblies of the same. As ordinations (Acts i. 23. v. 36), excommunications (Matt. xviii. 18—20. I Cor. v. 4. 2 Cor. ii. 10), councils (Acts xv. 4. 22), and other acts (2 Cor. vii. 19). And herewith agrees the primitive custom of the church for divers ages; whereby they gave satisfaction to the people of the integrity of their proceedings, and by the same means obliged superiors to that integrity, by making the proceedings so manifest, and so to preserve the unity of the church. And from this interest of the people in such acts it is, at this day, that the people of the church of England are demanded, what they have to say against ordinations and marriages to be made (see Mr. Thorndike, in his Rites of the Church in a Christian State, ch. iii. p. 159, &c.).

The congregation shall restore him to the city of his refuge.] They were to send him back again, from the place where he was tried, to the city where he had taken refuge, there to remain till the time prescribed in the next words. This was more merciful than the punishment inflicted by the Attic laws (which plainly show they were borrowed, in great part, from Moses), for he who slew a man involuntarily was forced to fly his country. So the scholiast upon the last of Homer's Iliads, Ἔθος ἦν παρὰ τοῖς παλαίοις, τὸν ἀκούσιον φόνον ἐργασάμενον φεύγειν ἐκ τῆς πατρίδος, &c. "It was the manner, in ancient times, for a man that had killed another involuntarily, to flee his country; and, betaking himself to some neighbouring place, to sit with his face covered, begging to be expiated." But this was only for a certain time, as Demosthenes tells us (in his oration in Aristocratem): ο νόμος κελεύει τὸν ἀκούσιον φόνον ἐν τρισὶν ἡμετέροις χρόνοις ἀπελθεῖν ταχτῆν ἰδὼν, καὶ φεύγειν, &c. "The law requires him that is condemned of killing a man involuntarily, for some limited time to go away, and keep at an appointed distance, till he can make his peace with the kindred of him that was slain: after which he may return again," &c.

He shall abide in it] Not stir out of the limits of the city, that is, beyond the suburbs, and the two thousand cubits which encompassed them (ver. 4, 5); within which bounds he was to keep.

Unto the death of the high priest.] This looks like a punishment to the manslayer; whereby others were taught to be very watchful over themselves, lest by negligence they chanced to kill any body, and so be forced to leave their own home. But Maimonides takes it for "a prudent charity to the manslayer, and to the relations of him that was slain: for by this means the manslayer was kept out of the sight of the avenger of blood, who might have been tempted, some time or other, to fall upon him, if he had come in his way: but by long absence his anger might be mitigated, at least by the death of the high-priest, the most excellent of all other persons, and most dear to every one in the nation. Which made the public grief so great when he died, that men forgot their private resentments: for nothing could fall out more grievous to all people (saith he) than the death of the high-priest, which swallowed without the border of the city of his refuge, whether he was fled;

27 And the revenger of blood find him with-up all other grief" (More Nevoch. par. iii. cap. 40). And in the mean time the Jews say, that the citizens of the place were bound to teach him some trade, whereby he might provide himself with necessaries; and he had this comfort also, during his absence from his own family, that the mother of the high-priest sent him many gifts, that he might remain there more contentedly, and not pray for the death of the high-priest. So they tell us, in the place forementioned, Maccoth, cap. 2. sect. 6. where they also observe, that if a man killed the high-priest, or the high-priest himself happened to kill a man involuntarily, they were to stay in the city of refuge as long as they lived: yet they found this temperament, that if one who had been high-priest, but removed from his office, was alive when the slaughter was committed; after his death, both he that killed the high-priest, or any other unawares, and the high-priest himself, who had done the same, were set free from the city of refuge (see Selden, lib. ii. De Synedr. cap. 9. sect. 6. and lib. iii. cap. 8. sect. 3).

There may seem to be some inequality in this law, because, as some high-priests lived long, and others but a short time, so some menslayers fled to the city at the beginning of their priesthood, and others just before their death. But it must be considered, that this could not be better ordered than to make the manslayer's liberty depend upon the death of the high-priest, whensoever it fell out, that a higher value might be set upon him; and that it might represent our deliverance only by the death of the Son of God: of which many great men looked upon this as a type or shadow; though it must be confessed, there is not the least signification of this in the New Testament. And since the great expiation, which the high-priest made every year on the day of atonement, did not procure such men their liberty, I cannot look upon it as the effect of the high-priest's death, but only as that which followed upon it, by virtue of this law. For the high-priest having a great power every where, and particularly in these cities of the priests and Levites, over whom he was the chief, it is possible the manslayer might be confined here by some peculiar act of his authority; which expiring together with himself, he was released.

Ver. 26. But if the slayer shall at any time] During the life of the high-priest.

Come without the border of the city of his refuge.] If he went beyond the bounds of the fields, in which he had liberty to walk, and might not be touched. For if a tree was planted (as the Mishna resolves in Maccoth) within the borders of the fields of the city, though the boughs stretched themselves beyond the borders, yet the manslayer was safe under the tree. In like manner, when churches became places of refuge, the civil law allowed the privilege to extend to the church gate: and the council of Toledo to thirty paces from the church; which pope Nicholas enlarged to forty. Thus, among the heathen, the bounds of the refuge at the temple of Diana at Ephesus were sometimes more, and sometimes less, as Ritterhusius observes in his book before named, where he shows how far it was extended by Alexander, and afterward farther by others. And Tacitus, lib. iii. Annalium, mentions a temple of hers, to which was granted, by several emperors, duobus millibus passuum eandem sanctitatem, "the same sanctity for two miles round about it."

Ver. 27. And the revenger of blood find him without out the borders of the city of his refuge, and the revenger of blood kill the slayer; he shall not be guilty of blood:

28 Because he should have remained in the city of his refuge until the death of the high priest: but after the death of the high priest the slayer shall return into the land of his possession.

29 So these things shall be for a statute of judgment unto you throughout your generations in all your dwellings.

30 Whoso killeth any person, the murderer shall be put to death by the mouth of witnesses. but one witness shall not testify against any person to cause him to die.

31 Moreover ye shall take no satisfaction for the life of a murderer, which is guilty of death: but he shall be surely put to death.

32 And ye shall take no satisfaction for him that is fled to the city of his refuge, that he should come again to dwell in the land, until the death of the priest.

33 So ye shall not pollute the land wherein ye are: for blood it defileth the land: and the

the borders, &c.] The court of judgment were not to put him to death; though perhaps he was obnoxious to the judgment of God, because he had killed an innocent person: but he was free from the punishment of the law, that manslayers might be the more careful to keep within their bounds; which was a profitable restraint upon them, for the public good. All men seeing how much God hated murder, by the confinement of him who had slain a man unawares, to a kind of imprisonment.

But it may be said, on the other side, that he who killed a manslayer in this case was perfectly guiltless; because he did not herein act as a private person, but executed a sentence against him, who was condemned by public authority. Which gave no protection to the manslayer, but within the borders of his city of refuge; leaving him to the avenger of blood, if he came out of those bounds, till the death of the high-priest. After which, if the avenger of blood killed him, no doubt he was to be punished as a murderer.

Ver. 28. He should have remained in the city of his refuge] These words give the reason, why the avenger of blood was not to be punished in this case; because the manslayer was guilty of breaking another law, and so in some sort accessory to his own death; for he might have been safe, if he had pleased.

After the death of the high priest, the slayer shall return] Where he was not only to remain safe, but to be restored to all his honours, if he had any before he fled to the city of refuge.

Ver. 29. A statute of judgment,] A rule whereby to judge between manslayers and murderers.

Throughout your generations] The like clauses are usual in the ancient civil law: "Hoc perpetua lege sancimus. Hoc generali et in perpetuum valitura lege decernimus," &c.

In all your dwellings.] This the Jews interpret as an obligation upon them to have courts of judgment wheresoever they dwell. Thus R. Solomon, upon these very words: "They teach us (saith he) the use of courts of judgment, which ought to be even out of the land, all the time that they were used in the land." So the ancient book Siphri, and many others mentioned by our most learned Selden, lib. ii. De Synedr. cap. 5. n. 1.

Ver. 30. The murderer shall be put to death by the mouth of witnesses,] This direction for all proceedings in this case, was to be the rule in all others of like nature, by examining witnesses, who were to be competent. Upon which account ten sorts of persons were incapable to be witnesses, according to the Hebrew doctors; viz. women, servants, minors, fools, the deaf and dumb, the blind, impious, and audacious people, dear relations, and those that had been convicted of hearing false witness: and they endeavour, after their manner, to find reasons against all these in the law itself (see Selden, lib. ii. De Synedr. cap. 13. n. 11).

One witness shall not testify—to cause him to die.] This was such an established rule in the civil law, that it saith, ubi numerus testium non adjectur, sufficienti duo; "where the number of witnesses is not mentioned, two suffices." Pluralis enim locutio, duorum numero contenta est: "for where witnesses in the plural number are spoken of, two are enough to answer the intention of the law." Which number, therefore, is frequently mentioned expressly in Scripture, as necessary in all cases (Deut. xvii. 6), particularly in this of murder (xix. 15). Yet, where there was but one witness, or not two who both together saw the man killed, so that he who was accused of the murder could not be put to death, he was thrown into a very strait prison, and there fed with bread and water of affliction, till his bowels were sorely pinched, &c. if we may believe the Jewish doctors, mentioned by Selden, lib. iv. De Jure Nat. et Gent. cap. 1.

Ver. 31.] If a murderer would have given all his estate to save his life, or the avenger of blood would have accepted a compensation, or freely let him go, the judges (when they had found him guilty) could not restore him to the city of refuge, but he was to suffer death. For the life of him that was slain, was not (as Maimonides speaks) part of the goods of the avenger of blood, but belonged to Almighty God; who set such a value on a man's life, that he would not suffer any price to be taken for it (see Selden in the same chapter, p. 470).

Ver. 32.] No money was to purchase his liberty to dwell anywhere else but there, till the time appointed by the law: but this punishment for manslaughter was as indispensable as death for murder. And therefore, if any man happened to kill another in the city of refuge, to which he was confined, he was forced to flee to another city of refuge, and there abide till the death of the high-priest.

Ver. 33. So ye shall not pollute the land:] By this it appears, that the next of kin was bound to prosecute the murderer unto death, for the good of his country, which otherwise would have had a guilt upon it, and that very grievous. For they are the greatest crimes, as Maimonides observes, which are said to pollute the land, or them, or God's sanctuary, viz. idolatry (Lev. xx. 3), all the filthiness that is forbidden, xviii. 24, 25, and murder, here mentioned (More Nevoch. par. iii. cap. 47).

The land cannot be cleansed—but by the blood of him that shed it.] The same Maimonides observes, in the forty-first chapter of that book, "That it is a piece of universal justice, to make a man suffer what he hath made another suffer. If he hath hurt his body, he must suffer for it in his own body; if in his money, his own purse must pay for it; if he have taken away his life, he must die for it himself. And the punishment can neither be mitigated, nor any compensation accepted for it. For which he quotes those words; and upon this account resolves, that if land cannot be cleansed of the blood that is shed therein, but by the blood of him that shed it.

34 Defile not therefore the land which ye shall inhabit, wherein I dwell: for I the LORD dwell among the children of Israel.

he that was murdered should live a few days or hours after his deadly wound, and, being in sound understanding, should desire he that killeth him might not die for it, declaring that he freely forgave him, his desire was not to be granted, but blood was to be punished with blood: whether he that was slain was a great man or a mean, a freeman or a slave, a wise man or a fool; because there is no sin committed by men greater than this."

Ver. 34. Defile not therefore the land] By suffering a murderer to live.

Wherein I dwell:] This is given as a reason elsewhere (see ver. 3.) why they should put all polluted people out of their camps, because God dwelt in them, viz. in his sanctuary, which made this land be called the Holy Land, and God's possession (2 Chron. xx. 11.)

For I the Lord dwell among the children of Israel.] See Exod. xxv. 8. The very same was practised among the Athenians, with some little alteration. For Demosthenes says, it was one of their laws τὸν ἐκ προνοίας ἀποκτείνοντα θανάτω ζῆμιόνεσθαι, "that he who out of forethought killed a man, should be put to death." And he tells us also, that it was not lawful for the judges to take money to remit the punishment after he was condemned: though if the prosecutors compounded with him or his friends beforehand, and desisted from the prosecution, his life was saved. If he fled from justice, all his goods were confiscated, and he forfeited all the rights of a citizen, both civil and sacred (see Sam. Petitus's Comment. in Leges Atticæ, lib. vii. tit. 1).

CHAPTER XXXVI.

1 The inconvenience of the inheritance of daughters 5 is remedied by marrying in their own tribes, 7 lest the inheritance should be removed from the tribe. 10 The daughters of Zelophehad marry their father's brothers' sons.

1 AND the chief fathers of the families of the children of Gilead, the son of Machir, the son of Manasseh, of the families of the sons of Joseph, came near, and spake before Moses, and before the princes, the chief fathers of the children of Israel:

2 And they said, The LORD commanded my lord to give the land for an inheritance by lot to the children of Israel: and my lord was commanded by the LORD to give the inheritance of Zelophehad our brother unto his daughters.

3 And if they be married to any of the sons of the other tribes of the children of Israel, then shall their inheritance be taken from the inheritance of our fathers, and shall be put to the inheritance of the tribe whereunto they are received: so shall it be taken from the lot of our inheritance.

4 And when the jubile of the children of Israel shall be, then shall their inheritance be put unto the inheritance of the tribe whereunto they are received: so shall their inheritance be taken away from the inheritance of the tribe of our fathers.

5 And Moses commanded the children of Israel according to the word of the LORD, saying,

CHAP. XXXVI.

Ver. 1. The chief fathers of the families, &c.] Not the fathers of those families whose inheritance had been assigned them already on this side Jordan, in the land of Gilead; but the other half of the tribe of Manasseh, who were to have their inheritance in Canaan, where the daughters of Zelophehad also had their portion, as appears from Josh. xvii. 3, 4, &c.

Spake before Moses, and before the princes.] Who were met together in a great assembly, as they used to do about public affairs (see xxvii. 2. xxxi. xxxii. 2).

Ver. 2. The Lord commanded my lord] This shows that one was the mouth of the rest.

To give the land for an inheritance by lot] See xxvi. 52, 53. For there the foundation of all these doubts was laid.

To give the inheritance of Zelophehad] Which would have fallen to Zelophehad had he been alive.

Our brother] So they called their near relations.

Unto his daughters.] Who petitioned him for the possession which should have been their father's, and it was granted them (see xxvii. 6, 7).

Ver. 3. If they be married to any of the sons of the other tribes] They being rich, many, it may be supposed, of the other tribes, as well as their own, would court them for their wives: and if they should choose a husband that was not of their own tribe, they represent to Moses the inconveniences which from thence would follow.

Then shall their inheritance be taken from the inheritance of our fathers,] i. e. Go out of our tribe, to which it originally belonged.

And shall be put to the inheritance of the tribe whereunto they are received:] Become a part of the inheritance of that tribe into which they married.

So shall it be taken from the lot of our inheritance.] For it must have descended unto their children, who were of another tribe by the father's side; which alone was considered, and not the mother's, in this case.

Ver. 4. When the jubile—shall be,] Which was ordained for the preserving estates in the tribes and families to which they originally appertained (Lev. xxv. 10, 13).

Then shall their inheritance be put unto the inheritance of the tribe whereunto they are received:] The jubilee will not help us in this case, by making their inheritances return as other lands do; because they are become the inheritance of another tribe by the right of marriage.

So shall their inheritance be taken away, &c.] So will their estate go out of our tribe, without remedy, because the jubilee itself will give us no relief.

Ver. 5. And Moses commanded—according to the word of the Lord,] Whom, I suppose, he consulted about this matter (as he did when the first doubt was

The tribe of the sons of Joseph hath said well.

6 This is the thing which the Lord doth command concerning the daughters of Zelophehad, saying, Let them marry to whom they think best; only to the family of the tribe of their father shall they marry.

7 So shall not the inheritance of the children of Israel remove from tribe to tribe: for every one of the children of Israel shall keep himself to the inheritance of the tribe of his fathers.

8 And every daughter, that possesseth an inheritance in any tribe of the children of Israel, shall be wife unto one of the family of the tribe of her father, that the children of Israel may enjoy every man the inheritance of his fathers.

9 Neither shall the inheritance remove from one tribe to another tribe; but every one of the moved about the inheritance of these women, xxvii. 5), and received the answer by which he here commanded the Israelites to govern themselves.

The tribe of—Joseph] In whose name the chief fathers of their several families made this representation to Moses; as became men who took care of the concerns of the whole tribe.

Hath said well.] In desiring the inheritance of these women might not go out of their tribe, which was prevented by the following law.

Ver. 6. Let them marry to whom they think best;] They were not confined to any particular persons; but might have their choice among those who were descended from the same stock as it immediately follows.

Only to the family of the tribe of their father shall they marry:] Only with these two limitations, that they might not marry a man of another tribe, nor a man of another family in their own tribe. For it is very manifest, that they are tied to marry into the family of their father; and accordingly they did actually marry their cousin-germans, as we now speak (ver. 11). For this law was made for the preservation of families (as well as of tribes), as the law for the redemption of lands was. And therefore these words, "the family of the tribe of their father," are well translated by Grotius (upon Matt. i. 16), familia stirpis paternæ, "the family of the stock of their father," which was that they desired might not perish (xxvii. 4), and was the ground of the law, which commanded a man to marry the wife of his brother, who left no issue (Deut. xxv. 16). Therefore, there being several families in the tribe of Manasseh (xxvi. 29—32), these women could marry only into the family of the Hephraites.

Ver. 7. So shall not the inheritance—remove from tribe to tribe:] For by preserving it in the family to which it was given, it was necessarily preserved in the tribe.

Every one—shall keep himself to the inheritance of the tribe of his fathers.] And not endeavour to get any part of the inheritance of another tribe, by marrying an heiress in it. Plato himself took care of this, that when a man left only a daughter, his estate should not be carried by her to a stranger, but she should be bound to marry Κατ' ἀγχιονείαν, "one that was nearest of kin to her." And if there was a want of near kindred, μέχρι μὲν ἀδελφοῦ εὐδῶν, &c. "it should descend to the children of her father's brother, or the children of the grandfather, some of which he ordains should marry her" (Lib. xi. De Legibus, p. 924, 925, edit. Serrani).

Ver. 8. Every daughter that possesseth an inheritance in any tribe.] Here this law is made general, that all women who were heiresses, as the daughters of Zelophehad were, should do as they are here commanded. And this was one of the Attic laws, which, as Grotius observes, were plainly borrowed from the law of Moses, Μὴ ἐξέσθαι τὰς ἐπικληρούσας ἕξω τῆς ἀγχιονείας γαμῆν, &c. "That an heiress should not marry out of her kindred," but dispose of herself and estate, τῷ ἐγγύτατῳ γένους, "to one nearest of kin to her;" which was one of the laws of Solon, as Sam. Petitus observes out of Isæus, Pollux, and others, in his Comment. in Leges Atticas, lib. vi. tit. 1. p. 441.

Shall be wife to one of the family of the tribe of her father.] Here she is confined to her family, and not merely to her tribe. But this concerned only such as were heiresses: all other women might marry into what tribe they pleased; as appears by those very books, wherein we read that Aaron himself married the sister of the prince of Judah (Exod. vi. 22). And if any object, that this was before the giving of the law, it is evident that Jehoiaða, a priest, and consequently of the tribe of Levi, married king Jehoram's sister, who was of the tribe of Judah (2 Chron. xxii. 11). And long before this, all the tribes of Israel, being in great solicitude how to find wives for their brethren of Benjamin, did not scruple their having them out of any tribe, if it had not been for their oath (Judg. xxi. 18). And, to add no more, David himself, of the tribe of Judah, married Michal, the daughter of Saul, who was of the tribe of Benjamin.

The Talmudists add, that even these heiresses might marry into what tribe they pleased, after the first division of the land by Joshua; to which they imagine this law was restrained; it being a common saying among them, "that it did not belong to any age, but that in which it was made." In the following ages they pretend a man might purchase land in any tribe and possess it alway; or have the inheritance of it by marriage, though he were of another tribe, as Selden shows their opinion to be (lib. De Successionibus ad Leges Hebr. cap. 18, and lib. iii. De Synedr. cap. 4. n. 1. and Buxtorf. De Sponsal. et Divortiiis, sect. 44). But this is well confuted by Grotius in his Annotations upon Matt. i. 16.

Ver. 9. Neither shall the inheritance remove from one tribe to another] This establishes in general what he had said before (ver. 7), with particular respect to the daughters of Zelophehad. But Moses ben Nachman, upon these very words, asserts the Talmudic opinion before mentioned, that this concerns only the present time, not future ages. And puts this case (which is the strongest that can be thought of), if a woman were married into another tribe, after which marriage, her father and all her brethren dying without children, the inheritance fell to her, and consequently, saith he, the possession must devolve from one tribe to another, into which she had married. But, according to the letter of these words, the inheritance was rather to descend to the next of her kindred, than by her be carried out of the tribe to which it belonged.

But every one of the tribes—shall keep himself to his own inheritance.] Shall cleave or stick close to his own inheritance, as the Hebrew word signifies; and as the Greek and Latin express it. The reason of the command was, as Procopius Gazæus observes, to prevent the confusion of tribes. How the Vulgar Latin came to deviate so much from the Hebrew text, and from the intention of this law (as it hath done in this and the two preceding verses), I shall not here examine.

tribes of the children of Israel shall keep himself to his own inheritance.

10 Even as the LORD commanded Moses, so did the daughters of Zelophehad:

11 For Mahlah, Tirzah, and Hoglah, and Milcah, and Noah, the daughters of Zelophehad, were married unto their father's brothers' sons:

12 And they were married into the families of the sons of Manasseh the son of Joseph, and their inheritance remained in the tribe of the family of their father.

13 These are the commandments and the judgments, which the LORD commanded by the hand of Moses unto the children of Israel in the plains of Moab by Jordan near Jericho.

It is sufficient to note, that Onkelos hath expressed the Hebrew text word for word; and the LXX. do not depart from the sense of it.

Ver. 10. So did the daughters of Zelophehad:] Accordingly they followed this direction when they came into the land of Canaan, and had received their portion there. Now there being no such words added here, as there are in other cases, "this shall be unto the children of Israel a statute of judgment" (xxvii. 11), much less "a statute of judgment throughout your generations" (xxxv. 29), it led, I conjecture, the Talmudic doctors into the forementioned opinion, that this law concerned only the present generation.

Ver. 11. For Mahlah, Tirzah, and Hoglah, and Milcah, and Noah,] Thus they are called both in xxvi. 33, and xxvii. 1, though they are not there mentioned in the same order; for Tirzah is there named last, who is here named in the second place. Perhaps they are set down here in the order wherein they were dispersed in marriage; and Tirzah, who was the younger, was married in the second place.

Were married unto their father's brothers' sons:] For Hephher, no doubt, had other sons besides Zelophehad, who had issue male, though Zelophehad had not. What their names were, or how many of them, we do not know; but some suppose them to have been six; one of which died in the wilderness without issue. See Selden, De Successionibus, cap. 23, where he discourses at large of the portion which fell to them in the land of Canaan.

Ver. 12. They were married into the families, &c.] In the margin, more exactly out of the Hebrew, and "some that were of the families:" i. e. to one of the families of Manasseh, from whom several families descended (xxvi. 29, &c.)

Their inheritance remained in the tribe.] The word for tribe signifies sometimes merely a family in a tribe. And so the LXX. (as Grotius observes in the place before named) in this very business, uses sometimes the word  $\delta\tau\mu\omicron\varsigma$ , and sometimes  $\phi\alpha\lambda\acute{\iota}$ ; the former of which signifies a part of a whole tribe. And thus Josephus also uses the word  $\phi\alpha\lambda\acute{\iota}$ , to signify a family. Mr. Selden hath the same observation in his book De Successionibus, cap. 18. that  $\tau\omicron\upsilon\tau\omicron\varsigma$  is sometimes translated  $\phi\alpha\lambda\acute{\iota}$ ; and then it signifies not a tribe, but  $\pi\alpha\tau\epsilon\rho\acute{\iota}\alpha\nu$ ,  $\sigma\upsilon\gamma\gamma\acute{\iota}\nu\epsilon\iota\alpha\nu$ , "familiam, cognationem, seu genus sanguine proximum; "a family, a kindred, or those that are next in blood." But there is no need of these observations, if the words be translated, as they may rightly; "And their inheritance remained in the tribe and the family of their fathers" (see ver. 6.)

Ver. 13.] He began to deliver the precepts here intended at chapter xxvi. (see ver. 3), and continues them to this place. By commandments, seem to be meant the precepts about the worship of God (ch. xxviii. xxix. xxx.), and by judgments, the civil laws about dividing their inheritances, and regulating their descent to their posterity, and establishing cities of refuge for manslayers, which are expressly called "a statute of judgment" (xxvii. 11. xxxv. 29). Some other things are interspersed, as God's commandment to number the people (which was in order to the assigning them their inheritances proportionable to their families), to execute judgment on the Midianites, and to set down in writing their travels in the wilderness; of which I have given an account in their proper places.

THE FIFTH BOOK OF MOSES,

CALLED

DEUTERONOMY.

THIS book had the name of DEUTERONOMY given it by the Greeks, from the principal scope and design of it; which was to repeat unto the Israelites, before Moses left them, the chief laws of God, which had been given them: that they who were not then born when they were first delivered, or were incapable to understand them, or had not sufficiently regarded them, might be instructed in them, and awakened to attend them, (see ver. 1, 5). In order to this, he premises a short narrative of what had befallen them since they came from Mount Sinai unto this time, in the first three chapters; and then in the fourth urges them, by a most pathetic exhortation, to the observance of those laws which he had taught them, especially the ten commandments, with which he begins the fifth chapter; where he makes a solemn rehearsal of the covenant God made with them in Horeb; and what immediately followed upon the delivery of the law by God himself from Mount Sinai. And then, having earnestly pressed the observation of the first commandment, in the former part of the sixth chapter, and in the latter part of it, and in the several chapters that follow (to the end of the eleventh), reminded them of a great many things which God had done for them, and given them several cautions, lest they let them slip out of their minds, and used many arguments, from several topics (as we call them), to move them to be obedient to all the other commandments; he proceeds in the twelfth chapter, and so forward to the twenty-eighth, to remember them of a great many other laws besides the ten commandments, which he had delivered to them. Some of which he explains; others he enforces with further reasons; and in several places adds new laws for the greater security of the whole (particularly, he orders the writing of God's law upon stones, when they came into the land of Canaan, ch. xxvii.), and then pronounces those promises which God had made to the obedient, and his threatenings to the disobedient, more largely, and with greater force, than he had done in the twenty-sixth of Leviticus. After which he again remembers them of several wonderful works of God for them (ch. xxix.) and renews the covenant between God and them; using several arguments to persuade them to a dutiful observance of God's law: which he commands (ch. xxxi.) to be read to all the people in the conclusion of every seventh year, that none might pretend ignorance of it. And then concludes all with a most admirable song, which he orders every one to learn; and with a blessing upon the twelve tribes.

All this was done in the last two months of the last year of Moses' life. But not all at once, as plainly appears by several parts of the book; in which he writes what he delivered to them at several times. Which is the reason of the repetition of the very same thing over and over again: that he might make it sink into their minds by being often inculcated. Some have been so foolish as to make this an objection against this book being composed by Moses. But it shows their great ignorance; all wise men having ever judged it necessary to say, τὰ αὐτὰ περὶ τῶν αὐτῶν, "the very same things concerning the same things;" that they might be thoroughly understood, and fixed in the memory of their auditors, and settled in their hearts and affections. Particularly Epictetus (as David Chytraeus long ago observed) delivered this as a profitable rule in all studies: Εἰδέναι χρὴ ὅτι οὐ ξέδιον δόγμα παραγινώσθαι ἀνθρώπων, εἰ μὴ καθ' ἑκάστην ἡμέραν τὰ αὐτὰ καὶ λίγη τις καὶ ἀκούη καὶ ἅμα χρεῖται περὶ τὰ βίον. "This must be known (as a certain truth), that it is not easy for a man to attend the solid knowledge of any thing, unless he both read and hear the same things every day, and also set himself to the practice of them." This course Moses took with the children of Israel: spending every day, it is likely, of the latter end of his life in calling to their mind, again and again, what he had taught them, and the reason they had to do accordingly.

CHAP. I.

Ver. 1 These be the words] This book contains the words.

Which Moses spake unto all Israel] All the people could not hear what he said, but he ordered the elders and heads, of the several tribes to communicate to the whole congregation what he delivered to them, in the audience of many of the people who were assembled with them. Thus these words are commonly understood. But, considering the great weight of what is here said, I rather think that Moses himself, at several times, spake what here follows in the ears of the people (see v. 1.)

On this side Jordan] The Vulgar Latin having translated the Hebrew words [beber] "on the other side Jordan," it hath furnished some ill-disposed minds with an argument, that Moses was not the author of this book: for he that wrote plainly shows that he was in Canaan when he wrote it. But a very little consideration would have prevented this frivolous objection; there being nothing more certain, than that the Hebrew words signify indifferently, either one side or the other; and may be literally translated, "in the passage over Jordan," or as they were about to pass over it; as Huetius observes and proves, by plain examples, that the Hebrews have no other word to express their mind, when they would say either on this side or beyond (see Demonstr. Evang. propos. iv. cap. 14). To which another learned writer, since him (Hermannus Witsius, lib. i. Miscel. Sacr. cap. 14), hath added several other places which evidently show, that beber is a word that indifferently belongs to either side of any place (see 1 Sam. xiv. 40, and must be determined by the matter in hand, to which it is to be applied. And here, undoubtedly, it is to be rendered "on this side Jordan" (see iii. 8).

In the plain] In the plain of Moab, where they had remained a long while; as appears from the foregoing book (Numb. xxii. 1. xxvi. 3. 63. xxxi. 12. xxxiii. 48. 59. xxxv. 1. xxxvi. 13).

reb by the way of mount Seir unto Kadesh-barnea.)

3 And it came to pass in the fortieth year, in the eleventh month, on the first day of the month, that Moses spake unto the children of Israel, according unto all that the Lord had given him in commandment unto them;

Over against the Red sea.] There is no word in the Hebrew text for sea; and therefore the marginal translation is to be preferred, which is, "over against Suph;" which was a place in the country of Moab (see Numb. xxi. 14), over against which they now lay encamped; but were so far distant from the Red Sea, that there can be no respect to it here.

Between Paran.] He doth not mean the wilderness of Paran frequently mentioned in the foregoing book (for that was as remote from hence as the Red Sea), but some place in the country of Moab, as Suph was, and the rest of the places which here follow.

And Tophel, and Labnan, and Hazeroth, and Dizahab.] There was a place called Hazeroth, where they had encamped a long time ago (Numb. xi. 35. xxxiii. 17), but it was in another wilderness far from this place, as appears by the account Moses gives of their removals from that place to this, where they now lay (Numb. xxxiii. 17. 48, 49). And therefore I take this, and the other three places here mentioned, to have been frontier-towns in the country of Moab, which lay upon the borders of this plain. The last of which, Dizahab, is translated by the LXX. and the Vulgar, as if it signified a place where there were mines of gold.

Onkelos and the Jerusalem Targum, who take Suph to signify the Red sea, and Paran for the wilderness through which they had come many years ago, &c. are forced to add several words to make out the sense of this verse in this manner: "These be the words which Moses spake unto all Israel on this side Jordan, &c. reproving them because they sinned in the desert, and provoked God in the plain over against the Red sea; and murmured in Paran about manna; and at Hazeroth for flesh," &c. And so they proceed to mention their other sins committed in other places; but not in these here named: which they force, from their natural sense, to comply with this conceit.

Ver. 2. There are eleven days' journey from Horeb, &c.] Or "eleven days (we were a coming) from Horeb, by the way of Mount Seir, unto Kadesh-barnea." Which cannot be understood of the whole time they spent between these two places, but only of the time they spent in travelling: for they stayed a month at Kibroth-hattaavah, and a week more at Hazeroth (Numb. xi. 21. xii. 15, 16), before they came to Kadesh-barnea. This he represents to them, to make them sensible they had been kept in the wilderness so many years as had passed since they came out of Egypt; not because it was a long way to Canaan, but for the reason mentioned in the fourteenth of Numbers. For from Horeb (whither he ordered them to go when they came out of Egypt) they came in eleven days, and took no long journeys, to the borders of the land of Canaan, where Kadesh-barnea lay. So Maimonides; The way was plain and known between Horeb (whither God brought them on purpose to serve him) and Kadesh: which was the beginning of a habitable country; according to what he saith, Numb. xx. 16. (see More Nevochim, par. iii. cap. 1. see Numb. xiii. 26).

By the way of Mount Seir] The country of the Edonites (ch. ii. ver. 12).

Unto Kadesh-barnea.] How they were ordered to come hither, and what they did here, he relates, ver.

4 After he had slain Sihon the king of the Amorites, which dwelt in Heshbon, and Og the king of Bashan, which dwelt at Astaroth in Edrei:

5 On this side Jordan, in the land of Moab, began Moses to declare this law, saying,

6 The Lord our God spake unto us in Horeb,

6. 19, and so proceeds to give an account of several remarkable things which befell them, unto the time when he wrote these things, which he sets down in the next verse.

Ver. 3. In the fortieth year.] After they came out of Egypt.

In the eleventh month, on the first day] In the first month of this fortieth year they came into the wilderness of Zin, unto another Kadesh (Numb. xx. 1). From whence they removed to Mount Hor; where Aaron died on the first day of the fifth month of this year. See there, ver. 28, where it appears, ver. 29, they mourned for him thirty days, that is, till the beginning of the sixth month. In which they fought with king Arad (Numb. xxi), and from Mount Hor travelled from place to place (as we read there, and Numb. xxxiii) till they came to these plains of Moab. In which journeys, and in the rest of the transactions, mentioned in the latter end of the book of Numbers, they spent the other five months of this year; as I have observed in their proper places. And now began the eleventh month, when Moses, being to leave the world before the end of this year, spake all that follows in this book. And this speech (which he begins ver. 6, and continues to the fortieth verse of the fourth chapter), the great primate of Ireland thinks, he made to the people on the twentieth of February, and on the sabbath-day, as the reader may find in his Annals.

That Moses spake, &c.] Made a rehearsal of all that at several times he had received from the Lord, and delivered unto them.

Ver. 4. After he had slain Sihon] About five months ago; for it was after Aaron's death, which was the first day of the fifth month (Numb. xxxiii. 38), and they mourned for him all that month (See Numb. xxi. 21, &c.).

And Og the king of Bashan, which dwelt at Astaroth] This was a city in the country of Bashan (Josh. xiii. 31), and a city it was of very great antiquity, as appears from Gen. xiv. 5 (see there). From whence some think the famous goddess Astarte had her name, being here worshipped. But whether that goddess took her name from this city, or the city from the goddess, is not certain; as Mr. Selden observes in his Syntagma ii. De Diis Syris, cap. 2. But that the heathen deities were wont to have their names from the groves, mountains, cities, and caves, where they were worshipped, is as certain as it is uncertain from whence Astarte, or Astaroth (as the Scripture name is), was so called.

In Edrei: His royal palace was at Astaroth (as Sihon's was in Heshbon), but he was slain in Edrei (Numb. xxi. 33).

Ver. 5. In the land of Moab.] In the plains of Moab; before they passed over Jordan (see ver. 1).

Began Moses to declare this law.] To call to remembrance that which any one had forgotten; and to explain that which any one did not understand. So Maimonides expounds these words in Seder Zeraim, "In the end of the fortieth year, in the beginning of the month Shebat, Moses called the people together, saying; The time of my death draws near, if any one, therefore, hath forgot any thing that I have delivered, let him come and receive it; or if any saying, Ye have dwelt long enough in this mount:

7 Turn you, and take your journey, and go to the mount of the Amorites, and unto all the places nigh thereunto, in the plain, in the hills, and in the vale, and in the south, and by the sea side, to the land of the Canaanites, and unto Lebanon, unto the great river, the river Euphrates.

8 Behold, I have set the land before you: go in and possess the land which the LORD swore unto your fathers, Abraham, Isaac, and Jacob, to give unto them and to their seed after them.

thing seem dubious, let him come that I may explain it. And so they say in Siphri, "If any one have forgotten any constitution, let him come and hear it the second time; if he need to have any thing unfolded, let him come and hear the explication of it." For which he quotes this verse; and says that Moses spent all his time in this, from the beginning of the month Shebat to the seventh day of Adar. And what he now said was likely to be more regarded, because these were, in a manner, his dying words: for he lived but till the seventh day of the next month; and seems to have composed this book as a compendium of his whole law, for the familiar use of the children of Israel; from whence it is called Deuteronomy, i. e. a second law (see Huetius in his Demonstr. Evang. propos. iv. cap. 1).

Ver. 6. The Lord our God spake] Numb. x. 13.

Ye have dwelt long enough in this mount.] From the third month of the first year (Exod. xix. 1), to the twentieth day of the second year after they came out of Egypt (Numb. x. 11), they stayed at Mount Sinai, which is the same with Horeb, they being only two tops of the same mountain, one of them something higher than the other, as they are described by those who have taken a view of them. For Moses was twice with God, for the space of forty days, in this mount; and here the tabernacle and all things belonging to it were made, according to the orders he there received; and then was erected and consecrated; and the people all numbered and disposed under several standards, to march in such order as God appointed (Numb. ii. 3. 10. 17, &c. x. 14, 15, &c).

Ver. 7. Turn you.] From this mountain.

Take your journey.] Resume your journey, which you have so long intermitted.

Go to the mount of the Amorites.] A mount on the south part of Canaan, inhabited by the Amorites, together with some Canaanites and Amalekites (Numb. xiv. 25, 43, 45). But the principal possessors of it were Amorites, as is expressed more than once in this chapter, ver. 19, 20, 41. This is the mountain to which Moses bade the spies go up, Numb. xiii. 17, and so they did, ver. 22.

Unto all the places nigh thereunto.] And so pass into all the neighbouring country which lies near it.

In the plain, in the hills, and in the vale.] This is a description of the country nigh unto this mountain; some of which was champaign (as we speak) and other parts of it consisted of hills and dales.

In the south, &c. unto the great river, the river Euphrates.] And so go into all the rest of the land of Canaan: the several quarters of which he here sets forth. The southern part lying towards this mountain; the western upon the sea (where the people properly called Canaanites dwelt); the northern towards Lebanon; and the eastern towards the river Euphrates. Which by other authors, as well as Moses, is called the great river. So Callimachus, in his hymn to Apollo, v. 103.

9 ¶ And I spake unto you at that time, saying, I am not able to bear you myself alone:

10 The LORD your God hath multiplied you, and behold, ye are this day as the stars of heaven for multitude.

11 (The LORD God of your fathers make you a thousand times so many more as ye are, and bless you, as he hath promised you!)

12 How can I myself alone bear your cumbrance and your burden, and your strife?

13 Take you wise men, and understanding,

Ἰσχυροὶ ποταμοῦ μίγας ἰσός—

"The great flood of the Assyrian river;" which the scholiast observes is meant of Euphrates. And Lucan, —<sup>a</sup> Cum Tigride magnus Euphrates?— Lib. iii. ver. 253.

Ver. 8. I have set the land] In the Hebrew, "given the land," i. e. bestowed it upon you, and am ready to bring you into possession of it.

Before you.] That every one of you may have his share of it. Or, that you may go whither you please, and settle yourselves in it (Gen. xiii. 9, xxxiv. 10).

Go in and possess] Therefore make no longer stay here in the wilderness; but go and take possession of my gift.

Which the Lord swore unto your fathers,] Gen. xv. 18, xvii. 7, 8, xxvi. 1, xxviii. 13.

Ver. 9. I spake unto you at that time,] About the time of their coming to Horeb, or Mount Sinai. For the story of Jethro, unto which this relates, preceded that immediately (Exod. xviii). Many great men place it after the giving of the law: of which, see Selden, lib. ii. De Synedr. cap. 2. n. 4.

I am not able to bear you myself alone.] We do not read, before now, that Moses spake thus to the people. But Jethro spake in this manner to him, Exod. xviii. 18, and gave him advice to take some others to his assistance (ver. 21), which advice he followed (ver. 24). And then spake to the people what Jethro had said to him; and enlarged upon it, in the words we read here, in the following verses: where he gives them the reason why he could not perform the office of a judge alone.

Ver. 10. Hath multiplied you,] Increased unto a greater number than can easily be told.

Ver. 11. Make you a thousand times so many more as you are,] As if he had said, I am not troubled at your vast increase, but bless God for it; and beseech him to make you a thousand times more numerous than at present you are.

Bless you, as he has promised you!] In the promise often repeated to their fathers (Gen. xii. 2, xv. 5, xvii. 5, 6, xviii. 18, xxii. 17, xxvi. 4, xxviii. 14).

Ver. 12. How can I myself alone bear your cumbrance, and your burden, and your strife?] But how is it possible for one man alone to undergo the labour of hearing all the complaints of such a multitude; and of remedying all their grievances, and determining all their controversies? So the last word signifies, suits at law (as we speak), as the two former signify other differences, which arose between one man and another, about such things as are mentioned in the twenty-first, twenty-second, and twenty-third chapters of Exodus. The first word, which we translate cumbrance, signifies tædiosam litigantium serram (as Hottinger interprets it, in his Smegma Orientale, lib. i. cap. 6), the tedious pleadings of those that manage causes before a judge, by bills and answers (suppose) and rejoinders, &c.

Ver. 13. Take you] In the Hebrew it is give ye, i. e.

and known among your tribes, and I will make them rulers over you.

14 And ye answered me, and said, The thing which thou hast spoken is good for us to do.

15 So I took the chief of your tribes, wise men, and known, and made them heads over you, captains over thousands, and captains over hundreds, and captains over fifties, and captains over tens, and officers among your tribes.

present unto me such persons as you think fit, according to the following characters.

Wise men, and understanding.] Men of known wisdom, prudence, and integrity; skilful in Divine and human laws (see Exod. xviii. 21). Some take wise men to signify such as knew much; and understanding, such as had prudence to make use of their knowledge, being men of experience, and they were to be noted for both these; otherwise the people would not have revered them.

Ver. 14.] This consent of the people is not recorded before; but sufficiently implied in their submission to this regulation, mentioned Exod. xviii. 26.

Ver. 15. So I took the chief of your tribes, wise men, and known.] From among those men that they presented to him, he took, I suppose, such persons among the chief of their tribes, as were endowed with the qualities here named, and were known by all so to be. For obscure persons, either for birth, or experience in affairs, would have been contemned: and therefore he chose the noblest of those that were presented to him (called here the chief of your tribes), if they were no less worthy than others. For some such, no doubt, there were among their great men, as might be thought fit for this high employment. And they were the fitter, because, being men of quality (as we speak), they were less liable to be corrupted by bribery. From which Moses took care all judges should be so free, that he expressly requires they should be men hating covetousness (Exod. xviii. 21). And Solon did not forget to make this a part of the oath, which every judge in Athens took (which is mentioned at large by Demosthenes: in his oration against Timocrates) οὐδὲ ὄψα εἶσθαι τῆς ἡλιείας ἐνεκα, οἷς αὐτὸς εἶπεν οὐκ ἄλλοις ἔμοι, &c. "I will receive no gift upon the account of my sentence; neither I myself, nor any body else for me, nor others with my knowledge, by any artifice or device whatsoever."

Made them heads over you.] Set them to govern and rule the people (as it is expressed ver. 13), by deciding all causes which were brought before them; as far as they were able to understand them.

Captains over thousands, &c.] It is a question whether they were commanders over so many families, or persons; as I observed upon Exod. xviii. 25. Hermannus Conringius thinks they were rulers (as the word signifies) over so many fathers of families, understanding by a family that which we now call a household (De Republ. Hebræorum, sect. 18).

Officers among your tribes.] The same great man, in the twenty-sixth section of the same book, takes shotrim to have been judges, as well as the rest. His great reason is, because the seventy elders were ordered to be chosen out of them, among others (Numb. xi. 16). Now it is altogether improbable, he thinks, that such a prophetic college as that was, should be chosen out of such mean officers, as the Hebrew doctors make these shotrim to have been. But see what I have noted upon Exod. v. 14, and Numb. xi. 16. And let me here add, that if they were judges (and not attendants upon them), they were very mean ones, being put below the rulers of ten.

16 And I charged your judges at that time, saying, Hear the causes between your brethren, and judge righteously between every man and his brother, and the stranger that is with him.

17 Ye shall not respect persons in judgment; but ye shall hear the small as well as the great; ye shall not be afraid of the face of man; for the judgment is God's: and the cause that is too hard for you, bring it unto me, and I will hear it.

But howsoever this be, it is certain some of these judges had greater authority than others, being entrusted with a larger jurisdiction; and, it is likely, greater abilities were required in those over thousands than in those over tens. As in the great Sanhedrin afterward, the Jews make more things necessary to qualify men for a place in it, than were requisite for those in lower courts; where no man could sit (much less in the highest) unless these seven things were remarkable in him, as Maimonides saith (Halacah Sanhedrin, cap. 4. sect. 7), "wisdom, humility, the fear of God, contempt of riches, love of truth, a good fame; and he was beloved also of others."

Ver. 16. I charged your judges at that time.] As the quality of their persons and their endowments made them considerable, so they were dignified with the honourable name of shofetim, and were also called elders, which had been a long time a title of honour among the Jews, and in other nations.

Hear the causes between your brethren.] This was a necessary quality in a good cause, to give audience to every one that brought a cause before him; and not to delay any man. But the Jews infer from these words, that it was not lawful to hear any man when his adversary was absent; but both parties were to be there present. And they were also to be heard speak for themselves, if they pleased: which was part of the forenamed oath which Solon ordered all the Athenian judges to take, ἀπράσσιμα τοῦ τε κατηγοροῦ καὶ τοῦ ἀπολογουμένου ὁμοίως ἀφοῦν, "I will hear the accuser and the defender, both alike."

Judge righteously.] The next thing required of a judge was to be upright and impartial, not considering what a man was, but his cause. This is implied in the following words.

Between every man and his brother.] i. e. Between one Israelite and another.

And the stranger that is with him.] i. e. Between an Israelite and a proselyte: whether he were received into the covenant by circumcision, or not. For of this latter sort there were, no doubt, a great number, amongst that mixed multitude, who came with them out of Egypt (Exod. xii. 38). And while they were in the wilderness, there was not a distinct court for Israelites and proselytes; but their causes were tried in one and the same, as Mr. Selden observes, lib. ii. De Synedriis, cap. 3. n. 1.

Ver. 17. Ye shall not respect persons in judgment;] Not be swayed by particular affection or interest; but judge sincerely, without respect to relation, or any benefit or injury received.

Ye shall hear the small as well as the great;] Be equally disposed patiently to attend to the cause of a poor man, as of a great; and to do him as speedy and impartial justice (see Lev. xix. 15). And here the Hebrew doctors tell us of some singular practices in their courts, to preserve the dispensation of exact justice: for if one of the contending parties came into them richly clothed, and the other poorly, they would not hear them till both were clothed alike. Nor would they suffer one of them to sit, and the other stand; but both of them either sat, or stood. And if they sat, one of them was not permitted to sit higher 18 And I commanded you at that time all the things which ye should do.

19 ¶ And when we departed from Horeb, we went through all that great and terrible wilderness, which ye saw by the way of the mountain of the Amorites, as the LORD our God commanded us; and we came to Kadesh-barnea.

20 And I said unto you, Ye are come unto the mountain of the Amorites, which the LORD our God doth give unto us.

21 Behold, the LORD thy God hath set the land before thee: go up and possess it, as the LORD God of thy fathers hath said unto thee; fear not, neither be discouraged.

than the other; but they sat by each other's side, &c. (see Selden, lib. ii. De Synedr. cap. 13. n. 10).

Ye shall not be afraid of the face of man;] Courage and undaunted resolution is another necessary qualification in a judge; who must not be overawed by what any man can do unto him; but remember (as it here follows) that he is in God's place.

For the judgment is God's;] God gave them their commission by Moses; so that they were his ministers, and acted by his authority: and therefore might be confident he would defend them in the discharge of their office. This shows, that though Moses alone acted by immediate authority from God, yet these always being constituted by him, were to be looked upon as pronouncing sentence in his name; who, after a peculiar manner, was the King and supreme Governor of the people of Israel.

The cause that is too hard for you, bring it unto me,] Another quality is humility, in not adventuring to judge of things above their reach. Some think there were certain causes reserved to the cognizance of Moses (as I observed upon Exod. xviii. 12), but the contrary appears by these words, that all manner of causes were brought before these judges; and they, not the people, brought such causes before Moses, as they found too hard for them to determine. So that they, not the person whose cause it was, judged of the difficulty of the cause (see Selden, lib. i. De Synedr. cap. 16).

Ver. 18.] As he rightly informed their judges, so he instructed the people also in their duty, before they went from Horeb, by delivering to them the judgments which God commanded him to set before them, Exod. xxi. 1, contained in that and in the two following chapters; whereby both they and their judges were to govern themselves.

Ver. 19. When we departed] See Numb. x. 2.

That great and terrible wilderness.] It may well be called great because it extended a great way. For after three days' journey (Numb. x. 12), they settled at Kibroth-hattaavah; which was in this wilderness of Paran. From whence they went to Hazereth, which is still said to be in this wilderness (Numb. xi. 35). And when they went from thence, they were in the same wilderness (xii. 16), where Kadesh was (xiii. 26, and see xxxiii. 19). And this wilderness was very terrible, or dreadful; because there were no inhabitants in it but wild beasts.

By the way of the mountain of the Amorites,] All the way you went towards that mountain (see ver. 7.)

As the Lord our God commanded us;] According to the direction which God gave them, by the motion of the cloud that went before them.

And we came to Kadesh-barnea.] Where they rested at the foot of that mountain, in the wilderness of Paran (Numb. xiii. 2. 26).

Ver. 20.] For this was part of the country which 22 ¶ And ye came near unto me, every one of you, and said, We will send men before us and they shall search us out the land, and bring us word again by what way we must go up, and into what cities we shall come.

23 And the saying pleased me well: and I took twelve men of you, one of a tribe:

24 And they turned and went up into the mountain, and came unto the valley of Eshcol, and searched it out.

25 And they took of the fruit of the land in their hands, and brought it down unto us, and brought us word again, and said, It is a good land which the LORD our God doth give us.

God bestowed upon them for their possession; as appears from Numb. xxxiv. 4, where Kadesh-barnea is mentioned as a frontier place in their south border. And indeed the Amorites, wheresoever they found them, were to be expelled; as they had already dispossessed them of the whole kingdom of Sihon, who was king of the Amorites (Numb. xxi. 21. 25, 26).

Ver. 21. Hath set the land before thee:] All the country beyond this mountain (ver. 8).

Go up] For there was a great ascent to it (Numb. xiii. 17).

And possess it,] Enter upon the possession of it.

As the Lord God of thy fathers hath said unto thee;] According to the promise made by God long ago, to Abraham, Isaac, and Jacob (see ver. 8), which he is now ready to perform.

Fear not, neither be discouraged.] Do not dread either their number or their strength; but trust in the Lord (whose name he repeats four times in these three verses), that he will make good his word.

Ver. 22. Ye came near unto me every one of you,] The heads of every tribe, in the name of the whole congregation, whose desire this was.

We will send men] Some select persons.

They shall search us out the land,] Give us an account how it lies, and what kind of country it is.

Bring us word again] Inform us which way to direct our march into it.

Into what cities we shall come.] What cities we shall first attack, to make our way the clearer into the country. Moses also charges the men that went to search the land with many other inquiries (Numb. xiii. 18—20), that the people might receive the fullest satisfaction.

Ver. 23. The saying pleased me well:] He thought this a reasonable motion, proceeding only from a prudent caution; whereas, in truth, they were timorous and distrustful of God's promise.

I took twelve men of you,] That every body might be satisfied when they heard the report of their brethren, Numb. xiii. 2—4, &c. and God directed him so to do, as we read there.

Ver. 24. They turned] From Kadesh-barnea.

Went up into the mountain,] Numb. xiii. 17. 21.

Came into the valley of Eshcol,] It appears by the relation (Numb. xiii. 21—23), that this was the last place unto which they came when they had ended their search.

Searched it out.] After they had gone through all the quarters of the country.

Ver. 25. They took of the fruit of the land] Both grapes, pomegranates, and figs (Numb. xiii. 23).

It is a good land] so they all said unanimously, and brought along with them a demonstration of it (Numb. xiii. 27), only they added, that they were not able to deal with the inhabitants of it.

26 Notwithstanding ye would not go up, but rebelled against the commandment of the LORD your God:

27 And ye murmured in your tents, and said, Because the LORD hated us, he hath brought us forth out of the land of Egypt, to deliver us into the hand of the Amorites, to destroy us.

28 Whither shall we go up? our brethren have discouraged our heart, saying, The people is greater and taller than we; the cities are great and walled up to heaven; and moreover we have seen the sons of the Anakims there.

29 Then I said unto you, Dread not, neither be afraid of them.

30 The LORD your God which goeth before you, he shall fight for you, according to all that he did for you in Egypt before your eyes;

31 And in the wilderness, where thou hast seen how that the LORD thy God bare thee, as a man doth bear his son, in all the way that ye went, until ye came into this place.

32 Yet in this thing ye did not believe the LORD your God.

33 Who went in the way before you, to search you out a place to pitch your tents in, in fire by night, to show you by what way ye should go, and in a cloud by day.

34 And the LORD heard the voice of your words, and was wroth, and sware, saying,

35 Surely there shall not one of these men of

Ver. 26.] Who bade you go up and not be afraid (ver. 8. 21). Which was the greater sin, because he had not only brought them to the borders of the land, but convinced them that he had not deluded them with fair promises of a better country than really it was: for they all saw the goodly fruit which it produced; and ought therefore to have believed he would fulfil his word, and give them the possession of it.

Ver. 27. Ye murmured in your tents.] After great lamentations for a whole night together (Numb. xiv. 1).

He hath brought us forth out of the land of Egypt.] Unto which therefore they desired and conspired to return (Numb. xiv. 4).

To deliver us into the hand of the Amorites.] Nothing can be more pernicious (as Grotius here observes) than a persuasion that God doth not love us, but hath a design upon us to destroy us.

Ver. 28. Whither shall we go up?] Moses, I suppose, still pressed them to go up, and take possession of the land; to which they gave him this snappish answer.

Our brethren have discouraged our heart.] The men that you yourself sent to search the land, dispirited us by the report they have brought us. Which would not have had that effect upon them, if they had minded one part of it as much as the other, and calmly considered what Caleb and Joshua said, who made no doubt of success.

The people is greater and taller than we;] More numerous, and of far greater stature and strength (Numb. xiii. 28. 33).

The cities are great and walled up to heaven:] The spies only told them, that their "cities were walled, and very great" (Numb. xiii. 28), but their fear and confusion of thoughts augmented the danger of attempting the conquest of them: yet Moses himself thinks good afterward to use the same hyperbole (ix. 1), which is common in the best authors. For thus Homer, in Odysseus, E. ver. 239, speaks of a fir-tree as high as heaven, i. e. exceeding tall:

— ἰσάτη τ' ἦν οὐρανὸν ἰκίει.

Many other instances may be seen in Bochartus's Phaleg. lib. i. cap. 13.

We have seen the sons of the Anakims there.] See Numb. xiii. 28. 33. Const. L'Empereur will rather have it translated "the sons of the giants," as the LXX. and Onkelos take it. Yet he acknowledges that Anak seems to have been the first parent and propagator of the race of giants after the flood; and, therefore, it may be properly translated as we do (see Annot. in Itiner. Benjamini Tudelensis, p. 136).

Ver. 29. Then I said unto you.] Moses here at large relates what he said unto their fathers upon this occasion; which he doth not mention in the book of Numbers (where we read only of his falling down before God), that he might awaken this generation to a greater confidence in God, and a dread of his judgment.

Dread not, neither be afraid of them.] Do not consider so much how strong they are, as how powerful the LORD your God is, who hath promised you this good land.

Ver. 30. The Lord your God which goeth before you.] In a glorious pillar of cloud and fire.

He shall fight for you.] As he had done hitherto (Exod. xiv. 14. xvii. 8, &c.).

According to all that he did for you in Egypt] Why should you think he is less able to bring you into Canaan, than he was to redeem you from Egypt, where you were oppressed by very powerful enemies!

Ver. 31. And in the wilderness.] Ever since they came from thence through the wilderness of the Red Sea (Exod. xiii. 18), and in the wilderness of Sin (Exod. xvi. 1), and the wilderness of Sinai (Exod. xix. 1, 2), and then through that terrible wilderness of Paran (see above, ver. 19.)

Where thou hast seen how that the Lord thy God bare thee.] The long experience they had of his tender care he had over them (which was as indulgent as that of a kind father towards his only son, when he is a child, whom he carries in his arms), should have made them confident of his gracious providence for the future.

In all the way that ye went.] He made provision for them in the most desolate places; bringing them water out of a rock; sending bread down to them from heaven; defending them from wild beasts, and from their fiercer enemies, &c.

Ver. 32.] He could not prevail with them to trust God; and go up, as he commanded, in his power and might to possess the land. Nor could all that Caleb and Joshua said at all move them (Numb. xiv. 7—9).

Ver. 33.] Who went in the way before you.] Never failed constantly to direct and guide you in your journeys (Exod. xiii. 22).

To search you out a place to pitch your tents in.] But always marked out your encampments where they should be (Numb. x. 17).

In fire by night,—and in a cloud by day.] That they might be able to travel by night, as well as by day: which was most convenient in summer-time, when the sun was very scorching in a wilderness where there was no shelter (Exod. xiii. 21. Numb. x. 16. 21).

Ver. 34. The Lord heard the voice of your words.] They not only distrusted God (ver. 32), but murmured against their leaders, and against God, in a mutinous manner; consulting to return into Egypt this evil generation see that good land, which I swear to give unto your fathers, 36 Save Caleb the son of Jephunneh: he shall see it, and to him will I give the land that he hath trodden upon, and to his children, because he hath wholly followed the LORD.

37 Also the LORD was angry with me for your sakes, saying, Thou also shalt not go in thither.

38 But Joshua the son of Nun which standeth before thee, he shall go in thither: encourage him: for he shall cause Israel to inherit it.

39 Moreover your little ones, which ye said should be a prey, and your children, which in that day had no knowledge between good and evil, they shall go in thither, and unto them will I give it, and they shall possess it.

(Numb. xiv. 1—4). And moreover spake of stoning Caleb and Joshua for their good advice (ver. 10).

Was wrath and swear.] Which so provoked the Divine Majesty, that he irrevocably determined what follows; confirming it with an oath (Numb. xiv. 21).

Ver. 35.] See Numb. xiv. 21, 28, 29.

Ver. 36. Save Caleb] And Joshua the son of Nun (see xiv. 24, 30, and see below, ver. 38).

He shall see it, and to him will I give the land, &c.] This was as exactly fulfilled as their disinheriting was, Josh. xiv. 9, 12, where the particular portion of land is mentioned which God promised to him, and which Joshua gave him in the mountain where the Anakims dwelt. For such was the wonderful faith and courage of Caleb, that he doubted not to dispossess those whom the rest of the Israelites dreaded as invincible.

Ver. 37. Also the Lord was angry with me.] Not at that time, but afterward; when they came into the wilderness of Zin, to another Kadesh (Numb. xx. 1, 12).

For your sakes.] By occasion of their fresh discontent and mutinous upbraidings of him (Numb. xx. 2—4), which provoked him so, that he spake unadvisedly with his lips, as the Psalmist observes, Ps. cvi. 31, 32. This was a high aggravation of their guilt; that they not only undid themselves, but brought great displeasure upon their worthy leader and governor, whom they wearied with their tumults and rebellions. Or the meaning may be (which doth not much differ from the account now given), that they murmuring in a tumultuous manner, when they saw the water did not flow out of the rock at the first stroke, he himself also was put into such a commotion, that he began to doubt, and say God would do nothing for such a rebellious people, though he had declared he would. If this be true, he soon recovered himself, and smote the rock again, in confidence God would be as good as his word. But God was so angry at the words he had spoken, that he so far punished him for them, as to deny him entrance into Canaan.

Thou—shalt not go in thither.] Which threatening is renewed a little before his death (Numb. xxvii. 13, 14), and he could not get repealed by any entreaties, as we read in this book, iii. 26.

Ver. 38. But Joshua—which standeth before thee, i. e. Waits upon thee.

He shall go in thither.] So God promised, when he, as well as Caleb, endeavoured to put courage into the people to go and possess the land (Numb. xiv. 6, 7, &c. 30).

Encourage him: for he shall cause Israel to inherit it. Not only go thither, and have his portion there, but be the captain of Israel, and conquer the land for 40 But as for you, turn you, and take your journey into the wilderness by the way of the Red sea.

41 Then ye answered and said unto me, We have sinned against the LORD, we will go up and fight, according to all that the LORD our God commanded us. And when ye had girded on every man his weapons of war, ye were ready to go up into the hill.

42 And the LORD said unto me, Say unto them, Go not up, neither fight; for I am not among you; lest ye be smitten before your enemies.

43 So I spake unto you; and ye would not hear, but rebelled against the commandment of the LORD, and went presumptuously up into the hill.

them, and divide it among them. This intimates as if Joshua was afraid he might be excluded as well as his master; being extremely troubled, it is likely, that he was not suffered to reap the fruit of his long labours. Therefore God bids Moses encourage his hope and command him to take heart (as we speak), for undoubtedly he should do more than go into Canaan. Which may be the reason why his name is not put into the exception (ver. 35, 36), together with Caleb's; but they are mentioned separately, because there was something to be said peculiar to each of them.

Ver. 39. Your little ones.] See Numb. xiv. 31. Had no knowledge between good and evil.] And consequently, did not provoke God by their disobedience.

They shall go in thither, &c.] Their innocence moved pity towards them: though children, in some cases, were cut off for their fathers' sins.

Ver. 40. But as for you, turn ye.] From the land of Canaan; to which they were not permitted to go.

Take your journey into the wilderness.] And get you back again into the wilderness, out of which I have brought you (Numb. xiv. 25).

By the way of the Red Sea.] Thus they had their desire, in some part, of returning into Egypt (Numb. xiv. 4), which was not far from the Red Sea.

Ver. 41. We have sinned] They repented when it was too late to do them any good (see Numb. xiv. 40).

We will go up and fight.] Now they resolve to encounter those enemies of whom they were before so afraid, as to speak of stoning those who exhorted them not fear them (Numb. xiv. 9, 10).

When ye had girded on every man his weapons of war, &c.] They not only made a stout resolution, but actually prepared themselves for the onset: as if there were no difficulty in that, which a little before they dreaded to think of. So De Dieu translates the last words, "Ye thought it an easy matter to ascend the hill;" or, ye despised going up the mountain; in our language, "Ye made nothing of it."

Ver. 42. Go not up.] See Numb. xiv. 41, 42. Neither fight.] Much less think of fighting.

For I am not among you;] By my powerful presence to subdue your enemies, or to defend you from them (so the phrase is often used): for the ark of the covenant, the token of God's presence, did not go with them (Numb. xiv. 44).

Lest ye be smitten] Which would be a far greater disgrace than marching away from them.

Ver. 43. So I spake] See Numb. xiv. 42, 43.

Ye would not hear.] No more than before; when he bade them go up.

44 And the Amorites, which dwelt in that mountain, came out against you, and chased you, as bees do, and destroyed you in Seir, even unto Hormah.

45 And ye returned and wept before the LORD;

But rebelled against the commandment of the Lord,] For now it was against his will, as before it was his will, that they should go up.

Went presumptuously up] Would venture against the express command of God, which was the highest presumption.

Ver. 44. The Amorites—came out against you,] As soon as they saw the Israelites ascend to assault them they came down upon them (Numb. xiv. 45).

Chased you, as bees do,] Which pursue those that disturb their hives in great swarms, and with great fury (Ps. cxviii. 12). For though bees have very small bodies, yet they have great spirits, and a vast force, as Bochart observes in many instances, to make out the aptness of this comparison, in his Hierozoic. par. ii. lib. iv. cap. 10.

Destroyed you in Seir,] It seems they fled towards that part of Idumea where mount Seir was; which they afterward compassed many days (ii. 1), when they removed from Kadesh-barnea. And there some of them fell by the sword of the Amorites, who were the fiercest of all the people of Canaan, and might on that account, be well compared to bees, who cease not their pursuit till they have fixed their stings.

Even unto Hormah,] See Numb. xiv. 45.

Ver. 45. Ye returned.] After the Amorites retreated.

Wept before the Lord;] Beseeching him to go along with you, and assist you to conquer the land.

But the Lord would not hearken to your voice,] To consent that they should now go and possess the promised land, or stay near to it; but remained fixed in his resolution, that they should go back again, but the LORD would not hearken to your voice, nor give ear unto you.

46 So ye abode in Kadesh many days, according unto the days that ye abode there.

and wander in the wilderness as long as they lived.

Ver. 46. So ye abode in Kadesh many days,] God had commanded Moses to lead them into the wilderness, by the way of the Red Sea, the very next morning after their mutiny upon the return of the spies (Numb. xiv. 25). But they prevented this, by their early rising next morning to assault the Amorites in the mountain (ver. 40.) After which they being discomfited, he permitted them to stay some time here to bemoan themselves. But how long, it is not certain; for sometime the cloud stayed but two days, sometime a month, sometime a year, before it stirred from the tabernacle: which was the sign of their removal (Numb. x. 22). And in some stations, it is likely, they stayed several years: for from the time of their removal from Kadesh-barnea, till they came to Mount Hor, which was thirty-seven years, we find but nineteen stations (see Numb. xxxiii. 18—37).

According unto the days that ye abode there,] Some expound it, as long as they did in all the rest of their stations, i. e. nineteen years, as the Jews compute in Seder Olam. But, as the learned Dr. Lightfoot thinks it signifies, "as long as they did at Mount Sinai;" and so they stayed near a whole year, as they had done at Sinai. But the most simple explication seems to be, that they tarried here so long after this, as they had done before it, at least forty days; which was the time the spies spent in searching out the land. Though there is no necessity to confine it to that number, but simply to interpret it, that "as they stayed there many days before this mutiny, so they did as many after it."

CHAPTER II.

1 The story is continued, that they were not to meddle with the Edomites, 9 nor with the Moabites, 17 nor with the Ammonites, 24 but Sihon the Amorite was subdued by them.

1 THEN we turned, and took our journey into the wilderness by the way of the Red sea, as the LORD spake unto me: and we compassed mount Seir many days.

CHAP. II.

Ver. 1. We turned, &c.] From the borders of the land of Canaan, to go southward, till they came to the very shore of the Red Sea. Which, as David Chytræus computes it, was thirty German miles from Kadesh-barnea.

As the Lord spake unto me;] According to the command formerly mentioned, Numb. xiv. 25.

We compassed Mount Seir] The mountainous country of Edom; whereof Mount Seir was but a part. For when they came to Ezion-Gaber, which was upon the Red Sea, they were still in the country of Edom (1 Kings ix. 26. 2 Chron. viii. 17). For it stretched a long way: from the confines of Canaan, unto Elath and Ezion-Gaber, on the Red Sea.

Many days.] Some think that they were marching to and fro along the borders of this country, all the time they spent in this removal, till they returned to go towards Canaan again. So that by many days they understand the whole thirty-eight years which passed between their departure from Kadesh-barnea

2 And the LORD spake unto me, saying,

3 Ye have compassed this mountain long enough: turn you northward.

4 And command thou the people, saying, Ye till they came over the brook Zered (ver. 14). For when they were at Ezion-Gaber (which was farthest from Canaan), they were, as I said, upon the borders of Edom; and so they were when they came back again, seven-and-thirty years after at Mount Hor (Numb. xx. 23. xxi. 4). But this must not be understood, as if all the stations mentioned Numb. xxxiii. after they left Kadesh-barnea till they came hither again, were near to the country of Edom; some of them might be remote, though they all lay in that wilderness, which reached from one end of Idumea to the other.

Ver. 2. The Lord spake unto me,] This was in the end of the thirty-ninth year after their coming out of Egypt; when they had spent thirty-seven years going to and fro since their departure from Kadesh-barnea. In all which time he gives us no account what passed either in the foregoing book, or in this: but only sets down the places of their abode, as I observed in the thirty-third of Numbers.

Ver. 3. Ye have compassed this mountain] i. e. The mountainous country of Edom, mentioned ver. 1.

are to pass through the coast of your brethren the children of Esau, which dwell in Seir; and they shall be afraid of you: take ye good heed unto yourselves therefore:

5 Meddle not with them; for I will not give you of their land, no, not so much as a foot breadth; because I have given mount Seir unto Esau for a possession.

6 Ye shall buy meat of them for money, that ye may eat; and ye shall also buy water of them for money, that ye may drink.

7 For the LORD thy God hath blessed thee in all the works of thy hand: he knoweth thy walking through this great wilderness: these forty years the LORD thy God hath been with thee; thou hast lacked nothing.

Turn you northward.] From Ezion-Gaber, which was in the south, towards the north, that is, directly towards the land of Canaan.

Ver. 4. Ye are to pass through the coast of your brethren.] For they went from Ezion-Gaber to Kadesh (Numb. xx. 1), and from thence to Mount Hor (ver. 22, which was in the edge of the land of Edom, Numb. xxxiii. 37), and from thence they travelled to compass the land of Edom (xxi. 4), i. e. the eastern quarter of it. So that though they did not pass through the coast of Edom, as we translate it, yet they passed by it, and very near unto it: as the particle beth frequently signifies (Gen. xxxvii. 13. Josh. v. 13. 1 Sam. xxix. 1). Though they may be truly said to "pass through their coast," if thereby we understand their border, or the confines of their country.

They shall be afraid of you.] Lest, wanting a settlement, the Israelites should seize upon their country. Accordingly we find, they raised all the force they could make to oppose them, Numb. xx. 20.

Take ye good heed unto yourselves.] Let not that encourage you to assault them.

Ver. 5. Meddle not with them;] Make not the least attempt upon them.

Not so much as a foot breadth;] i. e. Not the smallest portion.

Because I have given mount Seir unto Esau.] So Joshua saith expressly, Josh. xxiv. 4, wherein he made good the blessing of Isaac (Gen. xxvii. 39).

Ver. 6.] If you have a mind to any provision that their country affords, you shall not take it, but purchase it; as they did their very water (ver. 29), which was a scarce thing in those dry countries. And so the Israelites offered to do, when they treated with them about a passage through their country (Numb. xx. 19).

Ver. 7. For the Lord thy God hath blessed thee.] Or through the Lord hath blessed thee, &c. that is, though there is no need of it, God having abundantly provided you with all things necessary. But if we follow our translation, the sense is plain; "You have wherewith to buy of them what you need or desire; therefore do not take it away by force."

He knoweth thy walking.] Hath directed and prospered thee (as the word knoweth signifies in many places, Ps. i. 6. xxxi. 7), in thy travels through a dangerous wilderness.

Thou hast lacked nothing.] He had mercifully provided for them so constantly, that he let them want nothing necessary for their support. This was the sum of the argument why they should not molest the Edomites, nor take any thing by stealth from them, because they were in no need; and God had given that country to the children of Esau, as he intended to give Canaan to the Israelites.

8 And when we passed by from our brethren the children of Esau, which dwelt in Seir, through the way of the plain from Elath, and from Ezion-gaber, we turned and passed by the way of the wilderness of Moab.

9 And the LORD said unto me, Distress not the Moabites, neither contend with them in battle: for I will not give thee of their land for a possession; because I have given Ar unto the children of Lot for a possession.

10 The Emims dwelt therein in times past, a people great, and many, and tall, as the Anakims;

11 Which also were accounted giants, as the Anakims; but the Moabites call them Emims.

12 The Horims also dwelt in Seir beforetime;

Their being in the wilderness forty years is mentioned also viii. 2, xxix. 5, besides other places of Scripture. For, from the fifteenth day of the first month, in which their fathers came out of Egypt (Numb. xxxiii. 5) to the tenth day of the same month in which they went over Jordan into Canaan (Josh. iv. 19), there were but five days wanting of complete forty years. I cannot but here note also, that this is one of those places wherein Onkelos mentions the Memra, i. e. Word of Jehovah, which can signify nothing but a Divine person: for thus he translates these words, "The Word of the Lord thy God hath been thy helper; thou hast not wanted any thing."

Ver. 8. Of the plain] i. e. Through the wilderness of Zin.

From Elath, and from Ezion-gaber.] Two places upon the Red Sea; the last of which [Ezion-Gaber] signifies as much as the spine, or backbone of a man. So called, because there were great ragged rocks in that port (as Bochart observes), like those at Dyrrachium in Macedonia; which had its name also from thence (lib. i. Canaan, cap. 44).

We turned.] After they were denied passage through their country, and had gone through those stations mentioned, Numb. xxxiii. 41, 42, &c.

Passed—the wilderness of Moab.] See Numb. xxi. 11. Going by the east side of their country (Judges xi. 18).

Ver. 9. Distress not the Moabites.] He would not have them force their way through his country; because the king of Moab refused them a passage, as the king of Edom had done (Judges xi. 17). For their country now was but small, since Sihon king of the Amorites had taken from them all the best of it, which lay between Arnon and Jabbok; of which the Israelites had possessed themselves by the conquest of Sihon. So that they had only that portion remaining which lay upon the Dead Sea; which David, in aftertimes, subdued.

I will not give thee of their land.] No more than of Edom (ver. 5).

Because I have given Ar.] It is likely the capital city gave name to the whole country about it. At least Ar (which was the chief city of Moab, Numb. xxi. 15, 28,) is put here for all the land of Moab; as Mount Seir for all the land of Edom (ver. 1).

Unto the children of Lot.] Though the Moabites were now a wicked people; yet for their pious ancestor's sake, from whom they were descended, God would not have them dispossessed.

Ver. 10. The Emims dwelt therein.] A terrible people, as the very name imports, both for their number, and for their strength, being of a large size, like Anakims (see Gen. xiv. 5).

Ver. 11. Which also were accounted giants, as the

but the children of Esau succeeded them, when they had destroyed them from before them, and dwelt in their stead; as Israel did unto the land of his possession, which the LORD gave unto them.

13 Now rise up, said I, and get you over the brook Zered. And we went over the brook Zered.

14 And the space in which we came from Kadesh-barnea, until we were come over the brook Zered, was thirty and eight years; until all the generation of the men of war were wasted out from among the host, as the LORD swore unto them.

15 For indeed the hand of the LORD was against them, to destroy them from among the host, until they were consumed.

16 ¶ So it came to pass, when all the men of Anakims, &c.] Which seems to have been their name; or else Rephaim: but to distinguish them from others of that name in Canaan, the Moabites called them Emims.

Ver. 12. The Horims also dwell in Seir] They were the ancient inhabitants of Mount Seir; as the Emims were of the country of Moab (Gen. xiv. 6. xxxvi. 20).

But the children of Esau succeeded them,] Planted themselves in that mountain.

When they had destroyed them] When the children of Esau expelled the Horites, or the children of Lot the Emims, is nowhere recorded; nor who were their leaders in these expeditions. But they seem to be here remembered, as an encouragement to the Israelites to hope that they might drive out the inhabitants of Canaan (who were not stronger than these), as they had already driven the Amorites out of the country of Sihon, as it here follows.

As Israel did unto the land of his possession,] Some have argued from hence, that this book was not written by Moses, but by somebody else, after they had got possession of the land of Canaan. But it is manifest, this may relate to what they had done already in dispossessing Sihon king of the Amorites, and Og king of Bashan, of their country: which, it is expressly said, Moses had given for a tribute to the tribe of Reuben and Gad, and the half tribe of Manasseh, and that by God's direction, Numb. xxxii. 33. xxxiv. 14, 15. and in this book, xxix. 8. This hath been observed by many; particularly by Huetius, in his Demonstratio Evangelica, propos. iv. cap. 14. n. 15.

Ver. 13. The brook Zered.] Which elsewhere we translate "the valley of Zered" (see Numb. xxi. 12).

Ver. 14. The space was—thirty and eight years;] For it is evident, by the story in Numbers, that they came to Kadesh-barnea about the fourth month of the second year after they came out of Egypt (see upon Numb. xii. 16). And if we suppose that they removed from hence in the seventh or eighth month of that year, it is certain that they could not come to this brook till the seventh or eighth month of the fortieth year. For Aaron died at Mount Hor on the first day of the fifth month of this year; and we must allow two or three months' time, for all that followed between that and this, viz. the conquest of king Arad, and of Sihon, and Og, &c.

The generation of the men of war] So they were called, who were above twenty years old (Numb. i. 3).

Were wasted] Utterly consumed, so that not one of them was left (Numb. xxvi. 64, 65).

war were consumed and dead from among the people.

17 That the LORD spake unto me, saying,

18 Thou art to pass over through Ar, the coast of Moab, this day:

19 And when thou comest nigh over against the children of Ammon, distress them not, nor meddle with them: for I will not give thee of the land of the children of Ammon any possession; because I have given it unto the children of Lot for a possession.

20 (That also was accounted a land of giants: giants dwelt therein in old time; and the Ammonites call them Zamzummims;

21 A people great, and many, and tall, as the Anakims; but the LORD destroyed them before them; and they succeeded them, and dwelt in their stead:

As the Lord swore] See Numb. xiv. 23, 29.

Ver. 15. The hand of the Lord was against them,] Some of them, it is likely, died a natural death; but many of them might, in the course of nature, have lived longer, if God had not several ways cut them off before their time.

Until they were consumed.] By one plague or other, which God sent among them: so that a great deal of their time, in the thirty eight-years before mentioned, was spent, it is likely, in burying and mourning for their dead.

Ver. 16, 17.] This was spoken, it is probable, just as they passed over the brook Zered, or in their next station, at Dibon-Gad (Numb. xxxiii. 45).

Ver. 18. To pass over] Or rather, to pass by the border of Moab: for they were not permitted to come into their country, ver. 9 (see upon ver. 4).

Ver. 19. When thou comest nigh over against the children of Ammon,] As they did after the conquest of Sihon king of the Amorites; whose country bordered upon the Ammonites (Numb. xxi. 13. 24).

Distress them not] The same command with that about the Edomites and Moabites (ver. 5. 9).

I will not give thee of the land] As he had said before of the land of Moab (ver. 9).

I have given it unto the children of Lot] To the descendants of his youngest son; as he had done the country of Moab to the children of the eldest.

Ver. 20. That also was accounted a land of giants, &c.] Was called the country of giants, or Rephaim; for people so called inhabited it.

The Ammonites call them Zamzummims; Changed their names, it is probable, from Zuzims (see Gen. xiv. 5), as they were called before, into Zamzummims. But why they were called either by the one name or the other, it is but conjectured. Some conceive they were called Zuzims from their swiftness, or nimble running, which, in warriors, was a quality always highly valued; and Zamzummims from their abominable wickedness or their craft and cunning in doing mischief.

Ver. 21. A people great, &c.] The same description which he gave of the Emims, ver. 10.

The Lord destroyed them before them;] i. e. Before the Ammonites; who expelled them out of their country, and it is like, cut off the most of them.

They succeeded them, and dwell in their stead:] This is so often repeated, to possess the minds of the Israelites with a sense of God's providence, which rules every where: displacing one people, and settling another in their stead; and fixing their bounds also, which they shall not pass without his leave.

22 As he did to the children of Esau, which dwelt in Seir, when he destroyed the Horims from before them; and they succeeded them, and dwelt in their stead even unto this day :

23 And the Avims which dwelt in Hazerim, even unto Azzah, the Caphtorims, which came forth out of Caphtor, destroyed them, and dwelt in their stead.)

24 ¶ Rise ye up, take your journey, and pass over the river Arnon : behold, I have given into thine hand Sihon the Amorite, king of Heshbon, and his land : begin to possess it, and contend with him in battle.

25 This day will I begin to put the dread of thee and the fear of thee upon the nations that are under the whole heaven, who shall hear report of thee, and shall tremble, and be in anguish because of thee.

26 ¶ And I sent messengers out of the wilderness of Kedemoth unto Sihon king of Heshbon with words of peace, saying, 27 Let me pass through thy land : I will go along by the highway, I will neither turn unto the right hand nor to the left.

28 Thou shalt sell me meat for money, that I may eat; and give me water for money, that I may drink : only I will pass through on my feet;

29 (As the children of Esau which dwell in Seir, and the Moabites which dwell in Ar, did unto me;) until I shall pass over Jordan into the land which the LORD our God giveth us.

30 But Sihon king of Heshbon would not let us pass by him : for the LORD thy God hardened his spirit, and made his heart obstinate, that he might deliver him into thy hand, as appeareth this day.

31 And the LORD said unto me, Behold, I have begun to give Sihon and his land before

Ver. 22.] He repeats this (which he had said before, ver. 12.) because it was a fresher instance of God's disposal of countries unto what people he pleases; and nearly touched the Israelites, because they were their brethren.

Ver. 23. The Avims which dwell in Hazerim, even unto Azzah.] Unto which he adds an instance, which seems to be elder than any of the former, concerning a people called Avims; who inhabited some part of the land of Canaan, whither they were going. For though we do not read of Hazerim in any other place, yet Azzah, i. e. Gaza, was in the country of the Philistines; who expelled these Avims. And David Chytræus thinks that Hazerim was a town afterward in the tribe of Judah, called Hazagaddah, Josh. xv. 27.

The Caphtorims.] That is, some people of Cappadocia; who were near of kin to the Philistines (see Gen. x. 14).

Destroyed them, and dwell in their stead.] Concerning which, see in the place above named. Unto which I shall only add, that the Avims being expelled out of Canaan by the Caphtorims, went, it is very probable, over Euphrates and settled there; till the king of Assyria brought some of them back again, to plant the country of Samaria; 2 Kings xvii. 31. where we translate this word Avites (see Bochart, in his Phaleg. lib. iv. cap. 36).

Ver. 24. Rise ye up.] See Numb. xxi. 13, 14.

I have given unto thy hand Sihon—king of Heshbon, &c.] You yourselves shall do to him, what your brethren the children of Esau did to the Horites, and the Moabites to the Emims, and the children of Ammon to the Zamzummins, and the Caphtorims to the Avims. By which their faith might still be more confirmed, that the people of Canaan, though never so mighty, should not be able to stand before them.

Ver. 25. This day will I begin to put the dread of thee—upon the nations.] Especially upon the Canaanites, who were struck, no doubt, with terror by this conquest, as they had been by all that befell the Egyptians (Josh. 10, 11).

Who shall hear report of thee.] This explains what he means by the hyperbolical expression before going, "the nations under the whole heaven;" that is, as many as shall hear of these things.

Be in anguish.] As women in travail are.

Ver. 26. I sent messengers out of the wilderness of Kedemoth.] There is a city of this name mentioned by Joshua, xiii. 18. from whence this wilderness had its denomination. Some take it to be the same with that called Jeshimon, Numb. xxi. 20.

Unto Sihon—with words of peace.] A friendly message, desiring there might be no quarrel between him and the Israelites, who desired nothing but the common offices of humanity.

Ver. 27. Let me pass through thy land.] Which was the direct way to the fords of Jordan.

I will go along by the highway.] Not turning into the fields or vineyards, as it is expressed, Numb. xxi. 22. In the Hebrew the word is doubled, bederech, bederech, by the way, by the way: which seems to be a vehement affirmation, to assure them they would not stir out of the highway.

I will neither turn unto the right hand, nor to the left.] Not step aside out of the common road (called the king's highway), which was free for all people.

Ver. 28. Thou shalt sell me meat for money, &c.] They offered to pay for whatsoever they wanted; which is included in meat and drink.

Only I will pass through on my feet.] Barely have a passage through his country.

Ver. 29. As the children of Esau.] He doth not mean that they granted Israel a passage through their country; but that they did not deny to sell them meat and drink for their money, as they passed by their coasts.

Until I shall pass over Jordan.] This was said to move Sihon to consent to their desire, by letting him understand they intended nothing against his country; being secure of a settlement in the land of Canaan, unto which they prayed him to let them pass quietly.

Ver. 30. But Sihon,—would not let us pass by him.] Refused to agree to this reasonable demand.

For the Lord thy God hardened his spirit, and made his heart obstinate, &c.] Gave him over to his own inflexible humour, which was set upon violent courses; from which God did not divert him (because he intended to destroy him), but rather ordered things so, that his mind should be enraged and disturbed, and so unable to consider things prudently, and discern what belonged to his peace; which is the utmost that can be meant by hardening his spirit, and making his heart obstinate. Which, as it is a sin, cannot be ascribed unto God; but, as it is a punishment, might justly be inflicted by him upon Sihon, for his former sins.

Ver. 31. I have begun to give Sihon and his land.] This was said when Moses saw him coming out to battle against them (as it here follows in the next verse), at which time he is said to begin to give them his country, because he had absolutely resolved it; thee: begin to possess, that thou mayest inherit his land.

32 Then Sihon came out against us, he and all his people, to fight at Jahaz.

33 And the LORD our God delivered him before us; and we smote him, and his sons, and all his people.

34 And we took all his cities at that time, and utterly destroyed the men, and the women, and the little ones, of every city, we left none to remain:

35 Only the cattle we took for a prey unto and, it is probable, so confounded his forces, that they were as good as already conquered.

Before thee:] Into their power; that they might go into it at their pleasure.

Begin to possess,] In the same sense he bids Moses "begin to possess;" i. e. prepare to take possession of it (see iii. 2).

Ver. 32.] See Numb. xxi. 23.

Ver. 33.] They won the field, and killed him, his sons, and all that came out to fight with them. And R. Solomon saith his sons were like himself, very great men.

Ver. 34. We took all his cities at that time,] After this victory they took his whole country, as is related Numb. xii. 24, 25, and the cities belonging to it are mentioned xxxii. 34, 35, &c.

And utterly destroyed the men, &c.] They being part of those wicked people the Amorites; whom God had condemned to utter destruction: for the Amorites came out of Canaan, and took this country from the Moabites and the children of Ammon.

Ver. 35.] They had the Divine warrant for this, no doubt, as they had for the extirpation of the people.

Ver. 36. From Aroer, which is by the brink of the river of Arnon,] This river divided Moab from the kingdom of Sihon (Numb. xxi. 13. 24), upon which the city of Aroer stood; which was now in the possession of Sihon, though belonging formerly to the Moabites.

ourselves, and the spoil of the cities which we took.

36 From Aroer, which is by the brink of the river of Arnon, and from the city that is by the river, even unto Gilcad, there was not one city too strong for us: the LORD our God delivered all unto us:

37 Only unto the land of the children of Ammon thou camest not, nor unto any place of the river Jabbok, nor unto the cities in the mountains, nor unto whatsoever the LORD our God forbade us.

From the city that is by the river,] This some take to be the city Ar (Numb. xxi. 15). But I think these words should rather be translated, "even the city in the river;" meaning Aroer still, as a remarkable place, being encompassed with the river (Josh. xii. 2). For Ar, I think, was never in the possession of the Amorites, being the capital city of Moab.

Even unto Gilcad,] For half of Gilcad belonged to the country of Sihon (Josh. xii. 2), and was given to the tribe of Gad (Josh. xv. 2). And the other half belonged to the kingdom of Og (as we read in the same place, Josh. xii. 5), and was given to the half tribe of Manasseh (Josh. xiii. 31).

Ver. 37. Only unto the land of the children of Ammon thou camest not,] That is, into no part of their country, which was then in their possession; but all that the Amorites had taken from them was given to the Gadites (Josh. xiii. 25).

Nor unto any place of the river Jabbok,] To no place beyond that river, which was the border of the children of Ammon (Numb. xxi. 24. Josh. xii. 2).

Nor unto the cities in the mountains,] Much less into the mountainous parts of the country of the Amorites.

Nor unto whatsoever the Lord our God forbade us.] The words in the Hebrew are, "And all whatsoever the Lord our God commanded us;" i. e. not to meddle withal.

CHAPTER III.

1 The story of the conquest of Og king of Bashan. 11 The bigness of his bed. 12 The distribution of those lands to the two tribes and half. 23 Moses' prayer to enter into the land. 26 He is permitted to see it.

1 THEN we turned, and went up the way to Bashan: and Og the king of Bashan came out against us, he and all his people, to battle at Edrei.

2 And the LORD said unto me, Fear him not: for I will deliver him, and all his people, and his land, unto thy hand; and thou shalt do unto him as thou didst unto Sihon king of the Amorites, which dwelt at Heshbon.

3 So the LORD our God delivered into our hands Og also, the king of Bashan, and all his people: and we smote him until none was left to him remaining.

4 And we took all his cities at that time, there was not a city which we took not from them, threescore cities, all the region of Argob, the kingdom of Og in Bashan.

5 All these cities were fenced with high walls, gates, and bars; beside unwalled towns a great many.

6 And we utterly destroyed them, as we did unto Sihon king of Heshbon, utterly destroy-

CHAP. III.

Ver. 1.] See Numb. xxi. 33, where there are the very same words.

Ver. 2.] The same words in Numb. xxi. 34. Only there he saith, "I have delivered him into thy hand;" that is, resolved to do it. Which may interpret what is said in the foregoing chapter of this book ver. 31, concerning Sihon.

Ver. 3.] See Numb. xxi. 35.

Ver. 4. Threescore cities,] See Numb. xxxii. 41. All the region of Argob,] A small province lying between Jordan and the mountains of Gilend, a little above the sea of Tiberias: which region was afterward called Trachonitis, from the asperity of the mountains.

The kingdom of Og in Bashan,] Belonging to his kingdom in Bashan (ver. 13, and 1 Kings iv. 13).

Ver. 5.] So they are described 1 Kings iv. 13.

Ver. 6.] For they were Amorites, and therefore un-ing the men, women, and children, of every city.

7 But all the cattle, and the spoil of the cities, we took for a prey to ourselves.

8 And we took at that time out of the hand of the two kings of the Amorites the land that was on this side Jordan, from the river of Arnon unto mount Hermon;

9 (Which Hermon the Sidonians call Sirion; and the Amorites call it Shenir;)

der the curse of God; being part of the seven nations of Canaan, devoted to destruction (see ii. 34).

Ver. 7.] As they had done before, when they destroyed Sihon and his people (ii. 35).

Ver. 8. We took—the land that was on this side Jordan.] Which was given to the two tribes of Reuben and Gad, and half the tribe of Manasseh (ver. 12, 13). If men were not blinded with prejudice, they could not but see from hence, that the word beeber, in the first verse of this book, is rightly translated on this side: for beyond Jordan (as they would have it signify) in the land of Canaan, these two kings had no possessions; nor did Moses make any conquest there.

From the river of Arnon unto mount Hermon;] This river was the bounds of their country on the south: and Hermon, which was one of the mountains of Gilead (where it joins to Libanus), was their bound on the north.

Ver. 9. Which Hermon the Sidonians call Sirion;] And so it is called in Ps. xxix. 6, and joined with Libanus: for it was as much a part of Libanus as of Gilead, these two mountains there meeting together. Whence Jeremiah calls Gilead the head of Libanus (xxii. 6), because Libanus begins where Gilead ends.

The Amorites call it Shenir;] And so it is called Ezek. xxvii. 5, and had this name, as Bochart conjectures, from the multitude of wild cats which were in this mountain: for the Arabians called that creature sinar or sinar (see Hierozoicon, par. i. lib. iii. cap. 14).

Ver. 10. All the cities of the plain.] All the flat country which the LXX. thought was called Misor; for they retain here that Hebrew word.

All Gilead.] i. e. All that part of it which belonged to him; which was but half as I observed before, ii. 36.

All Bashan.] That part of his country which was properly and peculiarly called Bashan; which being the most rich and fertile (as the word signifies), gave denomination to his whole kingdom.

Unto Salehah and Edrei.] The former of these is mentioned Josh. xiii. 11 (just as it is here), as the bounds of Bashan towards Mount Hermon, or Libanus: so Chytræus, “A town in Bashan in the mountains of Libanus near to Machati.” And Edrei was the place where they fought with Og, and overthrew him (Numb. xxi. 23).

Ver. 11. For only Og—remained of the remnant of giants;] Or of the Rephaim, a very ancient people in that country (Gen. xiv. 5), who were either descended from the Amorites, or mingled with them: and Og was the very last of them; so that he and his people being destroyed, none of them remained.

His bedstead was—of iron;] Which was no unusual thing in ancient days, though far later than this. For Thucydides saith, that when the Thebans took Plateæ, they made beds of the brass and iron they found there; which they dedicated to Juno. And beds of silver and gold are mentioned by divers authors, as Huetius observes in his Demonstr. Evangel. propos. iv. cap. 14. n. 7.

10 All the cities of the plain, and all Gilead, and all Bashan, unto Salehah and Edrei, cities of the kingdom of Og in Bashan.

11 For only Og king of Bashan remained of the remnant of giants; behold, his bedstead was a bedstead of iron; is it not in Rabbath of the children of Ammon? nine cubits was the length thereof, and four cubits the breadth of it, after the cubit of a man.

12 And this land, which we possessed at that

Is it not in Rabbath of the children of Ammon?] This is thought by some to be a considerable objection against Moses being the author of this book: for how should this bedstead, say they, come to the children of Ammon in his days? No doubt, they imagine it would have remained in Bashan whilst Og lived; though, in length of time, it might be carried into the country of the Ammonites: as, if Og, fearing the worst, might not send his bed and his best furniture unto the Ammonites, knowing they would be safe among them, because the Israelites were forbid to make war upon them. Or Moses having conquered the country, and kept all the spoil (ver. 7), might not sell this, among other goods, to the children of Ammon, who preserved it in their capital city. Nobody can see an unreasonableness in either of these suppositions of the same Huetius. Nor do I see how the conjecture of another learned person (Andræus Masius, upon the twelfth of Joshua), can be confuted; which is, that the Ammonites drove out that monstrous sort of people, mentioned ii. 21. Og might possibly escape (and so is said here to be left of the remnant of the giants), who, flying hither to the Amorites, was made their king, because of his goodly presence and great valour. But the Ammonites kept his bedstead, and showed it as a monument of that illustrious victory which they got over the Rephaim, or, as they called them, the Zamzummins, in that country.

Nine cubits was the length thereof, and four cubits the breadth] This is mentioned, to show of what a vast stature Og was: for bedsteads being, according to the common custom, made a third part longer than the persons that lie in them, he was six cubits high, as Maimonides computes, that is, as high again as any other man (More Nevochim, par. ii. cap. 47), which is very sober discourse, in comparison with what other Jews say of him (see Schickard, in his Bechinah Haperuschim, p. 120).

After the cubit of a man.] According to the cubit of ordinary men, saith the same Maimonides (which is a little more than half a yard), not of Og before mentioned. But what need was there, say former objectors, to mention this; since the Israelites saw Og lie dead before them on the ground, and needed not to be told by Moses how tall he was! and therefore they conclude this was written by somebody else, in aftertimes. As if Moses did not write for the benefit of those that come after, as well as for the present generation. Who, that they might be satisfied what a vast man Og was, he left it upon record how large his bedstead was, and where it might be seen; whereby they may judge of his stature. Besides, there were in the present generation great numbers of children, old men, women, and servants, who could not go to see Og lie at length upon the field: but by this means were instructed from what a terrible enemy God had delivered them.

They that question the truth of this relation, may read, if they be able, what the learned Huetius hath at large discoursed concerning men of a portentous bigness in all countries (in his Questiones Alnetanzæ, time, from Aroer, which is by the river Arnon, and half mount Gilead, and the cities thereof, gave I unto the Reubenites and to the Gadites.

13 And the rest of Gilead, and all Bashan, being the kingdom of Og, gave I unto the half tribe of Manasseh; all the region of Argob, with all Bashan, which was called the land of giants.

24 Jair the son of Manasseh took all the country of Argob unto the coasts of Geshuri and Maachathi; and called them after his own name, Bashan-havoth-jair, unto this day.

15 And I gave Gilead unto Machir.

16 And unto the Reubenites and unto the Gadites I gave from Gilead even unto the river Arnon half the valley, and the border even unto the river Jabbok, which is the border of the children of Ammon;

17 The plain also, and Jordan, and the coast thereof, from Chinnereth even unto the sea of the plain, even the salt sea, under Ashdoth-pisgah eastward.

18 ¶ And I commanded you at that time, saying, The LORD your God hath given you this land to possess it: ye shall pass over armed before your brethren the children of Israel, all that are meet for the war.

lib. ii. cap. 12. n. 3), of which no man can doubt who is not resolved to disbelieve all the world. In his Demonstratio Evangelica also he observes, that Homer makes Tityon, when he was dead, to have lain stretched out upon (not nine cubits, but) nine acres of ground:

—ἐπ' ἑνέα χεῖρο πελαδρι.

Which hyperbole may excuse the Jewish rabbins, when they say that Og was nine cubits long when he lay in his cradle (see propos. iv. cap. 8. n. 4).

Ver. 12. By the river Arnon.] See ii. 36.

Half mount Gilead—gave I unto the Reubenites and to the Gadites.] See Numb. xxxii. 34, 35, &c. but especially Josh. xiii. 15, &c., where he distinctly relates what portion of this country was given to the Reubenites; and ver. 23, 24, &c., what was given to the Gadites. And it appears, that none of Gilead belonged to the Reubenites; but the Gadites had one half of it, as the Manassites had the other.

Ver. 13. The rest of Gilead.] Which was not given to the Gadites.

All Bashan, being the kingdom of Og.] That is, all that was taken from Og, of which he was king.

All the region of Argob.] It is repeated again, lest any one should think that Argob, which was a distinct province in that kingdom, was not given to them by this grant (see vor. 4).

Called the land of giants.] Where the Rephaims formerly inhabited; of whom Og was the last (see Gen. xiv. 5, compared with xv. 20. Josh. xiii. 12).

Ver. 14. Jair the son of Manasseh took all the country of Argob.] This is one reason why he gave this country to them (see Numb. xxxii. 41).

Geshuri and Maachathi.] We had no mention of these places before; which were in the northern part of this country, as appears from Josh. xii. 4, 5. xiii. 11. But the people of these places they could not expel (Josh. xiii. 13).

Called them after his own name.] Numb. xxxii. 4.

Unto this day.] From whence, likewise, cavils are raised against Moses being the author of this book: when the most that can be concluded from hence is, that, upon the revising of these books by Ezra, he put in these words to certify the reader, that still they retained this name; as somebody, no doubt, added the history of Moses' death at the end of this book. This the greatest defenders of the authority of these books, as written by Moses himself, make no scruple to allow; particularly Huetius, and since him Hermannus Witzius, in his Miscellanea Sacra, lib. i. cap. 14. sect. 47. But there is no necessity to yield so much; for Moses might say this himself, though it was not long before he wrote this book. For so the holy writers do sometimes mention places, which had their name but newly given them, from a particular fact, that posterity might know the original of it (see Acts i. 19).

Ver. 15. I gave Gilead.] All that was not possessed by the Gadites.

Unto Machir.] To the posterity of Machir (Numb. xxxii. 40).

Ver. 16. Unto the Reubenites, and unto the Gadites.] Here is a more exact description of that part of the country, which was given to the other two tribes.

I gave from Gilead.] Half of which, as I observed, was given to the Gadites (ver. 12).

Even unto the river Arnon.] Which was the bounds of the country towards Moab (see ii. 36).

Half the valley.] The same word in the Hebrew language, signifies both a valley and a brook or river; and being translated in the foregoing words, the river, it should be so here likewise, half the river; that is, to the middle of the river Arnon; by which the bounds of their country are most exactly set. And thus not only the LXX. and the Vulgar, but Onkelos also translates it, "the middle of the torrent;" yea, we ourselves also in the twelfth of Josh. ii. where there are the same words, which in the Hebrew run thus, "unto the river Arnon, the midst of the river:" where the city of Aroer stood, encompassed by the river, as I observed in the foregoing chapter, ver. 36.

And the border.] Something is understood, viz. went (as the phrase is Josh. xv. 6, 7, &c., or reached, or some such word. Or the meaning must be, "the country bordering upon that river."

Unto the river Jabbok.] This river was the other boundary of the country.

Ver. 17. The plain also, and Jordan.] The flat country towards the river Jordan: which was the western bounds of this country of Sion; as the river Arnon was the southern, and the river Jabbok the northern; the country of the children of Ammon being on the east.

The coast thereof, from Chinnereth.] The word thereof is not in the Hebrew: therefore these words may be better rendered "the coast of Chinnereth." Called "the Sea of Chinnereth," Josh. xii. 3. xiii. 27. It lying upon a country and a city called by that name (Josh. xi. 2. xix. 35), which gave the name to this sea, called in the New Testament, "the Sea of Galilee," and "the Sea of Genesareth," and at last "the Sea of Tiberias;" in honour of the emperor Tiberius (see upon Numb. xxxiv. 11).

Even unto—the salt sea.] The Dead Sea, as it is called in other places; which, before the burning of Sodom and Gomorrah, had been a most pleasant plain.

Under Ashdoth-pisgah.] The name of a city in this country (Josh. xiii. 20).

Eastward.] Which lay east of the Salt Sea and Jordan; which was the western bounds, as I said, of this country.

Ver. 18. I commanded you at that time.] That is he gave this charge to the two tribes of Reuben and 19 But your wives, and your little ones, and your cattle, (for I know that ye have much cattle,) shall abide in your cities which I have given you;

20 Until the LORD have given rest unto your brethren, as well as unto you, and until they also possess the land which the LORD your God hath given them beyond Jordan: and then shall ye return every man unto his possession, which I have given you.

21 ¶ And I commanded Joshua at that time, saying, Thine eyes have seen all that the LORD your God hath done unto these two kings: so shall the LORD do unto all the kingdoms whither thou passest.

22 Ye shall not fear them: for the LORD your God he shall fight for you.

23 And I besought the LORD at that time, saying,

24 O Lord God, thou hast begun to shew thy servant thy greatness, and thy mighty hand: for what God is there in heaven or in earth, that can do according to thy works, and according to thy might?

25 I pray thee, let me go over, and see the good land that is beyond Jordan, that goodly mountain, and Lebanon.

26 But the LORD was wroth with me for your sakes, and would not hear me: and the LORD said unto me, Let it suffice thee; speak no more unto me of this matter.

27 Get thee up into the top of Pisgah, and lift up thine eyes westward, and northward, and southward, and eastward, and behold it with thine eyes: for thou shalt not go over this Jordan.

28 But charge Joshua, and encourage him, and strengthen him: for he shall go over before this people, and he shall cause them to inherit the land which thou shalt see.

29 So we abode in the valley over against Beth-peor.

Gad, and to the half tribe of Manasseh before mentioned.

The Lord your God hath given you this land, &c.] According to their own desire: but on condition they should help their brethren to conquer the land of Canaan (see Numb. xxxii. 20—22).

Ver. 19.] See Numb. xxxii. 16. 24. 26.

Ver. 20.] Brought them to a settlement in the land of Canaan, and given them a peaceable possession of it. After which, we read that Joshua dismissed these tribes, and sent them to their wives and children, Josh. xxii. 4.

Ver. 21. I commanded Joshua at that time,] About that time, when by God's order he appointed Joshua to be his successor, and took him to be his associate in the government (Numb. xxvii. 18, &c).

Thine eyes have seen, &c.] This seems to be the preface to the charge, which, by God's command he gave to Joshua at that time (Numb. xxvii. 19. 23).

Ver. 22.] This is part of the charge itself; which he had heard him give all the people eight-and-thirty years ago (i. 21. 29, 30).

Ver. 23.] Being told by God at the same time (Numb. xxvii. 12, 13), that he should shortly die, and only see the land of Canaan, but not enter into it, Moses made his humble supplication to God that he would not execute the sentence which he had denounced against him. For the word besought signifies supplication to one that is offended.

Ver. 24. Thou hast begun to shew thy servant thy greatness,] In subduing the two kings of the Amorites.

For what God is there in heaven,] He speaks according to the language of those times, when men worshipped many gods, of several sorts: none of which, he acknowledges, were able to bring to pass such things as the Lord had done.

Ver. 25. I pray thee, let me go over, and see the good land] To see is here to enjoy it, as the rest of the Israelites were to do: for God bade him to go up into a mountain and behold it; but threatened he should not enter into it. Which threatening he might well think was reversible, as others had been against the people of Israel upon his prayer for them, though they had more highly offended the Divine Majesty than he had done. For though he doubted at the first, especially when he saw no water come out of the rock at the first stroke; yet he presently recovered himself, and smote it the second time, believing God would relieve them.

That goodly mountain,] Most think that he desired to go so far into it, as to see the place where God intended to settle his divine presence: which proved to be Mount Moriah. But nothing was known of this, a long time after; unless we suppose it was revealed unto him, that where Abraham offered Isaac, there the Lord would dwell. It seems to me, that he means that goodly country full of noble mountains: for thus the word mountain is often used, particularly Numb. xiii. 29, where the spies say the "Amorites dwell in the mountain," i. e. in that mountainous part of Canaan.

Lebanon,] He desired to go through the whole country as far as Lebanon; which was the most northerly part of it (famous for goodly cedars), as the mountain before spoken of was in the south of Canaan.

Ver. 26. The Lord was wroth] See i. 37.

And would not hear me:] Refused to grant my petition.

Speak no more unto me of this matter,] This suggests that Moses renewed his petition, after the first denial; and more earnestly begged this favour of God: which he could not obtain; but was enjoined silence. This argues great displeasure; and is mentioned by him as an admonition to the Israelites, to be fearful to offend the Divine Majesty.

Ver. 27. Get thee up into the top of Pisgah,] See what I have noted upon Numb. xxvii. 12.

Lift up thine eyes westward, &c.] Take a full view of the country in all the quarters of it; which might be seen from the top of this mountain, which was called Nebo (see xxxiv. 1—3)

Ver. 28. But charge Joshua, &c.] Bid him not doubt that I will bring my people thither under his conduct, though I deny thee entrance into it.

Ver. 29.] It is likely that there was a temple built to Baal-Peor, which fronted this valley; for so Beth signifies, a house or temple of Peor. Which gave the name to a city wherein it stood; which was part of the inheritance of the Reubenites (Josh. xiii. 20). In this valley Moses was buried, xxxiv. 6, where he made this most excellent exhortation to all the people.

CHAPTER IV.

1 An exhortation to obedience. 41 Moses appointeth the three cities of refuge on that side Jordan.

1 Now therefore hearken, O Israel, unto the statutes and unto the judgments, which I teach you, to do them, that ye may live, and go in and possess the land which the LORD God of your fathers giveth you.

2 Ye shall not add unto the word which I command you, neither shall ye diminish ought from it, that ye may keep the commandments of the LORD your God which I command you.

3 Your eyes have seen what the LORD did because of Baal-peor: for all the men that followed Baal-peor, the LORD thy God hath destroyed them from among you.

4 But ye that did cleave unto the LORD your God are alive every one of you this day.

5 Behold, I have taught you statutes and judgments, even as the LORD my God commanded me, that ye should do so in the land whither ye go to possess it.

6 Keep therefore and do them; for this is

CHAP. IV.

Ver. 1. Hearken.] Having commemorated several benefits which God had bestowed upon them, since their coming out of Egypt, and the giving of the law at Mount Sinai, with several severe punishments which he had inflicted on them for their disobedience to it, Moses proceeds now to exhort them earnestly to the observance of it.

Unto the statutes.] These seem to be such laws as concerned the worship of God.

And unto the judgments.] And then these were such as concerned their dealings one with another. Which two words comprehend all that is signified by testimonies and precepts also, in other places.

Which I teach you.] Which he was about to set before them; and press upon their practice.

That ye may live.] Not perish as their forefathers had done in their rebellion; but be happy, and enjoy what God had promised, and was ready now to bestow upon them.

Ver. 2. Ye shall not add unto the word which I command you, neither shall ye diminish ought from it.] This is thought by some to signify, that they should not make the least alteration in the laws he had given them, about the rites of Divine worship, and abstinence from several meats, and such like things; which were distinctive marks, whereby they were separated from other nations to be a peculiar people to him. Thus Chaskuni interprets these words, "Thou shalt not add fear, upon the fear of the blessed God." That is, any other worship to the Divine worship prescribed by these laws, nor diminish that worship: which interpretation seems to be warranted, by what follows: "Thy eyes have seen what the Lord thy God did, because of Baal-peor." But in the words before going (which introduce these), judgments being mentioned as well as statutes, there must be a larger sense of this injunction, which relates to all the laws of God: and the meaning seems to be, Ye shall not transgress any of these precepts, either by doing any thing contrary to them, which was to add; or omitting any thing which they required, which was to diminish. Thus Grotius interprets it, upon 2 Cor. xi. 24. Addere ad legem est facere quod lex vetat, diminuerè est omittere quod lex jubet. But which way soever we take it, nothing is more certain than that this prohibition preserved these books from any alteration, since the time they were written: for the whole body of the people acknowledging their Divine authority, none of them dared to change any thing, either by addition or diminution. Of which there is a wonderful instance in the people that came out of Assyria (in the room of the Israelites, who were transported thither), to inhabit the country of Samaria; who receiving this law, their posterity have kept it all along to this day, as uncorrupted as the Jews themselves have done; although they were their mortal enemies, and have been exposed to all the changes and revolutions that can befall a nation during the interval of two thousand and four hundred years. Thus the most learned Dr. Alix observes, in his Reflections upon the last Four Books of Moses, p. 144. And I do not see, why the perfection of the Scripture, without the oral law of the Jews, should not be thought to be established by these words, as another learned person (J. Wagenseil) understands them, in his Confut. Carminis Lipmanni, p. 585. Yet, as the forenamed Chaskuni notes, it does not seem reasonable to conclude from hence, that they were prohibited to add any constitutions as a hedge and fence to the law; or as an explication of it, when the sense was doubtful (see Mr. Thorndike, in his Rites of the Church in a Christian State, p. 180, &c.).

That ye may keep the commandments of the Lord your God.] This justifies the explication I gave of the foregoing words, as respecting all God's laws; and xii. 33, makes it more plain. And, indeed, God being their lawgiver, it was the highest presumption to make any alteration in any of his laws.

Ver. 3. Your eyes have seen what the Lord did because of Baal-Peor, &c.] How he cut off twenty-four thousand by a plague, and by the hand of justice, who had been guilty of idolatry by the enticements of the Midianitish women (Numb. xxv. 5. 9). Which seems to be a reason, why they should take a special care about the worship of God; that nothing was done contrary to the laws he had ordained concerning it.

The Lord thy God hath destroyed them.] The judges put to death all those that they knew to be guilty; and the hand of God found out all the rest: so that there was not a man of them left, who was not swept away by the pestilence.

Ver. 4. But ye that did cleave unto the Lord.] Did not depart from this worship, but bewailed the apostasy of some of their brethren (Numb. xxv. 6).

Are alive.] A singular providence watched over them, to preserve them in such good health, that not one in so many thousands was dead since that time. Nor in the war with the Midianites, wherein they slew all the males, did they lose so much as one man (Numb. xxxi. 7. 49).

Ver. 5. I have taught you statutes.] See ver. 1. Even as the Lord my God commanded me.] Sincerely and uprightly, without adding any thing of myself, or diminishing any thing that he said.

That ye should do so in the land.] To be the rule of your life, when ye come into the land of Canaan.

your wisdom and your understanding in the sight of the nations, which shall hear all these statutes, and say, Surely this great nation is a wise and understanding people.

7 For what nation is there so great, who hath God so nigh unto them, as the Lord our God is in all things that we call upon him for?

8 And what nation is there so great, that hath statutes and judgments so righteous as all this law, which I set before you this day?

Ver. 6. Keep therefore and do them;] It is your interest to observe them, as you will soon find by experience; which will teach you, that it is not only the wisest course in itself, but will get you the reputation of being a wise people among all your neighbours.

Which shall hear all these statutes,] There being mention before (ver. 1. 5) of judgments as well as statutes, and here only of the latter, Abarbinel thence infers, That even those laws which depended wholly upon the will and pleasure of God, and for which they could give no reason (for such they understood by chukkim), would procure them very good honour, if they were carefully observed. For the nations seeing how wonderfully they prospered, would be apt to impute it to these extraordinary prescriptions which they followed. Just, saith he, as a physician, who cures desperate diseases, by some small trifling remedies (as they seem to others), is highly applauded for the profoundness of his knowledge and wisdom. But Maimonides takes this word statutes to comprehend all the laws of God; and undertakes to show that all the six hundred and thirteen precepts have a wise end in them, for the profit and benefit of those that observe them; either to beget some wholesome opinion in their mind, or to pull out some perverse one; either to institute some good order, or to take away iniquity, &c. (see More Novechim, par. iii. cap. 31).

Surely this great nation is a wise and understanding people.] Who continued in safety, liberty, and prosperity, abounding with all manner of blessings, while they continued all to go up to worship one God sincerely at one place, at certain set times, as if the whole nation was but one family. All the rest of their laws, also, were admirably fitted to unite them unto God, and one to another; and consequently, to make them appear a wise people in the eyes of other nations; whose writers have not only highly magnified Moses, but their lawgivers have transcribed several of his laws into their own constitutions. This appears by the old Attic laws, and those of the twelve tables, as many learned men have observed; nay, the oracle, reported by Porphyry, in Eusebius's Præparatio Evangelica, lib. ix. cap. 10, thus extols this nation:—

Μοῖνα Χαλδαῖοι σοφῶν λόγων ἢ δ' ἄρ' Ἐβραῖοι
 Αὐτὸ γίνεθλον Ἀναστει σεβιζόμενοι Θεῶν ἀγνῶς.

“The Chaldeans and the Hebrews (who came from Chaldea) are the only wise people, who worship God, the Eternal King, in a pure manner.” And the oracle of Apollo Clarius, recorded by Macrobius, lib. i. Saturnal. cap. 18, is no less remarkable:

Φράξο τῶν πάντων ἕπατον Θεῶν ἔμμεν Ἰαῶ.

“Acknowledge Jao (so they pronounced the name Jehovah) to be the highest God of all.” For though Macrobius fancied the sun to be here called Ἰαῶ, (nobody can tell why); yet Diodorus Siculus acknowledges Ἰαῶ to be the God, from whom Moses pretended to have his laws, i. e. Jehovah.

9 Only take heed to thyself, and keep thy soul diligently, lest thou forget the things which thine eyes have seen, and lest they depart from thy heart all the days of thy life: but teach them thy sons, and thy sons' sons;

10 Specially the day that thou stoodest before the Lord thy God in Horeb, when the Lord said unto me, Gather me the people together, and I will make them hear my words, that they may learn to fear me all the days that they shall

Ver. 7.] Both Onkelos, and the paraphrase of Jonathan, and likewise the Jerusalem Targum, are very significant upon this place: “What people is there who have a god that approaches to them, so as the Lord our God doth to us? At whatsoever hour we cry unto him, he answers us. It is the manner of other people, to carry their gods upon their shoulders, to show that they are near to them: when, alas! they are afar off, and cannot hear them. But the Lord our God sits on his throne on high, and hears our prayers, whatsoever time we call upon him,” &c. To which may be added, that they had a symbol of God's presence continually among them, in the holy place, where he dwelt with them, and Moses, whensoever he pleased, consulted him in all difficult affairs; as their high-priest might do, with the urim and thummim, in all times to come.

Ver. 8.] The true greatness of a nation (it appears by this and the foregoing verse) consists in the sincere worship of God, and in the upright administration of justice. Both which were so provided for by the Divine laws among the Jews, that no nation could compare with them, or was really so great as they were: for, though their country was but small, and they were often oppressed by several cruel enemies, who desired their extirpation, yet they recovered themselves, and kept their laws in their worst condition (when commonly they best observed them): inasmuch, that, as a very learned person of our own church long ago observed, after so many changes and alterations as there were in their state, from better to worse, and back again; after so many victories got by them over others, and so many captivities of their persons, and desolations of their country, as others had wrought, they continued still one and the same people, governed by the same laws, under several great and potent monarchies. The successive rise and fall of three of which they were preserved to behold; and, in their declining state, able to stand out a great while against the fourth, the mightiest that ever was on earth, and that when this monarchy was in its full strength; this is a plain demonstration of the truth of these words of Moses, That no nation was so great as they (see Dr. Jackson's first book upon the Creed, ch. 21).

Maimonides observes, that the word zaddikim, which we translate righteous, signifies as much as equal and proportionale: such, saith he, were all these laws of God; in which there was no excess, by the prescription of long pilgrimages, or severe fastings; nor any defect which might open the window to any vice, or make them careless in the practice of virtue (More Novechim, par. ii. cap. 39).

Ver. 9.] Their only danger was, lest they should grow careless and unmindful of all the wonderful things that God had done for them: which he, therefore, exhorts them to think of frequently, and to keep in memory, and lay to heart; so that they might preserve the sense of them as long as they lived, and likewise teach all posterity to be mindful of them.

Ver. 10. Specially the day that thou stoodest before live upon the earth, and that they may teach their children.

11 And ye came near and stood under the mountain; and the mountain burned with fire unto the midst of heaven, with darkness, clouds, and thick darkness.

12 And the Lord spake unto you out of the midst of the fire: ye heard the voice of the words, but saw no similitude; only ye heard a voice.

13 And he declared unto you his covenant, which he commanded you to perform, even ten commandments: and he wrote them upon two tables of stone.

the Lord thy God in Horeb,] But above all, that memorable day, when the Lord delivered his law to them in Mount Sinai; at which the oldest of them were present, and had seen and heard what he said, and how it was delivered.

Gather me the people together,] Unto the foot of Mount Sinai; where they stood at such a distance from it as God prescribed (Exod. xix. 10—13).

Hear my words,] See Exod. xix. 9, &c. xx. 1, &c.

That they may learn to fear me, &c.] For those words which they heard were pronounced in so terrible a manner, as to make them dread to offend his majesty, and to instruct their children to stand in awe of him.

Ver. 11. Ye came near] See Exod. xix. 17.

The mountain burned] See Exod. xix. 16. 18.

Unto the midst of heaven,] Into the middle of the air, which is frequently called heaven in Scripture; as the fowls of heaven, are the fowls of the air: but whether the fire flamed up precisely into the very midst of the lower region of the air, or only a great height, is not material; either way the expression is proper enough.

Ver. 12. The Lord spake] See Exod. xix. 20. xx. 1. 22.

Ye heard the voice,] See Exod. xx. 19.

But saw no similitude;] Though sometimes the Divine Majesty seems to have appeared in a visible shape (Dan. vii. 9, 10), yet, when he came to give them his law, he would not appear in the figure of a man, or any other thing, that might seem to represent him to their outward senses, or their imagination: for it had been dangerous then to manifest himself under any resemblance, when he forbade them to make any resemblance of him. They would have thought he forbade them to make any other resemblance, but that wherein he showed himself to them; in which they would have concluded it was lawful to represent him.

Only ye heard a voice,] From hence some of the Jews would gather, that the people only heard the sound of God's words, when he spake the ten commandments; but not the distinction of the sound, so as to understand the sense of what he said. Thus Maimonides, in his More Nevochim (par. ii. cap. 32). Which is manifestly false, as appears from ver. 10. 13. and Exod. xx. 22. For therefore the day wherein he spake to them in Horeb was so remarkable, as never to be forgotten; because he "made them hear his words, so that they might learn to fear him," &c. For, though he did not appear in the likeness of any thing to them, yet he vouchsafed to speak to them plainly in their own language, that they might be instructed in their duty; both which was to keep them from idolatry. "He did not let them see any shape, that they might not make any image of him, to worship it, or him by it, after the manner of the heathens;

14 ¶ And the Lord commanded me at that time to teach you statutes and judgments, that ye might do them in the land whither ye go over to possess it.

15 Take ye therefore good heed unto yourselves; for ye saw no manner of similitude on the day that the Lord spake unto you in Horeb out of the midst of the fire:

16 Lest ye corrupt yourselves, and make you a graven image, the similitude of any figure, the likeness of male or female.

17 The likeness of any beast that is on the earth, the likeness of any winged fowl that flieth in the air, but he let them hear his voice, that they might not go and worship any other's gods, which the heathens pretended spake to them.

Ver. 13. He declared unto you his covenant,] These were the principal laws which they covenanted with him to observe, though afterward he added others, "After the tenor of which he made a covenant with them" (Exod. xxxiv. 27).

He wrote them,] See Exod. xxiv. 12. xxxiv. 28.

Ver. 14. To teach you statutes and judgments,] This doth not signify, that they themselves did not hear the ten words from Mount Sinai, but were taught them by Moses (as Maimonides fancies in the fore-named place), for it plainly relates to the rest of the laws, which God immediately after gave him (Exod. xxi. xxii. xxiii). It being their own desire, that God would speak to them no more by himself, but communicate the rest of his will by Moses (Exod. xx. 19). And accordingly he told the people "all the words of the Lord, and all the judgments," which he delivered to him (Exod. xxiv. 3).

All this will appear more plainly from the next chapter of this book, ver. 22, &c.

It is a mere imagination of those Jews, who take the statutes and judgments here mentioned for their oral law, as Aben Ezra, R. Solomon, R. Bechai, and others do, upon this place; who say, that when God gave Moses the written law he expounded it to him: which exposition he delivered to Joshua, and he to the seventy elders, &c. so that it came down to them in a successive tradition.

Ver. 15.] He gives them a special caution about this, because the nations of the world were so prone to make images of their gods; which he expressly forbids in the second commandment. Upon this text the present Jews ground the third article of their faith, which is, that God is incorporeal.

Ver. 16. Lest ye corrupt yourselves,] By worshipping any thing but God himself alone. Unto whom they being espoused, the giving Divine worship unto any thing else was such a corruption, as adultery is in a married woman.

And make you a graven image,] See the second commandment, Exod. xx. 3, 4.

The likeness of male or female,] The representation of God in human shape is first forbidden, because it was most common among the heathens. Therefore I cannot think this relates to the Egyptian worship, who honoured oxen as sacred to Osiris, and cows as sacred to Isis. Unto which Mr. Selden thinks the LXX. had respect, when they translated these words, 'Ομοίωμα ἀρσενικῆ καὶ θηρικῆ (De Diis Syris, Syntag. cap. 4).

Ver. 17.] The word or is to be here supplied, and in all that follows, in this manner: "Or the likeness of any beast that is on the earth; or the likeness of any winged fowl that flieth in the air;" where col-

18 The likeness of any thing that creepeth on the ground, the likeness of any fish that is in the waters beneath the earth :

19 And lest thou lift up thine eyes unto heaven, and when thou seest the sun, and the

tzippor canaph, which we translate, "any winged fowl," signifies, all birds and insects that fly in the air: for in the shape of such creatures also the heathen represented their gods, or some of their qualities: for not only oxen were sacred to Apis, and rams to Jupiter Ammon, but hawks and eagles, and even beetles, to other deities.

Ver. 18. The likeness of any thing that creepeth] Nothing was more common among the heathen than the worship of serpents.

The likeness of any fish] The famous Dagon, whom the Philistines worshipped, was a fish with a human face, hands, and feet. Certain it is, the Syrians worshipped a fish, as Cicero tells us, in his third book of the Nature of the Gods, Syri piscem venerantur: which Mr. Selden thinks relates to the famous goddess Atargatis; which is a word made out of the Hebrew, addiradag, i. e. "magnificent, or potent fish" (see De Diis Syris, Syntag. ii. cap. 2). The Egyptians were famous in aftertimes for worshipping all sorts of animals; and if one could find they were so in the days of Moses, it might be assigned as the most probable reason of his cautioning the Israelites against these things so particularly, they being lately come out of Egypt.

Ver. 19. Lest thou lift up thine eyes unto heaven,] From hence, I believe, that common speech among the Arabians was derived, "Take heed how thou gazest on the splendour of the stars:" which is, in the first century of Arabic proverbs, set forth by Erpenius (Prov. xxviii.), who saith he knew not what to make of it: but I take it to be a caveat against idolatry, to which the ancient Arabians were addicted.

When thou seest the sun, &c.] The most ancient idolatry of all other seems to have been the worship of the sun, and the rest of the heavenly bodies, which began among the Chaldeans: for there is not any god, or goddess, among the ancient gentiles, but hath a respect to the sun, or the moon, as Gisbertus Cuperus hath very plainly demonstrated, in his Harpocrates, p. 87, &c. 108, &c. And a very learned man of our own hath lately said a great deal on the same subject (see Appendix to the Antiquity of Palmyra, cap. 4. by Mr. A. Seller; and Maimon. More Nevoch. par. iii. cap. 30).

Shouldst be driven to worship them,] Drawn in, enticed, and deceived (as Onkelos, and the LXX. translate it), either by the instigation of some evil genius, or admiration of their splendour, or imitation of other nations, or a vain opinion that some divinity inhabits such illustrious bodies, or out of a sense of the benefits mankind receive by them: for the chief philosophers themselves were led by their weak reasonings into this error, as appears even by Plato, who saith, it is most just that the heaven should be worshipped with all the gods and demons, and that we should συνῶν τε καὶ εὐχεσθαι διαφρίτως αὐτῶ, &c. as he speaks in his Epinomis. See Eusebius, in his Præpar. Evang. lib. xiii. cap. 18. where he shows how much better the Hebrews speak in this matter; and quotes some words of Plato, out of a work of his, not now extant, for the explication of these words of Moses. And, to make this idolatry seem more reasonable, some of the philosophers asserted the sun to be endued with understanding; and, therefore, is called by Proclus, πνεῦμα νοητῶν βασιλεῖς, "the intellectual fire," to distinguish it from other fires which are moon, and the stars, even all the host of heaven, shouldst be driven to worship them, and serve them, which the LORD thy God hath divided unto all nations under the whole heaven.

20 But the LORD hath taken you, and brought without understanding: and from thence, in one of the coins of Caracalla, there is over the sun, surrounded with rays, the word Providentia. In short, the world had been so long settled in this worship, that it was no easy matter, when the Son of God came, to root it out: for the Essenes (the best sect among the Jews) seem to have had a tang of this superstition, as Josephus represents them, lib. ii. De Bello Judaico, cap. 7. Some, indeed, excuse them, as if they only admired the sun as the most excellent work of God, which they expressed by some kind of adoration: but Josephus expressly tells us, that, early in the morning, they directed to him πατριὸς ἑωῆς εὐχάς, as if they besought him to rise. And this stuck still in the minds of some who professed Christianity, particularly the followers of Basilides, and the Manichees, who called the sun and moon by the name of gods; and sometimes called the sun Christ, as Theodoret tells us, lib. i. cap. 26. And Epiphanius and St. Austin say the same in more places than one. No wonder, therefore, that Julian the apostate should say, that God produced, ἔξ ἑαυτοῦ Ἡλιὸν Θεὸν μέγιστον πάντα ὁμοῖον ἑαυτῷ, "out of himself the sun, the greatest god, in all things like unto himself:" for which he quotes Plato, in his famous oration in Praise of the Sun; where he saith, The same sun hath filled the heaven with innumerable other gods, p. 146. Ὅλος οὐρανὸς Θεῶν ἔξ ἡλίου πληρῆς, "The whole heaven is full of gods from the sun."

Which the Lord thy God hath divided unto all nations] The sense is very plain, that all nations under heaven have the benefit of the sun, moon, and stars, as well as the Jews; who were therefore to worship him alone, who is the Lord of them all, and hath made them to be ministers unto us.

This K. Solomon saw, and yet he could not stick to it, but fell into the vain fancy of the generality of the Jews, that God hath distributed the nations of the world under the government of several stars, which stars are under the government of angels; but the Jews under the government of God alone, and not subject to any planet. Which hath no foundation at all; much less can we think that God appointed the nations of the world to worship the heavenly host, lest they should be atheists, as Clemens Alexandrinus and Justin Martyr fancy from this place; unless they mean that God for their sins delivered them up to this impiety; which several great men since have thought to be the true meaning of these words: for there are no such words found in the LXX. as they allege, ὅμῳ δ' οὐκ οὕτως ἔδωκε Κύριος ὁ Θεὸς σου.

There is one who takes the word chalak, which we translate divide, to signify the blandish, and makes this the sense, that God places these great luminaries in the heavens, to invite and allure all nations to admire and adore him, the creator of them. And, indeed, in the conjugation which the Hebrews call hiphil, this word doth signify to soften and smooth, and consequently to allure; but it never signifies so in that they call kal.

Maimonides makes the sense of Moses' argument to be thus: God hath made the sun and moon to be ministers; not to be worshipped; according to that, Gen. i. 18. Which made the Psalmist so particularly call upon all the heavenly bodies to praise the Lord, Ps. cxlviii. (More Nevoch. par. ii. cap. 5).

you forth out of the iron furnace, even out of Egypt, to be unto him a people of inheritance, as ye are this day.

21 Furthermore the LORD was angry with me for your sakes, and sware that I should not go over Jordan, and that I should not go in unto that good land, which the LORD thy God giveth thee for an inheritance:

22 But I must die in this land, I must not go over Jordan: but ye shall go over, and possess that good land.

23 Take heed unto yourselves, lest ye forget the covenant of the LORD your God, which he made with you, and make you a graven image, or the likeness of any thing, which the LORD thy God hath forbidden thee.

Ver. 20. Brought you forth out of the iron furnace.] This is a phrase used also by Solomon, 1 Kings vii. 51. and by Jeremiah, xi. 4. to express the most cruel servitude; wherein God suffered them to be tried, as metals are in a furnace of iron, red hot; for he doth not allude to their making of bricks (as some imagine), which were not wrought in an iron furnace.

To be unto him a people of inheritance.] These were two powerful arguments to induce them to be obedient: that they were not only delivered from the hardest slavery, but now made God's peculiar people (see Exod. xix. 5), whom he had purchased for his inheritance, i. e. to be his people for ever.

From this verse Sir John Marsham gathers, that Moses had respect, in the foregoing verses, to the Egyptian superstition; as if he had said, Excusso servitutis jugo, etiam excutienda sunt Ægypti βδελυματα; "having shaken off the Egyptian yoke, they were also to shake off their abominable idols:" for the invisible God is not to be worshipped by images or symbols. So that when he forbids them, ver. 16, "to make a graven image, the similitude of any figure, the likeness of male and female," he thinks Moses hath respect to the boves utriusque sexus sacri, "the sacred beeves of both kinds;" the males to Osiris, the females to Isis. And he mentions "the likeness of any beast that is in earth," ver. 17. because all the Egyptians worshipped not only the creatures before mentioned, but canem and felem, a dog and a cat; the Thebans and Saitæ worshipped sheep; the Mendesiens a goat; and others of them, wolves and lions; and he adds, "the likeness of any winged fowl that flieth in the air," because the Egyptians worshipped a hawk, and the bird called ibis; and the Thebans an eagle. In ver. 18. he mentions "the similitude of any thing that creepeth upon the ground;" because about Thebes, serpents were sacred to Jupiter: "and the likeness of any fish that is in the waters," because all Egypt worshipped certain fishes, and some of them the crocodile and the hippopotamus. And as for the sun, moon, and stars (ver. 19), the worship of them was common to the Egyptians with all other nations. All this he justifies out of good authors; and it might pass for truth, had we any certainty that the Egyptians in the time of Moses were as sottish as they were in the time of Herodotus (see Seculum ix. Sect. De Idololatria).

Ver. 21. Furthermore] Or rather, but.

The Lord was angry with me] He remembers this again (though he had mentioned it twice before, i. 37. iii. 26), that they might be deeply sensible of the danger of offending God, since such a man as he was excluded from the good land for one single fault. Or hereby he would magnify the goodness of God to them, who, though great offenders, had a privilege granted to them which was denied him.

24 For the LORD thy God is a consuming fire, even a jealous God.

25 ¶ When thou shalt beget children, and children's children, and ye shall have remained long in the land, and shall corrupt yourselves, and make a graven image, or the likeness of any thing, and shall do evil in the sight of the LORD thy God, to provoke him to anger:

26 I call heaven and earth to witness against you this day, that ye shall soon utterly perish from off the land whereunto ye go over Jordan to possess it; ye shall not prolong your days upon it, but shall utterly be destroyed.

27 And the LORD shall scatter you among the nations, and ye shall be left few in number among the heathen, whither the LORD shall lead you.

And sware that I should not go over Jordan, &c.] He only told him so at the first (Numb. xx. 12), but upon Moses' importunate entreaty, that he would revoke the sentence (of which we read in the foregoing chapter of this book), it seemed he silenced him, by confirming his threatening with an oath.

Ver. 22. But I must die in this land.] See Numb. xxvii. 12—14. His frequent repetition of this, shows how near it went to his heart. "But ye shall go over, and possess that good land." God's promise to them, he would have them think, was as irrevocable as his threatening against him.

Ver. 23.] For this was the principal thing in the covenant, that they should worship him alone. Which is the reason it is so often repeated, and was, immediately after the delivery of the law from Mount Sinai, mentioned alone, as if it was the only thing that he had said unto them (Exod. xx. 22, 23): "Ye have not seen that I have talked with you from heaven: ye shall not make with me gods of silver; neither shall ye make unto you gods of gold."

Ver. 24. A consuming fire.] So he appeared upon the mount, when he delivered his laws from thence in a flaming fire (Exod. xxiv. 17). The learned Huetius thinks, that from these words of Moses, the ancient Persians took up the worship of fire; at first, only as a resemblance of God, or a symbol of him (as Maximus Tyrius saith, Dissert. xviii.), but afterward, as God himself (Demonstr. Evangel. p. 94).

Even a jealous God.] Who cannot endure any rival in your affection (see Exod. xx. 5). These were two awakening arguments to keep them from idolatry; that God cannot endure it, and will be very terrible in his punishment of it.

Ver. 25. When thou shalt beget children.] When they were very much multiplied, and had been long settled in the possession of the land of Canaan.

Corrupt yourselves.] By the worship of other gods. Make a graven image.] Which he had strictly prohibited, and solemnly cautioned them to beware of ver. 23.

And shall do evil] By imitating the idolatrous customs of other nations.

Ver. 26. I call heaven and earth to witness] A solemn kind of asseveration; that, as surely as the heaven and earth shall endure, they should utterly perish.

That ye shall soon utterly perish] As soon as the measure of your iniquity is filled up, ye shall speedily be destroyed without remedy. Which the Hebrews refer to the captivity by Salmanezar and Nebuchadnezzar, after they had been almost eighteen hundred years in this country; and so might he said to have remained long in the land.

Ver. 27. Shall scatter you] See Lev. xxvi. 33. Ye shall be left few] See Lev. xxvi. 22.

28 And there ye shall serve gods, the work of men's hands, wood and stone, which neither see, nor hear, nor eat, nor smell.

29 But if from thence thou shalt seek the Lord thy God, thou shalt find him, if thou seek him with all thy heart and with all thy soul.

30 When thou art in tribulation, and all these things are come upon thee, even in the latter days, if thou turn to the Lord thy God, and shalt be obedient unto his voice;

31 (For the Lord thy God is a merciful God,) he will not forsake thee, neither destroy thee, nor forget the covenant of thy fathers which he swore unto them.

32 For ask now of the days that are past,

Ver. 28. There ye shall serve gods, &c.] The idols of the heathen: to the worship of which he threatens to abandon them, as a punishment for their apostasy from God. And the heathen sometime compelled them to worship their gods, as we read in the third of Daniel.

Which neither see, &c.] This is a description of the most stupid idolatry, to which they should be delivered, if they fell from God (see Numb. xxi. 29).

Ver. 29. But if from thence thou shalt seek the Lord thy God,] When they were scattered among the heathen (ver. 27).

Thou shalt find him, if thou seek him with all thy heart] If they then repented sincerely, and became unfeigned worshippers of the Lord their God alone, he promises them forgiveness.

Ver. 30. When thou art in tribulation,] In great distress, by the execution of the foregoing threatenings.

Even in the latter days,] In future times, or in their most declining state. The Jews themselves apply this to the present state, wherein they are now, and have been many years; as appears by the ancient Nitzacon, set forth lately by Wagenseil, p. 254, where he saith, the whole nation must repent, before God send deliverance unto them.

If thou turn to the Lord thy God,] The great end of punishment was to convert them, and make them more observant of God's commands.

Ver. 31. The Lord thy God is a merciful God;] See Exod. xxxiv. 6, 7. Numb. xiv. 17, 18.

He will not forsake thee, &c.] He promises not to east them off, nor destroy them utterly (though they were utterly thrown out of their land, ver. 26), but restore them to his favour, according to the covenant made with their fathers, and confirmed by an oath, Gen. xvii. 19. xxii. 16, 17 (see Lev. xxvi. 44, 45).

Ver. 32. For ask] Turn over the annals of the whole world, from one end of it to the other, ever since it was made, and search whether thou canst find any thing like to that which God hath done for you. Which R. Isaac thus glosses in his Munimen Fidei (lately set forth by Wagenseil, p. 103), "From the creation of the world, till their going out of Egypt, there were passed two thousand four hundred and forty-eight years; yet in all that long track of time, there never were seen or heard in any part of the world such prodigious miracles as were wrought to bring them out of Egypt: and afterward, in leading them through the Red Sea; raining manna on them; and the appearance of the Divine Majesty at Mount Sinai," &c.

Ver. 33.] Here was a double, or rather triple prodigy, never heard of before, that God should speak to them, audibly and distinctly, so long as to inform them in their duty towards himself and one another; which were before thee, since the day that God created man upon the earth, and ask from the one side of heaven unto the other, whether there hath been any such thing as this great thing is, or hath been heard like it?

33 Did ever people hear the voice of God speaking out of the midst of the fire, as thou hast heard, and live?

34 Or hath God assayed to go and take him a nation from the midst of another nation, by temptations, by signs, and by wonders, and by war, and by a mighty hand, and by a stretched out arm, and by great terrors, according to all that the Lord your God did for you in Egypt before your eyes?

35 Unto thee it was shewed, that thou might-and this out of the midst of devouring flames, and without the least hurt to any one of them (Exod. xx. 18, xxiv. 17).

Ver. 34. Or hath God assayed to go and take him a nation from the midst of another nation,] Another wonder, never before heard of: that God, by two men alone, Moses and Aaron, should demand the delivery of a nation, under the power of another nation far greater and stronger than themselves, and effect it also, by no other means but such as here follow.

By temptations,] This word may be thought to signify the grievous trials of the Israelites, whose miseries were increased after the first attempt for their deliverance; which seemed to them a strange way of proceeding (Exod. v. 19. 22, 23). But by temptations may, in this place, be, in general, meant miracles, as the Hebrews understand it, and the Chaldee word tenessin signifies: this and the two following words being of the very same import with the three words in the New Testament, which we often meet withal (and seem to be taken from hence), δυνάμεις, τέρατα, και σημεία, "with miracles, wonders and signs" (Acts ii. 22. 2 Cor. xii. Heb. ii. 4).

By signs,] Which are mentioned Ex. iv. 9. vii. 9, 10.

By wonders,] This signifies all the ten plagues of Egypt: for Pharaoh would not let the Israelites go, till God had "multiplied his wonders on the land of Egypt," as we read Exod. vii. 3. x. 1, 2, xi. 9, 10.

By war,] This seems to relate to the overthrow of Pharaoh in the Red Sea: where the Lord is said to fight for Israel (Exod. xiv. 14. xv. 3), while they, which is the greatest wonder of all, were delivered without striking a stroke.

By a mighty hand, and by a stretched out arm,] These are phrases which we often meet withal, when Moses speaks of their deliverance out of Egypt, Exod. iii. 19. vi. 6. xv. 12, and many other places. And the Hebrews think, that his mighty hand particularly refers to the grievous murrain, and the pestilence, which are called the hand of the Lord, Exod. x. 3, 15. And his stretched out arm to have a particular respect to the killing of the first-born; the angel that was going to smite Jerusalem appearing with a "drawn sword, and his hand stretched out" (1 Chron. xxi. 16).

By great terrors,] wherewith the minds of those were struck who heard of these things (Exod. xv. 14—16). Or else he means the frights in which the Egyptians were, while they remained three days in most dismal darkness (Exod. x. 23.), for the conclusion of this verse signifies, that he speaks of "all that the Lord their God did for them in Egypt before their eyes."

Ver. 35. Unto thee it was shewed,] This was a particular kindness to the Israelites, which God never before manifested to any other nation.

That thou mightest know that the Lord he is God] est know that the LORD he is God; there is none else beside him.

36 Out of heaven he made thee to hear his voice, that he might instruct thee: and upon earth he shewed thee his great fire; and thou heardest his words out of the midst of the fire.

37 And because he loved thy fathers, therefore he chose their seed after them, and brought thee out in his sight with his mighty power out of Egypt;

38 To drive out nations from before thee greater and mightier than thou art, to bring thee in, to give thee their land for an inheritance, as it is this day.

39 Know therefore this day, and consider it in thine heart, that the LORD he is God in heaven above, and upon the earth beneath: there is none else.

40 Thou shalt keep therefore his statutes, and his commandments, which I command thee this day, that it may go well with thee, and with thy children after thee, and that thou mayest prolong thy days upon the earth, which the LORD thy God giveth thee, for ever.

41 ¶ Then Moses severed three cities on this side Jordan toward the sun rising;

42 That the slayer might flee thither, which should kill his neighbour unawares, and hated him not in times past; and that fleeing unto one of these cities he might live:

43 Namely, Bezer in the wilderness, in the plain country, of the Reubenites; and Ramoth in Gilead, of the Gadites; and Golan in Bashan, of the Manassites.

44 ¶ And this is the law which Moses set before the children of Israel:

45 These are the testimonies, and the statutes, and the judgments, which Moses spake unto the

That they might believe him to be the only true God, and worship none but him. Which two articles, saith Maimonides (More Nevochim, par. ii. cap. 33), that God is, and that he is but one, are fundamentals of religion, which were known not only by prophets, but by every body else.

Ver. 36. Out of heaven] See Exod. xx. 22.

That he might instruct thee:] Teach them his will, which was chiefly declared in the ten commandments.

He shewed thee his great fire:] He means either that they saw it as they stood upon the earth; or, that it burnt upon the top of the mount in their sight (Exod. xxiv. 17).

Thou heardest his words] See ver. 11, 12. and Exod. xx. 18, 19.

Ver. 37. Because he loved thy fathers,] See Gen. xv. 5—7, and many other places in that book, Exod. iii. 15—17.

Brought thee out in his sight with his mighty power] For, as he led them the way out of Egypt in a pillar of cloud, and of fire (Exod. xiii. 21), so, when they were in danger by Pharaoh's pursuit of them, he came behind them, and they marched in his sight (Exod. xiv. 19).

Out of Egypt;] This is mentioned in Scripture as the highest benefit, never to be forgotten by them. So G. Schickard observes, in his Mischpat Hammelech (cap. iii. Theor. 10). That they are put in mind of this in the frontispiece of the decalogue (Exod. xx. 2), in the institution of sacrifices (Lev. xxii. 33), in the promise of a blessing (xxvi. 13), and here, in the enumeration of God's wonderful works; and afterward in the commendation of his love (Deut. vii. 8), in his dehortation from ingratitude (viii. 14), in his institution of the passover (xvi. 6), in the speech which the reproving angel made to them (Judges ii. 1), in the hope he gave them of victory over the Midianites (vi. 9), in his answer to their petition for a king (1 Sam. x. 18), and on a great many other occasions: for this was "velut fundamentum et initium reipublice," &c., as another learned German speaks (Gierus on Dan. ix. 15), the foundation, as we may call it, and the beginning of their commonwealth founded by God; which comprehended in it abundance of miracles, far exceeding all the power of nature.

Ver. 38. To drive out nations—greater and mightier] So mighty, that they frightened their fathers from attempting the conquest of them (Numb. xiii. 28, 29. 31).

To bring thee in—as it is this day.] That is, as he had given them a late experiment, by overthrowing the two kings of the Amorites, and giving them their land for a possession.

Ver. 39.] Be sensible, therefore, and settle this belief in thy heart, that the Lord is the sole governor of the whole world.

Ver. 40. Keep therefore his statutes, &c.] Worship and obey him, as the only way to make them and their posterity live happily in the land, which God was about to give them.

That it may go well with thee, &c.] Though Moses spake of their long life upon earth, yet the better sort of Jews did not set up their rest here; but from this word prolong, extended their hope as far as the other world: for thus Maimonides saith (in his preface to Pereck Cheleck) they were taught by tradition to expound these words, "That it may be well with thee" in the world, which is all good; and "mayest prolong thy days" in the world, which is all long, i. e. never ends.

Ver. 41. Then Moses severed three cities] I observed in the preface to this book, that Moses did not deliver all that is contained in this book, in one continued speech; but at several times, as appears even by the beginning of the next chapter, where it is said, "He called all Israel, and said unto them," &c. Which supposes, that after this preface in these four chapters, he dismissed them to consider what he had said; and then some time after assembled the people again, to put them in mind of the laws which he so earnestly pressed them to observe. But between these two times (after he had spoken all that is contained in these four chapters, and before he rehearsed the decalogue), he put in execution the command of God lately given, to set apart three cities of refuge on this side Jordan; which he here relates, in the order, I suppose, wherein it was done.

Toward the sun rising;] On the east side of Jordan, according to what was ordered, (Numb. xxxv. 14).

Ver. 42.] See there, ver. 11, 12, &c.

Ver. 43.] Thus they are set down also in the book of Joshua, xx. 8. xxi. 27. 36. 38.

Ver. 44.] Now follows the law, which (after the forementioned assignation of the cities of refuge) Moses set before all the people, and pressed them to the observance of it.

Ver. 45. These are the testimonies, and the statutes, and the judgments.] As the next chapter contains the law, that is, the ten commandments, which Moses set before them; so, in several following chapters (after new earnest exhortations to obedience), he re-children of Israel, after they came forth out of Egypt,

46 On this side Jordan, in the valley over against Beth-peor, in the land of Sihon king of the Amorites, who dwelt at Heshbon, whom Moses and the children of Israel smote, after they were come forth out of Egypt:

47 And they possessed his land, and the land of Og king of Bashan, two kings of the Amorites, which were on this side Jordan toward the sun rising;

48 From Aroer, which is by the bank of the river Arnon, even unto mount Sion, which is Hermon, 49 And all the plain on this side Jordan eastward, even unto the sea of the plain, under the springs of Pisgah.

presents to them the rest of God's will, comprehended under these three words, testimonies, statutes, and judgments: some of which belonged to the Divine service, others to their civil governments, and the rest to ceremonial observations, for the better security and preservation of both the former.

Which Moses spake] Which he had formerly delivered to them, after they were come out of the Egyptian bondage, Exod. xxi. xxii. xxiii., and in the following books.

Ver. 46. On this side Jordan, &c.] In this and the two following verses he again mentions the place and the time, when and where, he set before them the law, and the testimonies, statutes, and judgments, recorded in the following part of this book: which he repeats, that all posterity might observe the discourses were made a little before he died.

Over against Beth-peor,] See ch. iii. ult.

In the land of Sihon] See ch. ii. 21. 31, &c.

Whom Moses and the children of Israel smote,] In the fortieth year after their departure thence; as appears from Numb. xxi. 21. xxxiii. 38.

Ver. 47.] See Numb. xxi. 33, &c.

Ver. 48.] The mount here called Sion is not that which was so famous in aftertimes, when David made it the royal seat; for that was on the other side Jordan, and is written with different letters in the Hebrew; but, in all probability, is a contraction of Sirion; which is the name by which the Sidonians called Hermon: for the bounds of this country are so described (iii. 8, 9, 12), to extend from the river Arnon to Mount Hermon, which is called Sirion.

Ver. 49. All the plain] See ch. iii. 17.

Under the springs of Pisgah.] The same place there called Ashdoth-Pisgah. Which is exactly described after the same manner, by Benjamin Tudelensis, in his Itinerary, set forth by L'Empereur, p. 51, where he saith, that Jordan is called at Tiberias the Sea of Gennesareth; and, coming from thence with a great force, falls at the foot of this hill into the Sea of Sodom, which is called the Salt Sea.

CHAPTER V.

1 The covenant in Horeb. 6 The ten commandments. 22 At the people's request Moses receiveth the law from God.

1 AND Moses called all Israel, and said unto them, Hear, O Israel, the statutes and judgments which I speak in your ears this day, that ye may learn them, and keep, and do them.

2 The LORD our God made a covenant with us in Horeb.

3 The LORD made not this covenant with our fathers, but with us, even us, who are all of us here alive this day.

4 The LORD talked with you face to face in the mount out of the midst of the fire,

5 (I stood between the LORD and you at that time, to shew you the word of the LORD: for ye were afraid by reason of the fire, and went not up into the mount;) saying,

6 ¶ I am the LORD thy God, which brought thee out of the land of Egypt, from the house of bondage.

CHAP. V.

Ver. 1. Moses called all Israel,] That is, summoned all the elders, and heads of their tribes, who were to communicate what he said to the rest; thus it is commonly expounded. But that which he saith, xxix. 10, 11, seems to direct us to another interpretation; that he himself went from tribe to tribe, and repeated these ten words (as they are called), placing himself in several parts of their camp, that every one might hear what he said. And this was some time after he had, in like manner, exhorted them to obedience in the foregoing preface (see iv. 41).

Hear, O Israel,] Mind what I now say unto you.

That ye may learn them, and keep, and do them.] That ye may not be ignorant of such important truths nor negligent in the practice of them; which is the end of knowledge.

Ver. 2.] See Exod. xxiv. 3. 5—8.

Ver. 3. The Lord made not this covenant with our fathers,] viz. Abraham, Isaac, and Jacob; with whom he covenanted to give their posterity the land of Canaan; but did not make to them this discovery of his will, which was the matter of the covenant at Horeb.

But with us,] A great part of those who were then at Horeb were now alive: viz. all under twenty years old. And if they had been all dead, Moses might have said, "He made it with us;" because they were still the same people, though the particular persons were dead, with whom the covenant was made, not only for themselves, but for their posterity.

Ver. 4. Face to face] Openly, clearly, and distinctly; or by himself, without the mediation of Moses: but in no visible shape: for that is expressly denied in the foregoing chapter, iv. 12. 15.

Ver. 5. I stood between the Lord and you at that time,] As a mediator, whom God employed to prepare them to meet him (Exod. xix. 10, 11, &c.), and to prescribe them the bounds, at what distance they should keep (ver. 12), and to bring them forth to meet with him (ver. 17), and to charge them to keep within their bounds (ver. 21). And on the other side to represent their desires unto God, after he had spoken to them (Exod. xx. 19). So that he was truly a mediator between God and them; and stood also in a middle place, at the foot of the mount, while they stood further off.

7 Thou shalt have none other gods before me.

8 Thou shalt not make thee any graven image, or any likeness of any thing that is in heaven above, or that is in the earth beneath, or that is in the waters beneath the earth:

9 Thou shalt not bow down thyself unto them, nor serve them: for I the LORD thy God am a jealous God, visiting the iniquity of the fathers upon the children unto the third and fourth generation of them that hate me,

10 And shewing mercy unto thousands of them that love me and keep my commandments.

Ye were afraid.] Exod. xx. 18.

Went not up] Exod. xix. 17. xx. 21.

Ver. 6.] This preface to the ten commandments is explained, Exod. xx. 2.

Ver. 7.] See Exod. xx. 3. It is wisely observed by Grotius (lib. ii. De Jure Belli et Pacis, cap. 20. sect. 45), that true religion was ever built upon these four principles: First, that there is a God, and that he is but One. Secondly, that God is nothing of those things that we see with our eyes, but something more sublime than them all. Thirdly, that he takes care of human affairs, and judges them most justly. Fourthly, that he is the maker of all things whatsoever. Which principles are explained in these first four precepts of the decalogue; the unity of the Godhead being delivered in the first place.

Ver. 8—10.] The second principle, that God's nature is invisible, is contained in this second commandment; being the ground of this prohibition, to make any image of him: which the best of the heathen forbade also for this very reason, ὡς οὐκ ἐφάρτευσαι Θεοῦ δυνάτων ἄλλως ἢ νοῦσαι, "because it is impossible to conceive God otherwise, but by the mind alone," as Plutarch reports the sense of Numa among the Romans. And we find the same as plainly said by Antisthenes among the Greeks, in Clemens Alexandrinus, ἀφθαλμοῖς οὐκ ὀράται, οὐδὲν ἰσχύει, διότι αὐτῶν οὐδὲν δυνάται ἰκμαθῆναι ἢ εἰκασθῆναι; "he is not seen by the eyes nor is like to any thing; and therefore none can learn any thing of him by an image." Nor could the vulgar, I am apt to think, have been kept so long, and so generally as they were, to the worship of them, if it had not been by bold fictions, that some of them were ἄπερτεῖ, "fallen down from heaven;" and that all of them were Θεοὶ, καὶ ὁμοίως μετουσίως ἀνθρώπων, "Divine things, and full of a Divine communication," as Jamblichus speaks. And, to make them more revered, while some of them were Ἐμφανῆ, "conspicuous to all the people," others were kept in secret in the inmost part of their temple, as having hidden in them a symbolical presence of God, as Proclus speaks upon Timæus. Which Ezek. Spanhemius justly thinks was done in imitation of what Moses saith concerning God's presence upon the mercy-seat in the holy of holies (Observationes in Callimachum, p. 586, &c.).

See upon these three verses my annotations on Exod. xx. 4—6.

Ver. 11.] This contains the third principle before mentioned, that God takes notice of all things, even of our thoughts, and governs all our affairs: for it is the foundation of an oath, that God knows our very hearts, and is witness to our meaning, as well as our words; and will, if we swear falsely, punish us for it: which is an acknowledgment also both of the justice and the power of God (see upon Exod. xx. 7).

Ver. 12.] They were to keep it in memory, that they might sanctify it, as it is Exod. xx. 8 (see there). And it was sanctified, or set apart for special ends and 11 Thou shalt not take the name of the LORD thy God in vain: for the LORD will not hold him guiltless that taketh his name in vain.

12 Keep the Sabbath day to sanctify it, as the LORD thy God hath commanded thee.

13 Six days thou shalt labour, and do all thy work:

14 But the seventh day is the sabbath of the LORD thy God: in it thou shalt not do any work, thou, nor thy son, nor thy daughter, nor thy manservant, nor thy maidservant, nor thine ox, nor thine ass, nor any of thy cattle, nor thy purposes, that they might give to the blessed God the seventh part of the week (as Abarbanel speaks upon these words,) and might learn the Divine law, together with the Kabalah, or traditional exposition of the words, and mark well the niceties of it: for which he quotes a saying out of the Gemara of the Jerusalem Talmud, "Sabbaths and feasts were not given, but to learn the law upon them." Which is the reason, he saith, of another speech of theirs, in their Midrasch, or allegorical exposition upon Exodus, that "the sabbath weighed against all the commandments;" because it was a principal means to make them known and observed. There is not much said, indeed, in express words, concerning this end of the rest of the sabbath: but common reason told the Jews, it could not be intended merely as a day of ease from labour, but for the solemn service of God, and instruction in their duty to him.

As the Lord thy God hath commanded thee.] At Marah, say the Jews commonly, where he gave them a "statute and an ordinance" (see Exod. xv. 25). But one of them saith better, "At Marah it was designed, and at Sinai it was commanded." But they do not look back far enough for the original of this commandment; for there being two things in this day, the rest of it, and the religion; the rest of it was in remembrance of their deliverance out of Egypt, and the overthrow of Pharaoh in the Red Sea, which completed their deliverance; immediately after which they kept their first sabbatical rest. The religion was in remembrance of the creation of the world; and so this day had been observed from the beginning by the patriarchs, though we find no mention made of their resting: and that may possibly be the meaning of these words; "as the Lord thy God commanded thee;" that is, immediately after he had finished the creation of the world.

Ver. 13.] See upon Exod. xx. 9.

Ver. 14. But the seventh day is the Sabbath, &c.] The reason why they might not do any work on this day is given in Exod. xx. 11, which is wholly omitted here, because Moses had another reason to add, for the enforcement of this precept: and refers them (in the foregoing words, ver. 12. "As the Lord thy God hath commanded thee") to what he had said in the books of Genesis and Exodus; where he had set down the reason which God himself gave with his own mouth, for the religious observation of this day; because in six days the Lord made heaven and earth," &c. So that this commandment was designed to establish the fourth principle I mentioned, that God is the maker of all things. To preserve the memory and sense of which (as the author of the answer, Ad Orthodoxos, observes, lxi.) this rest was instituted, to be observed with a more than ordinary sanctity; it being of such great moment, that the first sabbath-breaker was punished with death, because the voluntary violation of it contained in it a denial that the world was created by God.

stranger that is within thy gates; that thy manservant and thy maidservant may rest as well as thou.

15 And remember that thou wast a servant in the land of Egypt, and that the LORD thy God brought thee out thence through a mighty hand and by a stretched out arm: therefore the LORD thy God commanded thee to keep the sabbath day.

16 ¶ Honour thy father and thy mother, as the LORD thy God hath commanded thee; that thy days may be prolonged, and that it may go well with thee, in the land which the LORD thy God giveth thee.

17 Thou shalt not kill.

18 Neither shalt thou commit adultery.

19 Neither shalt thou steal.

20 Neither shalt thou bear false witness against thy neighbour.

21 Neither shalt thou desire thy neighbour's wife, neither shalt thou covet thy neighbour's house, his field, or his manservant, or his maidservant, his ox, or his ass, or any thing that is thy neighbour's.

That thy manservant and thy maidservant may rest] Mercy towards men, as well as piety towards God, was a reason for the observation of the sabbatical rest.

Ver. 15.] This is a new ground for the observation of the sabbath; because God had given them rest from their hard labour in Egypt. Which obliged them to keep that seventh day, which God appointed at the giving of manna (being the day on which he overthrew Pharaoh in the Red Sea), as the memory of the creation of the world obliged them to keep one day in seven. So our Mr. Mede hath explained it (see my annotations on Exod. xiv. 30). And Maimonides hath something to the same purpose, in his More Nevochim, par. ii. cap. 31 (see upon Exod. xx. 11).

Ver. 16. Honour thy father and thy mother.] In the twentieth of Exodus, ver. 12, see there. To which I shall here add, that the laws of Solon made those children infamous, who did not afford sustenance to their parents, and provide them a habitation. And by the ancient law of Athens, he that reproached his parents was disinherited; if he struck them, his hand was cut off; if he left them unburied, he lost their estate, and was banished his country; and another law punished this ingratitude with death. See J. Meursius, in his Themis Attica, lib. i. cap. 2, 3, where he shows, that by parents, they understand not only father and mother, but grandfather and grandmother; ναὶ, τοῦτων μήτηρ καὶ πατὴρ ἴδω ἐν ζῶντι, i. e. "great-grandmother and great-grandfather, if they were yet alive," as Iseus tells us, Orat. vii. And the ground of all these laws, was a sense they had, as Æschines tells us, That men ought to honour their parents, as they did the gods, οὓς ἐξ ἰσού διὰ τῶν πατέρων θεῶν, (see Sam. Petitus, in Leges Atticas, lib. iii. tit. 3). Whence Hierocles calls parents, θεοὶ ἐπίγειοι, "earthly gods." And Philo, upon the decalogue, θεοὶ ἰμφανεῖς, &c. visible gods, who imitate him that is unbegotten, by giving life." And accordingly, next to the precepts concerning the worship of God, Moses here places immediately the duty owing unto parents.

That thy days may be prolonged, &c.] These last words are added to what God spake, Exod. xx. 12, as an explication of the foregoing. Whereby they are excited to obedience, by the promise not only of a long life, but of a happy. I say obedience; for that is included in honour, as the apostle explains it, Col. iii. 20, "Children obey your parents in all things;" that is, where God hath not commanded the contrary, and where it is not inconsistent with the public good; which is always to be preferred, even before the duty that is owing to natural parents. Inasmuch, that common reason taught the heathen, that for the good of the society, the son is to lay aside the reverence he should pay to his father, and the father to pay it unto the son, that is, when he is in public office; thus the famous Fabius Cunctator commended his son, for making him light off from his horse, when he met him in his consulship, as Plutarch tells us. And see A. Gellius, lib. xi. Noct. Attic. cap. 1, and lib. xiii. cap. ult. and lib. xiv. in the beginning.

Ver. 17.] If a man killed another involuntarily, he was banished by the laws of Athens for his country for a year: but if he killed another ἐκ προνοίας, as Demosthenes speaks, "out of forethought," and designedly, he was put to death (see Sam. Petitus, lib. vii. in Leges Atticas, tit. 1. p. 508. 512). Yea, so detestable was this sin accounted, that even τὰ ἀθάνατα, "lifeless things," such as wood, or stone, or iron, wherewith a man was killed, Draco ordered to be thrown out of their coasts (Ib. p. 523).

Ver. 18.] This crime was especially punished with death by the laws of Draco. Solon, indeed, left it to the liberty of the husband, who caught another man in bed with his wife, either to kill him, if he pleased, or to let him redeem his life with a sum of money. But if after this he lived with his wife, he was infamous, as Demosthenes tells us, who saith, she might not come publicly into their temples: if she did, any man might treat her as he pleased, only not kill her: so that she was so odious as to be thrown, ἐκ τῆς οἰκίας τοῦ ἀνδρός, καὶ ἐξ ἐρῶν τῶν τῆς πόλεως, "both out of the house of her husband, and out of holy places of the city." Nor might she go abroad with any ornaments (μη ἐξείνα: κοσμησθαι, is the law of Solon): if she did, any body might take them away from her, and tear her clothes in pieces, and beat her, only not maim her in any part of her body (see the same Petitus, lib. vi. tit. 4).

Ver. 19.] The laws of Draco punished all theft with death; which Solon thought too severe, and therefore changed that punishment into making satisfaction, by restoring double; yet still making it death, if any man stole above such a value, or took any thing out of the public baths, and such-like places, though of never so little value (see in the same author, lib. vii. tit. 5).

Ver. 20.] There was an action, at Athens, lay both against false witnesses, and him that produced them; who had a fine set upon them, and were made infamous. And if they were found thrice in the same fault, τούτους ἴδω καὶ αὐτοῦς, καὶ τοὺς ἐκ τοῦτων ἀπίμους εἶναι, "both they themselves, and all their posterity, were made infamous," as Andocides speaks (see Ib. p. 559).

Ver. 21.] It is observed by some, that an exact order is observed in the delivery of these precepts: for, first, he places such offences as are consummate, and then those that are but begun, and not perfected. And in the former, he proceeds from those that are most heinous unto those that are less grievous: for those offences are the greatest which disturb the public order, and consequently do mischief unto a great many. Such are those that are committed against governors and rulers, who are comprehended under the name of parents, by whose authority human society is preserved. And then, among those which are against particular persons, those are the greatest 22 ¶ These words the LORD spake unto all your assembly in the mount out of the midst of the fire, of the cloud, and of the thick darkness, with a great voice: and he added no more. And he wrote them in two tables of stone, and delivered them unto me.

23 And it came to pass, when ye heard the voice out of the midst of the darkness, (for the mountain did burn with fire,) that ye came near unto me, even all the heads of your tribes, and your elders;

24 And ye said, Behold the LORD our God hath shewed us his glory and his greatness, and we have heard his voice out of the midst of the fire: we have seen this day that God doth talk with man, and he liveth.

25 Now therefore why should we die? for this great fire will consume us: if we hear the voice of the LORD our God any more, then we shall die.

26 For who is there of all flesh, that hath heard the voice of the living God speaking out of the midst of the fire, as we have, and lived?

27 Go thou near, and hear all that the LORD our God shall say: and speak thou unto us all that the LORD our God shall speak unto thee; and we will hear it, and do it.

28 And the LORD heard the voice of your words, when ye spake unto me; and the LORD said unto me, I have heard the voice of the words of this people, which they have spoken unto thee: they have well said all that they have spoken.

29 O that there were such an heart in them which touch a man's life; next those that wrong his family, the foundation of which is matrimony; then, those that wrong him in his goods, either directly by stealth, or more craftily by bearing false witness. Then, in the last place, those sins are mentioned which are not consummate, being gone no farther than desire; which in Exod. xx. 17, are expressed by one and the same word, but here by two; which we translate desire and covet: between which I know no difference, unless they express higher and lower degrees of the same sin. The contrary to which is, contentedness with our portion, and thankfulness to God for it; which will not let us covet any thing belonging to another man, with his loss and damage.

Ver. 22. These words the Lord spake unto all your assembly] Exod. xix. 16. xx. 18. This confutes the foolish fancy of the Jewish doctors, that the people heard only the first words of God, "I am the Lord thy God, &c. thou shalt have no other gods but me;" i. e. they heard him declare his existence, and his unity; but all the rest were reported to them by Moses. Nothing can be more contrary to what he here saith, that "all these words" (that is, the ten words before mentioned) were spoken to "their whole assembly" (see More Nevochim, par. ii. cap. 33).

With a great voice:] That is, so loud, that it might be heard by the whole camp.

He added no more.] All the rest of the commandments, which follow in Exod. xxi. xxii. and xxiii. were delivered to Moses alone, and by him to the people, according to their own desire (Exod. xx. 19, xxi. 1. xxiv. 3).

He wrote them in two tables of stone,] That is, the ten commandments, and no more (Exod. xxiv. 12. xxxi. 18. xxxiv. 1. 28). Lest what they heard with their ears should quickly slide out of their minds, he took care to have it engraven with his own hands in these tables.

Ver. 23.] After they had recovered out of the fright wherein they were at the conclusion of these words: when the thundrings, lightnings, and noise of the trumpet were so terrible, that they removed, and stood afar off (Exod. xx. 18).

Ver. 24.] Here Moses relates more largely what he said in short, Exod. xx. 19.

We have seen this day that God doth talk with man, and he liveth.] This looks like a thankful acknowledgment of the great goodness of God, in vouchsafing them such a favour as never any men had before and which they could not expect again. And accordingly Moses makes use of it as an argument to be very observant of God's commands (Exod. xx. 22, 23).

Ver. 25.] It is an ungrounded conceit of Maimonides (in the place above mentioned), that, when they had heard the first words, they fell into a swoon, and did not recover themselves till all the rest were spoken; which made them conclude, that they should really die, and never come to themselves again (as we speak), if they should hear him speak to them any more. The plain meaning is, that mortal men could not endure to hear him speak in that manner; for the voice was so loud, and accompanied with such flashes of fire, and such claps of thunder, as made them conclude, if it had continued longer, they should have expired.

Ver. 26. Who is there of all flesh,] i. e. Of all men who are weak and frail, as the word flesh denotes.

That hath heard the voice of the living God—and lived?] There is no instance of such a thing as this, which made them afraid of hearing him speak, in this manner, any more: for they did not mind God's end and intention in this (which Moses suggests to them in Exod. xx. 20), but in a confusion of thoughts imagined, that though they had escaped once, the flames out of which he spake might devour them, if they came near them again.

Ver. 27.] See Exod. xx. 19. This shows their opinion of Moses, that he could be able not only to endure that without disorder which made them ready to die, but go into the very midst of the darkness out of which those flames came.

Ver. 28.] As Moses here reports more largely what they said to him than he did in Exodus, so he likewise gives a larger account what God bade him say to them, in answer to their desire.

They have well said all that they have spoken.] It very much becomes them, out of a sense of their meanness and unworthiness, and of the inconceivable majesty of God, to desire he would speak to them by a mediator.

Ver. 29. O that there were such an heart in them,] The words are wonderful emphatical in the Hebrew, "Who will give, that there may be such a heart in them." Which is an expression of the most earnest desire; but withal signifies, that if what he had done for them would not move them to fear and obey him, it was impossible to persuade them to it. Not but that he could miraculously work upon them, and change their hearts (saith Maimonides), if he pleased, as he miraculously changed the nature of other things; but if this were God's will to deal with them after this fashion, there would have been no need to send a prophet to them, or to publish laws full of precepts and promises, rewards and punishments; by which (saith he) God wrought upon their heart, and not by that they would fear me, and keep all my commandments always, that it might be well with them, and with their children for ever!

30 Go say to them, Get you into your tents again.

31 But as for thee, stand thou here by me, and I will speak unto thee all the commandments, and the statutes, and the judgments, which thou shalt teach them, that they may do them in the land which I give them to possess it.

32 Ye shall observe to do therefore as the LORD your God hath commanded you: ye shall not turn aside to the right hand or to the left.

33 Ye shall walk in all the ways which the LORD your God hath commanded you, that ye may live, and that it may be well with you, and that ye may prolong your days in the land which ye shall possess.

his absolute omnipotence (More Nevochim, par. iii. cap. 32).

That it might be well with them,] For God desired nothing more than this, which they themselves promised (ver. 27), which moved him to vouchsafe such a special privilege to them, as first to speak to them himself, and, at their desire, consent to speak to them by his prophet.

Ver. 30.] All this shows that Moses was a mediator between God and them, and between them and God.

Ver. 31. As for thee, stand thou here by me,] He invites Moses unto the nearest approaches unto his majesty; and the most familiar converse with him (Exod. xx. 21. xxiv. 2. 18). For this was the highest degree of prophecy, as Maimonides calls it, in his More Nevochim, par. iii. cap. 51. And in his preface to that book, he saith, this is the greatest degree of illumination of a prophet, concerning whom it is said, "Stand thou here with me:" and again, "The skin of his face shone." Which he supposes signified, that his mind was always full of light: whereas other prophets were some time in darkness, and saw nothing.

I will speak unto thee all the commandments,] According to their own desire, ver. 27 (see vi. 1).

That they may do them] According to their promise in the same, ver. 27.

Ver. 32. Ye shall observe to do therefore] Being obliged by such singular benefits as no other nation ever had the like (ver. 24—26), and having engaged themselves so solemnly to be obedient (ver. 27).

Ye shall not turn aside to the right hand or to the left,] This is a phrase often used to signify a strict observance of God's laws; neither superstitiously adding to them, nor profanely laying aside any of them (xvii. 20. xxviii. 14. Josh. i. 7).

Ver. 33. Ye shall walk in all the ways] That is, observe all his laws, and make them the rule of their lives.

That ye may live,] Universal obedience, he would have them sensible, was the only way to make them live happy and long in that good land which he was about to bestow upon them. This he inculcates again in the next chapter, vi. 3. For all mankind thought long life a very great blessing, as appears by Callimachus' hymn to Diana, ver. 132, 133, when he promises to those whom she favours, οὐδ' ἐπὶ σῆμα

ἔρχονται, πλὴν εἴτε πολυχρόνιον τι φέρωσιν.

i. e. "They shall not come into their grave, till they have reached a great old age."

CHAPTER VI.

1 The end of the law is obedience. 3 An exhortation thereto.

1 Now these are the commandments, the statutes, and the judgments, which the LORD your God commanded to teach you, that ye might do them in the land whither ye go to possess it:

2 That thou mightest fear the LORD thy God, to keep all his statutes and his commandments, which I command thee, thou, and thy son, and thy son's son, all the days of thy life; and that thy days may be prolonged.

3 ¶ Hear therefore, O Israel, and observe to do it; that it may be well with thee, and that ye may increase mightily, as the LORD God of thy fathers hath promised thee, in the land that floweth with milk and honey.

4 Hear, O Israel: The LORD our God is one LORD:

CHAP. VI.

Ver. 1. These are the commandments, the statutes, and the judgments,] Which God promised to deliver to him, in the foregoing chapter, ver 31; and commandments are thought commonly to relate unto the moral laws; statutes to rites and ceremonies, which have no natural reason for them; and judgments to civil government.

Which the Lord your God commanded] They are the words of God himself, in the place before named, ver. 31.

This, I suppose, was spoken by Moses to them, a little time after he had delivered what is contained in the foregoing chapter; being a preface to the rest of the laws which he received from God in Mount Sinai, as they desired.

Ver. 2.] The prime intention of God's speaking to them by himself and by Moses was, to implant his fear in their hearts, as the true principle of obedience; which so certainly flows from it, if it be preserved in its power and force, that it frequently in Scripture signifies the whole duty we owe to God. But here, more particularly, it seems to signify their adhering to him as the only God: so it is used, 1 Kings xviii. 3. 12, and in the New Testament most plainly, Acts x. 2. 35.

Ver. 3. Hear therefore,—and observe to do it;] Mark therefore so well what I say, as to do accordingly.

That it may be well with thee, &c,] As the only way to be happy, and to grow a mighty nation, and, in short, enjoy all that God had promised to their pious ancestors.

Ver. 4. Hear, O Israel:] He repeats it again, because what he was going to say is of the highest importance.

The Lord our God is one Lord:] Being to remind

5 And thou shalt love the LORD thy God with all thine heart, and with all thy soul, and with all thy might.

them of all the laws which God delivered to them by him, and to endeavour to beget a holy fear of him, as the principle of obedience, he most earnestly presses upon them, before he proceeds further, the first of the ten commandments; which is, that there is but one God, who alone is to be worshipped; and that he is their God: whose laws therefore could not be controlled by the authority of any other pretended god.

Many of the ancient fathers, particularly Theodoret and Greg. Nyssen, think there is a plain intimation of the blessed Trinity in these words "The Lord our God is one Lord:" and some of the Jews themselves have thought there was something extraordinary in it, that the name of God should be thrice mentioned as it is in this sentence: which signifies three idoloth, or properties, they confess; which they sometimes call three faces, or emanations, or sanctifications, or numerations, though they will not call them three persons; as Joseph de Voysin observes, in his book against an Anonymous Anti-trinitarian, p. 58. 63. 71, 72. And the cabalists say as much, who, asserting ten sephiroth in God (which they take to be something different from the essence of God, and yet not creatures, but emanations from it, as Manasseh ben Israel explains their words,) they make the first three of them to be more than the other seven; and call them primordial. The first of which they call the "Wonderful Intelligence," and the "First Intellectual Light" (as St. James calls God the "Father of lights"), and the "First Glory." The second they call, among other names, the "Illuminating Intelligence" (just as St. John saith, the eternal Word "enlightens every one that cometh into the world"), and the "Second Glory." And the third they call the "Sanctified Intelligence" (so the word קדוש, which is in Paul, must be translated, not sanctifying, as Rittangelius takes it,) or they may mean no more than the Holy Intelligence; which is the very same with the Holy Spirit. All this we find in the book Jetzira, which they fancy was made by Abraham: from whence we cannot but learn, that they had an obscure notion of the blessed Trinity: and that the apostles used no other language about it, than what was among the Jews. The best of which are so sensible of such things, as I have mentioned, that they think we Christians are not idolaters though we believe three persons in the Godhead (which they fancy inclines to polytheism), because we believe the unity of God; and therefore may be saved as well as they. So J. Wagenseil shows in his annotations upon Sota, cap. 7, p. 751, &c. and Arnoldus, in his Spicilegia, after him, p. 1218.

Ver. 5. Thou shalt love the Lord thy God] Our blessed Saviour, alleging these two verses, (Mark xii. 29, 30.) looks upon these words as a part of the first commandment: for, after he had said, "The first of all the commandments is, Hear, O Israel, the Lord our God is one Lord; and, Thou shalt love the Lord thy God with all thy heart, and with all thy soul," &c. he thus concludes, "this is the first commandment." For, to own him to be the only God, the author of our being and of all things, doth necessarily include in it a love of him above all things whatsoever, which requires us to love him, who hath made them so lovely. This is another principle or spring of obedience, inseparable from the fear of God before mentioned: which doth not drive us away from him, but draws us to him;

7 And thou shalt teach them diligently unto thy children, and shalt talk of them when thou sittest in thine house, and when thou walkest by the way, and when thou liest down, and when thou risest up.

being such a reverence towards him as children have to their kind parents, which is ever mixed with love to them.

With all thine heart,] For there being no other God but he alone, none else could have any right to their love and service, but he only whose nature is so excellent, that it requires the utmost we can do to testify our regard to him. This one of the Jewish writers hath admirably expressed in this manner; "Whosoever serves God out of love, he gives himself to the study of his laws, and unto good works, &c. which excite him to love God with the most flagrant affection; not for the sake of any thing in this world, nor for the fear of any evil; but he serves God truly because he is the truth, and the chiefest good, that he may be admitted to communion with him. And a man ought to love him with the most vehement and intense affection; so that he languish with love to him, just as a man that is in love with one he desires to make his wife; wheresoever he is, at home or abroad, when he eats and drinks, when he lies down and rises up, he thinks of her. To which Solomon compares the love of the spouse, who saith, I am sick of love," (Cant. ii. 5.) To this purpose, Baal Chasidim, mentioned by Wagenseil, upon Sota, cap. 5. p. 611.

By the heart may be here meant the will, which is the original of all that a man doth (as the Jews speak) whether good or evil: by the soul, the affections (to which St. Mark adds the mind, i. e. the understanding, or rational faculty); and by might or strength, is meant the power of the body for action; which four all together make up the whole man. And the word all added to each of these, doth not exclude all other things from any share in our thoughts and affections, but only from an equal interest in them. The love of God ought to be superior, and direct all our other motions to serve him, as Maimonides expresses it in his preface to Pirke Avoth.

Ver. 7. Teach them diligently unto thy children,] In the Hebrew the words are (as our margin observes) shall whet or sharpen them: signifying, as some think, that they should endeavour to make them pierce their hearts. But De Dieu rather thinks it signifies beat them into them, as things are hammered on an anvil with repeated strokes. Which the famous Bochart doth not so well approve; who observes, that the word sanan, which in Arabic signifies, in the first place, to sharpen or whet, signifies also, exquisitè docere, &c. "to teach exquisitely;" so that he who is taught he made thereby more acute and perspicacious. Which is the intention he thinks of the Hebrew word here, lib. ii. Canaan, cap. 17. However it be expounded, it imports the diligence they should use (as we translate it), to instil this principle into their children's minds, that there is but one God; and to work in them a fear and love of his Divine Majesty. To that which goes before (ver. 4—6) these words have a particular respect. By which it appears, that Moses thought his law was so plain, that every father might be able to instruct his sons in it, and every mother her daughters.

Talk of them when thou sittest in thine house,] As much as to say, they should take all occasions to inculcate this great thing, at home and abroad, night and day; never ceasing their most earnest endeavours to persuade their children not to worship any other

8 And thou shalt bind them for a sign upon thine hand, and they shall be as frontlets between thine eyes.

9 And thou shalt write them upon the posts of thy house, and on thy gates.

10 And it shall be, when the LORD thy God shall have brought thee into the land which he swore unto thy fathers, to Abraham, to Isaac, and to Jacob, to give thee great and goodly cities, which thou buildedst not,

11 And houses full of all good things, which thou filledst not, and wells digged, which thou diggedst not, vineyards and olive trees, which thou plantedst not; when thou shalt have eaten and be full;

12 Then beware lest thou forget the LORD, which brought thee forth out of the land of Egypt, from the house of bondage.

13 Thou shalt fear the LORD thy God, and serve him, and shalt swear by his name.

14 Ye shall not go after other gods, of the gods of the people which are round about you;

15 (For the LORD thy God is a jealous God among you) lest the anger of the LORD thy God be kindled against thee, and destroy thee from off the face of the earth.

God; nor to fail to worship the Lord their God with sincere affection.

The Jews have made from hence one of their affirmative precepts, that twice a day, at least, they should recite these words, "Hear, O Israel," &c. which is a very dilute sense of this precept: wherein Moses requires not merely their saying these words (in which there might be a great deal of superstition), but taking all opportunities to imprint them upon the minds and hearts of their children.

Ver. 8.] Just thus he commands them to preserve the memory of their deliverance out of the land of Egypt, almost in the same words: see Exod. xiii. 9. 16, where this is sufficiently explained. And it appears to be a proverbial speech from Isa. xlix. 16. There are some learned men, indeed, who take these words literally, notwithstanding St. Jerome hath delivered his opinion to the contrary, that there is no command for phylacteries, which are grounded upon these words, particularly Jos. Scaliger, in his Elench. Trihæres. Nic. Serarii, cap. 7, 8. where he thinks God gave this commandment to the Israelites, to prevent their following the rites of other nations, who armed themselves against dangers with superstitious amulets in their forehead; which the Egyptians, he thinks, called totaphot. But since, neither here nor in Exodus there are any such words as "thou shalt make thee frontlets," but Moses only saith the things that he is speaking of "shall be for frontlets between their eyes" I take it not to be meant literally; though it is likely they intended well who so understood it: for our blessed Saviour doth not seem to reprove the Jews for wearing phylacteries, but for their ostentation, in making them broader than ordinary.

Ver. 9.] This looks more like a literal command than the former; and it might have been very useful to them, when they went in and out of their house to read these words, "Hear, O Israel, the Lord thy God is one Lord," &c. But the Jews are too scrupulous about the words they should write, and upon what part of the posts and gates they were to put them, &c. as Mr. Selden observes (lib. iii. De Synedr. cap. 13. n. 2.) Though, after all, it may be, this was not intended, but only that they should never let this principle slip out of their mind, but think of it when they went out and came in, as well as when they were in their houses, and by the way, when they rose up, and when they lay down. Yet it must be observed, that other nations used to write their laws upon their gates, as Huetius notes in his Demonstratio Evangelica, (p. 58) which, it is likely, they did in imitation of the Jews, who, to this day, have written in a parchment these words from ver. 4. to the end of this verse, (with that other passage, chap. xi. from ver. 13 to ver. 20) which they roll up, and writing on it the name of Shaddai, put into it a piece of cane or other hollow wood, and fasten it to the doors of their houses, and of each particular room in them; and, as often as they go in and out, they make it a part of their devotion to touch this parchment, and kiss it; as Leo Modena tells us, in his History of the Jews, par. i. cap. 2. Ver. 10. It shall be, when the Lord thy God shall have brought thee into the land] Of this he speaks with the greatest assurance, there being no doubt to be made, that God would immediately give them possession of the good land promised to them. The only danger was, lest they should be thrown out of it for their disobedience.

Great and goodly cities, which thou buildedst not,] For they did not lay all waste, as they did Jericho (for which there was a particular reason), but dwelt in them, after they had destroyed the inhabitants.

Ver. 11. And houses, &c.] In this, and what follows in the rest of the verse, he sets forth the great bounty of God to them; who intended to enrich them with all manner of good things, without any labour of their own to purchase them.

Ver. 12. Then beware, &c.] In prosperity we are too prone to forget our benefactors.

Ver. 13. Thou shalt fear the Lord thy God, and serve him.] Preserve an awful sense of him in thy mind, and be constant in his worship and service; which was never more necessary, than when they enjoyed so many blessings from him.

And shalt swear by his name.] When there was any need of it: as in making covenants with their neighbours, or in bearing their testimony before a judge, they were to swear only by the name of God, not by any idol, nor by the heaven, or the earth, or any thing therein; for they can bear witness to nothing (see Josh. xxiii. 7, 8). Nor was it lawful, as Maimonides observes (in his treatise called Shebuoth), to join any other thing with the name of God. But it was all one, whether a man swore by the proper name of God, or by any of his attributes; as, by the name of Him who is merciful, or gracious, or long-suffering, &c. for this is a perfect oath (see Selden, lib. ii. De Synedr. cap. 11. n. 2. and see n. 7. concerning other oaths).

Ver. 14.] This shows that his intention in this chapter is, to press upon them the observation of the first commandment, which our Saviour justly calls the great commandment.

Ver. 15. Jealous God] See Exod. xx. 5. Exod. xxxiv. 14.

Among you] In the Hebrew, in the midst of you; to observe all you do, though never so secretly.

Lest the anger] For this was the most provoking of all other sins: and therefore we never read either in the law, or in the prophets, the word charon (i. e. fury), or aph (anger), or caas (indignation), or kinah (jealousy), ascribed unto God, but when mention is made of idolatry. So Maimonides observes, More Nevoch. par. i. cap. 36.

16 ¶ Ye shall not tempt the LORD your God, as ye tempted him in Massah.

17 Ye shall diligently keep the commandments of the LORD your God, and his testimonies, and his statutes, which he hath commanded thee.

18 And thou shalt do that which is right and good in the sight of the LORD: that it may be well with thee, and that thou mayest go in and possess the good land which the LORD sware unto thy fathers, 19 To cast out all thine enemies from before thee, as the LORD hath spoken.

20 And when thy son asketh thee in time to come, saying, What mean the testimonies, and the statutes, and the judgments, which the LORD our God hath commanded you?

Ver. 16.] Never distrust God's good providence, nor murmur against him in any distress: for this was the temptation at Massah (Exod. xvii. 2—7).

Ver. 17.] As if he had said, I cannot too often press this upon you; nor can you use too great care in this matter.

Ver. 18. Thou shalt do that which is right and good] As they loved themselves, he charges them not to follow their own desires (which is called "doing that which is good in their own eyes,") but govern themselves by his holy will.

That thou mayest go in and possess the good land] Or rather, "after thou hast gone in, and possessed the good land which the Lord sware unto thy fathers:" for there was no doubt of their going in; but only of their behaviour there, after they were made so happy, ver. 10—12.

Ver. 19.] He seems particularly to charge them to drive out the people of Canaan, as God hath commanded (Numb. xxxiii. 32). For otherwise they would tempt them to forget this great principle of their religion, that the God of Israel was the only God, and entice them to serve their idols (ver. 14).

Ver. 20.] Abarinel thinks, that their posterity, in future ages, might observe three sorts of precepts in the law, viz. testimonies, which in Hebrew are called eduth, which were such constitutions as bear witness of some great thing God had done for them, and preserved the memory thereof; such was the passover. And then, secondly, there were chukkim (statutes), which are such precepts the reason of which is unknown. And, thirdly, mishpatim (judgments), which are such whose reason is evident. Now they might desire to know the reason why such several laws were given; and he thinks Moses teaches them to give a distinct answer to their children about each of these.

Ver. 21.] As if he had said, tell them the reason why he gave us the first sort of precepts, particularly that about the passover, was, because we were slaves, and God brought us a state of liberty; which he would have always thankfully remembered, by the observation of that feast which testified what God wrought for us by his power alone. The like may be said of the other two great festivals, which were to preserve the memory of such-like benefits.

Ver. 22.] Particularly slew all their first-born, and spared those of the Israelites: the memory of which he ordered to be preserved, by giving their first-born unto him (Exod. xiii).

Ver. 23.] This is the reason, Abarinel fancies, of giving them the judgments before mentioned: God brought us out, saith he, to place us in this good land,

21 Then thou shalt say unto thy son, We were Pharaoh's bondmen in Egypt; and the LORD brought us out of Egypt with a mighty hand:

22 And the LORD shewed signs and wonders, great and sore, upon Egypt, upon Pharaoh, and upon all his household, before our eyes:

23 And he brought us out from thence, that he might bring us in, to give us the land which he sware unto our fathers.

24 And the LORD commanded us to do all these statutes, to fear the LORD our God, for our good always, that he might preserve us alive, as it is at this day.

25 And it shall be our righteousness, if we observe to do all these commandments before the LORD our God, as he hath commanded us.

and settle us here under a government of our own. Now civil society cannot be preserved without just judgment: and therefore, that we might live in good order, God gave us these political laws.

Ver. 21. The Lord commanded us to do all these statutes.] As for the third sort, which are statutes, give your children this answer: that though we do not know the reason of them, yet the benefit of them is manifest; for they lead us to the fear of God. And nothing is so much for our good as that, both for the eternal good of our souls, and for the long life of our bodies. So he interprets the last words of this verse; and so doth Maimonides.

For our good always, that he might preserve us alive, as it is at this day.] The first words in the Hebrew are, "that it may be well with us all our days;" or, more literally, "for good to us all our days:" that is, say our rabbins (they are the words of Maimonides, par. iii. More Nevochim, cap. 27. where he repeats what I observed before upon iv. 40), "That it may be well with us in that world which is wholly good; and our days may be prolonged in that world which is wholly long;" or, in short, that thou mayest come into the world which is good and long, which is a perpetual subsistence. As for the last words, they belong, he thinks, to their corporeal subsistence here, which endures but for a time; and therefore he saith, as at this day; to show he speaks of the present world, wherein they should live happily by observing his laws.

Ver. 25. It shall be our righteousness.] Their child ren might say, if there be such benefits in observing the statutes, which lead to the fear of God, and to happiness hereafter, what need we trouble ourselves about the other two? Unto which, Abarinel imagines, they are taught to give this answer, "It is our righteousness, if we observe to do all these commandments;" i. e. we cannot be righteous before God, if they have not respect to all his precepts, whether testimonies, statutes, or judgments, which are all comprehended in this word mitzvot, or commandments. This is something nice and curious, but there is a great deal of truth in it.

The word righteousness also, it must be acknowledged, often comprehends mercy in it: and thus the LXX. and the Vulgar Latin here understand it. And to take in this sense, these words may be thus expounded: If we observe to do all these commandments, God will account us a righteous people, and be kind to us.

Before the Lord our God.] Having a sincere respect to God in all that we do.

CHAPTER VII.

1 All communion with the nations is forbidden, 4 for fear of idolatry, 6 for the holiness of the people, 9 for the nature of God in his mercy and justice, 17 for the assuredness of victory which God will give over them.

1 WHEN the LORD thy God shall bring thee into the land whither thou goest to possess it, and hath cast out many nations before thee, the Hittites, and the Girgashites, and the Amorites, and the Canaanites, and the Perizzites, and the Hivites, and the Jebusites, seven nations greater and mightier than thou;

2 And when the LORD thy God shall deliver them before thee; thou shalt smite them and utterly destroy them; thou shalt make no covenant with them, nor shew mercy unto them:

CHAP. VII.

Ver. 1. The land whither thou goest to possess it,] That is, when he had put them into possession of it.

And hath cast out many nations before thee, &c.] There were ten nations inhabited in this country in the days of Abraham: but three of them were either worn out since that time, or, being but a small people, were incorporated with the rest: for the Kenites and the Kenezites (see Gen. xv. 19.) are not mentioned after that time, and the Rephaim possessed but a little part of Canaan, the great body of them being in Bashan, on this side Jordan, where Moses now was (see upon Gen. xv. 19).

Seven nations greater and mightier than thou;] The Amorites alone seem to have been mightier than the Israelites (for there were no less than five kings of them that dwelt in the mountains, Josh. x. 5, 6, besides those in other parts), and therefore all the seven nations were much superior to them in strength.

Ver. 2. When the Lord thy God shall deliver them before thee, &c.] He still pursues his intention, to preserve in them a due care to observe the first commandment, of which he began to treat in the foregoing chapter: for that is the reason why they were to destroy these seven nations, that they might not be in danger to be seduced by them to serve other gods (ver. 1). But whether they were not first to offer them terms of peace, according to the directions in the twentieth chapter of this book, is a question which I have endeavoured to resolve in another place, upon Exod. xxiii. 33. Certain it is, that if they refused their offers, there was the greater reason to be severe to them: and without offering them any terms, God might in justice order the Israelites to destroy them: for every king hath power in his dominions to cut off evil-doers; and therefore much more the King of kings: who might order whom he pleased (as other kings do) to be executioners in his vengeance upon these seven nations, for their abominable idolatries, beastly lusts, and horrid cruelties, and other such like sins, of which they were guilty.

This was a thing of such moment, that God ordered Moses to give them this charge some time ago (Numb. xxxiii. 52), which he now renews.

Make no covenant with them,] To suffer them to live with them in the same country (Exod. xxvii. 12).

Nor shew mercy unto them:] For that had been cruelty to themselves and their posterity, to spare such incurable idolaters. How far the Talmudists extend this, see in Dionys. Vossius, upon Maimonides' Treatise of Idolatry, p. 139, and Maimonides himself, in the following paragraphs, 4—6.

Ver. 3.] See Exod. xxxiv. 15. Some of the Jews

3 Neither shalt thou make marriages with them; thy daughter thou shalt not give unto his son, nor his daughter shalt thou take unto thy son.

4 For they will turn away thy son from following me, that they may serve other gods: so will the anger of the LORD be kindled against you, and destroy thee suddenly.

think they might marry with them, if they became proselytes of justice (as they called those who received circumcision, and undertook to observe the whole law); and that they might think this was not lawful, yet think that they might marry with the children of such proselytes (see Selden, lib. v. De Jure Nat. et Gent. &c. cap. 14, 15). And the Talmudists say, this law did not extend to proselytes, who might marry with any of these nations, as he shows there, cap. 13.

Ver. 4.] There was great danger, if they loved their wives, that they might draw them to their idolatry; in which they were so rooted, that there was little hope of converting them to the true religion. Therefore this is opposed to the love of the Lord their God, for the preserving of which in their hearts they are forbidden such marriages (Josh. xxiii. 11, 12). And indeed it was but a piece of natural equity, that they should abstain from such familiarity with those who would certainly undo them. Which made Abraham, before this law, charge his son Isaac not to take a wife from among the Canaanites; and the same care was taken of Jacob. And when this law of Moses was abolished, the apostle warns Christians themselves against such unequal matches (2 Cor. vi. 14). The danger of which David had noted, Ps. cvi. 35, 36. "So will the anger of the Lord be kindled against you," &c. (see vi. 15).

Ver. 5. But thus shall ye deal with them;] Or, "therefore thus shall ye deal with them;" that is, to prevent the forementioned mischief, he orders them to leave no relic of their idolatry remaining.

Ye shall destroy their altars,] The very same precept, Exod. xxxiv. 13.

Break down their images,] The very same words with these are in Exod. xxiii. 21 (only there it is said, "quite break down"), and in Exod. xxxiv. 13.

Cut down their groves,] There is the same mention of asherim (which we translate groves) in the place last named; only another word for cut down (see there). But Mr. Selden, both there and here, understands by asherim, wooden images of Astarte, a great goddess worshipped in that country: for which among other reasons, he gives this, that Gideon is said to have thrown down the altar of Baal, and cut down the grove that was by it. So we translate it, Judg. vi. 25, 28, where, in the Hebrew, the last word is alaw, which signifies upon it, and not by it: and so the LXX. Ἐπ' αὐτῶν. And therefore the asherah, which is said to be upon the altar, must not signify a grove, but an image; and none more likely than that of Astarte (see De Diis Syris, Syntagm. ii. cap. 2 and 2 Kings xxxiii. 6, 7).

6 For thou art an holy people unto the Lord thy God: the Lord thy God hath chosen thee to be a special people unto himself, above all people that are upon the face of the earth.

7 The Lord did not set his love upon you, nor choose you, because ye were more in number than any people; for ye were the fewest of all people:

8 But because the Lord loved you, and because he would keep the oath which he had sworn unto your fathers, hath the Lord brought you out with a mighty hand, and redeemed you out of the house of bondmen, from the hand of Pharaoh king of Egypt.

9 Know therefore that the Lord thy God, he is God, the faithful God, which keepeth covenant and mercy with them that love him and keep his commandments to a thousand generations;

10 And repayeth them that hate him to their face, to destroy them: he will not be slack to him that hateth him, he will repay him to his face.

11 Thou shalt therefore keep the commandments, and the statutes, and the judgments, which I command thee this day, to do them.

12 ¶ Wherefore it shall come to pass, if ye hearken to these judgments, and keep, and do them, that the Lord thy God shall keep unto thee the covenant and the mercy which he swore unto thy fathers:

13 And he will love thee, and bless thee and multiply thee: he will also bless the fruit of thy womb, and the fruit of thy land, thy corn, and

Burn their graven images] As he was commanded to destroy their molten images (Numb. xxxiii. 52), that so no sort of image, nor any monument of their worship might be left in the country, but all so entirely abolished, that they might have no incentive to idolatry. This was the work of the supreme governor, as Grotius prudently observes: for though out of private places it belonged to the lord of the place, or, if he were negligent, to the king, to remove idols, yet none but the supreme power might remove them out of public places, or such persons who were delegated thereby to that office (see L. De Imper. Sum. Potest. circa Sacra, cap. 8, sect. 3).

Ver. 6. For thou art an holy people] This is an argument frequently used, particularly in the book of Leviticus, why they should cleave to God alone; because he had separated them to himself by many peculiar laws, which no other people had but they (Lev. xi. 44, 45. xix. 2. xx. 7. 26).

The Lord thy God hath chosen thee to be a special people unto himself.] As he had distinguished them from all other people by peculiar laws, so by special favours and singular privileges which no other nation whatsoever enjoyed (see Exod. xix. 5, 6). Some interpret the words special people, to signify that they belonged to none but him; and he had no other people but they; whom he had espoused to himself. From whence it is, that, as the Israelites are called God's people, so that country is called his land (Ps. lxxxv. 1), for there he dwelt by his special presence. And the king of that country is called God's king (Ps. xviii. 50), and he is said to sit on God's throne, and to be Melech le Jehovah, "king for the Lord" (2 Chron. ix. 8), and the kingdom is called the "kingdom of the Lord" (xiii. 8), and therefore with this argument Asa addresses himself to God in the next chapter (xiv. 11), for help in time of distress, because "he was their God;" and would not, he hoped, let their enemies "prevail against himself." And accordingly these enemies are said to be "destroyed before the Lord, and before his host" (ver. 13). Jehoshaphat also exhorts the judges in that book to great caution (2 Chron. xix. 6), because they "judged not for man, but for the Lord. And the prophet exhorts, in the following chapter (xx. 15), not to be afraid of a mighty host which came against him, because "the battle is not yours, but God's;" the cause in which they fought being his, more than their own.

Ver. 7. The Lord did not set his love upon you.] To be his special people, as he calls them in the foregoing verse.

Because ye were more in number] When God declared his love first to Abraham and his posterity he had no child, Gen. xii. 1—3. xv. 1, 2. And when he had, his family continued so small, after there were twelve heirs of the promise, that in the space of two hundred years they were but seventy persons (Gen. xli. 27). Nor do we read of any great increase of them till after the death of Joseph, which was near fourscore years more (Exod. i. 7, 8, &c.). So St. Stephen observes, Acts vii. 17. "When the time of the promise drew nigh, which God had sworn to Abraham, the people grew and multiplied in Egypt."

Ver. 8. But because the Lord loved you.] Because it was his good pleasure to single them out from all other people, to receive special tokens of his favour to them.

Because he would keep the oath which he had sworn, &c.] Not for any desert of theirs; but to make good his promise confirmed with an oath, did he work their wonderful deliverance out of Egypt (Gen. xv. 13, 14. xxii. 16, &c.).

Ver. 9. Know therefore that the Lord thy God, he is God.] He exhorts them therefore to preserve this sense in their mind, that their God is the only God.

The faithful God, which keepeth covenant, &c.] Who will not only faithfully keep his word and make good his promises, but do abundantly more than he hath promised to those that cleave unto him alone, and serve no other God: for it appears by the second commandment, that is peculiarly meant by loving him.

To a thousand generations;] See Exod. xx. 6.

Ver. 10. And repayeth them that hate him] Punisheth all idolaters, who are peculiarly called "haters of God," as I have often observed (see Exod. xx. 5).

To their face.] They themselves should live to see and feel the punishment of their idolatry. So the Chaldee paraphrases it, Bacajehon, "in their life."

He will not be slack to him that hateth him, he will repay him] Though he do not punish him immediately, yet he will not defer it long, but be avenged of him before he die. Therefore, when he threatens to punish them to the third and fourth generation, the meaning is not that he will only punish their posterity, but them with their posterity; whom they shall see destroyed before their face. For the fourth generation (as Maimonides observes) is as much as the oldest men commonly live to see.

Ver. 11.] All the laws of God (see vi. 1), especially this great commandment, to have no other God but him.

Ver. 12.] As faithfully fulfil his promises to them, as he did to their fathers.

Ver. 13. He will love thee.] Continue his love to them.

And bless thee, and multiply thee.] This was the great promise made to their fathers, that he would thy wine, and thine oil, the increase of thy kine, and the flocks of thy sheep, in the land which he swore unto thy fathers to give thee.

14 Thou shalt be blessed above all people: there shall not be male or female barren among you, or among your cattle.

15 And the LORD will take away from thee all sickness, and will put none of the evil diseases of Egypt, which thou knowest, upon thee; but will lay them upon all them that hate thee.

17 And thou shalt consume all the people which the LORD thy God shall deliver thee; thine eye shall have no pity upon them: neither shalt thou serve their gods; for that will be a snare unto thee.

16 If thou shalt say in thine heart, These nations are more than I; how can I dispossess them?

18 Thou shalt not be afraid of them: but shalt well remember what the LORD thy God did unto Pharaoh, and unto all Egypt; make their posterity as numerous as the stars of heaven, and the dust of the earth (Gen. xv. 5. xxii. 17. xxviii. 14).

He will also bless the fruit of thy womb,] Preserve them from miscarrying, that so they might multiply.

The fruit of thy land,] By giving them rain in due season, &c. (see Lev. xxvi. 4, 5).

The increase of thy kine,] The Hebrew word segar, which we translate increase, the LXX., Vulgar, and Syriac, render the herds. But Onkelos and Jonathan translate it as we do, “the young ones which the mothers bring forth” (see Bochart. par. i. Hierozolcon. lib. ii. cap. 30).

The flocks of thy sheep,] The Hebrew word ashtaroth comprehends flocks both of sheep and of greater cattle, as the same Bochartus observes, par. i. Hieroz. lib. iii. cap. 43. and in his Canaan, lib. ii. cap. 2. Where he observes, that the goddess Astarte, in those countries was thought to preside over flocks of sheep and herds of oxen.

Ver. 14. Thou shalt be blessed above all people:] He promises to make them as singular for his favours, as they were in their laws and manner of living.

Not be male or female barren] See Exod. xxiii. 26.

Ver. 15. Take away from thee all sickness,] Or remove from them the common diseases and infirmities of mankind; so that they should die in a good old age (as the Scripture speaks); which tended manifestly to their increase and multiplication.

And will put none of the evil diseases of Egypt upon thee;] Neither those blotches or bites which God, by an immediate hand, smote them withal (Exod. ix. 9. xv. 25), nor any other which they in that country were subject unto, peculiarly their filthy ulcers, called Egyptiaca and Syriaca, as Casaubon observes upon Persius, Sat. v. p. 467. with which the priests of Isis were wont to threaten and terrify poor people, if they did not worship her. In opposition to which our very learned Dr. Spencer thinks God made this special promise to his people, to preserve them from all such evil diseases, if they kept themselves pure from that Egyptian idolatry. Which is very ingenious, if the worship of Isis was so ancient as the days of Moses (see lib. i. De Legibus Hebr. Ritual. cap. 3).

But will lay them upon all them that hate thee.] And thereby disable them to hurt his people.

Ver. 16. Thou shalt consume all the people] Utterly destroy all the people of Canaan, when they had 19 The great temptations which thine eyes saw, and the signs, and the wonders, and the mighty hand, and the stretched out arm, whereby the LORD thy God brought thee out: so shall the LORD thy God do unto all the people of whom thou art afraid.

20 Moreover the LORD thy God will send the hornet among them, until they that are left, and hide themselves from thee, be destroyed.

21 Thou shalt not be affrighted at them: for the LORD thy God is among you, a mighty God and terrible.

22 And the LORD thy God will put out those nations before thee by little and little: thou mayest not consume them at once, lest the beasts of the field increase upon thee.

23 But the LORD thy God shall deliver them unto thee, and shall destroy them with a mighty destruction, until they be destroyed.

24 And he shall deliver their kings into thine hand, and thou shalt destroy their name conquered them, as he commanded them before, v. 7

Thine eye shall have no pity] The reason of this severity was, because of their abominable wickedness, as I there observed.

Neither shalt thou serve their gods;] In the Hebrew, “and thou shalt not serve their gods,” &c. This severity was used to prevent their being enticed by them to their idolatry, if they had suffered them to live among them.

Ver. 17.] If such a diffidence began to arise in their hearts, as possessed their forefathers (Numb. xiv).

Ver. 18.] He requires them immediately to excel all fear by faith in God; which the remembrance of what God had done for them, if seriously reflected on, might well work in them.

Ver. 19.] Of all these he had put them in mind before (iv. 34), and now renews the remembrance of it, that the experience they had of God's power and goodness might banish all fear out of their hearts.

Ver. 20. Will send the hornet among them,] Raise up enemies which they think not of to infest them, that is, unusual swarms of hornets, and of an unusual bigness, it is like, which came like an army upon them (see Exod. xviii. 28).

Until they that are left, and hide themselves from thee, be destroyed.] Which should pursue those that fled from the Israelites, and sting them to death in their lurking holes.

Ver. 21. Thou shalt not be affrighted at them:] Let all this inspire you with courage.

For the Lord thy God is among you,] The Sovereign of the world, of whose goodness you have had such long experience, dwells among you, and conducts and leads you, wheresoever you go: and who can stand before him? (see Exod. xvii. 7).

Ver. 22.] Be not discouraged, though they be not destroyed all at once: there is a great reason against that, concerning which see Exod. xxiii. 21, where this verse is explained.

Ver. 23.] In time he will deliver them all up into thy hand; and thou shalt so overpower them, as to leave none of them remaining.

Ver. 24. He shall deliver their kings into thine hand,] As he did, we read in the book of Joshua, xii. 7—9, &c. where thirty-one kings are enumerated, who were conquered by him.

Thou shalt destroy their name] There shall no memory, of so much as the names of such men, be left anywhere.

from under heaven: there shall no man be able to stand before thee, until thou have destroyed them.

25 The graven images of their gods shall ye burn with fire; thou shalt not desire the silver or gold that is on them, nor take it unto thee, lest

There shall no man be able to stand before thee,] The kings and great men of the country being destroyed, their victory was easier over the rest.

Ver. 25. The graven images—shall ye burn] This he had required before, ver. 5, but mentions it again, to let them know, that if they did not perform their part of the covenant (of which this was the chief), God would not destroy the inhabitants of Canaan totally. As we find he did not, Judges ii. 2, 3, and for this very reason, as Joshua had told them, xxiii. 12, 13.

Thou shalt not desire the silver or gold that is on them,] The Jews are too nice and curious who expound this only of the gold and silver cloths, or the chains, or other jewels of gold and silver, wherewith their images are adorned; because he saith on them. There is no reason to doubt but he means, that they should be destroyed, if they were entirely made of massy gold and silver; which they were not to convert to their own use: for thus Moses did with the golden calf, Exod. xxxii. 20, and Jacob in ancients time buried all the strange gods, as well as the earrings that were in their ears (Gen. xxxv. 4). And Josiah, in future ages, burnt every thing that had been employed to idolatry, even the vessels that were made for Baal, as well as the images, &c. and stamped them to powder (2 Kings xxiii. 4. 6. 14, 15).

Nor take it unto thee, lest thou be ensnared therein.] Be drawn into a conceit, that there was something sacred in it, and so tempted to worship it.

For it is an abomination to the Lord thy God.] Whatsoever hath been employed to such idolatrous worship, is so detestable unto the divine Majesty, that he will not have it converted to any ordinary and common use, but utterly destroyed.

Ver. 26. Neither shalt thou bring an abomination into thine house,] And therefore he requires them not to bring any of that silver and gold which had belonged to those idols (which he calls an abomination) into their houses, to be employed unto any private use whatsoever: so the Jews understand these words, having made from hence one of their affirmative precepts: that no man should seek the least profit or benefit from any thing appertaining to an idol.

26 Neither shalt thou bring an abomination into thine house, lest thou be a cursed thing like it: but thou shalt utterly detest it, and thou shalt utterly abhor it; for it is a cursed thing.

*Lest thou be a cursed thing like it:] Every thing that was idolatrous was a chorem, devoted to destruction, as he saith in the last words, "it is a cursed thing," which no man might meddle withal (xiii. 17). If he did, he became an accursed thing, i. e. was devoted to destruction, as the thing itself was. This was apparent afterward in the example of Achan (Josh. vii.), who took a wedge of gold and a Babylonish garment for his own private use, when it had been made a chorem by God's express command (Josh. vi. 17), and therefore was stoned to death.*

Thou shalt utterly detest it, and—abhor it,] Not only look upon it as useless and unprofitable, but as hateful and execrable in the highest degree, and therefore to be entirely destroyed. All this tended to their preservation in the true religion: which taught them to have every thing contrary to it in the utmost detestation: insomuch (as Maimonides interprets this precept, in his More Nevochim, par. iii. cap. 37), that if any man broke such images, or melted them down, and then sold the silver and gold, he committed an abomination: and the price of this being mingled with his other riches, proved the rust of them all. This he thinks is the meaning of bringing an "abomination into their house." Which was so far from bringing a blessing (as the heathen imagined), that it brought a curse upon all that they had.

The Jews were so sensible of all this, after they had severely smarted for their idolatry, that they thought it unlawful to use any vessel that had been employed in sacrificing to a false god: nay, to warm themselves with the wood of a grove that was cut down; or to sit under the shadow of it, for coolness' sake, while it was standing; or so much as to use the ashes of the wood that were left after the grove was burnt (see Selden, lib. ii. De Jure Nat. et Gent. juxta Discipul. Heb. cap. 7. p. 215, 216, &c.).

CHAPTER VIII.

An exhortation to obedience in regard of God's dealing with them.

1 ALL the commandments which I command thee this day shall ye observe to do, that ye may live, and multiply, and go in and possess the land which the LORD swore unto your fathers.

2 And thou shalt remember all the way which

CHAP. VIII.

Ver. 1. All the commandments—shall ye observe to do,] He seems still to press them to have a special care to observe the ten commandments, and especially the first of them (vi. 4—6). For it appears by the latter end of this chapter that he hath a regard to that.

That ye may live,] Long and happily: for life, every one knows, frequently signifies all the comforts of life, as death signifies all manner of miseries.

And multiply,] Which is the effect of a long and happy life.

Go in and possess the land, &c.] See vi. 18.

the LORD thy God led thee, these forty years in the wilderness, to humble thee, and to prove thee, to know what was in thine heart, whether thou wouldest keep his commandments, or no.

3 And he humbled thee, and suffered thee to

Ver. 2. Thou shalt remember all the way which the Lord thy God led thee] Whereby they were severely punished for the rebellion of their forefathers against him; which should be an admonition to them to be more dutiful. Others expound it of the care of God over them, in providing for them and protecting them, as well as leading them by a glorious cloud all that time; which doth well enough agree with what follows (see ii. 7).

To humble thee,] Or, to afflict thee with tedious wanderings up and down, backward and forward, without any certain dwelling-place.

hunger, and fed thee with manna, which thou knewest not, neither did thy fathers know; that he might make thee know that man doth not live by bread only, but by every word that proceedeth out of the mouth of the LORD doth man live.

4 Thy raiment waxed not old upon thee, neither did thy foot swell, these forty years.

5 Thou shalt also consider in thine heart, that, as a man chasteneth his son, so the LORD thy God chasteneth thee.

6 Therefore thou shalt keep the commandments of the LORD thy God, to walk in his ways, and to fear him.

And to prove thee,] To try whether they would be better, by being kept so long out of the good land promised unto them.

To know what was in thine heart,] God knew perfectly how they were disposed towards him; but it was fit, that they should know themselves better, and posterity be instructed by their behaviour.

Ver. 3. He humbled thee, and suffered thee to hunger,] He afflicted thee, by suffering thee to want bread to eat (Exod. xvi. 2, 3).

And fed thee with manna,] But it was that he might have an opportunity to make a bountiful provision for such a vast multitude of people, as were fed by him every day from heaven, and teach them to depend on his good providence.

Which thou knewest not,] Exod. xvi. 15. He made an unusual, as well as an unexpected provision for them.

Man doth not live by bread only,] That it is not only our common food that preserves us.

But by every word that proceedeth out of the mouth of the Lord doth man live,] But by any thing whatsoever (for so word often signifies) which God shall please to command to give us nourishment. This was a wonderful encouragement to obedience, that God would rather work a miracle, than suffer them to want necessities; and by a light aerial sort of bread, give them as great strength and vigour, as the most solid nourishment was wont to afford them. The remembrance of which could not but excite their posterity to love God, and serve him, if they often and seriously reflected on it.

Ver. 4.] These were two other wonderful benefits, which, if well considered, could not but incline them to be obedient to him, who multiplied miracles to nourish and strengthen their faith and hope in him. The Jews, to increase the miracle, say, their clothes enlarged as they grew bigger, from children to men; and so did their shoes also: but there was no need of this; for the clothes and shoes of those men that died might serve their children when they grew up to their stature. And it was sufficiently amazing, without such additions, that their clothes should not so much as decay, nor their feet, by so long travelling in hot or stony places, have the least swelling in them, or, as some translate it, grow callous. There are those that refer this last clause not to their feet, but to their shoes; according to what we read, xxix. 5.

Ver. 5. Consider in thine heart,] Often reflect and ponder.

That as a man chasteneth his son,] All the afflictions which God had sent upon them, he would have them think, were not for their undoing, but for their amendment, and correcting what was amiss in them; and therefore ought to be thankfully acknowledged as well as his benefits.

Ver. 6.] Howsoever therefore he dealt with them, it ought to have led them to obedience. In the re-

7 For the LORD thy God bringeth thee into a good land, a land of brooks of water, of fountains and depths, that spring out of valleys and hills;

8 A land of wheat, and barley, and vines, and fig trees, and pomegranates; a land of oil olive, and honey;

9 A land wherein thou shalt eat bread without scarceness, thou shalt not lack any thing in it; a land whose stones are iron, and out of whose hills thou mayest dig brass.

10 When thou hast eaten and art full, then thou shalt bless the LORD thy God for the good land which he hath given thee.

petition of this so often. Moses doth but practise his own lesson, which he had taught them, vi. 7, that they should teach these words diligently to their children, &c.

Ver. 7. For the Lord thy God bringeth thee into a good land,] Therefore there was the greater need they should enter into it with the pious resolution before mentioned, "to fear God and walk in his ways." Otherwise, they would be in great danger to be corrupted by such plenty and variety of all good things as this land afforded.

A land of brooks of water, of fountains and depths] The Hebrew word tehom, which we translate deep, and in the plural number depths, signifies sometimes those great caverns of water that are within the ground, which were made by the plentiful rains, which God sent upon this country while they were obedient to him; which both made it fruitful (though now barren), and abounding also with water for their cattle (Ps. lxxxviii. 15. Ezek. xxxi. 4). But it is here commonly interpreted lakes, or wells of water.

Ver. 8. A land of wheat, &c.] Plentifully stored with all things necessary for the support and pleasure of life.

A land of oil olive, and honey;] The same word debas, which signifies honey, signifies also dates. And so De Dieu thinks it most reasonable to translate it here, being joined with four other sorts of fruits; and so Kimchi saith, the ancient Jews expounded it in this place, and in 2 Chron. xxxi. 5, where it is said, that "Israel brought in abundance, the first-fruits of corn, wine, oil, and honey, or dates," as we there translate it in the margin.

Ver. 9. Wherein thou shalt eat bread without scarceness,] Be in no want of any sort of provision, which is comprehended under the name of bread.

Thou shalt not lack any thing] No other conveniences of life.

A land whose stones are iron, and out of whose hills thou mayest dig brass.] Where there are useful minerals, as plentiful as stones are in other places. These are the rather mentioned, because there were no such mines in Egypt, where they had long dwelt, and were stored with plenty of other things (Numb. xi. 5).

Ver. 10. When thou—art full,] After a liberal meal. Then thou shalt bless the Lord thy God for the good land] Give solemn thanks to God, not only for that present repast, but for the plentiful provision he had made for them of all good things, in the land he had bestowed on them. From this place the Jews have made it a general rule, or as they call it, an affirmative precept, that "every one bless God at their meals," that is, as I said, give him thanks for his benefits: for he blesses us when he bestows good things upon us; and we bless him when we thankfully acknowledge his goodness therein: which is a natural duty which we owe to the Fountain and Original of all good.

11 Beware that thou forget not the Lord thy God, in not keeping his commandments, and his judgments, and his statutes, which I command thee this day :

12 Lest when thou hast eaten and art full, and hast built goodly houses, and dwelt therein ;

13 And when thy herds and thy flocks multiply, and thy silver and thy gold is multiplied, and all that thou hast is multiplied ;

14 Then thine heart be lifted up, and thou forget the Lord thy God, which brought thee forth out of the land of Egypt, from the house of bondage :

15 Who led thee through that great and terrible wilderness, wherein were fiery serpents, and scorpions, and drought, where there was no water ; who brought thee forth water out of the rock of flint ;

16 Who fed thee in the wilderness with manna, which thy fathers knew not, that he might humble thee, and that he might prove thee, to do thee good at thy latter end ;

17 And thou say in thine heart, My power and the might of mine hand hath gotten me this wealth.

18 But thou shalt remember the Lord thy God : for it is he that giveth thee power to get wealth, that he may establish his covenant which he swore unto thy fathers, as it is this day.

Ver. 11.] He would have their thanksgiving for his benefits leave such a sense of God upon their minds, as should make them careful to yield him an entire obedience.

Ver. 12.] Feasted in stately houses, wherein they enjoyed their ease.

Ver. 13.] The sense of these two verses is, when they had great abundance of all good things within doors and without.

Ver. 14. Then thine heart be lifted up.] Which is a usual effect of great riches ; as Enripides observes in that known saying of his, ἰσθὺν δε τιχτεὶ πλοῦτος, "wealth breeds pride, scorn, and contempt of others." This Moses Kotzenis thought so great a sin, that he puts it among the negative precepts ; and pretends he was warned in a dream so to do, though Maimonides, and others, had omitted it. And when he awaked, he was confirmed in it, by reading a place in the Gemara upon Sota, cap. 1), which saith, wheresoever we find these words in Scripture, take heed lest, there is a prohibition, as there is ver. 11, and here, to take heed of pride : "for whosoever is proud, he shall be brought low," as the Gemara there adds, which are, in a manner, the words of our blessed Saviour (St. Luke xviii. 14.)

Thou forget the Lord thy God.] This is another common effect of large possessions, which makes the owners of them fall into sloth and luxury, and such forgetfulness of the Donor of all good things, that they trust in uncertain riches (as the apostle speaks), and not in the living God, imagining now they can never want ; not because God is so good, but because they have such store of good things laid up, for many years.

Which brought you forth out of the land of Egypt.] No wonder if they forgot all his former benefits, when they were unthankful for the present.

Ver. 15. Terrible wilderness.] See i. 19.

Wherein were fiery serpents.] See Num. xxi. 6.

Scorpions.] These are commonly joined with serpents in Scripture, even in the New Testament (Luke x. 19. xi. 12, 13), being found in the same places, especially in this desert of Arabia.

Drought.] The Hebrew word tsinmaon signifies a dry place, as we translate it, Ps. cvii. 33. Isa. xxxv. 7. And that best agrees with what here follows, where there was no water.

Who brought thee forth water out of the rock.] From which one would have sooner expected fire than water (Num. ix. 11).

Ver. 16. Who fed thee in the wilderness with manna.]

Ver. 3. The great Salmasius, in a treatise on purpose about manna hath said a great deal to prove that the manna which God sent the Jews did not differ in its form or substance from that which commonly fell in those countries, and doth so at this day ; but herein consisted the miracle, that he gave them in a prescribed measure, and so abundantly, as to suffice such a vast number, and that every morning, in all seasons of the year. This made it a Divine manna ; for the common fell only in small quantities, and not always, but at some times in the year.

That he might humble thee.] This word is commonly understood of humbling by affliction ; which may seem not to belong to manna ; for that was a singular benefit, being an excellent nourishment, and of a delicious taste : but they, having nothing else besides this to live upon, were soon tired with it (as we find Num. xi. 6). And much more did it seem an affliction to them, to live upon one thing alone for forty years together ; and God intended by it to humble them, at the same time that he was extraordinary kind to them.

Prove thee.] Whether they would be thankful that they were not starved, and submit to his wise providence, and obey his laws ; which they had the greater reason to observe, because it was evident they owed their very life and being to him every moment : for without new supplies every day from heaven, they had been famished in that desolate wilderness.

Do thee good.] That in conclusion his kindness to them might be more thankfully received, and more safely enjoyed. So Maimonides expounds this passage, in his More Nevochim (par. iii. cap. 24), "God was pleased to accustom them to labour in the wilderness, that he might increase their happiness when they came into the land of Canaan. For this is certain, a transition from labour to rest is far sweeter than continual rest. Nor could they so easily have subdued the land, and overcome the inhabitants of it, unless they had endured some hardship in the wilderness. For rest and idleness take away men's courage, but labour and hard fare augment it. And this is the good (saith he) which was in the issue to redound to them by this wise dispensation of God's providence."

Ver. 17.] Such vain conceits are apt to arise in men's minds, if they preserve not a sense of God, and of all his mercies to them.

Ver. 18.] Remember the Lord thy God : for it is he that giveth thee power to get wealth.] Continually call to mind that they owed all they had, and the increase of it, to his almighty providence ; without whom they could never have gotten possession of this land, nor have prospered in it.

That he may establish his covenant, &c.] He would have them sensible of their own unworthiness also (which would make them more grateful to him) of all the blessings God had bestowed on them, and acknowledge them to his mere goodness, and fidelity to his promises ; for they had been a murmuring and rebellious people.

19 And it shall be, if thou do at all forget the LORD thy God, and walk after other gods, and serve them, and worship them, I testify against you this day that ye shall surely perish.

Ver. 19. It shall be, if thou do at all forget the Lord thy God.] Luxury and pride (the usual effects of fulness) naturally made them unthankful and un-mindful of God: and neglect of God's service made them easily fall to idolatry.

And walk after other gods.] The two last expressions are the explication of the first; for then they walked after the idols of the people (as Onkelos paraphrases it), when they worshipped and adored them. It is evident by this, that the drift of Moses, in all this discourse, is (as I observed before) to press upon them the first and great commandment.

I testify against you this day] See iv. 26.

Ver. 20. As the nations which the Lord destroyeth before your face.] He speaks in the present tense, because he was about to destroy them: and when he began, he destroyed them by little and little (vii. 22), and there were still more to be destroyed.

So shall ye perish.] It was but just that they should perish as those nations did, because they fell into their sin.

CHAPTER IX.

Moses dissuadeth them from the opinion of their own righteousness, by rehearsing their several rebellions.

1 HEAR, O Israel: Thou art to pass over Jordan this day, to go in to possess nations greater and mightier than thyself, cities great and fenced up to heaven.

2 A people great and tall, the children of the Anakims, whom thou knowest, and of whom thou hast heard say, Who can stand before the children of Anak!

3 Understand therefore this day, that the Lord thy God is he which goeth over before thee; as a consuming fire he shall destroy them, and he shall bring them down before thy face: so shalt thou drive them out, and destroy them quickly, as the Lord hath said unto thee.

4 Speak not thou in thine heart, after that the Lord thy God hath cast them out from before thee, saying, For my righteousness the Lord hath brought me in to possess this land: but for the wickedness of these nations the Lord doth drive them out from before thee.

CHAP. IX.

Ver. 1. Hear, O Israel.] He begins a new exhortation to them, at some distance of time from the former, but still aiming at the same thing, to represent to them the danger of idolatry.

Thou art to pass over Jordan this day.] That is, shortly, and not long hence; for it cannot be meant precisely: all these things being spoken in the eleventh month of the last year of their travels, and they passed not over Jordan till the first month of the next year. Between which and this time Moses died, and they mourned a whole month for him.

To go in to possess nations] A country inhabited by nations; for the people themselves they were to destroy.

Greater and mightier than thyself.] Whom notwithstanding God would deliver up into their hands.

Cities great and fenced up to heaven.] As the spies had represented them (i. 28). And they were, indeed, very strong cities, whose walls could not easily be scaled.

Ver. 2. Great and tall.] See Numb. xiv. 28. 32.

The children of the Anakims.] Who seem to have been the chief of those Nephilim or Rephaim (which we sometimes translate giants) in those parts (Numb. xiii. 22. 28. 33).

Who can stand before the children of Anak!] A common proverb in those days. The children of Anak being so famous, that the whole nation (as Bochartus thinks) took its name from them. For Bene-Anak (i. e. children of Anak), or Pheneanek, is easily changed into Phœnicia. These Anakims were vanquished by Joshua, who drove them out of the cities where they dwelt, and made them flee to the Philistines. Where a remnant of them seemed to have lived till the days of David. For Goliath, and his brethren Lahmi, Sippai, and Ishbibanob (1 Chron. x. 4. &c.) were Anakims; and so was that man with six toes on each foot, and six fingers on each hand (2 Sam. xxi. 16), for they were all born at Gath; which was one of the cities to which the Anakims fled (Josh. xi. 22). Some think that from hence kings, among the Greeks, were called Ἀνακτες, because commonly they chose those to rule over them who were persons of a great stature, and carried majesty in their faces. But it is not improbable (as I observed before) that some of the Anakims fled into Greece, and settled there, when they were driven out of Canaan.

Ver. 3. Understand therefore this day.] Settle this therefore in your minds, before you go over Jordan, as undoubted truth.

Goeth over before thee;] Over Jordan (Josh. iii. 3, &c.).

Consuming fire] Before whom none can stand (iv. 24).

He shall destroy them.] See Josh. iii. 10, 11. The Hebrews have a conceit, that the fire which burnt upon the altar appeared in the form of a lion; to show what God would be to their enemies, if the Israelites obeyed him; otherwise what he would be to them.

So shalt thou drive them out.] Not the whole seven nations entirely; whom he said God would drive out by little and little (vii. 22) but so many, as to make a settlement for themselves, in Canaan without much difficulty.

Ver. 4. Speak not thou in thine heart.] When this is done, do not so much as entertain a thought.

For my righteousness] Nothing is more dangerous than pride and self-conceit; and therefore, as he taught them before (viii. 7) to have an humble opinion of their own power, so now not to arrogate any thing to themselves, on the account of their own righteousness.

But for the wickedness of these nations] Lev. xviii. 24, 25. 27, 28.

5 Not for thy righteousness, or for the uprightness of thine heart, dost thou go to possess their land: but for the wickedness of these nations the LORD thy God doth drive them out from before thee, and that he may perform the word which the LORD sware unto thy fathers, Abraham, Isaac, and Jacob.

6 Understand therefore, that the LORD thy God giveth thee not this good land to possess it for thy righteousness; for thou art a stiffnecked people.

7 ¶ Remember, and forget not, how thou provokedst the LORD thy God to wrath in the wilderness: from the day that thou didst depart out of the land of Egypt, until ye came unto this place, ye have been rebellious against the LORD.

8 Also in Horeb ye provoked the LORD to wrath, so that the LORD was angry with you to have destroyed you.

9 When I was gone up into the mount to receive the tables of stone, even the tables of the covenant which the LORD made with you, then I abode in the mount forty days and forty nights, I neither did eat bread nor drink water:

10 And the LORD delivered unto me two tables of stone written with the finger of God; and on them was written according to all the words, which the LORD spake with you in the mount out of the midst of the fire in the day of the assembly.

11 And it came to pass at the end of forty days and forty nights, that the LORD gave me the two tables of stone, even the tables of the covenant.

12 And the LORD said unto me, Arise, get thee down quickly from hence; for thy people which thou hast brought forth out of Egypt have corrupted themselves; they are quickly turned aside out of the way which I commanded them; they have made them a molten image.

13 Furthermore the LORD spake unto me, saying, I have seen this people, and, behold, it is a stiffnecked people:

14 Let me alone, that I may destroy them, and blot out their name from under heaven: and I will make of thee a nation mightier and greater than they.

15 So I turned and came down from the mount, and the mount burned with fire: and the two tables of the covenant were in my two hands.

16 And I looked, and, behold, ye had sinned against the LORD your God, and had made you a molten calf: ye had turned aside quickly out of the way which the LORD had commanded you.

17 And I took the two tables, and cast them out of my two hands, and brake them before your eyes.

18 And I fell down before the LORD, as at

Ver. 5.] It was of great moment (which makes him repeat it again) that they should understand the true causes why God expelled these nations, and gave their land to the Israelites; which were these two; first, the abominable wickedness of the Canaanites; for which they deserved to be rooted: secondly, God's gracious promises to the pious ancestors of the Israelites, with whom he made a covenant, and confirmed it with an oath, to plant them there, in the room of the former inhabitants.

Ver. 6. Understand therefore.] He repeats it a third time, that, if it were possible, he might root out of the Israelites the opinion of their own deserts, before he rooted the Canaanites out of their country.

Thou art a stiffnecked people.] So far from being righteous, that they were very refractory. Of which God often complained (Exod. xxxii. 9. xxxiii. 3. 5), and Moses acknowledges it in his prayer to God for them (xxxiv. 9).

Ver. 7. Remember,—how thou provokedst the Lord] In order to destroy the opinion of their own righteousness, it was necessary to call to mind some of their most notorious provocations; which he exhorts them carefully to preserve in their mind, as a means to keep them humble.

Ye have been rebellious] This appears by the many murmurings we read of in the first two years after they came out of Egypt, and likewise in the last; of which only we have a particular account: but their behaviour, all the rest of the time they spent in the wilderness, was no better.

Ver. 8. Also in Horeb] Or rather, even in Horeb (for there is an emphasis in this, and he speaks it with some indignation); when they had newly received the law, and had a visible appearance of God in great glory upon Mount Sinai, and had entered into covenant with him, they so shamefully revolted from him, that he thought to have destroyed them (Exod. xxxii. 7, 8, &c.).

Ver. 9. When I was gone up] See Exod. xxiv. 11. I abode in the mount] See Exod. xxiv. 18. xxxiv. 29.

Ver. 10. Two tables of stone] See Exod. xxxi. 18. According to all the words,] See Exod. xxxiv. 28. Out of the midst of the fire] When the whole body of the people were assembled, and heard God speak these ten words out of the midst of the fire (see Deut. iv. 10—13).

Ver. 11.] That is, having given him the two tables, as was said before, ver. 10.

Ver. 12. The Lord said unto me,] Immediately after he had delivered to him the tables (Exod. xxxi. 18. xxxii. 7).

Arise, get thee down] See Exod. xxxii. 7, 8.

Ver. 14. Let me alone,] Do not make any intercession to me for them.

That I may destroy them,] See Exod. xxxii. 10.

Ver. 15. So I turned] See Exod. xxxii. 15.

The mount burned with fire:] Was all in a flame, in token of God's high displeasure against them; and as if he intended presently to consume them.

And the two tables] Exod. xxxii. 15.

Ver. 16. Had made you a molten calf:] About which he found them dancing (Exod. xxxii. 19).

Ye had turned aside quickly out of the way] For a few weeks before he had commanded them, with his own mouth, not to make to themselves any graven image, &c. (Exod. xx. 4). And immediately after commanded Moses to repeat this precept particularly to them, "Not to make with him gods of silver or gold" (ver. 23, 23).

Ver. 17. And brake them.] By God's order, no doubt, in token that they had broken his covenant, and were unworthy to be owned by him for his people (Exod. xxxii. 19), or that the covenant was made void, and God no longer engaged to them.

the first, forty days and forty nights: I did neither eat bread, nor drink water, because of all your sins which ye sinned, in doing wickedly in the sight of the LORD, to provoke him to anger.

19 For I was afraid of the anger and hot displeasure, wherewith the LORD was wroth against you to destroy you. But the LORD hearkened unto me at that time also.

20 And the LORD was very angry with Aaron to have destroyed him: and I prayed for Aaron also at the same time.

21 And I took your sin, the calf which ye had made, and burnt it with fire, and stamped it, and ground it very small, even until it was as small as dust: and I cast the dust thereof into the brook that descended out of the mount.

22 And at Taberah, and at Massah, and at Kibroth-hattaavah, ye provoked the LORD to wroth.

23 Likewise when the LORD sent you from Kadesh-barnea, saying, Go up and possess the land which I have given you; then ye rebelled against the commandment of the LORD your God, and ye believed him not, nor hearkened to his voice.

24 Ye have been rebellious against the LORD from the day that I knew you.

25 Thus I fell down before the LORD forty days and forty nights, as I fell down at the first; because the LORD had said he would destroy you.

26 I prayed therefore unto the LORD, and said, O Lord God, destroy not thy people and thine inheritance, which thou hast redeemed through thy greatness, which thou hast brought forth out of Egypt with a mighty hand.

27 Remember thy servants, Abraham, Isaac, and Jacob; look not unto the stubbornness of this people, nor to their wickedness, nor to their sin:

Ver. 18. I fell down] To pray God for pardon; though not presently: but after he had broken the calf in pieces, reproved Aaron, and made a slaughter among the people (Exod. xxxii. 20, 21. &c).

As at the first,] When he first heard of their sin, Exod. xxxii. 11—13, and the next morning after he had broken the calf, and done execution upon the offenders (ver. 30—32).

Forty days and forty nights,] Exod. xxxiv. 2. 28.

Because of all your sins] He spent this time, very much, in earnest supplication to God, to forgive me not only this, but all other sins, whereby they had deserved to be cast off by him. For they provoked him at Marah (Exod. xv. 23), and in the wilderness of Sin (xvi. 2, 3), and at Massah (xvii. 2—4).

Ver. 19. I was afraid of the anger and hot displeasure,] Which God had expressed both before he came down from the mount and after (Exod. xxxii. xxxiii. 3. 5). Insomuch, that the Lord removed out of the camp; and would not, for the present, dwell among them (ver. 7).

But the Lord hearkened unto me] See Exod. xxxiv. 8—10, where the Lord tells him, he expected they should be more faithful hereafter, in observing their covenant with him, particularly this part, of worshipping no other God (see this, ver. 10—14).

Ver. 20.] This shows the heinousness of this sin, which had like to have cost Aaron his life; though he merely complied with the impetuous desire of the people, out of fear and want of courage to resist them.

Ver. 21. I took your sin,] So idols are termed in Isa. xxxi. 7. The object or occasion of sin, as well as the punishment of it, being called by the name of sin.

Burnt it with fire,] This he did before he went up the second time into the mount (Exod. xxxii. 20).

I cast the dust thereof into the brook] From the rock which Moses smote with his rod (Exod. xvii. 6), which constantly supplied them with drink; which for the present they could not but have mixed with their sin, as we read Exod. xxxii. 20.

Ver. 22. At Taberah,] Besides this great sin committed at Horeb, he puts them in mind of several other, that they might be more humbled, and have no opinion of their own righteousness remaining in them (see concerning this, Numb. xi. 1—3).

At Massah,] As the foregoing sin was committed after the making the golden calf, so this was before it. (Exod. xvii. 7).

At Kibroth-hattaavah, ye provoked the Lord] This provocation was immediately after that at Taberah (Numb. xi. 33, 34). All which three places had their names from the sin of the Israelites, or from their punishment.

Ver. 23. Likewise] And yet this was not all.

When the Lord sent you] Numb. xiii. 1—3.

Ye believed him not,] Numb. xiv. 1—3, of which unbelief God there complains, ver. 11.

Ver. 24.] To comprise all in a few words, you have been a disobedient people ever since I was acquainted with you. So he suspected they would prove (Exod. iv. 1), and upon the first disappointment found it to be true (Exod. v. 24, 25).

Ver. 25. Thus I fell down] Having interposed some other instances of their rebellious disposition, besides their making the golden calf, he returns to what he had begun to say concerning his intercession with God for a pardon; which he could not obtain without long importunity. For we cannot from these words gather, as some of the Jews do, that Moses was three times in the mount forty days and forty nights; it being plain, that he speaks here of the same time which he mentioned ver. 18. And if we should think he intended any other, we might conclude he was four times in the mount so many days and nights, because he mentions it over again in the next chapter, x. 10.

Because the Lord had said he would destroy you,] Exod. xxxii. 10, xxxiii. 5. This made him so earnest to obtain an assurance from God, that he would continue to be as gracious to them as he had been; of which he had given him some hope before he went up into the mount (see Exod. xxxiii. 17, xxxiv. 9, 13).

Ver. 26.] He used the same argument in his petition for them, when he went into the mount the second time, which he had urged before he came down the first time from it (Exod. xxxii. 12).

Ver. 27. Remember thy servants,] The very same he had said there, ver. 13.

Look not unto the stubbornness of this people,] He prays that the gracious promise of God to their pious forefathers would move him to overlook the high provocations of their posterity. Which he aggravates in several words, the more to humble them, and to magnify God's mercy in granting them a pardon. The word stubbornness seems to relate to their very evil disposition of mind; and their wickedness to all their undutiful murmurings; and their sin to their idolatry; which is often called in Scripture peculiarly by the name of sin: it being the highest provocation, from whence sprang all manner of wickedness. Thus Jeroboam is said to have made Israel to sin, by setting up the calves at Dan and Bethel to be worshipped.

Ver. 28.] The sense of this also he had before urged (Exod. xxxii. 12).

Ver. 29.] They were redeemed by him out of the 1 At that time the Lord said unto me, Hew thee two tables of stone like unto the first, and come up unto me into the mount, and make thee an ark of wood.

2 And I will write on the tables the words that were in the first tables which thou brakest, and thou shalt put them in the ark.

3 And I made an ark of shittim wood, and hewed two tables of stone like unto the first, and went up into the mount, having the two tables in mine hand.

4 And he wrote on the tables, according to the first writing, the ten commandments, which the Lord spake unto you in the mount out of the midst of the fire in the day of the assembly: and the Lord gave them unto me.

5 And I turned myself and came down from the mount, and put the tables in the ark which I

CHAP. X.

Ver. 1. Hew thee two tables of stone] After his anger was something appeased, he ordered Moses to come up to him, where he had been before, and bring with him two tables of stone like those he had broken, that God might renew his covenant with them. But there was this difference (as I observed Exod. xxxiv. 1), that God himself made the former tables, but he bade Moses make these: which signifies some abatement of his favour.

Make thee an ark of wood.] This command was given at his first going up into the mount (Exod. xxv. 10), and, perhaps, was renewed again now, upon the occasion of making these new tables which were to be put into it.

Ver. 2. I will write on the tables] So we read he told him, Exod. xxxiv. 1.

Put them in the ark.] As soon as it was made to receive them.

Ver. 3. I made an ark of shittim wood,] This looks as if he made an ark before he made the tables; that when he brought them down, it might be ready to receive them. And it hath given some ground to the Jewish doctors, to say that there were two arks; one made by Moses, wherein he put the tables of stone that were broken, and those that were renewed, until the other was made by Bezaleel: for we read expressly, "that Bezaleel made the ark," Exod. xxxvii. 1, and here it is said that Moses made it. So that they conclude there were two made; and this made by Moses they fancy was the ark that went before them in their marches and battles; which the other never did by God's order, but only when they entered into Canaan (Josh. iii.), for when of their own selves they carried it forth in the days of Eli, God was angry with them, and delivered it into the enemy's hand (1 Sam. iv. 3, 4. 11). But Aben Ezra, Nachmanides, and Abarbinel, have confuted this by strong reasons to the contrary, as may be seen in Buxtorf's Histor. Aræ, p. 35, 36, &c. And as to this place they are of opinion, that Moses speaks of the ark made afterward by Bezaleel, which Moses is said to have made, because he commanded him to make it. Just as Solomon is said to have built the temple, because he caused it to be built. Or, if it be granted that Moses made an ark before he went the second time into the mount (which this verse seems to countenance) it will not follow that there were two arks in use among the Israelites; for this ark now made of mere wood, not overlaid with gold, and designed only as a chest wherein to keep the tables handsomely, till the ark could be made by Bezaleel, and then the tables were translated into that, and this chest of Moses laid aside.

Hewed two tables of stone] See Exod. xxxiv. 4.

Ver. 4. He wrote on the tables,] Exod. xxxiv. 28. Which the Lord spake unto you] When the whole congregation was gathered together at the foot of the mount (see ix. 10).

The Lord gave them unto me.] To carry down to the people.

Ver. 5. I turned myself] From the Divine presence, where he had been supplicating for mercy, and had received from thence the tables of the covenant.

Came down from the mount,] At the end of forty days and nights (Exod. xxxiv. 28, 29).

Put the tables in the ark,] Which he commanded to be made by Bezaleel (Exod. xxxvii. 1), and put into the tabernacle as soon as it was built, with these tables in it (Exod. xl. 20, 21).

There they be,] Though Moses mentions his making the ark before his hewing the tables, and going up into the mount (ver. 3), yet these words seem to determine that he speaks of the ark made by Bezaleel, according to his directions. For now that they were going over Jordan, the tables were in the ark, which he is said here to have made. Which was certainly "the ark of the covenant," not that chest, had made; and there they be, as the LORD commanded me.

6 ¶ And the children of Israel took their journey from Beeroth of the children of Jaakan to Mosera: there Aaron died, and there he was buried; and Eleazar his son ministered in the priest's office in his stead.

7 From thence they journeyed unto Gudgadah; and from Gudgadah to Jotbath, a land of rivers of waters.

which some suppose Moses to have made to keep the tables in till the other could be fitted for their reception.

Ver. 6. The children of Israel took their journey] Not immediately; but after they had passed through several other places, and made some stay in them: for they went from Bene-Jaakan to Gudgadah (or Hor-hagidgad), and so to Jotbath, and the rest of the mansions mentioned Numb. xxxiii. 32, 33, &c. until they came to Mount Hor.

There Aaron died, and there he was buried;] At Mosera, or the top of Mount Hor; which was another part of the same mountain, as Horeb was of Sinai.

Eleazar his son ministered in the priest's office in his stead.] The greatest difficulty is to give an account how this comes in here, and what connexion this and the following verse have with what went before. All the satisfaction that I can give to it is this, that Moses having told them, that he put the tables of the testimony or covenant into the ark, as a token God was reconciled to them, and that there they still were as the Lord commanded, he puts them out of all doubt of it, by telling them, that though Aaron (who had the special care of the holy place, and all things in it committed to him) was dead, yet Eleazar his son was still alive, who could testify those holy things remained, as when Moses first placed them there, he being consecrated to the priest's office instead of Aaron, and in this very mount (Numb. xx. 25, 26, &c.), which is the occasion of mentioning this station here, when most of the rest are omitted.

Ver. 7. From thence] Not from Mosera, but from Bene-Jaakan, as appears from Numb. xxxiii. 32, where a full account is given of their removals, which are but just touched here.

They journeyed unto Gudgadah;] Called in the book of Numbers by the name of Hor-hagidgad. And none will think it strange that there is such a variation in the proper names of places and of men, in profane writers, as well as the Scriptures, who considers (as Conradus Pellicanus here notes) how differently the names of places are pronounced now, from what they were in former ages; and how much one nation differs from another, when they speak of them; and what alterations are made from the first founders of nations and cities by those that conquer them, and change all names to their own glory. See how names were changed among the Israelites in no long time, Numb. xxvi. 15—17. 23, 24. 35. 38, 39, &c.

From Gudgadah to Jotbath.] And so to the rest of the places mentioned Numb. xxxiii. 34—36, till they came to Mount Hor.

A land of rivers of waters.] A place where there was plenty of water; which he mentions, I suppose, that they might reflect upon their foul distrust of God's providence a little after, when they murmured for want of water at Kadesh (Numb. xx. 3, 4, &c.)

Ver. 8. At that time] Not long after Moses came down from the mount the second time; of which he had been speaking, ver. 5.

8 ¶ At that time the LORD separated the tribe of Levi, to bear the ark of the covenant of the LORD, to stand before the LORD to minister unto him, and to bless his name, unto this day.

9 Wherefore Levi hath no part nor inheritance with his brethren: the LORD is his inheritance, according as the LORD thy God promised him.

10 And I stayed in the mount, according to the first time, forty days and forty nights; and

The Lord separated the tribe of Levi,] To his own special service, as we read Numb. iii. Some think that God renewed his choice of them to the employment here mentioned after Aaron's death, when he confirmed them in their office. But we read of no such thing; and it cannot be inferred merely from these words, at that time, which may well relate to the time mentioned, ver. 5.

To bear the ark] Here are three parts of their office mentioned in these and the following words. The first of which was to carry the ark; which peculiarly belonged to the Kohathites (Numb. iii. 27. 31). when the camp removed from one place to another. Who were good witnesses that the same ark still remained at that day wherein Moses first placed the tables of the covenant; for it never stirred but by their means.

To stand before the Lord] This is a phrase used of servants that wait upon their masters, before whom they are said to stand. Thus Gehazi attended the prophet Elisha (2 Kings v. 25). And the prophets themselves are thus said to stand before the Lord (1 Kings xvii. 1, xviii. 16). Therefore it here signifies that the Levites were separated to be God's ministers, as it follows.

To minister unto him.] As assistants to the priests in the tabernacle (Numb. iii. 6), and as a guard to the tabernacle (ver. 7, 8). Which was the second part of their office.

To bless in his name.] This was the greatest thing of all, and was peculiar to the priests, who were a part of the tribe of Levi, but had the sole privilege among them to bless in the name of the Lord, as we read expressly Numb. vi. 23, 24. If, indeed, it could be made out, that by "blessing in the name of the Lord," is meant only to "bless the name of the Lord," that was common to all the Levites, who sang praises and gave thanks continually to him in the temple, as I suppose they did in the tabernacle: but I find no example of the use of this expression in this sense; and therefore it must be restrained to the priests, who were sons of Levi, as well as the rest; and are so called when Moses mentions this part of their office, Deut. xxi. 5.

Ver. 9. Wherefore Levi hath no part nor inheritance with his brethren;] Because God would have them only attend to this service, and not look after other affairs; particularly of guarding the sanctuary, and keeping constant watch there, to secure all the holy things, especially the ark, which they took care none should meddle withal. And therefore the people might be sure it remained as Moses left it, when he put it into the tabernacle with the tables of the covenant in it.

The Lord is his inheritance.] He took care to provide for the Levites, without having any land to plough or sow, &c. (see Numb. xviii. 20).

Ver. 10. I stayed in the mount, according to the first time,] This doth not signify, that after the separation of the Levites he went up again into the mount, but having confirmed what he said concerning his the LORD hearkened unto me at that time also, and the LORD would not destroy thee.

11 And the LORD said unto me, Arise, take thy journey before the people, that they may go in and possess the land, which I swear unto their fathers to give unto them.

12 ¶ And now, Israel, what doth the LORD thy God require of thee, but to fear the LORD thy God, to walk in all his ways, and to love him, and to serve the LORD thy God with all thy heart and with all thy soul, 13 To keep the commandments of the LORD, and his statutes, which I command thee this day for thy good?

putting the tables of stone in the ark, which he made after he came the second time down from the mount (ver. 5), he returns to what he was speaking of in the beginning of the chapter, and had begun to say before (ix. 25), how he prayed to God for them, when he went to carry the tables he had hewn up unto God in the mount, that now he might relate to them the success of his prayers, which follows in the next words.

The Lord would not destroy thee.] As he feared he would, because he had so threatened, ix. 15.

Ver. 11.] This cannot refer to what he said unto him after the making the golden calf (as I find some take it from Exod. xxxiii. 1), for that was before he went up into the mount again; but to what he said at the conclusion of their removals from place to place (some of which he mentions here, ver. 6, 7), for then he orders them what to do when they entered into Canaan, which, he saith, I have given you to possess it (Numb. xxxii. 51—53).

Ver. 12. What doth the Lord thy God require of thee.] Unto whom he hath given tables, wherein he himself hath written his will with his own hand (ver. 4, 5), and hath graciously pardoned your foul breach of his covenant upon my intercession (ver. 10).

But to fear the Lord thy God.] The fear of God sometimes includes in it all religion; but here seems to signify one of the great principles of obedience (see vi. 2).

To walk in all his ways.] Unto which the fear of God inclines men, when their hearts are possessed with it.

To love him.] Especially if the love of God be in them; which is still a stronger principle of obedience (vi. 1).

To serve the Lord thy God with all thy heart and with all thy soul.] Being constant in his worship and service, and worshipping him alone (vi. 13. xiii. 3). For loving him with all the heart and soul, seems here to have particular respect to their having no inclination to serve other gods (1 Kings viii. 23, 43), which the Jews, after they had smarted for their idolatry, understood to be the great commandment. As their father Jacob, they say, taught his twelve sons, when they came about him on his death-bed, saying to them: "Ye perhaps worship the idols which Terah, the father of Abraham, worshipped; or those which Laban, my mother's brother, worshipped; or ye worship the God of Jacob. To whom they all made this answer, with a perfect fear: Hear, O Israel, our father, The Lord our God is one Lord. Whereupon Jacob said, Let his great name be blessed for ever." Thus the Jerusalem Targum upon vi. 4. of this book.

Ver. 13.] Self-love should have inclined them to obedience to God's commands, which he gave them

14 Behold, the heaven and the heaven of heavens is the LORD's thy God, the earth also, with all that therein is.

15 Only the LORD had a delight in thy fathers to love them, and he chose their seed after them, even you above all people, as it is this day.

16 Circumcise therefore the foreskin of your heart, and be no more stiffnecked.

17 For the LORD your God is God of gods, and Lord of lords, a great God, a mighty, and a terrible, which regardeth not persons, nor taketh reward:

18 He doth execute the judgment of the fa-for their good; though he rewarded their obedience to them as if he had received the benefit thereof.

Ver. 14. Behold, the heavens] Where the sun, moon, and stars shine.

And the heaven of heavens] And all the glorious regions beyond them.

Is the Lord's thy God,] Are all his possession, as they are his work.

The earth also,] As well as this earth, and all the creatures that are in it.

Ver. 15.] He would have them sensible, therefore, that the possessor of heaven and of earth could have no need of them, or of their services, who were a very inconsiderable part of his creatures: but it was his own mere good will and pleasure which moved him to show such love to Abraham as he had done, and to his posterity for his sake, above all other nations on earth.

Ver. 16. Circumcise therefore the foreskin of your heart,] Do not satisfy yourselves therefore with the bare circumcision of your flesh (and the observance of such external rites and ceremonies), but cut off and cast away all your naughty affections, which make you insensible both of God's mercies and corrections, and disobedient to his commands.

Be no more stiffnecked.] As he had often before complained they were, particularly Exod. xxxii. 9. and see ix. 6. of this book. It is a metaphor, as I observed, from oxen, who, when they are to draw in a yoke, and go forward, pull back their neck and their shoulder to withdraw themselves from the yoke. To both which the Scripture alludes, Neh. ix. 29. And sometime severally we find mention of them, as in the place before named in Exodus, he speaks of their stiff neck; and Zech. vii. 11. he saith, "they pulled away the shoulder." St. Stephen puts both these together in his character of the wicked Jews that killed our blessed Saviour, Acts vii. 51. that they were stiffnecked and uncircumcised in heart. Therefore the contrary disposition God promises towards the conclusion of this book, as the greatest blessing he could bestow on them (xxx. 6).

Ver. 17. For the Lord your God is God of gods, and Lord of lords,] Superior to all other beings, whether kings on earth or angels in heaven.

A great God,] Who can do what he pleases everywhere; and therefore is to be greatly dreaded.

Which regardeth not persons, nor taketh reward:] The most righteous judge of men, who will not connive at your sins because you are circumcised, nor be bribed by any sacrifices to overlook your wickedness (Exod. xxxii. 8. Lev. xix. 15. Deut. i. 17), nor, on the contrary, reject those that uprightly obey him, though they be not Jews. So St. Peter learnt to understand these words, Acts x. 34.

Ver. 18. He doth execute the judgment of the father- therless and widow, and loveth the stranger, in giving him food and raiment.

19 Love ye therefore the stranger: for ye were strangers in the land of Egypt.

20 Thou shalt fear the LORD thy God; him shalt thou serve, and to him shalt thou cleave, and swear by his name.

less and widow,] Takes their part, as we speak, and defends them against those that would oppress them.

And loveth the stranger,] Provideth for those who are driven unjustly out of their own country, or, travelling on their honest occasions, fall into want; for he seems here to speak of those who were neither proselytes of justice, nor of the gate, as the Jews speak, but were mere gentiles.

Ver. 19. Love ye therefore the stranger,] Be kind and hospitable to such distressed persons: which is a virtue that flows from the love of God (ver. 12), to which it is in vain to pretend, if we love not all mankind. This love consists in imitating God's care of such persons, whereof he speaks in the foregoing verse, viz. doing them justice equally with others, and affording them food and raiment.

For ye were strangers] This virtue was particularly required of the Jews, who had been in that condition which he commanded them to pity (see Exod. xxiii. 9. Lev. xix. 33, 34). And if they had sincerely practised this duty towards aliens, the grace of God shown to the gentiles in our blessed Saviour, would not have seemed so strange to them as it did.

Ver. 20. Thou shalt fear the Lord thy God;] This was explained before, ver. 12.

To him shalt thou cleave,] Serve, that is, and worship none but him.

21 He is thy praise, and he is thy God, that hath done for thee these great and terrible things, which thine eyes have seen.

22 Thy fathers went down into Egypt with threescore and ten persons; and now the LORD thy God hath made thee as the stars of heaven for multitude.

And swear by his name,] See vi. 13.

Ver. 21. He is thy praise,] Whom thou oughtest therefore to praise; or rather, in whose love and favour thou oughtest to glory; and to think it the highest honour to be his servant, and to have him for thy God, as it here follows.

He is thy God,] Who hath bestowed upon thee all the good things which thou enjoyest.

That hath done for thee these great and terrible things,] In bringing them out of Egypt, destroying Pharaoh in the Red Sea, leading them through the wilderness, giving them the country of Sihon and Og, &c. Whom therefore they were bound to love and serve, and to confide in his mercy, and not in their own power or righteousness (viii. 17, 18. ix. 4—6).

Ver. 22. Thy fathers went down into Egypt with threescore and ten persons;] See Gen. xlvii. 27. Exod. i. 5. Their family, he would have them remember, was very small about two hundred years ago.

And now the Lord thy God hath made thee as the stars of heaven] Vastly increased them, according to his promise unto Abraham, Gen. xv. 5. Exod. xii. 37. Numb. xxvi. 51. 62. Which alone (as Conradus Pellicanus here notes) was sufficient to fill their hearts with his love, and their mouths with his praise.

CHAPTER XI.

1 An exhortation to obedience, 2 by their own experience of God's great works, 8 by promise of God's great blessings, 16 and by threatenings. 18 A careful study is required in God's words. 26 The blessing and curse is set before them.

1 THEREFORE thou shalt love the LORD thy God, and keep his charge, and his statutes, and his judgments, and his commandments, alway.

2 And know ye this day: for I speak not with your children which have not known, and which have not seen the chastisement of the LORD your God, his greatness, his mighty hand, and his stretched out arm,

3 And his miracles, and his acts, which he did in the midst of Egypt unto Pharaoh the king of Egypt, and unto all his land;

4 And what he did unto the army of Egypt,

His mighty hand, and his stretched out arm,] These are more words to express the same thing.

Ver. 3. And his miracles, and his acts,] Or, "his miraculous acts," &c. He uses so many words, to make them sensible how much they were obliged to God for their deliverance out of the slavery of Egypt; which nothing could have effected but God's almighty power, declared in various instances. This is the first argument wherewith he excites their love to God (which he pressed in the foregoing chapter, and begins this again with it), that God had loved them so much, as to work many astonishing miracles, rather than let them continue slaves to Pharaoh.

Ver. 4. What he did unto the army of Egypt,] Who pursued after the Israelites, and overtook them (Exod. xiv. 6—8); whereby the kindness of God appeared, after he had delivered them, in preserving them from being brought back to their slavery.

How he made the water of the Red sea to overflow them] See Exod. xiv. 23, 24. 27, 28.

How the Lord hath destroyed them unto this day;] Brought them so low, that they have not recovered

CHAP. XI.

Ver. 1. Thou shalt love the Lord thy God,] Who of so small hath made thee so great a nation.

And keep his charge,] A phrase used frequently concerning the Levites, Numb. iii. 7, 8, &c. But here comprehends all the particulars following, his statutes, and his judgments, and commandments, which he had charged them to observe (see vi. 1).

Ver. 2. And know ye this day:] Consider seriously what I have said to you, till you be sensible of it (viii. 5. ix. 6.)

For I speak not with your children which have not known,] The words I speak are not in the Hebrew: and they may as well be supplied thus, "For not with your children have these things been done," &c. Which agrees well with ver. 7.

The chastisement of the Lord your God,] The plagues he sent upon the Egyptians.

His greatness,] Which appeared by the many great things he did, only upon the stretching out of Moses' rod.

unto their horses, and to their chariots; how he made the water of the Red sea to overflow them as they pursued after you, and how the Lord hath destroyed them unto this day;

5 And what he did unto you in the wilderness, until ye came into this place;

6 And what he did unto Dathan and Abiram, the sons of Eliab, the son of Reuben: how the earth opened her mouth, and swallowed them up, and their households, and their tents, and all the substance that was in their possession, in the midst of all Israel:

7 But your eyes have seen all the great acts of the Lord which he did.

their strength, to attempt anything against you since that time.

Ver. 5.] Provided for them, protected and preserved them forty years: giving them possession also of the country of Sihon and Og, two kings of the Amorites. These benefits, if they considered, which they could not but see they owed to his love alone, were powerful arguments to move them to love him.

Ver. 6. What he did unto Dathan and Abiram.] Numb. xvi. 1, &c. The remembrance and consideration of the terrible vengeance the Lord took upon rebellious people, he uses as another argument to make them obedient. And there was none more remarkable than this upon Dathan and Abiram. He doth not mention Korah; but they would not well forget him, when they thought of his confederates, though he suffered another punishment.

How the earth opened] See Numb. xvi. 32, &c.

Ver. 7.] In Egypt, at the Red Sea, and in the wilderness (ver. 3—5). Some of which all of them had seen; and there was none of them who had not seen some.

Ver. 8. Therefore shall ye keep all the commandments] Remembering what had befallen both their enemies and themselves.

That ye may be strong, and go in] In hope that the same God would empower them to subdue the Canaanites, and give them full possession of their country.

Ver. 9. Ye may prolong your days] This may relate both to the present generation, and to their posterity; who, after their fathers had lived long in the land of Canaan, should succeed them, and enjoy it in future ages (see ver. 21).

A land that floweth with milk and honey.] This is a common description, in all authors, of a rich and pleasant country. Particularly in Euripides:

Ῥεῖ δὲ γάλακτι πίονα,
Ῥεῖ δ' αἰνῆ· ρεῖ δὲ μελισσῶν
Νίκταρ:

And the like Bochartus hath observed in Virgil, Horace, and other writers (Hierozoic. lib. iv. par. i. cap. 12).

Ver. 10. For the land,—is not as the land of Egypt.] He uses all manner of arguments to persuade them to obedience; from a grateful remembrance of God's former mercies (ver. 2, 3, &c.), from the terrible punishment of the disobedient (ver. 6), from the benefits that would redound to themselves by their obedience (ver. 9), and now he represents to them what a noble country he was going to bestow upon them: but of such a condition as would keep them in a constant dependence upon his favour for the blessing of it.

When thou sowest thy seed, and wateredst it with thy foot, as a garden of herbs.] This doth not sig-

8 Therefore shall ye keep all the commandments which I command you this day, that ye may be strong, and go in and possess the land, whither ye go to possess it;

9 And that ye may prolong your days in the land, which the Lord sware unto your fathers to give unto them and to their seed, a land that floweth with milk and honey.

10 ¶ For the land, whither thou goest in to possess it, is not as the land of Egypt, from whence ye came out, where thou sowest thy seed, and wateredst it with thy foot, as a garden of herbs:

11 But the land, whither ye go to possess it, nify that the land of Egypt was not so fruitful as the land of Canaan (for their fertility is not to be compared), but that there they reaped the fruits of their labour with more pains. Diodorus Siculus, indeed, and Herodotus, say, that the Egyptians take the least pains of all other men about their corn, inasmuch that it may be affirmed, ἀπρωτότα καρπὸν κομίζονται, “they bring in the fruits of the earth without labour,” being at no such trouble about ploughing as other men are, &c. (see in his Euterpe, cap. 14). Yet it must be considered, that as the Nile, which made this fruitfulness, failed them sometimes, and did not overflow all the flat country, so the upper parts of Egypt had not the benefit of it; nor all the lower neither, without great pains in cutting rivers to bring the water to them. Which Pliny calls rigua Nili; for the word rigua properly signifies the “little rivers” and διώρυγες “cuts,” which were made to derive water from the Nile into places at a distance from it, as Salmasius observes, p. 588. in Solinum. Hesychius calls them δοχὰς ἰδάτων, “receptacles of water, ditches, or dikes,” which we now call canals, as the same author observes, p. 908. And this I find Strabo speaks so plainly in his Geography, (lib. xvii. p. 788), that his words may serve as a good commentary upon those of Moses: “Nature (saith he) doth much for Egypt by the Nile; but industry and art about that river doth a great deal more. For the higher it flows, the more ground it naturally waters and makes fruitful; Ἄλλα ἡ ἐπιμέλεια πολλὰκις καὶ τῆς φύσεως ἐξίσχυον ἐπιαιτιοῦσης, &c. ‘but industry sometimes hath prevailed when nature hath failed.’ insomuch, that as great a part of the country hath been watered in the smallest rise of Nile, as in the highest. Which was effected, διὰ τῶν διωρυγῶν καὶ τῶν παραχωμάτων, ‘by the cuts and banks which were made by art.’ For before the time of Petronius (he saith) there was the greatest fruitfulness when the Nile rose fourteen cubits; and when it rose only eight there was a famine: but in the time of his government there was as great plenty when it rose only twelve cubits; and no man felt any want when it rose only eight. This was by the care and industry of the people, who were forced also sometimes to carry water from these cuts, as well as from the river, in vessels, to moisten the ground, when the mud which the Nile left was baked into a crust by the great heat of the sun. So that the ground of Egypt might properly be said to be watered by the fool, as we water our gardens when there wants rain.” Concerning which expression, see Dr. Hammond upon the Psalms, p. 7. col. 2. of the first edition.

Ver. 11. Is a land of hills and valleys] Not a low flat country like that of Egypt; but full of hills, which could not be made fruitful but by rain from heaven, which seldom fell in Egypt; but the Israelites might expect in due season, if they were obedient is a land of hills and valleys, and drinketh water of the rain of heaven:

12 A land which the LORD thy God careth for: the eyes of the LORD thy God are always upon it, from the beginning of the year even unto the end of the year.

13 ¶ And it shall come to pass, if ye shall hearken diligently unto my commandments which I command you this day, to love the LORD your God, and to serve him with all your heart and with all your soul, 14 That I will give you the rain of your land in his due season, the first rain and the latter rain, that thou mayest gather in thy corn, and thy wine, and thine oil.

to God. Who, by this means, after they had ploughed their ground, and sowed their corn, made it spring up plentifully without any farther labour or care of theirs. Such a country also was more pleasant and healthy than that of Egypt, whose ground next Nile being overflowed more or less every year, by the rising of Nile to the fall of it (which was from the solstice to the equinox, or, as some say, a hundred days; see Salsmasius upon Solinus, p. 427, &c. 436, &c.), they could not walk abroad into their fields; and many times there followed, after the water was gone off, great sicknesses and diseases, by the smell of the silt which it had left behind.

Ver. 12. A land which the Lord thy God careth for: Takes care that it want not water, by sending showers of rain plentifully from heaven in their proper season.

The eyes of the Lord thy God] That is, the providence of God; whose majesty dwelt in the sanctuary.

Are always upon it,] To see what is wanting, and to supply it.

From the beginning of the year even unto the end] At all seasons, to give them both the first and latter rain (as he speaks ver. 14), and such weather as might both produce and kindly ripen the fruits of the earth. This he mentions as an argument to obedience; in which, if they failed, he plainly tells them, the land should not yield her fruit (ver. 17). For this country was not so fertile of itself, as by the peculiar blessing of God upon it, whilst they kept his laws.

Ver. 13. If ye shall hearken diligently] To hearken diligently here signifies, to consider them seriously, and lay them to heart.

To love the Lord your God, and to serve him] He repeats this so often, because it is the great commandment (as our Saviour speaks), and because nothing is more natural than to love our benefactors, God especially (our greatest benefactor, who gave us our being) with all our heart, and with all our soul (see x. 12). And being the first and great commandment, it draws along with it obedience to all the rest, and is, in effect, the whole duty of man to God. For constant experience shows us, that whosoever gets the firm hold of this affection, governs a man as he pleaseth.

Ver. 14. I will give you the rain of your land] As much as is sufficient for such a hilly country.

In his due season,] At the proper times which here follow.

The first rain] Before the sowing of their seed, to prepare the ground; and after it was sown, that it might take root in the earth, and spring up.

And the latter rain,] When the corn was grown up towards earing time; and after it was eared, to make the ears full and plump. This appears from Amos, iv. 7, where he speaks of withholding the rain from them while there were "yet three months to the harvest."

15 And I will send grass in thy fields for thy cattle, that thou mayest eat and be full.

16 Take heed to yourselves, that your heart be not deceived, and ye turn aside, and serve other gods, and worship them;

17 And then the LORD's wrath be kindled against you, and he shut up the heaven, that there be no rain, and that the land yield not her fruit; and lest ye perish quickly from off the good land which the LORD giveth you.

18 ¶ Therefore shall ye lay up these my words in your heart and in your soul, and bind them for a sign upon your hand, that they may be as frontlets between your eyes.

19 And ye shall teach them your children,

Which is meant of this latter rain, whereby their corn was brought forward, when it was but in the blade to earing, and so on to harvest.

That thou mayest gather in thy corn,] Till the corn and all the fruits of the earth be brought to maturity.

Ver. 15. I will send grass in thy fields for thy cattle,] To make them fat; or to give plenty of milk.

That thou mayest eat and be full,] Eat flesh if they pleased, as well as the fruits of the earth, in great plenty.

Ver. 16. Take heed to yourselves, that your heart be not deceived,] By the specious colours that other nations put upon their idolatry (as, the antiquity of it, universal consent, &c. there being no part of the world at that time, as Maimonides observes, where all were not accustomed to worship images, &c.) whereby the Israelites were in danger to be seduced into an imitation of their neighbours.

Ye turn aside, and serve other gods,] By this it is evident that Moses is still pressing them to care in observing the first and second commandments.

Ver. 17. Then the Lord's wrath be kindled against you,] For their being deceived into idolatry by false reasonings, which persuaded them what they did was lawful, did not excuse them before God; who expected they should have used greater caution, and governed themselves by his plain and express commands.

And he shut up the heaven,] The contrary to this is called "opening his good treasure," Deut. xxviii. 12, signifying that they lived upon the royal bounty of the King of heaven, which their sins would hinder from flowing to them.

That the land yield not her fruit;] To withhold rain from them was a sore judgment, which quickly brought a famine; which was very grievous to those who used to live so plentifully. And it was frequently attended with various diseases, whereby they were wasted and consumed.

Ver. 18. Lay up these my words] See ch. vi. 6.

Bind them for a sign upon your hand, that they may be as frontlets] Always in sight: as the rule whereby they should order their steps, lest they trod amiss. This is one of the portions of Scripture (from ver. 13. to the end of ver. 21), which the Jews write in their tephillin, as they call them, which they use when they say their prayers, which they fancy are thereby made more acceptable unto God. This conceit began, not long before our Saviour's time, in the school of Hillel and Shammai, and took such root in the minds of the most religious, that it hath grown to a great superstition ever since. See upon ch. vi. ver. 8, 9, which is another portion of Scripture, that they wrote in these parchments; though at the first (St. Jerome saith, speaking of them when thou sittest in thine house, and when thou walkest by the way, when thou liest down, and when thou risest up.

20 And thou shalt write them upon the door posts of thine house, and upon thy gates :

21 That your days may be multiplied, and the days of your children, in the land which the LORD sware unto your fathers to give them, as the days of heaven upon the earth.

22 ¶ For if ye shall diligently keep all these commandments which I command you, to do them, to love the LORD your God, to walk in all his ways, and cleave unto him ;

23 Then will the LORD drive out all these nations from before you, and ye shall possess greater nations and mightier than yourselves.

24 Every place whereon the soles of your feet shall tread shall be your's : from the wilderness and Lebanon, from the river, the river Euphrates, even unto the uttermost sea shall your coast be.

25 There shall no man be able to stand before you : for the LORD your God shall lay the fear of you and the dread of you upon all the land that ye shall tread upon, as he hath said unto you.

26 ¶ Behold, I set before you this day a blessing and a curse ;

27 A blessing, if ye obey the commandments of the LORD your God, which I command you this day :

28 And a curse, if ye will not obey the commandments of the LORD your God, but turn aside out of the way which I command you this upon Matt. xxiii. 5), they wrote only the ten commandments.

Ver. 19. Ye shall teach them your children,] This is repeated very often (iv. 10. vi. 7). And out of this place, and v. 1, the Jews have framed this as one of the affirmative precepts, "that they ought themselves to learn the law of God, and teach it unto others." And this they do so diligently, that as soon as their children are capable to understand any thing, they make them carefully read the holy books, and instruct them so, that before they can be called youths, they are acquainted with the whole law of God. In which we must confess, they shame a great many Christians, who scarce understand so much of our religion when they are men and women, as the Jews do of theirs when they are mere children.

From the Hebrew word limmalethtem, in this verse, "ye shall teach them," the Jews have framed a conceit that their Talmud hath its name ; signifying teaching and instruction, as R. Jehiel saith, in his disputation with Nicolaus, p. 9.

Speaking of them when thou sittest in thine house, &c.] Taking all occasions to inculcate these precepts upon them (see ch. vi. 7), and upon their daughters as well as their sons ; though the Jewish doctors commonly fancy there is no command to instruct their daughters in the law (see Mischna Sota, cap. 3. sect. 3, with Wagenseil's Annotations, and the Gemara there, p. 471. 501).

Ver. 20. Write them upon the door posts] See ch. vi. 9. By this means God's word being so rooted in the hearts of the parents (to use the words of Dr. Jackson), as to bring forth this good fruit in their practice, the seed of it might be sown in the tender hearts of their children, and be propagated from one generation to another.

Ver. 21. That your days may be multiplied,] Nothing is wont to move men more than love to themselves, and love to their children, whom they love next to themselves.

As the days of heaven upon the earth.] As long as this world shall last. Which the Psalmist, speaking of David, expresses in this manner, "His seed shall endure for ever, and his throne as the days of heaven." (Ps. lxxxix. 29), which doth not signify absolutely for ever, but a long time. For thus Baruch says, the Jews in Babylon were commanded to pray for the life of Nebuchadnezzar, and the life of Baltasar his son, ἵνα ὡς αἱ ἡμέραι αὐτῶν ὡς αἱ ἡμέραι τοῦ οὐρανοῦ ἐπι τῆς γῆς, "that their days might be as the days of heaven upon earth." Which is the very phrase of Moses here in this place, importing a very long life. And such hyperbolical expressions, every one knows, are used by the heathen, particularly by Virgil (Æneid. 1).

—"Convexa potius dum sidera pascet."

Ver. 22. If ye shall diligently keep all these commandments, &c.] To love the LORD your God. This is still made the condition of all their happiness (see ver. 13. and x. 20).

To walk in all his ways,] In observance of his laws, which was the fruit of true love to him.

To cleave unto him,] So as to serve no other God, but to persevere in the worship of the LORD their God alone. The Jews make this one of the six hundred and thirteen precepts of the law (as they count them) distinct by itself ; but they interpret it foolishly ; of "sticking to the cabala of their wise men," whereby they fancy themselves united unto God.

Ver. 23. Then will the LORD drive out all these nations] As he had often promised (vii. 23. Exod. xxiii. 27).

Ye shall possess nations] See ch. vii. 1.

Ver. 24. Every place whereon the soles of your feet shall tread shall be your's :] That is, every place of the promised land ; as it is explained in the next words.

From the wilderness] viz. of Sin, which was on the south of Canaan.

And Lebanon, Which was its bounds on the north.

From the river—Euphrates,] Which was the eastern limits ; when in the days of Solomon their empire reached hither ; according to the promise unto Abraham in Gen. xv. 18.

Even unto the uttermost sea] Which is called the Mediterranean, or the Midland Sea, which bounded it on the west. See Numb. xxxiv. 6, where it is called the Great Sea ; and in that chapter the bounds of their country round about are described.

Ver. 25. There shall no man] See vii. 24.

For the LORD your God shall lay the fear of you, &c.] For God had promised to terrify the inhabitants of Canaan, and take away their courage (Exod. xxiii. 27). And accordingly the spies whom Joshua sent brought him an account of the great consternation wherein the whole country was, when they were about to enter into it (Josh. ii. 9. 21).

Ver. 26. I set before you this day a blessing and a curse ;] That is, he proposed them to their choice.

Ver. 27. A blessing, if ye obey the commandments] Which he more largely explains xxviii. 2—4, &c.

Ver. 28. A curse, if ye will not obey] Which is also more particularly laid before them, xxviii. 15—17, &c. The whole historical part of the Old Testament witness the truth of this, that God blessed or cursed day, to go after other gods, which ye have not known.

29 And it shall come to pass, when the LORD thy God hath brought thee in unto the land whither thou goest to possess it, that thou shalt put the blessing upon mount Gerizim, and the curse upon mount Ebal.

30 Are they not on the other side Jordan, by them, according as they observed or broke his laws. And if the people of Israel had diligently marked, and considered, and laid to heart, that their happiness or misery was always corresponding to their good and bad behaviour towards God, it would have confirmed their belief of their law, as much as if they had seen all the miracles done before their forefathers, and supplied the want or the rarity of them in after ages; nay, this would have done more than all the miracles did, which were forgotten in a short time; whereas their own daily experience of the happy fruits of obedience, and the mischief of disobedience, would have sealed these truths unto their conscience.

But turn aside out of the way] It was not every sin that turned God's favour from them; but their idolatry and apostasy from him; against which he principally warns them, throughout all these chapters, iv. 3. 4. 15. 16. 23. v. 32. vi. 4. 14. vii. 4, 5. 25. viii. 19. ix. 12. x. 20.

Ver. 29.] To quicken them unto a strict care in their obedience, blessings and cursings were to be pronounced with great solemnity at their first entrance into the land of Canaan; as is more fully ordered xxvii. 11, 12, &c., and performed by Joshua (viii. 33—35). And Moses seems to enjoin them the like solemnity, every seventh year, xxxi. 10—13.

Ver. 30. Are they not on the other side Jordan,] With respect to the place where Moses now was, the mountains he mentions were on the other side of Jordan, in the land of Canaan. In which they had no sooner got footing, but Joshua took care to execute this command; that their hearts might be possessed with a sense upon what terms they were to enjoy it. And he describes the places so particularly, that they might be sure to know them.

the way where the sun goeth down, in the land of the Canaanites, which dwell in the champaign over against Gilgal, beside the plains of Moreh?

31 For ye shall pass over Jordan to go in to possess the land which the LORD your God giveth you, and ye shall possess it, and dwell therein.

32 And ye shall observe to do all the statutes and judgments which I set before you this day.

Where the sun goeth down,] On that side which inclined to the west.

In the land of the Canaanites,] The people particularly so called, who were one of the seven nations; some of which lived here in the east, and others near the Midland Sea. As I have observed upon Gen. xv. 21.

Which dwell in the champaign over against Gilgal,] Some think these mountains were at such a considerable distance from Gilgal, that they cannot be said to be "over against Gilgal;" because this phrase signifies them not to be far off one from the other. And therefore they translate these words, "looking towards Gilgal." But it is not said, that the mountains were over against Gilgal, but the dwelling of the Canaanites (in whose country these mountains were) was over against it.

Beside the plains of Moreh?] Of which mention is made Gen. xii. 6, where the Canaanites are also mentioned as in that land, when Abraham came into it. Which suggests to us, that these blessings were pronounced in that very place where Abraham anciently dwelt, and where he worshipped God, who there appeared to him.

Ver. 31.] He would have them be as careful in this matter, as it was certain that they should shortly go over Jordan, to take possession of the country which God was about to bestow on them; which he assures them they should get possession of, and settle themselves therein.

Ver. 32.] But then do not forget what I have so often said to you, which he thought he could not inculcate enough (see iv. 40. v. 32. vi. 1. vii. 11. viii. 1, &c).

CHAPTER XII.

1 Monuments of idolatry are to be destroyed. 5 The place of God's service is to be kept. 15, 23 Blood is forbidden. 17, 20, 26 Holy things must be eaten in the holy place. 19 The Levite is not to be forsaken. 20 Idolatry is not to be inquired after.

1 THESE are the statutes and judgments, which ye shall observe to do in the land, which the LORD God of thy fathers giveth thee to possess it, all the days that ye live upon the earth.

2 Ye shall utterly destroy all the places,

CHAP. XII.

Ver. 1.] Now, I suppose, he begins a new exhortation, which he made to them at some small distance from the former. And he enters upon it with the same words, which he used before, vi. 1. ix. 1, which could not be too often repeated, considering the great proneness of the people to neglect their duty.

Ver. 2. Ye shall utterly destroy all the places, wherein the nations—served their gods,] So that no opinion should be left of their being sacred places by any relic or memorial of the old idolatry remaining there. It was not sufficient that the gods which the seven nations worshipped were abolished, but the very places also where they were worshipped were to be made common, and employed to other uses.

Upon the mountains, and upon the hills, and under every green tree;] These were the places where the ancient heathen chose to worship their gods, imagining their sacrifices were more acceptable upon mountains than in valleys. Lucian himself gives this reason for it, because men were then nearer to the gods, and so more easily obtained audience: "Οτι ταυ εὐχολέων ἀγγίζεν ἐπαύρου αἱ θεοί. And Tacitus saith the same in the last of his Annals. Demens also were wont to haunt woods and shady places, and there appear to men; and were thought also to be the presidents of mountains; others of woods and forests. And accordingly the heathen erected altars to them in these and such like places, particularly under great oaks, which were held sacred places, where their gods were thought to have a peculiar power. By this law wherein the nations which ye shall possess served their gods, upon the high mountains, and upon the hills, under every green tree :

3 And ye shall overthrow their altars, and break their pillars, and burn their groves with fire; and ye shall hew down the graven images of their gods, and destroy the names of them out of that place.

therefore God intended to root out this superstition; and commanded his tabernacle to be built low and humble. And though afterward the temple was set upon a hill, there was only one, and no more; and therefore it could not be thought to be out of any opinion that a hill was more sacred than another place.

Under every green tree.] Nothing can illustrate these words more, than what Pliny saith, in the twelfth book of his Natural History, concerning trees; which thus begins, Hæc fuerunt numinum templa, &c. "These were the temple of the gods; and even now the simple people, after the ancient rites, dedicate to God such trees as excel the rest. Nor do we more adore the images glittering with gold and ivory, quam lucos, et in iis silentia ipsa, than we do the groves, and the solemn silence therein." And then he reckons what trees were peculiarly sacred to Jupiter, Apollo, Minerva, &c., concluding that several of their gods, such as the Sylvani, Fauni, and some of their nymphs, had their names from woods. This was a thing so notorious, that in their most sacred solemnities, they were wont to present the gods whom they worshipped with a crown or garland made of boughs and leaves of such trees in which they were thought to delight; as to Jupiter, a crown of oak; to Apollo, of laurel; to Minerva, of olive; to Venus, of myrtle; to Bacchus, of ivy; to Rhea, Pan, Neptune, and Vulcan, of pine, &c. (see Ezek. Spanhemius upon Callimachus' hymn to Diana, ver. 200).

Ver. 3. Ye shall overthrow their altars, &c.] See vii. 5, and Lev. xxvi. 1. He mentions all these so particularly, because this is the very foundation and hinge of the law (as Maimonides speaks), that all opinion of the sanctity of such things should be blotted out of men's hearts, and the memory of them extinguished, More Nevochim, par. iii. cap. 29, where he reckons abundance of things of this kind, which were among the old idolaters called Zabii.

Destroy the names of them out of that place.] From this, and such-like places, the Jews have framed this affirmative precept, that "the gentile idolatry is by all means to be destroyed." For these nations having forfeited their land by their abominable wickedness, and God having bestowed it upon the Israelites (whom he took for his peculiar people, and among whom he dwelt, and therefore calls this his land, see vii. 6), he, as the King of the country, might enjoy what orders he pleased to have observed. And it was of the highest concernment, that there should not be the least footstep of the old idolatry left in the country; but that he who was the Lord of it, and the Lord of heaven and earth, should be alone acknowledged and worshipped. And there was a greater reason for this than at first sight may be imagined: for, as the host of heaven was worshipped, as the glorious bodies wherein their gods inhabited (which was the reason of the best of the heathen for this worship), so their demons were supposed to dwell in the images and pillars which for that end were erected to them; the sovereign celestial gods being worshipped in the sun, moon, and stars, wherein they were thought to dwell, and these petty deities, the demons, were worshipped in images and columns, which were made for them, and for no other deities, as our Mr. Mede observes, par. i. p. 778.

4 Ye shall not do so unto the Lord your God.

5 But unto the place which the Lord your God shall choose out of all your tribes to put his name there, even unto his habitation shall ye seek, and thither thou shalt come:

6 And thither ye shall bring your burnt offerings, and your sacrifices, and your tithes, and

Ver. 4. Ye shall not do so unto the Lord your God.] That is, not serve him upon the mountains, nor in groves, nor under green trees. Which appears to be the sense, both from the foregoing words (ver. 2, 3), and from the following opposition in the next verse. And it is very probable, that, during their continuance in the wilderness, none sacrificed in high places, but offered all at the door of the tabernacle, which was not far from them. When they came into Canaan, and were many of them at a distance from the tabernacle, they did sacrifice in high places; and we do not find them reproved for it while they worshipped the Lord alone, and had priests who officiated there, and in other places, according to the precepts of the law: but when the temple was built, and the ark of God's presence no longer removed from place to place, the prophets required them not to sacrifice any longer in high places, nor anywhere else, but only at the temple. And they blamed even good kings for not taking away the high places; though no sacrifices were offered upon them to any strange god, but to the true God alone. Which connivance proved in time a great mischief; for here they first began to worship strange gods, the Israelites being very prone to choose mountains, and such shady places (as the rest of the world did), wherein to set up their images (2 Kings xvii. 10, 11. Ezek. xx. 28. Hosea iv. 13).

Ver. 5. Unto the place] Unto one certain place which God intended to set apart; unto which all the tribes should resort, as the only place where they might sacrifice. By which means the notion of the unity of God was preserved, and his worship kept pure and sincere, as long as they kept to this one place, where the priests of God constantly attended, to see his service rightly performed.

To put his name there,] By the name of God is meant God himself (as to call upon his name, is to call upon him), and therefore the sense is, where he would make his dwelling-place, by setting the ark, and the cloud of glory there, which was the token of his presence. This place at first seems to have been Mispeh, and afterward Shiloh. And when that was destroyed, the ark removed to several places (Kirjath-jearim, Mizpeh, Gilgal, Nob, Gibeon, the house of Obad-Edom), till at last it settled at Jerusalem. Where, when the temple was built, God saith to Solomon, "I have chosen this place to myself, for a house of sacrifice" (2 Chron. vii. 12). Which is the plain sense of these words, "choose a place to put his name there."

Even unto his habitation shall ye seek,] This explains what he means by the place where he would put his name, viz. the place where his sanctuary was settled, which was his habitation; where he placed his majesty (as Onkelos paraphrases), that all might repair thither, to seek his grace and favour.

Ver. 6. Your burnt offerings, and your sacrifices,] By sacrifices, as distinct from burnt-offerings, must be meant their sin-offerings and peace-offerings. And the latter of these were sometimes for mercies received, and sometimes freewill-offerings, or vows, as we read in Lev. vii. 12, 16. Which, if they had been bound, as oft as there was occasion, to bring to one certain place (Jerusalem suppose), though they were at never so great distance from it, it would have heave offerings of your hand, and your vows, and your freewill offerings, and the firstlings of your herds and of your flocks:

7 And there ye shall eat before the LORD your God, and ye shall rejoice in all that ye put your hand unto, ye and your households, wherein the LORD thy God hath blessed thee.

8 Ye shall not do after all the things that we do here this day, every man whatsoever is right in his own eyes.

9 For ye are not as yet come to the rest and to the inheritance, which the LORD your God giveth you.

10 But when ye go over Jordan, and dwell in the land which the LORD your God giveth you to inherit, and when he giveth you rest from all your enemies round about, so that ye dwell in safety;

11 Then there shall be a place which the LORD your God shall choose to cause his name to dwell there; thither shall ye bring all that I command you; your burnt offerings, and your sacri-been an intolerable expense to devout people. And therefore the Jews think the meaning is, that they were bound to these sacrifices, either for offences committed, or for mercies received, &c. at the next feast at the farthest; and not to defer them beyond that time (see Dr. Lightfoot in his Temple Service, p. 99, 100, of the first edition).

Your tithes,] Not those which were to be paid to the Levites, or by them to the priests, but another tithe which was to be set aside, after that to the Levites was paid, and employed as is directed, xiv. 22, 23, &c. (see here below, ver. 17).

And heave offerings of your hand,] The first-fruits, as the LXX. and Vulgar Latin rightly translate it, viz. of corn, and wine, and oil, and other fruits of the earth. Which are called the "heave-offerings of their hand," because they brought them in their own hand; and having heaved them up to the Lord, they gave them to the priests (see Numb. xviii. 11, 12, and Deut. xviii. 4. xxvi. 4. 10).

Your vows, and your freewill offerings,] Which were comprehended before under the name of sacrifices, but here more particularly expressed, to signify, that though they might choose whether they would offer them or not, or whether they would vow them, yet they could not choose the place where they should be offered (if they vowed, or were disposed to it), but must be determined by this law.

The firstlings of your herds] This shows, that the heave-offerings of their hand comprehend only the firstlings of the earth; besides which, these firstlings also belonged to the priests (Numb. xviii. 15—17).

Ver. 7. There ye shall eat] Their part of the things before mentioned; the people being wont, in ancient time, before the law of Moses, to feast upon part of the sacrifices of peace-offerings; as appears from Exod. xviii. 12. xxxiv. 13, 14.

Before the Lord your God,] Not in the tabernacle or temple, where only the priests might eat the most holy things, which were peculiarly theirs (Numb. xviii. 10), but in some place very near to the sanctuary: it being the custom of other people (and perhaps before the time of Moses) to feast with their gods in their very temples, or near their altars, according to that of the apostle, 1 Cor. viii. 10. Therefore God entertained his people also at his own house, commanding them here, and in other places, to eat their sacrifices before him at his sanctuary, and nowhere else; that is, in some place adjacent to the sanctuary. Whereby they declared that they had communion with him, and not with idols, by partaking with him at his table, that is, his altar: for there could be no need of their eating there, but only to signify this, and to secure them in his religion by feasting in his presence, and thereby owning themselves to belong to him. This is repeated very often in this book (ver. 18, of this chapter, xiv. 23. 26. xv. 20. xvi. 5), and especially xxvii. 6, 7, where they are required, before the temple was built, to eat their sacrifices near the altar which was erected after they came over Jordan. This being a profession of the true religion, to eat at God's altar, as to eat of things sacrificed to idols was to profess the heathenish religion. So all have understood it, as Elmenhorstius hath shown from a great heap of authors, in his Annot. ad Minutum Felicem, fol. 69.

Ye shall rejoice] This signifies either that they should rejoice at these feasts in the goodness of God, who had blessed the labour of their hands (of which the tithe they brought thither was a fruit), or that, doing thus, God would bless all their future labours, and make them and their families prosper, and take comfort in all their enjoyments.

Ver. 8. Ye shall not do after all the things that we do here this day,] This doth not signify, as if there was no civil government, or that the courts of justice did not sit and execute judgment between man and man, but relates to the place of offering sacrifice (as Mr. Selden observes, lib. ii. De Synedr. cap. 15, n. 4), which, in their wandering condition, they did not so strictly observe as God expected when they came to be settled. Our learned Dr. Spencer thinks it relates also to other old customs, which were rather childish than profane; and therefore tolerated by God for the present. To which he thinks those words of St. Paul have respect, Acts xiii. 18. Many things also perhaps they omitted, which they could not, or did not, observe in the wilderness; as their new moons, and other solemn days; with several rites of purification and cleansing prescribed by the law of Moses.

Every man whatsoever is right in his own eyes.] This doth not import that there was no good order kept among them, or that they were left at liberty to sacrifice where they pleased; but that, in such an uncertain state, when they were removing from place to place, many took the liberty in such matters to do as they thought good.

Ver. 9. For ye are not yet come to the rest] This explains what goes before, and gives the reason why God connived at some irregularities, because they were not fixed to a place, but uncertain when they should have a sign to pack up their goods, and be gone to another station.

To the inheritance,] Where they were to abide, as long as they observed God's commands.

Ver. 10. But when ye go over Jordan,] When their condition was altered for the better, God expected that they should be so too.

When he giveth you rest] This intimates, that the fear they were in, while they wandered in the wilderness, of the incursions of their enemies, might make them sometimes offer sacrifice where they ought not, and commit other disorders.

Ver. 11. Then there shall be a place which the Lord your God shall choose] God was not pleased (as Maimonides observes) to declare anywhere in the law where this place should be: but though he often determines them to one place (ver. 26. xiv. 23. xvi. 6), yet he leaves the place undetermined. Which he imafices, your tithes, and the heave offering of your hand, and all your choice vows which ye vow unto the LORD :

12 And ye shall rejoice before the LORD your God, ye, and your sons, and your daughters, and your menservants, and your maidservants, and the Levite that is within your gates ; forasmuch as he hath no part nor inheritance with you.

13 Take heed to thyself that thou offer not thy burnt offerings in every place that thou seest :

gines might be for these three reasons : first, lest the gentiles should get possession of it, and make war upon that account ; thinking that this place was the end of the law (as he speaks). And, secondly, lest they, in whose hands it was, should do all they could to destroy it. And, thirdly (which is the truest reason), lest every tribe should desire to have it in their lot, and strife should arise among them about it (More Nevoch. par. iii. cap. 45).

Thither shall ye bring all that I command you, &c.] All that he mentioned before, ver. 6. This may seem a heavy imposition, that they might not offer them in any place, and at any time ; but Maimonides makes this wise reflection upon it ; “ That God intended to teach them, not to have so high an opinion of sacrifices, as of prayers and deprecations, and such-like parts of Divine worship (viz. acknowledging his goodness, praising him, and giving him thanks), which are the things God mainly intends, and may be offered everywhere. Whereas sacrifices are not of that account with him ; which made him limit them to one place where he should appoint them to be offered ; and not suffer any but one certain family to discharge this office. These and such-like things were to diminish the value of sacrifices ; for which reason the prophets often reprehend men for their too great diligence and zeal in bringing sacrifices, of which God had no need, and did not principally intend as the worship he delighted in : for which he cites 1 Sam. xv. 22. Isa. i. 11. Jer. vii. 22. Sacrifices being appointed, and one place for them, not for any good in themselves, but only that all idolatry might be abolished, and the belief of the unity of God preserved” (More Nevoch. par. iii. cap. 32).

All your choice vows] In the Hebrew the words are as our margin notes, the choice of your vows. So their peace-offerings, which were vows, were called ; because they were to be selected out of those creatures which were perfect, and without the least defect. Whereas those creatures which had something superfluous, or lacking in any part, might be accepted for a freewill-offering, which a man was not bound to make, but brought it merely out of good-will. So we read expressly in Lev. xxii. 23.

Ver. 12. Ye shall rejoice before the Lord your God, ye, and your sons, &c.] The whole family was to feast with God, and one with another : whereby brotherly love and friendship were increased and strengthened, by their meeting and eating together at one place. And nothing is more joyful than to see brethren dwell together in unity (see ver. 7).

And the Levite] See x. 9. This whole tribe (as Maimonides well notes) being devoted to the Divine service, and the study of the law, neither minded ploughing nor sowing, but were wholly consecrated unto God. And, therefore, we find them very commonly reckoned among the strangers, the fatherless, and the widows, because they had no certain possessions ; which made it the more reasonable they should constantly be entertained at these feasts, which were kept at God’s house (More Nevoch. par. iii. cap. 31).

14 But in the place which the LORD shall choose in one of thy tribes, there thou shalt offer thy burnt offerings, and there thou shalt do all that I command thee.

15 Notwithstanding thou mayest kill and eat flesh in all thy gates, whatsoever thy soul lusteth after, according to the blessing of the LORD thy God which he hath given thee ; the unclean and the clean may eat thereof, as of the roebuck, and as of the hart.

Ver. 13. Offer not thy burnt offerings] Under burnt-offerings are comprehended all the other offerings before mentioned ; for these were the chief, and the most usual ; and if they might not be offered but at a certain place, much less might any other, as every body might understand, without repeating them all again.

In every place that thou seest:] To be beautiful, lovely, and inviting, by its situation, and shady trees, and fountains, &c. Such as are mentioned ver. 2. Which the gentiles chose, perhaps, wherein to sacrifice, because they were more delightful or solemn than other. Whence Ezekiel, vi. 3, mentions rivers and valleys (together with mountains) where there were fine pastures, and springs of water ; which were so pleasant and refreshing in those countries that they fancied the gods delighted in them. So St. Jerome notes upon Jer. vii. that this gentile error, omnes provincias occupavit, &c. “spread itself in all parts of the world,” that they should offer their sacrifices at the heads of fountains and delightful groves.

Ver. 14. But in the place which the Lord shall choose] This he had said before, ver. 5, 6, 11, but repeats it again, because of the great importance of it, to prevent all strange worship. Elijah, indeed, offered upon Mount Carmel, after the temple was built, but it was by prophetic inspiration ; and if any one at that time had asked him if they might take that liberty, he would have answered, By no means ; but he that offers out of Jerusalem shall be cut off (Lev. xvii. 4), as for what I do now, it is an extraordinary case, to convince the lying prophets of Baal, &c. Thus Maimonides in Seder Zeraim.

There thou shalt do all] Bring their tithes and first-fruits before mentioned, ver. 6, and eat and rejoice before the Lord (ver. 7).

Ver. 15. Thou mayest kill and eat flesh] For common food.

In all thy gates,] In any city, town, or house. While they were in the wilderness, indeed, they might not kill their beasts but only at the door of the tabernacle ; and, consequently, they ate nothing but peace-offerings, which had been first presented unto God, and part of them burnt at his altar (Lev. xvii. 3, 4, &c.). But when they went into Canaan, they were freely indulged to kill their beasts in any place, without bringing any part of them to the altar.

Whosoever thy soul lusteth after,] Of all sorts of creatures, not prohibited in the eleventh of Leviticus.

Which he hath given thee:] Suitable to every man’s estate and condition.

The unclean and the clean may eat thereof,] They who were under any legal uncleanness might not eat of the sacrifices ; but of common food, at their ordinary tables, they might, as well as others.

As of the roebuck, and as of the hart,] He instances in these, because there was great plenty of them in that country, as Elian observes in the end of his fifth book ; where he saith they were ἐν μεγίστοις ὄρεσι, “in the highest mountains” of Amanus, Libanus, and Carmel. These creatures might not be sacrificed to 16 Only ye shall not eat the blood; ye shall pour it upon the earth as water.

17 ¶ Thou mayest not eat within thy gates the tithe of thy corn, or of thy wine, or of thy oil, or the firstlings of thy herds or of thy flock, nor any of thy vows which thou vowest, nor thy freewill offerings, or heave offering of thine hand:

18 But thou must eat them before the Lord thy God in the place which the Lord thy God shall choose, thou, and thy son, and thy daughter,

God: but they might eat of others which were used in sacrifice (sheep, goats, oxen), as freely as of these which were not.

Ver. 16. Ye shall not eat the blood;] But of the blood of those creatures they might no more eat, than of those that were sacrificed at the altar. But, as there it was to be sprinkled upon the altar, and then poured out at the foot of it, so here it was to be poured on the earth.

Ye shall pour it upon the earth as water.] So that it might sink into the ground and disappear, as water doth when it is poured on the earth. Which is so strictly enjoined, though it was not the blood of an oblation, to prevent those superstitions which were exercised by the old idolaters about the blood of their sacrifices, in which they thought their demons delighted, and by eating of which they hoped to have communion with them, as Maimonides observes, in his More Nevochim, par. iii. cap. 46.

Ver. 17. Thou mayest not eat within thy gates] In their own private habitations.

The tithe of thy corn, or of thy wine, or of thy oil,] This cannot be meant of the tithe paid to the Levites, which the people might not eat anywhere, being appropriated to the Levites alone: he speaking therefore of a tithe which the people might eat, though not at home, yet in the place where the sanctuary was, it must be meant of that which the Hebrews call the second tithe, which was set out after that to the Levites was paid. Concerning which he speaks, xiv. 22, 23, &c.

Or the firstlings of thy herds, or of thy flock,] These were entirely the priests' portion by an express law (Numb. xviii. 15, 17, 18), and therefore could not lawfully be eaten by the people, either at home, or at the sanctuary. Which makes it necessary to understand this of some other firstlings; and it is not improbable that it is meant of the females which open the womb: for the males only were the Lord's (as appears from Exod. xiii. and other places), who gave them to his priests; but he would have the first-born females also to be in some sort sacred, by requiring them to be eaten at his sanctuary, where his priests had their share of them. For I see no ground to think, that as there was a secondary tithe, so there was a secondary firstling set apart by every man to this use.

Nor any of thy vows which thou vowest, &c.] All such things were also wholly the Lord's (Lev. xxvii. 28), and given by him to his priests (Numb. xviii. 14). But that is only to be understood of what was vowed to God absolutely, without mentioning any particular use to which it was designed. Besides which, they might vow what they pleased to be spent in solemn feasts with the Levites, the widows, the fatherless, and other poor people; and of such Moses here speaks.

Heave offering] These were first-fruits of corn, wine, and oil, as I said upon ver. 6. which were also the priests' portion (Numb. xviii. 12). Therefore this can be meant of no other first-fruits but such as and thy manservant, and thy maidservant, and the Levite that is within thy gates: and thou shalt rejoice before the Lord thy God in all that thou puttest thine hands unto.

19 Take heed to thyself that thou forsake not the Levite as long as thou livest upon the earth.

20 ¶ When the Lord thy God shall enlarge thy border, as he hath promised thee, and thou shalt say, I will eat flesh, because thy soul longeth to eat flesh; thou mayest eat flesh, whatsoever thy soul lusteth after.

men freely offered, without any obligation to it, to be spent in this fashion: for he was speaking before of such kind of things; unless we will understand this of the first-fruits of young trees, which might not be eaten in three years after they were planted, but in the fourth year were "to be holy, to praise the Lord withal" (Lev. xix. 24), which, as Josephus saith, were spent in these sacred feasts (see there).

Ver. 18.] See before, ver. 11, 12.

Ver. 19.] He gives this caution, lest covetousness should make them defraud the Levites of their tithes, and not let them have convenient habitations, or profaneness make them not invite them to the sacred feasts before spoken of. This is repeated xiv. 27. And in this the Jews were so careful, that when there was such increase of the Levites that their cities could not contain them, they assigned them more than were given them at first: for Joshua gave them only forty-eight; but before the captivity of Babylon they had twenty more added to them, as appears from 1 Chron. vi. 65, 66, &c. where, after the mention of the old number, there is an account given of twenty more added to them out of several tribes: for though they could not enlarge the bounds prescribed to their cities, yet, as the number of Levites increased, they might give them new cities. And so they did, that they might not be straitened in their dwellings among them.

Ver. 20. Shall enlarge thy border.] That is, when he had brought them out of this wilderness, where they were encamped round about the tabernacle, into a spacious country, where they might live far distant from it.

As he hath promised thee,] Which he promised to enlarge, even as far as Euphrates, if they were obedient to him (Gen. xiv. 18).

I will eat flesh,] Have a desire to eat it.

Because thy soul longeth] There were several sorts of flesh that were lawful to be eaten, which they could not have in the wilderness, and therefore might be supposed to desire them very much when they came into Canaan, which abounded with them. And besides, they would have more plenty of such cattle as they now had, which might incline them to keep greater tables.

Thou mayest eat flesh,] This was said before, ver. 15, and now repeated with all the rest that belongs to this matter, to let them see God did not intend to abridge them too much of their liberty: for though they might not eat the tithe of their corn, wine, and oil, (and the rest mentioned ver. 17), at their own home, because they were holy things, and therefore to be eaten in one certain place, where God's sanctuary was; yet all sorts of flesh, used at their private tables, he now gives them leave to kill anywhere, without bringing it to the tabernacle, and offering the blood at the altar, as they were tied to do while they were in the wilderness (Lev. xvii. 3, 4, &c.). For then the tabernacle was very near to every one of them; but when their border was enlarged, it must 21 If the place which the Lord thy God hath chosen to put his name there be too far from thee, then thou shalt kill of thy herd and of thy flock, which the Lord hath given thee, as I have commanded thee, and thou shalt eat in thy gates whatsoever thy soul lusteth after.

22 Even as the roebuck and the hart is eaten, so thou shalt eat them: the unclean and the clean shall eat of them alike.

23 Only be sure that thou eat not the blood: for the blood is the life; and thou mayest not eat the life with the flesh.

24 Thou shalt not eat it; thou shalt pour it upon the earth as water.

25 Thou shalt not eat it; that it may go well with thee, and with thy children after thee, when thou shalt do that which is right in the sight of the Lord.

26 Only thy holy things which thou hast, and thy vows, thou shalt take, and go unto the place which the Lord shall choose:

27 And thou shalt offer thy burnt offerings, the flesh and the blood, upon the altar of the Lord thy God: and the blood of thy sacrifices shall be poured out upon the altar of the Lord thy God, and thou shalt eat the flesh.

28 Observe and hear all these words which I commanded thee, that it may go well with thee, and with thy children after thee for ever, when thou doest that which is good and right in the sight of the Lord thy God.

29 ¶ When the Lord thy God shall cut off the nations from before thee, whither thou goest to possess them, and thou succeedest them, and dwellest in their land;

30 Take heed to thyself that thou be not needs be at so great a distance from some of them, that it would have been too heavy a burden to oblige them to kill every thing they ate at the tabernacle, and therefore he dispenses with it.

Ver. 21. If the place, &c.] The particle chi may better be translated here because; which makes these words a reason of the allowance given in the foregoing verse, "Because the place which the Lord thy God hath chosen to put his name there, is too far from thee, thou mayest kill," &c.

Of thy herd] Such creatures as are now allowed for sacrifice, oxen, sheep, lambs, and goats.

Which the Lord hath given thee,] For food as well as other uses.

As I have commanded thee,] Given thee leave to eat at home, without carrying them to the tabernacle: so it follows, "And thou shalt eat in thy gates whatsoever thy soul lusteth after;" i. e. all manner of things, of which there was great variety, not prohibited by this law.

Ver. 22. Even as the roebuck and the hart is eaten,] Which were creatures not allowed to be offered to God in sacrifice (see ver. 15), and therefore they might less doubt to eat of them, than of such as were peculiarly appointed for that use. From which they might possibly have thought, that out of reverence to God they should abstain; but are here satisfied they might as freely eat of them as of the other.

The unclean and the clean shall eat of them alike.] Whereas, while they were in the wilderness, only such as were clean might eat flesh, because it was sanctified by being killed at the altar; now all are indulged the same liberty, whether "they were removed from holy things (as the Jerusalem Targum expresses it), or were pure to use them, both might eat flesh alike."

Ver. 23. Eat not the blood.] Take great care, as the word signifies in the Hebrew (which is, be strong), use thy utmost diligence to prevent this.

For the blood is the life;] See what I have noted upon Gen. ix. 4. Lev. xvii. 11. 14.

Ver. 24.] Since they could not pour it out at the altar, where nobody could meddle with it, they were to pour it out on the earth, that it might sink into it; Or, as the law required in Leviticus (xvii. 13), cover it with dust, that the cattle might not lick it up: or, the meaning may be, pour it as a common thing (which water is), without any religious rite used about it.

Ver. 25. Thou shalt not eat it;] This is repeated here so often, as it is also in Lev. xvii., to show the weightiness of this command.

That it may go well with thee,] When they neither followed the idolatrous customs which the gentiles used about the blood, nor profanely meddled with that which was peculiar to God, when it was offered at the altar: which was the great reason why they were prohibited to eat blood.

Ver. 26.] Only he would have them not to forget that the things mentioned ver. 17. they were not to eat at home, but at the house of God, though it was never so far distant from them.

Ver. 27. Thou shalt offer—upon the altar] No sacrifices were to be offered anywhere but at the sanctuary, as he had said before, ver. 6, and now reminds them of it, that they might observe it, and do accordingly.

The blood—shall be poured out] All their peace-offerings, as well as others, were to be there offered, and their blood poured on the altar as a holy thing; whereas the blood of those creatures they killed at home was poured out, as a common thing, like water.

Thou shalt eat the flesh.] After God and his priests had their parts.

Ver. 28. That it may go well with thee,] This was the great commandment, to serve God alone: and the observance of it was the great condition upon which all their happiness depended; which makes him again press their care in this matter.

When thou doest that which is good and right] Please God by a strict obedience to this precept.

Ver. 29.] See ix. 1.

Ver. 30.] Take heed to thyself that thou be not snared by following them,] It is plain from hence, that in this chapter, as well as in the foregoing, he is still endeavouring to secure them from the idolatrous customs of the country which they went to possess; which is the ground of the following prohibition, about which he could not say too much, they being so prone to idolatry, and the danger they incurred thereby so exceeding great. There are some of the Jews who think, that by following them is meant following their fashions in their clothes, and in their ornaments (as it is explained in the book Siphri), which might entice them to imitate their religious rites, which it appears by the next words are principally intended.

After that they be destroyed] It was the most unaccountable folly to worship the gods of those nations, whom they saw expelled their country for their idolatries.

Inquire not after their Gods,] They were not so much as to ask what gods they worshipped.

Saying, How did these nations serve their gods?]

snares by following them, after that they be destroyed from before thee; and that thou inquire not after their gods, saying, How did these nations serve their gods? even so will I do likewise.

31 Thou shalt not do so unto the LORD thy God: for every abomination to the LORD, which he hateth, have they done unto their gods; for even their sons and their daughters they have burnt in the fire to their gods.

32 What thing soever I command you, observe to do it: thou shalt not add thereto, nor diminish from it.

Nor endeavour to know the manner of their worship: Which was very different, as Maimonides observes, according as their gods differed one from another; for that sort of worship which was acceptable to one god, might not be given to another. As they uncovered themselves (if we may believe him) before Baal-Peor, and threw a stone to Mercury. See his tract concerning the worship of the Planets, cap. 3. sect. 2, &c. and Dionys. Vossius' annotations there; where he resolves, that, if they uncovered themselves to Mercury, or threw a stone to Baal-Peor, it was not idolatry, because not their proper worship: which is a foolish opinion; for they were not to use any of their religious rites, no more than to offer sacrifice, burn incense, or bow down to any of their idols, which he acknowledges was idolatry. In short, if they gave the idol the worship proper to him, or that worship which was proper to the true God, he acknowledges they were guilty.

Even so will I do likewise.] Though men only resolve to do it, yet they were guilty of committing this sin. The Jews, indeed, make no great account of sins committed in the heart, yet in this case they are very strict, having framed this maxim, as R. Levi Barzelonita observes, Præcept. cexxvi. which their rabbins industriously inculcate into their scholars, that "the blessed God imputes no thought of any transgression to an Israelite, as if it were the fact itself, except only the thought of idolatry, which is imputed to a man as if he had committed idolatry." Now it was a reasonable presumption, that he who inquired how the people of Canaan worshipped their gods, intended at least to worship the God of Israel, as they did those idols: and this gave too much cause to suspect, that he had an inclination to worship their idols instead of God: for otherwise he would have rested content with that way of worshipping God which the law had prescribed. Whereupon the Jews have determined (as our Mr. Thordike hath observed), that there are four ceremonies, which, whosoever performs to any thing but to God alone, must be understood to worship it for God; which are sacrificing, burning incense, pouring out drink-offerings, and adoration. But others there are, by doing which men cannot be concluded to worship any thing but God, till they do it in that way and fashion as is done by those who profess to worship it for God. (See his Principles of Christian Truth, chap. 26.)

Ver. 31. Thou shalt not do so] See ver. 4. of which the reason is here given.

Every abomination—have they done unto their gods;] For instance: "The Zabii (saith Maimonides), I find in their books, offered to their great god, the sun, seven bats, and seven mice, and seven other creeping things: which alone may suffice to demonstrate how vile and abominable their worship was, and what reason there was so severely to prohibit their idolatry and every thing pertaining to it" (More Nevochim, par. iii. cap. 29).

Their sons and their daughters they have burnt in the fire.] This is the great instance of their abominable wickedness. Of which, see Lev. xviii. 21. xx. 2. This was notoriously practised by the Carthaginians, who, it is certain, derived it from the Phœnicians, the ancient inhabitants of this country. Plato mentions it in Protagora, where he saith, "The Athenian laws did not permit them to sacrifice men; but among the Carthaginians it was a holy rite; so that some of them permitted their sons to be offered to Saturn:" which wicked custom at last overspread all nations, even the Greeks themselves, as Job. Gensius hath demonstrated, lib. De Victimis Humanis, par. i. cap. 11. and par. ii. cap. 6.

Ver. 32. Observe to do it:] Keep close to the precepts I have given you about my worship, ver. 28, and see iv. 2.

Thou shalt not add thereto, nor diminish from it.] They were not to add any other rites of worship of their own devising, or from the idolatrous customs of those countries, nor omit any of those which God had commanded them to use: for if they had used any of the gentile ceremonies, whereby they honoured their gods, it would easily have introduced the worship of the gods themselves; and if they had omitted any of the rites which God had ordained, some other would have easily stepped into their room which were used by idolaters.

Maimonides, from these words, labours to prove the "eternity of the law of Moses." But it is very strange that so great a man should be so blind as not to see what some of his brethren could discern, that God did not bind up himself neither to change nor alter these laws, though he did not permit the Israelites to do it. So the author of Sepher Ikkarim wisely glosses upon these words (lib. iii. cap. 14): "The Scripture prohibits us to add unto, or detract from, these precepts, according to our will and pleasure; but what hinders the blessed God either to add or detract, when his blessed wisdom shall think fit? Which he illustrates in the foregoing chapter, by this example among others: A physician prescribes a diet to his patient, for such a time as he judges convenient, which he doth not declare to the sick man. Now when the time comes that the physician hath obtained his end, he changes the diet, and permits his patient what he formerly forbade, and prohibits that which he formerly permitted, Which exactly agrees to what our blessed Saviour had done."

CHAPTER XIII.

1 Enticers to idolatry, 6 how near soever unto thee, 9 are to be stoned to death. 12 Idolatrous cities are not to be spared.

1 If there arise among you a prophet, or a dreamer of dreams, and giveth thee a sign or a wonder,

2 And the sign or the wonder come to pass, whereof he spake unto thee, saying, Let us go after other gods, which thou hast not known, and let us serve them;

3 Thou shalt not hearken unto the words of that prophet, or that dreamer of dreams: for the LORD your God proveth you, to know whether ye love the LORD your God with all your heart and with all your soul.

4 Ye shall walk after the LORD your God, and fear him, and keep his commandments, and obey his voice, and ye shall serve him, and cleave unto him.

5 And that prophet, or that dreamer of dreams, shall be put to death; because he hath spoken to turn you away from the LORD your God, which brought you out of the land of Egypt, and redeemed you out of the house of bondage, to thrust thee out of the way which the LORD thy God commanded thee to walk in. So shalt thou put the evil away from the midst of thee

CHAP. XIII.

Ver. 1. If there arise among you] In future times.

A prophet.] One that pretends to have a message from God delivered to him in a vision, or by the word of the Lord: for there was a constant succession of prophets (to whom God revealed his mind several ways) among the Jews, to preserve them in the true worship of God, and instruct them in their law, and admonish them on some occasion of things to come; which was the more necessary, because there were such kind of persons among the gentiles.

Or a dreamer of dreams.] Who pretended God had appeared to him in a dream, (as he did unto Jacob, Gen. xxviii. 11.) and revealed his mind to him. Such there were in Jeremiah's time (Jer. xxix. 8).

Giveth thee a sign] Foretell something.

Or a wonder.] By what follows one would think this belongs to the foregoing words, which are to be understood as if he had said, "If he foretell some wonderful thing," which shall shortly come to pass. Or, it may be interpreted, "shall work a miracle;" unto which the heathen did not so much pretend, as they did to predictions, which were common among them.

Ver. 2. And the sign or the wonder come to pass.] The event confirms the prediction; so that he seem a true prophet.

Saying, Let us go after other gods.] And, consequently, he persuade you to worship other gods, which he pretends is demonstrated to be lawful, by the fulfilling of his sign and wonder.

Ver. 3. Thou shalt not hearken unto the words of that prophet, or that dreamer] Notwithstanding, look upon him as a liar, and not as a true prophet: for God cannot contradict himself, nor do any thing to persuade men to forsake him, and give his worship to another. This shows that he still pursues his intention (in this chapter, as well as all the foregoing), to establish them in the belief and worship of one God, according to the first commandment, from which nothing was more likely to seduce them, than false prophets, who were the great instruments of establishing the foulest idolatry in Israel, as appears from 1 Kings xviii. 19, where we read of no less than four hundred prophets of Baal, and four hundred and fifty prophets of the groves, that is, of other false gods, particularly Astarte, as Mr. Selden conjectures, in his Syntagma ii. De Diis Syris, cap. 2. And there could not be a greater demonstration that a man was a false prophet, than if he endeavoured to draw them to the worship of other gods, or if he pretended to speak in the name of any other God (Deut. xviii. 20), or if he commanded them to offer such sacrifices as God abhorred. Thus Aristander (as David Chytraeus notes) discovered himself to be a false prophet, though he foretold the destruction of Babylon; for he required human sacrifices to be offered: as Tiresias also predicted victory to the Thebans, provided Creon's son was offered up in sacrifice: and Chaleas at the time of the siege of Troy, but together therewith commanded the sacrifice of Iphigenia. These, and such-like things, plainly discovered they were not inspired by God, who is the lover of mankind, and cannot delight in their blood.

For the LORD your God proveth you.] That there might be an open and public discovery made, whether they sincerely loved God or not, or were steadfast in their religion. So Maimonides in his More Nevochim, par. iii. cap. 21. "God would make known to the nations of the world the measure of your faith, in the truth of this law, and of the approbation wherewith you apprehend it," &c. For it had been a great weakness to suffer even a miracle to shake their faith, after it had been confirmed by so many miracles.

Ver. 4. Ye shall walk after the LORD your God.] Follow the will of God (as Maimonides interprets it), declared by himself (More Nevochim, par. i. cap. 33). Which is a plainer and more genuine interpretation than that of the Gemara of Soto, cap. 1, sect. 52, where R. Chama expounds it of imitating God, in clothing the naked, visiting the sick, burying the dead, &c. for "beneficence is the beginning and the end of the Divine law." Which is a pious sense, but not here intended.

Fear him.] Worship him alone, (vi. 2.)

Keep his commandments.] The greatest of which is this (xi. 13).

Obey his voice.] Which you heard from Mount Sinai, saying, "Thou shalt have no other gods but me."

Ye shall serve him, and cleave unto him.] Steadfastly adhere unto his service, and not be drawn from it by any persuasion.

Ver. 5. That prophet, or that dreamer] These two signify persons who pretend to different sorts of revelations, by vision or by dreams.

Shall be put to death.] This the Jews interpret to signify strangulation, unto which, upon good proof of the fact, he was to be sentenced by the great Sanhedrin: for that was a received maxim among them, that "a lying prophet was to be judged no where but by the council of seventy." (See Selden, lib. iii. De Synedriis, cap. 6. n. 1).

Because he hath spoken to turn you away from the 6 ¶ If thy brother, the son of thy mother, or thy son, or thy daughter, or the wife of thy bosom, or thy friend, which is as thine own soul, entice thee secretly, saying, Let us go and serve other gods, which thou hast not known, thou, nor thy fathers;

7 Namely, of the gods of the people which are round about you, nigh unto thee, or far off from thee, from the one end of the earth even unto the other end of the earth;

8 Thou shalt not consent unto him, nor hearken unto him; neither shall thine eye pity him, neither shalt thou spare, neither shalt thou conceal him:

9 But thou shalt surely kill him; thine hand shall be first upon him to put him to death, and afterwards the hand of all the people.

10 And thou shalt stone him with stones, that he die; because he hath sought to trust thee away from the Lord thy God, which brought thee out of the land of Egypt, from the house of bondage.

Lord] Persuaded you to forsake your God and his service, to whom you owe your liberty and all your possessions in the land of Canaan.

To thrust thee out of the way which the Lord thy God commanded thee to walk in.] These words express how zealous such impostors were in their importunities, and how restless in their endeavours to draw men to idolatry, pressing them so earnestly, as if they would force them to it.

So shalt thou put the evil away from the midst of thee.] i. e. The danger of idolatry; by taking away the life of him that would have seduced others unto it.

Ver. 6. If thy brother,] Who lay in the same womb with him.

Or thy son, or thy daughter,] Who were dearer than a brother.

Or the wife of thy bosom,] Who was still dearer, sleeping in the same bed with him, as the Jerusalem Targum expounds it.

Or thy friend, which is as thine own soul,] Whom thou lovedst as thou dost thy life. He puts a friend in the chief place, (as the son of Sirach also doth, Eccles. xxxiii. 19.) which their wives, by the ill choice they made of them, had not always in their affection.

Here is no mention of father or mother, because a child, as the Hebrews fancy, was to have more reverence for them, than to accuse them of any crime whatsoever. As if a greater regard was to be had to them than to God himself. The true reason is, because there was no need to name them; for, if their piety to God was to overcome their love to all those relations before mentioned, it could not be supposed that respect to parents was to come into competition with it.

Entice thee secretly,] In the foregoing verses he speaks of an open seducer, and here of a secret one; there of one that came with authority, and here of one of the ordinary people.

Saying, Let us go and serve other gods,] The Jews think this is meant of one who invited others to idolatry, but did not press them with reasons, as in the former case. Which is not likely; for all men pretend some reason or other for such a great alteration as that to a new religion.

Which thou hast not known, thou, nor thy fathers;] This aggravates the crime; to entice them to forsake God, who was known to have done such wonders for their fathers, and was so good to them, and go to serve gods with whom they had no acquaintance.

Ver. 7. Of the gods of the people which are round about you,] Wheresoever they were (for several nations had several gods), whether in the neighbouring countries, or in remote parts; it made no difference at all, if they were strange gods.

From the one end of the earth even unto the other] The enticer might possibly suggest the universality of the worship to which he invited him, as an argument to embrace it.

Ver. 8. Thou shalt not consent unto him,] As many words as there are in this verse, the Jews think there are so many precepts. The first of which is this, not to be led by affection and kindness to yield unto his motion. So they interpret these words, "thou shalt not love him."

Nor hearken unto him;] I do not see how this differs from the former; but they interpret it, that "they ought to hate him," as well as his motion. So Maimonides, in his book of the Worship of the Planets (cap. 5. sect. 6, 7).

Neither shall thine eye pity him,] This they fancy signifies, that, if he were in danger of death, they should not help him, but let him perish.

Neither shalt thou spare,] When he was brought before the judge, they were not to intercede for him, nor say any thing in his favour, nor assist him to defend himself.

Neither shalt thou conceal him,] Dissemble any thing that might make against him. And, no doubt, God intended by all these words to signify, that he ought to be looked upon as his greatest enemy; upon whom therefore they were to have no mercy, but to prosecute him unto death, as guilty of the highest treason against the Divine Majesty.

Ver. 9. But thou shalt surely kill him;] Not privately, as he enticed others, but by a legal process against him in a court of judgment. And that not the highest, but in the court of twenty-three, who might proceed against him, as Mr. Selden observes, lib. iii. De Synedr. cap. 6. The only difficulty was, how to prove him guilty who enticed another secretly (as the text saith), and not before witnesses. To which the Jews answer, That he who was enticed was to dispose some persons as secretly near to the place of their next meeting, who might hear all he said, and testify it in court.

Thine hand shall be first upon him to put him to death,] He was to be sentenced to death, and the accuser was to throw the first stone at him, together with the witnesses (xvii. 7). For it would have weakened the credit of his accusation if he had not been the foremost in the execution (see xvii. 7).

Afterwards the hand of all the people,] Who were to assist in the execution of this sentence.

The first words of this verse, which we translate, "Thou shalt surely kill him," the Vulgar Latin translates, "Thou shalt forthwith kill him." And so the Jews understand the Hebrew phrase, "Killing thou shalt kill him;" i. e. immediately have him before the court of judgment. As the LXX. understood it, ἀναγγέλων ἀγγελίαις πρὸς αὐτοῦ, "informing thou shalt inform against him," that is, without delay. And accordingly the Jews add, that, after he was condemned, he was immediately also put to death. Whereas in other crimes the execution was respited, after the sentence was pronounced, for a day and a night, that the man might have time to clear his innocence, if he were able, by any new proofs. Such severity was but needful among a people prone to idolatry, and encompassed on all sides with idolatrous nations.

Ver. 10. Thou shalt stone him with stones, that he

11 And all Israel shall hear, and fear, and shall do no more any such wickedness as this is among you.

12 ¶ If thou shalt hear say in one of thy cities, which the Lord thy God hath given thee to dwell there, saying,

13 Certain men, the children of Belial, are die;} But if, upon admonition, he desisted from his enticement, and repented of what he had said to his neighbour, and resolved himself not to worship other gods, he was not bound to inform against him.

Because he hath sought to thrust thee away from the Lord, &c.] See ver. 5. The very attempt of this was criminal, though he did not prevail in his seducement.

Ver. 11.] The end of this severity was to preserve the body of the people from the contagion of idolatry. Nothing being more apt to deter men from crimes than such exemplary punishments of them. So Callimachus, in his hymn to Ceres (ver. 23), makes this the design of the punishment she inflicted on Erysichthon, ὦρα καὶ τις ὑπερβάνης ἀδέρπει

"that others might shun the like transgression."

Ver. 12.] If the infection was spread into a city, or a considerable part of it, there was still more danger, and greater severity was to be used, to prevent the whole country about it from being drawn away from their allegiance to the Divine Majesty. And therefore, upon such an information as follows in the next verse (which is here meant by thou shalt hear say), given to the great Sanhedrin, they were to do as is directed ver. 14.

Ver. 13. Children of Belial.] So the most profligate wretches are called in Scripture (Judg. xix. 22. 1 Sam. i. 16. x. 27. xxv. 17. 25), signifying lawless persons, who had no regard either to God or men.

Gone out from among you.] Left the worship of God at the tabernacle: for it doth not signify their forsaking the city (in which they continued to seduce men from their religion), but forsaking their communion in Divine service. By which many have well observed that place in St. John may be interpreted, 1 John ii. 19.

Have withdrawn the inhabitants of their city.] The Hebrew word which we here translate withdraw, is twice before (ver. 5. 10) translated thrust away; signifying only earnest endeavors to seduce men from their religion. But here it seems to signify also the effect of those endeavors, whereby they had prevailed with men to forsake the God of Israel, or to worship other gods with him.

Let us go and serve other gods.] Strange gods, as they are often called in Scripture, which the nations round about them worshipped (ver. 7), but were always abhorred by true Israelites.

Ver. 14. Then shalt thou enquire, and make search, and ask diligently;} The great Sanhedrin, who only could take cognizance of this crime, were upon this information to send some, on whose fidelity they could rely, to examine the truth of the report which was spread abroad, concerning the defection of a city to the worship of other gods; who were to use their utmost care and diligence in this inquisition, and, by all possible means, endeavor to find whether or not the information was true. For it was a matter of great concernment, that neither the innocent should suffer, nor apostates go unpunished. But the punishment being so dreadful, there was the greater exactness used to be certain of the crime; and there were likewise a great many temperaments (as Mr. Selden calls them) found by the Jewish lawyers (partly from the nicest interpretation of every syllable gone out from among you, and have withdrawn the inhabitants of their city, saying, Let us go and serve other gods, which ye have not known;

14 Then shalt thou enquire, and make search, and ask diligently; and, behold, if it be truth, and the thing certain, that such abomination is wrought among you; in these two verses, and partly from the pretended tradition of their elders), whereby they mitigated the sharpness of this law. For they would not proceed upon it to destroy a city, though they found them idolaters unless the seducers were two, or more; and those also men, not women; because the law here speaks in the plural number, of certain men, children of Belial. As if their forsaking God was not a crime, whether they were persuaded to it or not by others. They say, also, it was not to be a mere town, or village, but a city; because the words here are in one of thy cities, in which there were more than a hundred houses: if there were fewer, it was no city in their account, and so escaped. They who seduced a city also were to be of the same city; because it is said here, These men of Belial are gone out from among you. All which are mere quirks, which have no solid reason in them. They are all mentioned together in the title Sanhedrin, set forth by J. Coch, cap. 11. sect. 4. and by Maimonides more largely, in his Avoda Zara, and our Selden, lib. iii. De Synedr. cap. 5. n. 2.

But there are other temperaments of this law, which have no foundation in reason. As, first, that a city was not to be destroyed, unless the major part of the inhabitants were fallen off to serve other gods. And, secondly, that the law speaks only of lesser cities, not of those which were so large that the greatest part of a tribe lived in it; for God would not have a whole tribe cut off by the senate. Thirdly, they might not destroy any of the six cities of refuge, because they were none of theirs, but God's: and the words of the law are, "In one of thy cities, which the Lord hath given thee to dwell in;" whereas these were given for a further purpose. And, fourthly, some add, not a frontier town; because it is said, "in the midst of thee" (so the words are in the Hebrew, which we translate among you), to which they subjoin a better reason, because the whole country might have been exposed to be overrun with the gentiles. And, lastly, they except Jerusalem from this law, because it was God's seat; and (as Maimonides will have it) it was not distributed to any particular tribe. Which, how it is to be understood, see Selden in the place above named, sect. 3, 4, where he touches upon all these. But, if Jerusalem was to be excepted from the judgment of men, God took care to have this sentence executed upon it by his own judgment; for he sent Nebuchadnezzar against it, whose soldiers burnt with fire both the house of the Lord, and the house of the king, and all the houses of Jerusalem (Jer. lii. 13).

If it be truth,—that such abomination is wrought among you;] If the inquisitors found, upon due examinations, that there was a plain and evident proof of their guilt, they were to make their report to the great Sanhedrin; who, being satisfied that either the whole city, or the greater part of them, were fallen to idolatry, sent to them two men of extraordinary wisdom (who were candidates for the senatorial dignity) to admonish them, and, by arguments and persuasions, to endeavour to reduce them to the worship of the Lord God of Israel. And if they prevailed, they were pardoned, and no further proceedings against them: but if they continued obstinate, then 15 Thou shalt surely smite the inhabitants of that city with the edge of the sword, destroying it utterly, and all that is therein, and the cattle thereof, with the edge of the sword.

16 And thou shalt gather all the spoil of it into the midst of the street thereof, and shalt burn with fire the city, and all the spoil thereof every whit, for the LORD thy God: and it shall be an heap for ever; it shall not be built again.

17 And there shall cleave nought of the cursed thing to thine hand: that the LORD may turn from the fierceness of his anger, and shew thee mercy, and have compassion upon thee, and multiply thee, as he hath sworn unto thy fathers;

18 When thou shalt hearken to the voice of the LORD thy God, to keep all his commandments which I command thee this day, to do that which is right in the eyes of the LORD thy God.

the Sanhedrin commanded the people of Israel to raise an army, and besiege the place, and enter it by force, if they could not otherways. And when the city was taken, several courts were appointed to try and condemn all that were guilty. Thus Maimonides, in the forenamed treatise, reports the method of proceeding, out of their ancient authors (see Selden, sect. 6).

Ver. 15. Thou shalt surely smite the inhabitants of that city] The same author there saith, that, in the hearing of their cause, every one who was found guilty of idolatry, after admonition, by two witnesses, was set aside: and if they proved to be the lesser part of the city, they were stoned (according to the law of single apostates), the rest being freed from punishment: but if they were the greater part of it, they were sent to the great Sanhedrin, who adjudged them to be cut off by the sword, together with their wives and children. And thus the whole city was to be punished if there was an universal defection.

Destroying it utterly,] In the Hebrew the word is, Thou shalt make it a cherem, or "an accursed thing." And so the LXX. Ἀναθήματα ἀναθήματα αὐτῶν, where the Vulgar translates it as we do, "Thou shalt utterly destroy it;" which is consonant to the notion of the Hebrew word (see Selden, lib. i. De Synedr. cap. 7. p. 131). So that if any righteous man had any thing therein at that time, it was to be destroyed, as the very words are in the title Sanhedrin, cap. 11. sect. 5. But it is to be supposed, that all who feared God would remove their effects, together with themselves, from so wicked a place, before sentence was pronounced against them. On the contrary, they say, the goods of the idolaters, wheresoever they were found, whether within the city or without, were to be burnt.

Ver. 16. Gather all the spoil of it into the midst of the street] Into the market-place, as the Jews interpret it. Or, if it had none, they were to make a spacious place, into which all the spoil and the household stuff was to be brought, and fire set to it, to consume it, as an anathema, or cursed thing. What temperaments, as they called them, there were to mitigate the severity of this sentence, see Mr. Selden, in the place forenamed, sect. 7.

And shalt burn with fire the city,] For the vindication of God's honour, and preserving men in their allegiance to him. R. Simeon, in the title Sanhedrin, interprets it in this manner, sect. 6. "Thus saith the Lord, If you do justice upon a city full of idolatry,

I will account it, as if you had offered a whole burnt-offering unto me."

It shall not be built again.] The Hebrew doctors do not entirely agree in the interpretation of these words. For some of them say (in that place of the Sanhedrin now named), that they were not so much as to make a garden or orchard in that place. Others of them say, though it might not be restored into the form of a city, yet they might employ the ground in plantations of trees. But there are those who interpret the words so rigidly, that they think it was not lawful to erect any building there, not so much as a dove-house, but it was to lie waste (see Selden, sect. 8). If any man did attempt to build such a city, he was to be beaten, as the same great man observes, lib. i. De Synedr. cap. 13. p. 558.

Ver. 17. There shall cleave nought of the cursed thing to thine hand:] They were not to take the smallest part of the spoil to their own use. "For as long as the wicked are in the world (say the Jews in the forenamed title Sanhedrin), the fierce anger of God will remain in the world; but when they are removed the wrath of God also will cease." Now the wickedness of purloining any thing that was a cherem, as the Hebrews call it, or an accursed thing, appears in the story of Achan, who brought all Israel into danger by it, as we read in the seventh of Joshua. And Saul is an eminent example of it also, for he lost his kingdom for this sin (1 Sam. xv. 3. 9. 19. 26, &c.).

That the Lord may turn from the fierceness of his anger,] This explains, in part, what he means in the former verse, when he bids them burn the city and the spoil, "for the Lord their God," i. e. to pacify the Divine Majesty, who was highly incensed by such a wickedness. The punishment of which was, indeed, very terrible, but very necessary; because the crime was of so high a nature, that it struck at the very foundation of their religion and government.

Show thee mercy, and have compassion upon thee,] God promises to deal the better with them, for executing this judgment upon such dangerous offenders.

Multiply thee,] They were not to fear any want of people, by cutting off such a multitude; for God promises to increase them by this loss.

Ver. 18.] It was not sufficient that they kept themselves from idolatry, unless they also executed his vengeance upon idolaters: for the inflicting the punishment before named was as right in his eyes, as the observance of any other of his precepts.

CHAP. XIV.

Ver. 1. Ye are the children of the Lord your God:] So the Lord had owned them to be, when he sent Moses unto Pharaoh; to command him to dismiss Israel; telling him he was "his son, even his first-born" (Exod. iv. 22, 23). This was a good reason, therefore, why they should own no other God but him; and, consequently, follow none of the customs of idolatrous people, but be wholly governed by his laws.

Ye shall not cut yourselves.] This might seem to forbid the making any incisions in their body, as the heathen did (at least in future times), who marked themselves thereby to belong to such and such gods (for the Israelites had received the mark of God in their flesh by circumcision, which obliged them to receive no other), if the following words did not plainly determine this to their cutting themselves for the dead; which hath been sufficiently explained in Lev. xix. 28. Yet it is fit to note, that the Jerusalem Targum expounds this of "incisions here and there for idolatry." And it may be further observed, that the heathen were wont to cut themselves in pangs of devotion (as appears by the priests of Baal, 1 Kings xviii. 28), as well as when they were full of sorrow and grief for the dead (Jer. xvi. 6), and in all public calamities (Jer. xli. 5. xlvii. 5). All which arose from an opinion they had, that the more they afflicted themselves, the less they should be afflicted by God.

Nor make any baldness between your eyes for the dead.] Some of the heathen, saith Theodoret (Quest. 13, upon this book), cut off all their hair, and offered it to the dead; others shaved their beards; and others their eye-brows and eye-lids, or (which some think is the meaning of "between their eyes") the hair in the forefront of their head, or near their temples, as R. Solomon interprets it. Which seems to be the meaning of the Jerusalem Targum, which translates it "Ye shall not make any baldness in the house of your countenance." And whether it were done with a razor, or they used any art, by plasters or ointments, to make the hair fall off, it was the same crime, as Maimonides saith, that is, a piece of idolatry. For this was practised, not merely to make themselves look ruefully, but there was some respect to their gods in it, which is the reason it is here prohibited. Certain it is, that in aftertimes the gentiles pulled off their hair, or cut it off, and laid it upon the face or the breast of the dead, or in their sepulchres, to pacify the infernal gods. We find instances of it in Homer. And likewise they made incisions in their flesh, and spilt their blood at funerals, with the same intention, to appease the gods below, and make them kind to the dead (see our learned Dr. Spencer, lib. ii. cap. 12. sect. 2, 3).

All which shows that Moses still pursues the argument, which he begins at the sixth chapter, and hath continued ever since, to press upon them the strict observance of the first commandment. Inasmuch, that he would not have them use any of the rites which were used at their funerals by those that worshipped other gods.

Ver. 2.] The very same words, in a manner, we had before, vii. 6, as a reason why they should destroy the images of the heathen, &c. Which shows he is still speaking of the idolatrous customs which they should eschew, because they were separated to God as a peculiar people by laws different from all other nations. The author of Sepher Cosri speaks not amiss, That the people of Israel were called God's Segullah, because they were elected by him to enjoy special privileges above other people; and brought by him for that end out of the land of Egypt in a wonderful manner, and then had his glory dwelling among them. From whence it is, that he doth not say in the preface to the ten commandments, "I am the Lord of heaven and earth," or "thy Creator," and therefore thou shalt have no other gods but me; but "I am the Lord thy God that brought thee out of the land of Egypt," &c., to show that this law was given peculiarly to them; and that they were tied to it, by virtue of their deliverance out of Egypt, and God's placing his glory among them. Whereas, if they had been bound to it by virtue of their creation, it would have belonged to other nations as well as to them (par. i. sect. 27).

Ver. 3. Thou shalt not eat any abominable thing.] All the meats forbidden by God to be eaten are called abominable, not merely because his prohibition made them so, but because the gentile superstition had consecrated most of them to their gods (see upon Lev. xi. 2.) However, after this law was given, the Jews were to look upon them as abominable; by which means they were kept from having such free conversation, as otherwise they would have had, with their idolatrous neighbours. So that this law also was intended to preserve them in the true religion.

Ver. 4. Ye shall eat:] The original of the difference of meats, see in the learned J. Wagenseil, in his Tela Ignea, p. 553, &c., where he shows it was not to continue for ever. And it is a rational account of this, which I just now gave, that hereby they were preserved from common conversation with other nations, and consequently from their idolatries. But it is a mere fancy, and indeed a proud imagination, which some of the Jews have (particularly the author of Schebet Judah), that as men are more excellent than beasts, because they have better food, so Jews are more excellent than all other men, because they do not feed upon all sorts of animals, but only of some certain kinds; and that after much preparation, by rejecting the blood and the fat, &c. whereby they fancy the flesh is so much altered, that it is not so much flesh as some other food.

The ox, the sheep, and the goat,] These were the only beasts that were offered in sacrifice to God; and therefore are the first that are mentioned as clean for their use.

5 The hart, and the roebuck, and the fallow deer, and the wild goat, and the pygarg, and the wild ox, and the chamois.

6 And every beast that parteth the hoof, and cleaveth the cleft into two claws, and cheweth the cud among the beasts, that ye shall eat.

7 Nevertheless these ye shall not eat of them that chew the cud, or of them that divide the cloven hoof; as the camel, and the hare, and the coney: for they chew the cud, but divide not the hoof; therefore they are unclean unto you.

8 And the swine, because it divideth the hoof, yet cheweth not the cud, it is unclean unto you: ye shall not eat of their flesh, nor touch their dead carcase.

9 ¶ These ye shall eat of all that are in the waters: all that have fins and scales shall ye eat:

10 And whatsoever hath not fins and scales ye may not eat; it is unclean unto you.

11 ¶ Of all clean birds ye shall eat.

12 But these are they of which ye shall not eat: the eagle, and the ossifrage, and the ospray,

13 And the glede, and the kite, and the vulture after his kind,

14 And every raven after his kind,

15 And the owl, and the night hawk, and the cuckow, and the hawk after his kind,

16 The little owl, and the great owl, and the swan,

17 And the pelican, and the gier eagle, and the cormorant,

18 And the stork, and the heron after her kind, and the lapwing, and the bat.

19 And every creeping thing that flieth is unclean unto you: they shall not be eaten.

20 But of all clean fowls ye may eat.

21 ¶ Ye shall not eat of any thing that dieth of itself: thou shalt give it unto the stranger that is in thy gates, that he may eat of it; or thou mayest sell it unto an alien: for thou art a holy people unto the Lord thy God. Thou shalt not see the kid in his mother's milk.

Ver. 5. The hart, and the roebuck,] These, and the rest that follow in this verse, though they might not be offered in sacrifice, were allowed to be eaten; and seem to be mentioned as the principal food in the land of Canaan (xii. 15. 22).

Fallow deer,] It is not very material what the word jackmur signifies, because we are not now concerned in this law about difference of meats; therefore we may follow our translation, as well as any other: and the famous Bochartus hath made it probable, that it signifies either a kind of deer or of goat (par. i. Hierozoic. lib. iii. cap. 22).

Wild goat,] So the Hebrew word akko signifies (which is nowhere else to be found), the same author proves in the same book, cap. 19.

Pygarg,] This is also a kind of doe or goat (as he shows, cap. 22), which the Hebrews call dison. We find mention of pygargus in Juvenal's eleventh satire; where the old scholiast gives this account of it: that it is a kind of deer, quæ retriores partes albas habet, "whose hinder parts are white." From whence it had its name among the Greeks, who call the buttocks Πυργ.

Wild ox,] So we translate the Hebrew word theo, or tho. But herein Bochartus dissents; because there were no such creatures in Judea (as he observes there, cap. 26), which are bred in colder countries. And therefore he reckons this also among his deer or goats (cap. 28).

Chamois,] The Hebrew word zemer he also thinks signifies as the former, a kind of goat or hart; of which there was great variety in those countries. And this he thinks of all other was maxime ἀεικέλιος, "remarkable for jumping;" which is the signification of the word zemer in the Arabic language (see cap. 21).

Ver. 6.] He forbears to reckon up any more particulars, and only sets down the general marks whereby they might be known; which he had delivered in Lev. xi. 3 (see there).

Ver. 7.] These exceptions from the general rule have been explained, Lev. xi. 4—6.

Ver. 8.] See upon Lev. xi. 7.

Ye shall not eat of their flesh,] See Lev. xi. 8.

Ver. 9.] See Lev. xi. 9.

Ver. 10.] See Lev. xi. 10—12.

Ver. 11. All clean birds ye shall eat.] He doth not name any (as he did of beasts), but by enumerating those of which they might not eat, all the rest were left free to be used for food.

Ver. 12.] All these are mentioned just as they are here in Lev. xi. 13.

Ver. 13. Vulture] There are only two of these mentioned in Lev. xi. 14, the last of them, hadajah, being there omitted; for it is so near to haajah, which goes before, that the transcriber (as Bochart imagines), might there leave it out. But rather, Moses now adds this sort of bird, which was not so like in nature as in name; otherwise he would not have distinctly forbidden it.

Ver. 14.] The same words with those Lev. xi. 15.

Ver. 15.] All the birds mentioned in this and the three next verses, 16—18, are the very same which are forbidden in Lev. xi. 16—19. And therefore I refer the reader to what I have noted there; only adding, that from hence it appears how false their opinion is, who think the Hebrew word tzippor is a general name only for small birds (such as sparrows); for it is evident from this place, that it is a name for all birds whatsoever, even the greatest, such as are here mentioned.

Ver. 19.] See Lev. xi. 20.

Ver. 20.] This is not the same precept with that ver. 11, for there he speaks of birds, but here of other winged creatures, which are not birds, but insects, as we call them. And in Lev. xi., he describes the flying creeping things which they might eat; and particularly mentions several sorts of them (ver. 22).

Ver. 21. Ye shall not eat of any thing that dieth of itself:] Unto this discourse about food, it was very proper to add a caution (which he had given before, Lev. xi. 39, 40), that, though they might kill and eat any clean creature, yet if it died of itself, it was unlawful to eat it, because the blood was in it.

Some verses ascribed to Phocylides contain this sense so fully, that one would think he had read Moses (see Jos. Scaliger in Eusebium, p. 88).

Thou shalt give it unto the stranger] The proselytes of the gate (as they called them) who had not embraced their religion, but were not idolaters, and therefore suffered to dwell among them, might eat such meat, having no obligation upon them to observe these laws; for they were not circumcised.

Or thou mayest sell it unto an alien:] To a mere 22 Thou shalt truly tithel all the increase of thy seed, that the field bringeth forth year by year.

23 And thou shalt eat before the LORD thy God, in the place which he shall choose to place his name there, the tithe of thy corn, of thy wine, and of thine oil, and the firstlings of thy herds and of thy flocks; that thou mayest learn to fear the LORD thy God always.

gentile, who might happen then to be in their country. For there were three sorts of people called by the name of strangers, being not of the Jewish nation. First, such as had received circumcision, and consequently embraced the Jewish religion, who were called gere-tzedek strangers, or proselytes of justice. Others were not circumcised, but yet worshipped the God of Israel, who were called strangers of the gate, or gere-tosha, strangers dwelling among them; because they were to abide in their country constantly. But there was a third sort, called nocherim, which we here translate aliens, who were mere gentiles, and not suffered to have a habitation among them; but only to come and go in their traffic with them.

[For thou art a holy people] This reason was given in the beginning of this discourse (ver. 2), and so it is in Leviticus, in the conclusion of it (see xi. 41, 45).

[Thou shalt not see the kid in his mother's milk.] Now he plainly returns to caution them against idolatrous customs. For this was practised among the heathens in the end of harvest, when they sprinkled their fields and their gardens with this broth, to make them fruitful. It is mentioned twice before (see Exod. xxiii. 19, and xxxiv. 26).

Ver. 22. Thou shalt truly tithel all the increase of thy seed.] This doth not seem to reach unto herbs, as the pharisees interpreted it; of which see Grotius on Matt. xxiii. 4. But though Casaubon and Drusius, and other great men, are of this opinion, yet the contrary is maintained by persons of no small note; because our Saviour, when he determines this case, saith, "These things ye ought to have done, and not left the other undone."

As for the tithe here mentioned, I have shown elsewhere, that it was the manner of the eastern princes to receive the tenth of the fruits of their country, for the maintenance of their ministers and officers; as we read 1 Sam. viii. 15. In like manner, God, the great king of all the earth, and the peculiar sovereign of this country, required a tenth of all their increase for the maintenance of his priests and Levites in his service. After which he ordered also a further tithe to be taken out of the nine parts remaining (which was called the second tithe) to be spent in feasts at his tabernacle. And this is, with great reason, thought to be particularly enjoined in these words; for of such tithes he speaks in the next verse. It might seem indeed a little hard, to give another tenth part, after they had paid one already, which they might be tempted not to perform exactly; and therefore he saith, Thou shalt truly, that is, faithfully, without any deceit or fraud, tithel all the increase of thy seed. And when this was done, he required also, once in three years, a third tithe, for the use of the poor (see ver. 28), that they might also be entertained at his cost, though not at that time at his house. For it was suitable to his royal greatness, that all his subjects should be feasted by his order at his palace; and that the poorest of them should not be neglected, but some time or other partake of his bounty; as they did at those feasts I mentioned, where their men-servants and maid-servants were to be entertained as well as the Levites (xii. 12. 18).

Ver 23. The place] See xii. 5, 6.

[The tithe of thy corn, &c.] This cannot be meant of the tithe paid to the Levites; of which the people were not to partake, but only the priests, to whom the Levites were to give a tithe. Therefore it must be understood of the second tithe, separated (after the other was paid) for this holy use. The design of which was, that they might be secured in his religion, by eating and drinking in his presence; and thereby professing that they belonged to him, and were his thankful servants.

The observation of R. Bechai upon these words ["thy corn, thy wine, and thine oil"] is something curious, but it hath a great deal of truth in it:—If thou pay the tithe, saith he, then it is thy corn; if thou do not, it is my corn, and not thine (in like manner, if they paid the tithe of wine and oil); for it is said in Hosea ii. 9, "Therefore I will return, and take away my corn in the time thereof, and my wine in the season thereof." For they forfeited the whole, who did not pay the tenth, which was the rent God reserved to himself. And the same R. Bechai represents this as a very merciful law: For it is the fashion of the world, saith he, if a man have ground of his own, to let it out to tenants at what rate he pleases, for a half or third part, to be paid to him: but it is not so with the Almighty, whose the earth is, and who raises clouds, and waters it with rain, and sends down drops of dew, and makes fat the fruits of the earth; and yet requires but one part of ten, for his own uses. This made it highly reasonable, that Moses should admonish the Israelites so often diligently to pay their tithe.

[That thou mayest learn to fear the LORD thy God always.] This justifies what I said, that the design of this was to preserve them steadfast in their religion, by having communion with him, in so solemn a manner, every year: for that is meant by "fearing the LORD always:" continuing in the worship and service of him alone (see vi. 1).

Ver. 24.] If they lived at so great a distance from the sanctuary, or the way was so bad, that it would be very troublesome and chargeable to carry those tithes in kind, here they have a liberty granted them to make money of them, and with that to buy provision for the feast at the sanctuary, when they came thither; as it follows in the next verse. All things, likewise, which would not keep so long as till they could go to the house of God, they were to turn into money; but things that were not perishable, they were to carry in kind, if they did not dwell too far off from it.

Ver. 25. Then shalt thou turn it into money,] Adding a fifth part to it, as the law is, Lev. xxvii. 31.

And bind up the money in thine hand,] Put it into a bag by itself, and not mix it with other money, but keep it bound up till the next feast; and then carry it in thine hand, to the place where God's house was settled.

26 And thou shalt bestow that money for whatsoever thy soul lusteth after, for oxen, or for sheep, or for wine, or for strong drink, or for whatsoever thy soul desireth : and thou shalt eat there before the Lord thy God, and thou shalt rejoice, thou, and thine household, 27 And the Levite that is within thy gates ; thou shalt not forsake him ; for he hath no part nor inheritance with thee.

God would not have them excused from going to that place with these things in kind upon every slight reason ; and therefore made it something chargeable to exchange them into money, by requiring a fifth part to be added. And besides, the elders made a constitution, That this liberty should be allowed to none, but those who lived above a day's journey from Jerusalem, which at last was the fixed place of God's worship. And, that it might be known certainly what was a day's journey, the places at that distance were fixed from every quarter ; viz. Lydda on the west, the river Jordan on the east, Acrabatta on the north, and Elath on the south, as J. Wagenzell hath observed in his confutation of that blasphemous book, called Toldos Jeschu, p. 22.

Ver. 26. Thou shalt bestow that money for whatsoever thy soul lusteth after.] Purchase such provision as they most delighted in, of all meats that God's law allowed.

Thou shalt eat there] Make a holy entertainment at the house of God.

Rejoice, thou, and thine household.] Men-servants, and maid-servants, as well as sons and daughters, (xii. 18), together with the Levites, widows, orphans, and strangers.

Ver. 27. And the Levite] They were always to be invited to these feasts (see xii. 19).

For he hath no part nor inheritance with thee.] They being wholly devoted to the worship of God, and the study of the law, as Maimonides observes, in his More Nevochim, par. iii. cap. 39 (see xii. 19).

Ver. 28. At the end of three years thou shalt bring forth all the tithe] The opinion of the Hebrew doctors is, That this was not a distinct tithe from that which they call the second tithe paid every year, but the very same, which every third year was not to be carried to the sanctuary, but to be employed to the comfort of the poor, in their own cities and houses. For thus they explain it : That in the third year after the year of release, and in the sixth year, the tithe that was wont to be carried to the place where the sanctuary was, and there spent in feasts before 28 ¶ At the end of three years thou shalt bring forth all the tithe of thine increase the same year, and shalt lay it up within thy gates :

29 And the Levite, (because he hath no part nor inheritance with thee,) and the stranger, and the fatherless, and the widow, which are within thy gates, shall come, and shall eat and be satisfied ; that the Lord thy God may bless thee in all the work of thine hand which thou doest.

God, was to be spent upon the poor in every town where they that paid the tithe lived ; but every first, second, fourth, and fifth year, from the year of release, it was spent in holy entertainments at the house of God. In the year of release itself (which was every seventh year), no tithes at all were paid of any kind, because all lay common. So that every year the owner of the ground set out a second tithe ; but he was not bound to carry it every year to Jerusalem ; for in the compass of seven years, four of those years only were appointed for their journey thither, and two they stayed at home (see Selden, of Tithes, and lib. vi. De Jure Nat. et Gent. p. 693). But this is contradicted by other great men, particularly by Bishop Montagu, who asserts these to be two distinct tithes : see p. 332, &c. especially p. 346, and those that follow. And Josephus seems plainly to be of his mind, p. 349. Old Tobit calls it τρίτην δεκάτην, "the third tithe," i. 8.

The tithe of—the same year,] i. e. Of the third year.

And shalt lay it up within thy gates:] It was not to be carried to the place where God's house was, but to be spent at home.

Ver. 29. And the Levite,] See ver. 37.

The stranger, &c.] This tithe was not spent in joy and gladness, as the second tithe was (ver. 26), when they went to God's dwelling-place, but merely in the relief and comfort of the poorer sort of people, who otherwise might have been forced to beg, or to serve strangers, and thereby be in danger of being perverted from their religion.

That the Lord thy God may bless thee] This tithe, the Jews say, was called the "consummation of tithes ;" because herein the love of their neighbours was most eminently apparent. For it is likely they themselves had no share in this, as they had at the feasts upon the second tithe, but was wholly spent upon the persons here named. Whose hearts could not but be moved to pray to God for his blessing upon them in all their labours, which he here promises to bestow.

CHAPTER XV.

1 The seventh year a year of release for the poor. 7 It must be no let of lending or giving. 12 An Hebrew servant, 16 except he will not depart, must in the seventh year go forth free and well furnished. 19 All firstling males of the cattle are to be sanctified unto the Lord.

1 At the end of every seven years thou shalt make a release.

CHAP. XV.

Ver. 1. At the end of every seven years] It appears, from ver. 9, that this phrase signifies as much as "every seventh year."

Thou shalt make a release.] Perfectly free their brethren from all their debts which they owed to their creditors. This year was famous not only for this, but for letting servants go free (as some think,

2 And this is the manner of the release: Every creditor that lendeth ought unto his Exod. xxi. 2), and for letting their ground rest (Lev. xxv. 34), and for reading this law publicly to all the people (Deut. xxxi. 10).

Ver. 2. This is the manner] It is thus to be understood.

Every creditor that lendeth ought unto his neighbour shall release it;] It was an entire acquittance, not of debts contracted by sale of lands or goods, to those who were able to pay, but of money lent to a neighbour shall release it; he shall not exact it of his neighbour, or of his brother: because it is called the LORD's release.

3 Of a foreigner thou mayest exact it again: but that which is thine with thy brother thine hand shall release;

4 Save when there shall be no poor among you; for the LORD shall greatly bless thee in the land which the LORD thy God giveth thee for an inheritance to possess it:

5 Only if thou carefully hearken unto the voice of the LORD thy God, to observe to do all these commandments which I command thee this day.

neighbour or friend, merely to relieve his poverty, not to carry on trade, or to make a purchase. For nothing could have been more absurd, than to have extinguished such debts, whereby the borrower was enriched.

He shall not exact it of his neighbour.] Here the word brother is added, to explain what is meant by a neighbour: viz. an Israelite or a proselyte entirely of their religion, who had all the privileges of an Israelite. Some think, that by not exacting money lent to such a man, is meant no more but only forbearing to demand it in this year, because there was no sowing or reaping in it; or if he did, that he should not have power to recover it by law this year, though afterward he might. But the plain meaning seems to be, that he should be perfectly free from his debt, as a servant, after six years, was from his service: though, if afterward he grew rich, in good conscience he was bound to pay it.

The Lord's release.] In the Hebrew the words schemitta laihova signify, that this year was "a release to the Lord, or for the Lord." In honour, that is, of him, who made this year of great charity: in obedience to whom they were bound to be very kind to their poor brethren. But the Jews fancy they were not bound to be so kind as to make this release, till the very last day of the year. So that if a man had borrowed money in the beginning of it, he was not acquitted till the year expired.

Ver. 3. Of a foreigner thou mayest exact it again.] Of an alien, as we translate the word noeri, in the foregoing chapter, ver. 21, that is, of one who was neither an Israelite, nor proselyted to their religion, but a mere gentile. The only question is, whether they were not to remit the debts of a proselyte of the gate, who, I think, is nowhere called their brother in the law; and therefore they were not obliged to discharge them from what they owed.

But that which is thine with thy brother thine hand shall release.] This seems to restrain it wholly to those who were Jews, or had all the privileges of Jews.

Ver. 4. Save when there shall be no poor among you.] Whether we follow this translation, or that in the margin of our Bibles, it appears that they were obliged to acquit only their poor brethren; of whom they were not to exact their debts, lest they should be tempted to flee to the gentiles, and forsake their religion: so this was a provision still against idolatry. Or, if we understand it as it is in the margin, "to the end that there be no poor among you," the sense is the same; that they were by this charity to keep men from extreme necessity, which might force them to go a begging, or to seek for relief in strange countries.

For the Lord shall greatly bless thee.] He would not have them think that they might become poor themselves by this means; for he assures them God would 6 For the LORD thy God blesseth thee, as he promised thee: and thou shalt lend unto many nations, but thou shalt not borrow; and thou shalt reign over many nations, but they shall not reign over thee.

7 ¶ If there be among you a poor man of one of thy brethren within any of thy gates in the land which the LORD thy God giveth thee, thou shalt not harden thine heart, nor shut thine hand from thy poor brother:

8 But thou shalt open thine hand wide unto him, and shalt surely lend him sufficient for his need, in that which he wanteth.

9 Beware that there be not a thought in thy prevent that, by sending his extraordinary blessing upon them. Cardinal Cajetan, and some others, understand this verse as if it were all of it a promise, and contained no precept in it; viz. That God would take care they should not be burdened by this law, for he would so bless them, that they should have no poor among them; and then they were not obliged to acquit those of their debts, who were able to pay them.

Ver. 5.] Particularly this, of releasing their poor neighbours from their debts; which would entitle them to the blessing he promises again in the next verse.

Ver. 6. Blesseth thee, as he promised thee.] God had many ways blessed them already, and he promises to reward their obedience with greater blessings.

Thou shalt lend unto many nations, but thou shalt not borrow.] Grow so very rich, that other nations should come to borrow of them; but they be beholden to none.

Thou shalt reign over many nations, &c.] I suppose he means no more than Solomon doth, when he saith, "the borrower is servant to the lender" (Prov. xxii. 7). But it may extend to their dominion over many nations, whom they conquered, till they enlarged their bounds as far as Euphrates.

Ver. 7. Thou shalt not harden thine heart, nor shut thine hand from thy poor brother.] As they might be inclined to do, after the passing of this law; thinking with themselves, that what they lent to such a man they should never have again, but must lose it if he were not able to repay it before the year of release. This seems to be the meaning of this verse, which the Jews interpret not of lending, but of giving alms. It is not much material which way we take it: for he that lent to a poor man, was willing to give what he lent, if he could not pay him before the year of release, after which he could not demand it.

Thou shalt not harden thine heart, &c.] Covetousness proceeds from want of pity, tenderness, and compassion towards others in their miseries; unto which nature itself inclines us, especially towards members of the same society. And the Jews had several particular obligations to be tender-hearted, as they were all children of God after a peculiar manner, who had been wonderfully kind and merciful to them (xiv. 2).

Ver. 8. Open thine hand.] Bountifully supply him with what he wants.

Lend him sufficient for his need.] The Jews understood this, not merely of affording him food sufficient to satisfy his hunger, and clothes to cover his nakedness and keep him warm, but furnishing him with household goods (if he had been forced to sell all he had), that he might live comfortably. Yea, they proceed so far, as to determine, that the neighborhood should join together, and make a purse for him, to wicked heart, saying, The seventh year, the year of release, is at hand; and thine eye be evil against thy poor brother, and thou givest him nought; and he cry unto the Lord against thee, and it be sin unto thee.

10 Thou shalt surely give him, and thine heart shall not be grieved when thou givest unto him: because that for this thing the Lord thy God shall bless thee in all thy works, and in all that thou puttest thine hand unto.

11 For the poor shall never cease out of the put him in as good condition as he was before he fell into this want. They determine also the quantity that every man should give; a very liberal person the fifth part of what he had, if need required; a man of moderate bounty, a tenth part. If any man gave less when the case required more, he was accounted a niggard; or, as they phrase it, a man of an evil eye. But, notwithstanding all these precepts, and their interpretations, the Jews so little minded their poor, that their governors were at last forced (as we now, alas! do) to lay a rate upon the rich for the maintenance of the poor, which they enabled their officers to exact. See Selden, lib. vi. De Jure Nat. et Gent. cap. 6, and Maimonides De Donis Pauperum, set forth by a very learned friend of mine, Dr. Prideaux, cap. 7, who argues from this place, that if a poor man wanted a wife, they were bound to provide him one, &c.

Ver. 9. Beware that there be not a thought in thy wicked heart,] If such a thought came into their mind, that they should lose what they lent, because the seventh year approached, they were bound to stifle it immediately, and not suffer it to lodge there.

Thine eye be evil] This move thee to be unkind and unmerciful to him. So a man of an evil eye, signifies in Prov. xxiii. 6, one that grudges what another eats at his table.

Thou givest him nought;] Lending was in this case giving; when a man was very poor, and the year of release so near, that he could have no prospect of his being able to repay him.

And he cry unto the Lord] Make his doleful complaint unto God, finding no relief from men.

And it be sin unto thee.] God charge it upon thee as an offence against his majesty, yea, a great offence. For so the word sin sometimes signifies (John xv. 24. James iv. 17).

Ver. 10. Thou shalt surely give him,] Not fail to relieve his wants.

And thine heart shall not be grieved] They were not only to relieve him, but to do it cheerfully.

In all thy works, and in all that thou puttest thine hand unto.] There is no difference between all their works, and all that they put their hand unto (for all works are performed by the hand), unless one refer to what they did within doors, and the other to their labors in the field.

Ver. 11. For the poor shall never cease] There would always be some or other among them, who stood in need of the forenamed charitable relief, by which they might be preserved from extreme poverty; which God intended to prevent, as is plain from ver. 4 (see Grotius upon St. Matt. xxvi. 11). The Jerusalem Targum understands this, as if there should have been no poor amongst them, if they had been obedient to God's precepts.

Thou shalt open thine hand wide] If any one refused to give, or gave less than became him, Maimonides saith, in the forenamed place, the sanhedrim compelled him to it, and whipped him with the stripes of land: therefore I command thee, saying, Thou shalt open thine hand wide unto thy brother, to thy poor, and thy needy, in thy land.

12 ¶ And if thy brother, an Hebrew man, or an Hebrew woman, be sold unto thee, and serve thee six years; then in the seventh year thou shalt let him go free from thee.

13 And when thou sendest him out free from thee, thou shalt not let him go away empty:

14 Thou shalt furnish him liberally out of thy flock, and out of thy floor, and out of thy wine-rebellion or contumacy (i. e. very sorely), till he gave as much as they judged he ought to do.

Unto thy brother, to thy poor, and to thy needy] Here are evidently three different sorts of persons mentioned as objects of their charity, which may be looked upon as directing the excellent order of it. For, first, they were to relieve those that were nearest to them in blood, called here their brethren. Then secondly, such as were in great misery. And, thirdly, such as were low in the world, and required some help, but not so much as the former sort. Some indeed will not admit such a difference between the words poor and needy, but think the last signifies such whose condition was calamitous; about which I think it is not worth while to dispute. I shall rather observe, that God took exceeding great care that none should come to very great want, by the large provision he made for the poorer sort of people: who had the benefit of the third tithe, mentioned in the foregoing chapter, which was wholly given to them every third year; and of the sabbatical year, when all that grew of itself was common to every body; and of this release of debts in the same year; and of the large quantity of corn, which they were bound to leave every year, in the corners of their fields, with the ears that fell, and the sheath that was left, &c.

Ver. 12. If thy brother, an Hebrew man, or an Hebrew woman, be sold unto thee,] Whether sold by themselves, or by the court of judgment, for theft. But there was some difference between a man and a woman (see Exod. xxi. 2, 3, &c.). And the same law, they say, was to be observed about those who were sold by their father, or were born of Hebrew slaves.

And serve thee six years; then in the seventh year thou shalt let him go free] He doth not speak of the year of release, as if he were then to be set free, though he had served but one year, or perhaps no more than half a year before that time came, but of the seventh year from the time of his sale: for he was to serve six complete years, unless the jubilee happened to intervene, when every one was set free, though he had not served so long; but such servants as were taken in the wars, or were sold by Canaanites, or born of them, might be kept perpetual slaves, unless they were maimed by their masters, with the loss of some member of their body.

Ver. 13. Thou shalt not let him go away empty;] But bestow something upon him for his more comfortable subsistence when he was a freeman. And this comprehends women as well as men, as appears by the foregoing verse: but then it is to be understood of such as went out free by virtue of this law, after they had served six years, not of such as were redeemed by their friends, or redeemed themselves with their own money (Lev. xxv. 18). For such might he supposed not to need their masters' kindness, as they did who had nothing to help them out of their slavery.

Ver. 14. Thou shalt furnish him liberally out of thy flock,] That they might put themselves in a way of press : of that wherewith the LORD thy God hath blessed thee thou shalt give unto him.

15 And thou shalt remember that thou wast a bondman in the land of Egypt, and the LORD thy God redeemed thee : therefore I command thee this thing to day.

16 And it shall be, if he say unto thee, I will not go away from thee ; because he loveth thee and thine house, because he is well with thee ;

17 Then thou shalt take an awl, and thrust it through his ear unto the door, and he shall be thy servant for ever. And also unto thy maid-servant thou shalt do likewise.

living well in the world : which they were not able to do without this assistance, because what they got in their six years' service was wholly for their master, and not for themselves. He doth not prescribe a certain measure to their bounty, but leaves every man to express his affection freely towards God and towards his neighbour. But the Hebrews say, they were bound to give them at least thirty shekels of silver.

Of that wherewith the Lord thy God hath blessed thee] Considering how God hath enriched thee, even by his service.

Ver. 15. Thou shalt remember that thou wast a bondman] And did not bring them empty out of their slavery, but loaded with silver, and gold, and raiment (Exod. xii. 35). By which bounty of God to themselves, they might take the best measure of their duty to their poor brethren when they were dismissed from servitude.

Therefore I command thee this thing to-day.] In remembrance of that great benefit, he enjoined this benevolence to poor slaves.

Ver. 16. I will not go away from thee ;] Refused to enjoy his liberty, when his six years' service was expired.

Because he loveth thee and thine house,] The phrase in Exod. xxi. 5. being, "saying, shall say, I love my master," &c. Abarbinel from thence gathers, that it was necessary he should often profess how loath he was to leave his master and his family, and make repeated declarations of his affection to them.

Because he is well with thee ;] Lives happily. Out of these words Maimonides infers that there was to be reciprocal love between the servant and his master, for if the servant loved his master, yet if his master did not love him, his ear was not bored : for he could not take content in his staying with him. But these words suppose his master's kindness to him by his good usage of him.

Ver. 17. Take an awl, and thrust it through his ear] But first he was to bring him before the judges, that he might there in open court profess the same that he had done to his master ; and thereby make it appear there was no fraud or deceit in the business : and that his master did not keep him against his will contrary to this law. See Exod. xxi. 6, where all this is explained.

And also unto thy maid-servant] This relates only to the not sending maid-servants away empty ; not to the boring their ears, if they had no mind to be freed ; for that was not used, if we may believe the Hebrew doctors, to maid-servants. It was sufficient, if they had a mind to stay with their masters, that they addicted themselves, in solemn words, to their service for ever. But there were many differences between a man-servant and a maid-servant, at least in some cases (see upon Exod. xxi. 7), which are explained with great nicety by the Hebrew doctors : with which 18 It shall not seem hard unto thee, when thou sendest him away free from thee ; for he hath been worth a double hired servant to thee, in serving thee six years : and the LORD thy God shall bless thee in all that thou doest.

19 ¶ All the firstling males that come of thy herd and of thy flock thou shalt sanctify unto the LORD thy God : thou shalt do no work with the firstling of thy bullock, nor shear the firstling of thy sheep.

20 Thou shalt eat it before the LORD thy God year by year in the place which the LORD shall choose, thou and thy household.

I need not trouble the reader, because there is no such slavery among us in these days.

Ver. 18. It shall not seem hard unto thee when thou sendest him away free from thee ;] It is plain by this that he returns to what he was speaking of, ver. 12, 13, &c. concerning their not letting their servants go away empty when they had their freedom : for this was the chief thing that could seem hard to them.

For he hath been worth a double hired servant to thee,] Who served at most only for three years, and had wages paid him all the time (Isa. xvi. 14).

In serving thee six years :] Twice as long as a hired servant, and for nothing. So that, considering what wages he gave the other, and how small a price, perhaps, they paid for him, they would find themselves gainers by such slaves, and therefore should not think much to give them a gratuity when they send them away.

The Lord thy God shall bless thee] He encourages them to hope they should be greater gainers otherways by this charity, which would procure God's blessing upon their future labours. This argument he had pressed twice or thrice before in this chapter, ver. 4. 6. 10.

Ver. 19. All the firstling males that come of thy herd and of thy flock thou shalt sanctify] All the first-born males were the Lord's, by a law made at their coming out of Egypt ; and he gave them to his priests for their portion (Exod. xiii. 2. 15. Numb. xviii. 15).

Thou shalt do no work with the firstling of thy bullock, &c.] Besides the firstling males, which alone were separated to the Lord, there were also firstling females ; which, though they were not sanctified to him as the males were, yet were not to be employed by the owners, as the rest of their cattle, but offered as peace-offerings to God. Of which they themselves had a good share, though some part of them was given to the priests.

Ver. 20. Thou shalt eat it before the Lord] It is evident from hence, that he speaks of such female firstlings as I mentioned in the foregoing verse ; for of the males they might not eat, but they belonged entirely to the priests.

Year by year] At their solemn festivals, when they were first to offer them unto God ; and then the feasts upon these peace-offerings followed.

Thou and thy household.] With the Levites and strangers, &c. whom they were to invite to these sacred entertainments : for this is but a repetition of the law twice or thrice mentioned before, xii. 6, 7, &c. 17, 18, 26. xiv. 23. and upon this occasion here again inculcated, because it was of exceeding great moment, to preserve them in the worship and service of God alone.

Ver. 21. If there be any blemish therein,] This is another reason why he mentions these feasts again, that he might admonish them what to do with their 21 And if there be any blemish therein, as if it be lame, or blind, or have any ill blemish, thou shalt not sacrifice it unto the Lord thy God.

22 Thou shalt eat it within thy gates : the un-firstlings, if there were any blemish in them, which made them unfit for sacrifice. These blemishes he had spoken of in Lev. xxii. 21, 22, 24. But here adds the lame to those there named. Which the prophet Malachi also mentions (and so do the heathens), as unacceptable unto God (Mal. i. 8).

Thou shalt not sacrifice it] No, not to make such a charitable feast at the sanctuary.

Ver. 22. Thou shalt eat it within thy gates :] It was free for them to eat it at home : though it is very probable God expected they should invite the Levites and the strangers, the fatherless and the clean and the clean person shall eat it alike, as the roebuck, and as the hart.

23 Only thou shalt not eat the blood thereof ; thou shalt pour it upon the ground as water.

widows, to partake of it (as they did of the third tithe, xiv. 29), because, if it had been without blemish, it must have been so employed at the sanctuary.

The unclean and the clean person shall eat it] Whereas, if it had been sacrificed at their feasts, only the clean could have eaten of it.

As the roe-buck, and as the hart.] See xii. 15. 22. Ver. 23. Only thou shalt not eat the blood thereof ;] He takes all occasions to mention this, because it was designed to preserve them free from idolatry (see xii. 16. 23, 24).

CHAPTER XVI.

1 The feast of the passover, 9 of weeks, 13 of tabernacles. 16 Every male must offer, as he is able, at these three feasts. 18 Of judges and justice. 21 Groves and images are forbidden.

1 OBSERVE the month of Abib, and keep the passover unto the Lord thy God : for in the month of Abib the Lord thy God brought thee forth out of Egypt by night.

2 Thou shalt therefore sacrifice the passover unto the Lord thy God, of the flock and the herd, in the place which the Lord shall choose to place his name there.

3 Thou shalt eat no leavened bread with it ; seven days shalt thou eat unleavened bread therewith, even the bread of affliction ; for thou camest forth out of the land of Egypt in haste : that

CHAP. XVI.

Ver. 1 Observe the month of Abib,] Which God, by a special order, made the beginning of their year (see Exod. xii. 2. xiii. 4. xxxiv. 18).

Keep the passover] He now begins in this chapter, to admonish them about their great feasts which they were to keep ; whereby the whole nation was preserved in the worship of one only God, which Moses still pursues to press upon them.

For in the month of Abib the Lord thy God brought thee forth] In memory of which the feast of the passover was ordained.

By night.] For then Pharaoh pressed them to be gone, when he saw his first-born slain in the night (Exod. xii. 29—31), and then they immediately prepared themselves for their journey, and borrowed of the Egyptians jewels of gold and silver (ver. 25). Insomuch that Moses calls this “a night much to be observed unto the Lord,” and “that night of the Lord to be observed by all the children of Israel in their generations” (Exod. xii. 42), though it was daylight before they began their march, as we read there, ver. 22. So that Moses bid them “remember the day when they came out of Egypt” (Exod. xiii. 3), which comprehends both that which is properly called day and night.

Ver. 2. Thou shalt therefore sacrifice the passover] The word passover signifies here not only the lamb (which was properly called pesach, or passover), which was offered the fourteenth day at even, but all the paschal sacrifices which followed after, as appears by the next words [“of the flock, and of the herd”]. Which sacrifices were appointed for all the seven days of unleavened bread (Numb. xviii. 17—19, &c.). See Bochartus in his Hieroicozon, par. i. lib. ii. cap. 50, where he shows at large that the word passover is here a general word, comprehending the particulars after-mentioned (p. 565, 566), and thus translates these words (which he justifies by many like instances), “Thou shalt therefore sacrifice the passover unto the Lord thy God,” viz. “of the flock and of the herd.” Which last words are added exegetically, to explain what that passover was which they were to offer unto the Lord. Such sacrifices as were offered in the solemn passover of Hezekiah, 2 Chron. xxx. 22. and of Josiah, 2 Chron. xxxv. 7—9, where it is apparent, that the king and the princes gave to the people, and to the priests, oxen as well as sheep, lepesachim, for the passover-offerings. And thus it is used in the New Testament, John xviii. 28, where it is said, the Jews would not go into the judgment-hall, lest they should be defiled ; “but that they might eat the passover,” i. e. these passover-offerings, which were holy things, of which none might eat in their defilement.

In the place which the Lord shall choose] At the sanctuary, as hath been often said, xii. 5. 11, &c. where all sacrifices were to be offered.

Ver. 3. Thou shalt eat no leavened bread with it ;] That is, with the passover before mentioned. Which is a demonstration that all the sacrifices of the flock, and of the herds, spoken of in the foregoing verse, are comprehended under the name of passover. For with the lamb they could not eat unleavened bread seven days, it being to be eaten presently in the evening when it was offered ; after which followed the seven days of unleavened bread, which could not be eaten so long with the passover, unless passover signifies all the seven sacrifices.

Seven days] See Exod. xvii. 15. xiii. 6, 7.

Even the bread of affliction ;] So called, because it was insipid, and also heavy upon the stomach, and not easily digested. Whence it had the name of matzah, because it was lumpish, and could not rise as leavened bread doth.

For thou camest forth—in haste :] Wanting time to put any leaven to their dough (Exod. xii. 34. 39).

That thou mayest remember the day when thou camest forth] That their affliction there, and their speedy deliverance from thence, might never be forgotten. For their eating this bread seven days to-thou mayest remember the day when thou earnest forth out of the land of Egypt all the days of thy life.

4 And there shall be no leavened bread seen with thee in all thy coast seven days; neither shall there any thing of the flesh, which thou sacrificedst the first day at even, remain all night until the morning.

5 Thou mayest not sacrifice the passover within any of thy gates, which the Lord thy God giveth thee:

6 But at the place which the Lord thy God shall choose to place his name in, there thou shalt sacrifice the passover at even, at the going down gether every year, one would think, could not but make great impressions on their mind; and the more to impress the sense of God's mercy there, the master of every family, when he brake this bread at the paschal feast, and gave every one a piece of it, said, This is the bread of affliction which your fathers did eat in the land of Egypt. So Maimonides and others tell us (see Exod. xii. 17).

Ver. 4. Noleavened bread] See Exod. xii. 18—20. xiii. 3. 7.

Remain all night until the morning.] This is a plain description of the paschal lamb, which was to be eaten in the even wherein it was sacrificed (Exod. xii. 10), which he forbears here to call the passover (though that name properly belonged to it), because he had called other sacrifices by that name (ver. 2), and would not have them confounded.

Ver. 5. Thou mayest not sacrifice the passover within any of thy gates.] Not at home, as they did when they first came out of Egypt, and that because it was a sacrifice; which was now required to be offered at the sanctuary, as was said before (xii. 5. 11).

Ver. 6. But at the place which the Lord thy God shall choose] From whence Maimonides infers, that even whilst high places were allowed, the passover could not be killed anywhere but at the sanctuary: if any man did offer it in a private high place, he was beaten, as he saith in his treatise concerning the passover, cap. 1. sec. 3.

At even.] Between the two evenings, concerning which see Exod. xii. 6. After the offering of the evening sacrifice, they began to kill the passover, and continued this sacrifice till sun-set.

At the season that thou earnest forth] Then they were preparing themselves for their journey, and had warning to be ready, and eat the lamb with their staves in their hands, as men going forth to travel (Exod. xii. 11), though they did not actually go forth till the next morning.

Ver. 7. Eat it in the place] See Exod. xii. 8, 9.

Turn in the morning and go unto thy tents.] Unto their own habitations, which are called tents, because they had no other dwellings when these words were spoken. The only doubt is, whether he permits them to go home the next morning after the even before mentioned, or the morning after the whole feast of unleavened bread was over. It seems most reasonable to expound it of the former, that if men's occasions called them home, they were not bound to stay any longer at the place where the sanctuary was, but till they had eaten the paschal lamb; after which they might return home if they pleased. So Bochartus, who from hence proves that the most solemn days of the feast of unleavened bread were not observed like a sabbath, because men might travel home upon the first day of unleavened bread, as the whole nation travelled out of Egypt on this day, from of the sun, at the season that thou earnest forth out of Egypt.

7 And thou shalt roast and eat it in the place which the Lord thy God shall choose: and thou shalt turn in the morning, and go unto thy tents.

8 Six days thou shalt eat unleavened bread: and on the seventh day shall be a solemn assembly to the Lord thy God: thou shalt do no work therein.

9 ¶ Seven weeks shalt thou number unto thee: begin to number the seven weeks from such time as thou beginnest to put the sickle to the corn.

10 And thou shalt keep the feast of weeks

Rameses to Succoth; yet pious people, who were able to bear so great a charge, were wont, no doubt, to stay the whole seven days before they returned home; because the first and last days of the feast were great solemnities. So they did in the passover of Hezekiah and Josiah, 2 Chron. xxx. 21. xxxv. 17. And there being special sacrifices to be offered every day during this festival (as was before said), Solomon ben Virga observes, that all the country thereabouts brought their oxen and their sheep to be sold at this time to those who came from far; so that the mountains round about Jerusalem were covered with them, and not a bit of grass to be seen. He adds also, that whosoever did not come up to this feast, all his goods were forfeited and converted to sacred uses (Schiebet Judah, p. 378).

Ver. 8. Six days thou shalt eat unleavened bread; and on the seventh day shall be a solemn assembly] This is to be understood as if he had said, that after they had eaten unleavened bread six days, they should conclude the solemnity upon the seventh day with a solemn assembly, or, as it is in the Hebrew, with a restraint; but still continue also on this day to eat unleavened bread. For this feast was to last seven days, and in all the foregoing books they are expressly required to eat unleavened bread seven days (Exod. xii. 15. Levit. xxiii. 6. Numb. xxviii. 17).

A solemn assembly] Which the Hebrews call azzereh; of the meaning of which see Lev. xxiii. 36.

Thou shalt do no work therein.] That is, no servile work, as it is explained Numb. xxviii. 25, but they might dress their meat, which the LXX. seem to mean to those words, which they add, πάντα ὅσα ποιήσεται ψυχῆ, “save only such things as shall be done to preserve life.”

Ver. 9. Seven weeks shalt thou number unto thee:] From the morrow after the sabbath, when they brought the sheaf of the wave-offering, as it is explained in Lev. xxiii. 15 (see there).

Begin to number—as thou beginnest to put the sickle to the corn.] For they began to cut barley at the passover, as is manifest from hence, that Joshua passed over Jordan to enter into Canaan, in the time of harvest (Josh. iii. 15), and this was in the month of Nisan, when they kept the passover, as appears from Josh. v. 10. which month could not be called Abib, or “the month of new fruits,” if some corn was not then ripe, viz. barley. This Josephus confirms, lib. iii. Antiq. cap. 10. which must be understood, as Hermannus Conringius observes (in his treatise De Initio Anni Sabbaticæ, &c.), of that sort of barley which was sown in autumn (as it is this day in Frisia), which required a stronger soil than that sown in the spring, and produced a much richer crop. See Mr. Mede's works, p. 355. who observes how very different their climate was from ours.]

Ver. 10. Keep the feast of weeks] The reason of unto the LORD thy God with a tribute of a free-will offering of thine hand, which thou shalt give unto the LORD thy God, according as the LORD thy God hath blessed thee :

11 And thou shalt rejoice before the LORD thy God, thou, and thy son, and thy daughter, and thy man-servant, and thy maid-servant, and the Levite that is within thy gates, and the stranger, and the fatherless, and the widow, that are among you, in the place which the Lord thy God hath chosen to place his name there.

12 And thou shalt remember that thou wast a bondman in Egypt: and thou shalt observe and do these statutes.

13 ¶ Thou shalt observe the feast of tabernacles seven days, after that thou hast gathered in thy corn and thy wine :

14 And thou shalt rejoice in thy feast, thou, and thy son, and thy daughter, and thy man-servant, and thy maid-servant, and the Levite, the stranger, and the fatherless, and the widow, that are within thy gates.

15 Seven days shalt thou keep a solemn feast unto the LORD thy God in the place which the LORD shall choose: because the LORD thy God shall bless thee in all thine increase, and in all the works of thine hands, therefore thou shalt surely rejoice.

16 ¶ Three times in a year shall all thy males appear before the LORD thy God in the place which he shall choose; in the feast of unleavened bread, and in the feast of weeks, and in the feast of tabernacles: and they shall not appear before the LORD empty:

17 Every man shall give as he is able, according to the blessing of the LORD thy God which he hath given thee.

this name is given in the foregoing verse. And see Exod. xxxiv. 22. It was called also the feast of harvest (see Exod. xxiii. 16).

[With a tribute of a free-will offering] Besides those offerings which are prescribed, Lev. xxiii. 17, 18. Numb. xxviii. 27, &c. The quantity is not directed, but left to every man's piety. And whatsoever it was he brought, it was wholly given to God, and he that brought it had no share in it; but God gave it to his priests.

[According as the Lord thy God hath blessed thee:] Though no quantity was prescribed, yet God expected every man should offer proportionably to his estate: and they who had a religious sense of God's goodness in blessing their labours, no doubt acknowledged it by a liberal tribute.

Ver. 11.] This feast was made of such offerings as are mentioned, xii. 7. 17—19.

Ver. 12. Remember that thou wast a bondman] They are often put in mind of this as an argument to charity, particularly towards their servants (see xv. 15).

Observe and do these statutes.] There was a particular reason for keeping this feast, because it was in remembrance of God's giving them his law from Mount Sinai; where he speaks with them himself.

Ver. 13. The feast of tabernacles seven days.] This is the third great feast, at which all their males were bound to appear every year, as we read, Exod. xxiii. 16, 17, xxxiv. 22, 23. Of which he puts them in mind again, Lev. xxiii. 34—36. and here, ver. 16.

Ver. 14.] There was the like law at Athens, where king Cecrops ordained (as Macrobius tells us, lib. i. Saturnal. cap. 10.) the master of every family should, after harvest, make a feast for his servants, and eat together with them, who had taken pains with him tilling his ground; delectari enim Deum honore servorum, contemplatu laboris, "for God delighted in the honor done to servants, in consideration of their labor." This, it is likely, he learnt from Moses, for he reigned at Athens much about the same time that Israel came out of Egypt; and was the first, as Eusebius saith, who taught the Greeks to call God by the name of Ζεύς (lib. x. Præpar. Evangel.), which we may interpret "the living God." Though therein he seems to be a little mistaken, for Pausanias saith more than once (both in his Arcædia and his Attica), that Δία ὠνόμασαν ἑταρον πρώτου, "he was the first that called Jupiter by the name of the Most High," or Supreme. And the same we read in St. Cyril against Julian, lib. i. (see Joh. Meursius De Legibus Atheniensium, lib. i. cap. 9).

Ver. 15. Seven days shalt thou keep a solemn feast] In order to which, that it might be kept the more solemnly, it is once more enjoined, and all the sacrifices that were to be offered in each of the seven days appointed in Numb. xxix. from ver. 12. to ver. 35. where he orders also the eighth day to be solemnly observed for a special reason (see there).

Because the Lord thy God shall bless thee] Thankfulness to God for blessings bestowed was the way to procure more.

Thou shalt surely rejoice.] In God the giver of all good things; whom the whole nation, by the institution of this feast, were incited to bless and praise for the fruits of his bounty to them. And peace-offerings were sacrificed on purpose for this end (xxvii. 7). From the repetition of this command. "Thou shalt rejoice," the Jews infer, that though all festivals were times of joy, yet the feast of tabernacles was to be celebrated with greater joy than all the rest. And accordingly Maimonides tells us, the whole festival was spent in music, and dancing, and singing, night and day.

Ver. 16. Three times in a year shall all thy males appear before the Lord] This is so frequently enjoined (see ver. 13), because it was of the greatest consequence that they should meet as often as they could conveniently, at one and the same place, to worship the Divine Majesty; whereby the notion of the unity of God was preserved among them.

They shall not appear—empty:] This is also frequently repeated, where the feasts themselves are enjoined (Exod. xviii. 15. xxxiv. 20). And from these and the following words, That every man should give as he was able, &c. came the pious custom in the beginning of our religion, that the people when they came to the Lord's table offered bread, and wine, and corn, and oil, and such like things, for the support of God's ministers and the relief of the poor, every one according to their ability. Which was done in acknowledgment of God as the author of life, and of all good things; for which they, in this manner, showed their gratitude to him. And the priests, in the presence of all the people, lifted them up, and gave God thanks, and besought him to accept them: and out of these, in many places, they made their agapa, or feasts of charity, for the poor. Mention is made of these oblations in the Canons ascribed to the apostles, ch. 3, 4, which, though not made by them, yet contain a great many apostolical customs.

Ver. 17. Every man shall give as he is able,] It was but reasonable, that the more bountiful God had been to them, the more liberally they should offer a grateful acknowledgment to him. For all the forenamed three feasts had relation to the fruits of the earth, which God had blessed them withal, as well as commemorated former great benefits bestowed on their forefathers: the passover being at the beginning of barley harvest, Pentecost at the beginning of wheat harvest, and the feast of tabernacles, when they had gathered in all the fruits of the earth. At which seasons all mankind were ever wont to be full of joy, and to offer sacrifices. So Aristotle tells us (lib. viii. ad Nicomachum, cap. 2), Αἱ ἀρχαῖαι θυσίαι καὶ συνοδοὶ φαίνονται γινέσθαι μετὰ τὰς τῶν καρπῶν συγκομιδὰς, "The ancient sacrifices and conventions seem to have been after the gathering in of the fruits of the earth, as a first-fruit, at which time chiefly they rested from their labors." And so Strabo, likewise (lib. x. Geograph. p. 467). "It is common, both to Greeks and barbarians, to offer their sacrifices with a festival intermission of their labors, &c. καὶ τοῖς ἡ φύσις οὕτως ἐπαγορεύει, and so nature taught them to do," that is, to thank God with rejoicing and cessation from labors. For which he gives this surprising reason, ἕτε γὰρ ἀνεῖσι τὸν νοῦν ἀπάγει ἀπὸ τῶν ἀνθρώπων ἀσχολημάτων, τὸν δὲ οὕτως νοῦν τρέπει πρὸς τὸ θεῖον "for remission of labor abstracts the mind from human affairs, and turns it towards God." This certainly was the ancient intention of all such festival times, as the heathen themselves could discern.

Ver. 18. Judges and officers shalt thou make thee] To see that these and all other laws were duly observed. Moses de Cotzi, upon these words, makes this difference between schofetim and schoterim: that the former (viz. judges) were the senators in the several courts, who decided causes; and the other (officers) were no more than ministers attending the court, to keep the people in order, with a staff and a whip, and to execute the decrees and orders of the judges; whom they appointed not only in the court, but in the streets, looking after weights and measures in the market, and correcting offenders. Maimonides also makes them the same with our apparitors, or those who, in the Roman law, are called officiales, as Constantine L'Empereur observes, p. 362. upon Cornelius Bertram (who mistook them for a sort of judges), and in the digests executores: and in the New Testament πράκτορας, "executors," Luke xii. 58. Josephus makes them to have been public criers; and so we find them employed, xx. 8. Josh. i. 11. But then some of them, at least, seem to have been an honorable sort, like our heralds (Josh. xxiii. 2), and all of them were men of authority, though but young men (as Maimonides describes them), who had not attained the years and knowledge of the doctors of the law, and therefore unfit to be judges. But the Jews place them next under their wise men, or doctors, and above their scribes and clerks, as Mr. Thorndike observes, in his Review of the Rites of the Church, p. 94. But that they were certainly only under officers, and not judges, there is another argument; which is, that Solomon upon this account commends the ants, that they carefully do their business, though they have no schoter set over them (Prov. vi. 7), no ἄρχαι διοχοῦσιν, or εργοδωκῆτης, to force or affright them into it.

In all thy gates,] That is, in every city, as Mr. Selden observes out of the Jewish writers, lib. vii. De Jure Nat. et Gent. cap. 5. sect. 1. where he shows they interpret it, "in all the cities of Israel, both within the land and without, where Israel had any jurisdiction." Which is so true, that they had consistories wheresoever they were dispersed, for the determining all differences arising out of the law, though not as to the power of life and death, which was seldom granted them by their sovereigns. Thus we learn from Philo, that there was such a consistory at Alexandria; and the little chronicle, called Seder Olam Zuta, tells us of the like in Babylonia. And after the destruction of the temple, it is manifest, not only by the Jewish writings, but by Epiphanius and others, that there continued a consistory at Tiberias for many ages, &c. (see Mr. Thorndike's Rites of the Church, p. 56, 57, and his Review of it, p. 56).

But though this be granted, yet these words ("in all thy gates") may suggest also the part of the city where they kept their court, which was in the gate: for there, as I observed, Gen. xxxiv. 24, all public business was transacted in the time of Abraham and Jacob, and continued so afterward. Insomuch, that the highest court in Moses' time met at the door of the tabernacle (Numb. xi. 24), the gate among the Hebrews being the same with forum, as I observed, among the Romans. As we see by 1 Kings vii. 1. where Elisha foretells at what low rates provision should be sold on the morrow "in the gate of Samaria." Where it is evident there was a place so spacious, that Ahab assembled four hundred prophets there before him and king Jehoshaphat, who had, no doubt, both of them numerous attendants (2 Kings xxii. 10). And before this time, David, it is said, upon the news of Absalom's death, went up to "the chamber over the gate," and wept; which we may well think was the council-chamber (2 Sam. xviii. 33. And when Joab advised him to come down, and show himself publicly, it is said, "he rose and sat in the gate, and all the people came before him" (xix. 6). And therefore in these cities, which were so large, there was some place, I make no question, where there were benches for the judges.

Which the Lord thy God giveth thee, throughout thy tribes:] In the cities of every tribe there was to be such a court erected, that people might have justice easily and speedily done them. And the Talmudists unanimously agree that the number of judges was proportionable to the greatness of the city wherein they were placed, and of the causes which they judged. Where there were less than a hundred and twenty families in any town or city, there was seated the lowest court of all, consisting of three judges, which tried only actions of debt, or damages done by man or beast, or defamation, &c. But in cities where there were above a hundred and twenty families, there was placed a higher court, consisting of three-and-twenty judges, who tried capital causes. Josephus, indeed, differs from the Talmudists about the number, for he saith they were but seven. Both of them, it is likely, may say true, with respect to different times and places; for it cannot but be presumed that both he and they understood the state of their country in such public matters. But at the place where God chose to settle his sanctuary, unto which all the country resorted at certain times, there was the supreme court of all, consisting, as the Talmudists say, of seventy persons, besides their president, who judged all manner of causes; and none but they could judge a false prophet, or a city fallen to idolatry. All appeals were made to them; but from them there was none, their sentence being final (see Selden, lib. ii. De Synedr. cap. 4.).

Such a court, it is certain, there was in future ages, whose number was according to that of the seventy elders chosen by God himself to assist Moses in the government, and endued with the spirit of judgment to qualify them for that office (Numb. xi. 25). In Moses's time they sat at the door of the tabernacle, as I observed before; and afterward at Shiloh, or wheresoever the sanctuary was. Though it may be doubted, whether, after Moses's death, and the death of the elders, there was a court consisting of so many judges. Nay, it is highly probable that this consistory itself was not constantly settled there, according to law, till the time of Jehoshaphat; at least, not the inferior consistories before mentioned, which were to be settled in every city. For if they were, what reason can be given why the judges (Judg. v. 10. x. 4. xii. 14), and Samuel should ride circuit up and down the country to minister justice according to the law, when the people might have had it every day in their several cities? And for this reason, it is likely Jehoshaphat himself, desiring to put this law in force, first sent some great men, "who went about through all the cities of Judah" (2 Chron. xvii. 8, 9), and then settled judges according to this law "throughout all the fenced cities of Judah, city by city," as well as in Jerusalem (2 Chron. xix. 5. 8). See Mr. Thorndike, in his rites of the Church in a Christian State, ch. 4. p. 226, where he observes that Josephus, in express terms, rendering a reason of the great lewdness, upon which the war against Benjamin followed, attributes it to this, that these courts of judgment were not established according to this law (lib. v. Antiq. cap. 2). But though this, I think, be very evident, yet it is scarce credible that David, after he was set upon the throne of God in peace, did not take care to settle these courts, as he did to regulate a great many other things. And, indeed, we find a plain intimation of it in 1 Chron. xxvi. 29. But succeeding kings, it is probable, were negligent in keeping up this constitution, till the time of Jehoshaphat, who exercised his authority to enforce the exact practice of this law.

Judge the people with just judgment.] According to the rules of this law. The judges, saith R. Solomon, were to judge the people; and the officers, to constrain them to do as the judges commanded.

Ver. 19. Wrest judgment;] See Exod. xxiii. 6.

Respect persons,] See Lev. xix. 15, and Deut. i. 17.

Neither take a gift:] The very same is said, Exod. xxiii. 8.

Ver. 20. That which is—just shalt thou follow,] The words in the Hebrew are far more emphatical (as they are in the margin), "Justice, justice shalt thou follow." Mind nothing but the justice of the cause, and do it to all persons equally.

That thou mayest live, and inherit the land] Be happy, and continue long in the land of Canaan: for nothing contributes more to the establishment of a government, than the exact and impartial administration of justice.

Ver. 21.] It is evident from this, that his great aim is to keep them from idolatry; which he still pursues, as he hath done from the beginning of his exhortation in this book. And their history teaches us, that it was very needful to inculcate this so often; for, notwithstanding all that Moses could say, they fell immediately after Joshua's death into the idolatrous customs of Canaan, and could never be wholly purged from their idolatry till the captivity of Babylon. And these words may be translated, "Thou shalt not plant thee a grove, nor make any wood (i. e. a wooden image) near to the altar of the Lord thy God." So 20 That which is altogether just shalt thou follow, that thou mayest live, and inherit the land which the Lord thy God giveth thee.

21 ¶ Thou shalt not plant thee a grove of any the LXX. For the very word we translate grove, sometimes imports the idol in the grove, as well as the grove itself (see 2 Kings xxiii. 6. and Selden, De Diis Syris, Syntagma ii. cap. 2). Certain it is, that nothing was more ancient in the east, than altars with groves of trees about them; which made the place very shady and delightful in those hot countries. They are so often joined in Scripture, that it would be tedious to number all the places (Exod. xxxi. 13. Deut. xii. 3. Judg. vi. 25, &c.). Cadmus is thought by some to have brought this custom into Greece out of the east. And they planted the trees so thick, and they were so large and shady, as to make the place very dark and solemn; whereby a kind of horror was struck into those who went into them. And they became hereby fitter for the devil to play his pranks there; and for the practice of these obscene and uncouth rites whereby he was worshipped. For the gentle custom had made these places proper to the infernal gods, and anciently consecrated them as sepulchres or temples for their heroes. That the Israelites, therefore, might be preserved from sacrificing to the dead, and from filthy lusts (by both which they afterward polluted themselves), they are forbidden to place a grove near to God's altar, nay, so much as any tree (as the words may be translated); for the heathen thought there was a sacredness in trees themselves, which they dedicated to their gods, and honored several ways (see xii. 2, 3). And therefore the Jews say, they might not plant trees in the court of the temple, or in the mountain of the house (as they call it), for the ornament or beauty of God's house. And they gave this reason for it, because it was an idolatrous rite to plant trees near their altars, that the people might there meet together (see Selden, lib. ii. De Jure Nat. et Gent. cap. 6. p. 186, and Dr. Spencer, lib. ii. chap. 16. sect. 1, 2). And more lately, Ezekiel Spanhemius (in his most learned observations upon Callimachus), hath shown that they planted odoriferous trees in some groves, to make them more inviting. Whence the grove dedicated to Pallas is called by that poet τρυφαῖος ἄλσος, though that may signify only a grove consecrated by many sacrifices. And the vulgar groves were planted with pines, fir-trees, cypress, laurel, olives, vines, and other lovely trees, especially oaks, which grow to a great height, in which both altars and temples were erected. See in Hymn. in Dianam, ver. 38. p. 156, and in Palladem, ver. 61. p. 595, and in Cererem, ver. 38, 39. p. 689, where he mentions the black poplar, as a tree of which her grove consisted, under the shade of which the nymphs delighted to dance at noon. And thence these shady places, consecrated to their gods, were called ψυχρῆς, because of their refreshing coolness, as he observes out of Athenæus (ad ver. 47. p. 695). And indeed nothing is plainer in the Holy Scripture, than that these groves related to idolatry; for all pious princes took them away, and bad ones planted them (1 Kings xviii. 4. 2 Kings xxiii. 14. 2 Chron. xiv. 3. xv. 16). And they are frequently joined with statues and images, both here, and vil. 5. xii. 3. 1 Kings xiv. 23, &c.

Ver. 22. Neither shalt thou set thee up any image;] The Hebrew word matzebah is commonly translated by the LXX. στῆλην, "a pillar;" and so we translate it in the margin. For as it was unlawful to set up the statue of a man, or any other creature, so it was as contrary to religion to set up a pillar, or an altar, trees near unto the altar of the LORD thy God, which thou shalt make thee.

22 Neither shalt thou set thee up any image; which the LORD thy God hateth.

or any such-like structure, for public assemblies to be held about them, though they worshipped there the true God. So Maimonides reports the sense of their doctors; "a statue or pillar signifies any work raised up, that religious assemblies may be made there, though they be for the worship of the Divine Majesty; for this is a practice among idolaters." And so Pausanias confesses (in Achaïcis) that in the most ancient times, among all the Grecians, τιμίαι θεῶν ἀντὶ ἀγαλμάτων εἶχον ἀγροὶ λαθοί, "rude stones had Divine honours given them, instead of statues or images" (see Selden, lib. ii. De Jure Nat. et Gent. cap. 6, in the beginning; and Maimonides, of the Worship of the Planets, ch. 6, sect. 8—10, and Dionys. Vossius's annotations there).

[Which the Lord thy God hateth.] Hence it sufficiently appears, that this was an idolatrous practice; which is more odious to God than any thing else. And thus the Israelites we see understood it, being ready to take arms against their brethren on the other side Jordan, when they heard they had erected an altar there (taking it to be such a structure as is here forbidden); but were appeased when they understood that it was not intended for worship (Josh. xxii. 18).

CHAPTER XVII.

1 The things sacrificed must be sound. 2 Idolaters must be slain. 8 Hard controversies are to be determined by the priests and judges. 12 The contemner of that determination must die. 14 The election, 16 and duty of a king.

1 Thou shalt not sacrifice unto the LORD thy God any bullock, or sheep, wherein is blemish, or any evilfavouredness: for that is an abomination unto the LORD thy God.

2 ¶ If there be found among you, within any of thy gates which the LORD thy God giveth thee, man or woman, that hath wrought wickedness in the sight of the LORD thy God, in transgressing his covenant,

3 And hath gone and served other gods, and worshipped them, either the sun, or moon, or any of the host of heaven, which I have not commanded;

4 And it be told thee, and thou hast heard of it, and enquired diligently, and, behold, it be true, and the thing certain, that such abomination is wrought in Israel:

5 Then shalt thou bring forth that man or that

CHAP. XVII.

Ver. 1. Wherein is blemish,] Having warned them, as he had done often, against idolatrous practices, he here interposes a caution against profaneness in the worship of the true God; for it was a great disrespect to him, to offer any thing that was not perfect, the heathens being ashamed of such sacrifices.

Wherein is blemish,] Of this see Lev. xxii. 20, &c. Or any evilfavouredness:] In the Hebrew, "any evil thing, or matter;" that is, if it had any disease, or was sick.

That is an abomination] This is more than is said in Leviticus, where the words are, "for it shall not be acceptable for you." For here he expresses the greatest disdain and abhorrence of such sacrifices.

Ver. 2. Within any of thy gates] In any cities or towns within their country.

Man or woman, that hath wrought wickedness] Now he returns to the business of idolatry; which is the wickedness here said to be wrought, as appears by the next words.

In transgressing his covenant,] For this was the principal part of the covenant, that they should have no other gods but him (Exod. xx. 22, 23); upon this all depended: so that the whole covenant was void, if they served other gods. Which was so foul a sin, that he would have none spared who were guilty of it. Which is the reason, as Maimonides thinks (More Nevochim, par. iii. cap. 37), why he here saith, man or woman, because men are naturally more tender towards the female sex, and inclinable to be favourable to them; against which he warns them in case of idolatry, and of profaning the sabbath; in which two cases only he uses these words.

He had shown in the thirteenth chapter, what they should do with him that seduced others to idolatry, whether he were a pretended prophet, or a private man (ver. 1. 9, 10). And then, what should be done with a whole city that was seduced (ver. 12, 13, &c.). And now he shows how they should proceed against any particular person who apostatized from God.

Ver. 3. And hath gone and served other gods,] The most ancient idolatry (of which Abarbanel makes account there were ten sorts) was the worship of the heavenly bodies, as I have observed before, iv. 19, and see Job xxxi. 26. The forenamed doctor, indeed, places first the worship of angels; about which I will not dispute, but only observe, that by condemning those who worshipped the host of heaven, though very glorious creatures, Moses suggests plainly enough how vile they were who worshipped images of wood and stone.

Which I have not commanded;] This is a way of speaking in this language, importing the quite contrary, "which God hath forbidden," and that most strictly (see Prov. xvii. 21. xxiv. 23, and many other places).

Ver. 4. It be told thee,] Thou hast had information of such wickedness.

Hast heard of it, and enquired diligently,] Upon information, they were to make diligent search, whether the report was true or not.

And the thing certain,] They were not to proceed upon rumors, nor yet to slight them; but endeavor to be satisfied, whether or not there was ground for them; and if upon examination they found there was no doubt of the truth of the thing, to do as is here directed.

That such abomination] So idolatry is frequently called (see xiii. 14).

Ver. 5. Bring forth that man or that woman,—unto thy gates,] Set them before the court of judgment in the city to which they belonged (see xvi. 18). For woman, which have committed that wicked thing, unto thy gates, even that man or that woman, and shalt stone them with stones, till they die.

6 At the mouth of two witnesses, or three witnesses, shall he that is worthy of death be put to death; but at the mouth of one witness he shall not be put to death.

7 The hands of the witnesses shall be first upon him to put him to death, and afterward the hand of all the people. So thou shalt put the evil away from among you.

8 ¶ If there arise a matter too hard for thee in judgment, between blood and blood, between plea and plea, and between stroke and stroke, being matters of controversy within thy gates: then shalt thou arise, and get thee up into the place which the Lord thy God shall choose;

9 And thou shalt come unto the priests the particular persons were tried and sentenced in the lower courts, but a tribe or a city, accused of idolatry, only by the highest court of all; as Maimonides and the rest of the Jewish doctors inform us (see Selden, lib. iii. De Synedr. cap. 4. n. 3, and cap. 5. n. 1).

Stone them with stones.] This was a punishment of a particular person, as a city fallen to idolatry was to be killed with the sword; and a false prophet, who seduced others to idolatry, to be strangled (see xiii. 5).

Ver. 6. At the mouth of two witnesses, or three witnesses, shall—he be put to death;] No man could be convicted but by two witnesses, at least, and those of a competent age, of good fame, and not convicted themselves of having borne false witness, &c. Many other qualifications, of lesser moment, the Jews required in a witness: which Mr. Selden reports, and the reason of them, lib. ii. De Synedr. cap. 13. n. 11.

At the mouth of one witness he shall not be put to death.] Because, though the witness was never so credible, it was possible he might be mistaken. But it was not likely that two or three honest men, agreeing in the same testimony, should all be deceived. Yet in pecuniary matters, the Hebrew doctors say, the testimony of one credible witness was sufficient to put a man to his oath for his purgation. And they set a mark of infamy upon him, who, in such matters as are here spoken of, had such a single witness against him (see Maccoth, cap. 1. sect. 8. and J. Coeh's annotations there).

Ver. 7. The hands of the witnesses shall be first upon him.] This was great reason, that they might thereby still confirm the truth and certainty of their testimony by being the first executioners of the sentence; which no men would easily venture to be, who were not sure they had testified the truth.

Afterward the hands of all the people.] From hence some infer, that he was to be put to death at a public feast.

So thou shalt put the evil away.] See xiii. 5.

Ver. 8. If there arise a matter too hard for thee in judgment.] Now he returns to speak of the courts of judgment, which he had ordered to be erected in all their cities, when they came into the land of Canaan, (xvi. 18) who might find some causes to be so difficult that they could not determine them.

Between blood and blood.] The Jews, I think, interpret this absurdly concerning menstruous women, and the tokens of virginity (see Mr. Selden, lib. iii. De Synedr. cap. 2), where there is a plain and obvious meaning of these words: That there might be a doubt whether a man had committed wilful murder, or only casual, and consequently, whether he should have the benefit of the city of refuge, or be taken from it.

Plea and plea.] As the former words belong to criminal causes, so these to civil; such as suits about debts, or purchases of lands or houses, &c.

Stroke and stroke.] It doth not seem reasonable to me, that this should be interpreted of the leprosy (which is often called a plague or stroke), though the Jews so understand it, for that was to be judged solely by the priests; whereas he speaks also of other judges: therefore the meaning is, concerning any wound or hurt that was done to a man in his body. About which, if the judges could not agree, but were divided in their opinions, either about the fact itself, or about the punishment to be inflicted, an appeal was to be made to a higher court.

Being matters of controversy.] Or contention and strife; that is, disputes arising about them, which could not be determined by the judges in those courts below.

Within thy gates.] Where God had commanded judges and officers to be settled (xvi. 18). And therefore here he speaks of the inferior courts of judgment, that were in the lesser cities of their several tribes.

Get thee up unto the place which the Lord thy God shall choose.] Where the supreme court was settled in the chief city of the kingdom. While they continued in the wilderness, the captains of thousands, and hundreds, and fifties, and tens (whom Moses constituted by the advice of Jethro), judged the causes of the people under Moses himself, to whom God joined seventy persons for his assistance; all hard causes being brought before him. But this authority of the captains lasted no longer than during their pilgrimage in the wilderness; for when they came to Canaan, the law, as I now observed, required judges and officers to be ordained in every city; who, if there fell any difference about the law, are here ordered to repair to the place where the sanctuary was, for there the highest court sat as the successors of Moses, and his consistency of seventy elders, (mentioned Numb. xi. 16. 24, &c.) who judged all difficult cases while he lived.

Ver. 9. Unto the priests the Levites, and unto the judge.] Who must be supposed to be resident in this place, where the sanctuary was. And these words, "the priests the Levites," the Jews understand as if he had said, "the priests of the tribe of Levi, or the sons of Levi;" for so he speaks in xxi. 5. And Mr. Selden produces a great many other instances of the like phrase (lib. ii. De Synedr. cap. 8. n. 2, 3), and shows they are so described (as the Jews think) to exclude all others that had been priests, before God took the sons of Aaron peculiarly to serve him in this office. But the Levites, as well as priests, they unanimously agree, were capable to be members of this great Sanhedrin; which, they all likewise say, did not consist only of priests and Levites, but of any other persons of other tribes, who were fit to be promoted to this dignity. Nay, they say, if there was not one priest or Levite in the court, it was a lawful judicature; for the high-priest himself, no more than any man else, had a place here, merely for his birth, unless his learning in the law was answerable: so Maimonides and others. And those other members who were not priests, nor Levites, they think are comprehended under the word judge, which, though it be in the singular number, may be thought to signify more than one, as appears from xix. 17. where it is said expressly, they shall bring the controversy there mentioned, "before the priests and the judges." And farther, that judge, after the manner of this language, may signify judges. Constantine I. Emperour gathers from ver. 12. where priest in the singular number is used for those who are here called priests in the plural (Annot. in Corn. Bertram, p. 389).

But howsoever this be, it seems to me, that though the priests and Levites were not the only persons of whom this high court consisted (the members of which might be chosen out of any tribe where they could find men qualified), yet they are here first mentioned, because they were likely to be the most capable persons to exercise this authority, especially in the first constitution of this commonwealth, when they were newly entered into Canaan. For all other persons were then busily employed in looking after the inheritance that was fallen to them, and settling the affairs of their several families; whereby they were rendered less able to attend unto this weighty office. But the tribe of Levi having no inheritance among them (as is often repeated in these books), and no care about husbandry, and such like affairs, had a full leisure both to study the laws of God and to judge according to them; especially being appointed by God to "teach Jacob his judgments and Israel his law," xxxiii. 10. Besides, this court being settled at the place of God's worship, where a great many priests and Levites always necessarily attended, they were most ready, without any inconvenience to themselves, to execute this office of judges, having their maintenance from the public, which no other persons had. But otherwise, as I said, they had no more right than other men to be members of this court, which we cannot certainly say consisted of seventy judges, together with their nasi, i. e. their prince or president: nor that they always sat at the place here appointed: for there were sometimes great troubles in the land, and they were under the power of their enemies, which extremely disturbed their government, and made it necessary for God to raise them up extraordinary judges, because the power of this court was broken in pieces. So Mr. Selden himself acknowledges, that there were great intermissions of their sitting in the times of Antiochus Epiphanes, and of Herod the Great (lib. ii. De Synedr. cap. 14. n. 3). And therefore, why not in the times when they were oppressed by the Moabites, Ammonites, Philistines, and other cruel neighbours, in the days of the judges? and thus Grotius, Hermanus Conringius (to name no more), here understand the word judge, who is joined with the priest and Levites.

[Unto the judge] The forenamed authors thus translate this verse, "Thou shalt come unto the priests the Levites, or unto the judge that shall be in those days." Where by judge they understand such as Othniel, Ehud, Gideon, Jephthah, Samson, Samuel, and others whom God raised up when they were oppressed by their enemies, and in great confusions, to govern his people; which they did with the highest authority, being equal to kings, save only that they kept not royal state or equipage, but are plainly called by that name, Judg. xvii. 6. xix. 1. xxi. 25. Now, though the priests and Levites (i. e. that court, of which they made a considerable part) were the ordinary supreme judges of controversies, yet the judge, when God raised one up, was endued with an extraordinary power above theirs; to whom the people therefore resorted for his decision. For just as all ordinary magistrates among the Romans gave place to a dictator, when they had one, so all the Hebrew magistrates did to such a judge, when God appointed him, who determined all manner of controversies, as, at other times, the other judges, whether priests or others, were wont to do (see Herman. Conringius De Republ. Ebraeorum, sect. 39).

10 And thou shalt do according to the sentence, which they of that place which the Lord shall choose shall shew thee; and thou shalt ob-

I know but one objection against this, which is, that those extraordinary judges were not fixed, as far as we can find, in the place where the sanctuary was; unless we may judge of all the rest by Eli and Samuel, who seem to have been settled there. But we must consider that they were not confined by their commission, which was not grounded on this law, to any one certain place, but left at liberty to live where they thought most convenient for the discharge of their trust, in the reformation of the people. And the truth of what I said concerning their supreme power, plainly appears in Samuel, who went up and down the country executing judgment, when Shiloh was destroyed, and had no court, like that which the Jews speak of, to assist him. But when he needed assistance, he appointed his sons to be judges (1 Sam. viii. 1), of whom, when the elders complained (ver. 4), because they did not discharge their duty well, it was to himself, and not to any other persons; and they desire not a Sanhedrin, but a king to judge them (ver. 5). Which petition we do not find that he communicated to the Sanhedrin, but only unto God; nor is any mention made of them in the choice of a king, or, after he was chosen, in the history of their kings, till Jehoshaphat's time, no more than there is in the books of Joshua and Judges; where we read, that when there was no king (that is, judge) in Israel, every man did what was right in his own eyes; which is a sign that there wanted such a court, to keep them in order. After the time of Jehoshaphat, who settled judges in every city (as I observed, xvi. 18), they continued, it is plain, till the captivity; but what number there was of them we do not know. After the captivity, Ezra and Nehemiah seem to have done all themselves (see Neh. ix. and x.). Which makes it very probable, that though there were judges appointed according to the direction of this law, yet the exercise of their power was often interrupted by the great changes which were in that nation; and that there was no such Sanhedrin as the Talmudists describe till the time of the Maccabees. For the very name of Sanhedrin plainly shows its original to have been when the Greek tongue was common among the Jews; and that was, when the kings of Syria and Egypt (who were of the Macedonian race) had the chief power in Palestine (see Conringius, in the forenamed book, sect. 37).

[And enquire;] They were to lay the cause before this high court, and desire their opinion in it.

[The sentence of judgment;] They were bound to determine the controversy; and whatsoever sentence they gave, it was to stand good till it was reversed by other judges of the same authority; for the Jews (who understand all this of the great Sanhedrin, and scan every syllable with great nicety) will have the words just before ["that shall be in those days"] to signify that every sentence must hold in the time when it is given: so that if this court determined a matter, which in aftertimes, by other judges of the same court, should be judged otherways, that second sentence was to stand, being the opinion of those days. For this sentence was, in their judgment, the meaning of the law, by which they were all to be governed; and, if there was no tradition in the case, they judged themselves as well as they could.

[Ver. 10. Of that place] That is, the high court which sits there, or the judge who is in those days.

serve to do according to all that they inform thee :

11 According to the sentence of the law which they shall teach thee, and according to the judgment which they shall tell thee, thou shalt do: thou shalt not decline from the sentence which they shall shew thee, to the right hand, nor to the left.

Which the Lord shall choose] The Jews, who understand this only of the Sanhedrin, say, it was not lawful for them to judge causes, at least not those which were capital, in any other place (see Selden, lib. ii. De Synedr. cap. 15. n. 6, 7, 10).

Shall shew thee] Shall pronounce.

Observe to do according to all that they inform thee] Some fancy that he speaks to the inferior judges, who brought the cause thither to have the opinion of this highest court, who were then to pronounce sentence according to it: but whoever brought the controversy before this court (when the inferior could not determine it), they gave the sentence, in which he requires the contending parties to acquiesce, and to do according to their determination; which did not concern questions of faith, as if men were to believe whatsoever they should teach them, but such controversies as are mentioned ver. 8. about civil or criminal matters, which they were finally to determine; so that men should not farther controvert the matter, but rest in their decisions. For in all governments there must be an end of suits, somewhere or other; and God required all his people to submit to the sentence of this court: for so the words run in the Hebrew, "And thou shalt do according to the sentence which they shall show thee, from the place which the Lord thy God shall choose;" that is, from the supreme court of judicature, which resided where God himself did. For if men had been permitted to disagree to their sentence, the very end and use of this court had been taken away: as Maimonides speaks, in his More Nevochim, par. iii. cap. 41.

Ver. 11. According to the sentence of the law] In the Hebrew, according to the "mouth, or the word of the law," which they shall teach thee; that is, according to the interpretation which they gave of the law.

According to the judgment] That is, according to the order or decree which they made thereupon.

Thou shalt do] Pay, suppose, the money, which they judged to be due to another man: for he doth not speak of their doing whatsoever they bade them (as if they could control the commands of God), but of obeying the sentence of this court, about those matters which were in question between one man and another (ver. 8), who were not to be judges in their own case, but rest in the judgment of those whom God had made the supreme interpreters of his law.

Thou shalt not decline from the sentence] They were not to make the least alteration in their sentence: for though they might think it was wrong, and the senate perhaps did really err, and be better informed afterward (which the law supposes, and in that case orders an expiatory sacrifice, Lev. iv. 13), yet it was not lawful for any man to act contrary to their present decree, nor to teach the contrary, whatsoever his private opinion might be.

Ver. 12. The man that will do presumptuously, and will not hearken] This they understand, not barely of a private man, that would not stand to their sentence, but of an elder, or inferior judge, who presumed to contradict it; as Mr. Selden shows, lib. iii. De Synedr. cap. 3.

Unto the priest] It is commonly thought, as I observed, ver. 8. that the singular number is here put 12 And the man that will do presumptuously, and will not hearken unto the priest that standeth to minister there before the Lord thy God, or unto the judge, even that man shall die: and thou shalt put away the evil from Israel.

13 And all the people shall hear, and fear, and do no more presumptuously.

for the plural; and that the meaning is, if any man would not hearken to the highest court of judgment, which consisted commonly of a great many priests, he should die for his contempt: but they have a great deal of reason on their side, who insist upon the letter of this word priest, and of that which follows, or the judge (understanding both of single persons), and take the high-priest only to be here meant; who seems to be described in the next words, "that stands to minister there before the Lord thy God." For when God did not raise up a judge to govern his people, the high-priest was the supreme governor under God until the days of David; and so he was after the captivity. Hence it is, as Grotius observes (lib. De Imperio Summarum Potestatum circa Sacra, cap. 9, sect. 4), that cohen is a name common to priests and princes: for, among a great many nations anciently, he shows, the priests had the highest power; particularly among the Cappadocians (Strabo, who was of that country, saith), the sacerdotal dignity was next to the regal; but howsoever this word be interpreted, the crime here mentioned was contumacy, in not submitting to the sentence of the highest authority, whether it were vested in one person or more, whereby the government was in danger to be broken; and therefore God orders such a person to be put to death.

Or unto the judge] See before, ver. 9.

Even that man shall die] The Jews, who interpret this, as I said, of a judge in inferior courts, who presumed to contradict the judgment of the supreme court, have tempered the severity of this law by several explications and exceptions; which have regard, either to the manner of passing this decree by the highest court, which an inferior disobeyed (and that was when a cause came before them upon an appeal, for it was not so criminal to disobey every sentence of the supreme court, but only such as these), or to the place where it was made, which was to be nowhere else but at God's dwelling-place, or to the things about which the decree was made; which some will have to be only weighty matters: and the act of contumacy also was considered; for he was not put to death, they say, unless in open court he declared a contrary sentence. The death he suffered was strangling; and he could suffer in no other place but where this high court sat (see Selden, of all these, in the place before mentioned, n. 2—6). And it may be farther observed, that the prophets themselves were subject to the power and jurisdiction of this high court, by whom they might be sentenced to capital punishment, if they taught contrary to the law of God. But our Mr. Thorndike makes a doubt, whether the constitution which the Jewish writers mention about a rebellious elder (as they call him who taught any thing contrary to the determination of this supreme court), was ever in force or not? For it was made, because of the differences between the schools of Hillel and Shammai, who lived not long before our Saviour's time; when, it appears by the gospel, that nation had lost the power of life and death (see Rites of the Church, ch. v. p. 256).

Put away the evil from Israel] This may refer either to the evil person, or to the great scandal and dangerous example he gave, by resisting the highest

14 ¶ When thou art come unto the land which the Lord thy God giveth thee, and shalt possess it, and shalt dwell therein, and shalt say, I will set a king over me, like as all the nations that are about me;

15 Thou shalt in any wise set him king over thee, whom the Lord thy God shall choose: one from among thy brethren shalt thou set king authority, and thereby breaking the bond of unity and peace.

Ver. 13.] This punishment was intended to strike a terror into all the people, that they should not adventure to oppose the supreme authority. And for this end the offender was to be kept in custody, as R. Aquiba understood this, till the next great feast (either of the Passover, or Pentecost, or tabernacles), and then executed, when the whole nation, i. e. all the males were present. This Mr. Selden observes (in the forenamed place, n. 7), is the most received opinion; though R. Jehuda saith, they did not make the sentence sharper by a long delay, but executed it presently: and for the farther publication of it, they sent letters to all the tribes and cities of Israel, to give notice, that such a man was executed at such a time for this crime (see Selden there, n. 8).

Ver. 14. When thou art come unto the land] When they had conquered the land of Canaan, and were settled in it.

I will set a king over me.] The Jews commonly, from this and the next verse, fancy that God commanded them to make a king when they came to the land of Canaan, and had a quiet possession of it; following herein the Gemara of the Sanhedrin, cap. 2. Inasmuch, that they have presumed to make this an affirmative precept, "a king of the people should be chosen;" and quote this place for it. To which some learned men among Christians have seemed to incline; particularly Petrus Cuneus, lib. ii. De Republ. Hebr. cap. 14. and Guil. Schickardus, in his Jus Regium, cap. 1. Theor. 1. But Abarinel himself contradicts this; and so doth Josephus, who observes, that God intended they should keep their present government; but if they would have a king, he should be one of their brethren. For thus he interprets this place (lib. i. Antiq. cap. 8), that "they should not affect any other government, but love the present, having the law for their master, and living according to it;" ἀγαπᾷ γὰρ ὁ Θεὸς ἡγῆσθαι εἶναι, "for it is sufficient that God is your ruler." And then he adds, But if you desire to have a king, ἔστω μὲν αὐτοῦ ἰσχυρότατος, "let him be one of your own nation," as it here follows in the next verse.

Like as all the nations that are about me;] Such as the Edomites, who had been governed by kings before the days of Moses (see Gen. xxxvi. 31).

Ver. 15. Set him king over thee.] Install, and receive him into the throne.

Whom the Lord thy God shall choose;] They could not elect whom they pleased, but the first king, at least, was to be appointed by God himself, who was their supreme governor. So the people understood it, when they desired Samuel, who was their chief ruler under God, to make them a king (1 Sam. viii. 5), but durst not presume to set one up of themselves. And to confirm them in this opinion, Samuel saith to Saul (1 Sam. x. 1), "The Lord hath anointed thee to be captain over his inheritance;" and saith to all the people (ver. 24), "See ye him whom the Lord hath chosen." And accordingly, when the lot was to be cast, to show who was to be their king, Samuel bids all the tribes present themselves before the Lord over thee; thou mayest not set a stranger over thee, which is not thy brother.

16 But he shall not multiply horses to himself, nor cause the people to return to Egypt, to the end that he should multiply horses: forasmuch as the Lord hath said unto you, Ye shall henceforth return no more that way.

17 Neither shall he multiply wives to himself,

(ver. 19). And when it fell upon Saul, and they could not find him, they inquired of the Lord, and the Lord answered where he was (ver. 22). In like manner, when Saul was rejected, the Lord himself appointed David to be anointed their king, and settled that authority in his family. And to determine which of his sons should have it, God himself appointed his immediate successor, viz. Solomon. For so David declares to all the princes and the great men whom he assembled before his death: "Of all my sons, the Lord hath chosen Solomon to sit upon the throne of the kingdom of the Lord God of Israel" (1 Chron. xxviii. 5). And again (xxix. 1), "David said unto all the congregation, Solomon my son, whom alone God hath chosen, is yet young," &c. But though it was thus in the beginning of this kingdom, yet God intended at length to make it hereditary, as appears from ver. 20 of this chapter.

One from among thy brethren] i. e. Saith the tradition, mentioned by the Jews out of Tospitha, the most select and choice person that could be found, not one of mean extraction or employment. This they fancy is meant by "from among thy brethren."

Thou mayest not set a stranger over thee, which is not thy brother.] This the Jews extend to all offices whatsoever, as Maimonides reports their sense (see Selden, lib. vi. De Jure Nat. et Gent. cap. 20, p. 647). And by thy brother some of them understand one that was an Israelite, both by father and mother; though others think it sufficient, if a king was an Israelite by the mother's side. See there, cap. 22, which in his book De Succession. ad Pontificat. lib. ii. he shows was sufficient for any dignity among the Israelites, but only the priesthood. See also, lib. iii. De Synedr. cap. 9. n. 6. where he observes the Talmudists say, the great Sanhedrin was to see that no king but one thus qualified was set over the people; which, when there was such a court, may be allowed to be true; though all the power which they ascribe to their Sanhedrin over their kings, is by no means to be admitted; but is an apparent figment: for it is manifest out of the Bible, that their kings had that very power which they ascribe to the Sanhedrin: particularly, it is notorious that Solomon, by his own power, put Abiathar out of the office of high-priest (1 Kings ii. 6. 26), which judgment the Talmudists say belonged only to the great Sanhedrin. In like manner other kings judged prophets; which they appropriate to the same court.

Ver. 16. He shall not multiply horses to himself;] There is no certain number determined; but the Jews well resolve, that he was not to keep them for mere pomp and state, but only so many as were for use and service; to draw his chariot, for instance, and for the guard of his person; but he was to take care that he did not burden his people by too many, under this, or any other pretence: and therefore not to keep up a body of horse for war. For among the Jews their armies consisted altogether of footmen; there being no breed of horses in that country; and their people, who were all husbandmen and shepherds, being accustomed to labor, and to run as swiftly as a horse (2 Sam. ii. 18. xviii. 19. 22, &c.). Certain it is, that in the days of David they had no that his heart turn not away : neither shall he greatly multiply to himself silver and gold.

horsemen in their army ; for when Absalom lost the battle and fled, it was upon a mule that he endeavored to make his escape. And though Solomon was so prodigiously rich, that he was able to maintain forty thousand stalls of horses for his chariots, and twelve thousand horsemen (1 Kings iv. 26), yet succeeding kings could not keep up such an expence ; but when they had occasion sent for succours from Egypt, which commonly consisted of horsemen. Now one of the reasons the Jews give why their king was "not to multiply horses," is, lest he should be puffed up with pride ; for a horse being a stately creature, his rider is often swollen with a high conceit of himself, as more than one of the heathen have observed (see Bochart, in his Hierozoicon, lib. ii. cap. 9). Nachmanides gives another good reason, lest he should confide and trust in the power of his horsemen more than in God (see Schickard, in his Mischpat Hammelech, cap. 3. Theor. 10). But the chief reason is given by Moses himself in the next words, Lest they should be tempted to go to Egypt, with which country it was dangerous to have familiarity.

Nor cause the people to return to Egypt, to—multiply horses :] Send his people thither to buy horses for him, it being a country that abounded with them, as Judea did with asses. For when Sheshak, king of Egypt (whom the Greek writers call Sesostris), came against Jerusalem, there were threescore thousand horsemen in his army (2 Chron. xii. 3). Which shows how they abounded with horses in that country in those days, though in aftertimes they did not care to breed them. They might indeed have horses out of other countries, as well as Egypt, but not so easily, nor so good : which made Solomon send thither, and Pharaoh set a great price upon them ; because he knew their value, and that they could not furnish themselves so easily with them elsewhere (1 Kings x. 28, 29).

Forasmuch as the Lord hath said unto you, Ye shall henceforth return no more that way.] Or the first words may be rendered, "forasmuch as the Lord saith unto you," &c. as he did now by him, that they should not maintain traffic with the Egyptians, at least while they continued idolaters. We read, indeed, that many Jews went thither, and Urijah the prophet fled thither (Jer. xxvi. 21) : of which the Jews give this account : first, some say this was but a temporary constitution, which was not to last always : secondly, they distinguish about the way of returning thither ; conceiving that they might not go thither out of the land of Israel, but they might out of another country whither they were driven. Maimonides thinks they might go thither as merchants, but not fix their dwelling there. But the true meaning is, that they might not voluntarily go thither upon any account, at least while they remained, as I said, so corrupted in their religion and manners, as they were at this present : for there is an express law, Lev. xviii. 3, "According to the works of the Egyptians ye shall not do" (see Schickardus, in the forenamed place, p. 78). Whence those words of the prophet Isaiah, where, when he saith the land of Israel was "full of horses," he adds, "their land also is full of idols" (Isa. ii. 7, 8). For by multiplying the one, they multiplied the other. And, therefore, though David did reserve some chariots and horsemen, which he took to his conquests, for his own use, yet no great number (2 Sam. viii. 4). But still great men rode upon mules (2 Sam. xviii. 9. 1 Kings i. 33. 38, 41), as they had done in the days of the judges (Judg. v. 10. x. 4. xii. 14).

18 And it shall be, when he sitteth upon the throne of his kingdom, that he shall write him a

Ver. 17. Neither shall he multiply wives to himself.] This is not a prohibition to take more wives than one, but not to have an excessive number, after the manner of the eastern kings, whom Solomon seems to have imitated : I see no ground for what the Jews say, that he might have eighteen (see Schickard, in the book above named, cap. 3. Theor. 9. Selden's Uxor. Hebr. lib. i. cap. 8. Buxtorf. De Sponsal. par. i. sect. 40). For the proof which R. Solomon and Bechin give of it is very weak ; which is, that David having already six wives (2 Sam. v. 13), the prophet tells him, if he had not offended God, he would "moreover have given him such and such things," i. e. say they, twice as many wives (2 Sam. xii. 8). Much less is there any ground for what they say, that if he took more than his number, he was to be scourged by the authority of the Sanhedrin, as he was, they pretend, for the breach of any of these precepts here mentioned (see Selden, lib. ii. De Synedr. cap. 9. n. 5). Which Grotius, indeed, endeavors to soften, by affirming that these lashes were no disgrace to him, because he received them voluntarily, in token of his repentance : and therefore was not scourged by the common executioner, but by such a person as he himself chose to give this correction ; and he received also such a number of stripes as he himself pleased, and no more (lib. i. De Jure Belli et Pacis, cap. 3. sect. 20). But this is directly against Maimonides, who saith, in downright words, that the Sanhedrin appointed this chastisement ; as Selden observes in another place (lib. iii. De Synedr. cap. 9. n. 5). And there is no example in the whole book of God of any such jurisdiction which the Sanhedrin had over their kings ; but all this may well be looked upon as a mere invention of the Jewish doctors, to magnify the power of their great council.

That his heart turn not away :] From all serious business and employment, whilst he was caressing and studying to please a multitude of women : some understand it, lest they turned his heart away from God, and the duties of piety, of which there was great danger, if he married worshippers of strange gods, as Solomon did. Otherwise, I should think it might be interpreted, of turning his thoughts from minding his people, and their good and welfare ; which must needs suffer much, when they were burdened with a great company of wives, who were to be richly maintained and provided for.

Neither—multiply to himself silver and gold.] No more, saith the Sanhedrin (cap. 2), than would pay stipends to his servants, &c. Others of them scan the words more nicely ; and observe, that, first, he is forbidden to multiply gold and silver greatly, that is, to content himself with moderate riches, and not set himself to heap up treasure, which could not be done commonly without great oppression of his subjects. And, secondly, he is forbidden to multiply them to himself : but for the public benefit he might lay up money in the treasury at the temple, though in his own coffers, for his private interest, he might not. See Schickard in his Mischpat Hammelech, cap. 3. Theor. 11, where he produces their answer to this question,—How should the king be able to manage a war, or do any other great thing, if he did not furnish himself with good store of gold and silver ? He might, say they, fill the public exchequer, though not his own private bags : and that for two reasons ; first, lest he should wax proud and haughty, when his purse swelled : and secondly, lest he should be tempted to squeeze his subjects, and exact more from them than they were able to bear ; as Solomon seems copy of this law in a book out of that which is before the priests the Levites :

19 And it shall be with him, and he shall read therein all the days of his life : that he may learn to fear the LORD his God, to keep all the words of this law and these statutes, to do them :

to have done, whose treasurer the people stoned (1 Kings xii. 18).

Ver. 18. He shall write him a copy of this law in a book] Not only of this book of Deuteronomy, but of the whole law, and that with his own hand, as a means to fix it more in his mind : insomuch, that though a copy was left him by his father, he was, notwithstanding, to transcribe one himself, as the Jews say, in the Gemara Sanhedrin (cap. 2. sect. 13). All this is very agreeable to these words : but whether he was bound, if he had not written a copy before he was king (as every private Israelite, they say, was bound to do), to write two when he sat on the throne, may be doubted ; for it cannot, without violence, be drawn from these words ; and their authority is not sufficient to warrant it : they give, indeed, a plausible reason for it, that the one he was to carry about with him whithersoever he went, and to read in the other at home : but why one copy might not serve for both these purposes, I do not see.

Out of that which is before the priests the Levites :] He was not to write one word of it out of his memory merely, or any private man's copy, but out of the book which was in the sanctuary, where the original and uncorrupted copy was in the custody of God's ministers : there are a great many rules the Jews give about the right writing of this copy, which may be seen in Gnll. Schickardi Mischpat Hammelech, cap. 2. Theor. 5.

Ver. 19. It shall be with him,] Whersoever he was, either in the camp, or at home, or in any other place provided it was pure, and free from filth, as the Jews limit it (see there, Theor. 6).

He shall read therein all the days of his life :] Diligently study it, not spending his time, as Maimonides glosses, in drinking and making merry, but in learning the law of God (see there, p. 53). From the neglect of this precept, their kings became so ignorant of the laws of God, and of their obligation to observe them, that, in the days of the good king Josiah, he was strangely started at what he heard read out of this book of the law, when it was found in the temple, where it had long lain without any knowledge of it.

That he may learn to fear the Lord] Be preserved in the true religion.

To keep all the words of this law] Be acquainted with his whole duty, and perform it constantly (see Josh. i. 8).

20 That his heart be not lifted up above his brethren, and that he turn not aside from the commandment, to the right hand, or to the left : to the end that he may prolong his days in his kingdom, he, and his children, in the midst of Israel.

Ver. 20. That his heart be not lifted up above his brethren,] Not imagining himself to be above all laws, nor slighting his subjects as unworthy of his notice, but taking a due care to promote their happiness. "For as the Scripture (saith Maimonides) provided the king should have great honour done him, obliging all to reverence him, so it commands him to be lowly in heart, and not carry himself insolently : let him be gracious, and full of clemency to little and great, so shall he go out and come in with the love and good wishes of them all." Unto which Nachmanides adds this pious reflection : "If the Scripture deters kings from pride and haughtiness of heart ; how unbecoming is it in their men, who are far inferior to them !" &c.

That he turn not aside] Neither by changing the laws on pretence of making better ; nor by abrogating them, on pretence of their inconvenience ; but where the Divine law was not clear, or where nothing was there defined, he might by his authority make new constitutions, as David and Solomon did, as well in sacred as in civil matters.

To the end that he may prolong his days] This shows that God intended to establish a successive right in that family to which he chose to give the kingdom, if they continued in a constant observation of his laws. And indeed, there is no way to establish and perpetuate a family in the throne, like the due observation of laws, though they be but human, not Divine laws : for as Aristotle truly said, "He that commands the law shall govern all, (i. e. all things be ordered according to law), δοξει μελεινν ἀρχεν τον Θεον και τοις νόμοις, 'seems to command that God should rule, and the laws :' but he that bids a man rule without laws (according to his own will), προστιθην θηριον, 'sets up a beast to govern.'" And above all things, he ought to endeavor to win the love of his subjects, by humility and clemency ; as the same Aristotle taught Alexander, if we may believe R. Jedaja, in his book called Mibchar Happeninim, where he reports a letter of his to that great prince, advising him to gain the affection of his people by a gentle government, which is far better than to rule tyrannically by force and violence : "For to what purpose is it to have possession of their bodies, when the true possession is to be master of their hearts ? get possession of their hearts by clemency, and that will draw their bodies along with them."

CHAPTER XVIII.

1 The Lord is the priests' and the Levites' inheritance. 3 The priest's due. 6 The Levite's portion. 9 The abominations of the nations are to be avoided. 15 Christ the prophet is to be heard. 20 The presumptuous prophet is to die.

1 The priests, the Levites, and all the tribe of Levi, shall have no part nor inheritance with Israel : they shall eat the offerings of the LORD made by fire, and his inheritance.

CHAP. XVIII.

Ver. 1. All the tribe of Levi,] Or, even the whole tribe of Levi (see xvii. 9.).

Shall have no inheritance with Israel :] As had been said Numb. xviii. 20, and here in this book

x. 7. Which made it the more necessary Moses should remind the people of that maintenance God had appointed for them ; which unless it was duly given them, religion could not be supported ; and consequently the government (of which he had been speaking) would be quite confounded.

2 Therefore shall they have no inheritance among their brethren: the LORD is their inheritance, as he hath said unto them.

3 ¶ And this shall be the priest's due from the people, from them that offer a sacrifice, whether it be ox or sheep; and they shall give unto the priest the shoulder, and the two cheeks, and the maw.

4 The firstfruit also of thy corn, of thy wine, and of thine oil, and the first of the fleece of thy sheep, shalt thou give him.

They shall eat the offerings—made by fire.] Not the burnt-offerings, which were wholly God's: but all other offerings, of which a share was appointed for the priests the sons of Aaron (Numb. xviii. 9—11. 18, 19).

His inheritance.] That is, the inheritance of the Lord, of whom he spoke before, who had reserved certain oblations to himself and bestowed them upon the priests: They are mentioned Numb. xviii. 8, 9, and ver. 12—15, where he first speaks of the first-fruits, and the first-born, which were all "brought unto the Lord," and by him given to them. In like manner, all the tithes of the land are said to be a "heave-offering unto the Lord," ver. 24, where he saith, "I have given them to the Levites to inherit," so these two, "the offerings of the Lord made by fire," and "his inheritance," comprehend all that belonged to his ministers, whether priests or Levites.

Ver. 2.] The Lord had given them that part and portion of the offerings which were peculiarly his own; and therefore is said to be their inheritance, because they enjoyed his inheritance, as these holy things are called in the foregoing words (see Numb. xviii. 20, 24, and Josh. xiii. 14, 33).

Ver. 3. This shall be the priest's due] Besides those things that God gave them, which peculiarly belonged to him.

From them that offer a sacrifice.] Of peace-offerings, which are sometimes called simply a sacrifice (Lev. xvii. 5. 8. Numb. xv. 3), in which the people had a considerable interest.

Ox or sheep.] Under sheep are comprehended goats also, as I have observed (see Lev. iii.).

They shall give—the shoulder.] Together with the breast; as we read Lev. vii. 32—34.

The two cheeks, and the maw.] These were not given to the priests before, but were now added to their portions, being accounted the best part of the beasts: for, as the cheeks were the best part of the head, and the shoulder and breast the best of the other members of the body, so the maw was the principal part of the entrails, as Maimonides observes, par. iii. More Nevochim, cap. 39.

By the maw is meant the stomach; and in beasts that chew the cud, who have four stomachs, that which is called by the Greeks γαστήρ, viz. the lowest of them, which had this name, because the digestion which is begun in the other, is here perfected and completed: and it appears that this part of the entrails was accounted by the ancients a great dainty, as Bochartus proves out of Aristophanes, in his Hierozoicon, par. i. lib. ii. cap. 45. p. 505.

Ver. 4. The firstfruit also of thy corn.] See Numb. xviii. 12. To which it may be useful to add this out of Maimonides (who hath distinctly represented the order wherein all oblations were made), that after the fruits of the earth were gathered, every man was bound to bring a fiftieth part of them, as a first-fruit to the priests, which was called trumah gedolah, "the great oblation," of which Moses speaks in this place: and next of all, he separated a tenth part of the whole from the rest, which was maasher rishon, "the first tithe," and given to the Levites (Numb. xviii. 24). Then, out of what remained, another tenth part was taken, called maasher sheni, "the second tithe," which was every third year given to the poor, and in the two intermediate years, spent in feasting at the house of God (Deut. xiv. 28). So that, for instance, if a man had pressed out a hundred and two logs of oil, he sent two of them as first-fruits to the priest, and then ten more, as tithes to the Levites, and deducted nine parts more out of the residue for the poor; by which it appears, that one-and-twenty parts of a hundred and two, that is, a fifth part of the whole, was separated for pious and charitable uses (see Schickard, in his Jus Regium, cap. 4. Theor. 15).

5 For the LORD thy God hath chosen him out of all thy tribes, to stand to minister in the name of the LORD, him and his sons for ever.

6 ¶ And if a Levite come from any of thy gates out of all Israel, where he sojourned, and come with all the desire of his mind unto the place which the LORD shall choose;

7 Then he shall minister in the name of the LORD his God, as all his brethren the Levites do, which stand there before the LORD.

The first of the fleece of thy sheep.] This is comprehended under first-fruits, but never particularly mentioned before now: and though the quantity is not mentioned, yet the Jews have adventured to determine, that less than one fleece in sixty was not accepted. For so they say of all other first-fruits, that a sixtieth part of the whole was the least that any man gave; and he was accounted a covetous man if he gave no more; they that were indifferently good, giving a fiftieth part, and liberal persons the fortieth. By this means the priests were provided with clothes, and by other offerings with food. And the wool also, as they call it, of goats (which were shorn in these countries) is comprehended under the fleece of sheep.

Ver. 5. To stand to minister] This was the office of a priest; to offer sacrifices unto God, and to bless the people in his name.

Him and his sons forever.] The family of Aaron, of which he is principally speaking. Who, when they were few in number, all ministered unto God; but afterward they took their courses of attendance. And, as the Jews say, there were eight courses before Moses died; four of the family of Eleazar, and as many of Ithamar's, which in David's time were enlarged into four-and-twenty courses (see Selden, lib. i. De Succession. in Pontificat. cap. 1.)

Ver. 6. If a Levite] By a Levite he seems here to mean a priest (see ver. 1). For they only could minister unto God, and the Levites ministered unto them.

Come from any of thy gates] From any city, in any tribe of Israel.

Where he sojourned.] i. e. Leave the country where he hath been wont to live.

Come with all the desire of his mind] With a sincere affection to devote himself to the perpetual service of God, at the sanctuary; so that, instead of coming in his course, he would always wait there, and never stir from that place.

Ver. 7. Then he shall minister in the name of the Lord] Attend continually at the altar, to do all the service of the sanctuary. The LXX. translate it, 8 They shall have like portions to eat, beside that which cometh of the sale of his patrimony.

9 ¶ When thou art come into the land which the LORD thy God giveth thee, thou shalt not

“He shall minister to the name of the Lord,” i. e. to the Divine Majesty, who dwells there.

[As all his brethren the Levites do,] As all those do who live at that place.

[Which stand there] To minister unto him: this was the case of Samuel.

Ver. 8. They shall have like portions to eat.] This shows that he is speaking of the priests; for the Levites did not eat of the holy things offered at the altar: and the meaning is, that the rest of the priests who waited there, should allow him the same portion which they themselves had in the sacrifices.

[Beside that which cometh of the sale of his patrimony.] Which was to remain proper to himself, and not be divided with other priests at Jerusalem (suppose) where he ministered. The Hebrew words are something obscure, being “besides his sales by, or unto, the fathers,” that is, such possessions as their fathers purchased, and left to them: for though the priests had no share in the land of Canaan given them at the division of it, yet they might purchase houses, and goods, and cattle; and sometimes they purchased fields, as we read Abiathar had fields of his own at Anathoth, 1 Kings ii. 26, and the prophet Jeremiah, who was a priest also, purchased a field of his uncle’s son, in his own town, Jer. xxxii. 7, 8, &c.

But the Jews make a quite different construction of these three verses, which they understand in this manner, that if any Levite (i. e. priest, for they only ministered before God) came up out of the city where he commonly resided, out of pure devotion to attend at the three solemn feasts, which were held at the place where the sanctuary was (where they were bound to wait, only when their course came, but at these feasts might all come and minister in the sanctuary), his brethren, whose week it was then to attend, should both admit him to minister before God with them, and also give him an equal portion with themselves in the extraordinary sacrifices which were then offered at those festivals, except only those which were peculiarly assigned to them whose week of waiting at the altar it then was; who, by the ordinance of God, delivered to Moses and Aaron, (who, they suppose, are here called the fathers), were to have the right shoulder of the peace-offerings. See Lev. vii. 33, where it is said, “He among the sons of Aaron that offereth the peace-offerings and the fat, shall have the right shoulder for his part;” in which none other was to participate. But why this should be called the sales, I do not understand, unless we interpret it as Forsterus doth, venditiones, i. e. res venditas à patribus, “things sold by the fathers,” that is, appropriated by them (to the particular priest that offered the sacrifice), as things sold are to those that buy them.

Ver. 9. Come into the land] The land of Canaan, which the Lord was about to bestow upon them, according to his promise.

Thou shalt not learn to do after the abominations] Now he returns to warn them again not to fall into the idolatry and the superstitions of the country whither they were going (see Lev. xviii. 3).

Ver. 10. There shall not be found among you] So as to be tolerated.

That maketh his son or his daughter to pass through the fire.] This was the most abominable idolatry practised in that country whither they were going, who consecrated their children in this manner to learn to do after the abominations of those nations.

10 There shall not be found among you any one that maketh his son or his daughter to pass

Moloch, or the sun, of which I have said sufficient, Lev. xviii. 21. Therefore I shall only add here that this wicked custom seems to have flowed from this country of the Phœnicians and Tyrians unto the Carthaginians; who were guilty of the impiety of sacrificing their children, as they did also here unto Moloch (Lev. xx. 2, 3), which spread itself, in a manner, over all the world, as many have shown; particularly Joh. Gensius, in his treatise De Victimis Humanis, par. i. cap. 11, and it was found among the Americans, when that new world was discovered (see also par. ii. cap. 5).

[Or that useth divination.] Of which there were many sorts; and one was, by raking into the bowels of their sacrifices, particularly of human sacrifices; by the observation of which they pretended to foretell things, as many authors testify. Yea, they offered little children on purpose, that thereby they might make their auguries, as the same Gensius hath observed in that book (cap. 21). Unto which, perhaps, there is a peculiar respect in this place; for I find most of the things here mentioned, joined in other places with “making their children pass through the fire,” particularly 2 Kings xxi. 6. 2 Chron. xxxiii. 6. And the prophet Ezekiel seems to intimate, that hereby they divined, when he charges the Israelites with this crime, xx. 26, 31. For he adds, “Shall I be inquired by you, O house of Israel,” who have inquired, that is, by making your children pass through the fire?

But it must be confessed, that the Hebrew words kosem kosemim (which we translate “useth divination”), are by many thought to have a peculiar respect unto such as used to divine by casting or drawing of lots. And the word, as our learned Dr. Castell observes, is so used in the Arabian language for “distribution of lots.” Which sort of divination was much in use among the Greeks and Romans; and had been so, it is very likely, in more ancient times among the eastern nations: for nothing is more known than the Sortes Prænestinae and Pativinae among the Romans; and the Dodonææ, and Dindymentæ, and many others, among the Greeks, particularly that at Bura in Achaïa, where there was a cave in which was the image of Hercules; before which they, who resorted thither to inquire directions in any case, or the success of any affair, used to fall down, and say their prayers, and after that to throw four dice upon the table, and by the letters or marks upon which they fell, the divination was made; as Pausanias describes it in his Achaïca. In other places they used them in a different manner, and the ancient Arabians divined by arrows, as our famous Dr. Pocock has shown in his notes upon Gregor. Abulfaragus’s book, concerning the Original and Manners of the Arabians, p. 327, 328, &c. where he describes the manner of it, and shows that it was performed before some idol, and therefore was strictly forbidden, by Mahomet in his Alcoran, as a diabolical invention. In which he seems to have imitated Moses, who may be thought here to forbid such kind of divination; which was in use among the eastern people in the days of the prophet Ezekiel, xxi. 21, where we find the same word kosem, which that learned author thinks is illustrated by that Arabian custom.

It is to be noted, also, that they used to divine by a dead man’s skull, as our Dr. Windet hath observed out of the Sanhedrin (cap. 7), and Maimonides.

through the fire, or that useth divination, or an observer of times, or an enchanter, or a witch, 11 Or a charmer, or a consulter with familiar spirits, or a wizard, or a necromancer.

12 For all that do these things are an abomi-

Which custom the Greeks likewise followed; for Palladius relates how Maecius inquired πρός τὸν ξηρὸν κρᾶνον, "at a dry skull," &c. (see Windet, in his book De Vitæ Functorum Statu, sect. 1).

Several sorts of such kind of persons there were among the Edomites, Moabites, and other nations near Judea, who, in the days of Jeremiah, deceived the people with their divinations, prophecies, dreams, enchantments, and sorceries, as we learn from Jer. xxvii. 3. 9.

[An observer of times, or an enchanter,] Of these I have said enough upon Lev. xx. 26.

[A witch,] This word signifies worse than any of the former, viz. one that doeth mischief unto men or beasts by evil arts: concerning which see upon Exod. xxii. 18. Unto which I shall here add, that the Jewish nation have been extremely addicted to witchcraft, and some of their famous rabbins have been suspected of it (see J. Wagenseil upon Sota, p. 529).

Ver. 11. A charmer,] There are various conjectures about the meaning of the Hebrew words chober chaber; which importing something of society or conjunction, some translate fortune-teller, who by the conjunction of the planets pretends to predict future things; others, one that bath society with evil spirits, which is mentioned afterward in another word. Job Ludolphus seems to me to have given the plainest account of the words, which he translates congregans congregationem, "gathering together a company." For it was an ancient way of enchantment, to bring various kinds of beasts into one place, which the rabbins distinguish into the "great congregation," and the "little congregation:" the great was, when they assembled together a great company of the larger sort of beasts; and the less, when they gathered together as great a company of the smaller, such as serpents, scorpions, and the like: but we cannot be certain of this; though Telezius tells us, it is in use at this day in the eastern countries. For so he describes the election of the king of Gingir, that he stood compassed about with lions, tigers, leopards, and dragons, which, by magical arts, were gathered together as his guard and courtiers (see Ludolphi Comment. in Hist. Ethiop. cap. 16. n. 116).

But the common interpretation which the Jews give of chober chaber is, that he is one who uses strange words, which have no signification; but he pretends are powerful to charm a serpent (for instance), that it shall not sting, or to preserve from any other harm. So Maimonides in Avoda Zara, cap. 11. And to this sort of superstition the world was so addicted, that this precept of Moses could not bring the Jews quite off from it; but, when they threw away other charms, they used the words of Scripture instead of them; pretending, for instance, to cure wounds by reading that verse in the law, Exod. xv. 26. I will put none of these diseases upon thee," &c. So we find they themselves acknowledge in Sanhedrin, cap. 2. sect. 1. And Maimonides saith, in the forenamed treatise, this is forbidden by Moses in this place, as much as any other kind of charm; "for the words of the law are turned hereby to another use than God intended in them; which was not for healing the body, but curing the soul." And I see no reason why it should not be thought as great a crime to use the Schem Hamphorash (as they call the name Jehovah) to such purposes; and yet the Jews are so stupid as to ima-nation unto the LORD: and because of these abominations the LORD thy God doth drive them out from before thee.

13 Thou shalt be perfect with the LORD thy God.

gine Moses wrought all his miracles by the virtue of it. Maimonides, indeed, was so sober as to reject this common conceit, condemning those who think there was a power in the very letters and pronunciation of the word (lib. i. More Nevochim, cap. 62).

[A consulter with familiar spirits, or a wizard,] Of these two see what I have noted, Lev. xix. 31. and Lev. xx. 6.

[A necromancer,] In the Hebrew, "one that seeks to, or inquires of, the dead." It is not easy to tell wherein this differs from one that had a familiar spirit, as we translate it. For the woman whom Saul consulted, who had a spirit, called Ooth, inquired also after this manner; their spirit, it seems, teaching such persons to call for the dead to appear to them: but some, perhaps, had not such a spirit, who notwithstanding consulted the dead, by going to their graves in the night, and there lying down, and muttering certain words with a low voice, that they might have communion with them by dreams, or by their appearing to them: unto which the prophet Isaiah is thought to allude, viii. 19. xxix. 4. Maimonides, in Avoda Zara, cap. 11. sect. 15. thus describes a necromancer: he is one, who, having afflicted himself with fasting, goes to the burying-place, and there lies down, and falls asleep; and then the dead appear to him, and tell him what he desires. Such are they also who put on a certain kind of garment, speak some uncouth words, and make a fume, and then lie down alone, that the dead whom they desire may come to them, and discourse with them in their sleep. To the same purpose Aben Ezra. To this the gentiles were very prone; and it was thought so high an attainment to come to this knowledge, that Julian the apostate, who was ambitious to be acquainted with all the heathen mysteries, secretly practised this Neχρωματεια, in the most retired part of his palace, cutting up the bodies of virgins and boys to bring up the dead to him; which was far more impious than what the Talmudists say (in the title Beracoth), that such kind of people were wont to burn the secundine of a black cat, when she had her first kittens, and beating it very small, put some of the powder upon their eye, whereupon demons appeared to them (see Greg. Nazianz. in his invectives against Julian, p. 91. and St. Chrysostom, in his oration upon St. Bahylas). I shall only add, that this was not only privately practised among the gentiles, but there were also public places to which men resorted to consult the dead, particularly at Thesprotis, near to the river Acheron, where Herodotus, lib. v. mentions a Neχρωματῆριον; and Plutarch (to name no more) mentions another at Heraclæa, which Pausanias, in his distress, went to consult, as he relates in the life of Cimon.

Ver. 12. All that do these things are an abomination] Because they were invented by idolatrous people, if not by the suggestions of evil spirits.

Because of these abominations the LORD thy God doth drive them out] Expelled the Amorites and other wicked inhabitants of the country, where they practised these abominations; which, no doubt, had some relation to idolatry, and therefore were forbidden to the Israelites.

Ver. 13. Thou shalt be perfect with the LORD thy God.] This shows there was something of idolatrous worship, in all the forenamed practices; which, if they followed, it was, in some degree, to forsake the 14 For these nations, which thou shalt possess, hearkened unto observers of times, and unto diviners; but as for thee, the Lord thy God hath not suffered thee so to do.

Lord, on whom they were wholly to depend, and seek to him alone in the ways which he had prescribed in his laws. For this was to be "perfect with the Lord;" to have nothing to do with any other God, nor with the rites and ceremonies that were used in their worship; and therefore the LXX. translate this word sometimes by ἀπόω (Job xxii. 3), as well as by τελειώω; for then they were perfect with God, when they kept his worship simple and pure, without the mixture of any foreign religion; which the whole context shows to be the sense, both in the words foregoing and following.

Ver. 14. For these nations,—hearkened unto observers of times, and unto diviners:] The ancient heathen, as Strabo tells us, lib. vi. had these diviners in such esteem, ὡςτε καὶ βασιλεῖς οὐ ἀξιοῦντας, "that they thought them worthy of the highest authority." But God would not have his people so much as to consult such persons: for it appears by these words, that not only they who were diviners (for instance), but they who hearkened to them, were odious to God. For that even the art of divination depended upon some idolatrous opinions and practices, appears evidently, even from the most refined account we have of it in ancient authors: for instance, Ammianus Marcellinus, who, to acquit his master Julian from the suspicion of sorcery, which some said he used, to get the foreknowledge of things future, makes it a principal point of wisdom, not unworthy such a prince, who was a professed lover of all sciences, to offer placatory sacrifices to draw in the spirit of all the elements, to endue him with a spirit of divination: for so his words are in the beginning of his one-and-twentieth book: "The spirit of all the elements, being all way and every way invigorated with the foreperceiving motion of the everlasting (i. e. the heavenly) bodies, makes us partakers of the gifts of divining; and the substantial powers, ritu diverso placate, 'being rendered favorable by respective rites' (i. e. such as were proper and suitable to each of them), convey predictions to mortality, as from so many perpetual springs or fountains, over which (substantial powers) the goddess Themis is said to preside," &c. Which shows that Julian, who called Jupiter the most high God, the King of all, yet courted other inferior powers, by such rites as he imagined would win their favor: which was rank idolatry.

The Lord thy God hath not suffered thee so to do.] But absolutely forbidden it, Lev. xix. 31. xx. 6. where he warns them to have nothing to do with some of the persons here mentioned; and not only instructed them in the way to live happy, but established an oracle among them, to be consulted on all weighty occasions, and governed them by men whom he had endued with his Spirit (Numb. xi. 16, 17. 25). Therefore if any Israelite practised any of the things here forbidden, though he did not worship any idol, he was scourged by the sentence of the court of judgment (see Selden, lib. De Jure Nat. et Gent. cap. 7).

Ver. 15. Raise up unto thee a Prophet] Since the Jews, as all other nations, were extremely desirous to know things to come, Moses reveals unto them from God a thing future of the highest importance, viz. the coming of Christ, and the greatness of his authority; and in after times, God revealed to them, by degrees, the time of his birth, his death, resurrection, &c. The Jews, indeed, commonly take these words to be a promise of a constant succession of prophets that should be among them, to preserve them from going to such diviners as were famous among their heathen neighbors; and thus many Christian interpreters make out the connexion of these words with the foregoing. But though this may be allowed to be intimated, and this promise be acknowledged to be partly verified in those prophets which God raised up, from age to age, after Moses, for further knowledge of his will (as the promise of a Saviour was in part verified in those judges and kings by whom God delivered his people from their enemies), yet it is very evident that he speaks of a single prophet, more eminent than all the rest; and that these words, in their most literal sense, cannot belong to any other person but the Messiah. So that albeit the continuance of prophets among this people, was a means to prevent all occasions of consulting sorcerers or witches; yet the chief ground upon which Moses dissuades them from such practices, according to the literal connexion of these words with the foregoing, "the Lord thy God hath not suffered thee to do so," i. e. to hearken unto observers of times and diviners, was, the consideration of their late mighty deliverance by Moses; the excellency of their present law, which God had given them for their direction; and their expectation of a greater Lawgiver in future times, when the first covenant should wax old, and prophecy itself for a long time fail, as it did before the coming of this great prophet, the Lord Christ. To this purpose Dr. Jackson, in his third book upon the Creed, ch. 21. parag. 19.

From the midst of thee,] It was a great honour to them to have such a prophet as is here spoken of arise out of their nation; but as he was after a peculiar sort raised up by Jehovah, not merely by the external assistances or impulsion of his Spirit (to use the words of the same excellent person, parag. 9), but by intrinsic assumption into the unity of his person; so likewise he was raised up, in a strict and proper sense, "from the midst of them;" being, as it were, extracted out of a pure virgin, as the first woman was out of the man, by the Almighty's own immediate hand.

Like unto me;] This shows he speaks of a single prophet, and not of a constant succession of prophets, there being none of them like to Moses, whom God himself distinguished from them all (Numb. xii. 6—8). And accordingly that Divine writer, who added those verses which are at the end of this book (concerning the death of Moses), testifies that there never rose in Israel a prophet like to Moses (see Deut. xxxiv. 10). It is commonly thought to be done by Ezra, who hath effectually confuted all the conceits of R. Bechai, Aben Ezra, Abarinel, and other Jewish doctors, who take either Joshua or Jeremiah to have been this prophet. If Joshua, as some fancy, added these words, then he excluded himself from being the person; nor did Joshua act as a prophet, but as a judge or governor: and Jeremiah is acknowledged by Abarinel himself to be inferior to Isaiah: for though in his preface to his commentary upon Jeremiah he mentions fourteen things wherein he was like unto Moses, and saith he prophesied just forty years, as Moses did; yet, in his commentary upon the lesser prophets, he prefers Isaiah before them all, and censures the rudeness of Jeremiah's language, in many things preferring Ezekiel to him. So little do these doctors agree in their interpretation of this prophecy 16 According to all that thou desiredst of the LORD thy God in Horeb in the day of the assembly, saying, Let me not hear again the voice of the LORD my God, neither let me see this great fire any more, that I die not.

17 And the LORD said unto me, They which can belong to none of their prophets which succeeded Moses (who were all much inferior to him), until He came, who perfectly resembled him, but was much superior to him (see ver. 18). And thus the ancient Jews understood this prophecy; for though Maimonides only saith, the Messiah should be endued with wisdom greater than Solomon's, and should equal their master Moses, yet those before him proceeded a great deal further. This being a common saying among them, which Abarbinel himself remembers, in his commentary upon the small prophets, "He shall be exalted above Abraham, lifted up above Moses, and higher than the angels of the ministry." Nor is the cabalistical observation mentioned in Baal-Haturim to be quite neglected; which is, that this verse begins and ends with the letter nun, which is the numeral letter for fifty, importing, that to the prophet here promised should be opened the fifty gates of knowledge, forty-nine of which only were opened to Moses. And that this verse also consists of ten words, to signify that they were to obey this prophet no less than the ten commandments: which observation, it must be confessed, is weakly grounded, but contains a most illustrious truth, and shows that they believed Moses here speaks of the Messiah.

Unto him shall ye hearken;] As they had engaged themselves to do: it will appear from the following words.

Ver. 16.] So we read Exod. xx. 19. where they made this request unto Moses, saying, "Speak thou with us, and we will hear; but let not God speak with us, lest we die." In which words the whole multitude bound themselves solemnly to hear the words of the Lord, being delivered not immediately from his own mouth, but by Moses, as is more fully expressed in this book, Deut. v. 27—29. where God highly commends this good resolution in them, as Moses here observes again in the next verse.

Ver. 17. They have well spoken] He approved their desire, and resolved not to speak to them any more, as he did from Mount Sinai, with a voice out of the fire and cloud; but by Moses himself while he lived, and afterward by one like to Moses, as it here follows.

Ver. 18. I will raise them up a prophet] These words seem to have been spoken to Moses by God, when they desired God would not speak to them any more immediately by himself, but by a mediator. Then God was pleased to promise them a great deal more than they desired, which was to raise up another Prophet like to Moses, who should acquaint them more fully with his mind and will in as familiar a manner as Moses did, without striking any such terror into them, as they were in at the giving of the law, though the words of this prophet came from the mouth of God himself: in which two things the Israelites excelled all other nations (i. e. in that they had such an excellent law delivered by Moses, which was to be bettered by an everlasting covenant, made by this Prince of the Prophets). In respect of both (as the same Dr. Jackson expresses it), the name of soothsayer, or soreerer, was not to be named in Israel, as they were in the nations that knew not God, much less expected such a Mediator. In whom the Spirit of life should dwell as plentifully, as splendor doth in the body of the sun; from whose fulness, ere he have well spoken that which they have spoken.

18 I will raise them up a Prophet from among their brethren, like unto thee, and will put my words in his mouth; and he shall speak unto them all that I shall command him.

visibly appeared in the world, all other prophets were illuminated: so that Moses himself, and all the prophets that followed him, were but as messengers sent from God, to solicit his people to preserve their allegiance free from all commerce or compact with familiar spirits, until the Prince of Glory came in person to visit them, and dwell among them.

Like unto thee;] This is well explained by Eusebius, δευτερος κατά Μωυσία νομοδότης, "a second law-giver, as Moses was:" for in saying not simply he would raise them up a prophet, but like unto thee, it must signify, saith he, that this Prophet should be a lawgiver as well as Moses, which none of the prophets were, till our Saviour came. Neither Isaiah nor Jeremiah were the makers of laws, but only called upon them to observe the law of Moses; whereas, when the Lord Jesus came, he gave laws to all the world, and those far superior to the laws of Moses, who only said, "Thou shalt not commit adultery;" but our Lord saith, "I say unto you, Ye shall not lust; and instead of 'Thou shalt not kill,' he saith, 'Be not angry with thy brother,' &c. Whence it was that they who heard him were astounded at his doctrine, and said, that he spake "not as the scribes," who were expounders of the law, but "as one that had authority," that is, power to ordain and enact laws, and not only to explain those that were already written (lib. 1. Demonstr. Evang. cap. 7. and lib. iii. cap. 2. lib. ix. p. 443. &c. See also what Joh. Wagenseil hath said upon these words, in his annot. in Lipman. Carm. Meinoriale, p. 548).

He shall speak unto them all that I shall command him.] Reveal the whole mind and will of God (John xii. 49, 50). For he was herein like to Moses (though far superior to him), that he was intimately acquainted with God's counsels, being "in the bosom of the Father" (John i. 18), and confirmed all that he said to be from God by miracles, and wonders, and signs, far more mighty than those of Moses, and more in number than had been wrought by all the prophets, from the beginning of the world. Particularly, he fed multitudes with a little food (which made the people cry out, "This is of a truth that Prophet which should come into the world." John vi. 14), but above all this, gave them "that bread from heaven," of which the manna which Moses gave them was but a shadow, as he took occasion to show the people, upon their admiration of that miraculous feast he had made for them, with five barley loaves, and two small fishes: for he himself was that bread of life, who nourished men's souls with the word of eternal life, which he had in himself, as he showed by his resurrection from the dead, which he himself predicted, and thereby proved himself the greatest of all the prophets: for though Moses foretold his own death, yet neither he, nor any other prophet whatsoever but our Saviour, spake of his being raised up again. In which he may be thought to be like to Moses, who was raised up by God to be a saviour of his people out of that ark, which, without the special providence of God, had been his tomb. And unto this resurrection of Christ doth the propriety of this phrase, "from the midst of thee," agree: for this was done, as Dr. Jackson also well observes, in the midst of Jerusalem, the metropolis of Judea, not without express notice given of it to the rulers of the people; and such a 19 And it shall come to pass, that whosoever will not hearken unto my words which he shall speak in my name, I will require it of him.

20 But the prophet, which shall presume to speak a word in my name, which I have not commanded him to speak, or that shall speak in the name of other gods, even that prophet shall die.

21 And if thou say in thine heart, How shall we know the word which the Lord hath not spoken?

22 When a prophet speaketh in the name of confirmation it was, that "he was the prophet they should all hear," that there could not be a greater; as all strangers, both to their religion and ours, would agree, and they themselves cannot deny: for Nachmanides, relating, in a letter of his to the rabbins at Marseilles, how there was a man in those days, in the southern countries, who pretended to be the fore-runner of the Messiah, unto whom great numbers both of Jews and Arabs resorted, tells us, that he being apprehended by the king of the country, and asked what miracle he showed to confirm his commission, he answered boldly, "Cut off my head, and I will come to life again." To which the king of the Arabs replied, "There is no sign greater than this; which, if it come to pass, both I and the whole world will believe thee." Whereupon his head was cut off, and there was an end of all his pretences; though some of the Jews were so mad, as Maimonides there saith, that they still expected his return to life. Thus R. Gedaliah reports in his Schalshet Hakkabalah.

Ver. 19. Whosoever will not hearken unto my words which he shall speak in my name.] This is the proper character of a prophet, to deliver in the name of God what he received from God. Thus did Moses: but Christ most eminently, as I before observed from John xii. 49, 50, where he saith, "I have not spoken of myself," but the Father which sent me; he gave me a commandment what I should say and what I should speak, &c. whatsoever therefore I speak, even as the Father said unto me, so I speak." Which is a perfect commentary upon these words of Moses, who here calls Christ a prophet, not a priest, or a king (though he was to be both), because he would not have the Jews mistake, and expect to find in his person the worldly grandeur of a mighty prince, or the high honour and splendour of Aaron; but have the greatest regard to the heavenly doctrine which he taught them, as he himself (he told them) was taught by the Father: "For I proceeded forth (says he) and came from God; neither came I of myself, but he sent me; and I do nothing of myself, but as my Father hath taught me, I speak these things," John viii. 28, 42. This was the highest honour of all, to speak God's words (ver. 47), in the name of God (ver. 42).

I conclude this with the remarkable words of the Midrash upon Ecclesiastes, who thus expresses the sense of this prophecy, "As was the first Redeemer, such shall be the last Redeemer." Which plainly determine the prophet here spoken of to be one single person; and he no other but the Lord Christ (see Huetius, in his Demonstr. Evang. prop. 7. n. 9).

I will require it of him.] Severely punish him, so as to destroy him from among his people, as St. Peter interprets it, Acts iii. 23. And so this phrase is used, Gen. ix. 5, xlii. 22. And there was great reason for this severity, seeing they had so solemnly bound themselves to hearken to this prophet, when they desired God not to speak any more to them by himself, but by a mediator, which God then promised, as I observed, ver. 18. A mediator of a better covenant, who should secure them from such dreadful flames, as they then saw, if they would hearken to him, as they promised to do; otherwise, what could they expect, "but a certain fearful looking-for of judgment, and fiery indignation, to devour the adversaries!"

For since "he that despised Moses's law died without mercy, under two or three witnesses, of how much sorer punishment, suppose ye, shall he be thought worthy, who hath trodden under foot the Son of God," in the open face of all the world? Heb. x. 27—29, which is a full explication of these words, "Whosoever will not hearken unto my words, which he shall speak in my name, I will require it of him:" or, as Onkelos translates it, "my Word shall require it of him:" where Menra, Word, can signify nothing but a Divine person, distinct from him who speaks these words, even that very person to whom the apostle applies them.

Ver. 20. But the prophet, which shall presume to speak a word in my name, &c.] These words plainly suggest to us, that Moses intended, in the foregoing discourse, to admonish the Israelites to hearken diligently to all such prophets as God should at any time raise up to them; though it be most evident, if we examine the propriety of every word or clause in the whole context, they cannot be exactly fitted unto any prophet but Christ; unto whom the whole discourse is as fully accommodated, as a well-made garment to the body that wears it. They are the words of the same excellent person, so often mentioned, Dr. Jackson, book iii. on the Creed, ch. 21. par. 1, 2.

That shall speak in the name of other gods.] It was a manifest sign a man was a false prophet, if he spake in the name of Baal, or any other god, but the God of Israel: or if he said, Such a star by its spiritual influence coming upon me, said, Worship me after this manner, or, Thus call upon me, as Maimonides (who gives an account of the several sorts of false prophets) speaks in his preface to Seder Zeraim. But how should they know a man to be a false prophet, when he spake to them in the name of the Lord? For men might pretend, as some did, that God had sent them, and given them a command, when he had not. To which he answers in the next verses.

Even that prophet shall die.] He was to be strangled, say the Jews, by the sentence of the great Sanhedrin; for it is a tradition of their rabbins, saith the Gemara Babylonica upon that title, that in the business of prophecy there are three sorts of persons, who are to be punished by the judgment of men, and three by the sentence of Heaven. He that prophesied what he did not hear from God (an example of which we have in Zedekiah, 1 Kings xxii. 11), or spake what was not said to him, but to another (an example of which they make Hananiah, Jer. xxviii. 11), or prophesies in the name of an idol (suppose Baal); all these were to be put to death by the sentence of the court of judgment: but he that suppressed his prophecy (like Jonah), or despised the words of a prophet, or did not observe his own words, was to be punished by the hand of Heaven (see Seldon, lib. iii. De Synedr. cap. 6. n. 1).

Ver. 21.] Which was but a reasonable question, there being as great care necessary, not to hearken to falsehood, as to be attentive unto truth. And this relates unto such prophets as came to them in the name of the Lord: for if a man came in the name of any other God, there needed no other mark to discover him to be an impostor.

Ver. 22. When a prophet speaketh in the name of the Lord,] Predicting some wonderful thing to come the Lord, if the thing follow not, nor come to pass, that is the thing which the Lord hath not to pass, as a token he is sent of God to deliver what he speaks to the people.

[If the thing follow not, nor come to pass,] For if the Lord had sent him, he would have accomplished what he gave as a sign of his mission; which not coming to pass, he was proved to be a false prophet, who spake out of his own heart, and not the word of the Lord. But here the Jews distinguished between a prophet who predicts evil things, as famine, or pestilence, &c. and one that predicts good things, as rain (when there is great need of it), and fruitful years, &c. Though the predictions of the former sort did not come to pass, he was not to be reputed presently a false prophet, because God is very merciful, and often repented him of the evil, as he did in the case of Nineveh: but, in the latter case, if any one of the good things he foretold did not come to pass, he was to be taken for a deceiver; which they understand also of the very time and place, when and where he said the things he predicted would be fulfilled: and here they bring in the example of Hanaiah, the son of Azur, mentioned before, Jer. xxviii. 11, and see ver. 8, 9 of that chapter. But this doth not give us the true difference; for both God's promises and threatenings many times depend upon a condition, as appears from that famous place in the prophet, Jer. xviii. 7—9. So that the good things a prophet foretold might not come to pass, and yet he might be a true prophet; because the people proved unworthy of them, and God did not absolutely intend them. Therefore the true meaning seems to be, that if a prophet foretold such a thing as the power of nature cannot produce, and gave it as a sign God sent him, who would justify his mission by doing that wonder, and the thing did not come to pass, he was to be looked upon as not a man of God: for example, when Moses threw his rod on the ground, and said it should become a serpent, if it had not been turned into a serpent, he had been convicted of falsity: or a prophet said fire should come down from heaven, and consume the sacrifice which lay before him, which was the case of Elijah; if it had not come down, he would have been no more owned for a true prophet, than the prophets of Baal. And, as Maimonides well observes, if a prophet's words were fulfilled in one or more things, he was not to be judged a true prophet, unless every thing he spake in the name of God came to pass; which he proves from those words concerning Samuel (1 Sam. iii. 19, 20), "The Lord let none of his words fall to the ground: and all Israel knew that Samuel was established to be a prophet of the Lord."

The Jews also made this addition to the rule forementioned of trying prophets, as Mr. Selden observes (lib. iii. De Synedr. cap. 5. n. 3), that "whatsoever prophet had the testimony of another undoubted prophet, was to be taken for a true prophet." By which rule they might have known the great Prophet whom God promised to them in the foregoing verses: for spoken, but the prophet hath spoken it presumptuously: thou shalt not be afraid of him.

John the Baptist, whom the whole nation took for a prophet, testified to them that Jesus was the Christ. And besides all other undoubted marks of his being sent from God, his rising from the dead, which he himself foretold, was enough to satisfy all men of the truth of what he said: for though every prediction of what afterwards comes to pass, will not necessarily prove a man to be a true prophet; yet the fulfilling of a great number of things (not one of which fails, as was said before of Samuel), especially of such a thing as this, which was impossible to be brought to pass but by an almighty power, is an uncontrollable evidence of a Divine mission.

R. Solomon, upon this verse, hath a note which is worth our observation, though it be not to the purpose of Moses's words: "A prophet (saith he) that bids thee not observe some of the precepts, is not to be heard, unless he be known to be a man of eminent virtue, and upright life, as Elijah was, who bade them build an altar on Mount Carmel, even when the sacrifices upon high places were forbidden. But there was a necessity for it, that he might restore the true worship of God in Israel." Which should have made them hearken to our blessed Saviour better than they did, he being so perfectly holy and pure, that he challenged any of them to charge him with sin; especially, when he only laid aside some of their vain traditions, but conformed to all the rites of Moses: so that if in conclusion we should grant that Moses (in the fourteenth and sixteenth verses, &c.), speaks of all the prophets that should succeed him (which it is certain he doth not principally intend), the Jews were impious in rejecting our Saviour, who came as a prophet to them, and had all the marks that a prophet could have of his being sent from God.

[Hath spoken it presumptuously:] For it was an act of high presumption, and arrogant pride, for any man to pretend a commission from God, when he had not sent him. Which was done two ways, as the Jews interpret this, either when a man spake in the name of God that which was false, or when he pretended that to have been spoken to him which was revealed by God to another (see Jer. xxii. 30). Both these were impudent impostors, and accordingly to be treated.

[Thou shalt not be afraid of him.] Have no reverence or regard to him, though he be never so confident: nor be afraid to lay hold of him, and endeavour to bring him to the Sanhedrin, to have their sentence passed upon him (as the Jews understand it), though he have never so powerful an interest to support him, and preserve him from punishment. Thus Maimonides, in the forenamed preface to Seder Zeraim: "Thou shalt not be terrified, or averted from endeavouring to have him put to death, by his religion, goodness, or knowledge, since in his proud brags he hath spoken false things of God." For to be afraid of such a person, and of his partakers, was to distrust God, who is the defender of those that defend the cause of religion.

CHAPTER XIX.

1 The cities of refuge. 4 The privilege thereof for the manslayer. 14 The landmark is not to be removed.
15 Two witnesses at the least. 16 The punishment of a false witness.

1 WHEN the LORD thy God hath cut off the nations, whose land the LORD thy God giveth thee, and thou succeedest them, and dwellest in their cities, and in their houses;

2 Thou shalt separate three cities for thee in the midst of thy land, which the LORD thy God giveth thee to possess it.

3 Thou shalt prepare thee a way, and divide the coasts of thy land, which the LORD thy God giveth thee to inherit, into three parts, that every slayer may flee thither.

4 ¶ And this is the case of the slayer, which shall flee thither, that he may live: Whoso killeth his neighbour ignorantly, whom he hated not in time past;

5 As when a man goeth into the wood with his neighbour to hew wood, and his hand fetcheth a stroke with the axe to cut down the tree, and the head slippeth from the helve, and lighteth upon his neighbour, that he die; he shall flee unto one of those cities, and live:

6 Lest the avenger of blood pursue the slayer, while his heart is hot, and overtake him, because the way is long, and slay him; whereas he was not worthy of death, inasmuch as he hated him not in time past.

CHAP. XIX.

Having sufficiently pressed upon the people the great commandment, of loving God with all the heart, and soul, and strength, and him alone, Moses now proceeds to remember them of other precepts belonging to the second table (as we now speak), but not in an exact method, nor without interspersing some ceremonial matters. And he begins with what concerns that commandment, "Thou shalt not kill."

Ver. 1.] The very same words we had before upon another occasion, xii. 29, which are now used to signify, that they were not bound to what follows, till God had subdued the land of Canaan for them, and they were settled in it; as the last words of the verse imports, dwellest in their cities, and in their houses. Accordingly, after the division of the land, God puts Joshua in mind of this business (Josh. xx. 1, 2, &c.).

Ver. 2. Thou shalt separate three cities] According to an order God had given to Moses, Numb. xxxv. 14, 15, to set aside six cities in all, for the use here mentioned; three on this side Jordan, where they now were, and three on the other side in the land of Canaan. The former part of which command Moses himself had executed (Deut. iv. 42, &c.), and now gives them a charge to perform the other.

In the midst of thy land,] In the "midst of their land," signifies no more but "within their land:" for if they had been all three in the very heart of the country, it would have crossed the end and intention of them, which was, that they should be placed so conveniently in several parts of the country, that men might easily and speedily flee to them. And therefore "the midst of the land," may be opposed to the skirts of the country, where they would have been too far distant from some parts of it; or may denote, that they should be set in an eminent place, upon the top of mountains, where they might be seen afar off. And so they all three were, it is apparent from Josh. xx. 7, where they are said to be in Mount Naphtali, Mount Ephraim, and the mountain of Judah.

Ver. 3. Thou shalt prepare thee a way,] Make a plain road to them, and keep it in good repair, that, both in winter and summer, the manslayer might without difficulty flee thither. And for his more safe passage, the Hebrews say, where there were any turnings, or two ways parted, they were bound to set up a post, or stone, whereon was engraven, in great letters, the word MIKLAT, i. e. refuge, that he might not mistake his way to the place.

Divide the coasts—into three parts,] The Jews understand it, that they were to be placed at an equal distance, in three several parts of the country, that all might have the same benefit by them; and nobody have a longer journey to go than his neighbour for his safety.

That every slayer may flee thither.] Have the convenience of preserving himself in one or other of them. It is observable, that there were as many of these cities in the two tribes and a half, as there were in all the other nine tribes and a half; in which there seems to be a great inequality. I have given some account of it upon Numb. xxxv. 14. And the Hebrews fancy there was another reason for it, because of the frequent murders which were likely to be committed by the fierce nature of the Gileadites (see the book of Judges, ch. x. and xi. and Hosea vi. 8).

Ver. 4. That he may live:] Be preserved from the avenger of blood, who otherwise might kill him.

Whoso killeth his neighbour ignorantly,] These cities were not to be a protection to a wilful murderer, but to an innocent person, who, against his intention, was so unhappy as to kill a man, belidooth (as the words are in the Hebrew), "without his knowledge," being free, that is, from any design to do him the least harm. But as for such as, out of hatred and malice in their hearts, killed another, they were so far from finding safety in these cities, that they were to be pulled from the altar, if they fled thither for sanctuary, as we now speak (Exod. xxi. 12, 14). Or, if they would not stir from thence, they might be killed there, as appears by the case of Joab, 1 Kings ii. 28, 30, 31.

Ver. 5. As when a man goeth into the wood, &c.] By this all other like cases were to be judged; that is, when a man was about a lawful business, if any thing happened which he intended not, he was not accountable for it (see Selden, lib. iv. De Jure Nat. et Gent. cap. 2).

He shall flee unto one of those cities, and live:] He might get to which of them he could most conveniently, and there be preserved. The Jews, from this word live, conclude, without any other ground for it, that a master was bound to go along with his scholar who fled thither; because, without the doctrine of the law, men did not live, but were dead.

Ver. 6. Lest the avenger of blood pursue the slayer] With anger, which might boil up to such a degree as to move him to kill the slayer, before he had examined whether there was a just cause.

It is evident that this verse is to be connected with verse the third (the next two, ver. 4, 5, coming in as 7 Wherefore I command thee, saying, Thou shalt separate three cities for thee.

8 And if the LORD thy God enlarge thy coast, as he hath sworn unto thy fathers, and give thee all the land which he promised to give unto thy fathers;

9 If thou shalt keep all these commandments to do them, which I command thee this day, to love the LORD thy God, and to walk ever in his ways; then shalt thou add three cities more for thee, besides these three:

10 That innocent blood be not shed in thy land, which the LORD thy God giveth thee for an inheritance, and so blood be upon thee.

a parenthesis, to show who should be preserved in these cities, and who not), being a reason why the cities of refuge should be placed at an equal distance in the several parts of the country, that the journey might not be too long to any of them, but a man might soon flee thither, before the avenger of blood could lay hold of him.

Because the way is long, and slay him;] If he could not have gotten thither in a short time, he might have been in danger to lose his life, though not worthy of death. For, as the law did not punish him that killed a manslayer, when he found him out of the bounds of the city of refuge (Numb. xxxv. 27), so it seems to have indemnified him, if he killed him before he got thither.

Whereas he was not worthy of death,] Which, in his rage, the avenger of blood did not consider; and therefore was guilty before God of shedding innocent blood, though the law did not punish him for it.

Ver. 7.] To prevent which mischief, God commanded, not merely one, but three cities, and those in several places of the country; where men might find safety, if they made haste to flee to them.

Ver. 8.] As far as unto the river Euphrates (Gen. xv. 18. Exod. xxxiii. 31. Deut. i. 7).

Ver. 9. If thou shalt keep all these commandments] This seems to have been the condition, upon the performance of which depended the enlargement of their border. Which is more fully expressed xi. 22—24. And so the covenant made with Abraham (in Gen. xv. 18), is to be understood, as including in it this condition.

Then shalt thou add three cities more for thee,] We do not read of any more added to these, though their border was enlarged in David's and Solomon's time; and that as far as Euphrates. But those nations which they subdued, were only made tributaries to the kings of Israel, who did not people and possess those countries; and consequently there was no occasion for such cities there; unless the Israelites had been the inhabitants of those countries, as they were of the land of Canaan (ver. 1).

Ver. 10. That innocent blood be not shed] As there would, if, upon supposition of such an enlargement of their borders, there had been no cities nearer to flee unto than these six; which were sufficient only for the land of Canaan, and the land they possessed on this side Jordan, where they now were.

So blood be upon thee.] The guilt and punishment of blood, in not taking care of the safety of innocent persons.

Ver. 11.] When there was a manifest design of killing another, and known hatred, he that committed the murder was to receive no benefit by fleeing to a city of refuge. And then a man was judged to 11 ¶ But if any man hate his neighbour, and lie in wait for him, and rise up against him, and smite him mortally that he die, and fleeth into one of these cities:

12 Then the elders of his city shall send and fetch him thence, and deliver him into the hand of the avenger of blood, that he may die.

13 Thine eye shall not pity him, but thou shalt put away the guilt of innocent blood from Israel, that it may go well with thee.

14 ¶ Thou shalt not remove thy neighbour's landmark, which they of old time have set in thine inheritance, which thou shalt inherit in the land that the LORD thy God giveth thee to possess it.

hate his brother, when for three days together he had never spoken to him, though they had kept one another company; as I observed before out of Mr. Selden (lib. iv. De Jure Nat. et Gent. cap. 2. p. 473).

Ver. 12. The elders—shall send and fetch him thence,] Demand him of the elders of the city to which he fled; that he might be sent to them, and tried by them, whether he was guilty of wilful murder, or ought to have the benefit of their protection, being innocent of that crime (Numb. xxxv. 12. 24). It is likely there were probable reasons given why he was suspected to be guilty of murder; and therefore they desired the matter might be examined; otherwise, if the case was known to be like that in ver. 5, they did not make this demand.

Deliver him into the hand of the avenger of blood,] That is, if they found him guilty of wilful murder; otherwise they were to "deliver him out of the hand of the avenger of blood, and restore him to the city of refuge," that he might not die (Numb. xxxv. 25).

Ver. 13. Thine eye shall not pity him,] Nor take any satisfaction for the life of a murderer, as the law is, Numb. xxxv. 31.

Thou shalt put away the guilt] By putting him to death.

That it may go well with thee,] By having no guilt upon them; as they had when they let this crime go unpunished.

Ver. 14. Thou shalt not remove thy neighbour's landmark, &c.] The Jewish doctors think that this hath respect to the holy land (as they call it), and to the terms or bounds which were set by Joshua in the division of the country, which no man might take away; for that made him both guilty of theft, and also of the breach of this precept; and consequently he incurred a double punishment, and was whipped twice as much as another offender (see Selden, lib. vi. De Jure Nat. et Gent. cap. 3, in the latter end). This was a law among the Greeks, as appears by Plato, lib. viii. De Legibus, Μη κινείτω γήσορα μηδεις, &c. νομισας τα άκείρωτα κινείτω αληθως τουτο ειναι, &c. "Let no man presume to remove the bounds of land; looking upon this, as being truly to remove things immovable;" i. e. to unsettle and overturn all things: Numa Pompilius therefore made this crime capital. Which makes Josephus's explication of these words seem more reasonable than that of the Talmudists, who extend this precept to the grounds of all their neighbour nations who were at peace with them: ως πολεμίων εντειθεν στασεων γηομιμων, "as being from the covetousness of men, who would thus enlarge their territories, (lib. iv. Archæol. cap. 8). Which may be thought a reason why Moses joins this to the foregoing precept, about punishing mur-

15 ¶ One witness shall not rise up against a man for any iniquity, or for any sin, in any sin that he sinneth: at the mouth of two witnesses, or at the mouth of three witnesses, shall the matter be established.

16 ¶ If a false witness rise up against any man to testify against him that which is wrong;

17 Then both the men, between whom the controversy is, shall stand before the LORD, before the priests and the judges, which shall be in those days;

18 And the judges shall make diligent inquider; and made this one of the curses they were bound to pronounce, and consent to it, at their entrance into the land of Canaan (Deut. xxvii. 17).

Which they of old time have set in thine inheritance,] This may seem to determine this precept peculiarly to the preserving the bounds in the land of Canaan; and by those of old time they understand Joshua and the elders, who divided the land, and fixed every one his lot. But it was as necessary to be observed in all other countries as that which was their proper inheritance. For, as Josephus truly observes, "they that remove the bounds of lands, are not very far from subverting all laws."

Ver. 15. One witness shall not rise up] They that gave their testimony in any cause always stood up.

Against a man for any iniquity,] A single witness was not to be admitted, as sufficient to convict a man of any offence whatsoever, whether in civil or criminal matters. For an inquisition into the fact one was enough; but not for the condemnation of him that was accused. Yet in pecuniary matters, one witness was sufficient to bring a man to purge himself by an oath (xvii. 6).

Shall the matter be established,] The accusation shall stand, or fall to the ground.

Ver. 16.] In any matter, whether against God, or against man. For though one witness could not condemn another; yet if it were proved he was a false witness, it was sufficient to condemn himself.

Ver. 17. Then both the men,] That is, the accuser and the person accused.

Shall stand before the Lord,] They were to come, in cases obscure, to the supreme court, where the sanctuary was settled. Who sat, it is likely, at the door of the tabernacle in Moses's time (see xvii. 8. 22), and so might properly be said to try them before the Lord.

Before the priests and the judges,] This they all understand of the highest court, which consisted partly of priests, and partly of other great persons, whom he calls judges; under which name, the whole court is comprehended in the next verse (see xvii. 8, and Selden, lib. ii. De Synedr. cap. 8. n. 2, 3).

Ver. 18. The judges,] The court beforenamed; who are all (whether priests or others) comprehended under the name of judges.

Shall make diligent inquisition:] For it was not easy to prove a man to be a false witness; and therefore the matter was brought before this supreme court.

If the witness be a false witness,] If, upon strict examination, he was found to have given a false evidence against his brother, in a matter which touched his estate, or his body or his life.

Ver. 19. Ye do unto him as he had thought to have done unto his brother:] That is, saith Maimonides, if he designed to have taken away his brother's life, he was to lose his own; if to have him scourged, he was to be lashed himself; if to lose a sum of money, he was to be fined the very same sum (More Nevochim, par. iii. cap. 41). But though in most cases a false witness was to suffer the very same kind of punishment, which he intended to have brought upon another, if his testimony had not been disproved; yet in some it was not exactly observed. As, if one falsely accused a priest's daughter of playing the whore, he was not to be burnt, as she should have been, but to be strangled as an adulterer. So J. Coch observes upon the title Maccoth, ad cap. 1, where the whole business of false testimonies is handled. But some foolish decisions were made by the rabbins, in opposition to the Sadducees, as he observes in his Annot. 20. in sect. 6.

19 Then shall ye do unto him, as he had thought to have done unto his brother: so shalt thou put the evil away from among you.

20 And those which remain shall bear, and fear, and shall henceforth commit no more any such evil among you.

21 And thine eye shall not pity; but life shall go for life, eye for eye, tooth for tooth, hand for hand, foot for foot.

he was to lose his own; if to have him scourged, he was to be lashed himself; if to lose a sum of money, he was to be fined the very same sum (More Nevochim, par. iii. cap. 41). But though in most cases a false witness was to suffer the very same kind of punishment, which he intended to have brought upon another, if his testimony had not been disproved; yet in some it was not exactly observed. As, if one falsely accused a priest's daughter of playing the whore, he was not to be burnt, as she should have been, but to be strangled as an adulterer. So J. Coch observes upon the title Maccoth, ad cap. 1, where the whole business of false testimonies is handled. But some foolish decisions were made by the rabbins, in opposition to the Sadducees, as he observes in his Annot. 20. in sect. 6.

Among the Athenians there was an action lay not only against the false witness, but against the person who produced him. Upon whom they set a fine; and they were made infamous. And if they were found thrice guilty of this crime, not only they but their posterity were made infamous throughout all generations; as Sam. Petitus observes, out of Andocides, and others (lib. iv. in Leges Atticas, tit. vii. p. 359). It is something strange they were not more severe against such offenders, many of their laws being plainly borrowed from Moses. And among the ancient Romans, by the law of the twelve tables, false witnesses were thrown down from the Tarpeian rock, as A. Gellius tells us (lib. xx. chap. 1), which was altered indeed, in latter times, for such punishments as the judges thought they merited: but he there tells Phavorinus, that, if the old punishment had continued to their days, they should not have had so many false testimonies given as they then saw.

So shalt thou put the evil away] This may be understood either of the false witness, or of his crime: the guilt of which was taken away by the just punishment of it.

Ver. 20. Those which remain] The remainder of Israel, who see him suffer in his kind.

Shall hear, and fear,] The end of punishment is to deter others from such wickedness (see xiii. 11. xvii. 13).

Henceforth commit no more any such evil] Learn to beware by other men's sufferings.

Ver. 21. Thine eye shall not pity;] He speaks to the judges, who were not, out of compassion, to moderate the punishment, but make it equal to the damage he intended to another. Examples he gives of this in the words following.

Life shall go for life, &c.] Concerning this lex talionis, see Exod. xxi. 23—25. Lev. xxiv. 19, 20. And see Grotius on Matt. v. 38, 40, where he well observes, that the party injured might forbear to require this punishment; but the judge, if it were required, could not deny to inflict it.

1 The priest's exhortation to encourage the people to battle. 5 The officers' proclamation who are to be dismissed from the war. 10 How to use the cities that accept or refuse the proclamation of peace. 16 What cities must be devoted. 19 Trees of man's meat must not be destroyed in the siege.

1 WHEN thou goest out to battle against thine enemies, and seest horses, and chariots, and a people more than thou, be not afraid of them: for the LORD thy God is with thee, which brought thee up out of the land of Egypt.

2 And it shall be, when ye are come nigh unto the battle, that the priest shall approach and speak unto the people,

3 And shall say unto them, Hear, O Israel, ye approach this day unto battle against your enemies: let not your hearts faint, fear not, and do not tremble, neither be ye terrified because of them;

4 For the LORD your God is he that goeth with you, to fight for you against your enemies, to save you.

CHAP. XX.

Ver. 1. When thou goest out to battle against thine enemies,] Who either invaded them (as in Judg. xi.), or with whom they had a just quarrel, because of injuries done them, without satisfaction: such as that mentioned 2 Sam. x. 4, &c.

And seest horses,] Which the Israelites wanted (as I observed upon xvii. 16), their armies consisting of footmen; who were taken from the plough, or from the sheepfolds.

Chariots,] Which carried a certain number of men in them; and when they were falcati (as they called them) were very formidable. For they made terrible slaughters among the enemy, cutting down men as we do grass, with a scythe or sickle. The Canaanites had great numbers of them, Josh. xi. 4, and Judg. iv. 3.

Be not afraid of them:] The Israelites were trained up to confide in God, and not in horses (which their country, as I said, did not afford, and consequently they had no chariots), nor in multitude of soldiers. And we find remarkable instances of this, particularly in Jehoshaphat (2 Chron. xx. 6, &c. 17), who followed the example of David, whose words are most memorable, Psalm xx. 7. "Some trust in chariots, and some in horses, but we will remember the name of the Lord our God" (see also Prov. xxi. 21).

For the Lord thy God is with thee,] That was such an instance of his power, as made it unreasonable to doubt of good success, when he was present with them; as he always was while they continued faithful worshippers of him. The translation of Onkelos is here very remarkable; which is, "The Lord thy God, his word is thy help:" which plainly denotes another Divine person, the same with Jehovah.

Ver. 2. When ye are come nigh unto the battle,] Are about to give or receive the assault.

The priest shall approach and speak unto the people,] The Jews say there was a priest appointed for this very purpose, whom they call Mashuach Milchama, "anointed of war," he being set apart, as they say, to this office by an unction, and that with the same oil with which the king was anointed withal. His office was to blow with the trumpets, to make the following speech unto the army, when they were preparing to join battle; and when they first went out, to exhort all new builders, planters, and married men to return back; and when they were drawn up in battalia, to exhort all that were faint-hearted to leave the army and go home (see Num. xxxi. 6). A great many of the Jewish Doctors thus explain this, particularly Maimonides, who may serve instead of all. See Schickard, Jus Regium, cap. 5. Theor. 18, and Hottinger, in his Histor. Eccles. Seculum xvi. par. ii. p. 689, 690, &c. where he produces an excellent discourse out of R. Levi Barzelonita's Catechism, to show the office of this πολεμάρχιστος, "anointed for the war;" and the reason why he was appointed to it. For soldiers (saith he) in the time of war, have great need to be heartened and confirmed in their resolution. And because the more honorable any one is, the more willingly men hearken to him; there the law required, that he, who was to encourage others, should be a select person himself, and a priest, to whom they would be apt to pay a great reverence.

Ver. 3. Shall say unto them, &c.] Going from one battalion (as we now speak) unto another: or else, ordering the officers (mentioned ver. 5), to go about and speak everywhere that he did at the head of the army. And he was to speak in the Hebrew language, and no other, as the Jews say, in Mischna Sota. cap. 8. sect. 1. And they have a conceit, that the Romans learnt both the form of encamping out of Moses's law, and also to make orations to their soldiers before they went to fight, as J. Wagenseil observes out of Shilte Hagibborin: though it is more reasonable to think, that common sense taught those that were leaders of others to encourage them to follow them.

Ye approach this day unto battle against your enemies:] Who often appeared very formidable, by the vast number of their horses and chariots, which the Israelites wanted.

Let not your hearts faint,] So we well translate the Hebrew word, be soft or tender. Which though it be a quality highly commendable with respect to God (2 Kings xxii. 19), yet the contrary became them towards their and his enemies.

Fear not, and do not tremble,] Trembling, or as the Hebrew word is, "making haste," i. e. running away, is the effect of fear.

Neither be ye terrified] Sometimes a great dread of danger made men run away; and sometimes so dismayed them that they could not stir, much less strike a stroke.

Some of the Jewish doctors fancy, that the four several words here used are opposed to so many actions of their enemies, whereby they hoped to strike a terror into them. "Let not your hearts faint," when your enemies brandish their swords, and clash them one against another. "Fear not," when you hear the prancing of their horses, and the terrible rattling of their chariots. "And do not tremble," when they shout, as if they were sure of victory. "Neither be ye terrified," when ye hear the trumpet sound an alarm to the battle. So Moses Kotzensis (see Schickard, cap. 5. Theor. 16. p. 115). And such a passage Wagenseil observes out of Philostratus, lib. ii. cap. 5, upon the Gemara of Sota, cap. 8. sect. ii. p. 876.

Ver. 4. For the Lord your God is he that goeth with

5 ¶ And the officers shall speak unto the people, saying, What man is there that hath built a new house, and hath not dedicated it? let him go and return to his house, lest he die in the battle, and another man dedicate it.

6 And what man is he that hath planted a vineyard, and hath not yet eaten of it? let him you.] Sometimes the ark of God's presence went before them, when they entered into Canaan (Josh. iii. 3, 10, 11, &c.), and in the midst of them, when they compassed Jericho (Josh. vi. 9). So that God was properly then said to go with them, or "in the midst of them," as the Vulgar Latin here translates it. And at all other times he was present, by his power, to aid them, especially against the people of Canaan, with whom their battles were said to be the wars of the Lord.

To save you.] To preserve them by the defeat and overthrow of their enemies.

Ver. 5. The officers shall speak unto the people,] This the Jews, particularly Abarinel, think was spoken by the priest before mentioned, and then proclaimed by the officers, called shoterim, of whom I have observed enough before, xvi. 18, and other places. They that would see more may consult J. Wagenseil upon that title, in the Mischna called Sota, cap. 8. p. 854. But by whomsoever this was spoken, it seems most likely to have been delivered before they drew nigh to the battle (see ver. 2), at the first mustering of the army.

What man is there that hath built a new house, and hath not dedicated it?] i. e. Hath not yet dwelt in it. For at their first entrance to dwell in a house, they made a feast, which being the first meal they made there, was called chanach, or dedication: as the same Wagenseil observes out of Michlol Jopli (see in cap. 8. Sota, sect. 2. annot. 3). And because a year is allowed to a man to enjoy his wife, before he be obliged to go to the wars (xxiv. 5), they allow the same time in these other cases, for the enjoyment of a new house, or of a vineyard; as many have observed, particularly Selden (lib. iii. De Synedr. cap. 13. n. 1, and Schickard, in his Jus Regium, cap. 5. Theor. 16, 17). And they understand this, not only of a new-built house, but of a house newly come into a man's possession, either by succession, purchase, or gift; yet not of such houses as were not fit for habitation, as Mr. Selden reports their opinion (lib. iii. De Uxor. Hebr. cap. 3). In which he seems to have forgot himself: for the Mischna in Sota, cap. 8. sect. 2. saith expressly, this is to be understood of him that built a house, wherein to lay straw, to make a stable, a barn, or a granary: because, as Wagenseil there notes, such places might in case of necessity, be turned into a dwelling house.

Let him—return to his house, lest he die in the battle.] This was allowed in those wars only which they made voluntarily but not of those which were ex precepto, by the Divine commandment, against the seven nations of Canaan and Amalek, in which every man was bound to engage. And so are the other cases, which here follow, to be understood, as all the Jewish writers agree.

Another man dedicate it.] First enjoy it: for this word here does not denote any consecration (as in other places), but beginning to use a thing; which in our English language (as Mr. Selden observes in the place forenamed) we call "taking handsel of it;" and so the Spanish Jews express it in their translation.

Ver. 6. What man is he that hath planted a vineyard, and hath not yet eaten of it?] Which he could not lawfully do for the first three years after it was planted (see Lev. xix. 29, &c.). And in the fourth year also go and return unto his house, lest he die in the battle, and another man eat of it.

7 And what man is there that hath betrothed a wife, and hath not taken her? let him go and return unto his house, lest he die in the battle, and another man take her.

8 And the officers shall speak further unto the the fruit of it was to be carried to Jerusalem, and eaten there; after which, the fruit of the fifth year was wholly his own, when it was no longer sacred (as the Hebrew word chillel signifies), but common for every body's use. Aben Ezra takes the word in the sense of rejoicing; as if he had said, "Who hath planted a vineyard, and hath not danced in it:" for that was the custom (he saith) when they first enjoyed the fruits of their vineyards. And to this the LXX. seem to have had respect, when they translated it, οὐκ εὐφράθη ἐξ αὐτοῦ, "he hath not been made merry by it." But the other notion is more proper; and the Jews understand it, not only of vineyards, but of all other plantations wherein there were fruit-trees fit for food, if there were five of them planted together in good order, such as R. Solomon and Wagenseil have described; and see Selden, Uxor. Hebr. lib. iii. cap. 3. p. 334.

Let him also go and return unto his house, lest he die in the battle.] The ground, both of this and the foregoing proclamation (and of the next also), seems to have been, that the minds of such men were commonly very much disturbed, to think of leaving what they had taken a great deal of pains about, and enjoy nothing of it; which would naturally make them fight with less courage. So R. Solomon. And Josephus much to the same purpose: μή πόθῳ τούτων φειδόμενοι τοῦ ζῆν, &c. "lest, out of a longing desire after these things, they should be sparing of hazarding their lives; and, reserving themselves for their enjoyment, not fight manfully." But many think this was a bare concession to such persons; who, if they could overcome their affection to all things, but the safety of their country, might remain in the camp, and go to battle. Yet Abarinel disputes strongly against this, and will have all these to be precepts, enjoying such persons as are here mentioned, not to stay in the army, but to return home.

Ver. 7.] The Jews interpret this law, either of one who had espoused a wife, and not yet brought her home; or of one that had but newly completed his marriage. And whether he had married a widow or a virgin, an old woman or a young, it was the same thing. Yea, they extend it to him who had married his brother's wife; but not to him who had married a person prohibited to him by the law, or him that took his own wife again, whom he had formerly put away, because she was not a new wife, as the phrase is, Deut. xxiv. 5, where the time being limited, how long such a man should be free from the war, viz. for one year, they extend it, as I said, to the other two cases; that so long men might enjoy a new house, or a vineyard, after the first use of them, as the law allowed them to enjoy a wife before they went to war (see Selden, lib. iii. Uxor. Hebr. cap. 3. and Schickard in his Jus Regium, cap. 5. Theor. 17). And it must be confessed, that this is a law of great equity, founded in nature, that conjugal love should not be disturbed; but have some time to knit into a strong and stable affection, by an uninterrupted conversation together in its beginning. The Jews were so favorable in this matter, that they say, if five brethren were in the war together, and one of them was slain, leaving a widow without issue, all the remaining four returned home; because every one of them, in their order, people, and they shall say, What man is there that is fearful and fainthearted? let him go and return unto his house, lest his brethren's heart faint as well as his heart.

9 And it shall be, when the officers have made an end of speaking unto the people, that they shall make captains of the armies to lead the people.

10 ¶ When thou comest nigh unto a city to fight against it, then proclaim peace unto it.

11 And it shall be, if it make thee answer of peace, and open unto thee, then it shall be, that all the people that is found therein shall be in case those before him refused, was to raise up seed to his dead brother.

Ver. 8. The officers shall speak further] Make this new proclamation throughout the camp.

What man is there that is fearful and fainthearted?] This some of the Jews understand of a natural timorousness, which makes men quake at every danger; and others refer it to those that were old, in whom that heat and vigor, which make men valiant, were quite abated. Upon which account they would not admit one who had no children to go to war (if we may believe Maimonides), because he was not thought masculine enough; or rather, because they would not cut off all hope of his having posterity. But there are those who understand this of the terrors of an evil conscience (See Sota, cap. 8. sect. 5). For they did not do as we are wont in these days (who send the wickedest villains into the wars); but if they knew any man to be guilty of a great crime, thrust him out of the army, lest they should all fare the worse for having him among them (see Schickard, in his Jus Regium, cap. 5. Theor. 17. p. 124).

Let him go and return unto his house, lest his brethren's heart faint!] For the cowardice of some might enfeeble the rest. Yet all these who were thus dismissed, were bound (if required) to furnish the army with victuals and water, to clear the ways, and to take up their quarters; as it is in the foregoing place in Sota, cap. 8, where Joh. Wagenseil observes, that they, who restrain these offices only to the fearful, are mistaken.

Ver. 9.] This shows that what I noted, ver. 5, is true; that the foregoing proclamation was made before they marched forth to the war: for how should they march till there were captains chosen, to lead the several armies (as those companies, into which they were divided, are called), which was not done till he had spoken all the forenamed things. And if we translate the words as they may be out of the Hebrew [they shall place or set captains of the host in the head, or the front, of the people], still it must be supposed, that this was done before they stirred a foot; for no order could be observed without leaders.

Ver. 10.] I have often noted, that there were two sorts of war which the Jews undertook: one by the Divine commandment against the seven nations of Canaan; another voluntarily, when they themselves found just cause to make war upon any other neighboring nation. Now this precept many of the Jews will needs understand only concerning the latter sort of war; for the Canaanites were to be utterly destroyed, without mercy. But Maimonides and Moses Kotzensis take it to belong to both sorts of war. So the former of them in express words: "It was not lawful to make war upon any one whatsoever, before they offered them terms of peace," &c. Only they think the Ammonites and Moabites were to be excepted by that law (xxiii. 6): yet they temper it tributaries unto thee, and they shall serve thee.

12 And if it will make no peace with thee, but will make war against thee, then thou shalt besiege it:

13 And when the Lord thy God hath delivered it into thine hands, thou shalt smite every male thereof with the edge of the sword:

14 But the women, and the little ones, and the cattle, and all that is in the city, even all the spoil thereof, shalt thou take unto thyself; and thou shalt eat the spoil of thine enemies, which the Lord thy God hath given thee.

thus; that if those nations desired peace of themselves, it was to be granted to them, though not offered. And the most ancient writers of the Jews say, that Joshua sent three messages to the seven nations of Canaan before he invaded them, though he undertook the war with a command from God to destroy them; viz. if they did not submit to the summons which was sent them, either to flee, or to make peace; which was the subject of the first two messages. The next was a denunciation of war against them, as they say in the Jerusalem Talmud, quoted by Mr. Selden, lib. vi. De Jure Nat. et Gent. cap. 13, and see the learned J. Wagenseil, in Annot. upon Sota, p. 845. Maimonides was of opinion, that the Gibeonites had not heard of these proclamations, which made them use craft to procure mercy from the Israelites. But P. Cunæus thinks it more probable, that they had refused, at first, to submit to Joshua's summons; but seeing him victorious, they betook themselves to that artifice, mentioned in the book of Joshua, when they could not hope for peace by any other means (lib. ii. De Republ. Hebr. cap. 20).

Ver. 11. If it make thee an answer of peace, and open unto thee.] Accept of the conditions offered to them, which were three. First, that they should take upon them the observation of the several precepts of the sons of Noah, and consequently renounce idolatry. Secondly, pay them a yearly tribute: and thirdly, become their subjects (see Selden, lib. vi. De Jure Nat. et Gent. cap. 4, and Schickard, in his Jus Regium, cap. 5. Theor. 16).

All the people that is found therein shall be tributaries!] Here are two of the conditions before mentioned; and the first was necessarily supposed, because the Israelites were not to suffer any of their gods to remain among them. For though by servicing the Israelites is not meant being made their slaves, yet it imports that they were to live in due subjection to them as their governors, who might employ them in their public works, as repairing the king's palace, the walls of cities, &c.

Ver. 12.] Without any further summons to yield upon conditions of peace.

Ver. 13. When the Lord thy God hath delivered it into thine hands.] Of which they were not to doubt, ver. 4.

Thou shalt smite every male thereof!] Which was a just punishment for their obstinacy; of which the men, who were here condemned to destruction, were the authors, and suffered the more justly, because they were told, no doubt, beforehand, that if they did not yield when conditions were offered to them, they must expect this execution.

Ver. 14. But the women, and the little ones.] Who had not offended, by rejecting conditions of peace, nor could do any harm. And by little ones are to be understood male children, as well as female.

And the cattle,—even all the spoil thereof.] Money, household-stuff, and all manner of goods.

15 Thus shalt thou do unto all the cities which are very far off from thee, which are not of the cities of these nations.

16 But of the cities of these people, which the Lord thy God doth give thee for an inheritance, thou shalt save alive nothing that breatheth :

17 But thou shalt utterly destroy them ; namely, the Hittites, and the Amorites, the [Shalt thou take unto thyself, &c.] This was granted to them as a reward of their service in the war.

Ver. 15.] This clemency to the women and little ones, is limited to those that were not inhabitants of the land of Canaan ; who, in the following verses, are ordered to be otherwise treated. For by the laws of war among all nations, the conqueror might use those whom he subdued as he pleased. See Grotius, lib. iii. De Jure Belli et Pacis, cap. 4. sect. 5, where, among other things, he quotes that saying of Marcellus in Livy, Quicquid in hostibus feci, jus belli defendit, whatsoever I have done with enemies, the right of war defends it."

Ver. 16. But of the cities] The cities of the land of Canaan.

Thou shalt save alive nothing that breatheth :] i. e. Neither man, woman, nor child, as we speak. But their cattle, (except in a few cases, when they were appointed to be a cherem, i. e. accursed) were not to be killed, as appears from Josh. xi. 14. And the slaughter of all the people, is to be understood only in case they did not surrender when they were summoned, but rejected the conditions of peace that were offered to them. After this, no mercy was to be had upon them (see Exod. xxiii. 32). In which their condition was worse than any other people's, whose men were only to be slain (ver. 14.), but not women and children. For which difference there was a great reason, as I shall show presently ; but if we could see none, we ought to consider that it was done by God's command ; who, as he is most just and merciful, so hath a greater right over men, than we have over beasts, as Grotius well observes ; who alleges many examples of the like practice in the heathen world, both among Greeks and Romans (see lib. iii. De Jure Belli et Pacis, cap. 4. sect. 9).

Ver. 17. Utterly destroy them ;] After they had slighted all offers of peace. Some of the Jews, indeed, have been so merciful as to think this not a command, but a permission ; which warranted them to kill all, without any distinction of sex or age ; yet did not so enjoin it, but that they might, after they had taken a city, spare such as repented, and offered to become proselytes of the gate. This was the opinion, one would think, which anciently prevailed, as Selden observes (lib. vi. De Jure Nat. et Gent. cap. 16), because we find the relics of these people often mentioned in the Bible. And this is agreeable also to the law of nations, that such as beg mercy should be spared ; which flowed from the ancient right which such persons were thought to have to it, as David Chytraeus observes out of Thucydides, lib. iii. and the known verse of the oracle, Μὴς ἱκίτας ἀδικεῖν, ἱκίτας ἱεροῦ τε καὶ ἀγροῦ.

"Not to hurt supplicants, who are sacred, and acquitted of their offences." He doth not mention the place where this oracle was uttered ; but Ezekiel Spanhemius hath lately observed out of Pausanias, that it was at Dodone. See observations in Callimachi Hymnum in Dianam, ver. 123, where he notes, that from hence Jupiter was called ἱκίσιος, because he was accounted a severe and implacable avenger of all violence done to supplicants. And they are sup-pliants, and the Perizzites, the Hivites, and the Jebusites ; as the Lord thy God hath commanded thee :

18 That they teach you not to do after all their abominations, which they have done unto their gods ; so should ye sin against the Lord your God.

19 ¶ When thou shalt besiege a city a long pliants (says the same Chytraeus) who confess their sin, and acknowledging they deserve punishment, give themselves up to the pleasure of the conqueror ; but beg the punishment may be mitigated by mercy and clemency.

Namely, the Hittites, &c.] He distinctly mentions the nations which were to be utterly destroyed, that this severity might be extended no further. And so he had done before, vii. 1, where he mentions seven nations, though here are only six, the Girsagshites being omitted. The reason of which Maimonides (in Hileoth Melachim) thinks to be, that they upon the first summons of Joshua fled the country into Africa ; and therefore are not named in Josh. ix. 1, 2, among those that "gathered themselves together to fight against Israel." But I take the true reason of this to be, that the Girsagshites were a people mixed among the rest, and did not live in a separate part of the country by themselves ; but that they opposed Joshua, as well as others, and were delivered into his hand, appears from Josh. xxiv. 11. Now this looks like a great cruelty, to kill so many nations ; till we consider who these people were, that God commanded to be utterly extirpated, viz. most abominable idolaters, who offered their children to Moloch, as a piece of pious worship ; magicians, witches, necromancers ; and guilty of all those filthy lusts mentioned in Lev. xviii. For which crimes God thought them not fit to live any longer upon the face of the earth ; and therefore commanded them to be utterly destroyed in this war, which was undertaken by his order, and called therefore the war of the Lord. And so was that against Sihon and Og, who were likewise Amorites, and upon that score rooted out by God's order, Numb. xxi. ult. Dent. ii. 34. For it was mercy to others not to suffer such a wicked generation to live.

Ver. 18. That they teach you not to do after all their abominations.] Here is the great reason given of the forenamed severe execution, that if they had been spared, they would have infected the Israelites with their filthy idolatry. Which some make an argument why peace was not to be proclaimed to these nations (ver. 10.), because they were so wicked, that on no terms it was fit to suffer them to live. But they that object this against what was before said, forget, or do not consider, that the great condition of peace with them was, that they should renounce their idolatry ; and then there was no such danger in sparing them. And this was so settled in the opinion of the ancient Jews, that, after they had taken a city, they thought, upon these terms, there was room for mercy. So the book Siphri, upon these very words, "lest they teach you to do after all their abominations." From whence it is to be observed (saith that author), "if they repented, the Israelites might let them live." And so R. Solomon himself : "It is to be understood, that if they repented, and became proselytes, it was lawful to receive them."

So should ye sin against the Lord] Both by suffering them to live, and imitating them in their wickedness.

Ver. 19. Thou shalt not destroy the trees thereof] It is very plain that he speaks of fruit-trees, such as bear apples, olives, dates, &c. which were to be preserved both in war and in peace: except in a few cases. In war, if the enemy made advantage of them, for their archers to lurk and shelter themselves behind them, by which the Israelites were much annoyed, then they think they might be cut down to shorten the siege. And in peace, if they did not bring forth fruit, or if the fruit would not be so profitable as the wood would be for building, and other uses; or if they hindered the growth of better trees: in all these cases they might be cut down, as the Jewish doctors resolve. Who when they please, mind the reason of a law, and not the bare words; insomuch, that they extend this law to a great many other things, which they say might not be destroyed, if they were useful and profitable. No houses, for instance, nor garments, nor household-stuff; nor were they to stop up fountains, &c. (see Selden, lib. vi. de Jure Nat. et Gent. cap. 15, and Guil. Shickardus in Jus Regium, cap. 5. Theor. 18).

[For the tree of the field is man's life] The word life is not in the Hebrew text; but we add it to make out the sense. In which we follow many good authors among the Jews, particularly Aben Ezra, who observes many such elliptical, i. e. concise forms of speech in Scripture. As in 1 Sam. xvi. 20, where an "ass of bread" is an ass loaded with bread. So here the tree is a man, i. e. the life or support of man. Just as (xxiv. 6) it is said a man should not take the upper or nether millstone to pledge, ki nephesh hu, "because it is his life," i. e. that whereby he gets his livelihood. But there are a great many who translate the words by way of interrogation (and the Hebrew will bear it), and, joining them with those that follow, make this the sense, "Is the tree of the field a man, that it should come against thee in a siege?" So the Vulgar, the Greek, and the Arabic translation, and the Chaldee paraphrast, and Josephus, as Mr. Selden observes (lib. vi. De Jure Nat. et Gent. cap. 12.), as much as to say, They need not fear any danger from the trees, as if they were soldiers that could fight against them. And if this sense do not seem dilute (as some have censured it), there is no need of rendering the words by way of interrogation, but only of repeating the word not out of the foregoing words, in this manner, "Thou shalt not cut them down, for the tree of the field is not a man," &c. Of this there are many examples, as Glassius and our Gataker have shown. And thus R. Bechai among the Jews expounds these words; and the famous Abarbanel, who thus glosses upon them: "It is not decent to make war against trees, who have no hands to fight with thee, but against men only." And this sense Grotius follows, lib. iii. De Jure Belli et Pacis, cap. 12. sect. 2. where he produces Philo for this opinion, and Josephus, who says, "If trees could speak, they would cry out that it was unjust, that they who were no cause of the war should suffer the mischiefs of it." And thus Onkelos translates these words, and those that follow: "For the tree of the field is not as a man, that it should come against thee in the siege;" that is, they had no cause to fear trees, and therefore should not hurt them. But this is a reason against cutting down any trees whatsoever; whereas Moses speaks only of fruit-trees. From whence Grotius thinks that saying of the Pythagoreans took its original, ἕμπερον φυτόν καὶ ἔχκαρον, &c., "trees that do not grow wild, and bear fruit, ought not to be hurt, much less cut down." And yet it seems to be more agreeable to the Hebrew words, than our marginal translation, which makes this sense, "That there are trees of the field sufficient to employ in the siege;" so that they need not cut down fruit-trees to carry it on.

20 Only the trees which thou knowest that they be not trees for meat, thou shalt destroy and cut them down; and thou shalt build bulwarks against the city that maketh war with thee, until it be subdued.

Ver. 20. The trees which thou knowest that they be not trees for meat, thou shalt destroy] If it were necessary for the raising bulwarks (as it here follows), or otherways to distress the enemy, they had liberty to cut down trees that did not bear fruit; but not merely to make waste and desolation.

Thou shalt build bulwarks against the city that maketh war with thee,] From whence they battered the city and threw great stones into it; as well as begirt them round, that no provisions might be brought in to them. Thus we find they did in after times, 2 Chron. xxvi. 15. 2 Sam. xx. 15. And they must have had some such inventions in Moses's days; or else how could they take cities fortified with such high walls as are mentioned Deut. i. 28? Or to what purpose should they build bulwarks, and cast up banks, but from thence to batter the city with some engine or other?

Until it be subdued,] From these words the Jewish doctors conclude, that it was lawful to make war even upon the sabbath; because, having set down before a city, they were to proceed till it was subdued; which these words suppose might not be in a short time. Only they say, that the siege was to be begun at least three days before the sabbath. Thus these superstitious people, not thinking common reason sufficient to justify them in so plain a case, make the Scripture speak what it intended not for their warrant. See Shickard, in his Jus Regium, cap. 5. Theor. 18. where he alleges Maimonides in his Hilkoth Melachim to this purpose. And Joh. Benedictus Carpozovius produces a plainer out of Hilkoth Schabath, where he delivers their sense in these words: "A siege is to be begun three days before the sabbath; and then it may be continued every day, even upon the sabbath, until the city be taken: and this may be done in a war that is voluntarily undertaken. For thus our wise men understand these words by ancient tradition, until it be subdued."

1 If one be found slain in the land which the Lord thy God giveth thee to possess it, lying in the field, and it be not known who hath slain him :

2 Then thy elders and thy judges shall come

CHAPTER XXI.

Ver. 1. If one be found slain in the land] This follows very properly after the law he had delivered about making war; because then the bodies of dead men were most frequently found. About which the wisest lawgivers took the greatest care that inquisition should be made, how and by whom they were slain. This appears by Plato, who, in his ninth book De Legibus, hath a law something like to this, though far short of the solemnity that is here required to be used; as I shall observe in the conclusion of this statute.

Lying in the field,] The Hebrew doctors here stick too much to the letter of these words; for they will not have them reach to a dead body hanging in the air upon a tree, or hid in the sand or dust, or floating upon the water, which is extremely absurd.

Ver. 2. Then thy elders and thy judges shall come forth.] The great Sanhedrin were to send forth some of their members (so the Jews interpret it) to do what here follows. And indeed it may be thought that none but they could take care of this matter, the doubt being to which of the neighboring cities (where the other judges lived) it belonged. Therefore the paraphrase ascribed to Uzielides saith, "Two of the wise men or elders, and three of the judges, were sent by the great Sanhedrin about this business" (see Selden, lib. iii. De Synedr. cap. 7. n. 2).

Yet he observes, in another part of that most learned work (lib. ii. cap. 7. n. 3), that there was a sort of elders who were not ordained by laying on of hands, but only were venerable persons for their age and prudence, who, some think, might serve for this employment. And they called such elders ziekne hashuck, "elders of the street, or vulgar elders." But none, I think, hath discoursed more critically upon these words, thy elders, and thy judges, than our Mr. Thorndike; who observes, that there had been judges constituted to determine causes by Jethro's advice (Exod. xviii.), the greater causes being reserved for Moses alone. For whose assistance God afterward appointed seventy elders (Numb. xi.), who made up the great court of judgment in that nation. Now they of this great consistory are called "the elders of Israel;" but they of other consistories, or inferior courts, are called, barely elders, or "elders of such a city." See Review of the Rites of the Church, p. 70. where he alleges this very place for it; and by thy elders, understands the elders of Israel; the lower elders being mentioned in the next verse. And so those of the great consistory are commonly called in the gospel: and in like manner, "the scribes of the people," and thy scribes, signify there those of this high court. Whereas the bare name of scribes is extended further, to the inferior doctors of the law. As also the name of rulers, and that of "rulers of the people," are to be understood with the like difference.

They shall measure unto the cities which are round about him that is slain:] That is, if it were dubious forth, and they shall measure unto the cities which are round about him that is slain :

3 And it shall be, that the city which is next unto the slain man, even the elders of that city shall take an heifer, which hath not been what city lay nearest to the dead body, as it sometimes happened. But commonly, it is probable, at the first view they easily discerned this, and so did not trouble themselves to measure. It is a frivolous dispute in the Michna, from whence they were to measure; whether from the navel, or the nose, or the forehead: which last seems more rational to Maimonides, who calls it the centre of the body. But they did not (if we believe the Jewish doctors), in their measuring, take notice of any city wherein there was not a court of twenty-three elders; and Jerusalem was always excepted (see Selden in the place forenamed, n. 3. and L'Empereur upon Bava-kama, p. 173), and Wagenseil upon Sota, p. 899. If the dead body lay nearest to the country of the gentiles, then they did not measure at all; but it was presumed the man was killed by them.

Ver. 3. The city which is next unto the slain man,] From whence it might be presumed the murderer came, or was fled thither, as Abarbinel discourses.

Even the elders] Who were different from the elders before mentioned (see the foregoing verse), for they returned to Jerusalem when they had seen the body buried, if there was no discovery of the murderer: and then the senators of the city next to the dead body, who were twenty-three, performed what is here ordered.

Shall take an heifer,] That was not above two years old; for if it were a day more, they may not use it for this purpose, as Maimonides and others affirm. Yet the Scripture, in other cases, mentions one of three years old (Gen. xv. 9. Isa. xv. 5. Jer. xviii. 5), as Wagenseil observes upon the Mischna of Sota, cap. 9. sect. 3. annot. 2. If two cities happened to be equidistant from the dead body, they then joined together to provide this heifer.

Which hath not been wrought with,] Never used in ploughing the ground.

Not drawn in the yoke;] This may seem to be included in the foregoing expression, as Maimonides observes; but it is added, he thinks, to signify, that if it had been employed in any other labor, it became improper for this use. Such heifers were accounted by the heathen to be most acceptable to their gods, as appears by Homer, in whom Diomedes and Nestor promise such an offering to Pallas (see Bochart lib. ii. Hieroz. cap. 33. p. 1. out of Iliad K. and Odysse. 6.

But there was a particular reason for such a one in this case (wherein the heifer was not to be offered), that it might the better represent, as many think, the person that had committed this murder, who was a son of Belial, subject to no law, and deserved to be beheaded as this heifer was. It is not required that it should be without blemish, as those heifers were to be that were offered at the tabernacle: but it sufficed if it had never been accustomed to the yoke. Yet this is not to be taken without all limitation; for if it wanted any member, or were diseased, it might not be wrought with, and which hath not drawn in the yoke;

4 And the elders of that city shall bring down the heifer unto a rough valley, which is neither cared nor sown, and shall strike off the heifer's neck there in the valley :

5 And the priests the sons of Levi shall come near; for them the LORD thy God hath chosen to minister unto him, and to bless in the name of the LORD; and by their word shall every controversy and every stroke be tried :

6 And all the elders of that city, that are next unto the slain man, shall wash their hands over the heifer that is beheaded in the valley :

7 And they shall answer and say, Our hands have not shed this blood, neither have our eyes seen it.

8 Be merciful, O LORD, unto thy people employed in this service, as Wagenseil observes out of Maimonides, in the place before named, p. 907.

Ver. 4. The elders of that city shall bring down the heifer] Their cities, it seems, were commonly seated on hills or high grounds.

Unto a rough valley,] The Hebrew word nachal signifies both a valley and a torrent. The LXX., Josephus, and the Vulgar, understand it as we do; and the following words favor this interpretation. But the Talmudists and the rabbins, who generally follow them, take it to signify a torrent, which is the sense of Maimonides himself; and the next word, ethan (which we translate rough), they interpret a rapid torrent. Chaskuni thinks there is some reason for this in the sixth verse, where they are required to "wash their hands over the heifer" in the water that is of the brook. I see nothing to hinder the putting both senses together, torrents being wont to run down violently from the mountains, through the valleys which lie beneath them, which is the cause that the same word signifies both.

Which is neither cared] Or rather, ploughed. Nor sown,] Being a stony, craggy ground, representing the horridness of the murder, and the cruelty and hardness of the man's heart who committed it. They that follow the other interpretation of nachal, understood the foregoing words, asher lo jeabeth bo, which we translate "neither cared," as if they signified the torrent did not serve to water the neighboring ground: and these words to be meant of the soil which lay next to the torrent, in which nothing was sown. And, besides this variety, there are those who take ethan not to signify either that which is hard or rapid, but the most fertile ground: So R. Bechai, and lately R. Jac. Abendana, in his marginal notes upon Michal Jophi, where he gives this reason for it; that the inhabitants of each city might be the more careful to prevent such murders, being in danger otherwise to lose the best ground belonging to their inheritance. For the land where the body was found (if we may believe the Mischna) was never to be sown any more (see Sota, cap. 9, sec. 5).

Strike off the heifer's neck] Coming behind the heifer (saith the Mischna), as the murderer was supposed to have treacherously surprised the slain man; and should have been thus used, if he could have been found.

Ver. 5. The priests] See ch. xvii. 9. 18. xviii. 1. Shall come near;) To see all performed according to the law, and to pray to God for the country in the words prescribed, ver. 8.

For them the Lord thy God hath chosen] See Exod. xxviii. 1, &c. Numb. vi. 23, &c.

By their word shall every controversy and every stroke be tried;) They did not determine all matters whatsoever, but all of this nature; in which the law appointed them to take care things were done according to it. As in the killing the red heifer; the examination of the woman suspected of adultery by the water of jealousy; the leprosy, whether in men, or houses, or garments. Thus the Hebrews explain these words (see Selden, lib. ii. De Synedr. cap. 8). And so Bonfrerius here acknowledges, that they did not come hither as judges, but as directors; and that they might purge themselves, together with the elders, from all guilt of this crime.

Ver. 6. All the elders] If there were never so many elders in the city, they were all to clear themselves by doing what follows.

Shall wash their hands over the heifer, &c.] In the water of the brook which flowed through the valley; protesting their innocence, in the words prescribed in the next verse. So Chaskuni glosses, "As our hands are clean, so are we from the guilt of this blood." See Wagenseil upon Sota, p. 910. who thinks Pilate had respect to this rite when he condemned our Saviour (Matt. xxvii. 24), notwithstanding all that learned men have said to the contrary.

Ver. 7. They shall answer] Being asked, perhaps, whether they knew any thing of this murder.

Our hands have not shed this blood, neither have our eyes seen it.] That is, they professed solemnly they knew not who shed it, nor how the man came to be slain. And the Michna beforementioned adds, that they said (for how can any one think that elders would be murderers?), "This man did not come into our city that we know of, and dismissed without necessary provisions; nor was seen by us, and permitted to go away without company." Which Maimonides expresses more largely in his More Nevoch. par. iii. cap. 40. where he represents the wisdom of this law in these words: "The elders called God to witness that they had not neglected to secure the ways, nor to set watches to examine diligently those that travelled, saying (as our rabbins express it), 'This man was not killed through any negligence or forgetfulness which we are guilty of, in not observing our public constitutions; nor do we know who killed him.' Now, by this inquisition into the fact, by this going forth of the elders, and the striking off the heifer's head, &c. a great deal of discourse necessarily arose about this business, which made the thing public, and was a probable means of discovering the murderer, by some or other who were there, or should hear of all this." And if any one came, and said he knew the author, then they forebore to behead the heifer: but the man being apprehended, if the house of judgment did not put him to death, the king had power to do it: if he neglected it, the avenger of blood might kill him wheresoever he met him. By which it appears, that this solemn process here mentioned tended very much to detect the murderer. Unto which this also contributed, that the place where the heifer's head was struck off might never be ploughed or sowed hereafter (as I noted before), which made the owners of that ground employ their utmost diligence to find out the murderer, that their land might not lie waste for ever; for they might not so much as plant a tree upon it.

Ver. 8. Be merciful, O Lord, unto thy people Israel, &c.] The priests alone pronounced these words, as the Michna there saith; though Josephus (who often differs from the Talmudists) saith, both priests and elders prayed God to be propitious unto them, and Israel, whom thou hast redeemed, and lay not innocent blood unto thy people of Israel's charge. And the blood shall be forgiven them.

9 So shalt thou put away the guilt of innocent blood from among you, when thou shalt do that which is right in the sight of the Lord.

10 ¶ When thou goest forth to war against thine enemies, and the Lord thy God hath to prevent the like evil from falling out again in their region (see Selden, lib. iii. De Synedr. cap. 7. n. 5, 6).

The blood shall be forgiven them.] These are not the words of the priests, saith the same Mischna, but the Holy Ghost pronounces, that when they observed these rites, the guilt should be removed from them; which, in some sort, would have laid upon them, if they had taken no notice of a murder committed so near to their city, nor made inquisition after it, and expressed their abhorrence of it.

Ver. 9.] Sincerely protesting their innocence and detestation of this fact: which was to be done in the day-time, and not in the night; and the body of the heifer was to be buried, but none of it eaten, or any part employed to other use. If the murderer was found before its head was struck off, it was to be let go into the pasture among other beasts; if after, he was to suffer capital punishment, that is, to be cut off by the sword, as the Mischna before mentioned explains it, cap. 9. sect. 7.

By all this it appears, that no ancient law made such provision for the discovery and expiation of secret murders as this of Moses. For the very best of them, which is that of Plato, enacts no more than this, that if a man was found dead, and he that killed him, after a diligent search, could not be heard of, public proclamation should be made, that he who was guilty of the fact should not come into any holy place, nor any part of the whole country; for if he were discovered and apprehended he should be put to death, καὶ ἴσῳ τῆς τοῦ κακόντος χώρας ἐκβαλεθῆσθαι τὸν ἀτακτον, "and be thrown out of the bounds of the country, and have no burial" (lib. ix. De Legibus, p. 874).

Ver. 10. When thou goest forth to war] To a voluntary war against any of their neighboring nations, not against the people of Canaan, none of which were to be spared, if they stood out and fought, but destroyed by the Divine precept, which required this war.

Thou hast taken them captive.] As the manner was, to make them slaves to their conquerors.

Ver. 11. And seest—a beautiful woman.] It was indifferent whether she was a virgin or a widow, or a wife, according to the Jewish doctors.

And hast a desire unto her.] The plain meaning is, fell so passionately in love with her, as to desire to marry her, though a stranger, of another nation and religion. It is a common opinion, indeed, among the Jewish doctors, that a baser sort of passion is here indulged; for it was lawful, they imagine, for a soldier to lie with such a captive once to satisfy his lust (which some make to be the meaning of this expression, "hast a desire to her," or, as it is in the Hebrew, "hast cleaved to her,") but not repeat it, unless he would take her for his wife: which they think was allowed to military men when they were absent from their wives, to prevent greater outrages, which were wont to be committed by the heathen. But the best nations severely prohibited all such abuses, as Grotius observes, lib. iii. De Jure Belli et Pacis, cap. 4. sect. xix. 1. And though Shickard, in his Mischpat Hammelech, endeavors to make out the wisdom of delivered them into thine hands, and thou hast taken them captive,

11 And seest among the captives a beautiful woman, and hast a desire unto her, that thou wouldest have her to thy wife;

12 Then thou shalt bring her home to thine house; and she shall shave her head, and pare her nails;

this law in permitting a Hebrew soldier to enjoy a captive once (see p. 130, 131, and Mr. Selden, lib. v. De Jure Nat. et Gent. cap. 13), yet he cannot but acknowledge that some of the Jews do not allow of this interpretation, but are of opinion, that he might not touch a captive till she became a proselyte, and he took her for his wife. Thus R. Bechai, as Grotius observes in the place forenamed, sect. xix. 2, "God would have the camp of Israel holy, and not defiled with fornication, and other abominations, as the camps of the gentiles." Unto whom Alexander himself gave a better example; who being extremely taken with the beauty of Roxana, did not abuse her as a captive, but vouchsafed to marry her, and make her his wife; for which he is justly commended, both by Arrianus and by Plutarch; and therefore I think it is most reasonable to expound this law, only of taking such a captive in marriage; which Abarinel also shows is the most ancient interpretation of it, and hath the best authority on its side among the Jews. For though he acknowledges it is the common opinion of their wise men, that a soldier might lie with a fair captive once, whilst she was a mere gentile; yet herein they followed the doctors in the Babylonian Talmud, which is not of so great antiquity as the Jerusalem Talmud, where R. Johannes (in Massecheth Sanhedrin) delivers the quite contrary doctrine, that it was not lawful for any Israelite to lie with such a woman at all, till the conditions, mentioned in the following words of this law, were fulfilled, when he was to make her his wife. And according to the judgment of this R. Johannes, Abarinel explains this law in a large commentary on this place.

Ver. 12. Thou shalt bring her home] The forenamed doctors, who are so indulgent to the soldier's lust, will have this to signify, that they were to observe the rules of modesty in the camp, and not openly lie with her like beasts, but privately in their tents. Thus, Maimonides himself, More Nevochim, par. iii. cap. 41. But it is evident Moses doth not speak of any thing done in the camp, but of what was to be done when he returned to his house; where he was to dispose her, in the manner following, to be his wife.

She shall shave her head,] These and the following words are variously interpreted, some taking these things to be done to her, with a design to abate his affection to her, that he might not marry her at all; and others, to prepare her, and make her fit for his bed. For shaving her head (which every one knows was used in mourning) deprived her of one of her greatest ornaments, and made her less amiable, and consequently might extinguish his affection, which was kindled by her beauty. So Clemens Alexandrinus understands it (see lib. ii. Strom. p. 398, 399, and lib. iii. p. 456.) And many of the Hebrews are of the same mind, that these things were ordered to lessen his affection to her, by making her appear less lovely in his eyes (see Schickard's Mischpat Hammelech, cap. 5. Theor. 17. p. 134, 135). But there are others who take this to have been a kind of purification, and cleansing her from her gentilitism; and a token of her becoming a new woman, that she might be meet to be made his wife.

13 And she shall put the raiment of her captivity from off her, and shall remain in thine house, and bewail her father and her mother a full month: and after that thou shalt go unto

Pare her nails;] This likewise was a piece of cleanliness and neatness. But they who are of the other opinion translate the words, "Let her nails grow," as our marginal translation bath it, and the Arabic, and Chaldee, and the Hebrew doctors commonly understand it; which was intended to make her look ugly, and to slack his love to her. At least, it was suitable to the condition of a mourner, as she plainly was, it appears by the next verse. The Hebrew words, indeed (which are, make her nails), are dubious; from whence arose that dispute we find in the Talmud, between R. Eliezer, who expounds it pare her nails, to make them look handsome; and R. Akiba, who expounds it, let them grow. The former reasons thus: The hair and the nails are to be used alike. Now her hairs plainly ordered to be cut; and therefore so were her nails to be. But the other doctor turns it quite contrary: What was ordered about her hair, was to make her abominable; therefore this also was intended to make her appear ill-favored. And, indeed, the Hebrew word being indifferent to either sense, we must judge of the meaning by the circumstances of the place: and here they seem to lead us to R. Akiba's interpretation; which Onkelos, a most judicious paraphrast, follows; and many learned men in later times, particularly Schickard in the book before mentioned, p. 134, and Martinus Gierus De Luctu Hebræorum, cap. 14. sect. 5.

Ver. 13. She shall put the raiment of her captivity from off her,] Her fine clothes, wherein they suppose her to have been taken captive; instead of which she was to put on sordid apparel, which was the habit of mourners. This still tended to cool his love; the drift of these things being (as the Jews commonly think) to take away from her all that was inviting and tempting, that so such marriages might not be common among them.

Shall remain in thine house,] Nor stir out of doors, but be retired; as persons in a mournful condition are wont to be.

Bewail her father and her mother] Who, perhaps, were killed in the war; or rather, whom she was likely to see no more. And this also the Jews supposed might help to abate his affection to her; sorrow and grief very much spoiling one's beauty.

A full month:] So long the Jews were allowed to bewail their dead relations, or at least those who were eminent, as they did Aaron and Moses. And here I cannot but observe how Philo magnifies this constitution, and plainly shows he was of the opinion of R. Johannes before mentioned, that this captive might not be touched till all those things were performed. παντα καλως ελαστα διαταξάμενος (saith he, in his book, περι φιλασθρακίας, p. 545, &c.), "Moses ordered every thing most excellently in this law: first, in not letting the reins loose to men's desires, but restraining them for thirty days. In which time, secondly, a trial was made of his love; whether it was a furious ungovernable passion, or had something of reason in it, which advises us to do nothing suddenly, but after serious and long deliberation. And, thirdly, ελεει τον αιχμαλωτον. This was a merciful law to the captive, that, if she were a virgin, she might bewail her unhappiness, in not being disposed of in marriage by her parents: if a widow, that she had lost her first love, and was now to be married to one who would be her lord, as well as her husband."

her, and be her husband, and she shall be thy wife.

14 And it shall be, if thou have no delight in her, then thou shalt let her go wither she will;

After that] Upon these words R. Johannes grounded his opinion, that, till a full month was spent in the forementioned ceremonies, he might not lie with her.

Thou shalt go in unto her, and be her husband,] If he continued, that is, to love her at the end of the month, and she was willing to embrace the Jewish religion, in which, while she remained retired in his house, she was instructed. For the Jewish doctors agree she was to be baptized, and not merely made a proselyte of the gate (i. e. renounce idolatry), otherwise he might not marry her. And if she refused to embrace their religion entirely, Maimonides saith, they gave her a year's time to consider of it; at the end of which, if she remained still obstinate, they required her at least to observe the seven precepts of the sons of Noah, and so to become a proselyte of the gate; otherwise she was to be slain. But though she was so converted, no Jew might take her to wife; for such a marriage, Maimonides saith, was counted impious.

Those Hebrew doctors who think a soldier might enjoy her once, at the first taking her captive, have added another conceit to this, viz. that there was not only this month's time allowed her to bewail her parents, but that he was to stay two months more, before he "might go in to her and be her husband," that he might see whether she were with child or not, by his first enjoyment of her. For if she were, a great difference was to be made between that child, and those she might have by him after marriage. Concerning which, see Selden, lib. v. De Jure Nat. et Gent. cap. 13, where he observes, they make Tamar, the daughter of David, an instance of this; whose mother being a captive, they suppose he lay with her as soon as she was taken, and had this issue by her; but afterward she becoming a proselyte, he made her his wife, and she bare him Absalom. Whereby it came to pass, that there was not such a relation between her and the other sons of David by other women, but that it had been lawful for Amnon to have married her.

But all this is judged by the famous Abarbanel (upon 2 Sam. xiii.), to be very absurd; neither does he believe that David would have committed such a fact, as to lie with a woman in her gentility; nor, if he had, that this child would have been looked upon as a gentile, since he afterward married her mother. And therefore he takes those words of Tamar, ver. 13, "Speak to the king, and he will not withhold me from thee," to be a mere put-off, as we speak, to get rid of his company; which Amnon understood very well, who, knowing he could not have her to wife, proceeded to force her.

Ver. 14. If thou have no delight in her, then thou shalt let her go wither she will;] If at the month's end, or before, his mind was changed, and he did not like to take her for his wife, then he might neither meddle with her any more (as the Hebrew doctors understand it), nor keep her any longer as a slave, nor sell her, or make merchandize of her (as the text here expressly orders), but give her liberty to go whither she herself thought good. This he lost, say the Jews, by his short pleasure he took at first. For other captives, whom a man had made himself master of, by the law of war, he might employ in his work as slaves, or make money of them; but one whom he had lain with, he was either to marry, or set her at but thou shalt not sell her at all for money, thou shalt not make merchandise of her, because thou shalt have humbled her.

15 ¶ If a man have two wives, one beloved, and another hated, and they have born him children, both the beloved and the hated; and if the firstborn son be hers that was hated:

16 Then it shall be, when he maketh his sons to inherit that which he hath, that he may not make the son of the beloved firstborn before the son of the hated, which is indeed the firstborn:

17 But he shall acknowledge the son of the liberty. This they ground upon the last words of this verse, which I shall show may have another interpretation. And therefore I shall not insist upon their sense (which depends upon the same words), who think Moses speaks of his not liking her after she was become his wife, her humor, manners, and conversation, being disagreeable to him; in which case he was to give her a bill of divorce as he might do another wife, but not keep her as a slave.

Because thou hast humbled her.] It must be acknowledged that this is an usual phrase, for having had carnal knowledge of a woman, as the Scripture modestly elsewhere speaks, in the like case. It signifies so in the very next chapter of this book, Deut. xxii. 29. Judg. xix. 24. xx. 2, and many other places, where it is used for violence offered to a woman, which was the greatest affliction to her, as the Hebrew word properly signifies. From which I see no reason why we should depart in this place; for it was sufficient affliction and humiliation to a captive woman (as Carpzovius observes, in his annotations upon Schickard's book, which I have so often named), that, after she had been brought into a soldier's house, and kept there a month, having her head shaved, garments changed, &c., in hope of marriage, she was rejected at last, when it should have been consummated. And thus Abarbanel here understands the word humbled, not of his lying with her, but of all the forementioned conditions, which were imposed upon her as a preparation for his bed, and of her disappointment after she had submitted to be baptized. And, indeed, the Hebrew word denotes any sort of affliction (see Exod. i. 11. Ps. lxxxviii. 8. lxxxix. 23. xc. 15. xciv. 5, &c.).

Ver. 15. If a man have two wives, one beloved, and another hated.] That is, less loved; as the word hated sometimes signifies, Gen. xxix. 31. Matt. vi. 21. R. Solomon thinks that this case follows the other, because it might so happen, that, if a man suffered himself to be carried with too violent a passion towards such a woman as is before mentioned, it might turn into hatred, when he found her not to be agreeable to him.

And they have born him children.] Towards which it was likely he would be affected very differently, as he was to his wives.

If the firstborn son be hers that was hated.] As it fell out in the case of Leah and Rachel.

Ver. 16.] He speaks of sons; for daughters were not to have a double portion. And he speaks of sons (as the Jews will have it) born before the death of their father; to whom he divided his inheritance. For a posthumous son had not a double portion, as the Gemara upon Bathra saith (see Selden De Successionibus, cap. 7. p. 29).

Ver. 17. He shall acknowledge the son of the hated for the firstborn.] Which had his first love, and was to enjoy the effects of it.

By giving him a double portion] Of all that he was hated for the firstborn, by giving him a double portion of all that he hath: for he is the beginning of his strength; the right of the firstborn is his.

18 ¶ If a man have a stubborn and rebellious son, which will not obey the voice of his father, or the voice of his mother, and that, when they have chastened him, will not hearken unto them:

19 Then shall his father and his mother lay hold on him, and bring him out unto the elders of his city, and unto the gate of his place; in possession of when he died; but not of that which was his in reversion after his death: as Mr. Selden shows the opinion of the Jewish lawyers is, lib. De Success. cap. 6. p. 24.

The right of the firstborn is his.] By a very ancient custom, antecedent to the law, which made the firstborn the head of the family, and gave him as much more as any of his brethren of the estate belonging to it, that he might be able to maintain and support the dignity of it (Gen. xxv. 31). But if there was no son, and the inheritance was to be divided among daughters, the eldest daughter had not a double share of the estate; as Mr. Selden shows in the same book, cap. 8.

Ver. 18. If a man have a stubborn and rebellious son.] By a stubborn son, the Jews understand one that will not do as he is bidden, and by a rebellious, one that doth what he is forbidden. And they imagine this law is annexed to the foregoing, about the marriage of a soldier to a captive woman, because the issue of such marriages commonly proved refractory, or at least gave their parents great trouble. So Schickard observes out of Tanchuma. And they confirm it by an example out of Scripture, viz. the two children of David, Absalom and Tamar, who were both born of a captive woman, made a proselyte: the former of which conspired the death of his father; and the other being ravished by Amnon, was the occasion of the death of some of her brethren (Mischpat Hannelech, cap. 5. Theor. 17).

Which will not obey the voice of his father, or—his mother.] Behaved himself not only undutifully but crossly to them; and with such contempt of their authority, as argued he had not only lost all filial affection and reverence to them, but would, if he could, undo them.

Will not hearken unto them.] Is never the better for admonitions, reprehensions, and corrections, which they were bound to give him.

Ver. 19. Then shall his father and his mother lay hold on him.] It is absurd to say, as the Hebrew doctors do (in their qualifications of this law), that his parents were with their own hands to apprehend him, and bring him before the court; though it seems reasonable enough, that both father and mother should agree in the complaint against him, and desire officers might be sent to lay hold of him. In which one cannot well suppose that they would consent to have such a punishment as follows inflicted upon him, unless he were intolerable.

Bring him out unto the elders.] Who were to examine the proofs, and accordingly to pass sentence upon him. Concerning these elders, see ver. 3. 4.

Unto the gate of his place.] Where the court of judgment was wont to sit (see xvi. 13). The paternal power among the ancient Romans was so great, that they might put their children to death, as they did their slaves, without any process before a magis-

20 And they shall say unto the elders of his city, This our son is stubborn and rebellious, he will not obey our voice; he is a glutton, and a drunkard.

21 And all the men of his city shall stone him with stones, that he die: so shalt thou put trate. And this some have taken to be a natural right; and imagined God would not have commanded Abraham to kill his son, but that it was a part of his inherent power. However this be, they were not thought fit to be long entrusted with it; for God here orders, by Moses, that it should be committed to the public judges, as the most disinterested persons.

Ver. 20. They shall say unto the elders] This seems to intimate the authority of parents was still so preserved, that their testimony alone was sufficient to convict a rebellious son, without any further proof. The Hebrew doctors, indeed, are of another mind, as I shall show in the explication of what follows.

This our son is stubborn and rebellious.] This is to be understood, say they, of a son that was no less than thirteen years old a day; and so might be presumed to know his duty, and to be capable of being governed by counsel and good advice, and this is reasonable enough: but what they say concerning the time when he became his own man is monstrously absurd (see Selden, lib. ii. De Synedr. cap. 13. p. 559, 560). What they say of a daughter, not to be comprehended under this law, may be admitted, because she was not capable to do so much mischief in a family as a rebellious son.

He is a glutton and a drunkard.] These sins are nowhere made capital by the law of Moses, but when they were accompanied with rebellious disobedience to parents, who were to bring witnesses, as the Hebrew doctors say, that this son had stolen some of their goods, and sold them, that he might spend the money in these vices; under which others are comprehended, which usually attend them; and that he had done this, after he had been admonished and chastised: so that he was not to be punished as this law at last prescribes, till he was grown incorrigible. For, they say, the court was first to order him to be whipped, and not to proceed further till, upon a new complaint, it was proved that he had run into the same riotous courses since that punishment. Then, upon this second testimony (as they call it), the court gave sentence against him, that he should be stoned to death, unless the parents, before the sentence was pronounced, said they gave him their pardon. There are a great many little niceties about the quantity of meat and wine that he ate and drank, and other matters; with which I do not think fit to trouble the reader.

Ver. 21. And all the men of his city shall stone him] This is such a severe sentence, that it inclines me to think, the parents looked upon such a son as so debauched, that he would not only spend all their estate, if he had it, but was inclined to kill them, that he might get it into his own hands. For the sentence of death is denounced, elsewhere, against one that struck his father or mother (Exod. xxi. 15), or that cursed them (ver. 17). It is not said, indeed, he should be stoned, but put to death; which they interpret of strangling; this punishment of stoning being appointed for idolaters and blasphemers of God; next to whom parents are to be revered, being in God's place, with respect to their children (see upon the fifth commandment). And therefore other nations were very severe in their punishment of such children as are here described; and particularly the Romans, after the power was taken from pa-evil away from among you; and all Israel shall hear, and fear.

22 ¶ And if a man have committed a sin worthy of death, and he be to be put to death, and thou hang him on a tree:

23 His body shall not remain all night upon rents to sell them, or put them to death, and the censure of them committed to the magistrates (see Hen. Stephen, in his Fontes et Rivi Juris Civilis, p. 18). And among the Athenians, Lysias saith (in his oration against Agoratus), He that beat his parents, or did not maintain them, and provide a habitation for them, when they were in want, ἀξίως ἐστὶ θανάτου ζυμωθῆναι, "deserved to be put to death." The law indeed did not inflict that punishment, but only said ἀτιμὸς ἐστω, "let him be infamous;" that is, as they expound it, he might not come into the public assemblies, nor enter into their temples, nor wear a crown in their public festivals; and if any such persons presumed so to do, they were brought before the magistrates, who set a fine upon their heads, and committed them to prison till they paid it (see Sam. Petitus, in his Commentary upon the Attic laws, lib. ii. tit. 4. p. 163). No wonder therefore Moses ordained this punishment, when a son was come to such a degree of profligate wickedness, that he endeavored to undo his parents. Which some states have thought fit to follow in these latter ages: for David Chytræus saith, he himself saw an example of this severity at Zurich, in the year one thousand five hundred and fifty; where a disobedient son was beheaded, who had cursed his mother, and beaten her.

So shalt thou put evil away] See concerning this before upon xix. 20.

Ver. 22. If a man have committed a sin worthy of death] There were several sorts of capital punishments; viz. strangling, burning, cutting off by the sword, and stoning. Now the Hebrew doctors limit this unto such offenders as were stoned; of which punishment he speaks in the foregoing verse. But there being eighteen sorts of offenders, who were to be sentenced to this death, they put a further limitation upon these words; their tradition being, as they tell us, the "sin worthy of death" (or stoning) is only idolatry or blasphemy. So we read in the Sanhedrin, cap. 6. sect. 4. "All that were stoned were also hanged, according to the opinion of R. Eliezer: but the wise men say none were hanged but the idolater and blasphemer." And they add there, that only men, not women, were thus used; for which I can see no reason, but the sticking to the mere letter of these words; as if the word man did not comprehend both sexes.

But if we examine the Scripture, we shall find this not to be true (that no men were hanged but they that were stoned), for the king of Ai was hanged (Josh. viii. 29), and five kings more (x. 26), and they were not hanged because they were blasphemers or idolaters (for then all the rest of the Canaanites should have been so treated), but because they were such enemies of God, as had rebelliously withstood the gracious summons of surrender. And there are other examples also which confute this; as, the two traitors that murdered Ish-bosheth (2 Sam. iv. 12), and the five sons of Saul (3 Sam. xxi. 9). It is more probable, therefore, that all those whom the Judges thought to be such great offenders, that it was fit to make them very public examples, were hanged up after they had suffered the punishment of death to which they were sentenced. This seems to be denoted in the word chalta, which signifies sometimes a very great crime, as appears from Hosea xii. 8, where he speaks of the tree, but thou shalt in any wise bury him that day; (for he that is hanged is accursed of

"iniquity, which is sin:" not as if all iniquity were not sin; but some acts of iniquity were not so heinous, as to be called by that name.

Thou hang him] After he had been put to death, as appears by the foregoing words, which speak of his being put to death before this suspension: which shows that this punishment was not the same with the Roman crucifixion (as Baronius, Sigonius, Lipsius, and others, have mistaken), for they hanged men alive upon the gibbet; whereby they expired before they were taken down: but this was only hanging up their bodies after they were dead, and exposing them to open shame for a time.

On a tree:] On a piece of timber (saith the Sanhedrin) struck into the ground; out of which came a beam, whereunto his hands were tied, as they tell us in the place before mentioned: and so Schickard, in his Mischpet Hammelech, cap. 4. Theor. 14. So that his body hung in such a posture as crucified men did.

Ver. 23. His body shall not remain all night upon the tree,] This is excellently interpreted by Josephus, lib. iv. Archæol. cap. 8. Μείνας δ' ὅλης τῆς ἡμέρας εἰς διαρ τῶν ἀπάντων, διαπίσθη νεκρός. "Having remained the whole day a spectacle unto all, he was to be buried at night:" for as soon as the sun went down, the body also was taken down. Examples of which we have in the book of Joshua, viii. 29. x. 26, 27. In which he is far more sincere than their rabbins, who say the law was satisfied if they hanged up the body just before the setting of the sun, and presently after took it down again: which exposition seems to have been contrived in favour of their countrymen; for only Israelites, they confess, were to be thus exposed, not "proselytes of the gate," as Mr. Selden observes, lib. ii. De Jure Nat. et Gent. &c. cap. 12.

For he that is hanged is accursed of God;] The Jews interpret this clause, as if the meaning were, he was hanged "because he blasphemed God." So Onkelos himself, and the Samaritan versions, with those of the Spanish and Mauritanian Jews, as Selden observes, lib. ii. De Synedr. cap. 13. n. 4, and Hottinger in his Smegma Orientale, p. 96, 97. But though this be a common opinion among the Hebrew doctors, yet the LXX. have taken the sense right, Ὅρι κεκατηραμένος ἰπὸ Θεοῦ πᾶς χρεμάμενος ἐπὶ ξύλον. "Cursed of God is every one that is hanged on a tree." And so St. Paul, Gal. iii. with very little difference. For they observed what those doctors did not, that Moses doth not here give a reason why the man was hanged up, but why he was to be taken down from the gallows. Now what consequence is there in this, "Let him be taken down and buried, because he cursed God?" Every one sees that (though the word cursed should be taken in an active sense) this is not a right interpretation of these words: for though it had been good sense to have said, Let him be hanged, because he cursed God, yet not let him be taken down for that reason. Now such persons are here said to be accursed of God, not because they were hanged up, but because of their sin, which deserved they should be thus exposed. So St. Jerome upon Gal. iii. Non ideo maledictus quia pendet sed ideo pendet quia maledictus: "he was not accursed because he was hanged, but he was therefore hanged because he was accursed:" hanging up being a token that the man had committed a horrid crime, whereby he had incurred the high displeasure of Almighty God. So that every one who saw him hang on that fashion was to think with himself, This man was under the curse of God, because of his sin; and unless he had undergone this curse, he could not have been buried, and put into the condition of other men. But when he had undergone it for his sin, then it had been sin in the people not to have taken him down, or prolonged his suspension longer than God imposed this curse upon him. And the land had been defiled, if, after this suffering which God had appointed, they had not buried him. To this purpose Abarinell, who refutes several other accounts of this matter, particularly that of Sol. Jarchi, who thinks he was not to hang longer than till the evening, because it would have been a dishonor to the Sovereign of the world, after whose image man was made. This is followed by many, and even by Grotius himself, who gives no other reason of it, in his book De Jure Belli et Pacis, lib. ii. cap. 19. sec. 4. But this is a reason, as Abarinell notes, why he should not have been hanged up at all. It may be also usefully noted further, that they say in the tract called Sanhedrin, that not only the malefactor, but all the instruments of punishment, were to be buried at the going down of the sun. Even the tree itself, upon which he was hanged, was to be buried, "that no memory of so foul a thing might be left in the world; nor any might say, behold, this was the tree upon which such a one was hanged."

God;) that thy land be not defiled, which the Lord thy God giveth thee for an inheritance.

That thy land be not defiled,] By the stench of the body, after it putrified, as the same Abarinell expounds it, who observes, that the dead body of no creature corrupts and stinks sooner than that of a man, which is exceeding offensive to the living. For which cause, saith he, the book Sepher determines, not only that all malefactors should be buried as soon as the law here orders (that they might not imitate the manners of the Egyptians and Philistines, and such like people, who let bodies rot in the air after they were hanged up), but that every man should bury his dead the same day they died, or be deemed to have transgressed a negative precept; which may pass for a very good natural reason of it: but there is something more in it, respecting a legal pollution, under which their whole country lay, as long as an accursed thing hung openly among them; just as all that entered into the tent where a dead body lay, and all that was in it, were made unclean by it (Numb. xix. 14, 15). Upon which score St. Paul might well apply this passage to Christ crucified for us, not only because he bare our sins, and was put to death, and exposed to such shame as these sinners were, who were accursed of God; but was also taken down in the evening, in token now the guilt was removed; as the curse upon the man that was hanged ended at the going down of the sun: and as the land of Israel was pure and clean, after the dead body was taken down and buried with the tree upon which it was hanged. Joh. Coch hath well explained this, in his notes upon the Sanhedrin, cap. 6. sect. 5. whose sense in short is this: "As our blessed Saviour, while he hung upon the cross, was made a curse, and an execration; so, when, according to the law, he was taken down and buried, both he ceased to be a curse, and all they that are his."

CHAPTER XXII.

Ver. 1. Thou shalt not see thy brother's ox or his sheep go astray, and hide thyself] They were not to turn away their face, as if they did not see them, and so neglect them. And by brother is to be understood, not only an Israelite, but any man that lived among them; this being a matter of common right, and extended to their enemies as well as their friends. (Exod. xxiii. 4).

Thou shalt in any case bring them again] Not merely give notice to the owner where he saw them, but take care himself to bring them back, that they might not go further astray, and perhaps be quite lost, before the owner could have notice of them. This and many that follow are precepts of humanity, and care of each other's welfare, without which society could not be preserved.

Ver. 2. Thou shalt bring it unto thine own house,] And preserve it there, till he could send to him, or find who the owner was.

Until thy brother seek after it,] He was to give notice, by the public crier, that such a beast was with him, and that, as the Jews say, three or four times, that the owner might seek after it. But here they are pleased to make a distinction: that they were to do this, if there were marks upon the beast; but if there were none, they were not bound to cry it: which doth not seem to be reasonable (see Selden, lib. vi. De Jure Nat. et Gent. cap. 4).

Thou shalt restore it to him] He paying the charges of keeping it, from the time it was brought to his house till its being restored. But if nobody could prove a right in the beasts that were lost, they became his who found them, and he might lawfully keep them; for no other owner appearing, they were his that was in present possession of them, who did very piously, if he gave the value of them to the poor (and so the law was in many places); but he was an honest owner of them, if he kept them to himself: as Grotius observes, lib. ii. De Jure Belli et Pacis, cap. 10. sect. 11.

Ver. 3. In like manner shalt thou do with his ass, &c.] In all other cases of like nature, the same law was to be observed.

Thou mayest not hide thyself.] Pass them by with neglect, or pretend they did not see them.

Ver. 4. Thou shalt not see thy brother's ass or his ox fall down—and hide thyself] Turn away, as if they did not see the danger they were in.

Thou shalt surely help him to lift them up] This hath been explained upon Exod. xxiii. 5. I shall only add here a famous example of this sort of piety, in Alphonsus, king of Naples; who, travelling upon the road, attended by a great number of courtiers, and seeing a poor ass with a burden fall into a deep slough (whom all that went before him passed by without any regard), when he came to the place, stopped, and went himself to the driver, and lent him assistance to help the ass out of the dirt. So David Chytræus upon this place.

Ver. 5.] The last words of this place plainly indicate, that it was an idolatrous custom, which is here prohibited. For Moses and the prophets are wont to speak in these terms of utmost abhorrence concerning such matters. And nothing was more common among the heathen, than for men, in the worship of several of their gods, to put on the garments usually worn by women, and women those worn by men; particularly in the worship of Venus, women appeared before her in armor, and men in women's apparel. And thus the words literally run here in the Hebrew; "Women shall not put on the armor of a man (so the word cali frequently signifies armor, as well as other sorts of instruments, nor a man (σολην the LXX. translate it) the stole of a woman" (see Selden, Syntag. ii. De Diis Syris, cap. 4). And thus Maimonides saith he found this precept in an old magical book, that men ought to stand before the star of Venus in the flowered garment of women, and women put on the armor of men before the star of Mars (More Nevochim, par. iii. cap. 37). Servius also, upon the second book of Æneids, mentions a statue of Venus at Cyprus (in which island were anciently many colonies of Phœnicians), to whom the women sacrificed in men's garments, and the men in women's. Many other nations did the same (see 1 Ger. Vossius, lib. ii. De Orig. et Progr. Idol. cap. 27. 31. but especially our learned Dr. Spencer, lib. ii. cap. 17. sect. 1, &c.).

But setting aside all this, every one knows, that if there were no distinction of sexes made by their habits, it would open a door to all manner of impurity; for which reason, if there were no other, this law was very wise and pious.

Ver. 6. If a bird's nest chance to be before thee, &c.] By this place, among others (particularly Ps. viii. 8), it appears the word tsippor signifies all kinds of birds, and not only the smaller sort, as some have imagined, but he seems particularly to speak of clean birds, such as it was lawful for them to eat. And this pre-they be young ones, or eggs, and the dam sitting upon the young, or upon the eggs, thou shalt not take the dam with the young :

7 But thou shalt in any wise let the dam go, and take the young to thee ; that it may be well with thee, and that thou mayest prolong thy days.

8 ¶ When thou buildest a new house, then cept seems to have been given, to breed in the Jews a sense of a Divine Providence, extending itself to all creatures, and to teach them to exercise their dominion over them without any kind of cruelty.

Thou shalt not take the dam with the young : R. Menachem, mentioned both by Drusius and Bocharus, was of opinion, that it is not pity towards birds which is intended in this law, but kindness to mankind ; whom God intended by this usage of other creatures, to form unto gentleness and commiseration towards one another. But others, I think, have more truly determined, that this is a merciful constitution, with respect to birds as well as men : it being a sufficient affliction, as Maimonides calls it, to the old one to lose her young ; it being unreasonable also that men should consider only their own present interest without regard to posterity, to whom the breed ought to be continued, by letting the old one go free. Unto which those verses, commonly ascribed to Phocylides, have respect :

Μηδέ τις ὄρνιθας χαλεπῆς ἅμα πάντα ἐλίσσω,
Μητέρα δ' ἐκπρολιπέης, ἐν' ἔχθρῳ πάμυ τῆς τε νεοττούς,

i. e. "Let no man take all the birds together out of a nest ; but let the mother go, that thou mayest have young ones again of her."

Ver. 7. Thou shalt in any wise let the dam go, and take the young to thee ; For there is a great deal of ill-nature in it, to take away the liberty and life of any creature, from whom we have received a benefit ; as Bonfrerius glosses upon these words.

That it may be well with thee. Some of the Jews, from these words, have fancied, that the observation of this single precept was of such great value, as to procure for them even forgiveness of sins, and a long life ; which is such a foolish conceit, that it makes all other precepts unnecessary. The plain meaning is, that God would reward them for their kind usage even of brute creatures, if other virtues were not wanting, such as charity towards their poor neighbors. And so the Mischna, in the conclusion of the tract called Cholin, discourses very well : "If in a light precept concerning a thing which is scarce worth a farthing, the law says, 'That it may be well with thee, and thou mayest prolong thy days ;' how much more may this be expected in the weightier things of the law !"

Ver. 8. Make a battlement for thy roof. The Jews, I think, are a little too curious, in setting a mark upon the word thy, fancying he saith not simply the roof, but thy roof, to except the temple, and the synagogues, and schools, from this rule ; which were no private man's house, but belonged to the whole congregation. They say, indeed, the temple had battlements ; but not for necessity, but for ornament, because the roof of the temple was not flat, as the roof of another house was ; for nobody walked upon the temple, as they did upon their own houses, to take the air, and discourse together, or to meditate and pray (in little closets they had there), which made it necessary to have these battlements, of three feet and a half high (as the Jews say), to prevent any man's falling down, when he did not attend, but was thinking of some other thing (see Constant L'Empeur, in his annotations on Codex Middoth, p. 160).

9 ¶ Thou shalt not sow thy vineyard with divers seeds : lest the fruit of thy seed which thou hast sown, and the fruit of thy vineyard, be defiled.

ing of some other thing (see Constant L'Empeur, in his annotations on Codex Middoth, p. 160).

That the roofs of their houses were flat, which was the ground of this precept, we have many proofs in the scripture. For hither Rahab brought the spies, and covered them with the stalks of flax, which she laid upon them (Josh. ii. 6). Here Samuel communed with Saul, upon the top of the house (1 Sam. ix. 25), David also was walking upon the roof of his palace, when he saw Bath-sheba washing herself (2 Sam. xi. 2). And in the same place Absalom caused a tent to be spread, that he might go in to his father's concubines in the sight of all Israel (xvi. 22. see also Isa. xv. 3. xxii. 1. and in the New Testament, Acts x. 9). Nor was it the manner of the Hebrews only, but of the Greeks and Romans also, to make the roofs of their houses so that they might walk upon them ; and stand there to see any public show, or take the air ; as Is. Casaubon shows, in a multitude of instances, lib. iv. in Athenæum, cap. 12, where he observes also out of Pliny and Seneca, that the Roman houses wanted these battlements, which Moses here ordered in this law. By all which we may easily understand those places in the gospel, that speak of proclaiming these things on the housetop, &c. (Matt. x. 27. Luke v. 19).

That thou bring not blood upon thine house, if any man fall from thence. And be killed by the fall. For his neglect being the cause of his death, it made him guilty before God of his blood, and liable to be punished by the judges for slighting so profitable an institution as this is : which the Jews extend to a studious care about every thing that might bring a man's life in danger. For example's sake : they might not keep a mad dog, nor set up a broken ladder in their house, &c. as L'Empeur observes upon Bavakama, cap. 5.

Ver. 9. Thou shalt not sow thy vineyard with divers seeds : What he had said concerning their fields, Lev. xix. 19, he now says of their vineyards, which they were not to sow with seeds of a diverse kind : for this was an idolatrous custom, as the reason given against it plainly shows. This Maimonides saith he found in a book of the Zabii, and in one rabbi Josiah, who taught, that "these three things, wheat, barley, and grapes dried in the sun, should be sown together in the ground with one and the same east of the hand : which was so senseless a thing, that he could not but think they learnt it from the ways of the Amorites, as his words are, that is, from the wicked idolaters of the country to which the Israelites were going. For wheat being sown properly at one season of the year, and barley at another, and a vineyard being an improper place for the growth of either of them, this custom could not have its original either from God or from man, but from the devil, the author of confusion, who taught them this uncouth rite, in honor of Ceres, perhaps, and Bacchus, whom they joined in the same act of worship.

Lest the fruit of thy seed—be defiled. If the Israelites had followed this custom, it would have made both the corn and the grapes that sprung up from such seed impure, because polluted by idolatry ; the very smell of which God would not have to remain among 10 ¶ Thou shalt not plow with an ox and an ass together.

11 ¶ Thou shalt not wear a garment of divers sorts, as of woollen and linen together.

12 ¶ Thou shalt make thee fringes upon the four quarters of thy vesture, wherewith thou coverest thyself.

the Israelites, as Maimonides speaks in his More Nivochim, par. iii. cap. 37 (see Dr. Spencer, in his very learned work De Leg. Ritual. Hebr. lib. ii. cap. 18). Every one also knows, that it was unlawful for the Israelites to eat any of the fruits of the earth, till the first-fruits of them had been offered unto God; which would not have been accepted by him of such things as these, that were expressly forbidden by his law; and consequently the whole crop became unclean to them, and might not be used by them.

Ver. 10. Thou shalt not plow with an ox and an ass together.] Lest that law should be violated which we read Lev. xix. 19. "Thou shalt not let thy cattle gender with a diverse kind." So some give the reason of it; even Maimonides, in the book forementioned, par. iii. cap. 49. But it seems also to have respect to those magical rites of the idolatrous nations in those countries; who thought their fields would be more fruitful, if, according to some directions which had been given by their gods, they were thus ploughed. For one cannot well think that men, of themselves, would join together two creatures so different in their temper and motions, to draw in the same yoke, if they had not been led to it by some superstition or other. For their strength is unequal, as Aben Ezra here observes, "the strength of an ass is not as the strength of an ox." Whence it was that Ulysses, to make it be believed that he was mad, joined a horse and an ass to plough; and Homer, Odyssey. 5. would have oxen ισοφόρους, joined together; that is, ἰσως φέρουτας καὶ ἄκουτας, "equally bearing and drawing," as Bochart observes the scholiast there glosses.

The Jews commonly think this law extends to all other creatures of different species, which might not be yoked together. But some understand it so, that they might join several kinds together; provided one was not unclean and the other clean. Baal-Haturim finds this mystery in this prohibition, "That the righteous ought to have no society with the wicked." And there are those who think the apostle alludes to this, when he saith (2 Cor. vi. 14), Μὴ γίνεσθε ἑτεροζυγῶντες ἀπίστοις, "Be not unequally yoked together with unbelievers;" which Bochart himself thinks not improbable (see Hieroicoicon, par. i. lib. ii. cap. 13. and cap. 40. p. 401. where there are other reasons of this precept).

Ver. 11.] The ancients think God intended hereby to teach his people simplicity in their manners (see Bochart, in the same book, par. i. lib. ii. cap. 45. p. 491). But there was something farther in it, as I have observed upon Lev. xix. 19. to which I refer the reader. And shall only add here, that the Jews carried this so far, as not to sew a woollen garment with linen thread; nor on the contrary.

Ver. 12. Make thee fringes] What these were, is sufficiently explained upon Numb. xv. 38, 39 (see there).

Upon the four quarters of thy vesture,] They wore long garments in those countries, as most people do still at this day. And I suppose the garments of the Jews had usually four skirts: but perchance they sometimes had more or fewer than four; and in this case, if they had but three, their doctors have resolved they were not bound to make any fringes for them; but, if they had five or six, they were bound to annex

13 ¶ If any man take a wife, and go in unto her, and hate her,

14 And give occasions of speech against her, and bring up an evil name upon her, and say, I took this woman, and when I came to her, I found her not a maid:

15 Then shall the father of the damsel, and them to the four most remote quarters, in which the intermediate were included. But this is a very unreasonable subtilty; the intention of the law being, that they might be put in remembrance of God's commandments by these fringes, which therefore were to be worn in the skirts of their garments, though they had been divided into no wings or quarters at all.

Wherewith thou coverest thyself.] Which they commonly wore: and it seems to signify the uppermost garment, which covered all the rest, and was most seen; whereby they were distinguished from the people of other nations: for that was one end of these fringes, to be a distinctive mark that they were of the Jewish religion. And therefore I do not see any reason in the determination of their doctors, who say, women servants and little children were not bound to wear fringes: for though little children could not think of the commandments of God, yet it was fit they should wear the note of their religion. There is no reason neither in their resolution, when they say, that if women and servants (who were bound as much as others to observe the laws of God) would wear fringes, though they were not obliged by their constitutions, yet they might not put them on with the common form of benediction which they used. But I think they observe rightly enough, that these fringes were so peculiar to the Jews, that the Samaritans, though acquainted with the law, did not wear them. Nor do the Jews themselves at this day use them upon their upper garment: for that being no longer four-cornered (because it made them a laughing stock), they wear only under their other garments a kind of square frock, with the aforesaid tassels or pendants fastened to it (as Leo Modena relates in his history of the Jews, par. i. chap. 5). Only in their synagogues or schools, at morning prayer, every man puts over his head a square woollen garment, with the tassels fastened at each corner, which they call talith. Concerning which Bartoloccius, in his late Rabbinical Lexicon, tom. i. hath a long dissertation, p. 576, &c.

Ver. 13. If any man take a wife, and go in unto her,] Have carnal knowledge of her.

And hate her,] Do not like her; but is desirous to be rid of her.

Ver. 14. And give occasions of speech against her,] The LXX. translate it ἐπιθῆ αὐτῇ προφασιτικῶν λόγων, "lay to her charge such things (for so words sometimes signify) as are opprobrious."

Bring up an evil name upon her,] Or, as the Hebrew words are, "bring forth a name of evil, or infamy: which signifies, as Mr. Selden observes, (lib. iii. Uxor. Hebr. cap. 1. p. 321) the action itself, which he brought against her in the court of judgment. This appears from the words following.

And say, I took this woman, &c.] This was the form wherein the action was laid against her (as the same Selden there observes), in those words, as the Jews say: "Having lain with this young woman, not of full age, as her husband, I found not in her the tokens of virginity; and making inquisition into the matter, it appears to me that she hath been guilty of adultery, after I had espoused her: and these are eye-witnesses of her guilt."

Ver. 15. Then shall the father of the damsel, and her mother, take and bring forth the tokens of the damsel's her mother, take and bring forth the tokens of the damsel's virginity unto the elders of the city in the gate :

16 And the damsel's father shall say unto the elders, I gave my daughter unto this man to wife, and he hateth her ;

17 And, lo, he hath given occasions of speech against her, saying, I found not thy daughter a maid ; and yet these are the tokens of my virginity] If the accusation, as they say, was to be made good by witnesses of her adultery, then her defence was to be made, no doubt, by contrary witnesses, who endeavored to disprove the testimony which was brought against her. For so they are constrained to interpret the words we translate "tokens of her virginity;" as I shall show upon ver. 17. The Hebrews have many nice subtilties about the word damsel, with which I shall not trouble the reader (see Selden, in the forenamed place, lib. iii. Uxor. Hebr. cap. 1).

Unto the elders] The court consisting of twenty-three judges ; who had the cognizance of common, capital, and penal causes, in every city.

In the gate :] Where the court sat, as I observed before upon xvi. 18. And this may be added to what I noted there, that by this may be explained those words in the book of Job, v. 4. concerning the children of the wicked, that they are "crushed in the gate," i. e. lose their cause, and are condemned in the court of judgment, and those of the wise man, Prov. xxii. 22, "Oppress not the afflicted in the gate" i. e. do him justice, and not let him be overthrown, because he wants money to defend his cause. This appears to be the sense from the very next words (ver. 23), "For the Lord will plead their cause," &c.

Ver. 16. The damsel's father shall say unto the elders, I gave my daughter unto this man to wife.] The Jews say, the mother had no power to espouse her daughter but the father only, before she was of age. Mischna Sotâ, cap. 3. sect. 8. where Wagenseil notes, that the mother, and brethren also, had some power in this matter ; but such, that the daughter, within a time limited, might make the contract void.

He hateth her ;] Hath no affection which a husband ought to have to a wife. If she had no parents alive, the judges appointed her a guardian : and Josephus saith the next of kin were to patronize her, as if they had been her parents.

Ver. 17. He hath given occasions of speech against her.] See ver. 14. He doth not add what there follows, "and brought up an evil name upon her" (i. e. accused her publicly before you of adultery), because it is sufficiently comprehended in this.

I found not thy daughter a maid ;] As such and such give evidence.

These are the tokens] I have good witnesses to the contrary ; which are here ready to be produced before the court, to disprove the former testimony.

And they] That is, the witnesses which the father produces.

Shall spread the cloth before the elders of the city.]

Though such tokens of virginity, as are commonly understood by these words, might always be found in those countries (being very consonant to the opinion of the chiefest Arabian physicians, as Mr. Selden observes out of Avicenna, and of the Africans and other people at this day, as many authors testify, see Joh. Geusius De Victimis Humanis, par. i. cap. 9. and par. ii. cap. 2. and Wierus L. Medicarum Observationum, sect. De Hymene), especially in such virgins as the Jews say were here meant, who were under thirteen daughter's virginity. And they shall spread the cloth before the elders of the city.

18 And the elders of that city shall take that man and chastise him ;

19 And they shall amerce him in an hundred shekels of silver, and give them unto the father of the damsel, because he hath brought up an evil name upon a virgin of Israel : and she shall be his wife ; he may not put her away all his days.

years of age ; and though all that some physicians and lawyers in these parts of the world have said to the contrary is of no consideration ; yet there are weighty reasons to incline us to think, that no man of common sense would bring such an action against his wife, wherein he was sure to be cast, whether his cause was right or wrong, if these were the evidences whereby it was to be tried. For if he accused her falsely, he knew her friends were able to produce the sheet wherein they lay when they were married, with such tokens upon it as would disprove him, and render him guilty of defamation. And if he had a just ground to accuse her, because he knew they could produce no such tokens ; yet this was no proof she had been vitiated since she was espoused to him : for she might have been corrupted before ; and then he could not attain his end, which was to be rid of her, not by way of divorce (for then he must have given her a dowry, which he was desirous to save), but by having her put to death as an adulteress, which ver. 21. shows to be the present case. Such evident reasons as these have constrained the Jews to understand these words, not according to the very letter of them, but figuratively, of such witnesses produced by her parents, as convinced the other of falsity so evidently, that they made it appear as plainly as a piece of cloth that is unfolded, and laid before men's eyes to view it. And they think the Hebrew word simlah, which we translate the cloth, favors this exposition : for it never signifies a sheet, or linen-cloth, (which is wont to be called sadin, Judg. xiv. 12. Prov. xxxi. 24) but such cloth as men's garments are made of, which commonly is woollen, not linen. And so it is used in this book, Deut. x. 18. and in this very chapter, ver. 5. So that the sense is "They shall produce evident proofs, and lay them before the court, like a piece of cloth, which is spread for all that please to look upon it." Whether this be the truth or not, I will not dispute, but refer the reader to Mr. Selden, lib. iii. Uxor. Hebr. cap. 1, 2.

Ver. 18. The elders of that city shall take that man] If they were convinced that he had accused his wife falsely, he was to be delivered into the hands of the officers who executed the sentence of the court.

Chastise him ;] Condemn him to receive forty stripes save one, as both Josephus and the Talmudists agree ; and it was to be done with a scourge made of thongs of an ox's hide. The woman was dismissed with a solemn benediction ; the form of which is set down in the Jewish rituals : and as for the false witnesses against her, they were condemned to be stoned, according to the law, ch. xix. 18, 19.

Ver. 19. And they shall amerce him in an hundred shekels of silver, and give them unto the father] Who was to receive this satisfaction for the reproach which was thrown upon his family. It is something strange that Josephus should mention only πεντήκοντα σίκλους "fifty shekels" to be paid to her father, when the Scripture expressly saith a hundred (lib. iv. Archæolog. cap. 8). But it is supposed, by some, that he means fifty besides her dowry, which he was to have given her, if he had put her away : which, that he 20 But if this thing be true, and the tokens of virginity be not found for the damsel :

21 Then they shall bring out the damsel to the door of her father's house, and the men of her city shall stone her with stones that she die : because she hath wrought folly in Israel, to play the whore in her father's house : so shalt thou put evil away from among you.

22 ¶ If a man be found lying with a woman married to an husband, then they shall both of them die, both the man that lay with the woman, and the woman : so shalt thou put away evil from Israel.

23 ¶ If a damsel that is a virgin be betrothed might save, he designed to take away her life ; and therefore was punished double to what it would have cost him, if he had been so wicked.

Because he hath brought up an evil name upon a virgin] Laid the most infamous crime to the charge of an innocent virgin ; and that out of hatred to her and love to his money. For if he would have put her away, according to the law of divorce, no man could have hindered him, as Maimonides observes : but then he must have paid her fifty shekels, which they take to be the dowry of virgins, mentioned Exod. xxii. 16, 17. To keep which to himself, and be rid of her, he brought this scandalous action against her ; for which he was thus justly punished.

She shall be his wife ; he may not put her away all his days.] Besides the two former punishments, in his body and his purse, he was deprived of the common benefit which all men had who did not like their wives ; which was to sue out a divorce. Here Maimonides calls upon his readers to admire the wise ordination of God, which appears in his judgments, as well as his works. For because this man took away his wife's reputation, therefore God ordered him to be rendered vile, by being whipped : and because he basely contrived to save her dowry of fifty shekels, he ordered him to be amerced as much more : and because he indulged his lust, and sought nothing but his pleasure, therefore he was bound to keep her as long as she lived (More Nuchim, par. iii. cap. 49).

Ver. 20. But if this thing be true,] If the witnesses which appeared for her could not prove the falsity of their testimony who appeared against her.

Ver. 21. Then they shall bring out the damsel to the door of her father's house,] Where she was to be punished, as a disgrace to her parents, who had taken no better care to preserve her chastity while she lived with them.

And the men of her city shall stone her] This was the punishment of such adulteresses, except only of a priest's daughter, who, if she was guilty of this crime, was burnt alive (Lev. xxi. 19). And it plainly shows he speaks here of a woman corrupted between the time of her espousals and her husband's completing the marriage : otherwise he could not have had this capital action against her, none being put to death for simple fornication. And this Maimonides saith, in Seder Zeraim, that, from Moses to his time, it was never doubted, the woman he here speaks of was one that proved false to her husband after she was contracted to him.

Because she hath wrought folly] A great wickedness ; as the word folly signifies in Scripture, and as the Vulgar translates it.

To play the whore in her father's house :] Where she remained after her espousals, as in a safe place, till her husband brought her home to his own house.

unto an husband, and a man find her in the city, and lie with her ;

24 Then shall ye bring them both out unto the gate of that city, and ye shall stone them with stones that they die ; the damsel, because she cried not, being in the city ; and the man, because he hath humbled his neighbour's wife : so thou shalt put away evil from among you.

25 ¶ But if a man find a betrothed damsel in the field, and the man force her, and lie with her : then the man only that lay with her shall die :

26 But unto the damsel thou shalt do nothing ; there is in the damsel no sin worthy of death :

Put evil away] See ch. xix. 19.

Ver. 22.] It is not said what death, either here, or Lev. xx. 10. But the Jews say they were to be strangled : which is an opinion so settled among them, that Buxtorf saith he never saw any Hebrew book which assigned any other punishment for adultery but this. Stoning, indeed, was the punishment of her that, after her espousals, played the whore (as was noted before) between that time and her marriage : but after the marriage was completed, if she were guilty of this crime, this was the only punishment, according to their tradition (see upon Lev. xx. 10. and Buxtorf. De Sponsal. et Divortii, p. 32, 33. and Grotius, in John viii. 5).

Ver. 23. If a damsel that is a virgin be betrothed to an husband,] But not yet known by him : for there was generally some space between the espousals and the bringing her home to her husband's house. And the time allowed was, more or less, according to her age (see Selden, lib. ii. Uxor. Hebr. cap. 8).

A man find her in the city, and lie with her ;] If he lay with her anywhere else, the crime was the same ; but it was not so easy to corrupt her in her father's house, or among her friends, where she remained till the completion of the marriage, as it was to do it abroad in the city, or in the field.

Ver. 24. Ye shall bring them both out unto the gate] That is, to the court of judgment, which sat there ; as I noted upon xvi. 18.

Ye shall stone them] After they had been sentenced to this death by the court.

The damsel, because she cried not, Which was a demonstration she was not forced, but lay with him by consent.

Being in the city ;] Where the neighbors might have heard her cry ; and the force, if there had been any, prevented.

The man, because he hath humbled his neighbour's wife :] For so she was by such a contract, as made her only his. This is supposed to be the case of the woman taken in adultery, mentioned John viii. 5. (see my notes upon Lev. xx. 10).

So thou shalt put away evil] See ver. 21, 22.

Ver. 25. If a man find a betrothed damsel in the field,] Where nobody was near, as in the city.

And the man force her,] It was presumed, by the circumstances of the place, that she did not consent, but was under a force ; as she also affirmed, and he could not prove the contrary.

Then the man only—shall die :] Because he only was guilty of a crime, as it follows in the next words.

Ver. 26. But unto the damsel thou shalt do nothing ;] To make her liable to suffer death : for it was her misfortune, as we speak, not her fault, that she was ravished.

For as when a man riseth against his neighbour,] He not being able to defend himself.

for as when a man riseth against his neighbour, and slayeth him, even so is this matter :

27 For he found her in the field, and the betrothed damsel cried, and there was none to save her.

28 ¶ If a man find a damsel that is a virgin, which is not betrothed, and lay hold on her, and lie with her, and they be found ;

Even so is this matter :] It is here observed by many (particularly by Grotius and De Dieu) that chastity is equal unto life.

Ver. 27. For he found her in the field,] Far distant from all company.

The betrothed damsel cried,] For help, as she affirmed, and as it was presumed; because, if she had consented, some other place might have been found, more convenient for their purpose than the field.

There was none to save her.] None appeared to rescue her, as she desired.

Ver. 28. If a man find—a virgin,] In the field, before mentioned.

Which is not betrothed,] To a husband.

And lay hold on her, and lie with her, and they be found ;] There be witnesses of it; or they themselves confess it. This case is different from that in Exod. xxii. 16, 17, in many respects. For that law speaks of one that was drawn in to consent to the man's lying with her by enticing words (which is expressly there mentioned), and fair promises, perhaps, of marriage; but here Moses speaks of one that "laid hold of her," i. e. deflowered her by force and violence. In this case the man was bound to marry her, if she and her father pleased (for both their consents were required, though the man that deflowered her could not refuse); but in the former case the man himself might choose whether he would marry or not, which he could not refuse in this; and besides, was bound to pay fifty shekels, as a mulct upon him for the crime, as follows in the next verse (see Selden, lib. i. Uxor. Hebr. cap. 16.)

Ver. 29. Then the—man shall give unto the damsel's father fifty shekels of silver,] Here is another difference between this case and that in Exodus; where the man was bound to settle a dowry upon her; but here to pay a fine unto her father. The reason is plain; because there was no need of settling a dowry in this case as in the former; for the dowry was settled upon her in that case, lest the husband might lightly and wantonly put her away by divorce, and she have nothing to maintain her; of which there was no danger here, because this law saith expressly, in the conclusion of this verse, that "he may not put her away all his days." Yet there are those who think it likely, that in this case also he settled a dowry of fifty shekels upon her, besides what he paid to her father; for otherwise the condition of a virgin deflowered by force, was worse than hers deflowered by her own consent.

They have some exceptions concerning this pay-

29 Then the man that lay with her shall give unto the damsel's father fifty shekels of silver, and she shall be his wife; because he hath humbled her, he may not put her away all his days.

30 ¶ A man shall not take his father's wife, nor discover his father's skirt.

ment to her father, which are not very material, nor certain. But this is considerable, that this fine was the same whether the woman was of noble or of mean parentage, neither more nor less was paid by the law. But in aftertimes, the Sanhedrin, they tell us, added some other mulcts besides this here mentioned; because it seemed so small, that the honor of a virgin was not thought sufficiently repaired by it. Therefore, he that enticed a virgin paid other two; one for the shame and dishonor he had done her; and the other for the loss of her virginity, and vitiating her body. And he that forced a virgin paid a third besides these two, upon the account of the pain unto which he was supposed to have put her. And in these three they proportioned the penalties to the quality of the person, and other considerations, which made them vary (see Selden, in the forenamed place, p. 123).

She shall be his wife ;] Though she were blind, or lame, or leprous, he could not refuse her, if she and her father required him to marry her.

He may not put her away all his days.] This was a third part of his punishment for the force he had committed, that he should be forced not only to take her to wife, but constrained also to keep her as long as she lived, and not have the liberty of giving her a bill of divorce, as other men might do, who were desirous to part with their wives.

If it be asked, how it could be known whether she was enticed or forced; they answer, as was observed before, that it was reasonably presumed that he forced her, if the thing was done in the field, or in a place far from inhabitants; but if in the city or town, that she consented, unless the contrary was evidently proved.

Ver. 30. A man shall not take his father's wife,] That is, shall not marry her.

Nor discover his father's skirt,] Nor so much as lie with her. For this is a modest phrase, borrowed from the ancient custom in those countries; where the bridegroom, when he brought his bride into the chuppa, as they called it, or bridal chamber, spread the skirt of his robe over her, to signify his right to her and power over her, and that he alone might lawfully enjoy her (Ruth iii. 9. Ezek. xvi. 8).

And this verse seems to me to be here inserted as a short memorandum, that they should be careful to observe all the laws which he had delivered against incestuous marriages in the eighteenth chapter of Leviticus (see there, ver. 8. and xx. 11).

CHAP. XXIII.

Ver. 1. He that is wounded in the stones,] bruised or compressed in those parts; as the manner was of making eunuchs, who are here spoken of, and were sometimes made that way when they were infants; or by taking them quite away; which was done in some when they were grown up. And there were those who had none of these parts left remaining; as it follows in the next words.

Or hath his privy member cut off,] In whole, or in part; which was not used till they found the other did not effectually answer their purpose in this unnatural practice. Wherein some thought they honored their gods, particularly Cybele, the mother of the gods, unto whose service her priests devoted themselves by cutting off their genitals. So not only Minucius Felix, Tertullian, and several other of the ancient Christian writers testify, but many also of the pagan (see Joh. Geusius De Victimis Humanis, par. ii. cap. 1).

Shall not enter into the congregation] These persons were so much abhorred by some among the pagans, that Lucian saith they were excluded not only from the schools of philosophers, but, which was more, ἀπὸ τῶν ἱερῶν αὐτῶν, καὶ περιήλων, καὶ τῶν κοινῶν ἀπάντων συλλόγων, "from their holy offices, and their sprinklings, and all common meetings." So Diocles is introduced speaking in his Eunuclus. But nobody thinks this to be the meaning here, that they should not entertain such a person as a proselyte; or that he should not come to worship God at the temple: for that was free for all nations if they renounced idolatry. But the meaning of this law is, either to forbid the Israelites to marry with such persons, or not to admit them to bear any office in the Jewish commonwealth. The Hebrew doctors generally take it in the first sense: see Selden, De Jure Nat. et Gent. lib. v. cap. 16. and so do a great many among Christian writers. And there is an eminent example of the use of this phrase in this sense, Neh. xiii. 1—3. But some think it was superfluous to forbid this, because none would marry with such persons as were incapable to perform the marriage duty; and therefore they follow the second sense, it being certain that the Hebrew word kahal, congregation, signifies in many places, not the whole body of the people of Israel, but the great assembly of elders, into which no such person was to be admitted; because they were unfit for government, eunuchs being observed generally to want courage. Thus Simeon De Muis, and others, who seem to have great reason on their side. Yet it is so plain that "the congregation of the Lord," in the following part of this chapter, signifies the people of Israel, who might not marry with the persons mentioned, ver. 2, 3, 8. that I cannot but think it ought to be so interpreted here. For though such marriages were useless and unprofitable, as Maimonides speaks, yet they made a distinction between those who were made eunuchs by God (that is, born so) and those made by men:

gation of the LORD; even to his tenth generation shall he not enter into the congregation of the LORD.

3 An Ammonite or Moabite shall not enter and this law, they say, is not to be understood of the former, but only of the latter. Some of which, it is certain, were left in such a condition, that they were desirous of marriage, as appears by the constitution of the Emperor Leo, who did not think it superfluous to forbid marriage with them. For it appears by it, that some women choose such husbands. See also Eccles. xxx. 20, but especially the book ascribed to St. Basil, De Vera Virginitate, tom. i. p. 719, &c. where there is too free a description of the unextinguishable lust of such eunuchs as were only deprived τῶν δάδων, whose company he charges virgins to avoid, not only because they hoped to corrupt them without danger of discovery, but were insatiable in their desires. And on the other side, though they were unfit for marriage, yet it appears by many instances in history, that they were not unfit for government, nor wanted courage for the greatest undertakings. I need only refer the reader for this to Xenophon's Cyropædia, lib. vii.

They that follow allegorical senses free themselves from all these difficulties (see Finesacus, lib. i. Selectorum, p. 169, 185). But one cannot think that Moses intended any of those things; though such pious use may be made of his words.

Ver. 2. A bastard] The Hebrews do not understand by the word manzer, one that was begotten in simple fornication, out of the state of marriage; but one that was begotten of such persons as the law forbade them to marry, or lie withal, under pain of being cut off; viz. those mentioned in the eighteenth of Leviticus. They only except this single case, if a man lay with a menstruous woman, and begat a child of her at that time, it was not a manzer. See Selden, lib. De Successione, in Bona Defunct. cap. 3. and lib. v. De Jure Nat. et Gent. cap. 16, and Wagenseil lately in his very learned Annotation upon Mischna Sota, cap. 4. sec. 1, where he observes, out of a MS. which he calls very precious (Etz-Hachajim in Hileoth Nidda), that manzer, whether male or female, was excluded from the congregation of the Lord. And they were manzers who were born of any woman whom the law prohibited them to have knowledge of; whether it was by violence or by consent, by error or advisedly, it made no difference.

Shall not enter into the congregation] Nor marry with an Israelite. So all the doctors, none excepted, expound it, as Mr. Selden observes, lib. ii. De Successione in Pontific. cap. 2. p. 209. If any man of Israel married such a woman, or any woman of Israel married such a man, and they were found in bed together after espousals, they were both whipped, for violating this precept. But if they lay together without any espousals, this punishment was not inflicted on them.

Even to his tenth generation shall he not enter into the congregation] That is, never, as the Hebrew doctors expound it. And Maimonides (More Nevochim, par. iii. cap. 49), gives this reason for it, that people might be deterred from such marriages or conjunctions, which would leave an indelible blot upon their pos-into the congregation of the LORD; even to their tenth generation shall they not enter into the congregation of the LORD for ever:

terity. And, indeed, some heathens anciently put such a mark of infamy upon mere bastards, as to prohibit both males and females to come to their sacred offices. Such a law there was at Athens, mentioned by Isæus; as Casaubon observes upon Athenæus, lib. vi. cap. 6. p. 410.

There were some also of these manzers, who were not manifestly born of such incestuous, or other forbidden mixtures, but were called dubious, because their fathers were not known, or being exposed, and found in the fields, or the streets, neither father nor mother was known. Yet it being uncertain whence they were descended, the Israelites might not marry with them, for fear they should be polluted by those who, perhaps, were born of incestuous parents. But proselytes of justice, they say, might marry with manzers; and that they might not for ever be excluded from the congregation of the Lord, they contrived this remedy for the restitution of their blood. They might marry a slave (who was baptized and become a Jew), whose children were not reputed manzers, but only slaves: who, being made Jews, and having their freedom given them, might lawfully marry with a Jewish woman; and then they were entirely incorporated into the congregation of the Lord: for proles sequitur matrem, "the issue follows the mother" (as that MS. of Wagenseil hath it, p. 565), and there was no regard had to the father.

Ver. 3. An Ammonite or Moabite shall not enter into the congregation of the Lord; even to their tenth generation] These last words for ever, in this verse, the Jews think warrant them to interpret those words to the tenth generation, in the foregoing verse, as if he said, never. It is certain, indeed, that Moses intended to exclude the Moabites and Ammonites from marrying with the Jews for ever; for so Nehemiah understood him when he quoted this law, xliii. 1. as a reason against the Israelites' marriages with them in his time, when more than ten generations were past. But then these words, for ever, being omitted in the foregoing verse, where he speaks of manzers, it seems reasonable that they should not be so interpreted; but that, after ten generations were past, all distinction between them and others should be abolished. This, one would have expected, should have been the sense of those who examine every word so nicely as the Jews do: for here being mention made only of an Ammonite and Moabite, that is, of the males of these two nations, they will not have their women concerned in this law: but say, that an Israelite might take one of them to wife, if she embraced their religion. For thus they expound this whole matter of marriages with proselytes of justice; that is, such of other nations as became entirely of the Jews' religion. With such proselytes of some nations, whether men or women, the Israelites were never to make any marriages: with those of some other nations, they were prohibited only to marry with their men: with others, they were prohibited to marry only for some generations; and there were others, with whom they might marry as soon as they were made perfect proselytes. Of the first kind were the seven nations of Canaan, mentioned Deut. vii. 1, with the males or females of which they might never contract an affinity. To the second kind belong the Ammonites and Moabites; to those males an Israelitish woman Balaam the son of Beor of Pethor of Mesopotamia, to curse thee.

5 Nevertheless the LORD thy God would not hearken unto Balaam; but the LORD thy God turned the curse into a blessing unto thee, because the LORD thy God loved thee.

was forbid by this precept to marry: but a man of Israel might marry any of their women, after they professed the Jewish religion; otherwise David, who descended from Ruth, a Moabitess, had been illegitimate. Of the third kind were the Edomites and Egyptians; with whom and with their children, the Israelites might not marry; but their grandchildren might. And of the fourth kind were all other nations besides these mentioned. This is an abridgment of what our great Selden hath more largely shown to be the sense of the Jews, in his fifth book De Jure Nat. et Gent. &c. cap. 14, which another excellent person, J. Christoph. Wagenseil hath confirmed, out of his inestimable MS. as he calls Etz-Ihachajim, in Hilcoth Nidda, cap. 10 (see Excerpt. Gem. in Sota, cap. 1. p. 143).

Ver. 4. Because they met you not with bread and with water] This seems to belong to the Ammonites, who had no compassion towards the Israelites, when they were distressed in the wilderness: but, though they were near of kin to them, did not show them that civility which is commonly expressed to mere strangers in their travels (Gen. xiv. 18. xviii. 2. 31. xix. 1, 2). We do not find any mention of this barbarity of theirs in the foregoing history; but we read how kind God ordered the Israelites to be to them, in not meddling with them, much less distressing them, as they passed by their country (Deut. ii. 19). Which aggravated their inhumanity in not vouchsafing this common kindness to the Israelites, of giving them the refreshment of bread and water as they went by them.

Because they hired against thee Balaam] As the foregoing passage peculiarly refers to the Ammonites, so this doth to the Moabites; who, with the assistance of the Midianites, invited Balaam, by the promise of a great reward, to come from the eastern country and curse the Israelites (see Numb. xxii. 5—7). For these two reasons God laid this prohibition upon his people; in which Maimonides observes the Divine justice in proportioning punishments to offences. For Amalek coming out against the Israelites, when they were newly come forth from Egypt, to cut them off with the sword, God commanded their memory to be blotted out (xxv. 19), but the Ammonites being only basely covetous, and the Moabites acting against them only by craft, and not by force, God inflicted no other punishment upon them but this, that his people should avoid all affinity with them, and show no love to them (More Nechochim, par. iii. cap. 41). And the MS. author of Etz-Ihachajim, mentioned by Wagenseil, in the place forenamed, makes this the ground of the distinction mentioned before between the males and females of those countries: "Their males (saith he) might never marry with an Israelitish woman; but, by a tradition delivered down to us from Moses in Mount Sinai, we hold, that the women of those countries (if they embraced the Jewish religion) might be married to a man of Israel. For the women must be thought, in all reason, not to have been guilty, as the men were, of that which was the reason of this law, it not being the custom for women to bring out bread and water to travellers; nor did they send any ambassadors to hire Balaam to come and curse the Israelites." Accordingly we find Ruth, who was a Moabitess, married to Boaz, the ancestor of David.

Ver. 5.] Balaam, indeed, did not curse the Israelites as the Moabites desired, and he intended ; but no thanks were owing to him for that : but it was to be ascribed to the love of God to his people, who constrained him against his will, to bless them.

Ver. 6.] By entering into any league with them, much less by taking them into conjugal society : but on the contrary, they were to look upon them as dangerous enemies ; who, being near their neighbors, would watch all opportunities to ensnare or disturb them.

Some of the Jews would have this to be an exception to the general rule, xx. 10, that they might not offer them terms of peace, as they were bound to do to all men, but the seven nations of Canaan : though, if they desired peace, they were bound, they say, to grant it, (see Schickard, in his Mischpat Haimmelech, p. 118). But Grotius hath well observed, upon Matt. v. 43, that God did not give the Jews any right to their country (as appears from Deut. ii. 19), and therefore the meaning here is, that they should not make any league with them of mutual assistance, which they called sadera, συμμαχίας.

Ver. 7. Thou shalt not abhor an Edomite ;] So as never to enter into the society of marriage with them, they being a circumcised people.

He is thy brother ;] Nearer of kin to them than the Ammonites and Moabites ; Esau their father being the twin brother of Jacob. And so Moses calls them, when he delivers God's command to the Israelites not to meddle with them, Deut. ii. 8, "We passed by from our brethren the children of Esau," &c. Here it may be observed, that the word brother comprehended more than the Israelites, as our Saviour shows the word neighbor did, Luke x. 29, &c.

Thou shalt not abhor an Egyptian ;] That is, the Egyptians in a sore famine sustained them, their children, flocks, and herds, very kindly ; the memory of which benefit God would not have forgotten, though in future generations they were cruelly oppressed by them.

Ver. 8. When they had been proselytes for three generations, it was lawful to marry with them. Nay, some of the Jews are so liberal here of their kindness, as to understand by banim, not children in general, but sons, with whom only marriage is forbidden till the third generation ; marriage with their daughters being lawful, as they think, as soon as they turned complete proselytes. Upon which account Solomon took Pharaoh's daughter to wife. (See Selden. lib. 5. De Jure Nat. et. Gent. cap. 14, 15. where he observes, that all this held good only till the captivity of Babylon, when, all these nations being confused, they might marry with any of them if they became Jews. For wars, and colonies, and deportations, had made such a mixture of people, that one could not be known from another. This Wagenseil hath lately confirmed out of several Hebrew authors, whom Mr. Selden did not trouble himself to mention ; and particularly out of the MS. Etz-Hachajim, which he most highly commends (see p. 149. upon Sota). They

12 ¶ Thou shalt have a place also without the camp, whither thou shalt go forth abroad :

13 And thou shalt have a paddle upon thy weapon ; and it shall be, when thou wilt ease all agree, likewise, that none of these laws extended to proselytes, who might marry with any of these nations (see Selden, ib. cap. 18).

Ver. 9. This was a rule to be observed at all times ; but then especially, when they had the greatest need of the Divine help (for which wicked people could not reasonably hope), and when there was the greatest danger of being wicked, in a time of such license as soldiers commonly take. There is a sentence very like this in Agathias, lib. ii. (mentioned by Grotius towards the conclusion of his Prolegomena to the book De Jure Belli et Pacis, 'Αδικία γὰρ καὶ Θεοῦ ἀθεράπευτοι φερόντο μὴ αἰεὶ καὶ ἀνίμφορα, μάλιστα δὲ ἐν τῷ προσπολεμῶν καὶ παραστρέφοντι. "Injustice and neglect of God's service are ever to be avoided as most pernicious ; but especially in a time of war, and when men are upon the point of giving battle." Which he proves elsewhere, by the illustrious examples of Darius, Xerxes, and the Athenians in Sicily.

Ver. 10. If there be among you any man, that is not clean, &c.] This seems to be only one instance of uncleanness, from which they were to keep themselves carefully ; though it was no moral impurity, nor a voluntary pollution. By which it was easy for them to understand how watchful they were to be over themselves, in all other cases, especially such as had an inward turpitude in them.

Then shall he go abroad out of the camp,] There is no such thing required before in Lev. xv. 16. where the same pollution is mentioned. The reason, I suppose, was, that he speaks there of what happened to them in their own houses ; where they had private chambers, into which they might retire, and keep themselves from defiling others ; but here, of those that were abroad in the army, where it was hard to keep their fellow-soldiers from touching them, without removing out of the camp.

He shall not come within the camp,] This some understand, particularly Drusius, of not coming within the camp of God, and of the Levites, that is, to the tabernacle : but it seems to be an exclusion of him from the whole camp of Israel, as I have expounded it.

Ver. 11.] See Lev. xv. 16. The end of all this, as Maimonides observes, More Novechim, par. iii. cap. 61. was, that every man might have this fixed in his mind, that their camp ought to be as the sanctuary of God (into which every one knows no man might enter in his uncleanness), and not like the camps of the gentiles, in which all manner of corruption, filthiness, rapines, thefts, and other wickednesses, were freely committed.

Ver. 12.] A place distant from all company ; where they might ease themselves, as it is explained in the next verse. For natural modesty directed all men on such occasions to seek privacy ; and it tended, as all cleanliness doth, to the preservation of health : which was one reason of ordering them to find a place without the camp, that there might be no offensive smell thyself abroad, thou shalt dig therewith, and shalt turn back and cover that which cometh from thee:

14 For the Lord thy God walketh in the midst of thy camp, to deliver thee, and to give up thine enemies before thee; therefore shall among them. And hereby, as Maimonides observes, they were distinguished from brute beasts, which commonly ease themselves anywhere, and before any body. But, besides all this, Moses himself gives us the principal reason of this command, peculiarly respecting the Israelites (ver. 14).

Ver. 13. Thou shalt have a paddle] An instrument wherewith to dig up the ground, and cover it again; Epiphanius, Hæres. lxxvii. calls it πασσάλον σιδήριον, "an iron paddle."

Upon thy weapon ;] Their sword, I suppose.

When thou wilt ease thyself abroad,] It was not in their choice when they would do this, but when their needs required: yet the Jews will have it, that they were to accustom themselves to do this business in the morning, as soon as they were up. Thus the Jews at this day (as Leo Modena tells us, in his history of them, par. i. ch. 6), afterward washing their hands, that they may go clean to their prayers.

Thou shalt dig therewith,] A hole in the ground.

Cover that which cometh from thee:] That there might be no appearance nor scent of it remaining. This is still practised by the Caribbeans; among whom there is never any such thing as ordure seen. So the authors of the History of the Caribbee Islands tell us, book ii. ch. 14. where they observe, also, out of Busbequius, that the Turks use the same cleanliness in their camps, making a hole with a piece of iron, wherein they bury their excrements. And in this matter the Essenes were extremely superstitious: for, as Josephus relates, they would not ease themselves at all on the sabbath-day, because they looked upon it as a labor to dig in the earth, and excrements not fit to be seen on that day.

Ver. 14. For the Lord thy God walketh in the midst of thy camp,] At this time the ark, which was the token of the Divine presence, was settled in the midst of their camp; and, whithersoever they moved, was carried along with them; two standards going before, and two following, and the ark between them in the midst, as appears from the tenth of Numbers. It is likely, also, that it was carried in aftertimes in the midst of them, when they went to war; as some think it was when they went against the Midianites (Numb. xxxi. 6), and when they compassed Jericho. Now this presence of God among them was the reason why no uncleanness, though in itself natural, might be found in their camp; but, out of reverence to the Divine Majesty, which dwelt between the cherubims over the ark, be removed afar off. And by such actions as these, Maimonides well observes, God intended to strengthen and confirm the faith of the soldiers, that God, dwelling among them, would go along with them, and fight for them against their enemies, as it here follows, More Nevochim, par. iii. cap. 41. And thus Abarbinel discourses upon these words: "The camps of the Israelites ought to be holy, having a special providence of God among them: for they do not make war by mere human power and courage, but by the power of God and of his Spirit, on which they depend for deliverance from all evil, and victory over their enemies," &c.

To deliver thee, and to give up thine enemies before thee:] This is the constant sense of this phrase, "of God's being in the midst of them," to defend, protect, and deliver them from all evil, as I observed before thy camp be holy: that he see no unclean thing in thee, and turn away from thee.

15 ¶ Thou shalt not deliver unto his master the servant which is escaped from his master unto thee:

16 He shall dwell with thee, even among you,

(see Deut. vii. 21. Josh. iii. 10. Psal. xlv. 6. Zach. iii. 15). Now this cleanliness being commanded with respect to the Divine presence, which dwelt among them, the Jews are strangely mistaken in using such superstitions as they do in every place, when they have no such presence of the Divine Majesty in the midst of them (see Schickard in Mischpat Hammelech, cap. 5. Theor. 18. p. 144, &c.).

Therefore shall thy camp be holy:] Free from all manner of defilements, though they be only of this sort.

That he see no unclean thing in thee,] In these words, saith Maimonides (in the place before named), he deters them from fornication; which is far worse than the forementioned uncleanness; but too common among the soldiers, when they are absent from their own homes. And, therefore, that he might keep them from such impurities, he commands them such actions (he means covering their ordure) as might call to their minds the glorious majesty of God which dwelt among them. But though the Hebrew word, which we here translate unclean thing, properly signifies nakedness, and all those impure mixtures mentioned in the eighteenth of Leviticus, and therefore by Maimonides particularly applied to such uncleanness; yet Mr. Selden hath well observed, that it signifies all manner of filthiness; and therefore is well so translated by us, both here and in the next chapter, where he speaks of the matter of divorce.

And so it is used by the prophet Nahum, iii. 5 (to name no more), where the nakedness of Nineveh, which God saith he would show to all nations, signifies all the murders, robberies, deceit, and other great wickedness, which abounded in that city (see Uxor. Hebr. lib. iii. cap. 23). And thus Abarbinel here extends it to all the horrid sins which were usually committed in the camps of idolaters.

Turn away from thee,] As princes are wont to do, when they see any thing offensive to them. And the meaning is, he would not deliver them from their enemies (as he promised before), but give them up into their hands. I conclude all this matter with the words of R. Zacharias, in Pirke Eliczer, cap. 44, "The pillar of the cloud (in which the glory of the Lord dwelt) encompassed the camps of Israel round about, and made them like a city girt about with a wall, that no enemy might assault them. But this cloud threw all uncleanness out of the camps of Israel, for they were holy:" and he quotes this place for it.

Ver. 15.] The Hebrew doctors understand this of a servant of another nation who was become a Jew. Whom his master, if he went to dwell out of Judea, might not carry along with him against his will; and if he fled from him, when he had carried him, he might not be delivered to him, but suffered to dwell in the land of Israel. Which they understand also of a servant that fled from his master out of any of the countries of the gentiles into the land of Israel; which was to be a safe refuge to him (see Selden, lib. vi. De Jure Nat. et Gent. juxta Discipl. Hebr. cap. 8, p. 711).

Ver. 16. He shall dwell with thee,] Having embraced the Jewish religion.

In that place which he shall choose] He was not to be abridged of his liberty, but permitted to settle himself where he pleased, in any part of their country.

in that place which he shall choose in one of thy gates, where it liketh him best: thou shalt not oppress him.

17 ¶ There shall be no whore of the daugh-

Thou shalt not oppress him.] For there was an express law against all manner of injuries or hardships put upon strangers (Lev. xix. 33, 34).

Ver. 17. There shall be no whore—nor a sodomite] or a whoremonger of the sons of Israel; as the last part of the verse may be translated, with the same reason that the foregoing words are translated, no whore of the daughters of Israel. So Bonfrerius truly observes, and so the Vulgar Latin and the LXX. translate it, and several other versions mentioned by Mr. Selden, lib. iii. Uxor. Hebr. cap. 23. p. 487. Which sort of persons Moses would not have to be tolerated among the Israelites, as they were among the Egyptians; many of which, if we may believe Sextus Empiricus, were so far from thinking it a reproach for women to prostitute themselves, that they looked upon it as honorable, and gloried in it, τὸ τὰς γυναικὰς ἑταίρειν, &c. παρὰ τοῖς πολλοῖς Αἰγυπτίων ἐκκλησίαι, &c. (lib. iii. Pyr. Hypot. cap. 24. p. 152).

And great reason there was for this prohibition, because by whoredom families are confounded and destroyed (as Maimonides observes); and their issues are looked upon by all men as aliens; so that none will own them as their kindred, and their neighbours become strangers to them; than which nothing can be worse for them, and for their parents. For which cause (saith he) all public stewes were disallowed among the Israelites; who had this benefit by it, among others, that many brawls and quarrels, fightings and bloodshed, were prevented; which frequently happened, when several men were assembled at the same time, contending for the same woman. For so the Scripture saith, Jer. v. 7. 'They assemble by troops in the harlots' houses.' For the preventing of these and such-like mischiefs, and that the distinction of families might be preserved, both whores and whoremongers, are here condemned; and no other conjunction permitted, but with a man's own wife, publicly married. For, if a private marriage had been sufficient, many would have kept women in their houses as their whores, and pretended they were their wives. Therefore, after a man had privately espoused a woman, he was bound publicly to keep his wedding." Thus that great man, More Nevochim, par. iii. cap. 49, and see Selden, lib. v. De Jure Nat. et Gent. juxta Disc. Hebr. cap. 4. p. 554.

How much more abominable then were such persons as prostituted their bodies in honour of Venus and of Priapus, and such-like filthy deities! of which sort there were both males and females consecrated to such impure services! and this practised even in the days of Moses; as appears from the history of those who committed fornication with the daughters of Moab, who exposed themselves in honor of Baal-Peor; and for their lying with them was accounted idolatry. And such there were at last among the Israelites, as appears from 1 Kings xiv. 24. 2 Kings xxiii. where we read, that "the houses of the sodomites" (as we translate it) were by "the house of the Lord." Which shows they were not vulgar, but consecrated Sodomites, or whoremongers. I need not mention the heathen writers, who tell us this was a piece of religion among them. See our learned Dr. Spencer, lib. ii. De Leg. Hebr. Ritual. cap. 22, and Heideggerus, in his Histor. Patriarch, exercit. i. sect. 2, where he observes, a great many very learned men understand this very place, not merely of vulgar whores, but of such as I have mentioned; which were famous in ancient ters of Israel, nor a sodomite of the sons of Israel.

18 Thou shalt not bring the hire of a whore, or the price of a dog, into the house of the Lord times among the Phœnicians, Babylonians, and other nations, whom Strabo calls ἑεροδούλους, lib. viii. Geograph. where he saith (p. 378), that at Corinth there was a temple so richly endowed, that it maintained πλείους ἢ χιλιάς ἑεροδούλους ἑταίρας, "above a thousand of these consecrated whores:" whom both men and women had dedicated to the goddess, Οἱ γὰρ ναυκλήροι ῥαδίως ἐξανάλκοιτο, "for seafaring men (who arrived in great numbers at this port) parted with their money easily." And, lib. xii. speaking of Comana, he saith, there were a multitude of women there, τῶν ἐργαζομένων ἀπὸ σώματος, "who maintained themselves by prostituting their bodies;" and most of them were ἑραῖ "sacred persons:" this city being a little Corinth, to which great numbers of people resorted at their festivals, διὰ τὸ πλῆθος τῶν ἑταρῶν αἱ τῆς Ἀφροδίτης ἦσαν ἑραῖ, "because of the multitude of harlots which were here sacred to Venus," p. 559. And the like account we find in Athenæus, lib. xiii. Deipnos. cap. 6, where he saith, they that went to pray there, were wont, for the obtaining their petitions, to add, that they would bring some women to be devoted unto Venus; as Xenophon the Corinthian did, when he returned conqueror from the Olympics.

Ver. 18. Thou shalt not bring the hire of a whore,] If such persons, as are mentioned in the foregoing verse, offered unto God what they had got by prostituting their bodies, it was not to be accepted, but rejected, as abominable. For this was a custom among the idolatrous nations, as appears by a great many of their writers; who tell us, they were wont to dedicate some part of that which they received for the use of their bodies at the temples of their pretended deities. Particularly Herodotus mentions it, as done among the ancient Babylonians, lib. i. p. 199. Which explains what we read in Baruch, vi. 42, 43. where see Grotius's Annotations.

Or the price of a dog,] There was a peculiar reason for this, besides the vileness of this creature (which Maimonides only mentions, More Nevochim, par. iii. cap. 46), which was, as Bochartus, and some other great men think, because a dog was highly honored among the Egyptians, from whom the Israelites were lately come. For the Nile was wont to overflow and enrich their country at the rising of the dog-star, and a dog was the symbol of one of their principal deities, called Anubis, who was represented with a head like that of a dog (see Hierozoiicon, par. i. lib. ii. cap. 56. p. 690, &c.). If we can think this vile idolatry was so ancient as the days of Moses, which it is certain prevailed afterward, this may pass for a very likely reason why God would not accept so much as the price for which a dog was sold or exchanged; for so the LXX. expound it: as, for example, if a man gave a lamb for a fine dog, God would not have that lamb offered at his altar; as Maimonides explains it.

For any vow;] There was the greatest obligation laid upon men to make good their vows, wherewith upon any occasion they had bound themselves; but God would have them discharged from such vile obligations as these.

For even both these are abomination unto the Lord] It is hard to give an account why these two (the price of a whore and of a dog) are associated in the same law; unless it be in opposition to some such rites as those before mentioned among the Egyptians. Who, thy God for any vow: for even both these are abomination unto the Lord thy God.

19 ¶ Thou shalt not lend upon usury to thy brother; usury of money, usury of victuals, usury of any thing that is lent upon usury:

in aftertimes, it is certain, had such harlots sacred to Isis, as many think are spoken of in the beginning of this verse; and a dog was nowhere else sacred as a symbol of Anubis, or Mercury. Though this may be said with some probability, that these two are joined together, because a whore and a dog are both alike impudent. Josephus thinks that the price of a dog here mentioned, was money given, ἐπὶ ἀξέμεται κυνός, "for the loan of a good dog to breed withal," as Mr. Selden observes in his History of Tithes, p. 57. where he notes, also, that the Jews would not admit the tents of usury or of war to be offered. But the Talmudists expound it quite otherwise, as I have done, for the price of a dog, either sold or exchanged for some other thing; which the same great man approves of as the truer interpretation (lib. v. De Jure Nat. et Gent. cap. 4. p. 557).

Ver. 19. Not lend upon usury to thy brother; ] i. e. Unto an Israelite (see Exod. xxii. 25. Lev. xxv. 36).

Usury of money,] Here the word nesech is used for all sorts of usury; whether that which was made by the loan of money, called here nesech ceseph, or that which was made by the loan of food, and such-like things, called nesech okel. But, commonly, there are two words used to express this matter, viz. nesech, usury, and tarbith, which we translate increase. Which are not two kinds of usury, one more griping, the other more moderate, as some have conceived; for the same usury is called nesech with respect to the debtor, to whom it is grievous, and tarbith to the creditor, to whom it is beneficial (see Salmasius, in his book De Usuris, cap. 7. p. 188). Yet there is some difference between nesech and tarbith; else one cannot tell why they are so often both mentioned in the same place. And nesech properly signifies the interest, as we speak, which was paid for money; and tarbith, the interest of corn, and other fruits of the earth; as the same author shows in that book (cap. 20. p. 614, &c.). And in the next book (De Modo Usuram) he shows, that, as the LXX. and R. Levi ben Gerson thus understood the difference, so do the ancient fathers, particularly Origen and St. Jerome (cap. 8. p. 320, &c.).

Ver. 20. Unto a stranger] One that was not an Israelite, whether he dwelt out of their land, or in it; if he were not a proselyte to the law; or of whom they might not take any usury, but use him as a brother.

Thou mayest lend upon usury;] Some of the Jews would have this to be an affirmative precept, obliging them to make the usury of a gentile, if they lent him any money. For this Maimonides quotes a passage out of Sipluri; which others say he mistook. See J. Wagenseil, in his Annotations upon Lipman's Carmen Memoriale, p. 598. where he shows that he was of this cruel opinion. But this is not the common sense of the Jews, and their wise men have been so modest also as to decree, That though their law did here permit them to take usury of a gentile, yet they were not to practise it, unless it were that they might provide for themselves, that they might live more safely among the gentiles. And they add this reason for this limitation: Lest the Jews by this way of commerce and traffic, should grow too familiar with the gentiles, and learn their manners: only men that studied the law, and thereby were out of danger of being enticed to their religion, might freely lend them money upon usury; for this very end, as they think, that they might make a gain of it, and enrich themselves. See Selden, lib. vi. De Jure Nat. et Gent. cap. 10. where he observes, that the Mahometans forbid usury only among themselves, not to strangers. Which Salmasius shows is thus limited in the Alcoran by these words, "in their own territories." That is, if Mahometans live among Christians, they may take usury of them; but of Christians who live among them they may not take any, no more than of a Mussulman, as they call themselves.

20 Unto a stranger thou mayest lend upon usury; but unto thy brother thou shalt not lend upon usury: that the Lord thy God may bless thee in all that thou settest thine hand to in the land whither thou goest to possess it.

Unto thy brother thou shalt not lend] He repeats this again, that they might not fail to be kind one to another in this matter. And the author of Etz-Hachajim, mentioned by Wagenseil, saith, according to their ancient doctors, this is six times forbidden in the law, not to take usury of their brethren (p. 601. upon Sota). And, indeed, as there was nothing more rational than this, that their neighbors making great gain by merchandise (such as the Sidonians, Tyrians, and those that lived upon the Red Sea, and the Egyptians), they should not borrow money of the Israelites for nothing; so it was no less reasonable the Israelites themselves, whose chiefest profit was by husbandry and breeding of cattle, should have money lent them freely by one another, without any interest, their land not being a country of traffic, whereby money might be improved, as in other countries. For, by the laws of other nations (as Grotius observes on Luke vi. 45), that usury was odious which was practised upon husbandmen. Abarbinel also is so tender in this point, as to say, that usury hath something in it so unequal (at least as it is commonly practised), that God did not permit the Israelites to exercise it among all their neighbors, but only upon those of the seven nations of Canaan. And thus far he is in the right, that every one who was not a Jew, was not to be deemed a stranger: an Edomite, for instance, is called their brother in the seventh verse of this chapter; and, therefore, this precept, "thou shalt not lend upon usury to thy brother," is to be extended to Edomites. In like manner, saith he, neither do the Ishmaelites come under the name of strangers, nor other people but those of the seven nations. And this opinion Leo Modena follows in his History of the present Jews, par. ii. cap. 5. where he saith, by the word stranger, in this place, none other can be meant but only those seven nations, from whom God commanded them to take away even their lives. And that it is only their present distress, in which they have no other way of livelihood left, that makes them think it lawful to lend upon usury to those among whom they live. In which I think he is mistaken; though this doctrine is better natured than that of some of the Jews, who are so full of hatred to us Christians, whom they call Edomites, that they deprive us (as Wagenseil observes in the place above named) of the name of brethren, and think it lawful to oppress us with usury. Of which number are R. Bechaia, and the author of the old Nitzaeon, set forth by Wagenseil (ancienter than that of Lipman's, set forth by Theodorick Hackspan), who was so full of malignity, that he shut his eyes against the light which he plainly saw. For he could not deny that the Edomites were their brethren; and, consequently, that Moses required the Jews not to take usury of them; and that it was anciently unlawful. But then he pretends, that they forfeited this privilege by not coming to help to preserve Jerusalem and the temple from being destroyed, yea, by re-joining at their ruin. And fearing this would not satisfy, he had devised this justification of their usury, that the Edomites have made themselves strangers by the neglect of circumcision (see p. 139).

That the Lord thy God may bless thee] Charity to their poor brethren had many promises of a great reward: and this law was made peculiarly for the relief of such persons, as appears by those places before mentioned, both in Exodus and in Leviticus. It extended indeed to all: but chiefly was intended as a provision for the poor and needy, whom they were not to neglect: for God ordered them to live together as brethren, children of the same father. And indeed they were all, rich and poor, descended from one and the same original. And therefore he designed there should be no indigent person unrelieved among this people, upon whom he had heaped so many blessings; and, delivering them from the slavery of Egypt, had planted them in the good land promised to their fathers. To which purpose all those precepts were given, which require them to lend gratuitously to their poor brother; to restore the pledge left with them; to leave the corners of their fields un-reaped; not to gather the gleanings of the harvest and vintage; to observe the year of release and of Jubilee; and such-like peculiar provisions for the comfort of the poorer sort, that they might share in the happiness which God bestowed upon his elect people.

Ver. 21. When thou shalt vow a vow] In a thing lawful and possible; and by a person who had power to make, and was not subject to the authority of another who had power to make it void (see Numb. xxx. 2).

Thou shalt not slack to pay it.] Lest they should prove less able, and so be unwilling to perform what they had vowed, or should perhaps forget it. If they lost the thing they vowed, while they delayed, they were bound to give the value of it. Which was one difference between a vow and a freewill-offering; that in the latter case (as Maimonides saith), if that which he designed was stolen or dead, he was not bound to make reparation. The same author applies this to a vow a man made of giving an alms to a poor body, suppose a shekel, which he was to bestow immediately, if any poor body was at hand; if not, he was to separate it, and lay it by till he met with one, &c. (cap. 8. De Donis Pauperum, sect. 1).

For the Lord—will surely require it!] Demand that which thou hast made to be his own.

It would be sin in thee.] Be punished by God's just judgment upon thee for the wrong thou hast done him.

Ver. 22. But if thou shalt forbear to vow, it shall be no sin in thee.] God was so very merciful, as Maimonides observes, that if a man was not able to offer him an ox, or a lamb, he accepted of turtles and young pigeons, of which there was great plenty in that country. And if this was beyond his ability, but he had a desire to testify his affection to God by a freewill-offering, he was pleased to accept an oblation of bread baked in an oven, or pan, or any other usual way. And if this was too heavy, he accepted of bare flour, without putting him to the charge of baking it. For shalt keep and perform; even a freewill offering, according as thou hast vowed unto the LORD thy God, which thou hast promised with thy mouth.

24 ¶ When thou comest into thy neighbour's vineyard, then thou mayest eat grapes thy fill at thine own pleasure; but thou shalt not put any in thy vessel.

he would have men to be easy in his service, and all their offerings to be free and cheerful; and therefore tells them here, that if they vowed nothing at all to him, he would not take it ill of them, nor impute it to them as a sin (More Nevochim, par. iii. cap. 46).

Ver. 23.] This was to make them consider well beforehand what their ability was, and not rashly resolve and promise any thing: for though they were not bound to vow the smallest matter, yet having once vowed, they were no longer free, but bound to make it good, though it proved very chargeable to them. Yet there is a traditional doctrine among them practised at this day, that if any man or woman make a vow which afterward they wish unmade, and it be not to the prejudice of any third person that it should be broken, in this case they may go to a rabbin, or to any other three men, who hearing their reasons why they repent of having made such a vow, and judging them good, they may free them from their obligation, saying to such a person thrice, Be thou absolved from this vow, &c. and so he is discharged. Thus Leo Modena, in his History of the present Jews, par. ii. ch. 4.

Ver. 24. When thou comest into thy neighbour's vineyard, then thou mayest eat grapes] This the Hebrew doctors take to be a law made in favor of poor laborers, who were hired to work in their vineyards in the time of vintage, whom the owners might not hinder from eating as many grapes as they pleased (and the same held good in olives, figs, dates, and all other fruit), as long as they were at work, but not after they had done working. And if their masters would not suffer them so to do, they were to be scourged with forty stripes save one; for it was not reasonable to deny them this liberty, when the very oxen were not to be muzzled whilst they trod out the corn (see Selden, lib. vi. De Jure Nat. et Gent. cap. 2. p. 670). Which must be confessed to be as good-natured a law, as that of Plato's was harsh and unnatural, which enacted a servant should receive as many stripes as he ate grapes or figs (see Eusebius, lib. xiii. Prepar. Evangel. cap. ult.).

But I see no reason at all to restrain this indulgence only to hirelings, of whom there is no mention at all in this law; and therefore Josephus seems to me to have justly enlarged this benefit (lib. iv. Archæol. cap. 8) to all travellers on the highway, though they were not Israelites (to whom, and to proselytes of justice alone, the Jews confine this privilege), but mere strangers of any other nation, who had occasion to pass by a vineyard, and needed a refreshment. Which permission may seem to have caused great inconvenience, if not mischief in it, because they might tread down the vines, and make great waste among the grapes. Therefore by "coming into their neighbour's vineyard," is not meant going into every part of it, with a liberty to pick out the best grapes; but only stepping aside out of their way into the skirts of the vineyard, which lay near the road, and satisfying their hunger, without entering further into the vineyard. This made it no damage to the owners, considering the great plenty of fruit in that country.

Thou shalt not put any in thy vessel.] They were only to eat for their present necessity or delight, but not to carry any away with them for the benefit of others, or their own refreshment at another time. And 25 When thou comest into the standing corn of thy neighbour, then thou mayest pluck the pharisaical doctors, who granted this privilege unto Jews, but not unto gentiles.

But thou shalt not move a sickle ] They might not cut down any corn, but only pluck with their hands as much as was necessary to satisfy their hunger, or for their pleasure.

1 When a man hath taken a wife, and married her, and it come to pass that she find no favour in his eyes, because he hath found some uncleanness in her: then let him write her a bill of divorcement, and give it in her hand, and send her out of his house.

CHAPTER XXIV.

Ver. 1. When a man hath taken a wife, and married her, ] The Hebrew doctors make a difference between these two; understanding by "taking a wife," his espousing her to be his wife; and by "marrying her," his completing the contract, by lying with her.

It come to pass ] Either after he hath espoused her, or after he hath consummated the marriage.

That she find no favour in his eyes, ] i. e. He dislikes her; or, as it is expressed, ver. 3. hates her. Which signifies either an absolute dislike to her, or comparatively with some person whom he likes better.

Because he hath found some uncleanness in her: ] This is assigned as the reason and ground of his dislike, which signifies something odious to him, though perhaps it might not be so to another, whom Moses supposes she might marry after this husband has discharged her. Some of the Jews, indeed, extend this liberty so far, as to fancy they might, without any reason at all, for their mere pleasure, part with their wives (see Buxtorf. De Sponsal et Divortis, sect. 89). But others are more modest, and acknowledge that these words ["matter of uncleanness"] signify some weighty cause. Yet they distinguish between the first wife a man took, who might not be put away but for some uncleanness, and the second, who might be put away for a lesser reason. But there were great differences between the school of Hillel and the school of Shammai (whom the Talmudists so much talk of), about this matter of uncleanness: yet both agree it hath a far lower signification here than in the book of Leviticus, where it signifies adultery, incest, or such like turpitude. For if adultery had been here meant, she might have been put to death; or the mere suspicion of it tried by the water of jealousy (see Buxtorf in the book before named, sect. 90. and our Selden, lib. iii. Uxor. Hebr. cap. 20, 21). Abarinell thinks the two plainest causes of dislike signified by these words, were either such behaviour as might make her suspected of impurity (as going with her face uncovered, or her breast naked; sporting with young men, or washing in the same place with them, or having her arms bare); or, secondly, when they were of such a different temper, humor, and disposition, that they disliked and nauseated each other's company, and, consequently, lived in continual brawls and contentions. And, besides such moral causes, they allowed also such natural as made a woman offensive; viz. leprosy, or some such disease in her body as he did not discover before marriage. And sometimes they extend this as far as to a stinking breath.

Let him write her a bill of divorcement, ] Whatever was the cause of the husband's dislike, this law provides the wife should not be damaged by it, being made rather for her advantage than her husband's; viz. to free her (as Dr. Hammond observes) from the pain and vexation of her husband's unkindness, and the danger of seeing another taken in, and preferred before her; and she might be perfectly at liberty to leave one who did not love her, and take another husband who might possibly delight in her (see answer to Six Queries, q. iii. ch. 2). Some think that this custom of putting away wives which they did not like, prevailed before the law of Moses; which opinion hath something to countenance it, from the mention of divorces in several places (Lev. xxi. 14. xxii. 13. Numb. xxx. 9) before the book of Deuteronomy was written, wherein he orders a bill to be given in writing to discharge them. If this be true, it gives a good reason why God was pleased to grant this permission; because they were so settled in this practice, that it was safer still to indulge it to them, than quite to abolish it. Which he did with this caution, that husbands should not discharge their wives with a word, bidding them be gone out of doors (i. e. putting them away rashly, and in a sudden fit of anger), but first write them a bill containing their pleasure herein. Which being a deliberate act, might possibly hinder this divorce; to which they might be prone in a passion, but not after some consideration. The form of this bill is in Mr. Selden, and exactly scanned, lib. iii. Uxor. Hebr. cap. 21. Who observes also, in another place of that book (cap. 19), that as, for five hundred years or more, the Roman state flourished without the use of divorces, so for seven hundred years after the making of this law, there is no mention of any bill of divorce among the Jews, that is, till the days of Isaiah (see ch. l. 1), and but rarely afterward.

Give it in her hand, ] Saying these, or some such like words, "Behold, this is thy bill of divorce;" otherwise it was not good; and there were to be at least two witnesses unto it, as the Jews say. Who make ten things necessary (which they think to be founded upon the law itself) to make the bill legal (see Selden, in the same book, cap. 25).

Send her out of his house. ] This Dr. Hammond (in the place above mentioned) looks upon as an obligation upon her husband to furnish her for her journey, to endow her, and make provision for her. For so the word προσπέμνει, "to send out," signifies in the 2 And when she is departed out of his house, she may go and be another man's wife.

3 And if the latter husband hate her, and write her a bill of divorcement, and giveth it in her hand, and sendeth her out of his house; or if the latter husband die, which took her to be his wife;

4 Her former husband, which sent her away, may not take her again to be his wife, after that she is defiled; for that is abomination before the Lord: and thou shalt not cause the land to sin, which the Lord thy God giveth thee for an inheritance.

5 ¶ When a man hath taken a new wife, he shall not go out to war, neither shall he be charged with any business: but he shall be free at home one year, and shall cheer up his wife which he hath taken.

New Testament, to provide a viaticum, 1 Cor. xvi. 6. 11. Titus iii. 13. where it is explained by "letting nothing be wanting." But the Jews are of opinion, that the divorce was perfect and legitimate before he sent her out of his doors: for it was sufficient to give her a bill in such a form as plainly showed their matrimony was dissolved; and that she was no part of his family, though he had not actually sent her away. Yet if he kept her still in his house, after this bill was delivered into her hand, it was presumed they cohabited together, and he was to give her a new bill of divorce.

In all which I can see nothing like a command for putting away their wives, if they were disagreeable; which the Jews would fain extort out of these words. And so they spake unto our blessed Lord, Matt. xix. 7. though in another place they spake of it only as a permission, Mark x. 3. The plain intent of this law being this; that if a man did put away his wife (as they are suffered to do), she might marry another man; but if that new husband died, she might not return to her first husband again. See Buxtorf. De Sponsel et Divortii, p. 107, 108, &c. and to show that Moses rather supposed than permitted divorces, p. 113, &c.

Ver. 2. When she is departed] So that it is publicly known she is no longer his wife.

She may go and be another man's wife.] The bond of marriage being wholly broken by the bill of divorce, whereby he renounced all interest in her, and expressly said, in the very body of the bill (as we speak), "it may be free to thee to marry with whom thou wilt." Much more was the bond broken by adultery, for which our Saviour gives a man leave to put away his wife, and take another. See David Chytraeus concerning this matter, p. 117, &c. where he reports a very wise resolution of Luther's Pomeranus and Melancthon, in the case of the criminal person.

Ver. 3. And if the latter husband hate her, and write her a bill of divorcement,] This shows that no other way of putting away a wife was allowed, but only this. For, as Maimonides well observes (More Novechim, par. iii. cap. 49) if it had been lawful to do it by bare words, or simply sending her out of his house, any woman might have left her husband, and said she was put away; both she, and he that committed adultery with her, pretending a divorce, when her husband had given her none. Therefore the law wisely provided none should be put away but by such a bill as is before mentioned, whereby an authentic testimony was given of it.

Or if the latter husband die,] Whereby she became free again, as the apostle hath observed, Rom. vii. 2.

Ver. 4. Her former husband,—may not take her again] One would have thought there could have been no danger of any man's desiring her again, whom he had solemnly sent away with dislike. But such is the levity and fickleness of human nature (the Jews at least were so inconstant), that it seems men sometimes sought after that which they had rejected: and this was the punishment of their injustice, in putting away a wife without sufficient cause (as by this they acknowledged), that they might not again enjoy her.

After that she is defiled;] This is the reason why the former husband might not marry her again (as the Jews take it), because by her second marriage she was defiled. Which they say she was (so that he could not have her again), though she had been only espoused to a new husband who had never lain with her. For they make no difference between her second marriage and second espousals, but think a woman contracted such a pollution by her second espousals, that she would not have been so much polluted, if she had played the whore after her divorce. For in that case, they say, he might notwithstanding have married her again; but not after she had been married to another. Thus Mr. Selden reports their opinion, lib. i. Uxor. Heb. cap. 11, where he observes, that the Mahometans, who are wont in many things to ape the Jews, here quite differ from them; allowing a man liberty to take his wife again, though he had divorced her three times.

Now the ground upon which a divorced woman was accounted defiled or unclean, after another man had married her, I suppose, was, that this was looked upon as a solemn renunciation of her former husband on her part, who had been renounced by him by the bill of divorce; but he was not absolutely renounced by her till she married another, whereby she was totally alienated from him. This made her unclean, not in herself, nor with respect to her second husband, whom she married, nor with respect to any other man (who might marry her without any pollution), but only with respect to her first husband, unto whom, by this law, she was made unclean; for so all things forbidden to the Jews were accounted, as appears from Acts x. 14, 15, where all meats prohibited by the law are called unclean; and God is said to have cleansed them, by taking off that prohibition.

For that is abomination] That is, to return to her first husband, and to be his wife again: for this, saith Abarbinel, was to imitate the Egyptians, who changed their wives, and took them again into their houses; which was the occasion of great filthiness. But this intimates, that if she had not been married to any other man, but kept herself free, she might have been his wife again, if he had a mind to be reconciled to her. And this shows also, that God intended to discourage them from putting away their wives, by making them incapable, after they had been married to another, for ever to enjoy them again, though they grew very rich, or otherwise desirable, which inclined many, no doubt, to consider well before they parted with them.

Thou shalt not cause the land to sin,] The people of the land might, by such a large indulgence, have been tempted to pollute it with many sins, and thereby bring God's judgments upon it (see Jer. iii. 1). For, as Isaac Arama glosses, if this had not been prohibited, a gate had been opened unto vile men, "to make a trade of changing their wives," and thereby filled the land with whoredoms.

Ver. 5. When a man hath taken a new wife,] The He-

6 ¶ No man shall take the nether or the upper millstone to pledge : for he taketh a man's life to pledge.

7 ¶ If a man be found stealing any of his brethren of the children of Israel, and maketh merchandise of him, or selleth him ; then that brews think (as I observed before, xx. 7), that, whether he had married a virgin or a widow, he was to have the privilege here mentioned; yea, they extend it to him who had married his brother's wife; but not to him who had married her whom he put away, and might take again, if she had not been married since that to another man. For she could not be said to be a new wife.

He shall not go out to war,] See Deut. xx. 7.

Neither be charged with any business :] No public employment was to be put upon him, which might occasion his absence from his wife; not so much as watching, or such like. For the better understanding of which, it must be remembered, what was said about the fearful and timorous, who were bid to return home from the army, lest they disheartened their brethren, xx. 8. And yet these men were bound to furnish the army with victuals and water, to clear the ways, and take up their quarters; but a new bridegroom was free from all these. Only they made a difference between a war by the Divine commandment, and one undertaken voluntarily: unto the former of which they think this immunity doth not extend, but only to the latter. In the margin these words are translated, nor any thing pass upon him, that is, he shall not pay tribute.

He shall be free at home one year,] The same time of freedom it was thought reasonable to grant unto builders and planters, because they are joined with new-married men in the speech the priest made before they went to battle, xx. 5—7.

And shall cheer up his wife] Make much of her, as we speak, and so endear himself to her by his kindness, that there might be no occasion of a divorce. For the prevention of which this law seems to have been intended; that by so long a conversation together, without any interruption, they might have so perfect an understanding, one of another, and such a mutual confidence might be settled, that he might not easily entertain any jealousies of her, when he should be absent in the wars, or elsewhere.

Ver. 6. No man shall take the nether or the upper millstone to pledge :] This is a law of the same nature with that Exod. xx. 26, 27, for the preservation of mercy, beneficence, and clemency towards the poor, as Maimonides speaks, More Nevochim, par. iii. cap. 39.

For he taketh a man's life to pledge.] That is, his livelihood: by which he maintains himself and his family, and keeps them from starving. By this reason it was unlawful to take any other thing for a security, by the want of which a man might be in danger to be undone. For instance, they did not allow any man to seize upon the oxen which were at plough. He who broke this law was scourged.

Ver. 7. If a man be found stealing any of his brethren.] If he were either taken in the fact, or it was plainly proved against him. So the very words of the Athenian law were, Ἐάν τις φανερός γίνηται ἀδελφοδοξίμενος, "if a man be an apparent man-stealer."

And maketh merchandise of him,] This was the end of man-stealing, to make a gain of him, either by exchanging him for some commodity, or selling him for money.

Then that thief shall die ;] This crime was punished with death, though stealing of beasts or other thief shall die; and thou shalt put evil away from among you.

8 ¶ Take heed in the plague of leprosy, that thou observe diligently, and do according to all that the priests the Levites shall teach you : as I commanded them, so ye shall observe to do.

things was not (see Exod. xxi. 16), because it was very heinous on a double account, both by depriving the community of one of its members, and making him a slave in another country. And, indeed, the most moderate lawyers did not know how to secure men in the possession of things very valuable, but by inflicting such a punishment on those that stole them. Thus, after Solon had tempered the rigid law of Draco, which punished all theft with death, by ordering in most cases only the payment of double, he enacted the stealing of a great sum of money to be capital; nay, he made it a great crime to steal dung, because it was a thing of great value in that country, which was very barren, and needed it for their ground. How much more valuable was a man in all men's account, whom if any man stole, the law was ταῦτα θάνατον ἵνα τὴν ζῆμίαν, "that death should be his punishment;" as Xenophon reports it. And he was accounted ἀδελφοδοξίτης, a "man-stealer," who, not only by force or by fraud, carried away a freeman, and sold him for a slave, or suppressed him; but he who inveigled away another man's servant, and persuaded him to run away, or concealed such a fugitive (as Sam. Petitus observes, out of Pollux and others, lib. vii. Leges Atticas, tit. 5. p. 533). Which makes me think not only he that stole "one of his brethren of the children of Israel," but he that stole a proselyte of any sort, or the servant of a stranger, was liable to the punishment mentioned in this law of Moses.

Put evil away from among you.] By these words we may understand the greatness of his crime; for they are never used in this book, but when Moses speaks of the punishment of some enormous sin (see xiii. 5. xvii. 7. xix. 19, &c.)

Ver. 8. Take heed in the plague of leprosy,] This was the highest legal uncleanness, and therefore the greatest caution was to be used to prevent its contagion.

Do according to all that the priests] They were constituted by the law the sole judges whether a man had the leprosy or not; and were to order his separation from others if he had: and frequently make inspection whether it spread, or was at a stand, &c. See the thirteenth and fourteenth chapters of Leviticus; where there are laws about houses and garments, as well as persons infected with this disease by the hand of God, as the Jews understand it.

Shall teach you :] To teach in this place signifies to declare the obligation of the law by the judges of it, the priests the Levites. Thus Jehoshaphat is said to have sent his princes "to teach in the cities of Judah," and with them he sent Levites and priests, 2 Chron. xviii. 18, where R. Solomon notes, that it was the business of the priests and Levites to teach and instruct, as is here written in this place (which he quotes), and the princes went with them, that none might disobey them, but be constrained by their authority to do according to their command. See Mr. Thorndike, in his Religious Assemblies, ch. 2. p. 22, where he observes, that in Leviticus, direction is given to the priests how to proceed in judging leprosy; but no provision made till now, that the people should stand to their judgment.

They who imagine that the priest had the care of lepers, as their physicians, forget that no other dis-

9 Remember what the LORD thy God did unto Miriam by the way, after that ye were come forth out of Egypt.

10 ¶ When thou dost lend thy brother any thing, thou shalt not go into his house to fetch his pledge.

11 Thou shalt stand abroad, and the man to whom thou dost lend shall bring out the pledge abroad unto thee.

12 And if the man be poor, thou shalt not sleep with his pledge:

ceased persons are ordered to repair to them; which is a sign they did not pretend to cure them, but only to preserve others from being defiled by them; and to do what was necessary for their cleansing, when they were healed by God.

So ye shall observe to do.] They were so to observe the priests, as to mark what God commanded; and accordingly obey them, not against, but according to his command.

Ver. 9.] This seems to be mentioned, that they might not think much to be shut up seven days, when they were but suspected to have the leprosy, and seven days more to make farther trial, and to be put out of the camp, when it appeared plainly they had this disease (Lev. xiii. 4, 5, 45, 46), since so great a person as Miriam was excluded so long from the society of God's people (Numb. xii. 15). And this may be looked upon as an admonition to take care, lest they spoke evil of dignities (which brought this punishment on Miriam), or disobeyed the commands of the priest, which might bring the like, or some other judgment upon them.

Ver. 10.] This was a very merciful provision for the poor, whose houses he would have so privileged, that no man might enter into them without their consent, and there choose what he pleased for the security of his debt: but he was to take what the borrower could best spare.

Ver. 11. Stand abroad.] Keep without door.

Shall bring out the pledge abroad unto thee.] So the debtor, not the creditor, was to choose what pledge he would give, for he best knew what he could, with most convenience to himself, part withal; and if it was sufficient, the lender had reason to be satisfied with it.

Ver. 12.] But restore it before night, which is to be understood of such things as were necessary for the preservation of his life or health, as the following words demonstrate.

Ver. 13. In any case thou shalt deliver him the pledge again—that he may sleep in his own raiment.] And not be forced to borrow of others a necessary covering to defend him from the cold; and not be able, perhaps, to procure it (see Exod. xxii. 26, 27). Which law seems to have been intended to keep them from taking any pledge of a very poor man. For to what purpose should they every morning fetch a pledge and every evening carry it back again, which would only create them a great deal of trouble!

Bless thee:] Pray God to bless thee.

It shall be righteousness unto thee] Procure thee a blessing from God, who will esteem it an act of great mercy: which is often called by the name of righteousness in the holy books, Ps. cxli. 9. Prov. x. 2, &c. Nay, such-like actions are properly called tzedekah, or righteousness, according to the opinion of Maimonides, who observes (More Nevochim, par. iii. cap. 53), that this word doth merely signify giving to every man his own. "For when a man pays the hireling his wages, or a debtor pays his creditor, that is not 13 In any case thou shalt deliver him the pledge again when the sun goeth down, that he may sleep in his own raiment, and bless thee: and it shall be righteousness unto thee before the LORD thy God.

14 ¶ Thou shalt not oppress an hired servant that is poor and needy, whether he be of thy brethren, or of thy strangers that are in thy land within thy gates:

15 At his day thou shalt give him his hire, neither shall the sun go down upon it; for he is called tzedekah; but what a man doth out of pure love to virtue and goodness (as when a man cures a poor wretch of his wounds), is properly called by that name. From whence it is said, concerning the restoring of a poor man's pledge, 'it shall be to thee for righteousness.' That is, saith Dr. Hammond (in his Practical Catechism), that degree of mercy which the law required of every Jew, without which he could not be accounted righteous: but there was a degree of bounty beyond this called chasidah, which was an excess of righteousness or goodness.

Ver. 14. Thou shalt not oppress an hired servant] Either by putting more work upon him than he is able to do, or by detaining his wages when it is done. The latter of these is most properly here denoted, as Const. L'Empereur observes out of D. Kimchi, who in his Book of Roots saith, the difference between עָבָד (which is the word here) and שָׂכָר doth not lie in this, that the former signifies to defraud, the latter to take away by violence; but the former signifies to detain by force, and the other to take away by force what belongs to another. And for the proof of it, alleges this place in Deuteronomy, which he thus translates, "Thou shalt not detain by force the wages of the hireling." Which is expressed more clearly, Mal. iii. 5. Annot. in Bava-kama, cap. 9. sec. 7. p. 247.

That is poor and needy,] And therefore the more to be pitied, and not oppressed, either by giving him less wages than another man, when he ought rather to have greater, or by keeping back his hire beyond the time wherein it ought to be paid: for, as the ancient lawyers say, "Minus solvit, qui tempore minus solvit;" as it is observed by Grotius upon James v. 4.

Whether he be of thy brethren, or of thy strangers] No difference was to be made between a natural Jew and a proselyte of the gate, according to the general law, Lev. xix. 34. For such oppression might tempt them to do very wicked things; for instance, expose or kill their children, when they were not able to maintain them; after the manner of the heathen, who were frequently guilty of this, and thought it no crime when their poverty constrained them to it. See Petrus Petitus, lib. iii. Miscell. Observ. cap. 17, where he produces many proofs of it, both out of Greek and Roman authors.

Ver. 15. At his day thou shalt give him his hire,] Which was due to him, either by contract or by natural equity; and whether he had agreed to serve him for a day, or a month, or a year. At the time when his wages was due, it was to be punctually paid unless he were willing to have it remain in his hands. For this was not an act of mercy, but of justice, to pay a hireling his wages.

Neither shall the sun go down upon it:] This shows he speaks particularly of one that served for a day's wages, and could not forbear the payment of it, because he was so poor as not to be able to provide himself and family necessaries without it.

Setteth his heart upon it:] Eagerly expects it, as poor, and setteth his heart upon it : lest he cry against thee unto the Lord, and it be sin unto thee.

16 The fathers shall not be put to death for the children, neither shall the children be put to death for the fathers : every man shall be put to death for his own sin.

17 ¶ Thou shalt not pervert the judgment of the stranger, nor of the fatherless ; nor take the widow's raiment to pledge :

18 But thou shalt remember that thou wast a bondman in Egypt, and the Lord thy God redeemed thee thence : therefore I command thee to do this thing.

19 ¶ When thou cuttest down thine harvest in thy field, and hast forgot a sheaf in the field, thou shalt not go again to fetch it : it shall be for the stranger, for the fatherless, and for the widow : that the Lord thy God may bless thee in all the work of thine hands.

20 When thou beatest thine olive tree, thou shalt not go over the boughs again : it shall be for the stranger, for the fatherless, and for the widow.

the support of his life. So the Vulgar translates it, "With it he supports his soul," that is, his life. Lest he cry—unto the Lord,] Make grievous complaints to him who made both rich and poor.

It be sin unto thee.] God will hear his cry, and severely punish thee [see James v. 4].

Ver. 16. This is a rule of common reason, which was anciently expressed in this vulgar saying, Noxa caput sequitur : and is excellently expressed by Dion Chrysostom, ἰκαστος αὐτῷ γινεται τῆς ἀτυχίας αὐτοῦ, "Let every man be the author of his own misfortune." Which Amazia, king of Judah, thought extended to the children of traitors, unto whom he allowed the benefit of this law, as we read in so many words, 2 Kings xiv. 6. 2 Chron. xxv. 4. And not only Philo, but Dionysius Halicarnassus condemns the custom of those nations who put to death the children of tyrants or traitors. See Grotius, lib. ii. De Jure Belli et Pacis, cap. 21. sect. 13, 14, where he observes that God indeed threatens "to visit the sins of the fathers upon the children;" but in this case, Jure domini non pænæ utitur, "he uses the right of dominion, not of punishment."

Ver. 17. Thou shalt not pervert the judgment of the stranger, nor of the fatherless;] Nor of the widow, who is joined with them, ver. 19. For such persons commonly have none to stand by them, and plead their cause; and therefore the judges were to take the greater care to see them have justice done (Exod. xxii. 21. xxiii. 9).

Nor take a widow's raiment to pledge;] Which is to be understood of one that is poor; as appears from ver. 12 (see Exod. xxii. 21. 26, 27).

Ver. 18.] The remembrance of their own miserable condition in Egypt, till God took pity upon them, was to work compassion in them towards others in like forlorn estate; otherwise they did not remember as they ought. This is often urged as a reason for showing mercy to strangers, and such-like helpless persons, particularly in Lev. xix. 33, 34, and in this book, x. 19, 20. xv. 15.

Ver. 19. Hast forgot a sheaf in the field, thou shalt not go again to fetch it;] There are many merciful laws about the poor (see Lev. xix. 9, 10. xxiii. 22). They are all put together by Mr. Selden, lib. vi. De Jure Nat. et Gent. cap. 6, where the exposition the Talmudists give of this law seems to me to be so strict that it could do little good. For they say a sheaf was not taken to be forgotten, unless not only the owner of the field, but all the laborers forgot it; and if none of them remembered it, yet if any man that passed by that way came and gave them notice of it, it was not looked upon as left by forgetfulness. Yet they are so kind as to extend this law, not only to the sheaves of corn left in the field, but to bunches of grapes, and other fruit, which were left behind in their vineyards or orchards. And it seems no unreasonable interpretation of this law, that if an owner of a field, or his workmen, called to mind, before they were gone quite out of the field, that a sheaf was left in such a place, they might go back and fetch it; but not, if they did not remember it till they came into the city. They that would see more cases about this matter, may look into Maimonides De Donis Pauperum, translated by Dr. H. Prideaux (cap. 5), and his very learned annotations upon it. Josephus seems to me to have interpreted this law most charitably, lib. iv. Archæolog. cap. 8, where he saith, they were not only not to go back to fetch what they had forgot, but to leave on purpose corn, and grapes, and olives, &c. for the benefit of the poor.

It shall be for the stranger, &c.] Who are commonly put together as proper objects of charity: and are (as Mr. Selden speaks) a kind of paraphrase upon the word poor.

That the Lord thy God may bless thee] Make their land still very fruitful; which was a reward of their charity.

Ver. 20. When thou beatest thine olive tree,] As they were wont to do, in those countries, with sticks, to bring down the olives.

Thou shalt not go over the boughs again;] Not search the boughs, after they are beaten, whether any be left.

It shall be for the stranger, &c.] Who might go into the olive-yards, after the owner had carried out his fruit, and gather what they found still remaining on the trees.

Ver. 21. When thou gatherest the grapes of thy vineyard, thou shalt not glean it afterward;] By making a new gathering after the first. But if the poor themselves left any behind, after the usual time allowed for the gathering such fruits or corn as were left for them, it was lawful for the owner to take it himself; and he was not bound, either to pay the poor the price of it, or to leave it for the beasts and birds. For the command is (say the Jewish doctors, who nicely scan these things), that it shall be for the poor, and that it be left for them; but not any thing given them in lieu of it (see Selden, in the forenamed place, p. 699).

It shall be for the stranger, &c.] The Jewish doctors by the stranger here mentioned, in this and the foregoing verses, would have only proselytes of justice, understood, who had entirely embraced the Jewish religion: so that other proselytes, and mere gentiles, had no right to these things. For by the law, say they, concerning the title for the poor (xiv. 29), the Levite and the stranger are put together: and the Levite being a child of the covenant, so must the stranger be, who is joined with him. But this restriction confined this charity within such narrow bounds, that they themselves are not satisfied with it; and therefore they add, that though such only as were within the covenant had a right to these things by the law, yet if proselytes of the gate, or mere gentiles, mixed themselves with the Jews, by the decree of their wise men, they were not to be hindered from gathering their share in these fruits of the earth which were left for the poor. And they gave this reason for it because of the way of peace, that is, offices of humanity and charity ought to be extended to all (see Selden, p. 700).

and neglected by the natives of the country, the remembrance of God's mercy in providing for them had been a powerful motive to obey this command; and therefore the remembrance of the slavery and grievous oppressions under which they there groaned was a far greater (see ver. 18).

CHAPTER XXV.

1 Stripes must not exceed forty. 4 The ox is not to be muzzled. 5 Of raising seed unto a brother. 11 Of the innocent woman. 13 Of unjust weights. 17 The memory of Amalek is to be blotted out.

1 If there be a controversy between men, and they come unto judgment, that the judges may judge them; then they shall justify the righteous, and condemn the wicked.

2 And it shall be, if the wicked man be worthy to be beaten, that the judge shall cause him to lie down, and to be beaten before his face, according to his fault, by a certain number.

3 Forty stripes he may give him, and not exceed: lest, if he should exceed, and beat him above these with many stripes, then thy brother should seem vile unto thee.

CHAP. XXV.

Ver. 1. If there be a controversy] It is evident, by the sequel, that he speaks of criminal causes.

The judges may judge them;] Who were appointed to be constituted and settled in all their gates (see xvi. 18).

They shall justify the righteous,] Acquit him who is falsely accused of doing any wrong.

Condemn the wicked.] To suffer such punishment as his crime deserves.

Ver. 2. If the wicked man be worthy to be beaten,] For what crimes men were to be beaten, by the sentence of the lower courts, as well as by that of the great Sanhedrin, see Selden, lib. ii. De Synedr. cap. 13. n. 7. 8. They were in all, as they reckon, two hundred and seven.

The judge shall cause him to lie down,] By his officers who attended the court.

Before his face,] In open court. But he was first to be admonished; and the witnesses were to be produced against him, as in capital causes: after which the judge commanded him to lie down before a low pillar, to which his hands were tied; and he being stripped down to his waist, the executioner stood behind him upon a stone; where he scourged him both on the back and breast, with things made of an ox's hide, before the face of the judges: for though one judge be only mentioned, the execution was done before the whole bench, after the sentence was pronounced by one of them.

According to his fault,] For the violation of a negative precept he might be scourged before the court, consisting of three judges; but not for the violation of an affirmative, which was to be done before the court of twenty-three, as Selden observes in the place forenamed, sect. 6.

By a certain number.] He was condemned to receive more or fewer stripes, proportionable to his crime; and all the time the executioner was scourging him, the principal judge proclaimed these words (Deut. xxviii. 58), with a loud voice, "If thou observe not all the words of this law, &c. then the Lord shall make thy plagues wonderful," &c. adding those, xxix. 9, "Keep therefore the words of this covenant, and do them," &c. Concluding at last with those of the Psalmist, lxxviii. 38. "But he being full of compassion, forgave their iniquities." Which he was to repeat, if he had finished these sayings before the full number of stripes were given (see Selden, lib. ii. De Synedr. cap. 13. n. 6, which I find in the title Maccoth, cap. 3. sect. 16, and see G. Schickard, Mischpat Hammelech, cap. 2. p. 57, 58).

Ver. 3. Forty stripes he may give him,] Which was more merciful than the Athenian law mentioned by Æschines, which was inflicted upon criminals, ἑξήδημοσία μαστιγι πενήκοντα πληγάς, "fifty stripes by the public scourge." But none among the Jews were to receive above forty for any crime; fewer they might inflict, though not more.

And not exceed:] Of this they were so careful, that as one of the three judges commanded the executioner to strike, another told the stripes, while the third pronounced the sentences out of the Scripture before mentioned, to admonish him, and every one else, of the justice of the punishment. So Schickard observes out of Maimonides, in the place above named. For the prevention also of excess in this punishment, they were wont to give but thirty-nine stripes, and no more; though the offender was ever so strong or pertinacious. Thus the Jews generally affirm, and it appears to be true, by what St. Paul saith of himself, 2 Cor. xi. 24, "Of the Jews five times I received forty stripes save one;" which is exactly the phrase of Mischna in Maccoth, cap. 3. sect. 10, where they interpret forty stripes by the next number to forty, i. e. thirty-nine. For which they give a foolish reason in the Gemara (as Joh. Coch there observes); but Maimonides gives a sober account, that this was ordered, lest the executioner, by carelessness, might exceed the number of forty, beyond which the law required them not to go; but it was lawful to fall short of it, and therefore they required him to stop at the thirty-ninth stroke. Yet if any man deserved this punishment twice together, they did sometimes exceed the number of forty, and went so far as to sentence such a malefactor to receive seventy-nine stripes; as Mr. Selden observes in the same place: where he likewise notes, on the other side, that if a man was so weak, that he was ready to faint away, before he had received thirty-nine, the judges ordered the executioner to stay his hand.

Lest, if he should exceed—then thy brother should seem vile unto thee.] Being beaten like a dog, as we speak; that is, so cruelly, that the marks of it re-

4 ¶ Thou shalt not muzzle the ox when he treadeth out the corn.

maintained afterward, to make him contemptible. Which the law was so far from intending, that the Jews say no man was to be reproached afterward with this whipping, or the crime for which he was whipped, because he was still a brother, as the word here is. And therefore he was to be restored to the same respect among them that he had before, nay, to any office which before he enjoyed; except he was the president of the Sanhedrin, who was never to be restored to his power, if he had been scourged, nor equally honored with his inferior colleagues. So Schickard observes, out of Maimonides, in the forenamed book, p. 62.

Ver. 4.] It was the custom, not only in this country, but among the Egyptians, Greeks, and Romans, to use oxen in treading out their corn, either with their feet bare, or by drawing a cart, or other instrument, over it. And while they were at work some muzzled them, and others daubed their mouths with dung; others hung a wooden instrument about their necks, which hindered them from stooping down; or put sharp pricks in their mouths; or kept them without drink; or covered their corn with skins, that they might not be able to come at it (see Bochartus, in his Hieroicozon, par. i. lib. ii. cap. 40. p. 401). Which inhumanity God here forbids, and instructs his people, by showing mercy to their beasts, to be kind one to another, particularly to their servants and laborers, but above all, to those who labored in the work of the ministry, for the salvation of souls, as St. Paul argues, 1 Cor. ix. 9 (see Bonferius).

Ver. 5. If brethren dwell together.] They are said to dwell together, not only who were in the same family, but in the same country, Gen. xiii. 5, 6.

And one of them die, and have no child.] If he left a child, though he were a manzer, or an apostate, his next brother was not bound to marry his wife; but if he left a child by a slave, or a gentile, he was. If he left his wife with child, and she miscarried, he was bound; but if she brought a live child, after she had gone with it nine months, he was free. And by a child is to be understood either a son or daughter (see Selden, lib. De Successionibus ad bona Defuncti, cap. 14).

The wife of the dead shall not marry without unto a stranger.] This shows the end of this law was to preserve inheritances in the family to which they belonged.

Her husband's brother shall go in unto her.] The Hebrew doctors understand this obligation to lie upon the eldest brother that was surviving; and only of a brother that was by the same father. For though they had the same mother, if they had not the same father, no obligation lay upon him: "For brethren (saith Maimonides) by the mother's side, are not accounted brethren, either in the matter of inheritances, or of marrying a brother's wife: but they are as if they were not brethren; for there is no fraternity which is not from the father" (see Heideggerus Exercit. i. De Œconom. Patriarch. 10. 16, and Selden, Uxor. Hebr. p. 80). But the king, they say, was excepted from this law, as Schickard observes in his Jus Regium, p. 56.

And perform the duty of an husband's brother unto

6 And it shall be, that the firstborn which she beareth, shall succeed in the name of his brother which is dead, that his name be not put out of Israel.

7 And if the man like not to take his brother's wife, then let his brother's wife go up to the gate unto the elders, and say, My husband's brother refuseth to raise up unto his brother a name in her.] This was a law before the time of Moses, among the patriarchs, as we learn from Gen. xxxviii. 7, 8. &c. And it was so well understood to be a bounden duty, that the Hebrew doctors say, it was not necessary there should be any solemn marriage celebrated with such widow; because, unless her husband's brother renounced her, she was esteemed his wife, min hashamajim, by the authority of God; and that, whether she had been only espoused by the deceased brother, or his complete wife. Yet by the constitution of their elders, he was to contract with her before two witnesses, and give her a piece of money; before which it was not lawful for him to lie with her. There was to be also a sacred benediction of the marriage; and her dowry assigned her by an instrument. But if he did lie with her before these solemnities, there was no formal contract exacted of him afterward; he was only scourged for contemning the constitutions of their elders, and compelled to settle a dowry upon her. See Selden, lib. i. Uxor. Hebr. cap. 12, where he observes, that, in case a man left several widows, if his brother either married, or renounced one of them, all the rest were free from this law. And if several brethren died, and left every one of them a wife, without issue, the surviving brother might either take or reject them all; or take one or two, and let the rest alone, as he pleased. And if the eldest brother, that married his brother's relict, died also without issue, then the next surviving brother was to marry her; and so forward, according to the case supposed in the gospel. And yet that brother only was admitted to this marriage, who was born before his brother's death; which they gather from the first words of this verse, "If brethren dwell together;" which cannot be meant of one born after his brother's death. They might likewise have concluded, from this phrase, that such of the brethren as had wives already were not bound to take her to wife, but only he that was unmarried; who might be supposed to be meant by "him that dwelt together with his brother," and was not yet gone to a house of his own. But I fear I have said too much of a matter now quite antiquated, unless it be among some of the Indians and Persians, and among the Tartars that inhabit Iberia and Albania, who still retain this custom; as Huetius observes, in his Demonstratio Evangel. prop. iv. cap. 11. n. 1.

Ver. 6. The firstborn which she beareth, shall succeed in the name of his brother which is dead.] Shall be reputed the son and heir of the deceased; but there was no necessity to give him his name.

That his name be not put out of Israel.] That a family in Israel might not be lost; for this was a provision for the preservation of families (see Numb. xxvii. 4). And therefore, if there was no brother, properly so called, to perform this duty, the next of kin (who is also called a brother in a large sense) was bound to marry her. See of this word name, Numb. xxvii. 4.

Ver. 7. If the man like not to take his brother's wife.] Here now was a great mitigation of that ancient law, which had been before the time of Moses, that a man might refuse to marry his brother's wife, if he did not like her. Which was not permitted before, as ap-

Israel, he will not perform the duty of my husband's brother.

8 Then the elders of his city shall call him, and speak unto him: and if he stand to it, and say, I like not to take her;

9 Then shall his brother's wife come unto him in the presence of the elders, and loose his shoe from off his foot, and spit in his face, and shall answer and say, So shall it be done unto that man that will not build up his brother's house.

pears by the story of Onan (Gen. xxxvii.), who married Tamar against his mind (as his behaviour towards her demonstrates), which he needed not to have done, if this permission, which here follows, had been then in use.

Go up to the gate] Where the court of judgment sat, as I have often observed (see xvi. 18).

Unto the elders,] A court consisting of three elders was sufficient to judge in this matter. And it was of no consequence, whether these three were created elders, according to the solemn form among them, by laying on of hands; but it was sufficient, if they were such as they called elders of the street, or common men (see lib. i. Uxor. Hebr. cap. 15. and lib. ii. De Synedr. cap. 7. n. 3).

And say, My husband's brother, &c.] She was to put a bill of complaint against him in these words.

Ver. 8.] He being summoned to appear before them, together with the woman (who they say was to be fasting), and two witnesses at the least, she opened the whole matter. And then the question being asked, whether it were three months since her husband's death (which were to be allowed, to see whether she proved with child or not), and whether this man was next of kin; and a satisfactory answer being returned, the judges laid the law before them, admonished them seriously to consider, on each side, their age, or any disparity or incommodity that might be in their marriage, and accordingly to resolve; and then they asked the man, in express words, whether he would marry her, and raise up seed to his brother. If he stood to his first resolution, as it here follows, and said, "I like not to take her;" then the woman read the words foregoing, ver. 7, "My husband's brother refuseth to raise up unto his brother a name in Israel," &c., and then proceeded to do as follows, ver. 9 (see Selden, in the book forenamed, cap. 14).

Ver. 9. Then shall his brother's wife come unto him and loose his shoe from off his foot,] From his right foot, as the Hebrew doctors say; which was done, I suppose, as a mark of infamy, for his want of natural affection; which made him unworthy to be reckoned among freemen, but rather deserve to be thrust down into the condition of slaves, who were wont to go barefoot.

Spit in his face,] In contempt of him who had despised her. The Hebrew doctors, indeed expounded this only of her spitting upon the earth, directly before his face, so that the spitting might be seen by the judges. And they give this as a reason, why the king was not subject to this law of marrying his brother's wife, (and they might add the high-priest, Lev. xxi. 13, 14), because it would have been below his dignity to have had his shoe pulled off (if he had not liked the woman), or to have had her spit before him, as Bartenora's words are: which would have been a better reason, if they had said, it had been very unbecoming for her to have spit in the king's face. See Selden, lib. i. Uxor. Hebr. cap. 10, and Hacksan, lib. i. Miscellan. cap. 7. n. 8, where he observes, the king was bound to all the six hundred and thirteen precepts, but only this of marrying his brother's wife.

Shall answer] To his peremptory refusal of her.

And say, So shall it be done unto that man, &c.] She was immediately to read these words of the law. And then the judges gave her a writing, signifying his renunciation of her, in the manner now related, that so it might be free for any other man to marry her. See the form of it in Selden, lib. i. Uxor. Hebr. cap. 14, where he hath observed certain niceties about the kind of shoe that was to be pulled off, but gives no account why this ceremony was used.

Ver. 10. As soon as she had loosed his shoe, both the judges, and all the by-standers round about, cried aloud three times, "The shoe is pulled off, the shoe is pulled off, the shoe is pulled off!" And thereupon his family had this name, as a disgrace, for not doing the duty of a brother. Some will have this pulling off the shoe to have been only a mark, that he parted with his right to her; but these words show that it was in the nature of a brand upon him and his posterity. And so Josephus saith, lib. iv. Archæolog. cap. 8, that he went out of the court with a mark of ignominy. Which doth not relate merely to her spitting in his face; for Maimonides saith expressly (in his Moré Nevochim, par. iii. cap. 49), that this action (viz. of pulling off the shoe, as well as the other) was a foul and ignominious thing in those days, intended to move men to perform the duty of a husband's brother, that they might avoid such reproach. J. Wagen-seil hath given us the exact form of the shoe, which was used on such occasions, in his Annotations upon Sota, p. 664, and see 1212, where he commends Leo Modena's account of this whole business; which differs not at all from that which I have given; only I observe that he saith, when the woman taketh off the shoe from the man's foot, she lifts it up on high, and throweth it against the ground; which I take to be a note of indignation and contempt. And he saith also, it was anciently accounted a more laudable thing to take her, than to release her; and imputes it to the corruption of men's manners, and the hardness of their hearts, that now they only look after worldly ends, either of riches or beauty: which makes very few in these days (especially among the Dutch and Italian Jews) to marry their brother's widow (see his history of the Rites and Customs of the Jews, par. iv. ch. 7).

Ver. 11. When men strive together] Fall out (as we speak) and fight, either with their fists or sticks, or other weapons.

Of him that smiteth him,] Who had wounded him, and was likely, I suppose, to be too hard for him.

Taketh him by the secrets:] As a sure means to make him let go his hold of her husband, that he might preserve himself.

Ver. 12. Thou shalt cut off her hand,] This was to be done by the sentence of the court, as a punishment for her impudence; and for the hurt which,

13 ¶ Thou shalt not have in thy bag divers weights, a great and a small.

14 Thou shalt not have in thine house divers measures, a great and a small.

15 But thou shalt have a perfect and just weight, a perfect and just measure shalt thou have: that thy days may be lengthened in the land which the Lord thy God giveth thee.

16 For all that do such things, and all that do unrighteously, are an abomination unto the Lord thy God.

17 ¶ Remember what Amalek did unto thee by the way, when ye were come forth out of Egypt;

18 How he met thee by the way, and smote the hindmost of thee, even all that were feeble behind thee, when thou wast faint and weary; and he feared not God.

perhaps, the man might have received hereby in those parts whereby mankind is propagated.

Thine eye shall not pity her.] The word her not being in the Hebrew text, several of the Jews (and Grotius seems to approve their opinion) interpret this law quite otherwise; as if the woman might both take hold of his secrets for the delivery of her husband, and also cut off the other man's hand; and they should not pity him who suffered thus, nor punish the woman, who might do any thing of this nature, to preserve one so dear to her as her husband; but this is a very forced interpretation. Maimonides is a little more reasonable in his exposition of these words, which he will have to signify, that they should lay a fine or a mulct upon her for her immodesty; which is suitable to the interpretation of that law, Exod. xxi. 24, "Eye for eye, tooth for tooth," &c. (see L'Empereur on Bava-kama, p. 198). But it is an intolerable presumption in Maimonides to say, that if any one interpret this of a proper abscission of the woman's hand, though he pretend to be a prophet, and say, The Lord hath said unto me these words, Thou shalt cut off her hand, are to be understood as the words sound (i. e. literally as we speak), and do a miracle to confirm it, he is to be looked upon as a lying prophet, and may be put to death, because it is contrary to the constant tradition of their elders. So he writes Seder Zeraim, translated by our famous Dr. Pocock, p. 15, 38. Upon which principle they killed our blessed Saviour.

Ver. 13. Divers weights.] In the Hebrew the words are, a stone and a stone: for their weights were then made of stone, as are ours now commonly of lead or brass.

A great and a small.] To buy in commodities with the great, and sell them out again by the small; which was then and is now an usual way of cheating.

Ver. 14. Divers measures.] In the Hebrew, an ephah and an ephah: for this was the most known measure among them, by which all the rest of their measures were made (see Exod. xvi. 36). From hence it was that Lucius Ampelius thought Moschos, that is Moses (who by ancient writers is called Moschos), was the inventor of weights and measures, because he took such pious care there should be no deceit in them, as the most learned Huetius observes in his Demonst. Evangel. prop. iv. cap. 8, n. 16.

Ver. 15. Thou shalt have a perfect and just weight.] Neither too scanty nor too large. See Lev. xix. 35, 36, where all these three verses are sufficiently explained.

That thy days may be lengthened.] Justice, as well as charity, was necessary to prolong their happiness in the land of promise (xvi. 20).

Ver. 16. For all that do such things.] All that any way wrong their neighbours.

Are an abomination.] This is an expression commonly used, to declare God's hatred of all idolatrous practices (see xviii. 9, 12).

Ver. 17. Remember what Amalek did unto thee by the way.] The Jews have framed three precepts out of this and the two following verses. One is, that they should "remember what Amalek did unto them." Which Maimonides, according to their oral tradition, refers to the mouth, that they should always be talking of what Amalek did to them. The second, not to forget it; which he refers to their heart: that they should never let slip out of their mind the hatred Amalek had to them. And the third, that they should "blot out their remembrance from under heaven," i. e. utterly destroy them, and leave none of them remaining. But none of the Jews have explained this better than Abarbanel; who, inquiring why such severity was expressed against the Amalekites, when the Edomites, who were of the same race, were dealt withal very favourably (as we read before, xxiii. 8), observes four reasons given here by Moses himself, why they should remember, when they were settled in the land of Canaan, and able to effect it, to exterminate this nation: for that is the single precept he gives them in charge; only he bids them not forget what Amalek had done to deserve that heavy sentence long ago passed upon them, and remaining on record (Exod. xvii. 14—16), confirmed with a solemn oath, though they were not able to execute it till they were settled in the land of promise. The first of these reasons is, because, whereas men undertake war against others, either to defend their own country, or to subdue their enemies' country, the Amalekites came forth against the Israelites without any such cause; for the Israelites did not pass by their country, and consequently gave them no apprehension of an invasion; nor had the Israelites then possession of any land of their own, which might tempt the Amalekites to covet it, and drive them out of it. But they undertook this war, with a petulant malice, only to bring them into slavery again. Which is the thing here intimated in this verse, "Remember what Amalek did to thee," &c. Unto which he should have added, that their barbarity was much aggravated, by their assaulting them when they were newly delivered from grievous oppressions, and were unaccustomed to war, and without any provocation.

Ver. 18. How he met thee by the way.] This the same Abarbanel takes to be the second cause of God's high displeasure against Amalek: that, whereas it is the custom of all countries, before they begin a war, to denounce it by heralds, showing the grounds of it, they rose up against the Israelites unexpectedly; which was a piece of the basest treachery. Which he thinks is intimated in these words, "he met thee by the way;" that is, on a sudden, by surprise, without any notice by a declaration of war. He might have added, that they did this when the Israelites were in a journey, and had travelled a great way, and in a wilderness, where they stood in need of refreshment; but were very unfit for fighting. Then, saith one of their rabbins, in Pirke Eliezer, cap. 44, "they came in like a bear in their way, to devour the mother with the children."

And smote the hindmost of thee.] This he makes the third cause; that they did not offer them a pitched battle, but only fell upon their rear (as we speak), and there cut off such as lagged behind

19 Therefore it shall be, when the LORD thy God hath given thee rest from all thine enemies round about, in the land which the LORD thy God giveth thee for an inheritance through feebleness and weariness, being unable to march so fast as the rest of their brethren. This is, in a very sober sense, suitable to the use of the word in Josh. x. 19. But what some of the Jews say, that the Amalekites cut off the privy members of certain of the tribe of Dan, in derision of circumcision, is disowned by others of them, as having no foundation. See Schickard, in his Jus Regium, p. 112, 113, where Carpovius observes, this was only a fancy of their midrashim, or preachers, wherewith they entertained the people in their sermons, on occasion of the ambiguity of the word we translate "cut off the hindermost." Which R. Zacharias much better interprets, in Pirke Eliezer, cap. 44, where he makes it to signify all that were behind the cloud (which protected those who were under it), as those who went out of the camp, by reason of some uncleanness, to wash themselves. But this is no more than an ingenious conceit; for the laws about cleansing were not then delivered.

And he feared not God.] This he makes the fourth cause; that though they feared Israel, whom they durst not look in the face, but cut them off behind, yet they feared not God, who had done such wonderful things for them in Egypt, and brought them thence with a mighty hand, and had overthrown Pharaoh in the Red Sea. Which might have made them understand, that he sets up kings and pulls down kings, as Daniel speaks, ii. 21. But instead of considering this, they would have "profaned the glory of the Lord" (as he speaks), by enslaving those whom he had but newly delivered, and continued under the protection of a glorious cloud. Unto all which may be added, that they were originally derived from the same stock with the Israelites; viz., from Isaac.

Ver. 19. God hath given thee rest from all thine enemies round about,] God did not require them to put this command in execution immediately after they were possessed of the land of Canaan, but after they were well settled there: so that there were some ages passed before they went about it; and then God himself put them in mind of it; or rather strictly enjoined it to be performed by Saul their first king: and we do not find them blamed for not doing it in the time of the judges (1 Sam. xv. 1—3).

Thou shalt blot out the remembrance of Amalek] So God commandeth Saul in the place now mentioned, "utterly destroy all they have, and spare them not; but slay both men and women," &c. For by the same justice that one person is cut off, a whole family, or a whole nation, may be utterly destroyed: that other families or nations, seeing or hearing God's judgments upon them, may be moved to flee from that wickedness for which they are punished. They are the words of Maimonides, par. iii. More Nevochim, cap. 41.

If we could believe all that the Talmudists say, we might think there were some among the Jews who endeavoured to mollify the severity of this precept: for they tell a story in Bava-bathra of Job's master, who taught him to read it thus; Blot out zechar, the male of Amalek, not zecher, the remembrance. But at the same time they tell us, Job thought to have killed him for leading him into an error.

Thou shalt not forget it.] This is not a distinct precept, but only a repetition of the foregoing; to imprint it more on their minds and hearts. And accordingly the Jews pretend to have had their hearts so set upon it, that when the officers were about to proclaim freedom from war to those persons mentioned xx. 5, 6, &c., they always excepted the war against the seven nations and Amalek, in which everybody was bound to assist.

I shall end this matter with an observation of Abarbinel, that in this paragraph about Amalek, the injunction which God gave to Moses, Exod. xvii. 14, was fulfilled by him: "Write this for a memorial in a book." No other book, saith he, is hereby meant, but the book of the law, which when Moses wrote, he was bound to mention this precept about Amalek; which he doth in this place. And if we suppose that he immediately wrote a distinct history of this matter, yet he inserted it afterward into the Pentateuch, both here and in the book of Exodus.

CHAPTER XXVI.

1 The confession of him that offereth the basket of firstfruits. 12 The prayer of him that giveth his third year's tithes. 16 The covenant between God and the people.

1 AND it shall be, when thou art come in unto the land which the LORD thy God giveth thee for an inheritance, and possessest it, and dwellest therein;

CHAP. XXVI.

Ver. 1.] When they had a settled possession of the several inheritances, which fell to their share in the land of Canaan.

Ver. 2. Take of the first of all the fruit of the earth,] This is not meant merely of the first first-fruits they should have after they were settled in Canaan, but of the first-fruits they should have every year; which being the most desirable (as Conradus Pellicanus here observes) of all other, and coveted by every one, majori aviditate, "with a greater appetite than ordi-

2 That thou shalt take of the first of all the fruit of the earth, which thou shalt bring of thy land that the LORD thy God giveth thee, and shalt put it in a basket, and shalt go unto the nary," nature itself directed men to offer them to God, the giver of all good things. And these were distinct from that mentioned Lev. xxiii. 10, being of all the fruits of the earth. The principal of which being seven, the Jews commonly say, these only were to be carried to God; viz. wheat, barley, grapes, figs, pomegranates, olives, and dates. Some of the doctors say, the first-fruits of all kind of things whatsoever were due; and a question being raised, whether a stranger was bound to pay them or not, some of them say, no; because they could not use the prostration mentioned, ver. 3. But the more common place which the LORD thy God shall choose to place his name there.

3 And thou shalt go unto the priest that shall be in those days, and say unto him, I opinion is, that they might both bring first-fruits and use the protestation, because Abraham was also the father of strangers (Gen. xvii. 5). And it may be, saith R. Bechai, that is appointed at ver. 11, of this chapter; where it is said, "Thou, and the Levite, and the stranger that is among you."

Which thou shalt bring of thy land] In order to which, they say, every owner of land, when he went into his ground, and found any figs, or bunch of grapes, or a pomegranate more forward than the rest, he was to tie a rush about it, and write upon it, "These are first-fruits." So Wagenseil, and many others, have observed out of the title Biccuring, cap. 3.

Put it in a basket,] The quantity of each, they say, was to be at least a sixtieth part. And they might be all put into the same basket, provided they were not mingled, but preserved distinct; barley being laid at the bottom, and then wheat, and next olives, and above them dates, and then pomegranates; and last of all, figs and grapes, being hung on the outside; and leaves of palm, or other trees, put between every kind of first-fruits.

R. Bechai saith, that the rich brought these fruits in baskets of gold and silver, that is, covered with gold or silver (as Maimonides speaks); and we read of the like golden baskets carried by virgins, in the feast of Bacchus at Athens (see Ezek. Spanhemius upon Callimachus's hymn to Ceres, p. 733). Now, if the basket here mentioned was made of these, or any other metal, the Jews say, the priest was to restore it to the owner, when he had emptied it: but if it was a wicker-basket, or suchlike, the priest had it together with the first-fruits (see Wagenseil upon Mischna Sota, cap. 7, sect. 3).

And shall go unto the place which the Lord thy God shall choose] The man himself was to go, as the Jews say, with the basket upon his shoulder: and a great company were wont to go together, who met at the chief city of their province. The time of going was at the feast of Pentecost (Exod. xxiii. 16), not before but at any time after, till the feast of dedication, which was in our November: after which they were not accepted. Of the manner of going up with a bullock before them, whose horns were gilt, and head crowned with an olive garland, with music, and singing in the way the first verse of Psalm cxxii., &c., see Wagenseil, in the place above mentioned; and Selden, lib. iii. De Synedriis, cap. 13, n. 3, with Dr. Lightfoot in his Temple Service.

And here I cannot but think fit to note, that the heathen, in all probability, from hence derived the custom of carrying their first-fruits, as a tithe every year, unto the island Delos, where Apollo was supposed to have his special residence. And this not only from the islands thereabouts, and the neighbouring countries, but from all parts of the world; as the Jews we find everywhere sent, from the countries where they dealt, a sum of money every year, instead of first-fruits and tithes, unto Jerusalem; which privilege the Romans allowed them, after they had conquered them, as Josephus tells us, lib. vii. De Bello Jud. cap. 13. That heathen custom, now mentioned, is expressed by Callimachus, in his hymn upon Delos, in those remarkable words, ver. 278, 279, &c.

Ἄλλα τοὶ ἀθηναῖοι ἑκατομῆροι αὐτὸν ἀπαίχθη
Πέμποντα: πᾶσαι δὲ χοροῖς ἀνάγουσι πόλιν profess this day unto the LORD thy God, that I am come unto the country which the LORD sware unto our fathers for to give us.

4 And the priest shall take the basket out of

Ἄνε πρὸς ἴσθμῳ, αἱ δ' Ἰσπερον, αἱ τ' ἀπὸ μίσην
Κλήρους ἰσθητῆρα, καὶ αἱ καθύπερθε βορέας.

The sense of which is this: "That first-fruits were sent for tithes every year from all countries, not only from the east, and west, and south, but from the north also." And they were sent with such joy, as the Jews expressed on this occasion; for all cities, he saith, did χοροῖς ἀνάγειν. And so we read in several authors, that there were θεωρίαί, as they called them, "solemn embassies" sent from several people, by chosen persons, unto Delos, to celebrate there the feast of Apollo with music and dancing, &c. Particularly the Athenians, Peloponnesians, and Messenians, &c., of whom see Ezek. Spanhemius, in his Observations upon Callimachus, p. 487. And, which is most strange, the Hyperboreans, a very northerly people, sent frugum primitias to this island, as Pliny, and I know not how many other authors, testify. Only what he calls the first-fruits of their corn, and suchlike things, they call the first-fruits of their holy things: as the same excellent person observes there (p. 490, 492, &c.). Which was done to testify his honour to this god, and for the maintenance of his priests and other ministers, who attended upon him there. For Delos, of itself, was but a barren isle, the soil being dry and stony, and called therefore by Callimachus, ver. 208, δυσήροτος.

There are other footsteps of this among the heathen; the mystica vannus iacchi, mentioned by Virgil in his Georgics, being nothing else (according to Servius), but was vineum, "a wicker basket," in which their first-fruits were carried (see the same Spanheim, p. 495).

Ver. 3. Go unto the priest] Who was then in attendance at the sanctuary, and particularly appointed to wait for their coming. When they entered the gates of the city, they sang the second verse of Psalm cxxii., "Our feet shall stand in thy gates, O Jerusalem:" and then they went to the mountain of the temple, and sang the whole hundred and fiftieth Psalm: and as soon as they entered the court of Israel, the Levites began to sing, Ps. xxx. 1, "I will extol thee, O Lord my God," &c.

Say unto him,] The following confession in this verse was made by them with the baskets on their shoulders, to stir them up to humility, as Maimonides interprets it. His words are these: "While they were compelled to carry their baskets on their shoulders, and in that manner to proclaim the Divine benefits, it signified that it was a considerable part of God's worship and service, for a man to be mindful of his afflictions and tribulations, when God had given him ease and rest from them. This the law takes care of, in several places; as when it saith, 'Thou shalt remember that thou wast a servant,' &c. with this intention, that he who lived in riches and pleasure, might be secured from the vices which spring from thence, such as pride, haughtiness, apostasy, and the like. According to what is said in this book, viii. 12, 'Lest thou eat, and art full,' &c., and xxxii. 15, 'Jeshurun waxed fat, and kicked,' &c. To prevent which, God commanded the first-fruits to be thus offered every year to his Divine Majesty" (More Nevochim, par. iii. cap. 39).

I profess this day, &c.] This is a thankful acknowledgment of God's faithfulness to his promise, whereby they were put in mind to be faithful unto him thine hand, and set it down before the altar of the LORD thy God.

5 And thou shalt speak and say before the LORD thy God, A Syrian ready to perish was my father, and he went down into Egypt, and sojourned there with a few, and became there a nation, great, mighty, and populous:

6 And the Egyptians evil entreated us, and afflicted us, and laid upon us hard bondage:

7 And when we cried unto the LORD God of our fathers, the LORD heard our voice, and looked on our affliction, and our labour, and our oppression:

of whom they held this good land, by his gracious and free gift, and held it by this tenure, of paying to him this yearly rent.

Ver. 4.] After the foregoing words were said, the basket was taken down from their shoulders, and every one holding his basket by the handle, or the rim of it, the priest put his hands under it, and waved it about, according to the prescription in the law, while the men recited the following words, ver. 5, 6, &c. This waving was a manifest token that it was offered to the Lord of the world, as an acknowledgment that he was in a peculiar manner their Lord and Sovereign of whom they held this land.

Ver. 5. Thou shalt speak and say] Audibly pronounced in the presence of God.

A Syrian ready to perish was my father.] Their father Jacob was not a Syrian by birth, for he was born in the land of Canaan. But one and the same person may be said to be of divers countries (as Bochartus hath observed), with regard either to the place of his nativity, or of his education, or of his life and conversation; which occasioned three countries to be ascribed to our blessed Saviour, viz., Bethlehem, Nazareth, and Capernaum (see his Phaleg, lib. ii. cap. 5). Thus Jacob, who was born and bred in Canaan, is notwithstanding called a Syrian, because he lived twenty years with his uncle Laban, who was a Syrian (Gen. xxv. 20), and consequently Jacob's mother was so, as were both his wives, and all his children, who were born there, except Benjamin. But he is more particularly here called a Syrian, to put them in mind of his poverty when he went first into that country, and there lived as a servant, under a hard master; which is expressed in these words, ready to perish, that is, very poor, and reduced to great straits, being forced to flee from the fury of his brother Esau, and to travel on foot to Padan-Aram (which was comprehended anciently under the name of Syria, Gen. xxxii. 10), where he was so cruelly used by his uncle Laban (xxx. 7, 39—41), that Onkelos takes these words, which we translate ready to perish, in an active sense, for him that destroys another. For by the Syrian here he understands Laban (who is so called, as I noted before, Gen. xxviii. 5), as if the meaning were, "the Syrian (that is, Laban) sought to destroy my father." For, as he used him barbarously when he was with him, so he followed after him, when he went away, with a mind to ruin him. And thus Manasseh ben Israel understands it, and many others mentioned by Fesselius, which is the sense also of the Vulgar Latin, Syrus persequebatur patrem meum.

He went down into Egypt.] Though he brought him from Laban with great substance, yet as he was still but a sojourner in the land of Canaan, so he was forced by famine to go down into Egypt for sustenance.

Sojourned there with a few.] They were but seventy persons, and lived there as strangers. All which they were now bound to commemorate, for their humiliation before God (which I observed before out

8 And the LORD brought us forth out of Egypt with a mighty hand, and with an outstretched arm, and with great terribleness, and with signs, and with wonders:

9 And he hath brought us into this place, and hath given us this land, even a land that floweth with milk and honey.

10 And now, behold, I have brought the firstfruits of the land, which thou, O LORD, hast given me. And thou shalt set it before the LORD thy God, and worship before the LORD thy God:

11 And thou shalt rejoice in every good thing of Maimonides), which might move them the more to exalt and magnify the mercy of God to them, who had made them (as it follows) a mighty nation. For this confession consists of these two parts; their own unworthiness, and God's great goodness.

Became there a nation.] See Exod. i. 7.

Ver. 6.] The goodness of God unto them in making them so numerous, was the occasion of sorer affliction than either they or their fathers had endured (see Exod. i. 9, 10, &c.). The remembrance of this was exceeding useful, to stir up their gratitude to God, not only for their deliverance from the Egyptian slavery, but bringing them into a country of their own, most plentifully stored with all manner of good things.

Ver. 7.] Having acknowledged their low, and poor, and distressed condition, now they proceed to an acknowledgment of God's wonderful goodness; which appeared the more in relieving them when they were utterly helpless (see Exod. ii. 23—25, iii. 7, 8).

Ver. 8.] See iv. 34, and vii. 19. This is so vehemently inculcated upon them (as Maimonides speaks in the place forenamed), that they should "remember the day they came out of Egypt all the days of their life," xvi. 3; Exod. x. 2. Which it became them especially to remember at this time, that they might demonstrate the truth of prophecy both concerning punishments and rewards.

Ver. 9.] As they remember the terrible plagues upon Egypt in the foregoing verse, so they commemorate the singular blessings bestowed upon them in this.

Ver. 10. I have brought the firstfruits, &c.] Thus they concluded this solemn rite, as they began it (ver. 3), with an acknowledgment that they held this land of God as the supreme Lord, and that by his free gift.

Set it before the Lord thy God.] Having said these words, they left the basket by the altar, as the Jews say, where it had been placed (ver. 4), and then the priest set it before the sanctuary, where God dwelt by his special presence there.

Worship before the Lord.] They made a profound reverence towards the holy place, by bowing their bodies as low as they could, and so went out of the temple: so the Hebrew word imports. And this outward act of worship, no doubt, was accompanied, in all good men, with humble thanks to God for his benefits, and prayer for the continuance of them.

Ver. 11.] They were to make a feast at the time of offering these first-fruits; and there to entertain the Levites, and the strangers, as well as their own family. These feasts were made out of the provision mentioned, xii. 6, 7, xvi. 10—12. Besides which, the bullock, which went before them when they carried up the first-fruits from their several cities, was offered for a peace-offering, when they came to the sanctuary; as Mr. Selden observes in the place above mentioned (lib. iii. De Synedr. cap. 13, p. 203).

Ver. 12. When thou hast made an end of tithing.] For there was a second tith to be paid after the first to the Levites, as was observed above, xii. 6, and is which the Lord thy God hath given unto thee, and unto thine house, thou, and the Levite, and the stranger that is among you.

12 ¶ When thou hast made an end of tithing all the tithes of thine increase the third year, which is the year of tithing, and has given it unto the Levite, the stranger, the fatherless, and the widow, that they may eat within thy gates, and be filled; plainly spoken of, xiv. 22, 23, &c. Which the Jews call the "consummation or finishing of tithing," as I observed there, ver. 29. And so these words may be translated, "When thou hast finished all the tithes of thine increase."

The third year, which is the year of tithing,] Every third year, the second tithe before mentioned was to be employed to a peculiar use (see xix. 28, 29), as it follows here in the next words (so the Jews expound it, whose sense our Mr. Mede expresses in a few words). For two years together they paid the Levites' tithe, and the festival tithe; but in the third year they paid the Levites' tithe, and the poor man's tithe; that is, what was wont in other years to be spent in feasting, was wholly spent every third year upon the poor (book i. Discourse xxxii. p. 228). But there are some that think they were bound every third year to pay this poor man's tithe, besides that to the Levites and the festival tithe: about which I shall not here dispute.

Give it unto the Levite, &c.] According to the commandment, xiv. 29 (see there).

Ver. 13. Then thou shalt say] As they were every year to make the foregoing profession when they brought their first-fruits, so they were to make another profession, which here follows, every third year; "When the course of all manner of tithing, (as Mr. Mede there expresses it) was come about."

Before the Lord] This sounds as if they were to make this profession before the most holy place at the sanctuary. Which seems to confute the common exposition of the Jewish doctors, that this tithe of the third year was not to be spent there, but at home, within their own gates. But it may be supposed that every man was privately to make this solemn profession, as in the presence of God, who knew the truth of what he said. Or rather, that the next time he went up to worship at God's house, he was bound to make this declaration before the Divine Majesty. Which is the most likely interpretation, because these words, before the Lord, are always so used in these books. And unless they had been obliged to this, their covetous and cruel disposition might have inclined them to defraud the poor, which by this means was prevented. For though men might have satisfied themselves in omitting this profession, if it had been left merely to their own private consciences, yet when they were bound to come and make it publicly at God's own house, as they could not avoid it, so few would be found so impudently profane as solemnly to tell a lie to God himself.

I have brought away the hallowed things] Things separated by the Divine commandment from their own private use, for the use of the poor.

Out of mine house,] From the rest of the fruits of the earth which they had gathered.

Have given them unto the Levite, &c.] That is, unto the refreshment of the poor. So the Jerusalem Targum paraphrases ver. 2, which is worth the mentioning: "In the third year, which is the year of tithing for the poor, ye shall give the first tithes to the Levites, and then the tithes of the poor to the 13 Then thou shalt say before the Lord thy God, I have brought away the hallowed things out of mine house, and also have given them unto the Levite, and unto the stranger, to the fatherless, and to the widow, according to all thy commandments which thou hast commanded me: I have not transgressed thy commandments, neither have I forgotten them:

14 I have not eaten thereof in my mourning strangers, fatherless, and widows, that they may eat in their cities, and be filled."

According to all thy commandments] According to the direction before mentioned, xiv. 29.

I have not transgressed thy commandments, &c.] Neither done contrary to God's precepts, nor forgotten to perform them; either by keeping these tithes to themselves, or by bestowing them otherwise than God appointed.

Ver. 14. I have not eaten thereof in my mourning,] After the general profession mentioned in the verse foregoing, that they had brought all hallowed things out of their houses, and employed them as God directed, they were to make three particular professions, which are mentioned in this verse. And, it is probable, they have respect to some idolatrous customs which were in those days: the first of them is, that they had "not eaten thereof in mourning, or in lamentation." For so the Hebrew word oni signifies, very bitter grief, and sore mourning. Such the Egyptians made in harvest-time, when they offered the first-fruits of the earth, and kept the feast of Isis with doleful lamentations. So Diodorus Siculus, and other authors tell us, particularly Julius Firmicus, who severely reproves their folly, or madness rather, saying, Cur plangitis fruges terræ, &c. "Why do you bewail the fruits of the earth? Why weep you at the growth of your seed, &c. You should rather give thanks for these things to the most high God, whose bounty is not to be lamented; but bewail rather your own error," &c. If there was such a custom in the world when Moses lived, it may very well be thought that he taught the Israelites to disclaim such senseless and impious practices. And as the Egyptians, by this mourning, acknowledged Isis, that is, the earth, to be the giver of all these good things; so he required God's people to bring in their harvest with the greatest joy and thanks unto the Most High: for there was no joy so great as that of harvest and vintage; directly opposite to the heathen, who kept the feast of Bacchus also with lamentations (see our learned Dr. Spencer, lib. ii. De Ritual. Hebr. cap. 24, sect. 1).

Taken away ought thereof for any unclean use,] As some of the old idolaters were wont to do; who separated some part of the first-fruits for magical purposes, and sometimes for carnal and filthy. So Julius Firmicus informs us, who immediately after the mention of their lamentations, when they gathered the fruits of the earth, asks this question, Quid addis incestum et adulterium? Which shows that there were unclean rites which accompanied their offerings, and that they made them minister unto Venus. See the same learned author in the same place, sect. 3.

Nor given ought thereof for the dead:] If this be the right translation of the last words, for the dead, St. Austin hath given us a likely reason of this clause, which was, to profess they had not imitated the gentiles, who were wont to set meat and drink upon the graves of the dead, as he tells us, Serm. 15, de Sanctis. But it doth not appear that they set any part of their tithe, or first-fruits upon them, not that they did it only in harvest-time; but rather common bread neither have I taken away ought thereof for any unclean use, nor given ought thereof for the dead: but I have hearkened to the voice of the LORD my God, and have done according to all that thou hast commanded me.

15 Look down from thy holy habitation, from heaven, and bless thy people Israel, and the land which thou hast given us, as thou swarest unto our fathers, a land that floweth with milk and honey.

16 ¶ This day the LORD thy God hath commanded thee to do these statutes and judgments: thou shalt therefore keep and do them with all thine heart, and with all thy soul.

17 Thou hast avouched the LORD thy day to be thy God, and to walk in his ways, and to keep his statutes, and his commandments, and his judgments, and to hearken unto his voice:

and wine, which at all times they set upon their graves when they were interred; and therefore it may be translated to the dead (as the same excellent person observes, sect. 3). And so it is a profession, they had not offered any of the fruits of the earth to heroes (after the manner of the gentiles), particularly to Osiris. For that they honoured them with their first-fruits, appears by a passage in Porphyry, lib. iv. περι Ἀποχρῆς, sect. 22, where he mentions three laws made by Triptolemus, an ancient lawgiver among the Athenians: one of which is this, Θεοῖς καρποὺς ἀγᾶλλειν, “to worship the gods with the fruits of the earth.” Which Draco thus expounds, as he shows in the conclusion of this book; Θεοῖς τιμᾶν καὶ ἥρωας ἐγχωρίους ἐν κοινῷ ἱσχυμένους νόμοις πατριῶς ἰδία κατὰ δύναμιν σὺν εὐφημίᾳ καὶ ἀπαρχαῖς καρπιῶν, &c., “to honour the gods, and the heroes of their country publicly, according to the laws of the nation; and privately, as much as they were able, with speaking well of them, and with the first-fruits, and the annual offerings” (see Meursius, in his Themis Attica, lib. i. cap. 1). But however we take this, the giving any part of tithes, either for the dead, or to the dead, shows there was such a superstitious custom: unto which this clause having a manifest respect, we have reason to think the two former have so likewise.

I have hearkened unto the voice of the Lord my God, and have done according] Performed all that God required, and done nothing contrary to it. All these words, from ver. 13 to this place, were to be spoken with a low and humble voice, because they are a sort of commendation of themselves, and of their own integrity; which is not to be proclaimed aloud. But when they made the foregoing profession, at the presenting of their first-fruits (ver. 5, 6, &c.), they being an acknowledgment of their own meanness and poor beginnings, and of God’s infinite goodness in their advancement, they were to lift up their voice, and say aloud, “My father was a Syrian ready to perish,” &c. Thus the doctors resolve in the Gemara of Mischna Sota, cap. 7, in the beginning of it.

Ver. 15. Look down] Have a gracious regard.

From thy holy habitation,] This is an humble acknowledgment of the infinite majesty of God, who, though he was graciously pleased to dwell among them by a glorious symbol of his presence in the sanctuary, yet dwelt in a far more transcendent glory in the heavens, the highest of which could not contain him, as holy men acknowledged (1 Kings viii. 27; 2 Chron. ii. 6).

Bless thy people Israel,] Having performed their duty, they had the greater confidence to beg the continuance of God’s mercies to them and to their country; which it had been presumption to expect, if they had not acknowledged him to be the donor of all the good things they enjoyed in the manner before appointed. For this was the end of all oblations, both of this tithe, and of the first-fruits, and any other, to acknowledge God to be the Lord, “of whom all things come (as David speaks), and of whose own we give unto him” (see 1 Chron. xxix. 11—13, &c.).

manded thee to do these statutes and judgments: thou shalt therefore keep and do them with all thine heart, and with all thy soul.

17 Thou hast avouched the LORD thy day to be thy God, and to walk in his ways, and to keep his statutes, and his commandments, and his judgments, and to hearken unto his voice:

18 And the LORD hath avouched thee this day to be his peculiar people, as he hath promised thee, and that thou shouldest keep all his commandments;

As thou swarest unto our fathers,] He teacheth them to conclude as they began (ver. 3), with a thankful acknowledgment of God’s faithfulness to his promise.

A land that floweth with milk and honey.] See xi. 9. The Jerusalem Targum paraphraseth it thus, “a land producing fruits as pure as milk, and as sweet and delicious as honey.”

Ver. 16. This day] This refers to the time when Moses spake all these words unto them.

Hath commanded thee] By me.

Statutes and judgments.] These two words comprehend the precepts in the foregoing chapters: some of which concern matters of religion, and others of civil government.

Thou shalt therefore keep and do them] Set yourselves sincerely and heartily to the performance of them.

Ver. 17. Thou hast avouched] So the Hebrew word signifies, as Job Ludolphus observes, who renders it, asseverare, serio affirmare; being the same with the French word avouer, and may be here translated, “Thou hast solemnly professed,” or rather protested.

The Lord this day] The word this is not in the Hebrew (as it is in the foregoing verse), but he saith simply hajom (not hajom hazeth), “the day;” or “that day;” which signifies the time when Moses delivered these laws from God.

To be thy God,] Then they owned him to be their king and governor. For so the name Elohim properly signifies dignity, empire, and authority, as Grotius observes upon Exod. xx. Fortunatus Seacchus, before him, expounds these very words: “Which (saith he) have respect to God as their emperor, who had the supreme government of the commonwealth of Israel, with a right and authority of constituting laws, and giving mandates for the establishing of that government.” Sacror. Elaeochrysm. par. ii. cap. 52, p. 509 (see Exod. xxiv. 3, 4, &c., and xxxiv. 27).

To walk in his ways,] By his ways, that author understands the moral precepts written on tables of stone.

To keep his statutes,] The ritual precepts.

His commandments,] Concerning the duties of his worship and service.

His judgments,] The political precepts belonging to their good government.

To hearken unto his voice:] In all things which he should declare from his oracle, when they consulted it.

Ver. 18.] At the same time (for the word this is not in the Hebrew), the Lord assured the Israelites that they should be his people in a special manner, provided they made good their promise of keeping his commandments: for the covenant was mutual (see Exod. xxiv. 3, 7, xix. 5, 6). It is observable that the Jerusalem Targum paraphrases these two verses in this manner: “Ye have taken the Word of the Lord to reign over you to-day, that he may be your God, &c. And the Word of the Lord reigneth over

19 And to make thee high above all nations which he hath made, in praise, and in name, and in honour; and that thou mayest be an holy people unto the Lord thy God, as he hath spoken.

you, a people dedicated to his name, as his peculiar," &c. Where Memra, "the Word," cannot be understood otherwise than of the second person in the Deity.

Ver. 19. To make thee high above all nations] It is a pious note of Conr. Pelicanus, that there is no greater glory to the faithful, than that they are peculiarly grateful, devoted, dedicated, obedient unto God, as his children.

In praise, and in name, and in honour:] These words express his singular kindness to them, in that though all nations were his (being made by him, and he the Lord and governor of them all), yet he promised to have such a special favour to them, that all nations round them should take notice of it, and speak with admiration of their happiness, and the honour he had done them. All this is included in those words before mentioned, Exod. xix. 5, 6, where the last words of this verse are explained, "That thou mayest be a holy people unto the Lord thy God, as he hath spoken."

All this Moses called to their mind, that it might prepare and dispose them to renew the same covenant with God before he left them; which he presses upon them in the nine-and-twentieth chapter of this book, after he had given them some other admonitions, and laid before them the blessings and curses that would come upon them, according to their fidelity or falseness in that holy covenant. Which is the subject of the two following chapters.

CHAPTER XXVII.

1 The people are commanded to write the law upon stones, 5 and to build an altar of whole stones. 11 The tribes divided on Gerizim and Ebal. 14 The curses pronounced on mount Ebal.

I AND Moses with the elders of Israel commanded the people, saying, Keep all the commandments which I command you this day.

2 And it shall be on the day when ye shall pass over Jordan unto the land which the LORD thy God giveth thee, that thou shalt set thee up great stones, and plaister them with plaister:

3 And thou shalt write upon them all the words of this law, when thou art passed over, that thou mayest go in unto the land which the

CHAP. XXVII.

Ver. 1. And Moses with the elders of Israel commanded the people,] I observed in the preface to this book, and upon ch. iv. 41, and other places, that Moses did not speak all that is contained in this book at once, but at several times; and that he commonly took the elders to his assistance, as is here expressly affirmed; though some things he spake himself alone to all the people, as I observed upon ver. 1.

Keep all the commandments] This is a new exhortation to obedience; which he could not press too often, considering the great proneness of this people to break God's laws.

This day.] At this time, and formerly, for it doth not precisely signify one day; and the word this is not in the original.

Ver. 2. On the day when ye shall pass over Jordan] Here it is evident the word day doth not signify precisely the very same day they passed over, but not long after, as soon as they were come to Mount Ebal (ver. 4), after the taking of Jericho and Ai, as appears from Josh. viii. 30. For they were to pass over Jordan, "unto the land which the Lord their God gave them" (as it here follows), before they were obliged to do what is here required.

Set thee up great stones,] It is not said how many; but some fancy there were twelve, according to the number of pillars which Moses employed (Exod. xxiv. 4) when he made the covenant between God and his people. But unless we could certainly determine how much of the law was to be written upon these stones, we cannot give a good guess at their number. For if only the ten commandments, fewer than twelve would serve; if the whole book of Deuteronomy, so many are not sufficient. As for the marginal reference in our Bibles unto Josh. iv. 1, it can have no respect to this place; for those twelve stones were ordered to be taken out of Jordan, and left there, where they lodged that night, which was at Gilgal (see there, ver. 3, 8, 20).

Plaister them with plaister.] That being plain and smooth, they might write what is here commanded upon them, which they could not do while they were rough and uneven.

Ver. 3. Write upon them all the words of this law,] Many think he means the whole book of Deuteronomy; which, because it is long, great stones are ordered to be provided for this purpose. Others think only the ten commandments are here intended, which were the principal "words of the covenant," as Moses calls this law, xxxix. 1. But Josephus (lib. iv. Archæol. cap. ult.) is of opinion, that he means the cursings which here follow from verse 15, to the end of the chapter. Which is no improbable opinion; they containing several select precepts, and the last of them seems to respect the whole law of Moses, ver. 26.

But, however we understand this, it is certain, that, before the use of paper was found out, the ancients, particularly the Phœnicians and Egyptians, were wont to write their minds upon stones, as a great many authors testify, mentioned by Huetius, who observes, that this custom continued long after the invention of paper, especially if they desired any thing should be vulgarly known and conveyed down to posterity. See Demonstr. Evang. propos. iv. cap. 2, n. 15, where he observes, that Moses ordered the book of Deuteronomy to be inscribed upon stones. I suppose he means all the laws contained in this book (not all the exhortations and historical passages), which agrees very well with this injunction, that they should write on the stones "all the words of this law."

When thou art passed over, &c.] When they were gone over Jordan to take possession of the land of Canaan, and were come to the place where he directed these stones to be set up, and this inscription

LORD thy God giveth thee, a land that floweth with milk and honey; as the LORD God of thy fathers hath promised thee.

4 Therefore it shall be when ye be gone over Jordan, that ye shall set up these stones, which I command you this day, in mount Ebal, and thou shalt plaister them with plaister.

5 And there shalt thou build an altar unto the LORD thy God, an altar of stones: thou shalt not lift up any iron tool upon them.

6 Thou shalt build the altar of the LORD thy God of whole stones: and thou shalt offer burnt offerings thereon unto the LORD thy God:

7 And thou shalt offer peace offerings, and shalt eat there, and rejoice before the LORD thy God.

8 And thou shalt write upon the stones all the words of this law very plainly.

9 ¶ And Moses and the priests the Levites spake unto all Israel, saying, Take heed, and made upon them. Which place is particularly named in the next verse. And from these words Fortunatus Scacchus thinks he hath reason to assert, that none of the things forementioned are meant by the words of this law, here commanded to be written; but that upon the very top of these stones (or the altar made of them, as he would have it understood) were written only the words of this covenant, whereby the people of Israel confessed themselves to have received the land of Canaan from God, and to hold it on condition of their obedience unto him. For so he interprets the words write unto them, in summa superficie. And to make us know what he means by the words of this law, he thinks the following words are added, "that thou mayest go into unto the land which the LORD thy God giveth thee," &c., that is, thou shalt declare who brought thee hither, and gave thee the possession of this country, and upon what condition; viz. that thou shouldst keep the commands given to thee by God in Horeb. And therefore Moses doth not bid them write on the stones the law of the LORD nor the law absolutely, but the words of this law. Where the demonstrative particle hazoth limits the sense to the present matter of which he is speaking. Thus he, Myrothec. 2 Sacror. Elæochrysm, cap. 57, where he endeavours to strengthen this interpretation, by observing, that, after this command for writing this law upon the stones, "Moses, and the priests, and Levites, spake unto all Israel, saying, Take heed, and hearken, O Israel, this day thou art become the people of the LORD thy God, &c. (ver. 9, 10).

Ver. 4. Ye shall set up these stones,] This phrase, set up, seems to imply that they were a kind of pillars erected for this purpose, that the inscription might appear more fairly upon them.

In Mount Ebal,] Here the Samaritan Pentateuch hath, "in Mount Gerizim;" which is a manifest corruption, to justify their building a temple there, which they pretend God commanded in these words.

Ver. 5. There shalt thou build an altar] That they might offer sacrifice to God, and renew their covenant with him.

An altar of stones] Upon which Josephus himself fancies the forenamed inscription was to be made; and so the Talmudists also, in Mischna Sota, cap. 7. But it is plain, the stones designed for that use were to be set up before the altar was built; the intention of it being (as I shall show presently), that they might promise to observe the words which were there written.

Not lift up any iron tool] See Exod. xx. 25.

Ver. 6. Build the altar—of whole stones:] Not hewn, nor polished; whereby all manner of imagery was avoided. Such rustic altars of rough stone, piled one upon another, were in use among the heathen, who seem to have imitated this pattern. The form of one of them Fortunatus Scacchus hath given us out of some ancient monument at Brixia, related by Octavius Roscius (see his forenamed book, cap. 59, p. 585). Such altars the Israelites were permitted to build upon some special occasion, as Gideon and Manoah did (Judg. vi. 24, 26, xiii. 19), and Samuel (1 Sam. vii. 17), and Saul (1 Sam. xiv. 35), and David (2 Sam. xxiv. 25), and such an one Moses himself built (Exod. xxiv. 4). And as Moses there set up twelve pillars, according to the number of the tribes of Israel, when they entered into covenant with God at Horeb, so the forementioned author thinks, at the confirmation of it, when they came into Canaan, they built not twelve altars, but heaped up twelve stones, which made one altar, without any cost at all bestowed upon it. And thus Elijah took twelve stones, and on a sudden built an altar with them, when he endeavoured to bring the Israelites back again into the covenant of God (1 Kings xviii. 31, 32).

Offer burnt offerings thereon] As they did at Horeb (Exod. xxiv. 5), and as Joshua did when they came into Canaan, and had built the altar here commanded (Josh. viii. 31), which burnt-offerings were an acknowledgment of God's sovereign dominion over them; and that they held this land of him, as their supreme Lord, from whom they had received it. They kept the passover as soon as they came into Canaan; but we read of no altar erected, nor burnt-sacrifices offered, till they came to Ebal.

Ver. 7. Offer peace offerings,] So Moses also did at Horeb, as we read in the forenamed place (Exod. xxiv. 5), and so Joshua did when they came into Canaan. And they were offered as thanksgivings to God, for bringing them into that good land.

And shalt eat there and rejoice] The sacrificers had a part of the peace-offerings given them, that they might feast with God, in token that they were in covenant with him (see Lev. vii. 5). And therefore God ordered these sacrifices to be offered, as soon as they came to this place, where his law was to be inscribed upon the stones before mentioned: that the people of Israel, to whom God promised the possession of the land of Canaan, upon the condition that they observed his laws, might confirm their covenant with him, when they took possession of it: and be given to understand, that God, having performed what he promised, expected that they should be mindful of their obligation, faithfully to observe his Divine laws. So that this altar may be properly called (as the same Fort. Scacchus terms it), "the altar of confederation, or confirmation of the covenant, into which they had entered at Horeb."

Ver. 8.] So that they might be read easily. How the Talmudists came to fancy they were written in seventy languages, I cannot imagine; but such a conceit there is among them, as Mr. Selden observes, lib. ii. De Synedr. cap. 9, p. 396; for so many languages they think there were in the world. And Bartenora saith, God would have everybody that came into their country learn these truths, if he pleased; and no pagan be able to excuse his ignorance, by saying, he had no means to know them (see Joh. Wagenseil upon Sota, cap. 7, sect. 5, annot. 5).

Ver. 9. Moses and the priests the Levites spake] hearken, O Israel; this day thou art become the people of the Lord thy God.

10 Thou shalt therefore obey the voice of the Lord thy God, and do his commandments and his statutes, which I command thee this day.

11 ¶ And Moses charged the people the same day, saying,

12 These shall stand upon mount Gerizim to bless the people, when ye are come over

Jordan; Simeon, and Levi, and Judah, and Issachar, and Joseph, and Benjamin:

13 And these shall stand upon mount Ebal to curse; Reuben, Gad, and Asher, and Zebulun, Dan, and Naphtali.

14 ¶ And the Levites shall speak, and say unto all the men of Israel with a loud voice,

15 Cursed be the man that maketh any graven or molten image, an abomination unto the Lord,

It seems, by this, that Moses and the elders (ver. 1) took the priests and Levites to their assistance, to deliver what follows.

Take heed,] Attend to what we say. The Hebrew word is found nowhere else; and seems to belong to their outward posture.

Hearken,] So as to consider.

This day thou art become the people of the Lord thy God,] These words following after the precept concerning building an altar of confederation, must be understood as relating unto that; and therefore the word this day doth not respect only that particular day on which Moses spake this to the people, or the day wherein God declared it, but the day upon which such an altar, for the renovation of the covenant, was to be erected, when Joshua was to speak these words: for then, and not before, the blessings were pronounced to those that observed the laws of God, and the curses against those that broke them; and God had not fulfilled his promises to them till they came over Jordan. Therefore he did not order this altar to be built, and these sacrifices to be offered, whereby they obliged themselves to him, and became his people by a new bond, till their entrance upon the possession of what he had promised.

Ver. 10.] These words, and the foregoing, are plainly words of a mutual covenant between God and them. Into which covenant they entered three times: first, at Horeb (Exod. xxiv.), and then just before Moses died, twenty-ninth of this book (ver. 1, 12, 13, &c.), and when they were come into Canaan (Josh. viii. 30, 31, &c.). And because the Divine laws delivered to them were confirmed and ratified at all these times, therefore it is that those laws are so frequently called by the name of the covenant; and when they transgressed them, they are said to break this covenant.

Ver. 11.] Which charge, I suppose, the elders, with the assistance of the priests and Levites, delivered throughout the whole camp of Israel (ver. 1, 9).

Ver. 12. Mount Gerizim] This is a mountain upon which Samaria was afterward built.

To bless the people,] By saying Amen, when they heard the blessings read by the priests. For it was not the people who stood upon the mountain that blessed (i. e. pronounced the blessings), but the priests below (ver. 14).

When ye are come over Jordan;] See ver. 2.

Simeon, and Levi, &c.] These six tribes, who stood upon Mount Gerizim (i. e. upon the top, and on the descent of it down to the bottom), were all descended from the sons of free women, Leah and Rachel; and therefore many think appointed to bless, which was more honourable than to curse.

Ver. 13. These shall stand upon Mount Ebal to curse:] This was a mountain opposite to the other; and there was a valley between them. Abimelech seems to have been made king upon this mountain, when he had killed all the sons of Gideon but Jotham: for it was done "in the plain (or by the oak) of the pillar, which was in Shechem;" that is by this pillar, on which the curses of the law were written (Judg. ix. 6), whereupon Jotham got upon Mount Gerizim, and then cursed the men of Shechem. Which shows, that the tops of these mountains were not so far distant one from another, but what was said upon the one might be heard by those who were on the top and the sides of the other. And yet there was such a valley between them, that they could not presently come at Jotham to apprehend him, but he had time to flee, and get away, after he had spoken his apologue.

Reuben, Gad, &c.] Four of these were children of the handmaids; and Reuben had lost his dignity by going up to his father's bed; and Zebulun was the youngest of Leah's sons; who was therefore chosen, rather than any of the other, for this less honourable employment. For otherwise there would not have been an equal number of tribes upon each mountain.

Ver. 14. The Levites] That is, the priests, who are often called "the priests the Levites;" particularly in that very place where we read of the execution of this command, Josh. viii. 33. And the Levites were among those that stood upon Mount Gerizim (ver. 12), who did not pronounce the blessings, but answered Amen to them. Yet the Gemara upon Sota, cap. 7, sect. 23, will have it, that as many of the Levites as were fit to minister, (that is, all from thirty to fifty years of age, who were fit to carry the ark) stood round about the ark with the priests; the rest of the Levites being upon Mount Gerizim, with the other tribes appointed to have their station there.

Shall speak,] The same Gemara rightly gathers, that the ark with the priests were below in the valley between the two mountains; because, it is said, in the place before mentioned, that all Israel and the elders stood about it, Josh. viii. 33. Which could not have been, unless it were placed between the two mountains whereon they stood, upon both sides, from the top to the bottom.

With a loud voice.] That every one that stood on the side or top of the mountains might hear what they said, the priests being placed so, in several parts of the valley, that their voice might reach them all. For which end they were advanced, perhaps, upon a pulpit (as Ezra afterward was, Neh. viii. 4), and a signal likewise given when they should say Amen.

Ver. 15. Cursed be the man that maketh any graven or molten image,] The people upon the mountains being to bless as well as curse, the Mishna, in the title Sota, (cap. 7, sect. 5) rightly explains it; that, first, the priests, turning their faces towards Mount Gerizim, proclaimed with a loud voice, "Blessed be the man that maketh not any graven," &c., unto which all the people that stood there answered Amen; and then turning their faces towards Mount Ebal, they said these words, "Cursed be the man that maketh," &c., to which they that stood there made the same answer. See also the Jerusalem Targum, which paraphrases these words in the same manner.

An abomination] Which is odious, and far to be removed from the presence of the Lord, as the same Targum interprets it.

The work of the hands of the craftsmen,] A mere device of men, and therefore not to have Divine worship given to it of any sort.

the work of the hands of the craftsman, and putteth it in a secret place. And all the people shall answer and say, Amen.

16 Cursed be he that setteth light by his father or his mother. And all the people shall say, Amen.

17 Cursed be he that removeth his neighbour's landmark. And all the people shall say, Amen.

18 Cursed be he that maketh the blind to wander out of the way. And all the people shall say, Amen.

19 Cursed be he that perverteth the judgment of the stranger, fatherless, and widow. And all the people shall say, Amen.

20 Cursed be he that lieth with his father's wife; because he uncovereth his father's skirt. And all the people shall say, Amen.

21 Cursed be he that lieth with any manner of beast. And all the people shall say, Amen.

22 Cursed be he that lieth with his sister, the daughter of his father, or the daughter of his mother. And all the people shall say, Amen.

23 Cursed be he that lieth with his mother in law. And all the people shall say, Amen.

24 Cursed be he that smiteth his neighbour secretly. And all the people shall say, Amen.

25 Cursed be he that taketh reward to slay an

Putteth it in a secret place.] Though he was not a public declared worshipper of images, yet, if he did it privately, in some closet of his own house, or in any other secret place, to conceal his wickedness, though he escaped the punishment of the law, which sentenced open idolaters to death, yet he could not escape the vengeance of God.

All the people] The forenamed Mischna and Targum say, that the people on both mountains answered Amen, both to the blessings and to the cursings: which doth not agree with what goes before, ver. 12, 13.

Shall answer and say, Amen.] Express their consent to it. For the word Amen, as the Talmudists say in Schebuoth, hath sometimes the force of an oath, sometimes only declares consent and approbation, and sometimes is used for the confirmation of any thing. An example of the first they think there is in Numb. v. 22, and they allege this place for an example of the second; and for the third, Jer. xxviii. 6.

Ver. 16. Cursed be he that setteth light by his father or his mother.] It is observed by interpreters, that, as the precept of honouring parents stands next to the commandment concerning the honour that is due to God (Exod. x. 12), so the curse pronounced against those who dishonoured them is here placed next to the curse against worshippers of images. And as idolaters were to be put to death, so were those that cursed their parents (Exod. xxi. 17; Lev. xx. 9). And I may add, from the foregoing words, that though they did it ever so secretly, they lay under his curse.

The people shall say, Amen.] But before this curse was pronounced, they had said Amen to the blessing opposite to it ["Blessed is he that setteth not light by his father and mother"], as was observed in the foregoing verse. And the same is to be noted concerning the following curses, which were preceded with a blessing, till they were all ended.

Ver. 17.] Against which there is an express precept in the foregoing part of this book, xix. 14. And Pellicanus well observes, that, by this particular instance of God's displeasure against injustice, they were deterred from all encroachments upon their neighbour's possessions.

Ver. 18.] By giving him wrong directions, or misleading him (see Lev. xix. 14). Some apply this to giving pernicious advice to simple people; which is certainly worse than misguiding of the blind, because it leads men into sin, as well as into danger.

Ver. 19.] These three I observed before (xxiv. 19), are commonly put together, as a paraphrase on the word poor: whose cause God himself undertakes to plead (x. 18, and see Exod. xii. 21, 22). And, therefore, all good lawgivers have taken special care of them, particularly of orphans; concerning whom Plato ordains, that the conservators of the laws should be ἀντι γονεῶν, "instead of their natural parents" and look after them so well, that they should not fare the worse for wanting their fathers (see lib. viii. De Legibus, fol. 926, &c., edit. Serrani).

Ver. 20.] See xxii. 30, and Lev. xviii. 8.

Ver. 21.] Exod. xxii. 19, and Lev. xviii. 23. This some of the Jewish doctors, out of an unaccountable pride, apply to the vulgar sort of their own nation (whom they call The people of the earth), as if they were no better than beasts, with whom they were not to marry.

Ver. 22.] This hath been explained also, Lev. xvii. 9.

Ver. 23. See Lev. xviii. 17, and xx. 14.

Ver. 24.] Though it be with his tongue, whereby he wounds the fame of an absent person. But the word smite is often used for killing (Exod. xxi. 12, Lev. xxiv. 17). Of which, if a man was guilty, though he committed the murder so secretly that he could not be put to death by the sentence of the judges, yet he lay under this heavy sentence of God.

Ver. 25.] This seems to have respect to the judges, who for money not only gave wrong judgment in other causes, but condemned those that were not guilty to death (see Exod. xxiii. 7, 8, and in this book x. 17, xvi. 19).

Ver. 26.] The word we here translate confirm, is more plainly translated perform, in 1 Sam. xv. 11. And so it certainly signifies here; the performing of what God commands, being a kind of establishment of the law, as obedience is a subversion of it, and as far as lies in the offender's power, an abolishing it and taking it away. Therefore, the apostle exactly translates the sense of these words, Gal. iii. 10. "Cursed is every one that continueth not in all things," &c., where the apostle adds the word all (as the LXX, and the Samaritan did, even in St. Jerome's time), to expound "the words of this law," to signify not merely all that is contained in these blessings and curses, "but all things which are written in the book of the law." So that whether this whole book (i. e. all the laws contained in it) were to be written upon the pillars, or only these blessings and cursings, the matter comes to the same issue; because all that is contained in this book is comprehended in this last curse, all that is contained in the whole law of Moses. Therefore, it is not very material neither, whether these cursings and blessings were recited upon Mount Gerizim and Ebal, or the whole law of Moses, from one end to the other, about which the Jews themselves differ. But they that are of the latter opinion, think it well grounded upon Josh. viii. 33, where we read how Joshua carefully performed what Moses here enjoined. And, that his words might not be forgotten, Moses seems to have ordered the continuance of this solemnity every seventh year, in the twenty-ninth chapter of this book, ver. 10, 11, &c.

The Mischna in Sota (which I have often mentioned) innocent person. And all the people shall say, Amen.

26 Cursed be he that confirmeth not all the concludes this matter with these words: When the blessings and cursings were ended, they brought stones and built an altar, which they plastered over, and wrote upon them all the words of this law in seventy languages. But I have shown before, that the stones on which the law was written were different from the altar, and were erected before the building of the altar. The Gemara there adds (cap. 7, sect. 24), That every one of the Israelites there present stood bound one for another (that is, for the whole company), that they would observe these laws. Which I know not how they extract out of Moses's words; but their doctors frequently mention it in their books, words of this law to do them. And all the people shall say, Amen.

and make this pious use of it, that, by virtue of this security which they gave for each other, every man was bound to reprove his neighbour if he saw him offend, unless he was content to undergo the punishment which was threatened upon the breach of God's laws, and come under the curse (Lev. xix. 17). And unto this they apply those words, "they shall fall one upon another" (as we truly translate Lev. xxvi. 37), as if they signified, "every one shall fall by his brother," that is, by his brother's crimes: for we all promised, say they (in the Gemara Sanhedrin, cap. 3, sect. 6), and engaged one for another, and so from that time were punished one for another.

CHAPTER XXVIII.

1 The blessings for obedience.

1 AND it shall come to pass, if thou shalt hearken diligently unto the voice of the LORD thy God, to observe and to do all his commandments which I command thee this day, that the LORD thy God will set thee on high above all nations of the earth :

2 And all these blessings shall come on thee, and overtake thee, if thou shalt hearken unto the voice of the LORD thy God.

15 The curses for disobedience.

3 Blessed shalt thou be in the city, and blessed shalt thou be in the field.

4 Blessed shall be the fruit of thy body, and the fruit of thy ground, and the fruit of thy cattle, the increase of thy kine, and the flocks of thy sheep.

5 Blessed shall be thy basket and thy store.

CHAP. XXVIII.

Ver. 1. It shall come to pass,] In this chapter he repeats, with many enlargements, the reward and penalties which he had promised and threatened in the book of Leviticus, unto the observance or breach of the covenant they had made with God: and here in this verse he promises in general the blessings which are more particularly enumerated in the following verses.

If thou shalt hearken diligently] See vii. 12, where the same thing is said; only here he adds the word diligently, to make them attend with the greater seriousness to what he delivered (see ch. xi. 13, 22).

The Lord thy God will set thee on high above all nations] By bestowing on them the following blessings (see vii. 14). They were already endued with singular privileges above other nations (Exod. xix. 5, 6), which by their obedience would be confirmed, continued, and augmented, in greater plenty of all things.

Ver. 2. All these blessings shall come on thee,] Blessings that come unexpectedly, and when we are not in pursuit of them, are most welcome, and highly delight us. And such God here promises to bestow on them by his gracious providence, without their laborious and anxious seeking after them. By which very thing he sets them above all nations: for what they followed after eagerly, and many times in vain, he undertakes should come to them and prevent their desires.

If thou shalt hearken] So as to observe and do all his commandments; as it is explained in the foregoing verse.

Ver. 3.] That is, in all their affairs, within doors or without. Or whether they lived by employments in the city, or by husbandry in tilling the ground. It is not a natural interpretation of these words, which one of the Hebrew doctors gives of them in Bava Metzia, where he expounds, blessed shalt thou be in the city, Thy house shall be so nigh unto the synagogue, that thou needest not be troubled by going a long way to it; and blessed in the field, Thy ground shall lie so near to the city, that thou mayest quickly bring the fruit it produces to be sold in the market. But if he could have gone on in this manner, it had been something tolerable; but he expounds what follows in a most indecent manner (see Wagenseil upon the Gemara of Sota, cap. 3, sect. 9, annot. 5).

Ver. 4. Blessed shall be the fruit of thy body,] This seems to be a promise of preventing miscarriages, when they were with child: for a numerous progeny is promised afterward (ver. 11).

Of thy ground,] This signifies they should have seasonable harvest and vintages. For fruit of the ground comprehends not only all sorts of corn, but grapes, figs, pomegranates, and suchlike fruits which grow on trees.

Of thy cattle,] By the word behema is sometimes meant all sorts of brood creatures, in opposition to men; sometimes tame creatures, in opposition to wild beasts: but here all sorts of domestic creatures (except kine, sheep, and goats), viz. asses and camels. Which Jacob brought with him, as well as oxen and sheep, when he came from Laban into Canaan (Gen. xxxii. 5, 7).

The increase of thy kine,] The breed of these was very profitable, being a considerable part of the riches not only of that, but of other countries; as appears by what Pausanius saith of them (see Bochartus, par. i. Hierozoicon, lib. ii. cap. 40, in the beginning.)

The flocks of thy sheep,] Under the name of sheep, in the Hebrew, are comprehended goats also. All which God promises to increase, that is, to make them very wealthy. And here it may be observed, that the Israelites were generally husbandmen or shepherds, and did not commonly follow any other trades: and therefore no mention is made of them here, unless it be in ver. 6, where he seems to speak of all sorts of business.

6 Blessed shall thou be when thou comest in, and blessed shall thou be when thou goest out.

7 The LORD shall cause thine enemies that rise up against thee to be smitten before thy face: they shall come out against thee one way, and flee before thee seven ways.

8 The LORD shall command the blessing upon thee in thy storehouses, and in all that thou settest thine hand unto; and he shall bless thee in the land which the LORD thy God giveth thee.

9 The LORD shall establish thee an holy people unto himself, as he hath sworn unto thee, if thou shalt keep the commandments of the LORD thy God, and walk in his ways.

10 And all people of the earth shall see that thou art called by the name of the LORD; and they shall be afraid of thee.

11 And the LORD shall make thee plenteous in goods, in the fruit of thy body, and in the fruit of thy cattle, and in the fruit of thy ground, in the land which the LORD swore unto thy fathers to give thee.

Ver. 5. Thy basket] The Jerusalem Targum refers to the basket wherein they carried up their first-fruits, (xxvi. 2). But the Vulgar Latin translates it thy barns: and so do the LXX. αἱ ἀποθήκαι σου, the place where they laid up their corn and other fruits of the earth. Which God promises both to fill and to preserve from the fire, or thieves, or other disasters.

Thy store.] The LXX. and the Vulgar translate it, "all that was remaining;" of which they had not present use, but kept till they had occasion for it. So it is a promise that they should never want; but still have something lying by them in store (as we translate it) above what they needed.

Ver. 6.] This the Jerusalem Targum interprets, of their entering into their schools, and going home again. But it rather signifies, they should have good journeys when they had occasion to travel, and find all safe when they returned home: or be prosperous both in time of peace and in time of war; when they are said, in the Hebrew phrase, to go out against their enemies. Or it may signify, in general, good success in all their affairs; which is expressed by the phrase coming in and going out (xxx. 2; 2 Sam. iii. 25). But I see no ground to think that it relates to traffic or manufactures: for they were of little use among a people, whose plain way of living made few things necessary, but what every man could make himself. And therefore we find by Ezekiel, who describes (ch. xxvii.) the great variety of merchandise which was brought to the mart of Tyre, that the Israelites carried nothing thither but wheat, and honey, and oil, and balm (ver. 17), which are the commodities the earth itself produceth.

Ver. 7. The Lord shall cause thine enemies—to be smitten] God had promised before, that, when they went up to serve him at their solemn festivals, their enemies should not so much as desire their land (Exod. xxxiv. 24), and now he assures them, that, when they did invade their country, they should not prevail, but be overthrown by them.

They shall come out against thee one way, and flee before thee seven ways.] He not only promises them victory, but a complete victory. For fleeing seven ways (i. e. many ways), imports a total overthrow; which made every man shift for himself, as soldiers do when they are entirely routed.

Ver. 8. The Lord shall command the blessing upon thee] Protect them in their enjoyments by his sovereign power and providence; when otherwise they would have been in danger.

In thy storehouses.] The LXX. translate it ταμεία, and the Vulgar cellaria; which signify places wherein other goods were laid up within doors, as corn was in barns without (ver. 5).

In all that thou settest thine hand unto;] In all manner of undertakings and employments.

Bless thee in the land] Make them live long therein.

Ver. 9. Establish thee an holy people unto himself.] Confirm them in that noble relation wherein they stood to him (see vii. 6, xiv. 2).

As he hath sworn unto thee.] See vii. 12.

If thou shalt keep the commandments.] He had separated them from all people, by peculiar laws and privileges: for this purpose, that they should be governed by him, and be obedient to him.

Walk in his ways.] Nobody can see any reason to make this a special precept (as the Jews do), that "we should walk in the ways of the Lord." Which contains all the duties owing to him: whether by his ways we understand those Divine qualities, of mercy, holiness, goodness, and truth, whereby we approach to him; or (as the word ways is commonly used in Scripture (his Divine precepts, whereby he comes (as it were) unto us, and declares his mind and will towards us, by conformity to which we become like him in those divine qualities: for that is the entire meaning of "walking in his ways;" ordering all our actions, according to the direction of his holy will, whereby we resemble him.

Ver. 10. All people] Who were round about them or should have any knowledge of them.

Shall see that thou art called by the name of the Lord;] Be convinced that you are after a peculiar manner, the LORD's people, (xiv. 1, xxvi. 18). For wheresoever we read that a person or thing hath the name of God called upon it, or is called by his name, the meaning is, that it is his. As the "city called by God's name." Jer. xxv. 29, is the city of God, where he dwelt, viz. Jerusalem. And thus the ark is said to have the name of God called on it, 1 Chron. xii. 6, i. e. was the LORD's ark, or the ark of the covenant. And as here the children of Israel are said to be the people called by his name, so it is of the Christian church, Acts xv. 17. For the very same phrase (as Mr. Mede observes) is used of the like relation that men have unto that which is theirs. Thus Jacob saith, Gen. xlviii. 16, that his name should be called on the two sons of Joseph, that is, they should be his, as Reuben and Simeon were: which shows these are "words of adoption" (see Disc. i. p. 7).

They shall be afraid of thee.] Not dare to do they any hurt, or fear to have thee their enemy.

Ver. 11. Make thee plenteous in goods.] Bestow on them abundance of all good things, that their hearts could desire.

In the fruit of thy body] By giving them a numerous and healthy issue; whereby they should be multiplied like the stars of heaven, or the sand on the seashore; according to the promise made to Abraham, Gen. xv. 5, xxii. 17.

Of thy cattle.] Which he promised likewise to increase exceedingly.

Of thy ground.] Which should afford large crops of corn, and great store of all other fruits every year.

In the land which the Lord swore unto thy fathers] So that they should not need to send unto other countries to procure food (as they did in the days of their father Jacob), but have enough in their own land to support them all, though ever so numerous.

12 The LORD shall open unto thee his good treasure, the heaven to give the rain unto thy land in his season, and to bless all the work of thine hand: and thou shalt lend unto many nations, and thou shalt not borrow.

13 And the LORD shall make thee the head, and not the tail; and thou shalt be above only, and thou shalt not be beneath; if that thou hearken unto the commandments of the LORD thy God, which I command thee this day, to observe and to do them:

14 And thou shalt not go aside from any of the words which I command thee this day, to the right hand, or to the left, to go after other gods to serve them.

15 ¶ But it shall come to pass, if thou wilt

Ver. 12. The Lord shall open unto thee his good treasure.] The heaven, or the air, is called the good treasure of God, because there he gathers together great heaps of clouds, from whence he enriches the earth with fattening showers of rain; which when he withholds, he is said to shut up this treasure (xi. 17), and when he bestows it, to open it; that his people might be sensible of their dependence upon his bounty for that blessing, as well as others, which he dispenses as he pleaseth.

In his season.] The former and the latter rain, as the Scripture calls it. The former fell in autumn, after the seed was sown, to make it take root and spring up; the latter fell in the spring-time, to bring the seed which was come up to maturity (see xi. 14). See the learned Dr. Prideaux, upon Maimonides's treatise De Donis Pauperum, cap. I, not. 25.

To bless all the work of thine hand.] By these seasonable showers he blessed their ploughing and sowing, and produced a plentiful harvest: which seems to be meant here by the "work of their hand;" viz. their husbandry; which includes all sorts of plantations, as well as tillage (Gen. ix. 20).

Thou shalt lend unto many nations, and—not borrow.] A token of great riches (see xv. 6), which all nations looked upon as a blessing: as indeed they are with piety. And therefore Callinachus, in his hymn to Jove, prays him to bestow both virtue and riches upon them (ver. 97).

— Δίδωσθ' ἄρεσιν τε καὶ δόξωσιν.

Which puts me in mind of a pertinent observation of Maimonides, in his preface to Perek Chelek, in which he treats of the foundations of the Jewish religion. "This is the meaning (saith he) of the promises and threatenings of the law, that, if they were obedient to his precepts, he would furnish them with all good things that should further them therein, and remove from them all that hinder them: for no man can serve God as he ought when he is sick, or oppressed with famine, or vexed with wars; therefore God promises to remove all these things, and to give them health and tranquillity, that they might perfect their obedience, and be worthy of the life of the world to come. 'For this is not the end of the law, to make the earth bring forth plentifully, and to prolong men's life upon the earth, and give them healthful bodies; but that by all those things they may be helped and encouraged to perform obedience to it,' &c."

Ver. 13. Make thee the head and not the tail.] This is a proverbial speech, which is explained in the words following: "And thou shalt be above only, and thou shalt not be beneath." For the head being the first and chief part of all animals, and the tail the not hearken unto the voice of the LORD thy God, to observe to do all his commandments and his statutes which I command thee this day; that all these curses shall come upon thee, and overtake thee:

16 Cursed shalt thou be in the city, and cursed shalt thou be in the field.

17 Cursed shall be thy basket and thy store.

18 Cursed shall be the fruit of thy body, and the fruit of thy land, the increase of thy kine, and the flocks of thy sheep.

19 Cursed shalt thou be when thou comest in, and cursed shalt thou be when thou goest out.

20 The LORD shall send upon thee cursing, vexation, and rebuke, in all that thou settest thine hand unto for to do, until thou be 'delast and lowest, those persons are said to be the head who command over others, and those the tail who are subject. And therefore this is a promise that they should rule over other nations, as their lords (as they did in the days of David and Solomon); but other nations should not lord it over them.

If that thou hearken unto the commandments—to observe and to do them.] This was the condition upon which all their happiness depended; as he had told them in the beginning of this discourse, ver. 1.

Ver. 14. Not go aside] See ch. v. 32.

To go after other gods] This was the principal commandment of the law, to serve no other gods but the Lord alone. Which, while they observed, he was pleased to bless them, and to bear with many other sins which they committed. Upon which account, this commandment is so often repeated, as we find it, in this very book, vi. 14, vii. 4, 16, viii. 19, ix. 16, 23, xi. 3, 4, 30, &c.

Ver. 15. To observe to do all his commandments] Especially that great commandment, "Not to go after other gods to serve them."

All these curses shall come upon thee.] Pursue them so, that they should not possibly escape them. The same phrase is used of the blessings, ver. 2.

Ver. 16.] As miserable, that is, everywhere, as he intended to have made them happy (ver. 3).

Ver. 17.] The blessing of the barn was to have it full (ver. 5), and therefore the curse upon it was to make it empty.

Ver. 18.] He threatens to consume their children, their corn, and other fruits, with their herds and flocks.

Ver. 19.] Have no comfort in any undertaking, either at home or abroad, in peace or in war.

Ver. 20. Cursing, vexation, and rebuke.] It is very hard to know what these three words particularly import; the first two of them being very variously translated. The first of them, meera, seems to signify, in general, that God would blast them in all they designed and went about; for although the LXX. and Vulgar here render it famine and want, yet elsewhere the LXX. render it as we do, κατάρα, "cursing;" and the next word, mechuma, they translate hunger; but in other places the LXX. render it by six or seven words, which import the same with our English vexation, viz. ταραχή, "trouble or disturbance;" ζόρυβον, "tumult;" σύγχυσις, "confusion;" ἕσθρασις, "horror or affrightment," &c., which relate to a great disorder, disquiet, and perplexity in their mind. And the last word, mighereth, the Vulgar translates as we do, rebuke; but the LXX. ἀνάσσειν, "consumption;" which are the same in effect. For when God rebukes a man for his iniquity, he makes his beauty to consume stroyed, and until thou perish quickly; because of the wickedness of thy doings, whereby thou hast forsaken me.

21 The Lord shall make the pestilence cleave unto thee, until he have consumed thee from off the land, whither thou goest to possess it.

22 The Lord shall smite thee with a consumption, and with a fever, and with an inflammation, and with an extreme burning, and with the sword, and with blasting, and with mildew; and they shall pursue thee until thou perish.

23 And thy heaven that is over thy head shall be brass, and the earth that is under thee shall be iron.

away like a moth (Ps. xxxix. 11). For God's rebukes consist not in words, but in sore afflictions (2 Kings xix. 3, Ps. xviii. 15, &c.), particularly in disappointments and ill success in their undertakings, and continual fear of worse for the future.

In all that thou settest thine hand unto] In all their affairs (ver. 8) they should meet with trouble, perplexity, and defeats.

Until thou be destroyed.] He threatens that this curse, trouble, and rebuke from God should pursue them, till they had completed their ruin.

Until thou perish quickly;] When God began to punish them, after long patience with them, he was quick in his executions, and many times brought upon them sudden destruction. So he threatens in Zeph. i. 18, that he would "make a speedy riddance of all that dwell in the land." And though the whole nation was not rooted out speedily, but by degrees, yet they enjoyed it but a short time, in comparison of what God designed, if they had been obedient; in that time, they were seldom without some trouble or other, till they were expelled out of their country.

Thou hast forsaken me.] And followed after other gods, which was the great crime that brought them to desolation.

Ver. 21. The Lord shall make the pestilence cleave unto thee.] The pestilence is threatened in Lev. xxvi. 25, where he saith he will "send it among them," and here adds, that it shall "cleave unto them," that is, be incurable. And so the author of Schebet Judah confesses, that, after they had been wasted and broken in pieces by wars, they that fled into Spain, in the time of Alphonsus, were swept away in great numbers by a plague; and introduces one applying these very words, as a prophecy of it: which I thought fit to note, though this part of the prophecy doth not belong to what hath befallen them since the last destruction of Jerusalem (as I shall show hereafter), but to the times before the first destruction; when he often sent a pestilence to destroy them (2 Sam. xxiv. 15; Jer. xiv. 12, xxi. 6, 7, 9, and many other places of that book; Ezek. v. 12, vi. 11, 12; Amos iv. 10). But it must be acknowledged, also, that the Greeks call such unseasonable weather as destroys the fruits of the earth, by the name of λοιμός, "pestilence." So Plato, lib. x. De Logibus, saith, that which is called νόσσημα, "a disease in bodies," ἐν δ' ἡραϊς ἐτῶν καὶ ἐναυτῶν λοιμός, &c., is called "pestilence in the seasons of the year." The murrain also in cattle is called by the same name; which even the pagans thought was sent by the anger of their gods, for the sins of men; as we learn from Callimachus, in his hymn to Diana, where he saith (ver. 125), that when she was angry, pestilence ate up their cattle, and hail destroyed the fruits of the earth.

Κρήναι φιν λαμβὸς μεταβρόσκειται, ἔργα δὲ πύσσιν.

As, on the contrary, when she was well-pleased, she sent fruitful seasons, and all manner of happiness, as it follows in that hymn.

Until he have consumed thee from off the land.] Made a great destruction, by sweeping away many people, the rest being reserved for other judgments, which follow in the next words.

Ver. 22. Smite thee with a consumption, and with a fever, and with an inflammation,] These three words signify sore diseases in men's bodies: the first two of which, socopheth and kaddachath, we translate in Lev. xxvi. 16, as we do here; only the second of them we render the burning ague, which here we translate fever. Unto which is here added dalleketh, which signifies such an inflammation as is accompanied with itching (according to the LXX. who translate it ἰθιβατόν), which is extremely grievous, because the scratching of it increases the inflammation.

With an extreme burning, and with the sword,] These two seem to relate unto the indisposition of the air, by extreme heat and drought; as we translate the word cherub in the margin of our Bibles; for it signifies both the sword and dryness; as the first word charchur signifies scorching heat, which frequently causes diseases: for it being the doubling of the word charar, it denotes the extremity or highest degree of it, as all such words do; of which Bochartus hath given many examples in his Hierozoicon, par. ii. lib. i. cap. 19.

With blasting, and with mildew;] These two relate to the destruction of their corn, and the fruits of the earth, which follows upon the corruption of the air, as famine follows upon the corruption of the fruits of the earth. The first word shiddaphon, the LXX. and the other Greek interpreters translate ἀνεμοφθόριαν, "blasting by biting winds;" though elsewhere the LXX. translate it by ἐμπυροτόν and πύρρην, which signify such "blighting as comes by heat." And the second word jerakon (which comes from jerek, herb or grass, or any green thing) seems properly to be expressed by the LXX. who translate it ἄχραν; for corn, and grass, and herbs, turn pale and wan for want of moisture.

They shall pursue thee until thou perish.] These plagues upon their bodies, and upon the air, and the corn, and herbs, he threatens shall come upon them one year after another, till they be consumed.

Ver. 23. Thy heaven—shall be brass.] That is, as brass, having no more moisture in it than brass hath. It is remarkable that he doth not say the heaven, that is, the air or clouds, but thy heaven, that is, the clouds which hung over their country should be dry, though they dropped upon other lands (see Jer. xiv.).

The earth—shall be iron.] Hard as iron, for want of rain to soften it (see Lev. xxiv. 19). The observation of Maimonides is worth noting upon this part of the law: "That the Zabii, an ancient sort of idolaters in the eastern countries, thought the fruitfulness of the earth depended upon the worship of the planets, and the rest of the heavenly bodies: and therefore their wise men and their prophets (as he saith he found in their books, particularly in one concerning the husbandry of the Egyptians) taught the people to keep festivals in their honour, because the fruitfulness of the earth, by which men subsist, depends upon their will and pleasure. In opposition to which, God ordered Moses to tell the Israelites in his name, that if they worshipped the stars they should have no rain; the earth should be barren, the trees yield no fruit; the season prove unhealthful, and their lives be shortened. On the contrary, if they worshipped him, the Lord of heaven and earth, and him alone, they should have showers from above; the earth should bring forth 24 The LORD shall make the rain of thy land powder and dust: from heaven shall it come down upon thee, until thou be destroyed.

25 The LORD shall cause thee to be smitten before thine enemies: thou shalt go out one way against them, and flee seven ways before them: and shalt be removed into all the kingdoms of the earth.

26 And thy carcase shall be meat unto all fowls of the air, and unto the beasts of the earth, and no man shall fray them away.

27 The LORD will smite thee with the botch of Egypt, and with the emerods, and with the scab, and with the itch, whereof thou canst not be healed.

28 The LORD shall smite thee with madness, and blindness, and astonishment of heart:

29 And thou shalt grope at noonday, as the abundantly, and they should be blessed with healthful seasons, sound bodies, and long life. For it is the very foundation of the law (as his phrase is), to root the forenamed false opinion out of men's minds" (More Nevoch. par. iii. cap. 30).

Ver. 24. Make the rain of thy land powder and dust:] That is, there shall be such a long drought, that, instead of rain, showers of dust, blown up into the air by the wind, shall fall down from heaven upon them.

From heaven shall it come down upon thee, until thou be destroyed.] This seems to denote something more than the falling of clouds of dust, wherewith the air was filled by high winds; viz. showers of ashes, which have sometimes fallen in great quantities, as good historians testify. Nothing is more known than the vast clouds of ashes which Mount Ætna hath often vomited, whereby all the country thereabout hath been laid desolate. And the like hath been thrown out by Mount Vesuvius, which hath reached as far as Rome and Constantinople (see Boniferius). But if there was any such thing in Judea, it must be a miraculous judgment, there being no such mountains in those parts of the world, to make such evolutions.

Ver. 25. Cause thee to be smitten] He saith the same in effect, Lev. xxvi. 17. For to smite in Scripture (as I have before observed) signifies to slay or kill.

Thou shalt go out one way against them, and flee seven ways before them:] Though they marched out in a great body against their enemies, he threatens that they should soon be dispersed; the hand of the Lord as well as of their enemies being against them. For that expression is remarkable, "the Lord shall cause thee to be smitten" (see ver. 7).

Be removed into all the kingdoms of the earth.] This is something more than is threatened, Lev. xxvi. 33, signifying, not only their dispersion into the remotest parts of the world, but their being tossed up and down like vagabonds, from one country to another, without any certain settlement; which had been notoriously verified since their last dispersion by the Romans, of which they themselves have given us large accounts in several books, viz. Juchasin, Schalscheleth Hakabala, Schebet Judah, and Zemueh David, wherein they have abundantly confirmed what Tertullian saith of them in his time, Dispersi, palabundi, et cœli, et soli sui extorres vagantur per orbem; "That being scattered, straggling up and down uncertainly, banished from their own country, they wander about the world, without any king," &c. But this belongs to the time of the first captivity, when Nehemiah (ch. i. 8) confesses these words were fulfilled (see Jer. ix. 16; Ezek. vi. 8, xii. 14, 15).

Ver. 26. Thy carcase shall be meat unto all the fowls of the air, and unto the beasts] Nothing was accounted a greater calamity among the Jews, than to have their dead bodies lie exposed, to be buried only in the bowels of birds and beasts; and therefore Jeremiah threatens this as the utmost punishment of the king of Judah, xxii. 19, xxxvi. 30, and the Psalmist he-wails it as one of the sorest judgments that have fallen them, Ps. lxxix. 2, 3.

No man shall fray them away.] That is, no man took so much compassion upon them as to chase them away, and to inter the remainders, which the birds and beasts hath not devoured.

Ver. 27. The Lord shall smite thee] Why the Jerusalem Targum should here, in a particular manner, say, "the Word of the Lord shall smite thee," I cannot imagine; unless it was to suggest, that he, being their conductor out of Egypt, was the person more especially concerned to punish them for their shameful ingratitude to their Deliverer (see ver. 68).

With the botch of Egypt.] Some take this to signify the leprosy, unto which they in that country were subject. Others, that "bile breaking out with blains," wherewith God smote the Egyptians (Exod. ix. 9, &c.). For that is called shechin, as this is.

With the emerods.] The Hebrew word apholim, is nowhere to be met with but here and 1 Sam. v. 6, 9, 11, and in the rest of that history; which most interpreters (and not without reason) think signifies those painful tumours in the fundament, which sometimes turn into ulcers (see Bochartus in his Hieroico. par. i. lib. ii. cap. 36).

The scab.] The LXX. here translate the Hebrew garab (as they do also Lev. xxi. 20), λίπα άγρια, "a fierce or malignant scab." And the Vulgar adds the word jugis, to signify that this was no small punishment.

The itch.] The Hebrew word cheres signifies, as is generally thought, a dry itch; which is the most troublesome of all other.

Whereof thou canst not be healed.] This may refer both to the scab and to the itch before mentioned; which proceeded from such a corruption of the blood, that they were as incurable as the leprosy.

Ver. 28. Madness, and blindness, and astonishment of heart.] All these three relate to the mind: the first of them importing such a distraction in their thoughts, that they should not know what course to take when they consulted for their safety: the second, such a stupidity, that they should not discern the true way, but always take the wrong; the third, that amazement and horror which followed thereupon, when they saw themselves ruined by their own foolish counsels and mad contrivances. A famous instance of which was in the time of Trajan, when they committed such outrageous massacres, both upon the Greeks and Romans (as Dion, a very sober author, relates), in Cyrene and Cyprus (where great numbers of Jews dwelt, after they were driven out of their own country), that the Lord, no doubt (to use the words of Dr. Jackson on the Creed, book i. ch. 27), had smote them with the "madness and blindness of heart" here threatened, that they might hereby provoke that puissant emperor's indignation, which otherwise would have slept, but now pursued them throughout his dominions, not only as enemies, or rebels, but "as noxious creatures to human society," with a revenge suitable to their former outrages. And, indeed, this prediction was verified in their blind credulity, which made them follow every one that pretended to be their Messiah; which blind gropeth in darkness, and thou shalt not prosper in thy ways: and thou shalt be only oppressed and spoiled evermore, and no man shall save thee.

30 Thou shalt betroth a wife, and another man shall lie with her: thou shalt build an house, and thou shalt not dwell therein: thou shalt plant a vineyard, and shalt not gather the grapes thereof.

always brought great calamities upon them, as R. Gedaliah himself confesses in Schalscheleth Hakkala; where he mentions no small number of these deceivers, and shows how many Jews perished who followed them. Yet they are but a few, in comparison of a long catalogue, that might be made of those pretended Messiahs (see the learned Wagenseil's confutation of R. Lipman's Carmen Memoriale, p. 233, &c.). Unto which I shall add only one observation more out of Solomon ben Virgæ, who saith, in some places of Germany, they were possessed with such a rabies, that they cut one another's throats, to avoid the oppression of their enemies; and burnt themselves and their neighbours in their houses, setting whole cities on fire, and perishing in the flames. Such was their extreme rage and furious revenge against those Christians who pressed them to change their religion. Many stories of the like nature that author tells in his book entitled Schebet Judah; where he hath sixty-four relations of the calamities which befell them in that and in other countries. But these words I doubt not, were fulfilled before in the first desolation of Jerusalem, to which they belong. For though we have not such particular relations as those now mentioned to illustrate them, yet the prophets speak of their being mad, by drinking of the cup of the Lord's fury (Jer. xxv. 16, 18), and blind (Zeph. i. 17; Lam. iv. 14), and astonished (Jer. iv. 9; Ezek. iv. 17).

Ver. 29. Thou shalt grope at noonday, as the blind gropeth in darkness.] This shows the blindness spoken of in the foregoing verse relates to their mind; which was so darkened, that in the plainest and clearest things they mistook the way and means of their preservation (Zeph. i. 17).

Thou shalt not prosper in thy ways.] But, quite contrary, whatsoever course they took, it turned to their undoing.

Only oppressed and spoiled evermore.] One oppression followed upon another (as the same Dr. Jackson observes), and such rapines were committed in several places upon them as only made way for new ones, even when the supreme powers endeavoured to hinder them.

No man shall save thee.] This was so remarkably fulfilled in these parts of the world, that the magistrates, who had a mind in many places to preserve them from such outrages, as none but Jews can justify, durst not venture to appear for their rescue. And those that did take them into their protection, were the instruments of their further wrongs, by grievous exactions for the maintenance of the war undertaken in their defence. So strangely (as that excellent person forenamed speaks, cap. 29), did the wisdom of God bring that to pass, which his servant Moses had foretold in this verse, no man shall save thee: for even succour itself turned into their sorrow; and it is hard to say, whether men's purposes for their good, or for their evil, brought greater plagues upon them. Thus it was before their first captivity; Pharaoh king of Egypt came to help them, but was not able (Jer. xxxvii. 7, xlii. 17).

31 Thine ox shall be slain before thine eyes, and thou shalt not eat thereof: thine ass shall be violently taken away from before thy face, and shall not be restored to thee: thy sheep shall be given unto thine enemies, and thou shalt have none to rescue them.

32 Thy sons and thy daughters shall be given unto another people, and thine eyes shall look, and fail with longing for them all the day.

Ver. 30. Thou shalt betroth a wife, and another man shall lie with her.] Take her away from thee before thou canst consummate the marriage. This was a sore affliction, for all nations accounted it a singular blessing to complete a marriage; and, on the contrary, a curse to be defeated of such delightful hopes. Whence Callimachus, in his hymn to Apollo, promising many blessings to the youths who sung and danced before his altar, mentions this in the first place (ver. 14).

ΕΙ ΤΑΙΣΤΕ ΜΕΘΩΝΑΙ ΓΑΜΟΝ

"that he would be with them, and prosper them, if they were to be married."

Thou shalt build an house, and—not dwell therein.] But another take possession of it (Zeph. i. 13).

Thou shalt plant a vineyard, and shalt not gather the grapes.] So we rightly translate the Hebrew word, which (as the margin notes) is, thou shalt not profane or make common the grapes thereof; which was not to be done till the fifth year after the plantation. Before which time God threatens another should enter into it, and enjoy the fruits thereof.

Ver. 31.] All these are but particular instances of their grievous oppressions in all countries, where their goods have been confiscated, the bills of debts owing to them all cancelled. Of which the same pious and learned person, Dr. Jackson, gives several instances in the forenamed chapter.

Ver. 32. Thy sons and thy daughters shall be given unto another people.] This was literally fulfilled when the Jews were banished out of Portugal, in the time of king Emanuel; who ordered their children under nineteen years of age to be taken from them, and brought up in the Christian religion. When infants also were torn from their mothers' breasts, with far more grief and sorrow than they had at their coming out of their womb: and many hundred years before that, when the Goths were lords of Spain, and suffered no parents to have any commerce with their children after the seventh year of their age, but by public decree they were committed to Christians to be educated by them, who married them to their own sons and daughters (see the same Dr. Jackson, ch. 28, parag. 1, 2).

Thine eyes shall look, and fail with longing for them.] Their women filling the heavens with more hideous shrieks than the Egyptians did, when all their first-born were slain in the night. For these were bereft at once of all their dear children in the open sun, in vain begging to have them restored to them. And to increase their calamity (as that excellent person observes, ch. 29, par. 15), many Moors professing Mahometism were transported out of Portugal at the same time, without such violence offered to them. What was the reason (saith he)? God would have a manifest distinction made between the Jews and other people, that this prophecy might be fulfilled.

There shall be no might in thine hand.] Either to protect or to rescue them from violence. Where I cannot but take notice, with the same doctor, that the Moors then had some power in their hand, which long: and there shall be no might in thine hand.

33 The fruit of thy land, and all thy labours, shall a nation which thou knowest not eat up; and thou shalt be only oppressed and crushed away:

34 So that thou shalt be mad for the sight of thine eyes which thou shalt see.

35 The Lord shall smite thee in the knees, moved the Portugals, perhaps, to abstain from such usage of them, lest the report of it coming to the African Mahometans, they might attempt to avenge their wrongs. But these wretched Jews had no power anywhere, none to avenge their injuries, which God had ordained they should suffer at all times, and in all places wheresoever they came, without redress.

Ver. 33. The fruit of thy land—shall a nation which thou knowest not eat up;] This was remarkably fulfilled, when Salmaneser came and dispossessed the ten tribes; and when Nebuchadnezzar carried the other two tribes away, and placed other people in their room.

There were many strange people also among the Romans, who devoured their labours, before their last destruction by Titus. And ever since they have been subject to depredations of various sorts; having scraped up riches, with great care, which have often fallen into the hands of strangers. Particularly in the time of the famous crusades, when divers nations marched in great numbers to recover the Holy Land from infidels, their business was in their way to rob and spoil the Jews, and to make great slaughter of them, as both Jewish and Christian writers witness; particularly the author of Schalscheleth Hakkabala, and our Mathew Paris.

Only oppressed and crushed away;] That they should not only sometimes, or in some ages, or in some one or few kingdoms, but always, in every kingdom whither they removed (as he speaks, ver. 25), suffer such violence and wrong, as no other people hath done, must needs be thought to proceed rather from Divine justice than men's inclination to injustice. Which could not but have varied with the diversity of times and places, and the several dispositions of parties, among whom they have been dispersed. And yet the brief enumeration of their particular spoils and hard usage, which Dr. Jackson makes in the forenamed chapter (whose words these are, in the beginning of it), throughout the most civil and best governed states of Europe, will abundantly confirm the truth of Moses's words in this place, "Thou shalt never but suffer wrong and violence away," as our old translation hath it. The same is lately observed by an eminently learned person (J. Wagenseil), in his confutation of R. Lipman's Carn. Memorale, p. 241, where he takes notice, that the Jews no sooner have grown rich, and by degrees become considerable in any country, but some great calamity hath befallen them. This the attentive consideration of their history will justify, particularly as he observes in France, Spain, and England; God not suffering them to be quite destroyed, like the Amalekites, Jebusites, and Philistines, of whom no footsteps remain, but be scattered and tossed about through all Christian countries (for a testimony to the truth of our religion), and there only oppressed, crushed, and squeezed, as Moses here foretold. One instance of which sore oppression I cannot forbear to add out of Schebet Judah, where R. Solomon Virga confesses what great miseries they have been exposed unto, by persons pretending to be their Messtah, who have drawn the hatred of all nations upon them; particularly in Persia, he saith, they were most lament-and in the legs, with a sore botch that cannot be healed, from the sole of thy foot unto the top of thy head.

36 The Lord shall bring thee, and thy king which thou shalt set over thee, unto a nation which neither thou nor thy fathers have known; and there shalt thou serve other gods, wood and stone.

37 And thou shalt become an astonishment, a ably handled upon this score, being not only stripped of all, but forced to go about like dogs with a great clog of wood bound to their necks, which exposed them to the scorn and laughter of all men: for while some threw it behind their backs, others would come and throw it down before their feet; some dragging them backwards, and others cruelly beating them with it. This one told him who saw it.

Ver. 31.] So they were (as the forenamed doctor observes, ch. 29, par. 6, 15), when their children were taken from them in Portugal. For some, being not able to rescue or despatch them, killed themselves; others, who had better opportunity, drowned their children in wells or ditches. And here in England, one of their learned rabbins persuaded four hundred of his company, besieged with him in a strong tower by the furious multitude, to cut their own throats, rather than fall into their enemies' hands; himself confirming his doctrine, by cutting his wife's throat first, then his children's, and lastly, killing himself. And thus, in the time of the forementioned crusades, the soldiers made such dreadful havoc of the Jews as they went along to the Holy Land, that many of them made themselves away out of despair; as their own authors, R. Gedaliah and David Ganz, tell us, ad an. 1096.

Ver. 35.] This is the same word in the Hebrew [sechein] which is used ver. 27, called the "botch of Egypt," and here "an evil botch," that is, a very grievous breaking out; which began in those lower parts, and so spread, (being incurable, and by no means to be stopped) from the sole of the feet, unto the crown of the head.

Ver. 36. The Lord shall bring thee—unto a nation which neither thou nor thy fathers have known;] This may seem to have been fulfilled literally, only when Jehoiachim was carried away captive to Babylon (2 Kings xxiv. 15), and afterward Zedekiah (xxv. 7; Jer. xxxix. 7, lii. 11). For when they returned, they had no more any kings. But the latter part of these words ["a nation which neither thou nor thy fathers have known"] may incline us to extend their threatening as far as to their last dispersion by the Romans. Since which they have been driven into several countries far less known to them than Babylon was (with which they had correspondence before their captivity thither, 2 Kings xx. 12, &c.), and though they have had no king, yet they have set over themselves rulers and governors, who may be comprehended under that name.

There shalt thou serve other gods.] Either sotschly following the example of the country to which they were carried (Jer. xlv. 17, 18), or being compelled thereunto by their cruel tyranny (Dan. iii. 6). The author of Schebet Judah observes, that this was the just punishment of their folly in running after idols, that they were sent into other countries to worship those gods which they were so fond of in their own. And he refers it particularly to the time of the captivity of Babylon; in which they continued seventy years, according to the number of years wherein those planets, whom they had worshipped, finished their course: for Saturn, as he computes, proverb, and a byword, among all nations whither the LORD shall lead thee.

38 Thou shalt carry much seed out into the field, and shalt gather but little in: for the locust shall consume it.

finishes his in one-and-twenty, Jupiter in as many; and so he proceeds with the rest, which make up that number. But this is too curious an observation, and the Jews have little skill in astronomy; therefore I pass it by, and only observe, that Manasseh ben Israel also understands this of the Babylonian captivity; for all the punishments mentioned, from ver. 15 to ver. 39, were fulfilled under the first temple, and after the ruin of it, till the building of the second; which, though it be not exactly true (some of these predictions having been more completely fulfilled, as I have shown in aftertimes), yet is it reasonable to think that this threatening particularly belongs to what they suffered in Babylon; the very same calamity being again threatened in the sixty-fourth verse, where I shall show it belongs to their present condition.

Ver. 37. Become an astonishment.] Their neighbours, he means, who saw or heard of the greatness and strangeness of their various plagues, should be dismayed at the sight, or report of them; wondering that a people, who had been so flourishing, should be made so exceeding desolate (see 1 Kings ix. 8; Jer. xviii. 16, xix. 8).

A proverb, and a byword.] So that when men would express one extremely vile, they should say he was a Jew. The same is threatened by God when he appeared to Solomon, 1 Kings ix. 7, and by Jeremiah, xxiv. 9, which, it is likely, was fulfilled at their first captivity into Babylon (see Lam. ii. 15, 16); but hath been notoriously fulfilled in their last captivity (as they call it) since the destruction of Jerusalem and their temple by the Romans: for here in England (from whence they have been banished above three hundred years) their name serves as a perfect measure (to use the words of Dr. Jackson, book i. on the Creed, ch. 30), to express the height of impiety in any agent, or the death of an abject, worthless, forlorn condition, in any patient. Better we cannot express the most cut-throat dealing than thus, "You use me like a Jew;" or, "none but a Jew would have done this." And when in common speech we exaggerate wrongs done to the most odious or despised people among us, we say, "I would not have done so to a Jew."

Ver. 38. Thou shalt carry much seed out into the field, and shalt gather but little in.] This was fulfilled before they were carried captive to Babylon, when God frequently sent sore famine upon them, as we read in the prophet Isaiah, lii. 19, and Jeremiah, xiv. 1—3, &c., and is often threatened by Ezekiel among other terrible judgments, and by Jeremiah himself, xxix. 17, 18.

For the locust shall consume it.] They were a great plague in those countries, falling sometimes in such vast numbers (from whence they had the name of arbe), that they covered the whole face of the earth, and devoured every green thing: for so another of their names imports, which is chusil, coming from chasal, which signifies to consume and eat up; which they did so entirely, that they were looked upon by all people as a plague sent by God, and are therefore called by Joel his army, ii. 25. So not only the Hebrews, but the Arabians esteemed them; who say, 40 Thou shalt have olive trees throughout all thy coasts, but thou shalt not anoint thyself with the oil; for thine olive shall cast his fruit.

41 Thou shalt beget sons and daughters, but thou shalt not enjoy them; for they shall go into captivity.

42 All thy trees and fruit of thy land shall the locust consume.

that some of them on a time fell before their prophet, as he sat at meat, with this inscription on their backs; "I am God, and there is none other besides me, the Lords of locusts, who nourish them; and when I please, send them forth, that they may be food for the people; and when I please, that they may be their plague, by eating up their food" (see Bochartus, in his Hierozoicon, par. ii. lib. iv. cap. 6).

Ver. 39. Thou shalt plant vineyards, and dress them.] Take a great deal of care and pains about them, after they are planted, to make them fruitful.

But shalt neither drink of the wine nor gather the grapes.] Not enjoy the least benefit by their cost and labour.

For the worms shall eat them.] The Hebrew word tholaath is a general name for all worms whatsoever; but there is a peculiar sort that infest vines, which the Greeks call λεπες and λεπες, as Bochartus observes, in his Hierozoicon, par. ii. lib. iv. cap. 27, where he takes notice that the Latins call this worm volvax, and convolvulus; because it wraps and rolls itself up in the buds, and eats the grapes up when they grow towards ripeness, as the Roman authors explain it.

Ver. 40. Thou shalt have olive trees—but thou shalt not anoint thyself with the oil.] Though the country abounded with these trees in all parts of it, they produced nothing but leaves, and a show of fruit, which came to no perfection.

For thine olive shall cast his fruit.] Being blasted, as the Jerusalem Targum explains it, in the very blossom; or the buds dropping off for want of rain; or the fruit being eaten with worms. Maimonides observes, that the idolaters in those countries pretended, by certain magical arts, to preserve all manner of fruit, so that the worms should not gnaw the vines, nor either buds or fruit fall from the trees (as he reports their words out of their own books, which he names): therefore to deter the Israelites from all idolatrous practices, Moses here pronounces, that they should draw upon themselves those very punishments which they studied by such means to avoid (More Nevochim, par. iii. cap. 37).

Ver. 41.] Which is threatened in many places of the prophets, and fulfilled in several invasions of their neighbours; for the Syrians, no doubt, carried captive more than one little maid, who waited on Naaman's wife (2 Kings v. 2). And in other inroads upon them, till the captivity of the whole land. This we may be confident was a frequent calamity (2 Kings xiv. 26, xv. 37, &c.). But it was never more remarkably fulfilled, than since they crucified our Saviour; their children having been taken from them (as I have observed before, ver. 32, 34), and transported sometimes into other places. And who knows whether many of their stock, detained by king Emanuel of Portugal, before mentioned, have not been transported into America? and whether many of the Spanish colonies have not a mixture of the Jewish progeny in them? as Dr. Jackson observes. Manasseh ben Israel, I am sure, endeavours to prove (in his book called Spes Israelis) that some of the ten tribes are in America; though how they came there, he can give no account.

43 The stranger that is within thee shall get up above thee very high; and thou shalt come down very low.

44 He shall lend to thee, and thou shalt not lend to him: he shall be the head, and thou shalt be the tail.

45 Moreover all these curses shall come upon thee, and shall pursue thee, and overtake thee, till thou be destroyed; because thou hearkenedst not unto the voice of the Lord thy

Ver. 42. All thy trees, and fruit of thy land shall the locust consume.] So Onkelos and the Hebrew writers generally translate the word tzalatal; which signifies a peculiar sort of locusts which falls upon trees, as others upon the fields. And it seems to have this name, because these locusts came in such thick clouds, that they darken the sun; the Hebrew word tzalatal signifying to overshadow. The Jerusalem Targum translates it, "all your trees, and the fruits of your land, shall spoilers possess."

I suppose these several judgments fell in the order wherein they are here mentioned in ver. 38—42, there being first a great dearth, of which we read 2 Kings viii. 1, &c., and Joel i. 10—12, &c., then many invasions of their country, wherein several were carried captive by the bands of Moab upon the Israelites (2 Kings xiii. 20), and of the Chaldeans, Syrians, and Ammonites, who came upon Judah (xxiv. 2). And we read expressly, that before this, in the days of Ahaz, a great multitude were carried captive by the Syrians (2 Chron. xxviii. 5). After which more spoilers came upon them in the days of Jeremiah, xii. 12, and a new famine, xiv. 1, &c., in which this forty-first verse may be thought to be fulfilled.

Ver. 43.] There is no sorer punishment to a proud people, than to see those who are not only their inferiors, but much beholden to them (as all strangers were to the Jews, among whom they lived merely by permission), get up above them, and become their superiors. But so it was, that the Jews, by their foolish endeavours to advance themselves, raised a mere stranger to the highest dignity, who humbled them into the lowest condition. For this (as that excellent person I have often mentioned observes) may be applied to Vespasian, who was appointed to command in the wars against the Jews, and being a person of mean birth and obscure family, had no thoughts of aspiring to the imperial seat; but by the unseasonable desire of the Jews to exalt themselves above all nations, they hoisted him up to the most sublime pitch of greatness, who was ordained by God to pluck them down from their seat, and bring them beneath all people (see Dr. Jackson, book i. on the Creed, ch. 23, par. 3, 4, &c.). For he quite extinguished their glory, which was their temple at Jerusalem; and likewise shut up and profaned the temple which the Egyptian Jews had built in the country of Heliopolis, after it had stood above three hundred years: but if any one think good thus to apply the words of this verse unto Vespasian, they must not take this for the literal meaning of them; because it is evident, that by the stranger is to be understood those of other nations who lived among them; particularly, those gentiles who were brought into the country by the Assyrians, instead of the ten tribes, as some of the best of the Jewish writers expound it. What the doctor also saith, concerning their advancing Vespasian to the imperial dignity, cannot be maintained.

Ver. 44.] Thus the covenant of God, to exalt his people and humble their foes, was quite inverted, as he also observes (see ver. 12, 13), all the plagues

God, to keep his commandments and his statutes which he commanded thee:

46 And they shall be upon thee for a sign and for a wonder, and upon thy seed for ever.

47 Because thou servest not the Lord thy God with joyfulness, and with gladness of heart, for the abundance of all things;

48 Therefore shalt thou serve thine enemies which the Lord shall send against thee, in hunger, and in thirst, and in nakedness, and in want threatened to those who bare ill-will to Sion, lighting on them and their friends; and all the blessings promised to such as prayed for her peace, being heaped on those that wrought her ruin.

Ver. 45. All these curses shall come upon thee.] These punishments, he means, should not cease, but follow one upon another till they had brought them to utter ruin. Which is so evidently fulfilled, that, would but the atheists consider it, and lay it to heart, it would wring from them a confession of the truth of what these Divine oracles have uttered, that "this was a people who had been appointed to destruction." For, though there be a great many of them remaining, in several parts of the world, yet they have never been suffered to grow into a nation, but in that sense are utterly destroyed, as Moses here prophesied.

Because thou hearkenedst not unto the voice of the Lord thy God,] It hath manifestly appeared the hand of God is very heavy upon them for their disobedience to him, there being no other reason why they, who were once so favoured by him, should be so long as they have been more miserable than any other people.

Ver. 46. They shall be upon thee] That is, the curses before mentioned should remain fixed upon them, and continue unremoved from age to age.

For a sign and for a wonder,] That all men may take notice of them, and look upon them as extraordinary tokens of God's high displeasure, and take warning thereby to beware of their infidelity and disobedience; for, as that great man often saith, "No sign can be given equivalent to the desolation of the Jewish nation, and their continuing still banished from their own land, and miserably treated in all other countries."

Upon thy seed for ever.] All the world may clearly see (to use his words again) that the God of their fathers hath cast them off, they having no signs or badges of his ancient wonted favours, whilst innumerable marks and scars of his fearful indignation against their fathers remain unhealed in their children, after more generations than their ancestors had of prosperity in the promised land.

Ver. 47. For the abundance of all things;] Or, "in the abundance of all things;" for this is opposed to the hunger and thirst "in which (he saith in the next verse) they should serve their enemies," as a punishment for the wanton abuse of God's mercies. Which being so exceeding great, justly required not only their obedience, but cheerfulness and delight therein.

Ver. 48. Therefore shalt thou serve thine enemies] He doth not call the Lord their God, as he did before, now they were abandoned by him for their sins.

In hunger, and in thirst, &c.] This shows what he meant before by "abundance of all things," plentiful provision of food and raiment, and all other things belonging to the comfort of life.

He shall put a yoke of iron upon thy neck,] The loss of liberty was as great a misery as any other, which ended also in hard servitude. And it was but just that they should be slaves in the land of their enemies to cruel masters, who would not, in their own country, of all things: and he shall put a yoke of iron upon thy neck, until he have destroyed thee.

49 The LORD shall bring a nation against thee from far, from the end of the earth, as swift as the eagle flieth; a nation whose tongue thou shalt not understand;

50 A nation of fierce countenance, which shall not regard the person of the old, nor shew favour to the young:

51 And he shall eat the fruit of thy cattle, and the fruit of thy land, until thou be destroyed: which also shall not leave thee either corn, wine, or oil, or the increase of thy kine, or flocks of thy sheep, until he have destroyed thee.

52 And he shall besiege thee in all thy gates, until thy high and fenced walls come down, wherein thou trustedst, throughout all thy land: and he shall besiege thee in all thy gates throughout all thy land, which the LORD thy God hath given thee.

53 And thou shalt eat the fruit of thine own serve so gracious and loving a father as the Lord their God.

[A yoke of iron] Signifies an unsupportable yoke, which could not be broken (see Jer. xxviii. 13, 14).

Ver. 49. Bring a nation against thee from far.] This evidently belongs to the Romans, as Manasseh ben Israel acknowledges; who thinks, that at this verse begins his prophecy of their calamities under the second temple, as in the foregoing he describes their calamities under the first. And in this, I think, he saith right, that there is scarce any thing mentioned in the following part of this chapter, but what relates to what they suffered under the second temple (as he speaks), and since its destruction; though I cannot say, as he doth, of the foregoing part of it, that it was fulfilled in the calamities which befell them under the first temple; for many things were never so completely fulfilled, as since they crucified our Saviour.

[From the end of the earth.] This shows he speaks of the Romans, rather than of the Chaldeans, who did not come "from far," much less "from the end of the earth;" but out of the north country, which was not very far distant from Judea: whereas the Romans, by whom they were last destroyed, came literally "from far," and "from the end of the earth;" particularly Julius Severus was called by the emperor Adrian to their destruction out of this island of Britain; wherein Vespasian also had given great proof of his conduct. And Adrian himself, and Trajan, by whom they were still more crushed, after Vespasian had destroyed their city and temple, were both Spaniards by birth. And, therefore, Manasseh ben Israel says peremptorily, in his book, De Termino Vitæ (lib. iii. sect. 3), this is to be understood of the soldiers in Vespasian's army, which he brought out of England, France, and Spain, and other remote parts of the world.

[As swift as the eagle] Which every one knows the Romans carried in their ensigns. And these birds are observed to fly upon their prey with great force and violence; to whom, therefore, fierce soldiers (such as the Romans were) are compared, when they set upon their enemies. So Homer describes Achilles falling upon the Trojans,

Ἄετός οἴμαρ' ἔχων

In Iliad Φ, where οἴμαρ signifies ἐπιήματα, "furious assaults," as the scholiast interprets it. And so he speaks concerning Hector, Iliad X. As David also speaks of Saul and Jonathan, 2 Sam. i. 23, and the Chaldeans are so described, coming against Jerusalem, Jer. iv. 13, xlviii. 40, xlix. 22; Lam. i. 19; Ezek. xvii. 3; and see Dan. vii. 4, and Bochartus, in his Hierozoicon, par. i. lib. ii. cap. 9, par. ii. lib. ii. cap. 2.

[A nation whose tongue thou shalt not understand.] The Roman tongue was more strange to them than the Chaldean, especially the language of many nations, of which the Roman army was composed; and being a people whom their ancestors, perhaps, never heard of. Dr. Jackson justly looks upon the destruction and general desolation of their country, made by the Romans and their tributaries in these western parts of the world, as an everlasting monument of the truth of Moses's prophecy, in this and in the following verses.

Ver. 50. A nation] This word nation being used thrice in this and the foregoing verse, Manasseh ben Israel (in the place forenamed) is so critical, as to observe, that this repetition shows Jerusalem was to suffer thrice by the Roman power: first, in the time of Pompey; and, secondly, when Sosius came to the assistance of Herod against Antigonus; and, thirdly, when it was besieged and overturned by Vespasian and his son Titus.

[Of fierce countenance.] So we translate this phrase Dan. viii. 23, which, in the Hebrew, is a strong or hard face. Accordingly we translate it impudent (or, in our language, brazen-faced), Prov. vii. 13, and hard, Prov. xxi. 29, and bold of face, Eccles. viii. 1. All which set forth a people stern, fierce, undaunted, cruel, and hard-hearted; that had neither mercy nor modesty, but inflexibly pursued their designs; which is the true character of the old Romans.

[Which shall not regard the person of the old, nor show favour to the young;] These are wont to be pitied, being unable to hurt others; but in their wars with the Jews, the Romans spared nobody, their rage and fury extinguishing all reverence to gray hairs, and all tenderness to young babes.

Ver. 51. He shall eat the fruit of thy cattle, &c.] For they brought such vast armies, as devoured all the provisions in the country.

[Which also shall not leave thee either corn, wine, or oil, &c.] He repeats it again, in more particular words, to set forth the desolation to be so great, that nothing should remain for their support.

Ver. 52. He shall besiege thee in all thy gates.] The country being wasted, the Jews fled into their fenced cities, where they had laid up some provisions, to enable them to hold out a siege.

[Until thy high and fenced walls come down, wherein thou trustedst.] This was literally fulfilled by the Romans, to whom the best fortified places were forced to yield, as may be seen in Josephus's History of the Jewish War, which is the best commentary on this part of the prophecy. The walls of Jerusalem particularly were razed by Pompey; and Sosius took it again by force in the time of Augustus. But Tacitus tells, that the Jews took such advantage of the covetousness of Claudius, that they purchased of him the liberty to fortify their city again: which they did so well, that they trusted, as Moses here speaks, to its strength; which was so great, that Titus could not take it but by a long siege, which concluded in its utter ruin.

[He shall besiege thee in all thy gates:] He repeats it again, that they might not think to find security in any place whatsoever, though never so strongly fortified, and well provided with all things necessary for its defence.

Ver. 53.] This was fulfilled to a title by Vespasian and his son Titus; who, after they had vanquished them in the field, begirt them so close in Jerusalem, that they could not stir out, and rather than sur-body, the flesh of thy sons and of thy daughters, which the Lord thy God hath given thee, in the siege, and in the straitness, wherewith thine enemies shall distress thee:

54 So that the man that is tender among you, and very delicate, his eye shall be evil toward his brother, and toward the wife of his bosom, and toward the remnant of his children which he shall leave:

55 So that he will not give to any of them of the flesh of his children whom he shall eat: because he hath nothing left him in the siege, and in the straitness, wherewith thine enemies shall distress thee in all thy gates.

56 The tender and delicate woman among you, which would not adventure to set the sole of her foot upon the ground for delicateness and tenderness, her eye shall be evil toward the husband of her bosom, and toward her son, and toward her daughter,

57 And toward her young one that cometh out from between her feet, and toward her children which she shall bear: for she shall eat them for want of all things secretly in the siege and render, perished by a lamentable famine. For there were vast multitudes of people shut up in the city, which run thither from all parts for safety; who brought the famine sooner upon them, and made it more severe when it came. If we may believe R. David Ganz, it was furthered also by a fire, which the seditious people kindled, whereby fourteen hundred magazines were consumed, stored with provisions to serve two hundred thousand people for twenty years. For this he quotes Josephus; though no such thing is to be found in him.

Ver. 54. The man that is tender—and very delicate.] The two Hebrew words for tender and delicate signify a man that had lived in pleasure, and fared daintily, like the rich man in the gospel.

His eye shall be evil toward his brother, &c.] Grudge every bit which he sees his nearest relations eat, being ready to snatch it out of the mouth of his dear consort and children, and put it into his own: for this is the effect of a ravenous hunger.

Toward the remnant of his children] This imports that they should see many of them die in the siege: for famine forced them to feed on bad food, and that bred pestilential diseases, which swept away many; and increased still more by the carcasses of those that were famished. If any credit may be given to one of their own authors (David Ganz), there were above a hundred and sixteen thousand dead bodies of the rich and honourable men of Jerusalem carried out at one gate of the city, which was that of the Brook Kidron, besides those which were carried out at other gates, and thrown over the walls: and this he pretends to have out of Minchas, the son of Seruk, who was a faithful register in that city. Josephus mentions almost the same number, lib. vii. De Bello Judaico, cap. ult.

Ver. 55. He will not give to any of them of the flesh of his children whom he shall eat:] This is a description of the sorest famine, which forced them, after they had eaten up their horses, dogs, cats, and suchlike creatures, and their very belts and shoes, to eat even their own children; which fathers, who used to live deliciously, Moses prophesies, should eat up themselves privately, and let none share with them.

Because he hath nothing left him in the siege.] They were so sorely pinched with famine in a long siege, that they had nothing else remaining but their own offspring, and one another, wherewith to satisfy their hunger. Josephus observes (lib. vii. De Bello Judaico, cap. 18), that Jerusalem had been taken five times before this; but never suffered so dreadfully as by Titus; whom the Talmudists therefore call by the name of impious: which epithet belonged rather to themselves, who having with wicked hands (as St. Peter speaks) crucified and slain their Redeemer, were, by the just judgment of God upon them for their infidelity, hardened in an obstinate belief and expectation of a deliverer from the Romans, till they were reduced to those extremities.

Ver. 56. The tender and delicate woman, &c.] A description of the greatest softness and delicacy: both which the Chaldees express by a word that signifies the nicest motion, and going so slow a pace, as if they were loth to touch the ground (see Bochartus, in his Phaleg, lib. iv. cap. 19).

Her eye shall be evil toward the husband of her bosom, &c.] This is only a higher instance of the cruel effects of their distress by famine: for women, especially of the better sort, are naturally more tender and pitiful than men, and have the most passionate love to their children; which Moses here prophesies should be quite extinguished by hunger. And it was literally fulfilled, both in the siege of Samaria, wherein a woman boiled her son (2 Kings v. 28, 29), as a man did in the first siege of Jerusalem by the Babylonians (Baruch ii. 3, and see Lam. ii. 20, iv. 10). But never so exactly fulfilled as in the last siege by the Romans, when a noble woman (which fully answers to this prophecy, such persons being very delicate) did the very same, as Josephus relates in his book of the Jewish Wars, lib. vii. cap. 8. A most unnatural fact, as he observes, which was never committed either by Greek or barbarian: and which he would not have related, because it might seem incredible, if there had not been many witnesses of it besides himself.

Ver. 57. Toward her young one] Towards her newborn babe, which is wont to be welcomed into the world with great joy; but in this siege despatched out of it, to assuage the rage of their hunger. In the Hebrew (as we take notice in the margin) the word we translate young one, properly signifies the after-birth: and so the LXX. translate it, ῥὸ ἔσπιον. Which makes this passage most plain; that their hunger should make them so unnatural, as first to eat the after-birth which came from them, and then the child which was wrapped in it.

Toward her children] The rest of their children, whose cries for food they had no way to stop, but by killing them, and making them their own food. So it follows in the next words.

For she shall eat them for want of all things.] Having nothing else left to eat: for they had devoured, not only the leather of their girdles, and their shoes, and which covered their shields, but the very stale dung of oxen, and such things as the most sordid of all living creatures would not eat (see Josephus, lib. iii. Antiquities, cap. 16, lib. vii. cap. 7).

Secretly] It was not done secretly for any other reason, but lest anybody should have a share with them, and so make their hunger return the sooner: and yet it was a hard matter to conceal what they had done of this kind; for the seditious people presently smelling there had been something boiled, got into the house when she had eaten one half of her child, and found the other half, which she had left till another time; of which she invited them to eat.

In the siege and straitness.] These two words which are used here and ver. 53, and 55, may both straitness, wherewith thine enemy shall distress thee in thy gates.

55 If thou wilt not observe to do all the words of this law that are written in this book, that thou mayest fear this glorious and fearful name, THE LORD THY GOD;

59 Then the LORD will make thy plagues relate to the grievous miseries they should endure when they were besieged (ver. 52), and may be translated, "in the pressure and straits wherewith thine enemies," &c.

Wherewith thine enemy shall distress thee] We have not such an account of their distress in other cities, as we have of what they suffered in Jerusalem; where ἀπειρον πλήθος, "an innumerable multitude perished by famine" (as Josephus tells us, lib. vii. ἀλώσεως, cap. 7), and ineffable calamities thereupon happened: for in every house where the least shadow of food appeared, a war immediately began; and the dearest relations fell to blows, snatching away from each other the miserable supports of life. Nor would they let those that were dying expire quietly, not believing what they affirmed when they told them they had no food in their houses; but the cut-throats came and searched their very bosoms as they laid drawing their last breath, whether they had not there hid some food.

Ver. 58. If thou wilt not observe to do all the words of this law] Among which those words are most remarkable (xviii. 15, 18, 19), "A Prophet shall the Lord thy God raise up unto thee, like unto me; unto him shall ye hearken, &c. Whosoever will not hearken unto the words which he shall speak in my name, I will require it of him."

That thou mayest fear this glorious and fearful name, THE LORD THY GOD] That is, fear the great Lord of heaven and earth, and their special benefactor, who is most glorious in himself, and to be most humbly revered by us: for the name of God is God himself; from whence it is that he is sometimes called Hashem, "the Name," Lev. xxiv. 11. This shows the reason why Moses repeats this name the "Lord thy God" so often as he doth in the preface to this book, ch. vi.—ix, &c. In some of which there is scarce a verse wherein we do not meet with these words, and it is sometimes repeated no less than three times in one and the same verse xii. 18, xvi. 15), that God might be in all their thoughts, and the fear of him might possess their hearts.

Ver. 59. Then the Lord] If they still persisted in their infidelity and disobedience, after Jerusalem and the temple were destroyed, and such unheard-of calamities as they had suffered during the siege of that place, he threatens to bring upon them more astonishing judgments.

Will make thy plagues wonderful] Though their great plagues, under Vespasian, by famine, sword, and pestilence, had lessened their numbers exceedingly, yet, by the time of Trajan and Adrian, they had, like traitors taken for a while from the rack (to use Dr. Jackson's words), recovered strength enough to be put to greater torture; for then they were made a spectacle to the world of the Divine vengeance again, which they brought upon themselves by their rebellion; and showed therein their natural strength, by their grievous lingering pains in dying: for not only in Mesopotamia and in Cyprus, but especially in Cyrene, and throughout all Egypt, they broke out into such outrages, ὡσπερ ὑπὸ πνεύματος δεινοῦ τινος καὶ σατωδούς, "as if they had been possessed with some fierce and seditious spirit" (as Eusebius speaks, lib. iv.

wonderful, and the plagues of thy seed, even great plagues, and of long continuance, and sore sicknesses, and of long continuance.

60 Moreover he will bring upon thee all the diseases of Egypt, which thou wast afraid of; and they shall cleave unto thee.

61 Also every sickness, and every plague,

Eccles. Hist. cap. 2); whereupon Marcins Turbo was sent against them, and setting upon them, both by sea and land, with horse and foot, made a vast destruction of them. See Dion, lib. lxxviii. and Xiphilinus, who describe their slaughter to have been so great, that now was fulfilled (as the forenamed Dr. Jackson thinks) what Moses foretold in this place, "The Lord will make thy plagues wonderful, great plagues, and of long continuance." And, indeed, Eusebius saith in the forenamed place, that Turbo destroyed many thousands of them, πολλὰς μάχαις ἐν οὐλίγῳ τε χρόνῳ, &c. "in many battles, and in no small time, the war being protracted a great while to complete their destruction." And the application of this prophecy to this time may be confirmed by a strange relation which we meet withal in their own books: for in the Jerusalem Talmud one of their doctors tells us, that when Trajan came upon them with his army they were reading these very words of the law (ver. 49), "The Lord shall bring a nation against thee from far, from the end of the earth," &c., which he understanding (having asked them what they were doing), he cried out, "Here is the man (pointing to himself), who am come five days sooner than I intended." And immediately compassing them about with his legions, slew them all. Then he went to their wives, and offered them mercy if they would submit themselves: but they replied, "What thou hast done to the ground, do to the stubble;" so he despatched them also, and shed so much blood, that it ran into the sea as far as Cyprus. At this time (so he concludes his story) the horn of Israel was cut off from Israel, never to be restored into its place till the Son of David come. This passage I find alleged by Joh. Benedictus Carpzovius, out of Massec. Sanhedr. in explication of another matter in Sebickard's Mischpat Hammelech, cap. 3, Theor. 10, p. 199.

Sore sicknesses, and of long continuance.] Such as gonorrhoeas, leprosies, and burning fevers, as the author of the old Nitzacon, set forth by J. Wagenseil, explains it, p. 131.

Ver. 60.] The same diseases he foretells should infect them in, and after, their destruction by the Romans, which had done formerly under the Chaldeans and other oppressors (ver. 27). What these diseases were, Pet. Cunæus, lib. ii. De Republ. Jud. cap. ult. hath expressed in these words, Vitilignes, psorasque et tetra ulcera, &c. "Leprosies, itches, botches, and foul sinking ulcers," the greatest physicians have anciently ascribed to the Egyptians and Syrians, as plagues proper to those nations; unto which diseases, he observes, the Jews were strangely obnoxious.

Ver. 61.] It had been too long to have set down all the diseases and calamities that mankind are subject to; but he tells them they should not escape any one of them, though very numerous, and be afflicted with them till their destruction was completed. For they were of such long continuance, as was said before, and pursued them so closely whithersoever they went, that they are no longer a nation, but a scattered, forlorn people, abandoned and forsaken by Him that formerly protected them. Of this they themselves are so sensible, that they have confessed the truth of this part of the prophecy in these later ages: for Solomon ben Virgæ having related (in the ficti-which is not written in the book of this law, them will the LORD bring upon thee, until thou be destroyed.

62 And ye shall be left few in number, whereas ye were as the stars of heaven for multitude ; section of his book, called Schebet Judah) how they were transported out of Palestine into Spain, and so miserably handled, that not one of a thousand remained; and then how they were destroyed in Germany and France, where, of innumerable multitudes (equal to the number which came out of Egypt) scarce five thousand survived that calamity; and what he himself saw in Castile and Portugal (where they suffered such things as cannot be expressed nor conceived, by famine, by deprivations, by transportations, and by being sold for slaves, or drowned in the sea), he thus at last concludes his sad story, that they who fled to avoid that dreadful tempest in Castile found the truth of this oracle, "Every sickness and plague which is not written in the book of this law shall the Lord bring upon thee, till thou be destroyed."

Ver. 62. Ye shall be left few in number.] The multitude of the Jews killed in the wars was equal to the number of living men in Israel in the time of king David; for Josephus saith, that in the siege of Jerusalem there were destroyed, by pestilence, famine, and other ways, eleven hundred thousand, besides above ninety thousand carried captive. For they being come from all countries to keep the passover, the whole nation (as his words are, lib. vii. 'Αλώσεως, cap. 17) were shut up here by a fate, ὡς περ εἰς εἰρήνην, "as in a close prison," or rather driven thither (as Dr. Jackson speaks) "into a slaughter-house," after they had been foiled by the Romans in the field. And yet after this they recovered strength (as I observed before), merely to be more tormented and miserably destroyed: for in the reign of Adrian (who succeeded the emperor Trajan) they shook the Roman empire by their rebellious commotions, as Dion, who lived not long after, relates in his History, lib. lxxix., which moved Adrian to exercise the greater severity upon them in their punishment, there being slain of them in battles and skirmishes five hundred and eighty thousand, besides a vast number consumed by famine, and sickness, and fire, during the time of this lingering war; which Julius Severus, a famous commander, sent for on purpose out of Britain, designedly protracted to a great length, not being willing to try it out in the field in one battle with a desperate multitude. And now, as Moses foretold, they were left "few in number:" for Dion, as if he had intended to expound these words, saith, that Severus so beset and attacked them separately, in several parties, "that very few of them escaped:" fifty of their strongest fortresses being utterly razed, and nine hundred and eighty and five of their most noble and populous towns sacked and consumed by fire, with the slaughter of the fore-mentioned number; insomuch that, as his words are, "all Judea was in a manner laid waste, and left as a desert." This we may truly call "the last conflict of this nation with death and destruction in their own land;" out of which they were now almost totally expelled.

Because thou wouldst not obey the voice of the Lord] Who had spoken to them by that great Prophet, his eternal Word, promised in the eighteenth chapter of this book, ver. 15, &c. but they would not hearken to him: for which cause he gave them up to listen unto false Christs, whom they followed to their destruction; particularly Barchocheba, who, in the time of Adrian, took upon him the title of their king, and set up his throne at Bitter, in the tribe of Benjamin, which the Jews had made their chief seat after the destruction of Jerusalem; and had in it, as they pretend, four hundred synagogues. Here the Romans made such a slaughter of them, when they took it, that the Jews themselves cannot find expressions tragical enough to represent it. Twice as many, they tell us, perished now as came out of Egypt; great rivers ran with the blood of the slain, which (say some of them) carried great rocks along with it in the stream. With these and many other such like hyperbolical speeches, they themselves exaggerate their calamities, as many have observed out of Juchasin and Gittin, particularly Const. L'Empereur, in his annotations on Jacchiades (Dan. xi. 34).

63 And it shall come to pass, that as the LORD rejoiced over you to do you good, and to multiply you; so the LORD will rejoice over you up his throne at Bitter, in the tribe of Benjamin, which the Jews had made their chief seat after the destruction of Jerusalem; and had in it, as they pretend, four hundred synagogues. Here the Romans made such a slaughter of them, when they took it, that the Jews themselves cannot find expressions tragical enough to represent it. Twice as many, they tell us, perished now as came out of Egypt; great rivers ran with the blood of the slain, which (say some of them) carried great rocks along with it in the stream. With these and many other such like hyperbolical speeches, they themselves exaggerate their calamities, as many have observed out of Juchasin and Gittin, particularly Const. L'Empereur, in his annotations on Jacchiades (Dan. xi. 34).

But though now they were left few in number in Judea, yet, in other countries where they were dispersed, they multiplied again, that God's plagues might continue to be multiplied upon them, and this prophecy more perfectly fulfilled: for some ages after this (anno 1009), they had so incensed Christian people against them, by bringing the Persians upon them, who destroyed the churches dedicated to our Saviour at Jerusalem, that it was resolved, by the common consent of all Christians, that no Jews should live in their territories, but be driven out of them throughout all the world. By which means the greatest part of them died of several kinds of death, or made away themselves, so that vix pauci residui fierent in orbe Romano, "there remained but a very few of them in the Roman world." They are the words of Glauber, who relates this, lib. iii. cap. 7.

Ver. 63. As the Lord rejoiced over you to do you good,—so the Lord will rejoice over you to destroy you.] The state of the Jews, from the time of Adrian till the expiration of the Roman empire, cannot be gathered from the Roman writers; but the fathers of the church often mention their miseries. And so do their own authors; particularly the author of Schebet Judah, who saith, "It is not in the power of man to tell all the kingdoms and cities where they were scattered, in which they suffered things so horrid, that it is fitter to pass them over in silence, than to relate them: but therein was verified the Divine prediction, Lev. xxvi. 38, 'Ye shall perish among the heathen, and the land of your enemies shall eat you up'" (sect. 49). And Dr. Jackson, to explain this, hath more particularly observed, that as God raised up Cyrus in testimony of his "rejoicing to do them good," who released them from their captivity in Babylon; so, to give the world a proof of his "rejoicing to destroy them, and bring them to nought," he advanced Philip Augustus to the crown of France (about anno 1179), to defeat all the hopes which some kindness shown unto them had put into their hearts: for he spoiled their synagogues of all their donatives and ornaments, confiscated all their lands and immovable goods, and granted a release of all debts due unto them from Christians (see book i. upon the Creed, ch. 28, parag. 13).

Ye shall be plucked from off the land] This was wonderfully fulfilled by Adrian; who, after a strange desolation, before mentioned, prohibited, by a public decree ratified with the senate's consent, any Jew to come within sight of Judea. This he did out of a politic respect, lest the sight of their native soil might inspire them with some fresh desperate resolutions to to destroy you, and to bring you to nought; and ye shall be plucked from off the land whither thou goest to possess it.

64 And the LORD shall scatter thee among all people, from the one end of the earth even endeavour their settlement there again; but herein he was unwittingly "the angel of God" (as the same excellent person speaks), to keep this wicked race out of that paradise, the good land, out of which he had driven them.

Ver. 64. Scatter thee among all people.] That was the effect of Adrian's severe decree, of not coming within view of their own country, which made them disperse all the world over, where they could find any admittance.

From the one end of the earth even unto the other;] Such as were carried captive in Adrian's war were transported by his order into Spain, his own native country, which was then accounted the end of the world westward. And many of them, it is evident by their own books, fled to Babylon, and the countries thereabout, which was far as they knew eastward. In Spain they continued many years in great abundance, as it were, expecting a wind for their passage to some place more distant from their ancient seat. And who knows whether many of them have not, since the discovery of America, been transported thither, as I before observed? Certain it is, that the Jews themselves are sensible this prophecy was not fulfilled, till this their last dispersion, after the destruction of Jerusalem by the Romans: for thus R. Isaac, who had occasion to mention these words (in his Minimen Fidei, lately brought to light by Wagenseil, Perek. vi.), glosses upon them: "In the Roman captivity, the Jews were dispersed and dissipated through all the regions of the east, and of the west: for every nation of which the Roman army consisted, when they returned to their own countries, carried some of them along with them, into Greece, Germany, Italy, Spain, France, and all other countries, which either Christians or Mahometans now possess."

There thou shalt serve other gods.] Here that excellent person I have so often mentioned (Dr. Jackson) commends it to the reader's consideration, whether this part of Moses's prophecy may not be understood of the convert Jews throughout the pope's dominions, who are often urged to commit idolatry with stocks and stones, upon more tyrannical terms (if they gain-say) than their forefathers were, either by the Assyrians, Chaldeans, Egyptians, Romans, or any whatsoever, that led them captive out of their land.

If it be said, there is a great difference between the heathen idolatry, and the present image-worship in the Roman church, it is granted the idolatry is of a diverse kind; and so it seems Moses meant, when he threatens the Jews, after their final transportation into these western countries, "should serve such gods as their fathers had not known:" for their forefathers, before Moses's time and after, had known the heathen gods too well; but were perfect strangers to this image-worship now in use. And to strengthen this interpretation, it ought to be observed, that these words ["which neither thou nor thy fathers have known"] are omitted in the thirty-sixth verse of this chapter; where he speaks of their "serving of other gods of wood and stone," as he doth here. But that part of the prophecy belongs to what they did in the first captivity into Babylon, as Manasseh ben Israel observes, who understands these words to be a prophecy of what they had suffered in this last dispersion: for, reciting these words (lib. iii. De Termino Vitæ, sect. 3, p. 131), as containing the greatest calamity that hath be-unto the other; and there thou shalt serve other gods, which neither thou nor thy fathers have known, even wood and stone.

65 And among these nations shalt thou find no ease, neither shall the sole of thy foot have fallen them, he saith, "This we see fulfilled, after a singular manner, in this present captivity; because of all those evils wherewith the Hebrews have been afflicted in France, and England, and Spain:" for they have been often pressed, either to renounce their religion, or to be undone; and many times chose rather to comply with the idolatrous worship in the Roman church, than to be banished, and have their goods confiscated.

Ver. 65. Among these nations shalt thou find no ease.] This was wonderfully fulfilled in the ages which followed that in which Adrian lived: when they both disturbed others, and could find no rest themselves: for in the third century, they raised sedition in the reign of Severus, by whom they suffered very much about the year 202, after our Saviour's birth: and in the next century we are informed by St. Chrysostom, in his second oration against the Jews (tom. vi. edit. Savil. p. 333). "That they rebelled again in the time of Constantine; who, causing their ears to be cropped off, dispersed them, καθάρτη τῶν ὀφθαλμῶν καὶ μαρτυρίας, "as vile fugitives and vagabonds, into various countries, where they carried this mark of infamy along with them, that all might be instructed to make no more such attempts." But in the fifth century they made new commotions, and were driven out of Alexandria for their seditious practices, where they had been settled ever since the time of Alexander the Great, and dispersed into several countries, as Socrates observes in his Ecclesiastical History, lib. vii. cap. 16. And in the next chapter relates how miserably they were deluded in Crete, by one who pretended to be Moses come down from heaven to lead them to their own land through the sea; into which many threw themselves, and perished. That expulsion out of Alexandria is mentioned by David Ganz also, one of their own authors. In the sixth century, as Elmacinus tells us, they again rebelled in Palestine against the Romans, who slew a great number of them. And in the seventh, they were expelled from Antioch by Phocas, and out of Jerusalem by Heraclius, and out of Spain (anno 604), by Sisebutus, or, as some call him, Sisebodus, king of the Goths; and they flying in great numbers into France were shortly after put to this hard choice, either to renounce their religion, or lose all they had; which persecution, Dr. Jackson observes, in the book often mentioned (ch. 28, parag. 1), is recorded by those who wrote the life of Dagobert, as one of the chief memorables of his reign. What their state was in the next three centuries, he saith, he had observed nothing remarkable: nor can I find any thing notable in the eighth, but the appearance of a false Messiah, by whom they were deluded, and brought into trouble. As for the ninth, there were no learned men among them in that age, nor in the Christian world. And in the tenth they were in the same condition; insomuch, that they were fain to make a weaver the head of one of their universities.

Neither shall the sole of thy foot have rest:] They being not able to obtain a long settlement anywhere; but were tossed up and down, and forced from one country to another: for so it was, that, in the beginning of the eleventh century, about the year of our Lord one thousand, they were so vexed throughout the most part of Europe that quid agerent, aut quo se verterent nesciebant, "they knew not what they rest: but the LORD shall give thee there a trembling heart, and failing of eyes, and sorrow of mind:

66 And thy life shall hang in doubt before thee; and thou shalt fear day and night, and shalt have none assurance of thy life:

should do, or which way they should turn themselves" as the forenamed doctor observes (par. 4), out of Papius Massonus, who hath it out of Glauber. To which I will add this testimony out of David Ganz, in his book called Tzemach David, that in the latter end of this century (anno 1096), when there was a famous expedition for the recovery of the Holy Land, "the Jews felt it a most calamitous time" (as he speaks), being robbed, and pillaged, and killed, by the soldiers as they went along. And, indeed, so much cruelty was exercised upon them, that it moved St. Bernard's compassion to write to the bishop, clergy, and people of Spire, not to persecute them, much less kill them or drive them out of their country: "For they are dispersed (saith he) into all lands, that while they suffer the just punishment of their horrid wickedness they may be witnesses of our redemption," Epist. 323. And the author of Schebet Judah, mentioning their banishment out of Savoy, Peidmont, Lombardy, Sicily, and other countries, quotes these very words of Moses ["among those nations thou shalt find no rest," &c.] as a prophecy of that exile: which was accompanied with many other mischiefs: for, as they fled to other countries, an immense multitude of people fell upon them, and pillaged them of all the gold and silver they were carrying away with them, as he relates there, sect. 11.

Give thee there a trembling heart,] They being always in dread of some new misery, their condition still growing more dismal in the twelfth century: for as there is a progress in Moses's prophecy of the increase of their calamities; so it proved in the event, that their sufferings grew greater and greater. They themselves (in Tzemach David, and other books) relate, that, in the year 1142, a hundred and twenty of their congregations were utterly subverted and dispersed. And in the year 1170, they were expelled again out of France, and spoiled of their treasure; which was renewed in the year 1198. How they were used here in England, our own chronicles tell us; and the like ill-usage they met withal in Germany and Spain: so that R. Zacut complains of no less than ten grievous persecutions in this one age, to abolish the name of Jews out of the world. This could not but give them a very trembling heart.

Failing of eyes,] Which looked for some relief; instead whereof they were still more hardly used in the thirteenth century, being, in the year 1253 again expelled out of France, whither they had returned; and again in 1295, when they expected some rest, there was a fresh expulsion, mentioned by R. Levi ben Gerson, who saith they were spoiled of all their goods, and sent away only with their clothes upon their backs. Which he affirms with the more confidence, because it was done in his time, when, he saith, there was such a number of them, that they exceeded those that came out of Egypt. So he writes in his exposition of those words, Numb. xxiii. 10: "Who can count the dust of Jacob?" I will forbear to mention how they were treated here in England (1290), and in Germany; into which they flying out of France were most cruelly used.

Sorrow of mind,] Which must needs seize upon them heavily to find their miseries so far from abating that they still increased in the fourteenth century: when they were banished again out of France, and spoiled of their goods, 1306, and once more 1395, which the Jews call their fourth and last banishment. About the same time they were banished out of Germany, anno 1392. In Castile, indeed, they redeemed their lives with money (which they could not part withal without much sorrow of mind), but in Catalonia, Arragon, and in other parts of Spain, such a terrible storm fell upon them, that they themselves, in Juchasin, say, there were no less than two hundred thousand turned Christians, with heavy hearts. It would be too tedious to mention all that they suffered in the fifteenth century in Germany, Hungary, Polonia, and in Italy, Spain, and Portugal. I will only observe what befell them in the country last named, in the next century, anno 1506, when all that is said in this verse is fulfilled, by that dreadful massacre which was made of them at Lishon for three days together; where men were not suffered to die of their deadly wounds, but were dragged by their mangled limbs into the market-place, where the bodies of the living and the slain, with others half alive, half dead, were burnt together in heaps. The spectacle was so horrible, that it quite astonished the rest of this wretched people; two thousand of which perished in this barbarous manner. Parents durst not mourn for their children, nor children sigh for their parents, when they saw them haled to the place of torment; so that their hearts, no doubt, were ready to break with grief and sorrow. In short, Sic eos metus examinaverat, ut vivi non multum a mortuorum similitudine distarent: "fear had so dispirited them, that the living in their aspect did not much differ from the dead;" which words of Osorius (in his fourth book De Rebus Emanuelis) our Dr. Jackson, who relates this sad story out of him, looks upon as a paraphrase upon these words of Moses (though Osorius did not think of them), "I will give thee a trembling heart, and failing of the eyes, and sorrow of mind."

There are those who, by a trembling heart, understand the terrors of an evil conscience: so D. Chytraeus, p. 131. And by failing of the eyes may be understood, the constant disappointment of their hopes, wherewith they were sometimes led by false Messiahs in several ages; which disappointment bred great sorrow of mind, when after earnest expectation of some good, the quite contrary came upon them.

Ver. 66. Thy life shall hang in doubt before thee,] That is, it should be doubtful whether they should live or die the next moment. As it manifestly happened in the forenamed massacre, when they durst not fetch a sigh, and yet could hardly avoid it, at the sight of their parents' or children's tortures, for fear they should suffer the same before the breath was out of their tortured bodies.

Thou shalt fear day and night,] So it was then: none of them knowing who would be next seized, in those three days' butchery. And so it was in some of their banishments, which, they were told, should be the best remedy for the evils impending over them, as the author of Schebet Judah speaks, who tells us (sect. 23), that the reason which some princes gave for their expulsion out of their territories was, to prevent their being torn in pieces by the people, who were most furiously set against them.

Ver. 67. In the morning thou shalt say, Would God it were even!] That they might not see those miserable spectacles, which they hoped would end in the night, when men went to rest.

At even thou shalt say, Would God it were morning!] Being afraid of unseen dangers, to which the night might give an opportunity; or, that they might not see their way, when they fled by sea and land,

67 In the morning thou shalt say, Would God it were even! and at even thou shalt say, Would God it were morning! for the fear of thine heart wherewith thou shalt fear, and for the sight of thine eyes which thou shalt see.

68 And the Lord shall bring thee into Egypt from one country to another, as they were forced to do very often: for Abarinel, in his Commentary upon Isaiah xl. 11, reckons up four universal banishments, out of the countries where they lived. The first out of England; the next out of France; the third out of Asia, Germany, Tuscany, Lombardy, and Savoy; and the last out of Spain; when he himself was one of those who were constrained to leave that country, and knew not whither to go. He hath given us a lively description of that calamity (like to which, he saith, none had ever befallen them, since they were banished their own country) in his preface to his Commentary upon the Book of the Kings, which he wrote the very next year after their expulsion (1493), and the author of Schebet Judah hath transcribed in his own words: "A decree was made and proclaimed publicly, that all the Jews should change their religion, or quit the country in three months' time. Abarinel had then a place in the court, where he petitioned the king, and besought his ministers and counsellors to revoke the edict, and be content with their estates, which they offered to him; but all in vain: for three hundred thousand, old and young, men and women, and he among the rest, went away on foot upon one day, not knowing whither to go. Some went into Portugal, others into Navarre; where they conflicted with many calamities: for some became a prey, or perished by famine and pestilence. And therefore others committed themselves to the sea, hoping to find a quiet seat in some other countries. But on the sea they met with new disasters; for many were sold as slaves when they came on any coast, many were drowned, many burnt in the ships which were set on fire: in short, all suffered the just punishment of God the avenger (as he speaks): for after all this, a plague came and swept away the rest of the miserable wretches, who were hated by all mankind; so that all that vast number perished by one calamity or other, except a very few." He that would see more of the woful miseries of this people, may look into Schebet Judah, sect. 53, where he shows what befell those who went to seek new habitations in the kingdom of Fess, where they lived a long time upon grass, and ate its very roots, and then died, and their bodies lay exposed, none being so charitable as to bury them.

For the fear of thine heart wherewith thou shalt fear,] The one of these seems to refer to their dreadful apprehensions in the night; and the other to the lamentable spectacles they beheld in the day. And the simple meaning of the former part of the verse may be, that they should be weary of life, having no comfort either day or night.

Ver. 68. The Lord shall bring thee into Egypt again.] The Jerusalem Targum translates it, "The Word of the Lord shall bring thee back again." He, that is, who conducted them out of Egypt in a glorious cloud, would punish them for their foul offences against him, by bringing them again into bondage there. This was first fulfilled after the desolation made by Titus; when there were, as I observed before (ver. 62), above ninety thousand carried captive, and many of them transported into Egypt, as Josephus relates, in the conclusion of the sixteenth chapter of the seventh book, concerning the Wars of the Jews. And here Manasseh ben Israel hath a very pertinent observation, that Vespasian transported them into many and various regions: but Egypt is only here named, the more to reproach the Jews: as if he had said, "Ye shall be carried into that land as captives, out of which ye came in a triumphant manner," lib. iii. De Termino Vitæ, sect. iii., which may incline one to think, that he was of the same mind with our Dr. Jackson, who, observing how cruelly they were used here in England, and many other countries, concludes, that this island, and every place of Europe, wherein their condition of life hath been more hard and burdensome than their forefathers' was in Egypt, may be said to be that Egypt, into which God threatens here to bring them in ships.

And, indeed, we do not read of their being carried into Egypt after Vespasian's time; though it is set down here as a punishment to come upon them after a long train of other miseries; and must relate to their rigorous usage, which I have observed in many countries, in several ages, down to these latter times. The Jerusalem Talmud, it must be observed, mentions another bringing into Egypt (literally understood), in the Massechta beforenamed upon ver. 59, where they say, that, as God forbade them three times to return into Egypt (which they there set down), so they were forced thither three times for their transgressions against God; first, in the days of Sennacherib, king of Assyria (Isa. xxxi. 1, 3); secondly, in the time of Johanan, the son of Kareah (Jer. xlii. 16); and lastly, in the time of the emperor Trajan: but this I look upon as a mistake; for Trajan rather killed all those whom he found there, than carried them thither, as I noted before.

With ships,] Which seems to put them in mind how different their condition was now become from what it was when they came out of Egypt without any ships; for the sea gave them a passage through it, by being made dry land. Their being carried also thither by ships, made their condition the more deplorable, because there were no means of escaping out of them, as there might have been if they had gone by land.

By the way whereof I spake unto thee,] Or, "to the way" (so the particle beth often signifies, Gen. xi. 4, xvi. 22), that is, to the place, whereof I said, "Ye shall see it no more again;" for it seems to be a manifest allusion to what we read in the seventeenth chapter of this book, ver. 16.

There ye shall be sold unto your enemies] Exposed to sale like beasts in the open market; and that at so vile a price, that thirty of them (as both profane and ecclesiastical historians relate) were sold for one small piece of money. Josephus, giving a particular account how the captives were disposed of by Titus, saith, that the most goodly young men he reserved to attend his triumph; of the rest, he ordered those above seventy years old to be sent bound into Egypt, to labour in the works there; many be distributed in the provinces to perish in the theatre by the sword and wild beasts: and all under seventeen years old he commanded to be sold. But while they were making this distribution, twelve thousand of them died of famine; partly by the hatred of their guards, who gave them no food; and partly by the weakness of others, whose stomachs could not receive it (lib. vii. cap. 16). By which a judgment may be made how little worth these vile wretches were, as it here follows. In after-times, I have observed, in the course of this Commentary, how they were sold for slaves in some places, and in all used as no better. Benjamin Tudelensis, who went a pilgrimage to visit his countrymen, represents their condition as most miserable throughout again with ships, by the way whereof I spake unto thee, Thou shalt see it no more again: and there ye shall be sold unto your enemies the eastern empire. And particularly complains of their hard usage among the Greeks at Constantinople: within the walls of which city they were not suffered to live, nor to come thither, but on occasion of traffic and business; and that only by boat (for they had their habitation in a kind of an island), not a man being permitted on horseback, except only one, Solyman, the emperor's physician. Whose advancement was their sole comfort in that miserable servitude, under which the rest groaned, without any difference of good or bad (as he acknowledges), who were daily beaten and abused in the open streets. Thus he confesses, though his principal design was to set forth the power they retained in the world (Itinerarium, p. 27, 28, edit. L'Empereur).

No man shall buy you.] Though some, as I said before, were sold at a very vile rate, next to nothing; yet others hung upon the seller's hands (as we speak), the market being either so overstocked with their numbers, that none would cheapen the greatest part of them, or they were so contemptible that nobody would give what was asked for such useless slaves: for, as no money could purchase their peace and security from calamities, so neither could the calamities, though continually most grievous (they are the words of Dr. Jackson), redeem their estimation in the world; nor all the blood of their slain (though their massacres were numberless) extinguish that hateful and loathsome conceit which most men had entertained of them. For in the fifteenth century they were become so abominable, that several doctors began to hold it unlawful for Christians to let them live among them. Particularly the famous Thomas Terrecremata, inqui-for bondmen and bondwomen, and no man shall buy you.

sitor-general, forbade all men to have any dealings with them, or to afford them meat or drink, or any thing else. Whence proceed the direful proscriptions which we read of in that age, whereby they were forced out of Spain, Poland, Hungary, and divers other countries; where they were not suffered to live, though with a note and character upon them to distinguish them from all other men.

I conclude my observations on this chapter, with the remark which the same great man (Dr. Jackson) makes, ch. 22, paragr. 6. That the extraordinary blessings and plagues which were to overtake this people, being here set down by Moses; although their blessings might have been more and more admirable than the curses that have befallen them, yet he, either foreseeing or fearing what would be, rather than hoping the best that might be, is almost four times as long in enumerating their plagues as he is in their blessings. And so have the miseries of the latter Jews been four times as long as the prosperity of their worthy ancestors. And since our Saviour's death, all the plagues, which were in part fulfilled before, have been more than seven times multiplied upon them. For in their former overthrows or captivities, though they suffered the violence of war, yet, after that storm was past, so they did but submit to their conquerors, they lived well enough, nay, usually found more than ordinary favour at their hands; but since our Saviour's death, they have through all ages been more and more miserable; "the memory of the foregoing plagues having been but an invitation to the like, or worse; and their continual bad usage prescribing the lawfulness of their abuse."

CHAPTER XXIX.

1 Moses exhorteth them to obedience, by the memory of the works they have seen. 10 All are presented before the Lord to enter into his covenant. 18 The great wrath on him that flattereth himself in his wickedness. 29 Secret things belong unto God.

1 THESE are the words of the covenant, which the LORD commanded Moses to make with the children of Israel in the land of Moab, beside the covenant which he made with them in Horeb.

CHAP. XXIX.

Ver. 1. These are the words of the covenant,] The Talmudists in the Gemara of Sota, cap. 7, sect. 24, refer these words to the benedictions and cursings mentioned in the foregoing chapter; which plainly belong to what God delivered unto Moses in Mount Sinai at the first: which he had now repeated in this book, with the addition of several blessings and curses to make what he said the more effectual.

Commanded Moses to make] That is, to renew. For which end Moses repeated the principal laws of God, and explained them in this book; which is from thence called Deuteronomy; being a compendium of the Pentateuch, a breviary of the covenant, composed for the familiar and daily use of the children of Israel.

In the land of Moab,] Where he declared to them the law which he had formerly delivered to their fathers (Deut. i. 5).

Beside the covenant which he made with them in

2 ¶ And Moses called unto all Israel, and said unto them, Ye have seen all that the LORD did before your eyes in the land of Egypt unto Pharaoh, and unto all his servants, and unto all his land;

Horeb.] This doth not signify that he made a covenant with them, different from the former made at Horeb (Exod. xxiv.) but only now renewed the same covenant, after they had shamefully violated it more than once. Which was the more necessary, because they were ready to enter into the land of Canaan, and he was just upon his departure from them into another world; and therefore did all he could to engage them in a more firm obedience to God. And for that end, both more fully explained several laws, and added others, and at large laid before them the happiness or the misery that would ensue upon their fidelity or falseness in this covenant.

Ver. 2. Moses called unto all Israel,] This seems to import a new summons which he sent out to them, to attend him, now he was about to conclude what he had to say to them, before he left them. Which he did not, as I have often observed (see ver. 1), all at once, in one continued speech, but at several times; and now was about to wind up all in this and in the next chapter.

3 The great temptations which thine eyes have seen, the signs, and those great miracles :

4 Yet the LORD hath not given you an heart to perceive, and eyes to see, and ears to hear, unto this day.

5 And I have led you forty years in the wilderness: your clothes are not waxen old upon you, and thy shoe is not waxen old upon thy foot.

6 Ye have not eaten bread, neither have ye drunk wine or strong drink: that ye might know that I am the LORD your God.

7 And when ye came unto this place, Sihon the king of Heshbon, and Og the king of Bashan, came out against us unto battle, and we smote them :

8 And we took their land, and gave it for an inheritance unto the Reubenites, and to the Gadites, and to the half tribe of Manasseh.

9 Keep therefore the words of this covenant, and do them, that ye may prosper in all that ye do.

10 ¶ Ye stand this day all of you before the LORD your God; your captains of your tribes, your elders, and your officers, with all the men of Israel,

Said unto them.] He argued with them from the knowledge and experience which they had of the power of God in his wonderful works, particularly three, which were very memorable. Those in Egypt, which he mentions here in the next two verses; and those in the wilderness, ver. 5, 6, and lately in the great victory he had given them over two potent kings, ver. 7, 8.

Ye have seen all that the Lord did before your eyes in the land of Egypt.] Some of them had seen (when they were young), and others had understood from them (which is here called seeing), all the plagues which God brought upon Pharaoh, and upon his court, and upon his whole country. This he had often called to their mind, in his preface to the repetitions of his laws (vi. 12, vii. 18, 19, xi. 3, 4), and makes it a great aggravation of their guilt, if they should forsake Him, who had done such wonderful things for them (xiii. 5, 10). And now he concludes with the same argument, as most powerful to move them, if they had any sense of their obligations to the greatest Benefactor.

Ver. 3.] Of these he had put them in mind before (see iv. 34, vii. 19).

Ver. 4.] They had not so considered and laid to heart God's wonderful works, as to have a lasting sense of them bestowed upon them by God. He gives us an understanding heart, but we must first consider what he hath done for us, as the apostle instructs us, 2 Tim. ii. 7. And he gives us what we do not receive; and so in effect it is not given. Thus he saith himself, that he purged Israel, but they would not be purged (Ezek. xxiv. 13).

What the difference is between a heart to perceive, and eyes to see, and ears to hear, need not be curiously inquired. They are, perhaps, but three various expressions of their gross stupidity, or three degrees of it, which was so great, that they had no continued sense of the wonderful works God had done for them; nor did so much as regard and observe them; no, nor hearken to those who put them in mind of them; which must not be imputed to any want of power in these things to move them, much less of the Divine grace to work upon their hearts by them, but was wholly to be ascribed to their own negligence and perverseness; of which God here complains, and with which he severely upbraids them, that he had not given them this grace; which is a clear demonstration the fault was in themselves. And therefore Maimonides rightly and judiciously explains these words, when he saith, the meaning is, They had not disposed themselves to receive this grace from God.

Ver. 5. I have led you forty years] By a glorious cloud, which both conducted and protected them (viii. 2, xi. 5). Concerning these forty years, see ch. ii. 7.

Your clothes are not waxen old, &c.] See viii. 4. The Jews used no shoes in Egypt, as Bochartus probably conjectures; but being to take a long journey, through a rough way in the wilderness, he commanded them to eat the passover with shoes on their feet (Exod. xii. 11), and these very shoes which they put on at that festival, when they were ready to march, God suffered not to decay in all their travels for forty years following (see Hierozoicon, par. i. lib. ii. cap. 50).

Ver. 6. Ye have not eaten bread, neither have ye drunk wine or strong drink.] Not commonly, though, when they passed by some neighbouring country, they might possibly sometimes purchase both bread and wine, or strong liquors; but their ordinary food was the heavenly manna, and their drink was the water that followed them out of the rock. So that the meaning is, they were constantly supported by a miraculous supply from God; who took care of them, and thereby laid a greater obligation upon them to serve him, who graciously fed them without any labour of their own. For they neither ploughed, nor sowed, nor reaped, nor took any other pains for this provision; as they must have done for bread and wine, or other liquors pressed out of dates or figs, &c.

That ye might know that I am the Lord your God.] This he did for them, that he might breed and maintain them in a sense of his omnipotent power, and of his all-sufficient goodness and faithfulness to his promises; which he intended to demonstrate at his first giving of manna to them (Exod. xvi. 12).

Ver. 7. When ye came unto this place,] For they were now in a part of the country which they conquered (iv. 45, 46, &c.).

Sihon the king of Heshbon, &c.] See Numb. xxi. 24, 34, 35; Deut. ii. 30, &c., iii. 2, 3, &c.

Ver. 8.] See Numb. xxxii. 33, and Deut. iv. 12, &c.

Ver. 9. Keep therefore the words of this covenant, and do them.] Preserve them in memory, so as to make good your engagements which you passed to God in Horeb; which Moses was now about to renew, and lay a fresh obligation on them. For most of them being a new generation, and now going to enter upon the possession of the land of promise, it was necessary to make them sensible of the condition of their tenure, by engaging them in a solemn covenant to observe the laws of God faithfully; which was but a renewal of what was made before at Horeb.

That ye may prosper] See iv. 6. The Hebrew word which we translate prosper, the LXX. translate act prudently; for they translate it ὡς σωφρονε. And the Vulgar, to the same purpose, ut intelligatis, that ye may understand to manage yourselves wisely in all your concerns, by observing the rules God hath given you; which was the way to prosper.

Ver. 10. Ye stand this day all of you before the Lord] The summons which he sent out (ver. 2), it seems by this, was to appear at the tabernacle, where they now stood; and from whence he delivered these words to them, by the priests and Levites (xxvii. 9, 14).

11 Your little ones, your wives, and thy stranger that is in thy camp, from the hewer of thy wood unto the drawer of thy water :

12 That thou shouldest enter into covenant with the LORD thy God, and into his oath, which the LORD thy God maketh with thee this day :

13 That he may establish thee to day for a people unto himself, and that he may be unto thee a God, as he hath said unto thee, and as he hath sworn unto thy fathers, to Abraham, to Isaac, and to Jacob.

Your captains of your tribes.] In the Hebrew, your heads of your tribes, who were the greatest persons in the nation, called sometimes princes.

Your elders.] These were not only the seventy elders, mentioned Numb. xi. 16, but all the other judges in their several courts, who are often called by the name of elders in this book, particularly xix. 12, 18, xxi. 2, 4, 6, xxv. 8.

Your officers.] Who attended upon the judge, to execute their sentence (see xvi. 18).

With all the men] All the men of their several tribes.

Ver. 11. Your little ones, your wives,] Who were all now present, or else were represented by the men of Israel.

Thy stranger] Whether Egyptians, that followed them when they came out of Egypt (Exod. xii. 38), or other people who embraced their religion, so far, at least, to renounce all idolatry.

From the hewer of thy wood unto the drawer of thy water.] The meanest servant, whom they had bought, perhaps with their money, either in Egypt, or since they came from thence.

Ver. 12. That thou shouldest enter into covenant] In the Hebrew the words are, "pass into covenant." For so covenants were anciently made in the eastern countries, by dividing the sacrifices, and passing between the parts of it; as appears from the manner of God's making a covenant with Abraham in Gen. xv. 10, 17, whence some derive the Hebrew word berith (which signifies a covenant) from bara, which signifies cutting off; because something was always sacrificed at the making covenants, and anciently cut in pieces. For the same reason the Romans called a covenant foedus, which they derive a feriendo, from striking, that is, killing some beast (particularly a swine), which was done with many ceremonies.

Into his oath.] The Hebrew word which we translate oath, rather imports a curse, which was annexed to an oath. And so the LXX. iv tauis apais; for they entered into this covenant with such imprecations upon themselves, as are mentioned xxvii. 15, 16, &c., wishing, perhaps, that they might be cut to pieces, as the sacrifice was (between whose parts they passed), if they did not faithfully perform their engagement.

Which the Lord thy God maketh with thee] For the covenant was mutual, as appears by the burning lamp, representing the Divine Majesty passing through the pieces of the sacrifice, when God entered into a covenant with Abraham (Gen. xv. 17).

Ver. 13. That he may establish thee to day for a people unto himself.] Confirm them in all the privileges which they had often forfeited by breaking his covenant; of being his peculiarly above all people (Exod. xix. 5; Deut. xix. 2).

That he may be unto thee a God.] Bless them and do them good as he had solemnly promised.

14 Neither with you only do I make this covenant and this oath;

15 But with him that standeth here with us this day before the LORD our God, and also with him that is not here with us this day :

16 (For ye know how we have dwelt in the land of Egypt; and how we came through the nations which ye passed by ;

17 And ye have seen their abominations, and their idols, wood and stone, silver and gold, which were among them :)

Hath sworn unto thy fathers.] Gen. xii. 2, 3, xvii. 7, 8, xxii. 16, 17, xxvi. 3, 4, xxviii. 13, 14.

Ver. 14.] He means those mentioned ver. 10, 11.

Ver. 15.] I think the particle ki (which begins this verse) should not be translated but; for this is the same with what was said before, not distinct from it: and therefore should be translated thus, "As with him that standeth here with us before, that is not here with us this day;" i. e. with all that were absent from the present assembly, and with all future posterity, who were as yet unborn. So the Jerusalem Targum understands the latter part of this verse, "With all generations which shall be after us, as if they stood here with us to-day:" and so Uzielides, as they call him, "With all generations to come, unto the end of the world, as if they stood here with us at this present." For perpetual leagues are sometimes made between whole nations; for whom some contract in the name and place of all the rest, and bind not only themselves but their successors. And thus kings give feifs to their subjects, upon conditions which their families are bound to perform in after ages, or else lose the benefit of them.

Ver. 18. For ye know we have dwelt in the land of Egypt] These words, and those that follow in this and the next verse, come in as an argument to move them to enter into this covenant, and to show them the necessity of renewing it. For, as God had wonderfully multiplied them in the land of Egypt, so he delivered them from thence no less wonderfully, when they were miserably enslaved; which was such a mercy, as ought never to be forgotten (and therefore frequently mentioned in this book) and laid an obligation upon them to be wholly devoted to him, as his redeemed people (iv. 20).

How we came through the nations] The Edomites, Midianites, Ammonites, and Moabites, through the skirts of whose countries they passed, and were preserved from receiving any hurt by them.

Ver. 17. Ye have seen their abominations, and their idols.] They had opportunity in Egypt of seeing too much of their vile idolatries. And so they had as they passed by the country of Moab and Midian, when some of them were seduced to the worship of Baal-Peor; though, if they had not been blinded by their lust, they could not but have seen how contemptible an idol that was, and have abominated it. All the idols of the heathen are frequently called abominations; and in Lev. xxvi. 30, they are called, as they are here, gillulim, which we translate in the margin dunghill-gods, to express the utmost contempt of them. And some think they are so called, not only in regard of their matter, sed ob formam scarabæi habitantis in stercore, "but for the form of the beetle, which lives in dung;" for so Isis, the great goddess of the Egyptians, was represented, as Plutarch tells us, in his book De Iside et Osiride. But whether in such ancient times, as this of Moses, it may be justly doubted.

Wood and stone, silver and gold.] Generally they 18 Lest there should be among you man, or woman, or family, or tribe, whose heart turneth away this day from the LORD our God, to go and serve the gods of these nations; lest there should be among you a root that beareth gall and wormwood;

19 And it come to pass, when he heareth the words of this curse, that he bless himself in his heart, saying, I shall have peace, though I walk in the imagination of mine heart, to add drunkenness to thirst:

20 The LORD will not spare him, but then the anger of the LORD and his jealousy shall smoke against that man, and all the curses that are written in this book shall lie upon him, and the LORD shall blot out his name from under heaven.

were made of wood or stone, which sometimes were silvered or gilded over. And if any of them were made of massy silver or gold, yet, being lifeless things, they were no more able to afford them any help, than the dung on the earth. And it was an abominable thing to look upon dead matter as a god, or to think he made his habitation there (which was the opinion of the better sort of heathen), or would be represented by them, they having no likeness at all unto him.

Ver. 18. Lest there should be among you man, or woman, or family, or tribe.] These words are to be connected with ver. 15, as the principal end why he engaged every soul of them to renew their covenant with God, that none of them might revolt from him, to serve any other god. And the order wherein he places these words shows, that idolatry is of a very infectious nature, spreading itself strangely, from single men and women unto families, and at last into whole tribes.

Whose heart turneth away] Who had a hankering, as we now speak, after other gods; which might afterward break out into idolatry.

To go and serve the gods of these nations] When the heart, i. e. the mind, will, and affections, are depraved, men easily find occasions to follow, whither they lead them. And by this it appears, that the principal part of the covenant was to keep them close to the worship of one God, and no other; as I have often observed, vi. 4, vii. 2, 25, ix. 1, &c.

Lest there should be among you a root that beareth gall and wormwood] Many take a root here to signify an evil principle, which the apostle calls "an evil heart of unbelief," Heb. iii. 12. But the words going before in this verse, and those that follow in the next, plainly lead us to take it for any person lurking secretly among them (like a root under ground), that was tainted with idolatry, who might poison others therewith, and in time bring forth the fruits of their impiety, which he calls "gall and wormwood." Where it must be observed, that the Hebrew word rash, which we translate gall, properly signifies an herb growing among corn, as bitter as gall. Which in Hosea x. 5, we translate hemlock; and commonly in Scripture is joined with wormwood, as it is here, Jer. ix. 15; Lam. iii. 19; Amos vi. 12. Unto which idolatry is compared, because it is most ungrateful and distasteful (if I may so speak) unto God, and produces bitter effects, that is, most grievous punishments, unto men.

Ver. 19. It come to pass, when he] The man spoken of before, under the name of a "root of bitterness."

Heareth the words of this curse] Against idolatry, which Moses engaged every one of them to renounce, by making a solemn covenant with God to worship him alone, and dreadful imprecations upon themselves, if they did not make good this covenant (ver. 12, 14—16, xxvii. 15).

That he bless himself in his heart] Secretly fancy none of these curses shall fall upon him, but, quite contrary, promise himself all manner of happiness.

I shall have peace] Prosper and be happy.

Though I walk in the imagination of mine heart] Or, "in the stubbornness of mine heart," as it is in the margin; that is, resolve to worship what god I best fancy.

To add drunkenness to thirst] In the Hebrew words are (as the margin of our Bibles observes) "the drunken to the thirsty;" for both words are adjectives, as grammarians speak; and supposing a substantive to support them, many think none so proper to be understood as the word earth. Which makes this a proverbial speech, "To add the wet ground to the dry and thirsty," or rather "the thirsty to the wet." For the particle beth, which in the Hebrew is the note of the accusative case, is put before the word dry, or thirsty; and, therefore, that is the thing which is to be added to the wet or drunken: not the drunken to the dry. And the sense is, "draw others into the same wickedness;" just as if a drunken man should draw sober persons to play the fool with him, and do as bad as himself; or, after one piece of land is overflowed, the water should be let into that which is dry, and spoil that also. For this seems to be the meaning of the whole verse, if a man shall be so presumptuous, as not only to cry peace to himself, when he runs after his own devices, in serving other gods, but endeavours to draw others into the same wicked practices.

There are a great many other interpretations of these words (seven or eight) given by the Hebrew doctors, beside others in Christian writers; which may be seen in Coceius, in his Ultima Mosis, sect. 134. But this seems to be the most easy, at which the Chaldee aims, and the LXX, if the particle uj be omitted, which is not in the Hebrew, nor the Chaldee, nor the Vulgar Latin. And if we take the words as we translate them (only inverting them), "add thirst unto drunkenness," the sense is as easy; viz. add more sins to the foregoing (Isa. xxx. 1), and be still inflamed (as the Scripture speaks) with love to more idols, after the service of many of them; "increasing their altars (as Hosea speaks) like heaps in the furrows of the field (Hos. x. 1, xii. 11)."

Dr. Jackson, in his first book upon the Creed (ch. 30, parag. 4), thinks the meaning is, that posterity added to the wickedness of their ancestors. For they being cast out of their good land for their infidelity and disobedience, their posterity (saith he) continue exiles and vagabonds for their stubbornness in like practices; not being willing, to this day, to offer up the sacrifice of a contrite heart for their disobedience past, but rather (adding thirst to drunkenness) "bless themselves when they hear the words of that curse, promising peace to themselves, though they walk on according to the stubbornness of their forefathers' heart."

Ver. 20. The Lord will not spare him] That is, not pardon, or pass by his wickedness without punishment.

The anger of the Lord and his jealousy shall smoke against that man] These words import the highest degree of anger, that is, the severest plagues, which are the effects of the anger of an incensed majesty.

All the curses that are written] Particularly in the foregoing chapter.

Shall lie upon him] Not only fall, but remain upon him, to his utter ruin, as it follows in the next words 21 And the LORD shall separate him unto evil out of all the tribes of Israel, according to all the curses of the covenant that are written in this book of the law :

22 So that the generation to come of your children that shall rise up after you, and the stranger that shall come from a far land, shall say, when they see the plagues of that land, and the sicknesses which the LORD hath laid upon it ;

23 And that the whole land thereof is brimstone, and salt, and burning, that it is not sown, nor beareth, nor any grass groweth therein, like the overthrow of Sodom, and Gomorrah, Admah, and Zeboim, which the LORD overthrew in his anger, and in his wrath :

Shall blot out his name] By his name is meant himself; so that this is a threatening of destruction to him and his posterity, till there be no memory of him left.

Ver. 21. The Lord shall separate him unto evil] Though he offended never so secretly (for he speaks of one that "blessed himself in his heart," &c., ver. 19), God threatens to make him a public and notorious example of his vengeance to all the people of Israel.

According to all the curses of the covenant] It was a singular condescension in the Divine Majesty to enter into covenant with them; but it contained not only blessings to the obedient, but curses upon the disobedient; the latter of which were as certain as the former.

Ver. 22. Shall say.] That which follows, ver. 24.

When they see the plagues of that land.] This shows that these threatenings are denounced not merely against a simple idolater, but such a one as made it his endeavour to draw others from the worship of God; not being content to be drunk himself with heathenish superstition, but zealous to intoxicate as many as he could with it, and to root true religion out of the nation.

And the sicknesses which the Lord hath laid upon it.] In the Hebrew it is, "The sicknesses wherewith he hath made it sick," i. e. the heavy punishments which he hath inflicted upon it, and thereby made it a miserable nation.

Ver. 23. That the whole land thereof is brimstone, and salt, and burning.] Or, as it may be translated, "Is burnt up with brimstone and salt." For these make land barren and unfruitful; as Pliny particularly observes of salt (lib. xxx. cap. 7), Omnis locus in quo reperitur sal, sterilis est, nihilque gignit: "All ground in which salt is found is barren, and produceth nothing" (see Judg. ix. 45; Ps. cvii. 34; Jer. xvii. 6; Ezek. xlvii. 11; Zeph. ii. 9).

That it is not sown, nor beareth.] That neither nature nor art will make it fruitful.

Like the overthrow of Sodom, and Gomorrah, &c.] And the country about them, which was the most beautiful of all other in that part of the world (Gen. xiii. 10), but on a sudden turned into a filthy stinking lake, where no creature, neither fish nor fowl, can live.

Which the Lord overthrew in his anger.] Being highly incensed by their wickedness (see Gen. xviii. 20, xix. 24, 25), as he was by the wickedness of the Jews; which was the more provoking, because they had such an example of his vengeance continually before their eyes, and yet went on in their evil ways, till they brought the like judgment upon all Judea.

24 Even all nations shall say, Wherefore hath the LORD done thus unto this land? what meaneth the heat of this great anger?

25 Then men shall say, Because they have forsaken the covenant of the LORD God of their fathers, which he made with them when he brought them forth out of the land of Egypt:

26 For they went and served other gods, and worshipped them, gods whom they knew not, and whom he had not given unto them:

27 And the anger of the LORD was kindled against this land, to bring upon it all the curses that are written in this book:

28 And the LORD rooted them out of their land in anger, and in wrath, and in great indignation.

This was more exactly fulfilled in the last destruction of the Jews by the Romans than in their first by the Babylonians: for the whole land was laid waste, and deserted by its inhabitants, and made a den of thieves; being brought to desolation by repeated returns of wars; more especially in the time of Adrian, when Julius Severus, as I observed upon the foregoing chapter, made such a devastation, that the whole country was turned, in a manner, into a wilderness.

Ver. 24. Even all nations shall say.] All that were near them, or came that way from far countries; as it goes before, ver. 22.

Wherefore hath the Lord done thus unto this land?] Which he formerly made so populous and plenteous.

What meaneth the heat of this great anger?] These exceeding dreadful calamities, which evidently proceeded from a Divine vengeance. For the Jews fought so valiantly, and defended Jerusalem so resolutely (as appears by Josephus), that the author of Schebet Judah had reason to say, That it was not want of arms, the unusual terror of new machines, but the anger of God, provoked by their wickedness, which was the true and only cause of their destruction. And, indeed, Titus himself said as much, That God fought for the Romans, and drove the Jews from their fortifications. Ἐπεὶ χεῖρες τε ἀνδρῶν, ἢ μηχαναί, &c. "For what could the hands of men or machines have done against such strong towers?" (see ch. xxxii. 22).

Ver. 25.] This account must be supposed to be given by the pious Jews, or by those who were made sensible, when it was too late, how steadfast God was in his covenant; which contained curses as well as blessings, as was before observed, ver. 21, and see vii. 9, 10, xi. 26—28.

Ver. 26. They went and served other gods.] This aggravated their sin, that they sought for acquaintance with strange gods, directly contrary to the covenant of God (xii. 30, 31).

Whom he had not given unto them.] Or, as it is in the margin, "had not given (or divided) to them any portion;" that is, never bestowed any benefit upon them, as the Lord their God had done, who brought them out of Egypt. Or, more simply (as Boetius thinks the words will bear) "to whom no worship belonged."

Ver. 27.] So Moses foretold them, vii. 4, xi. 16, 17.

Ver. 28. In anger, and in wrath, and in great indignation.] Here is one word more to express his displeasure against them, than was used before, when he speaks of the destruction of Sodom, &c., ver. 23. And they all denote the great plagues threatened in Lev. xxvi. and in the foregoing chapter of this book.

nation, and cast them into another land, as it is this day.

29 The secret things belong unto the LORD

Cast them into another land.] This may seem to relate only to their captivity in Babylon; for, after they were rooted out by the Romans, they were scattered into all lands (xxviii. 63, 64). But considering what goes before (ver. 23, 24), and that they were not quite rooted out (many of them remaining in the land when Nebuchadnezzar conquered them) till the desolation made by the Romans, I think these words relate to them also, and another land is only the singular number, as is usual, for the plural. And so the author of Schebet Judah understood it, who, quoting these words ["cast them out into another land"], adds, "which experience now proves to be true."

Ver. 29.] The Jews generally take these words to be meant of the punishment of secret sins (particularly of idolatry spoken of before, ver. 19), which belongeth unto God, as the punishment of open sins belonged unto them, in obedience to his law, who commanded them to put to death him that seduced any person to idolatry and to raze the city that apostatized into it (xiii. 5, 6, &c., 12, 13, &c). And their negligence in doing their duty in this particular, made idolatry spread among them to their utter ruin. But these words may be understood as a farther answer to such inquiries, as that ver. 24, in which, if men persisted, and still asked, But why doth God thus punish his own people with such unusual severity, when there are many idolatrous nations, far worse than they, who continue still in their own land, and are not thus rooted out? Moses bids them silence such demands, and rest satisfied in this, That we cannot give an account of such things as God hath not revealed, particularly why he punishes some people, when he our God: but those things which are revealed belong unto us and to our children for ever, that we may do all the words of this law.

spares others who are as bad; but must mind our own duty, which he hath plainly revealed unto us, that is (as Moses concludes this chapter), "to do after all his commandments which he hath given us in his law," believing he will greatly reward the obedient, and terribly punish, one time or other, all those that transgress it.

There may be also a more obvious sense of these words, if we translate them as some great men have done, "The secrets of the Lord our God are revealed to us, and to our children." Thus Onkelos, whose judgment is very valuable; which Grotius follows, and before him Forsterus; and Paulus Fagius represents it as a commodious sense, and makes it the same with the words of the Psalmist, cxlvii. 20, "He hath not dealt so with any nation," &c. For this was a peculiar favour to the Jews, that those things which God before kept secret in his own breast he now manifested to them; that they might know how to order their lives so as to please him. But this made them liable to be punished more grievously than all other people, if they did not observe his will, which he most graciously discovered to them. And if we could give any credit to the Jews, who say that all words in the Bible that have extraordinary points upon them (of which there are but ten in the Pentateuch, and these words, lanu ulebenu, "to us and our children," are the last of them), denote something peculiar and extraordinary, I should think that they relate to the revelation to be made by Jesus Christ, the great prophet promised to them (ch. xviii.), unto which, if they did not give heed, the most dreadful punishments would be inflicted on them; as we see they have been for many ages, and are not yet ended.

CHAPTER XXX.

1 Great mercies promised unto the repentant. 11 The commandment is manifest. 15 Death and life are set before them.

1 AND it shall come to pass, when all these things are come upon thee, the blessing and the curse, which I have set before thee, and thou shalt call them to mind among all the nations, whither the LORD thy God hath driven thee,

2 And shalt return unto the LORD thy God, and shalt obey his voice according to all that I command thee this day, thou and thy children, with all thine heart, and with all thy soul;

3 That then the LORD thy God will turn thy

CHAP. XXX.

Ver. 1. When all these things are come upon thee,] God at the first bestowed great and singular blessings upon them; but when they grew so insensible of his mercy as to violate the covenant he had made with them, then he sent his curses which he had threatened upon them: which were completed in their expulsion out of the good land, which he had given them; especially in their last expulsion by the Romans, which was rather an extirpation.

Thou shalt call them to mind] In the Hebrew, "bring back to thy heart," as we observe in the margin of 1 Kings viii. 47, where there is the very same phrase, and there translated, "shall bethink thyself," that is, reflect seriously both upon the blessings and curses, and consequently consider the truth of God in fulfilling both. In which consideration, repentance and conversion to God begin (see Ezek. xviii. 28).

Among all the nations,] Where they could not choose but often think of all the blessings they had enjoyed in their own land, and might have still enjoyed, if they had not been disobedient; and all the curses, which had befallen them till they were driven from thence, and had pursued them ever since (see Lev. xxvi. 40, &c.; Deut. iv. 29, 30, &c.).

Ver. 2.] Repentance was completed by forsaking their idols, and returning to the worship of the Lord their God alone, and by obeying all the rest of his commands, and teaching their children to do the same; and all this with sincerity of heart. This they did, in some measure, after they were carried captive to Babylon; since which time we read nothing of their idolatry. But they fell into other sins, which stopped their ears to that great prophet, the Lord Christ, when he came to them; for which they are punished to this day, and will be till they repent and obey.

Ver. 3. Will turn thy captivity,] That is, bring those that were carried captive back again to their own land. Thus the word captivity is used Ps. xiv. 7; Eph. iv. Have compassion upon thee.] These words express captivity, and have compassion upon thee, and will return and gather thee from all the nations, whither the Lord thy God hath scattered thee.

4 If any of thine be driven out unto the out-most parts of heaven, from thence will the Lord thy God gather thee, and from thence will he fetch thee:

5 And the Lord thy God will bring thee into the spring of all their happiness, viz. the Divine compassion, in pardoning their sins, which had been very provoking.

Will return and gather thee] This is the effect of his compassion in their restitution, and re-collection again into one body after their dispersion.

From all the nations,] This was fulfilled in part when they returned from Babylon; for then they who were scattered in other countries flocked again to them; and will be more completely fulfilled when they shall believe on our blessed Saviour.

Ver. 4.] Unto this promise Nehemiah plainly alludes in his prayer to God, to prosper his endeavours for the restoration of Jerusalem (Neh. i. 8, 9). And finding the truth of it confirmed by the king's gracious concession to him, he went about the work, though one, who was accounted a prophet (yea, several of the like quality), dissuaded him from the enterprise, as likely to prove dangerous to his person (vi. 10—12, &c.). Ezra also tells us how Cyrus made a "proclamation throughout all his kingdom," which was very large, that all the Jews might return, if they pleased, into their own country (Ezra i. 1, 4, and see Zech. vii. 7, 8). And though, in their last dispersion by the Romans, they be far more scattered, and into more distant regions, than they were in the Babylonian captivity (according to Moses's threatening, xxviii. 64, of this book), yet, if they did now consider the cause of it, and lay to heart their sin in crucifying the Lord Christ, no doubt God would have compassion on them, and wonderfully restore them. For the Jews themselves apply this place (and have long done so) to their present condition, being of opinion that God hath appointed a prefixed time in his own mind, though he hath not declared it, when he will deliver them; but, if they did repent, he would shorten the days of their banishment, and immediately bring them to their own land. Thus the ancient Nitzacon, set forth not long ago by Wagenseil, p. 254. And R. Isaac, since him, and more lately, often insists upon this, in his Chissuk Emuna, published by the very same learned person; particularly Perek. vii., where he saith, "There can be no time prefixed for their deliverance, because it depends upon their repentance; whereby they may cut off the length of this banishment, provided they turn to God with their whole heart, and a full repentance." For which he alleges this place. And he repeats it again (Perek. xxvii.), as the great comfort they have in this long banishment, that, upon their perfect repentance, God will be merciful to them, and overcome their sins, and perform this promise. Which I find still more lately mentioned in Manasseh ben Israel's book, De Termino Vitæ, lib. iii. sect. 3. where he saith, "Here in all the prophets imitate Moses, being wont, after terrible threatenings, to conclude with some singular consolation. Which made R. Aquiba (as the Talmudists report) fall a laughing, when all the wise men who were with him wept and lamented, at the sight of the ruins of Jerusalem and the temple. Which they wondering at, he said, "After the clouds the sun will break out; and after the end of the evils which Moses threatened, we may hope for good things: for God is not more faithful in fulfilling the one, than in performing the other."

But, alas! in all ages hitherto there are no signs of repentance, much less of a perfect one; but they have been strangely hardened in their unbelief, and have bitterly reproached the Lord Jesus and his religion. Abarbinel himself, though a gentleman of a noble family, a well-bred person, and of an excellent understanding, is extremely guilty of this. And since his time Solomon Virgæ, in the age before us, considering the astonishing plagues that have befallen them, and that never any people, as he acknowledges, conflicted with so many miseries and so many ages as they have done, inquires its causes why the Divine Majesty should be so angry with them; he reckons seven; among which he accounts the putting of Jesus of Nazareth to death as one; yet not as a crime, but that which had enraged Christians against them. For he wickedly illustrates this by that speech of Moses, Exod. viii. 24, which he thus translates, "If we slay and sacrifice the abominable gods of the Egyptians in their sight, will they not stone us?" Which is the highest reproach he could vomit against our Saviour; mingled with the most stupid folly, in giving that as a reason of the Divine anger, which at the most is only a reason in their account of men's indignation (Schebet Judah, sect. 63).

The most cruel usage which they have met with in all Christian countries, might thus exasperate and embitter their spirits: and I cannot excuse the violent hatred of Christians to them, and their barbarous treatment of them, though they therein fulfilled the Divine threatenings, as I have shown upon the twenty-eighth chapter; which being ceased since the reformation of religion, the Jews have not been so virulent against our blessed Saviour; and it is to be hoped will be won to the obedience of faith by our Christian usage of them; when those other stumbling-blocks, which hinder their conversion, are removed out of the way.

Ver. 5. Thou shalt possess it;] Be again planted in it, as they were at their return from the captivity of Babylon; especially after they had laid the foundation of the house of the Lord, he blessed them exceedingly, Hag. ii. 18, 19; Zech. vii. 7—12.

He will do thee good,] The prophet Zechary hath given a full explication of these words, viii. 13—15, and the prophet Jeremy before him (xxxii. 42, 43, &c.), which was fulfilled in the building of the house of the Lord, though great opposition was made to it; and in the compassing Jerusalem with walls, and settling them in a state of liberty, according to the prophecy of Isaiah, lii. 1, 2.

Multiply thee above thy fathers.] The Hebrew words import, that he would "make them greater than their fathers." Which he did, by their vast increase after they returned from Babylon (see Zech. viii. 4, 5, and before him, Hos. i. 10), which is manifest from their διασπορά, i. e. "spreading themselves in so many colonies;" through all Asia, both the great and the less; with Egypt, Greece, Italy, and Spain (see Strabo, lib. xvi. concerning Joppa). By this means they were very much exalted, as Zechariah prophesied after their captivity (xii. 6); for as they had their liberty in their own country (God being a wall of fire to them, while Jerusalem had no walls), so they spread themselves, as I said, and had their synagogues in Babylon, Arabia, Syria, and divers other countries before mentioned: and a great many proselytes also joined themselves to them.

Yet one cannot well think that so magnificent a prophecy as this is was entirely fulfilled after their return from Babylon, when they were tributaries to the Persians, and afterward fell under the power of the the land which thy fathers possessed, and thou shalt possess it; and he will do thee good, and multiply thee above thy fathers.

6 And the LORD thy God will circumcise thine heart, and the heart of thy seed, to love the LORD thy God with all thine heart, and with all thy soul, that thou mayest live.

7 And the LORD thy God will put all these curses upon thine enemies, and on them that hate thee, which persecuted thee.

8 And thou shalt return and obey the voice of the LORD, and do all his commandments which I command thee this day.

9 And the LORD thy God will make thee

Grecians, under whom they suffered very much, especially in the days of Antiochus Epiphanes; whose death did not conclude their troubles, as Hermannus Witsius hath shown at large, in his Decaphylon, cap. 10, n. 9—12, &c., where he endeavours to prove that there was no moment of time, after their return from Babylon, wherein they could be said to be "made greater than their fathers," especially in the days of David and Solomon: and therefore he concludes, that this promise is still to be completely fulfilled. And thus R. Isaac (in his book before named, Chissuk Emuna) argues (Perek. vi.), that God did not bestow benefits upon them equal to those which their fathers enjoyed, much less superior, while the second temple stood; but all that time was full of straits and calamities; for which he alleges the prophecy of Daniel ix. 25. And therefore saith, these words of Moses can by no means be thought to be fulfilled, when the tribes of Judah and Benjamin returned from Babylon, and left a vast number behind them, who would not come back with them, but stay there to this day.

Ver. 6. Circumcise thine heart.] By such singular benefits bestowed upon them in a miraculous manner, God designed to take away the stubborn refractoriness of their spirits (called "hardness of heart," xxix. 19), and to cut off all their wicked inclinations and dispositions to idolatry and superstition, which had been their ruin; which is called "humbling their uncircumcised heart," Lev. xvi. 41. But though God circumcised them, yet their hearts might remain uncircumcised, as appears from xxix. 3, 4. And therefore he calls upon them to circumcise their hearts themselves (xvi. 10), by laying to heart his benefits, and following the motions of his grace and holy Spirit, which thereby he put into their hearts: and their neglect of this, and resting merely in the circumcision of the flesh, was that which ruined them again.

The heart of thy seed.] Accordingly, we find they were freed from idolatry after their return from Babylon, though still they continued in other sins. Which brought this present captivity (as they call it) upon them; another banishment being necessary (saith R. Isaac, in the book before mentioned, Perek. vii.) to purge them from their sins, by the severe afflictions which they now endure, and have long suffered; because their manifold sins, as he expresses it, need much scouring, by contusions and pressures. After which, he saith, they shall sin no more, but that shall be fulfilled which is written in the law, "the LORD thy God shall circumcise thine heart," &c., quoting these very words of Moses. But, alas! they are not sensible for what sin they suffer (see p. 96, 97, of Wagenseil's edition).

To love the LORD thy God with all thine heart, &c.] See vi. 5. This prophecy, the Jews say, shall be fulfilled in the days of the Messiah, according to what Ezekiel saith, xxxvi. 26, "A new heart will I give plenteous in every work of thine hand, in the fruit of thy body, and in the fruit of thy cattle, and in the fruit of thy land, for good: for the LORD will again rejoice over thee for good, as he rejoiced over thy fathers:

10 If thou shalt hearken unto the voice of the LORD thy God, to keep his commandments and his statutes which are written in this book of the law, and if thou turn unto the LORD thy God with all thine heart, and with all thy soul.

11 ¶ For this commandment which I command thee this day, it is not hidden from thee, neither is it far off.

12 It is not in heaven, that thou shouldst you, and a new spirit will I put into you," &c. So R. Isaac, in the place above named, and in p. 83.

Ver. 7.] Their very restoration created them many enemies, whose hatred increased with their prosperity in their own land, and made them, when they had power, to persecute them. Whom God remarkably plagued, particularly Antiochus Epiphanes, who died in miserable torments.

Ver. 8. Thou shalt return.] This may relate as well to their return unto their own land, as to their turning unto God: of both which he had spoken before. And now, having mentioned their persecution, whereby many of them might be driven out of their country, I suppose he here promises their restoration to it again, when he had cursed their enemies.

And obey the voice of the Lord.] Continue steadfast in their love to him, by a strict observance of all his commandments.

Ver. 9. Make thee plenteous in every work of thine hand, &c.] The effect of their constant and sincere obedience he promises should be still greater prosperity in all their undertakings, and in all their enjoyments (see xxviii. 4, 5, &c.).

For good.] To encourage them to continue faithful in the service of God.

The Lord will again rejoice over thee for good.] Delight only in blessing them; and not send any curses upon them (see xxviii. 63, and Jer. xxxii. 41).

As he rejoiced over thy fathers.] In whose obedience he delighted (Deut. x. 15).

Ver. 10. To keep his commandments, &c.] Persist in obedience to him.

If thou turn—with all thine heart.] With a sincere love to all his commands (ver. 2), who had "planted them assuredly in their land, with his whole heart, and his whole soul," as Jeremiah speaks, xxxii. 41. But herein they were defective, after they came out of the captivity of Babylon. For though they never returned again to idolatry, but kept close to the worship of God alone, yet they rested merely in the outward rites of religion, and had not a hearty love to God and to all goodness; which made them reject the Son of God when he came among them, and fall under those long calamities, which will not end till they "turn to him with all their hearts and souls."

Ver. 11. For this commandment which I command thee this day.] Of hearty love to God, and sincere obedience to all his commands (ver. 2, 6, 8, 16.)

It is not hidden from thee.] Or it may be translated out of the Hebrew, "It is not too wonderful above thee;" that is, abstruse and hard to be understood, because above their reach; but easy to be known and acquainted withal, because plainly revealed. Which is as true of the gospel (unto which St. Paul applies these words, Rom. x. 6, &c.) as it was of the law of Moses: for therein our Saviour hath declared say, Who shall go up for us to heaven, and bring it unto us, that we may hear it, and do it?

13 Neither is it beyond the sea, that thou shouldest say, Who shall go over the sea for us, and bring it unto us, that we may hear it, and do it?

14 But the word is very nigh unto thee, in thy mouth, and in thy heart, that thou mayest do it.

the mind and will of God to us, in such familiar words that the most simple people may understand their duty.

Neither is it far off.] So that they should go to seek it, and learn it in some distant nation. R. Isaac, in his Chissuk Emuna, cap. 45, had his thoughts so fixed upon what is said ver. 4, that he fancies these words belong to that matter; and that Moses still speaks to them of repentance, "which is of greater value than any other thing, and yet most easily acquired." Which cannot but make one wonder at their blindness; for if repentance be so very easy, how comes it to pass that they remain impenitent for so many ages, and thereby, as they confess, prolong their miseries? And yet he repeats the same words in the second part of his work, Pereh. lxxx. where he hath the confidence to say St. Paul misapplies this place.

Ver. 12.] R. Jacob Hæcsæi, in his preface to that part of the Mishna called Seder Nesim (as Guil. Vorstius observes upon Abarbinel about the Articles of their Faith), hath very fairly expounded this: which he takes to be a proverbial speech, to show that there is no need of hard, or rather impossible labour, to come at the knowledge of God's will, as there is in many human sciences, where the mind of man is tired by several propositions and deductions, &c., before he arrives at what he seeks: but all things are plain and easy to be understood, and not hard to be performed. For God had revealed his mind clearly by Moses from heaven, and therefore none had need to go thither to desire God to acquaint them with it, which he had done of his own accord, out of his good will towards them. And thus Grotius observes upon Rom. x. 6, out of several Greek authors, that they expressed things very difficult, by going up to heaven. Maimonides, indeed, to Jesodehatorah, cap. 9, and Abarbinel, in Rosch Amana, cap. 13, make these words an argument for the eternity and unchangeableness of their law, and that there should be no new revelation from heaven: but there is no colour for this from these words, the particle hu being of the feminine gender, and therefore doth not refer to God, but to the command before mentioned, plainly importing that men could not pretend ignorance of their duty, nor had any reason to desire that somebody would go to heaven again for those things which Moses had already brought from thence. And thus the apostle most justly accommodates these words to the new revelation from heaven by the Son of God, which was not abstruse and difficult, but as plain and perspicuous as this now made by Moses.

Ver. 13.] Ὡς δεῖσθαι πολυχροῖον καὶ χαμητρῶς ἀποδρμίας (to use the words of Philo, in his book concerning Rewards and Punishments), "so as to need long and tedious voyages, laborious and wearisome travels, to fetch it from foreign countries." Such as the Greek philosophers took, who travelled into Egypt, and the eastern part of the world, to learn wisdom, which God now taught his people in the wilderness, without any pains to attain to it.

Ver. 14. The word is very nigh unto thee.] Being brought to their very doors by Moses, the servant of 15 ¶ See, I have set before thee this day life and good, and death and evil;

16 In that I command thee this day to love the LORD thy God, to walk in his ways, and to keep his commandments and his statutes and his judgments, that thou mayest live and multiply: and the LORD thy God shall bless thee in the land whither thou goest to possess it.

17 But if thine heart turn away, so that thou

God; who now delivered to them the mind of God, as the Son of God himself did afterward, when he came and dwelt among them.

In thy mouth, and in thy heart.] Made so familiar to them, that they might always have it in their common discourse, to teach it their children; and had now been so often repeated, that it might be well laid up in their memory, never to be forgotten by them (vi. 6—9, xi. 18—20). It was also in the mouth of their priests, who were to teach them knowledge (Mal. ii. 7), and press it upon their hearts. Here the forenamed R. Isaac, in both the places forenamed, observes, that "repentance depends on the confession of the mouth and grief of the heart:" but the largest confession and the sorest grief will not avail them, till they repent of their crucifying the Lord Jesus, and shall "confess him with their mouth, and believe in their heart that God hath raised him from the dead," &c., as St. Paul speaks, Rom. x. 9, 10.

That thou mayest do it.] That they might have nothing to do but to put it in practice; and in order thereunto continually read it and keep it in mind. In which the Jews were so diligent, that, as Josephus tells the gentiles (lib. ii. contra Apionem), they could as easily recite all the laws of God as tell their names. But here was their error, that they were not careful to do what they knew to be the will of God: and so when he sent his Son among them, who plainly declared to them more fully the meaning of their holy books, they could not understand and receive that which they read every day. And indeed this is the common error (as Dr. Jackson well observes) of all corrupt minds, to seek that afar off, as if they were strangers to it, which is really in their mouth and in their heart, so that they would but be doers, and not only hearers of the word, as St. James speaks, alluding perhaps to these words of Moses. As St. Paul applies this whole passage to the gospel; which is that word of faith, so preached and published by the apostles that it may be in all our mouths and hearts, without going to seek for any other infallible teacher.

Ver. 15.] "Life and good, death and evil," may be but two words for the same thing, viz., all manner of happiness, and all manner of misery; both which he had at large set before them in the twenty-eighth chapter. Or by life may be meant long life in the land God had promised them; and good, all the prosperity they could wish for there: as, on the other side, death may signify their being cut off from the land of the living before their time; and evil, all the calamities he had threatened while they lived: and so the next verse seems to interpret it. Maimonides from these words observes, that the wills of men are under no force nor coercion, but are free agents; and therefore have precepts imposed upon them, with a punishment threatened to the disobedient, and a reward promised to those who keep God's commandments. Of which he treats at large in his preface to his Commentary upon Pirke Avoth, cap. 8.

Ver. 16. To walk in his ways.] This includes their entire obedience to all God's laws, which are comprehended under these three names (see vi. 1, 5, vii. 11, x. 12, 13).

will not hear, but shalt be drawn away, and worship other gods, and serve them;

18 I denounce unto you this day, that ye shall surely perish, and that ye shall not prolong your days upon the land, whither thou passest over Jordan to go to possess it.

19 I call heaven and earth to record this day against you, that I have set before you life and death, blessing and cursing: therefore

That thou mayest live and multiply:] This is the explication of the life and good which he set before them, if they observed God's laws with sincere affection to them (ver. 15).

Ver. 17. But if thine heart turn away,] Want of love to God, and of a due esteem of his wonderful love to them, made their heart turn away to other things, and not regard what he had revealed to them from heaven.

And worship other gods, and serve them:] This was the principal breach of the covenant of God.

Ver. 18.] This is the explication of the death and evil he set before them (ver. 15).

Ver. 19. I call heaven and earth to record this day against you,] God, angels, and men, were witnesses that he had done his duty. See iv. 26, viii. 19, and therefore is owned by God himself to be "faithful in all his house" (Numb. xii. 7).

Blessing and cursing:] They are the same with life and death; but he uses several words, to make them sensible that both proceeded from God; the one being choose life, that both thou and thy seed may live:

20 That thou mayest love the Lord thy God, and that thou mayest obey his voice, and that thou mayest cleave unto him: for he is thy life, and the length of thy days: that thou mayest dwell in the land which the Lord sware unto thy fathers, to Abraham, to Isaac, and to Jacob, to give them.

the effect of his love and favour, and the other of his anger and high displeasure.

Therefore choose life,] That is, choose to be obedient, without which they could not be happy. Or he wishes them to set their hearts on the happiness God had promised them, that it might incline them to do as follows.

Ver. 20. That thou mayest love the Lord thy God,] Love is the noblest and the strongest spring of obedience.

Cleave unto him:] Obedience to God is the surest preservative from apostasy.

He is thy life,] The author and giver of life; which he preserves and prolongs unto those who are obedient.

That thou mayest dwell in the land which the Lord sware unto thy fathers,] Which promise confirmed by an oath being faithfully fulfilled, he justly claimed their fidelity to him upon that account: which is the reason it is so often mentioned (vi. 10, viii. 1, ix. 5, x. 11, xi. 9, 21, xix. 8).

CHAPTER XXXI.

1 Moses encourageth the people. 7 He encourageth Joshua. 9 He delivereth the law unto the priests to read it in the seventh year to the people. 14 God giveth a charge to Joshua, 19 and a song to testify against the people. 24 Moses delivereth the book of the law to the Levites to keep. 28 He maketh a protestation to the elders.

I AND Moses went and spake these words unto all Israel.

2 And he said unto them, I am an hundred and twenty years old this day; I can no more go out and come in: also the Lord hath said unto me, Thou shalt not go over this Jordan.

CHAP. XXXI.

Ver. 1.] By this it seems plain to me, that after Moses had renewed the covenant with the people (mentioned in the foregoing chapter), he dismissed them, and retired to his own tent. But not long after gave them a new summons (as he had done xxix. 2), and went again to take his leave of them. The LXX. indeed seem to take the first words, as if the meaning was, that he went on with his discourse. For thus they render them, ἀπετίθει λαῶν πάντα τοὺς λόγους τοῦτους, "he finished speaking all these words." For which I see no warrant, nor is it likely he could speak all that here follows at the same time.

Ver. 2. I am an hundred and twenty years old this day;] This shows these words were spoken not long before his death, which was this year (xxxiv. 7). Manasseh ben Israel would have us from hence observe, "The singular care God hath of those who serve him with a perfect heart, as Moses did; the days of whose years (saith he) are exactly proportioned. For so these words are expounded in Sota, cap. 1, 'To-day my years are completed; to-day I was born, and to-day I shall die:' for he was born on the seventh day of the month Adar, and on the same day of the same month he died. Thus Enoch (he adds) lived just three hundred and sixty-five years, which are proportioned to the days of the sun's annual course," lib. iii. De Termino Vitæ, sect. 5. But as there is no great weight in this observation, if it were true, so that which he saith of Moses is evidently false: for he did not die this very day, as appears from ver. 14, where he saith, "Thy days approach that thou must die." Therefore the time was not yet come.

I can no more go out and come in:] Discharge the office I have long sustained of your governor and leader (see Numb. xxvii. 17); not because he wanted vigour, either of body or mind (for that is contrary to xxxiv. 7, of this book), but because God did not think fit to permit him to conduct them any farther; as the following words explain it.

Also the Lord hath said unto me,] The particle we translate also, often signifies for: and is so translated by us in divers places; particularly in Isa. iii. 7, Jer. xvii. 8. And being so taken here, the sense of these words is plain and easy; giving a reason why he could no longer take the charge of them, as he had done, because God had otherwise ordered; having told him he should not bring them into Canaan, which they were now ready to enter.

3 The LORD thy God, he will go over before thee, and he will destroy these nations from before thee, and thou shalt possess them: and Joshua, he shall go over before thee, as the LORD hath said.

4 And the LORD shall do unto them as he did to Sihon and to Og, kings of the Amorites, and unto the land of them, whom he destroyed.

5 And the LORD shall give them up before your face, that ye may do unto them according unto all the commandments which I have commanded you.

6 Be strong and of a good courage, fear not, nor be afraid of them: for the LORD thy God,

Ver. 3. He will go over before thee.] Conduct them by the ark of his presence (Josh. iii. 5, 11, and see Exod. xxiii. 23, and Deut. ix. 3).

Will destroy these nations] Exod. xxxiv. 11.

And Joshua, he shall go over before thee.] As their captain and leader when Moses had left them (iii. 28, Josh. i. 2).

As the Lord hath said.] When he was appointed the successor of Moses (Numb. xxvii. 18, 21).

Ver. 4.] See Numb. xxiv. 24, 34, 35.

Ver. 5. The Lord shall give them up before your face.] As he had promised before, vii. 23, where he saith, "The Lord thy God shall deliver them unto thee." In the Hebrew the words are, "before thy face" (see ix. 3).

That ye may do unto them according unto all the commandments] i. e. Utterly destroy them, and their altars, and images, and groves, &c. (see vii. 2, 3, 5, 27, xii. 1, 2, &c.).

Ver. 6. Be strong and of a good courage.] By faith in God; which their forefathers wanting, were discouraged, and durst not go up and possess the land when God commanded them (i. 28, 32).

Fear not, nor be afraid of them.] Be not affrighted, much less dismayed at their multitude, their stature and strength, when you go to fight with them. The second word (afraid) only expresses a higher degree of the same passion of fear; signifying, being overcome with it. For that is the import of the Hebrew word aratz, which originally signifies to prevail over another. This he had said to their forefathers, i. 21, 29, and after repeated to them, iii. 2, 22, vii. 17, 18, 21.

He it is that doth go with thee.] According to the assurance before given them (xx. 4).

He will not fail thee, nor forsake thee.] This promise, which here is general, in the next verse but one is particularly made to Joshua; and renewed to him by God himself, after the death of Moses, when they were about to enter into the land of Canaan (Josh. i. 5). And it is applied by the apostle unto all faithful Christians, to encourage their hope of being conducted through all difficulties and dangers unto their heavenly inheritance (Heb. xiii. 5).

Ver. 7. Moses called unto Joshua, and said unto him in the sight of all Israel.] That they might have the greater reverence to his person and authority, and follow his conduct, as a leader appointed by God.

Be strong] He exhorts him to give a good example to all the people; these being the same words he had spoken to them, ver. 6.

For thou must go with this people] Be their leader and commander-in-chief, by God's special order, (Numb. xxvii. 21).

Unto the land] See viii. 1, x. 13, xxx. 20.

Cause them to inherit it.] Put them into possession of it (iii. 28).

he it is that doth go with thee; he will not fail thee, nor forsake thee.

7 ¶ And Moses called unto Joshua, and said unto him in the sight of all Israel, Be strong and of a good courage: for thou must go with this people unto the land which the LORD hath sworn unto their fathers to give them; and thou shalt cause them to inherit it.

8 And the LORD, he it is that doth go before thee; he will be with thee, he will not fail thee, neither forsake thee: fear not, neither be dismayed.

9 ¶ And Moses wrote this law, and delivered it unto the priests the sons of Levi, which bare

Ver. 8. He it is that doth go before thee.] Josh. i. 9. He will not fail thee.] See ver. 6.

Fear not, neither be dismayed.] The same which he said to the people, ver. 6, but was most necessary to be pressed upon him, who, by his undaunted resolution, was to put courage into them. The word we translate dismayed, is different in the Hebrew from that ver. 6, which is, be not afraid: but the LXX. and the Vulgar use the same word to express both; which denotes such a consternation, as disables a man to do his duty; which is the proper import of this word.

Ver. 9. Moses wrote this law] Some understand by this law, only the book of Deuteronomy; for which I can see no reason, the Scripture calling all that is contained in the five books of Moses by the name of the law. St. Paul, for instance, in Gal. iii. 21, asks this question, "Do you not hear the law?" and then quotes what we read in Gen. xvi. 21. And so Nehemiah saith, x. 34, 35, that they brought first-fruits unto God, "as it is written in the law," viz. Exod. xiii. 12, xxiii. 19. And Josiah put away the workers with familiar spirits, &c. "that he might perform the words of the law" (2 Kings xxiv. 24), which we find Lev. xix. 30, xx. 6, 27. And Hezekiah also (2 Chron. xxxi. 3) appointed the daily oblations, and those required at stated times, to be offered, "as it is written in the law of the Lord," which plainly refers to the twenty-eighth and twenty-ninth of Numbers. And Joshua built an altar on Mount Ebal (viii. 30, 31), "as it is written in the book of the law of Moses;" which we find nowhere but in this book of Deuteronomy (xxvii. 4).

Delivered it unto the priests the sons of Levi.] Concerning this form of speech "the priests the sons of Levi," see xvii. 9. It is probable Moses had written most of these five books some time ago (and so the foregoing words may be translated, "Moses had written this law," but did not finish them till a little before his death, and then delivered them to the priests. But there is no necessity thus to understand it, for he might have had time enough between this and his death to write the whole Pentateuch; it being only said, ver. 14, "Thy days approach, that thou must die;" which doth not imply he was to die in a day or two, but there might be some weeks before his departure.

Which bare the ark] It was most proper to deliver it unto them, who alone might touch the ark, in which this law was to be laid (ver. 26). The Kohathites, who were mere Levites, and not priests, did carry the ark in their travels through the wilderness, after the priests had covered it, and put in the staves thereof (as I have shown Numb. iv. 5, 6, &c.); but it is evident they served only as ministers to the priests, who, upon great occasions, bare the ark themselves. As when they passed over Jordan the ark of the covenant of the LORD, and unto all the elders of Israel.

10 And Moses commanded them, saying, At the end of every seven years, in the solemnity of the year of release, in the feast of tabernacles,

11 When all Israel is come to appear before the LORD thy God in the place which he shall (Josh. iii. 3, 6), when they compassed Jericho (Josh. vi. 6), and when the temple of Solomon was dedicated, and the ark brought into it (1 Kings viii. 3, 4, 6). When David, indeed, brought the ark to Jerusalem, it is said the Levites bare it; but at the same time the priests also were summoned to take care of it; which shows the Levites bare it as their servants (1 Chron. xv. 2, 11, 13—15).

Unto all the elders of Israel.] As he delivered this book of the law, that is, the whole Pentateuch (as Abarinel and others of the Jews understand it) unto the priests, commanding them to preserve it safe near the ark (ver. 24); so he delivered another copy of this book to the elders of every tribe, as the Jews affirm in Debarim Rabba; where they say (and it is highly probable) that Moses, before his death, wrote thirteen copies of the law (with his own hand as they add), and having delivered one unto the priests, to be preserved in the holy place, gave one to each tribe, which he committed to the care of the elders of it. Thus Maimonides, also, in his preface to Jad. Chazakah, as Buxtorf observes, in Histor. Arceæ Federis, cap. 5. The intent of which was, I suppose, that all the people of each tribe might resort to it (as the whole nation were to resort to that in the sanctuary), if they doubted of any thing, which might be thought to be amiss, by the errors of transcribers.

Ver. 10. Moses commanded them.] Both the priests and the elders, to take care of what follows.

End of every seven years.] Mentioned, xv. 1, &c.

In the feast of tabernacles.] When they had gathered in all the fruits of the earth, and thereby had greater leisure to attend to the hearing of the law read to them; which, when men's minds were also freed from cares by the release of their debts, was likely to make a greater impression upon them.

Ver. 11. When all Israel is come to appear before the Lord] As they were bound to do at this feast, and at Pentecost, and the passover (xvi. 16).

Thou shalt read this law before all Israel] This order being directed, not to all Israel, but to a particular person, plainly imports, that the supreme governor, who-soever he was, had this charge laid upon him, to take care these laws should be read at this solemn time, that all the people might hear them; and therefore, I think the Jews rightly say, that their kings, when they had them, were bound not only to look after this matter, but to read the law themselves to as many (that is) as could hear them, appointing the priests and the Levites to read it in as many other assemblies of the people as were necessary for the fulfilling of this precept. In order to which, a pulpit was set up in the court of the men of Israel on the very first day of the feast (for they did not think fit to defer it till the last, because it is here said, "when Israel is come to appear before the Lord," not when they were ready to depart, as the Jews observe); the king going up into it, the minister took the book of the law, and delivered it to the ruler of the synagogue, who gave it to the sagan (or vicar of the high-priest), who delivered it to the high-priest, and he to the king; who stood up to receive it, and then sat down to read. All this expresses the reverence with which this holy book was delivered; and likewise the reverence with which they approached to the king; choose, thou shalt read this law before all Israel in their hearing.

12 Gather the people together, men, and women, and children, and thy stranger that is within thy gates, that they may hear, and that they may learn, and fear the LORD your God, and observe to do all the words of this law:

who, they say, began to read at this book of Deuteronomy (which is a compendium of the law), and proceeded, before he stopped, to those words (vi. 4), "Hear, O Israel," &c. which having also read, he omitted the rest till he came to ch. xi. 13. "And it shall come to pass, if thou wilt hearken diligently," &c. reading on to ver. 22. And then skipped to xiv. 22. "And thou shalt truly tithe," &c. reading on to the section concerning the king (xvii. 14), and then the cursings and blessings out of the twenty-seventh and twenty-eighth chapters, till he had ended all that section of the law. Thus the Mischna, in the title Sota, cap. 7, sect. 8, which Wagenseil hath lately illustrated with most learned annotations; and our Dr. Lightfoot also hath given an account of it long ago, in his Temple Service, ch. 17, sect. 1, where he saith, the king might sit down if he pleased, when he read, but it was esteemed more honourable if he stood: as king Agrippa did when he performed this office. And before he began to read, he made a prayer to God; and all this (he adds) was done "in the court of the women." Which well agrees with what is said in the next verse, "Gather the people, men and women," &c. But it doth not contradict what I said before, of his reading it in the court of the men of Israel: for if the king were of the family of David, it was always done there; if he were not, then in the court of the women, as Wagenseil observes out of Maimonides.

Ver. 12. Gather the people together.] All that came to this feast could not meet in one place, but were divided into several assemblies, probably in their synagogues. For as many as the courts of Israel would hold meeting there, it is reasonable to think that the rest assembled in some other holy place. Such were their synagogues, which Philo (in his book of the embassy to Caius) calls "places of secondary holiness." And Maimonides discourses at large of the holiness of synagogues and schools in his book of Prayer and the Priests' Blessing, cap. 11, (see upon Lev. xix. 30).

Men, and women, and children.] Though the males only were bound to go up to the great feasts, yet many devout women went also voluntarily, as appears by Hannah, 1 Sam. i. 3, 4. And all the women in Jerusalem were likewise bound to attend at these solemnities, with the children who were capable of instruction (see Neh. viii. 2, 3). To whom some person of authority read the law in their court, while the king of the house of David was reading it in the court of the men of Israel.

Thy stranger] Such as were proselytes to the Jewish religion; not exceeding those who were only proselytes of the gate, if they would come to their assemblies.

That they may hear, &c.] That by this means they might be instructed in the true way of worshipping God (which is here called his fear), and to his worship and service add a careful obedience to all that he commanded in this book, which they might read (and were bound to do so) in their own private houses, and which they heard read every Sabbath-day in their public synagogues. For which, indeed, there is no particular command in the law; but they being commanded to teach their children every day at home the 13 And that their children, which have not known any thing, may hear, and learn to fear the Lord your God, as long as ye live in the land whither ye go over Jordan to possess it.

14 ¶ And the Lord said unto Moses, Behold, thy days approach that thou must die: call Joshua, and present yourselves in the tabernacle of the congregation, that I may give him a charge. And Moses and Joshua went, and presented themselves in the tabernacle of the congregation.

15 And the Lord appeared in the tabernacle things contained in the law, and consequently to read it (vi. 7, 8, xi. 16), they thought it most reasonable to have it read on the Sabbath in their public assemblies, where some portion of the law was read; but now the whole volume, as an authentic testimony of the whole nation, to the truth of what is contained in these books.

Ver. 13. That their children.] For the early instruction of posterity in the sacred authority of this law.

May hear, and learn to fear, &c.] Be preserved in the true religion, by so solemn an acknowledgment made by the king himself, that God delivered all these laws to Moses. Accordingly we find that Joshua, their supreme governor after the death of Moses, did read all the words of the law, not omitting a word that Moses commanded, before all the congregation, with women, and the little ones, and the strangers, that were conversant among them (Josh. viii. 34, 35). But from that time to the reign of Jehoshaphat, (2 Chron. xvii. 7, 8, &c.) which is commonly computed to be five hundred and thirty years, we find no mention of a public reading of it. Nor from that time to the eighteenth year of king Josiah (2 Chron. xxxiv. 30, 31), which was the space of two hundred eighty and two years; nor from that time till after the captivity of Babylon (Neh. viii. 2, 3, &c.). By which neglect they more easily fell into idolatry, and continued in it, more or less, till that captivity; for a forgetfulness of the law ensued upon this neglect.

Ver. 14. Behold, thy days approach that thou must die:] He admonishes him, that the end of his days upon earth was near, when he must resign up his office into the hands of Joshua, who had been before appointed his successor (Numb. xxvii.).

Call Joshua, and present yourselves in the tabernacle—that I may give him a charge.] This was done, I suppose, in the face of all the people, to whom Moses had been speaking (ver. 1, 2), to give Joshua the greater authority, and to make him revered by them, when they saw he was appointed by God himself to be their governor; as he had been before ordained publicly by God's order (Numb. xxvii. 18, 19, &c.).

And Moses and Joshua went,] In the court of the sanctuary, with their faces towards it; for it was not lawful for any but the priests to go into the sanctuary itself. Some indeed have thought, that by a special order from God, Joshua was now admitted into it: but this seems to me to be contradicted by the next verse, which saith God appeared in a cloud over the door of the tabernacle.

Ver. 15. The Lord appeared] This signifies, that the glory of the Lord (as other places speak) appeared unto them, and unto the people, as it had done upon many occasions (Exod. xxxiii. 9, 10; Numb. ix. 15, xvi. 42, 43).

The pillar of the cloud stood over the door] Being a symbol of the Divine presence, whose glory appeared out of the cloud, as it did Numb. xvi. 42. For the cloud was always upon the tabernacle (Exod. xl. 35, in a pillar of the cloud: and the pillar of the cloud stood over the door of the tabernacle.

16 ¶ And the Lord said unto Moses, Behold, thou shalt sleep with thy fathers; and this people will rise up, and go a whoring after the gods of the strangers of the land, whither they go to be among them, and will forsake me, and break my covenant which I have made with them.

17 Then my anger shall be kindled against them in that day, and I will forsake them, and I will hide my face from them, and they shall be 38; Numb. ix. 18); but when the Lord would strike an awe into the people, and move them to regard what he said or did, then the cloud stood at the door of the tabernacle, and the glory of the Lord came out of the most holy place, and appeared in it.

Ver. 16. The Lord said unto Moses,] Out of the cloud, I suppose, as he did, Numb. xvi. 44.

Behold, thou shalt sleep with thy fathers;] He first admonishes Moses again of his departure, in the audience, I suppose, of Joshua, who heard all the following admonition, to make him more carefully observe the end and design of it.

Sleep is a common word for death, either of good men or bad; which was not used merely as a soft expression of that which the heathen dreaded as the most terrible of all things; but to put them in mind, perhaps, that death should not last always, but they should as certainly rise again, as they lay down (so the word is in the Hebrew) to sleep with their fathers.

This people will rise] In rebellion.

Go a whoring] God, who searches all men's hearts, discerned such bad inclinations in this people, that he knew they would fall into idolatry (which is called "going a whoring" from him, as hath been often noted) notwithstanding all the means he had prescribed to prevent it. And therefore he adds one more, which was the learning them the following song; notwithstanding which, he foresaw, that after the death of Joshua, and the elders who survived him, they would forsake him, and worship other gods (see Ps. cvi. 36, 38).

After the gods of the strangers] This is an unusual phrase, signifying no more than what he calls in other places strange gods. Though some think it imports peculiarly the gods of the Canaanites, who were the former inhabitants, but, being expelled, became "strangers of the land." And thus Onkelos seems to have understood it, who translates it "after the idols of the people of the land." Which was a high aggravation of their sin, that they should worship such gods as had not been able to protect their servants.

Whither they go to be among them,] This seems to countenance the foregoing exposition. And God charges them in future ages with this, as a very great guilt, that they worshipped the gods of the Amorites, in whose land they dwelt (Judg. vi. 10).

Will forsake me,] For he looked upon himself as forsaken (that is, not worshipped), if they worshipped any other god with him (Exod. xx. 3).

Break my covenant] This being the principal thing in the covenant (as I have often observed), that they should worship him alone (Exod. xx. 22, 23, xxiii. 32, 33; Deut. v. 3, 4, &c., vi. 3, 4, &c.).

Ver. 17. My anger shall be kindled against them in that day,] So we read it was upon their very first apostasy to idolatry (Judg. ii. 14), and continued so in all ages, as we read frequently in that and the following books (see there, ver. 20, and iii. 8, &c.).

I will forsake them,] Go no longer before them devoured, and many evils and troubles shall befall them; so that they will say in that day, Are not these evils come upon us, because our God is not among us?

18 And I will surely hide my face in that day from all the evils which they shall have wrought, in that they are turned unto other gods.

19 Now therefore write ye this song for you, and teach it the children of Israel: put it in their mouths, that this song may be a witness for me against the children of Israel.

20 For when I shall have brought them into the land which I swear unto their fathers, that it floweth with milk and honey; and they shall have eaten and filled themselves, and waxen fat; then will they turn unto other gods, and serve them, and provoke me, and break my covenant.

21 And it shall come to pass, when many evils and troubles are befallen them, that this song shall testify against them as a witness; for it shall not be forgotten out of the mouths of their seed: for I know their imagination which they go about, even now, before I have brought them into the land which I swear.

against their enemies, but deliver them up into their hands (ver. 8).

Will hide my face from them.] Withdraw my favour and protection. So that they were devoured, as it follows, by their enemies, and wild beasts; and "many evils and troubles beset them;" or, as the Hebrew phrase signifies, "came upon them on a sudden." The prophet Ezekiel expresses this in these words, "My face will I turn from them" (vii. 22). The effect of which was, the Divine presence departed out of the sanctuary, and he left it (as he there speaks) to be polluted and defiled by robbers. And so it here follows.

Are not these evils come upon us, because our God is not among us?] For whithersoever they went out, "the hand of the Lord was against them for evil," as we read Judg. ii. 15, which was so remarkable a change, that it could not but at last make them reflect upon the cause of it; as we find it did, and moved them to cry unto the Lord for help (iii. 9, 15, iv. 3, &c.).

Ver. 18. I will surely hide, &c.] He repeats it again, because they were a people dull of hearing. Or the former words may relate to their first captivity, and these to the last (as they call it), wherein they now are. For they themselves take notice, that these words have been fulfilled by the many calamities which have befallen them since the destruction of Jerusalem by the Romans. This appears from Schebet Judah, where Solomon Virgæ quotes this very verse, to prove that their present sufferings proceed not from nature, but from an angry God, more powerful than nature, as he speaks, sect. 13.

Ver. 19. Now therefore write ye] This shows these words were directed both to Moses and to Joshua, who was to take care, after Moses's death, to see this command observed.

This song for you,] Which follows in the thirtys-second chapter.

Teach it the children of Israel:] Make them get it by heart, as we now speak.

Put it in their mouths,] That they might sing it, and thereby preserve it in their memory. For it hath been always thought the most profitable way of instructing people, and communicating things to posterity, by putting them into verse; and especially children and young people are best taught in this way. And the greater moment any thing is of, the more carefully it ought to be preserved; which Plato himself thought could be done by no better means than this. And therefore, having spoken of the songs which he would have composed for the use of the people, he would have it enacted δεν πάντα ἀνδρα και παιδα, &c., "that all men and children, whether bond or free, male or female, should be bound through the whole city to sing such songs, and never cease so to do," &c., (see Eusebius, lib. xii. Præpar. Evang. 32). And Plato himself, lib. ii. De Legibus; where he gives a great many cautions about this matter, and concludes that τούτο δὲ Θεοῦ, ἢ Θείου τινοῦ, ἀν εἶη, p. 657, "this must be the work of a god, or some godlike man." As if he had been acquainted with what Moses, the man of God, or rather God himself, here ordained, that every one should have this song in their mouths, as a means to preserve them in the worship of God alone. However, this justifies the admirable discipline of the Hebrews in those ancient times, who were taught by such hymns, as the wisest men among the heathen in future times thought the best way of instruction. For which reason, as Aristotle reports in his Problems (sect. 19, probl. 28), people anciently sung their laws, as the Agathyrsi (he saith) continued to do in his days, ὅπως μὴ ἐπικαθάρωνται, "that they might not be forgotten." Particularly the laws of Charondas (as Athenæus informs us out of Hermippus) were wont to be sung at Athens, παρ' οἶνον, "over a glass of wine;" and were therefore written in some sort of verse, or tunable measure, as our incomparable Dr. Bentley hath made it probable, in his late Dissertation on the Epistles of Phalaris, p. 373. Tully also (to add no more) tells us, that Cato, in his book De Originibus, reports, that it was the custom among the old Romans to have the virtues and praises of famous men sung to a pipe at their feasts; which he thinks they learnt from the ancient Pythagoreans in Italy, who were wont, "carminibus præcepta quædam occultius tradere, "to deliver in verses certain precepts," which were the greatest secrets in their philosophy; and composed the minds of the scholars to tranquillity, by songs and instruments of music. See upon Numb. xxi. 30, concerning this way of instruction.

That this song may be a witness for me] Testifying that they were sufficiently warned, and could not complain that they were not taught their duty and told their danger; and reproving also their ingratitude, and putting them in mind how ill they requited their God (ver. 21).

Ver. 20. For when I shall have brought them into the land which I swear] See vi. 10, &c., xv. 8, 9.

Shall have eaten, &c.] See viii. 10—12, &c., xxvii. 15.

Then will they turn unto other gods, &c.] Against which he had most solemnly forewarned them, in the places before mentioned, and xi. 16, xii. 29, 30.

Ver. 21. This song shall testify against them] That they are most justly punished for their foul ingratitude and unbelief, with which this song upbraided them; having told them plainly (xxxii. 18, 19) what would be the effect of their forsaking him; and at the delivery of it, God having solemnly said here (ver. 17), that when they went a whoring from him he would "forsake them, and hide his face from them."

It shall not be forgotten out of the mouths of their seed:] The calamities which fell upon them, according to what is predicted in this song, brought it to their remembrance when they had forgotten it, or did not regard it. For these words do not seem to be a precept requiring them to remember this song, but a 22 ¶ Moses therefore wrote this song the same day, and taught it the children of Israel.

23 And he gave Joshua the son of Nun a charge, and said, Be strong and of a good courage: for thou shalt bring the children of Israel into the land which I swear unto them: and I will be with thee.

24 ¶ And it came to pass, when Moses had made an end of writing the words of this law in a book, until they were finished,

25 That Moses commanded the Levites, prediction, foretelling that their miseries should not suffer them quite to forget it.

For I know their imagination] He saw the secret inclinations and designs which were in their hearts; and perceived that at that very present they hankered, as we speak, after idols.

Ver. 22. Moses therefore wrote this song] And so did Joshua (as he was commanded, ver. 19), who spake the words of this song unto the people as well as Moses, xxxii. 44.

And taught it the children of Israel.] Commanded them to learn it (ver. 19). In order to which, the Jews say, every man was bound to write for himself a copy of it: and more than that, they make it one of the affirmative precepts (as Maimonides tells us), which obliged every Israelite to write out the whole book of the law with his own hand. For so they interpret those words (ver. 19), "Write ye this song for you," as if they were spoken to all the people, and their meaning had been, "Write ye this law for you, wherein is this song;" for they were not to write the law by small parts and sections (as his words are), but all of it entirely. And if a man's parents had left him a copy, yet he was bound to write one himself; or if he could not write, to procure one to be written for him by any other person, &c. (see Schickard's Mischpat Hammelech, cap. 2, theor. 5).

Ver. 23. He gave Joshua—a charge,] That is, the Lord, who had hitherto spoken to him by Moses, now spake to him himself, and gave him this charge, to gain him the greater authority. For which end he had ordered Joshua to present himself before him, together with Moses (ver. 14).

Be strong and of a good courage.] Which he repeats to him after the death of Moses, Josh. i. 6, 7.

Thou shalt bring the children of Israel into the land] I have appointed thee to be the captain of my people, to lead them into the land of Canaan.

I will be with thee.] To give him success in all his enterprises. Which words being spoken in the audience of all the people (as may be supposed in ver. 14), made them readily submit to the authority of Joshua, and confide in his conduct.

Ver. 24.] The whole book of the laws, which he put together before his death; as I said on ver. 9.

Ver. 25.] The priests, who were of the tribe of Levi (see ver. 9).

Ver. 26. Take this book of the law, and put it in the side of the ark] Not in the inside of it; for he doth not say, "put it into the ark," but "in the side of the ark," that is, on the outside, in a little box, as Jonathan and others expound it. For it is the very same phrase with that, I Sam. vi. 8, where the Philistines are said to have put the jewels of gold which they returned for a sin-offering, in a coffer by the side of the ark; where none could put it but the high-priest, because nobody else might go into the holy place where the ark was. And therefore those priests who received the book of the law from Moses delivered it to Eleazar, to be there placed. See Buxtorf. Histor.

which bare the ark of the covenant of the Lord, saying, 26 Take this book of the law, and put it in the side of the ark of the covenant of the Lord your God, that it may be there for a witness against thee.

27 For I know thy rebellion, and thy stiff neck: behold, while I am yet alive with you this day, ye have been rebellious against the Lord; and how much more after my death?

28 ¶ Gather unto me all the elders of your

Arca, cap. 5, and Huetius, more lately, in his Demonstratio Evangelica, propos. iv. cap. De Can. Libr. Sacrorum, sect. 8, where he observes that R. Meir, in both the Talmuds, Abarbinel himself, and many others, have been of opinion, from this very place, that the book of the law was put into the ark itself, being no less precious than the tables of stone which were there. But the Scripture tells us, "there was nothing in the ark save the two tables of stone" (1 Kings viii. 9; 2 Chron. v. 10), and their reason is good for nothing, the two tables far excelling this book, because written by the finger of God; and therefore other great doctors among the Jews rightly place it without the ark, as the very words of Moses import.

That it may be there for a witness against thee.] It was deposited in that place as a public record, that if any one should falsify or deprave any thing in the law (as Abarbinel interprets it), he might be convicted out of this book, which was sacredly preserved to be produced as a witness against him. Or (as the author of Tzeror Hammor expresses it), that if they should be so wicked as to lose the books of the law, this copy, kept under the care of the priests, might remain to testify what was the will of God. As we see it did in the days of Josiah, when it was casually found in the house of God, as they were about the reparations of it: though I cannot say they found it in the side of the ark, but rather upon the roof of the house, or in the rafters; where the priests had hid it, as some of the Jews think, when Manasseh endeavoured to destroy this authentic copy of the law, as he had done all other that he could find; and when they came to uncover the house, there it appeared.

Ver. 27. For I know thy rebellion,] I have been sufficiently acquainted with your perverse disposition.

Behold, while I am yet alive, &c.] For it was not likely that they would have a greater regard to Joshua than they had to him, who had such near familiarity with God, as never any man had.

Ver. 28. Gather unto me all the elders] I suppose after Moses had spoken to the people what God ordered, ver. 1, 2, &c. (see there), he dismissed them again, that he might write the book of the law (ver. 9), and deliver it to the priests, &c., and then write this song (which follows in the next chapter), ver. 19, 22, &c., which being done, he is ordered here to summon all the elders of the several tribes (and with them all the people came, ver. 30), that he might deliver to them, by word of mouth, the song which he had written.

Your officers,] I have frequently observed that these shoterim (which we translate officers) were but ministers to their elders or judges (see Exod. v. 14; Deut. i. 15, xvi. 18). Unto which I shall add here only the words of Abarbinel: The office of the shoterim was to see that the sentence which the judges had given was observed, and to compel men to it. They who would have more may find a long roll of authors, who are of this mind, both Jews and Christians, tribes, and your officers, that I may speak these words in their ears, and call heaven and earth to record against them.

29 For I know that after my death ye will utterly corrupt yourselves, and turn aside from the way which I have commanded you; and evil will befall you in the latter days; because ye will do evil in the sight of the Lord, to provoke him to anger through the work of your hands.

30 And Moses spake in the ears of all the congregation of Israel the words of this song, until they were ended.

in Jo. Benedic. Carpzovius upon Schickard's Jus Regium; who hath also said a great deal to the same purpose, cap. 4, theor. 14.

That I may speak these words] The song which God had suggested to him, and commanded him to write (ver. 19, 22).

Call heaven and earth to record] Call the whole world to witness how wicked they are, if they fall from God, after such care to preserve them in his obedience.

Ver. 29. After my death ye will utterly corrupt yourselves.] Fall to the foulest idolatry (Judg. ii. 19).

And turn aside] Departing from that way of God which I have delivered to you by this command. It was a very melancholy thing for Moses to leave the world in this belief, that all his pains would be lost upon them; but he comforted himself in doing his duty to the very last, and omitting no means to secure them from apostasy.

Evil will befall you in the latter days.] This seems to express a foresight, that they would not immediately revolt, but after the death of Joshua, and of the elders who survived him (Judg. ii. 7, 11, 12, &c.).

Because ye will do evil in the sight of the Lord.] By making images, after the manner of other nations, and bowing down to them, and worshipping them, Judg. ii. 12, 13, iii. 7, where the groves signify the images in the groves.

Ver. 30. Moses spake] With the assistance of Joshua, xxxii. 44.

In the ears of all the congregation] Whom the elders and officers (ver. 28) had assembled, according to their tribes and families; unto whom they went severally, and spake these words in their hearing.

The words of this song.] Which follows in the next chapter, and much differs, in the raised expressions and loftiness of the style, from the rest of this book hitherto.

Until they were ended.] Omitted nothing, but completely delivered this song to them; or they spake all these words to them, at the same time, with one continued speech. I observed before that the most ancient way of instruction was by poetical compositions, which was more ancient than rhetorical discourses. And as their chief learning did consist of poetry, so the excellency of their poetry was seen in the proper and native subject of this faculty, that is, in matters of sacred use or observation: from whence the title of vates descended unto secular and profane poets, who retained the matter of speech used by the former. But, as Conradus Pellicanus here truly observes (and see my notes on Exod. xv. 1), the Scripture poetry doth not consist in the cadency and number of syllables, contrived to please the ear, but in brief and weighty sentences, simply and sincerely composed in a lively manner, to enlighten the understandings, move the affections, and stick in the memory. And the ancients (as a great man of our own observes) had this advantage of later poets, "That the fashion of the world (as he speaks), in their times, was more apt to ravish their thoughts with admiration; wonderful events being then more frequent, and their frequency not abating, but rather increasing their wonderment, because their variety was very great, and the apprehension of invisible or supernatural powers in those events was usual and undoubted. So that admiration was then enforced upon men, and the breasts of those who diligently observed those events, or were any way disposed by nature to it, were inspired with lively and sublime affections, apt to vent themselves in such poetical phrases and resemblances as we cannot reach, unless we raise our invention by imitation, and stir up admiration by meditation and study. But now our senses being neither moved by such extraordinary effects of God's power, nor our minds bent to observe the ways of his wisdom, so as to be stricken with true observation of them, we have fewer good sacred poems than of any other kind."

Thus Dr. Jackson, book i. on the Creed, ch. 14. David Chytraeus also hath an excellent discourse on this subject, to show that the ancient poetry among the heathen contained the doctrine of God, and of celestial things; all the offices and rewards of virtue, with the punishment of vice; the history of their kings, and the noble acts of famous men, tom. i. of his works, p. 154, &c., where he confirms this out of the verses of Orpheus, who lived (as he computes) about a hundred and fifty years before David; and those of Pindar, Simonides, and the rest, who lived in the time of the war with Xerxes. But Moses led the way to them all; whose mind was raised to that sublimity of thoughts and speech which we find in his songs, by admiration of those strange events which he saw, Exod. xv., Numb. xxi., and here in the next chapter, wherein he was followed by Deborah, Barak, and Hannah, &c., in aftertimes, Judg. v., 1 Sam. ii.

CHAPTER XXXII.

1 Moses' song, which setteth forth God's mercy and vengeance. 46 He exhorteth them to set their hearts upon it.
48 God sendeth him up to mount Nebo, to see the land, and die.

1 GIVE ear, O ye heavens, and I will speak; and hear, O earth, the words of my mouth.

2 My doctrine shall drop as the rain, my speech shall distil as the dew, as the small rain

CHAP. XXXII.

Ver. 1.] He calls angels and men to bear witness (xxx. 18) that the Israelites had been admonished of their duty, and warned of their danger; and this, not by words of his own invention, but which were put into his mouth by the Spirit of God. Or (after an elegant form of speech) he calls upon all insensible creatures, everywhere, to listen to him, that he might awaken the Israelites out of their stupidity, or upbraid them as a people that had ears to hear, and would not hear him. And, as some of themselves upon the tender herb, and as the showers upon the grass :

3 Because I will publish the name of the Lord : ascribe ye greatness unto our God.

4 He is the Rock, his work is perfect : for all have observed, he may be thought to intimate thereby, that if they would not hearken and keep his precepts, the heavens were forbidden to give them rain, and the earth to bring forth fruit. The gloss also of the Jerusalem Targum is not amiss, that Moses, being shortly to die, calls the heavens and the earth, which endure through all ages, to be witnesses against them when he was gone. But the following observation is too curious: That Isaiah, when he prophesied, i. e. being far remote from the heavens, and near to the earth, calls upon the heavens to hear, and the earth to give ear, or attend: whereas Moses, quite contrary, approaching now very near to the heavens, calls upon them to attend or give ear, and, being in spirit remote from the earth, bids it hear.

Ver. 2. My doctrine shall drop as the rain.] Or, "Let my doctrine drop," &c. For this seems to be a prayer, that his words, which were sent from heaven to them, might sink into their hearts, and soften them, as the drops of rain and the dew do the earth, and produce such fruits of obedience as might make them happy.

As the small rain upon the tender herb.] The aforesaid Targum thus paraphrases this whole verse: "Let the doctrine of my law be as sweet upon the children of Israel as the rain; and the word of my mouth be received by them as the delectable dew: let it be as gentle showers refreshing the grass, and as the drops of the latter rain, descending and watering the blades of corn in the month of March."

Ver. 3. Because I will publish the name of the Lord.] For my song shall be concerning the Lord of heaven and earth, whose glorious perfections I will proclaim; which make him the sole object of your worship.

Ascribe ye greatness unto our God.] Acknowledge therefore the infinite power of our God; and his sovereign dominion over all; and give honour and service to none besides him.

These first three verses seem to be the preface to the song; and now follows the song itself; which Josephus calls ποιησαν εξαμετρον, "a poem in hexameter verse" (lib. iv. Antiq. cap. 8).

Ver. 4. He is the Rock.] Always endures, and never changes; so that in him we may find at all times a sure refuge.

His work is perfect.] Whatsoever he undertakes, he perfects and completes it.

For all his ways are judgment.] He doth nothing without the greatest reason, and according to the rules of the exactest justice.

A God of truth.] Who is faithful to his promises.

Without iniquity.] And never deceives or wrongs any man.

Just and right is he.] Nor will he punish any man without a cause, or more than he deserves.

Maimonides takes the first words of this verse, "He is the Rock," to signify the first principle, and the efficient cause of all things without himself. For so the word Rock is used, when God bids the children of Israel "look to the rock out of which they were hewn" Isa. li. 1), that is, to Abraham their father, from whom they were descended. And so he thinks it signifies, ver. 18, of this chapter, "Of the Rock that begat thee, thou art unmindful," i. e. of God, the author of their being. And again, ver. 30, "their Rock (i. e. the Lord) sold them" (see More Nevochim, par. i. cap. 16). And then by the next words, his ways are judgment: a God of truth and without iniquity, just and right is he.

5 They have corrupted themselves, their spot is not the spot of his children: they are a perverse and crooked generation.

"his way is perfect," he thinks is meant, that as he is the creator of all things, so there is no defect or superfluity in his works. For he takes these words to be the same with those, Gen. i. 31, "God saw every thing that he had made, and, behold, it was very good" (see there, par. ii. cap. 28, and par. iii. cap. 25). And as his works of creation are most perfect, so are his works of providence; for he governs the world with the greatest judgment and justice. So he seems to understand the next words (par. iii. cap. 17), "all his ways are judgment." We are ignorant of the methods and reasons of his judgments, yet no injustice or iniquity is to be ascribed to him. But all the evil and all the good that befalls any man, or the whole church, proceeds from the just and equal judgment of God. And more largely, cap. 49, "Our narrow minds cannot apprehend either the perfection of his works, or the equity of his judgments; for we apprehend his admirable works only by parts, whether we look upon the bodies of animals, or the celestial spheres: and in like manner we apprehend but a little of his judgments; for that of which we are ignorant in both, is far more than that which we know of either." I conclude this with the words of the author of Sepher Cosri (par. iii. sect. 11), "He that believes this, that 'all God's works are perfect, and his ways judgment,' will always lead a sweet and pleasant life: all afflictions will be made light to him, nay, he will rejoice that his iniquities are hereby alleviated, and that he shall one day be rewarded for his patience; which he teaches men by his example, and thereby justifies the judgments of God." With respect to which, I suppose, the Jews now begin the prayer which they make at the burial of their dead, with this verse of Moses's song. Which prayer they call tziduck haddin, i. e. "just judgment," as Leo Modena observes, in his History of the present Jews, par. v. ch. 8.

Ver. 5. They have corrupted themselves, &c.] I know not how to justify this translation, nor that in the margin, "He hath corrupted himself." Maimonides translates them better; making these words a question, and the next words an answer to them, in this manner; "Did he (i. e. God, the Rock before spoken of) do him any hurt?" For the Hebrew word scecheth, with lamed after it, signifies to hurt, or destroy, Numb. xxxii. 15; 1 Sam. xxxiii. 10 (as Joh. Cocecius observes, in his Ultima Mosis, sect. 701). And so the meaning is, "Is God to blame for the evils that befall him? i. e. Israel." Unto which the answer follows in the next words, which we thus translate—

Their spot is not the spot of his children.] In the Hebrew the first word of this sentence is lo, i. e. not, or no. Which the accent tipcha (as they call it) under it, shows is not to be joined with the words that follow (banau munam), but taken by itself, being a denial of the foregoing question. And these words are thus to be translated, "No, his children are their blot;" i. e. all the evil that befalls them is the fruit of their children's wickedness. And so these words are in effect the same with those of Solomon, Prov. xix., "The foolishness of man perverteth his way, and his heart fretteth against the Lord;" he complains of God, when the fault is in himself (see More Nevochim, par. iii. cap. 12).

Onkelos translates it thus: "They corrupted to themselves, not to him, children that served idols;"

6 Do ye thus requite the LORD, O foolish people and unwise? is not he thy father that hath bought thee? hath he not made thee, and established thee?

7 ¶ Remember the days of old, consider the years of many generations: ask thy father, and he will shew thee; thy elders, and they will tell thee.

8 When the Most High divided to the nations their inheritance, when he separated the sons of Adam, he set the bounds of the people according to the number of the children of Israel.

9 For the LORD's portion is his people; Jacob is the lot of his inheritance.

10 He found him in a desert land, and in the waste howling wilderness; he led him about, he instructed him, he kept him as the apple of his eye.

i. e. as Paulus Fagius observes, They hurt themselves, not God, when, leaving him, the true God, they turned to idols; for the word corrupt is commonly used in Scripture, where it speaks of the sin of idolatry. The Jerusalem paraphrast aims at the same sense.

They are a perverse and crooked generation.] The whole body of them are untoward and untractable, walking contrary to God in all their ways; for there being a gemination (as they speak) of a syllable in the latter of these words (pethalthol), it increases the sense, and makes it the same with the superlative degree among us, importing the highest obliquity imaginable. And these words were never more exactly fulfilled than in the days of our blessed Saviour, who calls them a wicked and adulterous, a faithless and perverse generation (Matt. xvi. 4, xvii. 17). And in the days of the apostles, who call them ἀνότοις, "an absurd kind of people" (2 Thess. iii. 3), who pleased not God, and were contrary to all men" (1 Thess. ii. 15).

Ver. 6. Do ye thus requite the Lord.] He upbraids them with their senseless folly and foul ingratitude; which in the following words he demonstrates, by representing the obligations he had laid upon them.

Is not he thy father?] Having adopted them in a peculiar manner to be his children, above all other people.

That hath bought thee?] When he rescued them from the slavery of Egypt.

Hath he not made thee.] Advanced them (for so the word asa is translated, 1 Sam. xii. 6) to be a great and mighty people (see Ps. c. 3).

Established thee?] By settling them in excellent order, under the government of most wise and righteous laws (see the fourth chapter of this book, ver. 7, 8).

Ver. 7. Remember the days of old.] Look back as far as you are able.

Consider the years of many generations.] Consult the most ancient records; which would inform them how God chose their father Abraham long ago, and promised to bless his posterity, as he did Isaac and Jacob in a most eminent manner; and sent Joseph by a wonderful providence into Egypt to preserve them from starving, &c.

Ask thy father, and he will shew thee: thy elders, and they will tell thee.] All this is to express the same thing, that they should advise with those that knew more than themselves; and particularly with old men (as the word may be understood which we translate elders), who, by the benefit of their great age, had heard and seen more than others, and could tell them how God had dealt with them, ever since he brought them, by a wonderful power, out of the land of Egypt.

Ver. 8. When the Most High divided to the nations their inheritance.] He directs them still to look farther back, and they would find that long before Abraham's time God had them in his thoughts, even when he divided the earth among the sons of Noah and their posterity after the flood (Gen. x. 5, 25, 32).

When he separated the sons of Adam.] Or, "the sons of men;" who were one people, till he scattered them into several parts of the earth, and separated them into divers nations by confounding their language (Gen. xi. 8, 9).

He set the bounds of the people.] He had then the children of Israel in his mind, before they were a nation; and made such a distribution to other people (particularly to the seven nations of Canaan), within such bounds and limits, as that there might be sufficient room for so numerous a people as the Israelites when they came to take possession of that country.

How the LXX. came to translate these words thus, "He appointed the bounds of the nations according to the number of the angels," it is hard to say. Bochart hath made the best conjecture about it (which was hinted by De Muis before him), lib. i. Phaleg, cap. 15, that they had a bad copy before them, which left out the first three letters of Israel; and so they read Baneel, the children of God, meaning the Israelites. Instead of which some transcribers put the angels of God, because they are sometimes called his sons. Which led the ancient Greek fathers, who followed this translation, into great difficulties: and it grew a common opinion, that every nation was under the government of an angel; which seems to be the meaning also of the son of Sirach, Eccles. xvii. 17. And many others fancying that God divided the nations according to the number of the children of Israel, when they came into Egypt, which was just seventy, they thence gather there were just so many distinct nations, and so many several languages; which is a conceit of some of the Jews, as Mr. Selden observes, lib. ii. De Synedr. cap. 9. But Bochart, in the place above named, hath given the plain and simple meaning of this place in these words; "God so distributed the earth among the several people that were therein, that he reserved, or in his counsel designed such a part of the earth for the Israelites, who were then unborn, as he knew would afford a commodious habitation to a most numerous nation.

Ver. 9. For the Lord's portion is his people.] And not satisfied with this kindness, he chose them alone, out of all other nations, to be under his special care, and to enjoy singular privileges, which none other had; and therefore they are called his "peculiar treasure" (Exod. xix. 5). This Origen maintains to be true against all the cavils of Celsus, lib. v. p. 250, edit. Cantabr., where he shows how beneficial their laws were; and that they were taught so early to know God, to believe the immortality of the soul, and rewards and punishments in the life to come, as demonstrated they were distinguished from all other people whatsoever (see p. 260).

Jacob is the lot of his inheritance.] This is the same thing repeated in other words; alluding to the manner of measuring and dividing lands by cords, as the word in the Hebrew is, which we translate lot (see Ps. xvi. 6, and ch. 4, of this book, ver. 20).

Ver. 10. He found him in a desert land.] There he first took the Israelites to be his peculiar people; for so the word we translate found frequently signifies. As in Ps. cxvi. 3, "the pains of hell gat hold upon 11 As an eagle stirreth up her nest, fluttereth over her young, spreadeth abroad her wings, taketh them, beareth them on her wings :

12 So the Lord alone did lead him, and there was no strange god with him.

13 He made him ride on the high places of the earth, that he might eat the increase of the fields; and he made him to suck honey out of the rock, and oil out of the flinty rock ;

14 Butter of kine, and milk of sheep, with fat of lambs, and rams of the breed of Bashan, and goats, with the fat of kidneys of wheat; and thou didst drink the pure blood of the grape.

me;" where in the Hebrew the words are, "found me." And in the New Testament (Rom. iv. 1), "What shall we say then, that Abraham our father hath found?" that is, attained.

In the waste howling wilderness;] Desolate and void of all sustenance; where nothing was to be heard but the howlings and yellings of wild beasts (Deut. viii. 15).

He led him about,] Conducted the Israelites from place to place (Numb. xxxiii. 1, 2, &c.).

He instructed him,] Gave them his laws (Exod. xx. 1, 2, &c., xxxiv. 1, 10, &c.).

He kept him as the apple of his eye.] Protected and defended them from all dangers with extraordinary care; for there is nothing of which we are more tender than the sight of our eyes; which God hath guarded by several coats and humours, and eye-lids fenced with hairs, to preserve it from hurt. Unto which R. Levi ben Gersom thinks these words allude.

Ver. 11. As an eagle stirreth up her nest, &c.] Eagles are observed to have a most tender affection to their young ones; who are here meant by her nest, as Bochartus observes (it being a common figure used by other authors, to put continens pro contento), whom she provokes to fly (which is meant by stirring up her nest) by fluttering over them with her wings stretched out. Upon which she takes them while they are so weak and feeble that they fail in their attempt to fly, and supporteth them till they recover strength to commit themselves unto the air. See Hierozoicon, par. ii. lib. ii. cap. 3, and I. G. Vossius De Orig. et Progr. Idolol. lib. iii. cap. 77, where he observes, that this kindness to her young ones is chiefly found in the black eagle; though something of it be seen in others; which may be the reason they lay but a few eggs, because they are not able to educate many young ones with such tender care.

Ver. 12. So the Lord alone did lead him,] Numb. xiv. 14. This is an exact resemblance of God's tender care of his people Israel. Whom he solicited, by Moses and Aaron, to aspire after their liberty, when they were oppressed in Egypt; just as an eagle excites her young ones, when they lie drowsy in the filth of their nest, to fly away. And as the eagle flutters over them, with her wings spread abroad, so God by his Spirit moved the Israelites to be obedient to their deliverers out of Egypt. For Moses uses the very same word, when he speaks of the Spirit of God "moving upon the waters," Gen. i. 2. And as the eagle carries her fainting young ones on her wings, so God supported them when they were weary, and upheld them in dangerous ways. Inasmuch, that he is said to carry them in his arms, as a father doth his child (Deut. i. 31; Hosea i. 1, 3), see Bochartus in the place above named, cap. 4.

There was no strange God with him,] To help or assist him: but by his almighty power alone they were protected and preserved. Which made their sin the more heinous, in sacrificing to other gods (ver. 17), as if they had been their benefactors.

Ver. 13. He made him ride on the high places of the earth.] Brought the Israelites in a triumphant manner to possess a noble country, full of lofty and very fruitful mountains, which were in Canaan, where they lived deliciously. So to ride signifies, as Bochartus thinks, laute et opipare vivere. Which he justifies by that place in Hosea x. 11, "I will make Ephraim to ride; Judah shall plough, and Jacob shall break his clods;" that is, saith he, the people of Israel lived in pleasure, when Judah lived laboriously (par. i. Hierozoic. lib. i. cap. 41). But to ride signifies, also, to subdue and conquer; which may be the meaning here, Ps. xlv. 4, xlvi. 12, and to have dominion and rule, as Maimonides interprets it, in his More Nevochim, par. i. cap. 70. In which sense it is said of God himself, in the next chapter of this book, "He rideth upon the heavens for thy help," ver. 26. And he rideth upon Araboth the highest heavens (Ps. lxxviii. 4).

That he might eat of the increase of the fields;] Abundance of corn and fruit.

He made him to suck honey out of the rock,] Wild honey; which was esteemed an excellent food in that country, and was sometimes found upon the ground, sometimes in the hollow part of trees, and sometimes in the clefts of rocks, as Bochartus observes out of good authors (Hieroz. par. ii. lib. iv. cap. 15). This rock honey seems to be spoken of as the best of this kind, being joined with the finest wheat, Ps. lxxxii. ult.

Oil out of the flinty rock;] No part of this country being barren, but affording something or other for their sustenance; though some say that the olive-tree thrives best in rocky places. Columella himself observes, that it doth not delight either in low places or in high, but, magis modicos clivos amat, "rather loves the sides of moderately-rising hills" (lib. vi. cap. 6). And D. Chytraeus notes, that as the most generous wine is produced upon the Rhine, below Mentz, out of the hardest flints; sic clear locis petrosis sterilibus non infeliciter proveniunt, "so olive-trees grow prosperously in stony and barren places" (tom. i. p. 173).

Ver. 14. Butter of kine,] The use of butter was very ancient among the Hebrews, though lately known to the Greeks (as I observed upon Gen. xviii. 8), and it was accounted an excellent food.

Milk of sheep,] Which the Scripture often mentions (Isa. vii. 21, 22; 1 Cor. ix. 1, 7). And under the word tzon, as hath been often observed, goats also are comprehended, whose milk likewise is mentioned, Prov. xxvii. 27. Aristotle mentions both, and so doth Columella, and a great many others, in Bochart's Hierozoicon, par. i. lib. ii. cap. 45, where he proves that they made butter of these milks, as well as of cows.

With fat of lambs,] Well fed. For carim properly signifies pasture sheep, as the same Bochart there observes (cap. 42).

Rams of the breed of Bashan,] A country famous for excellent pasture; being εὐβορος καὶ ἐνανθής, &c., as St. Cyril calls it (see Numb. xxxii. 1, 4).

And goats,] Of the breed of that country.

With the fat of kidneys of wheat;] The Hebrews call the best of every kind of thing by the name of the fat. And the kidneys of wheat signify large and plump corn, affording great plenty of flour. Cajetan thinks it signifies wheat as big as a kidney; or rather, having that shape, as our kidney-beans have.

15 ¶ But Jeshurun waxed fat, and kicked : thou art waxen fat, thou art grown thick, thou art covered with fatness ; then he forsook God which made him, and lightly esteemed the Rock of his salvation.

16 They provoked him to jealousy with strange

Drink the pure blood of the grape.] Most generous red wine; very clear and bright. So Achil. Tattius, lib. ii. calls wine αἷα βορρῖνον.

Maimonides, in his More Nevochim, par. ii. cap. 47, takes all the expressions in this verse to be metaphorical, signifying (as Onkelos allegorizes them) the possession of all their enemies' cities and goods, after they had poured out their blood like water on the ground.

Ver. 15. Jeshurun waxed fat,] Grew rich, saith Onkelos and the Jerusalem Targum.

And kicked:] Against him who fed him so plentifully and deliciously. It seems to be a metaphor taken from oxen, who, being stirred up with a goad to labour, lift up their heels and kick against him who pricks them forward. So did the Israelites when they were urged and pressed to their duty by the prophets; not only despised, but evil-treated them.

Why Israel is called Jeshurun is not easy to resolve. Jo. Cocecius (in his Ultima Mosis, sect. 973) derives it from Shur, which signifies to see, behold, or descry. From whence, in the future tense and the plural number comes Jeshura, which, by the addition of nun paragogicum, as they speak, makes Jeshurun, that is "The people who had the vision of God." I know nothing more simple, nor more probable than this; which highly aggravated their sin, who, having God so nigh unto them (iv. 7), and their elders having had a sight of him (Exod. xxiv. 10), were so ungrateful as to rebel against him, and worship other gods. Some refer this kicking to their revolt from the house of David; when Jeroboam, to preserve his new kingdom, set up the golden calves, to prevent the return of the people to their old master, by going up to Jerusalem to worship.

Thou art waxen fat, thou art grown thick, thou art covered with fatness;] This variety of expressions is used to signify how exceeding bountifully God had provided for them; and withal, how very wanton and insolent they were grown, as cattle fed in a fat pasture are wont to be. The words with fatness (after covered) are not in the Hebrew, but are well supplied out of other places, particularly Ps. xvii. 10.

Then he forsook God.] The Jerusalem Targum here hath it, "They forsook the Word of God."

Which made him,] Advanced them from a desert where he found them (ver. 6, 10), into a very rich and plentiful country. This was the lamentable effect of their plethora, or fulness; unto which we are all too prone, as an excellent person of our own hath long ago observed. "Even such as seem most upright (saith he) when they wax fat, spurn with the heel, and cast away the memory of their misery, and of God's former mercy, behind their backs. And what was the reason that the Israelites waxed thus full and fat? Only because they did not use that exercise which God had appointed to keep them under, and preserve their hearts from being lifted up (Deut. viii. 11, &c.): "Take heed to thyself, lest when thou hast eaten, and filled thyself, &c., then thy heart be lifted up, and thou forget the Lord thy God, which brought thee out of the land of Egypt, &c. The daily and lively representation, or recognition of their condition there, should have been as usual to them as their meat and drink, yea, as it were, their thanksgivings before and after meats," as our Dr. Jackson speaks, book xi. on the Creed, ch. 34. And Maimonides himself, mentioning those very words, "Lest when thou hast eaten, and filled thyself," &c., very well observes, that to prevent pride and apostasy, which grow out of great plenty, God commanded them to offer their first-fruits before him every year, with a solemn confession, how poor they were in the beginning, and then raised by God to be a mighty people (Deut. xxvi. 5, 6, &c.). For which end the passover was instituted, "That they might remember the day when they came forth out of Egypt all the days of their life" (Deut. xvi. 3). See More Nevoch. par. ii. cap. 39.

And lightly esteemed the Rock of his salvation.] As there was a progress in their insolent forgetfulness of God, expressed in three phrases, which may signify three degrees of their stupidity ("waxen fat, grown thick, and covered with fatness"), so some observe as many degrees of their rebellion: first, they kicked against God, i. e. threw off the yoke of his laws, and refused to observe them; secondly, they "forsook God," and fell into idolatry; and, lastly, they "lightly esteemed the Rock of their salvation." Where the Hebrew word nibbel signifies more than a light esteem; for, if it come from nebelah, a dead carcass (as some think it doth), it denotes the greatest abhorrence, nothing being so much abominated among the Jews as a dead carcass, the touching of which was the highest pollution. And thus J. Cocecius and Campeg. Vitringa understand it; who observe that this was never so fulfilled as in their behaviour towards our Lord Christ, who was indeed the Rock of their salvation, and so vilely used by them, as if he had been the most loathsome man upon earth. So Vitringa expounds these words (in his Observ. Sacr. lib. ii. cap. 9, p. 173), "instar flagitii tractavit rupem salutis sue." For this is a word used by God himself, when he would express his utter detestation of Nineveh, and his dealing with her according to her abominable wickedness, Nahum iii. 6: "I will cast abominable filth upon thee, and make thee vile." &c., and when he speaks of the disgrace he would put upon his own temple, Jer. xiv. 21. The LXX. indeed simply expound the word ἀπέστρεψε, "he departed;" but the last words they expound ἀπό τοῦ Θεοῦ σωτήρος αὐτοῦ "from God his Saviour." as Onkelos also, "his most mighty Redeemer." Which, in the most eminent sense, is the Lord Jesus; for none brought such salvation to them, and wrought such a redemption for them, as he did, who is "the stone which God laid in Zion," &c. (Isa. xxviii. 16). But instead of flying to him, as men in danger do to a rock, or strong fortress, they not only rejected him, but abused and put the highest indignities upon him.

Ver. 16. They provoked him to jealousy] Made him extremely angry with them. For so jealousy is described as the rage of a man, Prov. vi. 34.

With strange gods,] Whom they fell in love withal, and worshipped. This was the ground of his jealousy, their falseness to God, who had espoused them to himself. And the Hebrew word zar (strange) we sometimes translate another (Job xix. 27). So that a strange god and another god are the same (Ps. lxxxii. 9; Exod. xx. 3). Therefore God saith, he will not give his glory to another (Isa. xlii. 8), and that their sorrows shall be multiplied that "hasten after another god" (Ps. xvi. 4).

With abominations provoked they him to anger.] I take this to be a repetition of the same thing, their idols being called abominations, because God exceedingly hates them (vii. 25; 1 Kings xi. 5). Though R. Solomon and Abarinel, by abominations, here gods, with abominations provoked they him to anger.

17 They sacrificed unto devils, not to God; to gods whom they knew not, to new gods that came newly up, whom your fathers feared not.

18 Of the Rock that begat thee thou art unmindful, and hast forgotten God that formed thee.

19 And when the LORD saw it, he abhorred them, because of the provoking of his sons, and of his daughters.

20 And he said, I will hide my face from them, I will see what their end shall be: for they are a very froward generation, children in whom is no faith.

21 They have moved me to jealousy with that which is not God; they have provoked me to anger with their vanities: and I will understand those filthy mixtures forbidden in Lev. xviii. with witchcrafts, and suchlike wickedness. And Abarinel refers the first part of this verse to the times under the first temple, when they worshipped the sun, moon, and stars; and the latter part of it to the times under the second temple, when, though they were free from idolatry, they were corrupted with other abominable filthiness.

Ver. 17. They sacrificed unto devils, not to God;] The Hebrew word shedim, which we translate devils, imports as much as destroyers (as the devil is called in the book of Revelation, ix. 11); evil spirits delighting in mischief, and leading those that worship them into perdition. Though some think they are called shedim ironically, by way of scorn, the true God being Shaddai, the Omnipotent, and All-sufficient; and these called, by way of mockery, counterfeit gods, who had no power to help their worshippers, nor were sufficient to preserve themselves. Either of these accounts of the word is better than that of Manasseh ben Israel, who derives it from שׂרף a field, because they frequent desert places. But then they should have been called sedim, not shedim, as he must needs know, who was a great master in the Hebrew learning. The LXX. call them here δαίμονια, and so doth the apostle, 1 Cor. x. 19, because the demons led men into the impiety of worshipping other gods, either themselves or other beings, which they persuaded simple people had some divinity in them; and that not only the stars, but even beasts here upon the earth, nay, onions and garlic, which they did not take to be gods, but things by which, as intermediate causes, their gods were pleased or offended with them, and therefore worshipped them.

To gods whom they knew not.] Or, as the words may be translated, "gods that knew not them," that is, had never bestowed any benefits upon them: for, as it follows, they were new gods, never before heard of by their ancestors.

New gods that came newly up,] Such as Jeroboam's calves, invented out of his own brain; and the gods of other nations, Moloch and Baal, which were new to the Israelites, and had not been known among them; for the demon gods were of no great antiquity: Bel, or Baal (as he is called in the Chaldee dialect), the first king of Babel after Nimrod, being the first that ever was deified (as Mr. Mede observes), or reputed a god after his death; whence all other demons were called Baalim, as all the Roman emperors were called Cæsars, from the first emperor of that name (see p. 776). Besides which, the heathens had another higher sort of demons, which had never been linked to a mortal body, viz., those we call angels, whom the Israelites were taught to believe to be but ministers unto their God, and therefore not to be worshipped.

Whom your fathers feared not.] That is, did not worship. This was a great aggravation of their guilt, that when they would have other objects of worship, they did not return unto those whom their ancestors had revered (the Teraphim, for instance, which were the gods of Laban and Rachel), for whose worship they might have pretended tradition; but chose gods whom their forefathers were not acquainted withal; which was a token of a strange proneness to idolatry. And Maimonides, mentioning this verse, observes, that they worshipped not only things that had a being, but mere imaginations; for which he quotes these words of the book Siphri: "It was not enough that they worshipped the sun, moon, and stars, and celestial signs, but they worshipped their shadow" (More Nevochim, par. iiii. cap. 46).

Ver. 18. Of the Rock that begat thee] God, the author of thy being. See ver. 4.

Thou art unmindful,] Being wholly intent on idols which they themselves have made.

Hast forgotten God that formed thee.] Into a kingdom of priests, making them his peculiar people (Exod. xix. 5, 6).

Ver. 19. He abhorred them,] Cast them off, as they had done him.

Because of the provoking of his sons, and of his daughters.] For so they were till they corrupted themselves, and thereby highly incensed him against them: for nothing can be so provoking as the rebellion of children against a most indulgent parent. Maimonides translates it, "By reason of his anger against his sons and his daughters," More Nevochim, par. i. cap. 36, where he observes, we never find the word caas (which is here used, signifying indignation) in Scripture applied to God, but only when it speaks of idolatry.

Ver. 20. He said,] Resolved.

I will hide my face from them,] See xxxi. 17, 18.

I will see what their end shall be:] Not cease my judgments till I have brought the sorest calamities upon them, and made an end of them, that is, of their polity and government.

A very froward generation.] Incorrigibly wicked.

Children in whom is no faith.] Who had broken their covenant with him (xxxii. 16) so often, that they were not to be trusted when they made profession of repentance. The book of Judges, and indeed their whole history, testifies to the truth of this.

Ver. 21. Moved me to jealousy] See ver. 16.

With that which is not God;] By worshipping God's creatures, or the work of their own hands.

Provoked me to anger with their vanities:] The same thing, in other words; all the gods of the nations whom the Israelites imitated, being mere vanities (or things of nought, as the Jerusalem Targum hath it), as hath been often observed.

I will move them to jealousy] He threatens to be even with them, and serve them in their kind.

With those which are not a people;] Who either were not a nation in being at this time, or so obscure, base, and ignoble, that they were not worthy the name of a nation. The Jews interpret it of the Chaldeans, whom God raised up on a sudden, when nobody would believe it (Hab. i. 5, 6, &c.), to be a terrible scourge to them (see Isa. xliiii. 13).

I will provoke them to anger with a foolish nation.] The Jews thought all nations so except themselves. And, in one sense, all the gentiles were really so: for move them to jealousy with those which are not a people; I will provoke them to anger with a foolish nation.

22 For a fire is kindled in mine anger, and shall burn unto the lowest hell, and shall consume the earth with her increase, and set on fire the foundations of the mountains.

23 I will heap mischiefs upon them; I will spend mine arrows upon them.

24 They shall be burnt with hunger, and devoured by burning heat, and with bitter destruction: I will also send the teeth of beasts upon them, with the poison of serpents of the dust.

25 The sword without, and terror within, shall destroy both the young man and the virgin, the suckling also with the man of gray hairs.

26 I said, I would scatter them into corners, I would make the remembrance of them to cease from among men:

27 Were it not that I feared the wrath of the enemy, lest their adversaries should behave themselves strangely, and lest they should say, nothing was more foolish than to worship creatures meaner than themselves (Jer. x. 8).

The apostle applies this unto the bestowing the blessing of the Messiah, whom the Jews refused, upon the gentile world (Rom. x. 19), which strangely enraged the Jews; as we see when our Saviour first mentioned it, Matt. xxi. 43, 44, &c., and when St. Paul did but speak of going to preach unto them, Acts xxii. 21, 22, and see 1 Thess. ii. 15, 16. And through all ages since it hath made them gnash their teeth to see so many nations subject unto our Saviour, and honour him as God, whom they rejected as the vilest of men.

Ver. 22. For a fire is kindled in mine anger,] Great and sore calamities are compared to fire in Scripture (Ezek. xxx. 8), which God here threatens to send upon them, as the woful effects of his heavy displeasure.

Burnt unto the lowest hell,] Never cease till they have destroyed them. For hell and destruction seem to be the same (Prov. xv. 11). And therefore the lowest hell signifies the depth of misery.

Consume the earth with her increase,] Make an utter desolation in the country (Isa. i. 7).

Set on fire the foundations of the mountains.] Subvert the strongest fortresses, which were accounted impregnable. Such as Jerusalem (which Rasi thinks is here meant), in whose last destruction this was perfectly fulfilled, as it was in part at the first (2 Kings xxv. 9). For Titus himself, as Josephus relates (lib. vii. De Bello Judaico, cap. 43), observing the vast height of the walls, the bigness of every stone, the exact order wherein they were laid and compacted, &c., cried out—God was with us in this war, he drove the Jews from these munitions, ἐπεὶ χεῖρές τε τῶν ἀνδρώπων, ἢ μηχαναί, τί πρὸς τοὺς τοῖς πυργῶν δύνανται; “for what could men’s hands or machines do against such towers?” Which calls to mind what is related, not only by St. Chrysostom, Sozomen, Socrates, but by Ammianus Marcellinus himself, a heathen historian (lib. xliii. beginning) how that when Julian the apostate ordered the temple of Jerusalem to be rebuilt, terrible globes of fire burst out, prope fundamenta, “from the very foundations,” which overturned all, burnt the workmen, and made the place so inaccessible that they desisted from the attempt. The certainty of this hath extorted the same confession from the Jews themselves (David Ganz, in his Tzemach David, and R. Gedaliah, in Schal. Hakkabala), though they pretend the building went on and was finished, but after many years overthrown by an earthquake.

Ver. 23. I will heap mischiefs upon them;] Which shall miserably oppress and crush them.

Spend mine arrows upon them.] His judgments and plagues are often compared to arrows shot at them (Ps. vii. 12, 13, xxxvii. 2, xci. 5). And he speaks in the language of an archer who shoots till he hath emptied his quiver, and hath not one arrow left.

Ver. 24. They shall be burnt with hunger,] This verse and the next explain what he means by arrows, which are here enumerated. And, first, he threatens a famine, with which he saith they should be burnt; either because these judgments are compared to fire, ver. 22, or because extreme hunger parches the inward parts, and makes the visage “as black as a coal,” as Jeremiah speaks, Lam. iv. 8.

Devoured with burning heat,] With fevers and calentures, as they are called in hot countries.

With bitter destruction.] With the pestilence; which he calls bitter, because it was incurable.

I will send the teeth of wild beasts upon them.] This was another of the sore judgments which God threatened to their disobedience (see Lev. xxvi. 22). Upon which Maimonides observed, that magicians were wont to promise them, by their arts, to free their cities, fields, and plantations from lions and serpents, and such like hurtful creatures; unto whose power God delivered them, because they forsook him, and followed idolaters and magicians (More Nevoch. par. iii. cap. 37).

With the poison of serpents of the dust.] Whose bitings were deadly. And they were exposed to them, as well as to wild beasts, when they were forced to fly into wildernesses, and hide themselves in dens and caves; where some of them could not avoid being devoured by wild beasts and bitten by serpents, which lay lurking in those holes. So Cocceius, in his Ultima Mosis, sect. 1271, where he notes also that this was fulfilled in part when they were thrown by the Romans to wild beasts in the theatres, as Josephus relates, lib. vi. De Bello Judaico, cap. 16, 20.

Ver. 25. The sword without, and terror within, shall destroy] They could nowhere be safe; for in the field the sword of their enemies cut them off, and at home they did not think themselves secure in their closest chamber, but died with fear, or made away themselves, lest they should fall into the hands of those that sought to destroy them (see Lam. i. 20). Or, perhaps, by the terror within, may be meant famine and pestilence (Ezek. vii. 15).

Both the young man and the virgin, &c.] He threatens to deliver them into such merciless hands as would spare none, nor make any difference of sex or of age. This Hueter refers to the last destruction of Jerusalem, in his Demonstr. Evang. propos. ix. cap. 173, and Abarinel also confesses it was then fulfilled.

Ver. 26. I said,] i. e. Resolved.

Make the remembrance of them to cease] Utterly destroy them, so that not one of them should be found; and if any remained they should skulk, and not dare to appear among men.

Ver. 27. I were it not that I feared the wrath of the enemy,] He that is omnipotent is not capable of fearing any thing: but he speaks in our language, and gives this reason why he did not make them cease to be a nation, because he would not have their enemies insult and grow outrageous in their insolent lan-

Our hand is high, and the LORD hath not done all this.

28 For they are a nation void of counsel, neither is there any understanding in them.

29 O that they were wise, that they understood this, that they would consider their latter end!

30 How should one chase a thousand, and guage, even against himself. Of which we find an instance, Isa. xxxvii. 28, 29.

[Lest their adversaries should behave themselves strangely,] Ascribe all this to their false gods (as Cocecius understands it), which are called "strange gods" (ver. 16).

[Lest they should say, Our hand is high,] Imagine their own power and valour had destroyed the Jews; as both the Assyrians and Chaldeans boasted (Isa. x. 7, 8, &c. Hab. i. 13, 16).

[The Lord hath not done all this.] And attribute nothing to the Most High in all the business. Certain it is, the wickedness of the Jews was so exceeding great, that their final extirpation had been accomplished many generations before it came to pass, had the Lord been only just, and respected nothing but their deserts, whom he very often preserved when they might have been justly destroyed, for such reasons as he himself here gives: that his glory might not be impeached among the nations, but they might see by the strange deliverances and restorations of the Jews, that "their God was a God of gods," most worthy to be honoured by all the world, as he himself speaks below, ver. 36. So Dr. Jackson well observes, book i. on the Creed, ch. 22, sect. 4.

The marginal translation of this last clause is also agreeable to the Hebrew, "Our high hand, and not the Lord, hath done all this." To prevent which wrong construction of God's judgments upon them, he took such a time for the execution of them (as Conradus Pellicanus well observes), when the world began to be better instructed by the coming of Christ. So that Titus himself said, as I noted before, that it was God, and not the hands of the Romans, that destroyed them (see xxix. 24, and this chapter, ver. 22).

Ver. 28. For they are a nation void of counsel,] The Hebrew word abad (which is commonly translated perish, and here we translate void) signifies, in the Ethiopic language, is foolish or mad, as Job Ludolphus observes in his excellent history of that country. Which makes it probable this was the ancient sense of the word among the Hebrews, and gives the best account of this place, which may be thus translated, "They are a nation foolish in their counsel." Whose counsels led them to such courses as utterly undid them: and when they seemed most wise they madly ruined themselves. And thus those words of Jeremiah may be best translated, "The heart of the king is foolish" (iv. 9).

[Neither is there any understanding in them.] They did not understand what was good for themselves; but imprudently chose that which did them mischief. Some refer this to the enemies of the Jews before spoken of: but that seems not so agreeable to what follows, which relates to the same person, and most likely expresses God's compassion towards the senseless Jews. Huetius applies this to their stupid blindness at their last destruction; which they were so far from preventing, that they drew it upon themselves, as Josephus shows (see xxviii. 28, 29).

Ver. 29. O that they were wise,] So as seriously to consider God's dealing with them exactly according to what he foretold them.

two put ten thousand to flight, except their Rock had sold them, and the LORD had shut them up?

31 For their rock is not as our Rock, even our enemies themselves being judges.

32 For their vine is of the vine of Sodom, and of the fields of Gomorrah: their grapes are grapes of gall, their clusters are bitter:

[That they understood this, &c.] Or, as it may be translated, "Then would they understand this, they would consider their latter end." They would soon perceive the hand of God in all that is befallen them; and that if they do not change their course, they will, in the conclusion, be utterly undone.

Ver. 30. How should one chase a thousand, and two put ten thousand to flight,] Whence should such an amazing change proceed? that the Israelites, who formerly with a handful of men put vast armies to flight (Lev. xxvi. 8) should now, though never so numerous, be beaten by one or two of their enemies, fleeing when none pursues them? (Lev. xxvi. 17, 36, 37; Deut. xxviii. 25).

[Except their Rock had sold them,] A little consideration was sufficient to make them understand, that this had been impossible, if they had not forsaken their God; who thereupon delivered them up to the will of their enemies. For by their Rock is meant God; and his selling them is his quitting his interest in them, and giving them up to be slaves to those that hated them.

[The Lord had shut them up?] So that they could not escape the hands of their enemies.

Ver. 31. For their rock is not as our Rock,] None of the gods of the heathen (whom he calls their rock, because they relied on them for safety) have such power as he that gave us our being. So Maimonides interprets the word tzur, "the spring and fountain of all things."

[Our enemies—being judges.] Who were often forced to acknowledge his overruling power and providence, controlling all their designs. As the Egyptians confessed, Exod. xiv. 2, 5, and Balaam, Numb. xxiii. 19, 22, and the Philistines, 1 Sam. iv. 7, 8, and the king of Babylon, Dan. iii. 29.

Ver. 32. For their vine is of the vine of Sodom, and of the fields of Gomorrah:] I suppose he speaks here of the Israelites (giving an account why their enemies so shamefully chased them, ver. 30) who are compared to a vine, which God brought out of Egypt, and planted in Canaan (Ps. lxxx. 8). And the prophet afterward calls them "the plant of his pleasure" (Isa. v. 7). Which was an ancient resemblance, as appears by this place; where he represents them as such a degenerate people, that they were as bad (nay, worse, as the marginal translation is) as the Sodomites, or the people of Gomorrah: and therefore deserved (ver. 26) to be utterly destroyed, as they were (see Isa. i. 10; Jer. ii. 21).

[Their grapes are grapes of gall, their clusters are bitter:] These words represent their actions (called fruit in Scripture) to be so wicked that they were not to be endured. And so Josephus describes them before their last destruction, lib. vi. De Bello Judaico, cap. ult. where he saith, if the Romans had delayed to fall upon such a wicked people, he thinks either the earth would have opened its mouth and swallowed them up, or a flood drowned their city, or thunder and lightning from heaven destroyed it, as it did Sodom. Πολύ γὰρ τῶν ταῦτα παρόντων ἤνευκε γενεῶν ἀδελφείραν, "for they were a more atheistical generation than they who suffered such things." And again (lib. vii. cap. 30), he saith, that the time when they were de-

33 Their wine is the poison of dragons, and the cruel venom of asps.

34 Is not this laid up in store with me, and sealed up among my treasures?

35 To me belongeth vengeance, and recompence; their foot shall slide in due time: for the day of their calamity is at hand, and the things that shall come upon them make haste.

36 For the Lord shall judge his people, and repent himself for his servants, when he seeth that their power is gone, and there is none shut up, or left.

37 And he shall say, Where are their gods, their rock in whom they trusted, 38 Which did eat the fat of their sacrifices, and drank the wine of their drink offerings? let them rise up and help you, and be your protection.

39 See now that I, even I, am he, and there is no god with me: I kill, and I make alive; I stroyed was so fruitful in all manner of wickedness among the Jews, ὡς μηδὲν κακίας ἔργον ἀπραχόν καταλείπειν, "that there was no one work of wickedness that was not committed; nor can one imagine any thing so bad that they did not do; endeavouring publicly, as well as privately, to excel one another both in impiety towards God and injustice to their neighbours."

Ver. 33. Their wine is the poison of dragons.] This still represents their fruit, that is, their works, to be most pernicious, being compared to the poison of dragons. Many authors, indeed, say that dragons have no poison in them (as B. Chytræus and others observe); but as the Hebrew word thaanim signifies any kind of serpent, so it is certain that the dragons of Africa and Arabia had a deadly poison in them, though those of Greece had not; as the famous Bochartus shows at large, in his Hierozoicon, par. ii. lib. iii. cap. 14. Who also observes, in another place, that the Hebrew word rash signifying both the head and also poison; the poison of serpents lies partly in their gall, partly in their teeth, and partly in a little bladder under their tongue (par. i. lib. i. cap. 4).

The cruel venom of asps.] The poison of asps is called cruel, because it is accounted the acutest of all others, instantly penetrating into the vital parts. Whence the proverb δῆγμα ἀσπίδων, "the biting of asps," for an incurable wound. For they who are bitten by an asp seldom escape with their life; as Aristote, Pliny, and a great many other authors observe, in Bochart, par. ii. lib. iii. cap. 5.

Ver. 34. Is not this] That is, the vengeance he is going to speak of in the following verses. For this particle hu often refers to what comes after, not to what goes before, as Cocceius observes.

Laid up in store] To be produced in due time.

Sealed up among my treasures?] He speaks of it as a matter determined or decreed, as deeds are which are signed and sealed, though not presently executed, but kept safely in a cabinet. And the meaning of this verse is, that though he do not speedily punish evil-doers, it is not because he doth not observe them, or forgets what they do; for he hath prefixed a time to reckon with them, as will appear in the issue.

Ver. 35. To me belongeth vengeance, and recompence;] As the supreme Lord, Governor, and Judge of the world, whose office it is to punish offenders. It is evident the apostle, alleging these words (Rom. xii. 19), ἔμοι ἐκδίκησις, "vengeance is mine" (or to me belongeth vengeance), exactly follows the Hebrew text, and not the present LXX., which render these words ἐν ἡμέρᾳ ἐκδικήσεως ἀναποδώσω, "in the day of vengeance I will recompense."

Their foot shall slide] Though they think themselves unmovably fixed in their dominion, they shall certainly fall.

In due time;] Not so soon, perhaps, as men may expect; but when the great Judge of the world sees it most seasonable.

For the day of their calamity is at hand.] When they little thought of it, and prided themselves in their prosperity, God suddenly brought down the Chaldeans, who had been the great instruments of plaguing the Jews (Isa. xlvii. 7—10, &c. Jer. l. 15, 27, 31, li. 6, 8). And so shall the plagues of Babylon the great "come in one day. In one hour her great riches shall come to nought" (Rev. xviii. 8, 10, 17).

Ver. 36. The Lord shall judge his people.] Plead their cause, as the Scripture elsewhere speaks (Jer. l. 34), and deliver them from the oppression of their enemies; as this phrase is often used in the book of Psalms (viii. 8, x. 18).

Repent himself for his servants.] Have mercy upon them (as the Vulgar truly expresses the sense), and turn his hand, which punishes them, upon their enemies (see Jer. l. 23, li. 24).

When he seeth that their power is gone.] That they are not able to help themselves. That it is the due time or season, before mentioned, for God to interpose, when the enemies of his people think themselves irresistible, there being none able to oppose them.

There is none shut up, or left.] Some refer this to persons, and others to things; and either way it signifies their condition to be so forlorn that they could do nothing, either by men or by money, for their deliverance. J. Forsterus translates these words, custoditum aut neglectum, i. e. "precious or vile." By which wonderful deliverance and restoration, when they were so totally destitute of all help, all the world was given to understand that there is no God like unto the Lord.

Ver. 37. He shall say,] Or, "It shall be said."

Where are their gods, their rock in whom they trusted.] It is dubious whether these words be directed to the Jews or to the gentiles who had oppressed them. It seems most agreeable to take them as a reproach to the enemies of the Jews, who had long bragged of the power of their gods, and ascribed all their success to them (ver. 27), who now could not deliver them in their distress, &c.

Ver. 38. Which did eat the fat of their sacrifices, &c.] For the same rites were used among the gentiles as among the Jews; who offered all the fat upon the altar, and there poured out the wine which accompanied the meat-offering, &c. (see Numb. xv.). The LXX. refer this to the worshippers themselves, and translate it thus (agreeably enough to the Hebrew), "The fat of whose sacrifices ye ate, and drank the wine of their drink-offerings." And Onkelos to the same purpose.

Let them rise up and help you, and be your protection.] From the calamity which was unavoidably coming upon them (Isa. xlvii. 1, 2, 7; Jer. li. 17, 18).

Ver. 39. See now] Open your eyes now at last, and be convinced, by your sad experience, of your error.

That I, even I, am he,] That it is I, and none but I, who have made these changes in the world: first making you instruments in punishing my people; and now inflicting the like punishments upon you (Jer. li. 24, 25, 49).

The words in the Hebrew being, I, I, am he, the author of the old Nitzæon was sensible that we wound, and I heal: neither is there any that can deliver out of my hand.

40 For I lift up my hand to heaven, and say, I live for ever.

41 If I whet my glittering sword, and mine hand take hold on judgment; I will render vengeance to mine enemies, and will reward them that hate me.

Christians might hence observe, that there are two who are here called God, the Father and the Son. And therefore takes care to inform his reader, that there are not two first principles of things. Which, as no Christian is so foolish as to affirm, so their own authors have acknowledged more persons than one, here called God. Thus Jonathan, in his paraphrase, plainly supposes another person in the Divinity, whom he calls the Word, when he thus explains this verse: "When the Word of the Lord shall reveal himself to redeem his people, he shall say to all people, I am he that have been, and am, and shall be (see Rev. i. 8), and by my word kill and make alive. I smote the people of Israel, and I will heal them in the end of the days." Which makes these words a plain prophecy of the Messiah, and him to be God. And so the Jerusalem Targum: "See, that I now am he in my Word, and there is no god besides me: I am he who kill the living in this world, and raise the dead in the world to come," &c.

There is no god with me.] As I have no superior, so neither have I any equal.

I kill, and I make alive.] If I please to destroy any people for their sins none can hinder me; and if any repent and implore my mercy, I restore them to perfect safety. R. Isaac, in his Chissuk Emuna (par. i. cap. 6, sect. 20), alleges these words as a prophecy of the resurrection of the dead in the days of the Messiah. And in another place (cap. 10), he alleges them as an effectual confutation of those ancient heretics who imagined two supreme powers; one of them, the author of all good; and the other, the author of all evil (which I observed upon Lev. xvi. to have been a very ancient opinion): for there could not be, they fancied, the same care which had an influence upon both. To remove which false conceit, God declares, I kill, as well as make alive, &c. And for the same reason he saith, in Isa. xlv. 7, "I form the light, and create darkness; I make peace, and create evil; I the Lord do all these things."

Neither is there any that can deliver.] Nor can any reverse the judgment that I pass upon men.

Ver. 40. For I lift up my hand to heaven.] Swear solemnly to do what follows; viz. be revenged on his enemies, as well as deliver his people. Thus Abraham anciently swore, Gen. xiv. 22. And when God promised to bring the Israelites into Canaan, he is said "to lift up his hand" (Exod. vi. 8; Neh. ix. 15). From whence some think the word promittere is derived, signifying to engage by stretching out the hand; and that from thence sprang the custom of stretching out, and lifting up their hand, when they swear. Which the gentiles practised, as those known words of Virgil informs us, Æneid. xii.

"Suspiciens cælum tenditque ad ðbera dextram."

When God therefore is said to lift up his hand to heaven, the meaning is, he swears by himself; as it here follows.

I live for ever.] As sure as I live.

Ver. 41. If I whet my glittering sword.] Make all things ready for the execution of my judgments.

Mine hand take hold on judgment.] I begin to punish. I will render vengeance to mine enemies.] None 42 I will make mine arrows drunk with blood, and my sword shall devour flesh; and that with the blood of the slain and of the captives, from the beginning of revenges upon the enemy.

43 Rejoice, O ye nations, with his people: for he will avenge the blood of his servants, and will render vengeance to his adversaries, and will be merciful unto his land, and to his people.

shall stop my proceedings, to be fully avenged of them.

Will reward them that hate me.] For, as Jeremiah speaks, li. 56, "The Lord God of recompenses will surely requite. For it is the vengeance of the Lord" (as he speaks in the foregoing chapter concerning Babylon, l. 15). "Take vengeance upon her; as she hath done, do unto her."

Ver. 42. I will make mine arrows drunk with blood.] Make an exceeding great slaughter (Isa. xxxiv. 5, 6).

With the blood of the slain.] This signifies none should be spared: for they should be killed who were taken captive, as well as those who fell in the battle.

From the beginning of revenges upon the enemy.] How the Hebrew word paroth comes to signify revenges, I am not able to give an account; but in that sense we take it both here and in Judges v. 2. The word para, from whence it seems to be derived, signifies to make bare, or naked. And so the Vulgar Latin here understands it; and thence Joh. Forsterus hath given a probable sense of these words (taking rosk, which we translate beginning, for the head, as it properly signifies, or the king), in this manner, "Because of the baring (i. e. making bare) of the head by the enemy;" that is, the taking away of the kingdom and priesthood from Israel. The LXX. translate it ἀπό κεφαλῆς ἀρχόντων ἐχθρῶν, "from the head of the princes of the enemies." Which is a sense very agreeable, if we could find any word in the Hebrew like to paroth that signifies princes or rulers. But I think there is a more simple sense may be given of these words than any of the forementioned, only by supposing the particle lamed to be omitted (as in many other places) before paroth, which is this, "From the king to the slave of the enemies." For they were wont to shave their captives, as every one knows, by way of contempt and scorn. Which is the reason God threatens baldness so often to the Israelites by his prophets, when he was so angry with them, that he gave them up to be slaves. Next to this is the translation of Onkelos, "I will take away (those words he adds) the crowns from the head of the enemy." Which was the making the king's head bare.

This universal slaughter is most notably expressed by Jeremiah, l. 35—37, 43. And some think this prophecy will be then most amply fulfilled, when the Jews shall be called, and made members of the church of Christ (see Dr. Jackson, book. xi. on the Creed, ch. 12).

Ver. 43. Rejoice, O ye nations, with his people.] Here the particle eth is omitted before anna, as I supposed, in the foregoing words, lamed to be before paroth. Which made the Vulgar translate these words, "O ye nations, praise his people." But the LXX. discerned the true sense, and translate it as we do: the apostle having justified their translation in Rom. xv. 10, where he expresses this, word for word, as they do, εὐφρανθήτε ἅθνη μετὰ τοῦ λαοῦ αὐτοῦ, "rejoice ye gentiles with his people." But it must here be noted, that before these words the LXX. have some other, which are very remarkable, εὐφρανθήτε οὐρανοὶ ἅμα αὐτῷ, καὶ προσκυνήσατε αὐτῷ πάντες ἄγγελοι θεοῦ, "rejoice ye heavens together with him, and 44 ¶ And Moses came and spake all the words of this song in the ears of the people, he, and Hoshea the son of Nun.

45 And Moses made an end of speaking all these words to all Israel :

let all the angels of God worship him" (and then follows, "rejoice ye gentiles with his people"), which are not in the Hebrew, nor in the Chaldee, and yet the latter clause of them, προσκυνησάτωσαν αὐτῷ πάντες ἄγγελοι Θεοῦ, "let all the angels of God worship him," are the very words of the apostle, Heb. i. 6, which seem to have been taken from hence out of the LXX., for they are nowhere else to be found in the Scripture. The margin, indeed, of our Bibles refers us to Ps. xvii. 7. But there the words of the LXX. are otherwise, προσκυνησατε αὐτῷ πάντες ἄγγελοι αὐτοῦ, "worship him all ye his angels;" which are in the second person; whereas here, and in the apostle, the words are in the third. We may therefore suppose rather, that the LXX. from ancient tradition among the Jews, added these words, before they translated this verse, to declare unto what time the fulfilling of them should principally belong. For Psalm xvii. seems to be but a descent (as Dr. Jackson's words are) upon this part of Moses's song; from whence the Jews might learn the scope of it. And accordingly the apostle uses the words of the LXX. here in this place, rather than those of the Psalmist; because he would have the Hebrews understand and consider, that Moses himself had predicted the exaltation of the Son of God, as the Psalmist afterward expounded him.

There is another translation of these words of Moses, which is very agreeable to the apostle in Rom. xv. 10, "Rejoice ye nations, who are his people" (see ver. 21 of this chapter). Either way, this is a plain prophecy of the gentiles becoming one body with the people of Israel. And thus Kimchi himself translates it, "Sing ye gentiles, who are his people:" which began to be fulfilled after our Saviour's ascension to the throne of his glory in the heavens, when all the angels of God worshipped him. Hitherto Moses had supposed, in his song, great enmity between them: and that sometimes they had plagued Israel sorely; as at others, God rendered to them according to what they had done unto his people. But now he breaks out into a rapture of joy, to think that they should one day be reconciled, and made one people of God. And the LXX. thus understanding it, might well preface to their translation of this verse, with the words now mentioned, "Rejoice ye heavens together with him." For if there be joy in heaven, as Procopius Gazæus well glosses, at the repentance of one sinner, how much more for the salvation of the whole world, by destroying the devil's tyranny? Which being to be performed, by the advancement of the Son of God into the heavens, the next words might well be added, "Let all the angels of God worship him." Which they had always done (the same Procopius observes) as their God who created them; but now they praise and extol his humanity, exalted at the right hand of God.

For he will avenge the blood of his servants.] These words seem to express some of the motives that should persuade the gentiles to become one body with the Jews (for such the apostles and all the first converts were), God's punishing all those who shed the blood of his servants; as the Christian martyrs are called in the book of the Revelation. In which confidence the LXX. add another sentence before these words, καὶ ἐπισχάσεως αὐτῷ πάντες υἱοὶ Θεοῦ, "and let all the sons of God be strong in him."

46 And he said unto them, Set your hearts unto all the words which I testify among you this day, which ye shall command your children to observe to do, all the words of this law.

47 For it is not a vain thing for you; because

Will render vengeance to his adversaries.] To all such as oppose this blessed union; and first to the Jews, who set themselves against it more than any others (being mad at the apostles for preaching to the gentiles), and then to the Romans, who persecuted all those who embraced Christianity.

Be merciful unto his land.] This cannot be meant of the land of Israel, which was no longer God's land than any other, but of the whole earth (as Conrad. Pellicanus well explains it), in which that one people of God dwells, reduced (as he speaks) in the whole multitude of the faithful into one catholic church. For they all acknowledge, from the greatest to the least, that one only Omnipotent God, with no less devotion and affection, than Abraham, Isaac, Jacob, and Moses did.

To his people.] The whole world that believe in Christ, and are his faithful servants; whose blood he will avenge (Rev. xix. 2), and then set up his tabernacle with men, and dwell with them, and they shall be his people, and he will be their God (Rev. xx. 3); which I mention, because this part of the prophecy reaches unto the last times, and is not yet all fulfilled.

Thus this famous song concludes, which, as the Jews reckon, consists of seventy verses, each of which contains two distinct and entire sentences, and, as they fancy, is a compendium of the whole law of Moses. Nay, some of them (such are the idle conceits of this nation) think this hymn is so perfect a prophecy, that it contains in it the names of all the men in the world; which they undertake to find, and by that versicle where it is, to tell what fortune he, whose name they seek, shall have in the world. Thus, instead of observing seriously what Moses foretold would certainly befall themselves, their superstition and hardness of heart have led them to vain conjectures concerning other men. See J. Wagenseil upon Sota, p. 164, &c., where he saith a Jew undertook to show him his name in this song, which fell out in a verse that signified prosperity to him. And since him Martinus Mauritius, in his book De Sortitione Hebræorum, cap. 16, sect. 3—5.

Ver. 44. Moses—spake all the words of this song] The very same that is said before he spake this song (xxx. 30), and is now repeated at the conclusion of it, to express his fidelity in his office to the very last.

He, and Hoshea] Who was now his assistant in this work, as he was designed to be his successor after his death. He is commonly called Joshua, but Oshea was his name at the first (Numb. xiii. 8).

Ver. 45.] When he had made an end of speaking them, then he added what follows.

Ver. 46. Set your hearts unto all the words] Apply your minds to press upon yourselves the observation of all these things. For this expression is a little more than letting them "be in their heart" (vi. 6), or "laying them up in their heart" (xi. 18). For they were so to retain the remembrance of them, as to attend unto them, and consider them.

Which ye shall command your children.] This necessary duty of instructing their children is often pressed (iv. 10, vi. 7, xi. 19), because without this care their religion would soon be lost; but by this means, might be preserved and propagated to all generations.

All the words of this law.] Which they might be certain was delivered by God to Moses: there being as it is your life: and through this thing ye shall prolong your days in the land, whither ye go over Jordan to possess it.

48 And the LORD spake unto Moses that selfsame day, saying,

49 Get thee up into this mountain Abarim, unto mount Nebo, which is in the land of Moab, that is over against Jericho; and behold the land of Canaan, which I give unto the children of Israel for a possession:

50 And die in the mount whither thou goest many witnesses of God's presence with him, as there were men in their nation. But he had seen so many instances of their unbelief, that he uses all the ways, manners, and forms (as Pellicanus observes), that he could think of, to urge them to obedience: by delivering them tables of their laws written by God himself, by books, by pillars, by blessings, cursings, obstructions, threatenings, long exhortations, songs, phylacteries, and other ceremonies, &c., which he continued to do as long as he had breath and was able to speak, that they, and their posterity, might be happy.

Ver. 47. For it is not a vain thing for you;] You shall not employ your diligence in this matter unprofitably. The Jews upon these words have founded a maxim, which Maimonides often mentions, "That every precept hath its end and use; which (though they do not appear to us) are grounded upon strong causes and reasons" (More Nevochim, par. iii. cap. 26 and 50). The design, for instance, of many ceremonial laws cannot now be fully discerned, because they were instituted directly contrary to the idolatrous rites of the Zabii: which are long since utterly abolished, and but imperfectly recorded in those ancient authors that speak of them.

Because it is your life.] The means to make you a happy people. Here are two benefits, saith R. Isaac, which are promised by the observation of this law; a spiritual and a corporal. The spiritual in these words and the corporal in the next, "ye shall prolong your days," &c. And he puts the spiritual first, though, among all corporal blessings, this of long life be the chief (Chissuk Emuna, par. i. cap. 18).

Through this thing] By teaching your children to observe to do all that is commanded in this law.

Ye shall prolong your days in the land,] Have the great blessing of a long life in all manner of happiness, which your posterity shall enjoy for many generations in the land of Canaan. By which it appears, that nothing else but contempt of this law could have ejected them out of this country.

Ver. 48. The Lord spake unto Moses that selfsame day,] up, and be gathered unto thy people; as Aaron thy brother died in mount Hor, and was gathered unto his people:

51 Because ye trespassed against me among the children of Israel at the waters of Meribah-Kadesh, in the wilderness of Zin; because ye sanctified me not in the midst of the children of Israel.

52 Yet thou shalt see the land before thee; but thou shalt not go thither unto the land which I give the children of Israel.

Immediately after he had ended the foregoing song, and given them this admonition at the conclusion of it.

Ver. 49. Get thee up into this mountain Abarim,] Which he had pointed him unto before, and told him what he doth now (Numb. xxvii. 12).

Unto mount Nebo,] Abarim was a ridge of hills, whereof Nebo was one (see there upon Numb. xxvii. 2).

Which is in the land of Moab,] This is a more particular description of the site of this mountain than he gave before in the book of Numbers.

The land of Canaan, which I give unto the children of Israel] Which he might easily do from the highest part of the mountain called Pisgah (Deut. iii. 27).

Ver. 50. Die in the mount] After he had taken a view of the land every way.

Be gathered unto thy people;] To Abraham, Isaac, and Jacob. This signifies, saith R. Isaac, that he should be associated and joined to the souls of the just, who are called his people. For the people of Moses were not buried in mount Abarim; and therefore he doth not speak of gathering his body to their bodies, but of his soul to their souls (Chissuk Emuna, par. i. cap. 11).

As Aaron] See Numb. xx. 24, 28, xxxiii. 38.

Ver. 51. Because ye trespassed against me] Rebelled against his commandments, as he speaks, Numb. xxvii. 14.

Ye sanctified me not] Numb. xx. 12, xxvii. 14.

Ver. 52. Thou shalt see the land before thee;] He had earnestly begged of God that he might go over Jordan; but he denied him that favour (Deut. i. 37, iii. 25, 27), yet he was pleased to mitigate his punishment, by letting him enjoy a sight of that good country into which he might not enter.

But thou shalt not go thither] By which the Israelites should have learnt, that as Moses left them short of the promised land, and could not bring them into the possession of it; so his law did not contain a perfect revelation of God's will, but they were to expect something beyond it.

CHAPTER XXXIII.

1 The majesty of God. 6 The blessings of the twelve tribes. 26 The excellency of Israel.

1 AND this is the blessing, wherewith Moses the man of God blessed the children of Israel before his death.

CHAP. XXXIII.

Ver. 1. This is the blessing,] As Jacob blessed his children, at his departure out of the world, when God had begun to fulfil the promise to Abraham, of giving him a numerous offspring; so Moses having seen them vastly increase, and ready to enter upon the land promised to them (Gen. xv. 18, &c.), takes his farewell of them, with a blessing pronounced upon the people in general, and upon each tribe in particu-

2 And he said, The LORD came from Sinai, and rose up from Seir unto them; he shined forth from mount Paran, and he came with ten

lar. Which is in part prophetical, as the blessing of Jacob was, and delivered in the prophetic style, which hath some difficulty and obscurity in it; on purpose, perhaps, to excite their diligent study to inquire into the meaning (see Gen. xlix. 1, 3).

Wherewith Moses the man of God] Or, "the prophet of the Lord," as Onkelos translates it: for prophets are called men of God in the holy books (1 Sam. ix. 6—8, 1 Kings xiii. 1, 1 Tim. vi. 11, 2 Tim. iii. 17, thousands of saints : from his right hand went a fiery law for them.

3 Yea, he loved the people ; all his saints

2 Pet. i. 21), because, in the exercise of their sacred function, they did not deliver their own sense, nor the sense of other men, but the mind and will of God who spoke by them.

Blessed the children of Israel before his death.] Before he went up into Mount Abarim to die (xxxii. 49), he prayed God to bless them ; and also foretold their future state and condition. Such had been the ancient custom among the holy patriarchs (as we learn from the example of Jacob), to admonish their posterity upon their dying beds of such things as they thought most imparted them : for then they could not but be thought to speak most sincerely ; and their words were apt to be entertained with greater respect, and preserved in mind with greater care. Moses therefore, their deliverer, leader, and lawgiver, concludes his life in the same manner ; and it is very likely deposited these dying words with them in writing.

Ver. 2. The Lord came from Sinai.] And, in the first place, he endeavours to make them sensible of what God had done already for them : and the chief of all his benefits being the revelation of his mind and will to them, he commemorates that as a common blessing to them all, before he begins to speak in particular to each tribe : for that is meant by "the Lord came from Sinai ;" where he appeared in a most particular manner, and from thence promulgated his law with the greatest solemnity (Exod. xx.). And thus the gentiles took an unwonted brightness in any place to be a token of the Ἐκφάνεια, "appearance," or "advent," of some of their gods in that place. As also a great commotion in any place, they took for another token of it. See the illustrious Spanhemius, in his annotations upon Callimachus's hymn to Apollo, ver. 7, which they seem to have learnt from this appearance of God on Mount Sinai, and the quaking of that mountain, when God appeared on it.

Rose up from Seir unto them ; he shined forth from mount Paran.] There is no difficulty in the foregoing words, it being evident that God came down on Mount Sinai, and thence delivered his commands to the Israelites, and espoused them for his people. But how he rose up from Seir unto them, the country of Edom, and shone from Paran, the country of Ishmael, is not so easy to understand. The Jews, indeed, who are wont to solve all difficulties, by inventing what they please, are not troubled to give an account of these words ; which signify, they fancy, that the Divine Glory first resided upon Mount Seir, where God propounded his law to the children of Esau ; but they would not have it, because they found these words in it, "Thou shalt not kill ;" he went, therefore, to Paran, and offered it to the children of Ishmael, but they refused it also, because they found these words in it, "Thou shalt not steal ;" so he came to Sinai, and gave it to the Israelites, who said, "All the words which the Lord hath said will we do," Exod. xxiv. 3. Thus the Jerusalem Targum, and Pirke Eliezer, and some other more ancient authors, with this addition, that he offered the law to all the nations of the world, but they rejected it, because it was written, "Thou shalt have none other gods but me." But this looks so like a fable, that some of themselves are ashamed of it, and have given a better sense of the words, though I cannot say the true one. For thus Abraham Peritsof expounds them, "The true law came out of Sinai to the Israelites, by which the Edomites were so enlightened, that God might be said to rise up to them also : and afterward the celestial influence shone out of this law to the Ishmaelites, who were the better for it." Thus Const. L'Empereur reports his sense in his Annotations upon Bava-kama, cap. 4, sect. 3, where he endeavours to make out a plainer sense of these words, in this manner : Though the mountain of Paran was higher to Sinai than Seir was, and first occurred to those that went out of Egypt ; yet there was great reason to mention Seir before it, because Moses had respect to the order of their journeys, and not to the site of the places. And their journeys were so directed by Divine Providence, that, fetching a long circuit, forward and backward, they should come to Canaan. In all which turnings and windings they were marvellously preserved and provided for, by the same good Providence which conducted them. Of this Moses here makes a thankful commemoration, how he led them from Mount Sinai to the borders of the land of Canaan, towards Mount Seir, as is expressly noted by Moses (compare Deut. i. 19, with Deut. ii. 1, and Numb. xx. 14). From whence, by reason of their infidelity, they were led back again towards the Red Sea, and encamped in the extremity of the wilderness (Numb. xxxiii. 35), where Ptolemy places Paran (though there was another part of it called Paran, near Kadesh, Numb. xiii. 3, 27) : and from thence they were led back again in a long circuit to the east part of the land of Canaan. This may be one reason why these two places are mentioned together with Sinai, that God, who there appeared to them, was with them all the time they wandered about in the wilderness, till he brought them to the borders of Canaan, where they now were. And another may be, because in Mount Seir the brazen serpent was erected by God's order, for the cure of such as were bitten by serpents, when they looked on it ; which was an illustrious type of our blessed Saviour, and the salvation wrought by him (Numb. xx. 4, 9). And in the desert to which Paran gave the name (because it overlooked the whole, though very large), they received the joyful news that they should march into Canaan : or, as D. Chytræus understands it, in the wilderness of Paran the seventy elders received the Spirit, to make them assistants unto Moses in the government (Numb. x. 12, xi. 24, &c.). And here, I may add, Moses repeated his law to them (Deut. i. 1, 5), who seems, in this verse, to follow a metaphor borrowed from the sun, which first illuminates the air, and then rises, and then spreads abroad his beams ; as God by degrees declared his presence with his people, whithersoever they went, first at Mount Sinai, then at Seir, and, last of all, here in the wilderness of Paran.

But it must be acknowledged, that these words may be interpreted in a more simple manner, they being but a farther amplification of what was said in the first words, "the Lord came from Sinai." When at the same time he "rose up from Seir, and shone forth from Mount Paran." For these mountains were very near one to another ; or rather parts of one and the same ridge of mountains, as Con. Pellicanus here observes ; and is more clearly made out by a very learned man among ourselves (Dr. Hyde, in his excellent notes on Abraham Peritsof, Itinera Mundi, p. 73), for Teman (which is the same with Paran, Hab. iii. 3) was near to Edom, whose chief city was Bozrah (Amos i. 12), as that was near to Sinai.

The ignorance of the Mahometans is much to be pitied, who out of this place imagine they have found as good an authority for the Alcoran, as there is for the law of Moses, and for the gospel of Christ. For thus they interpret these words, "God gave the law

4 Moses commanded us a law, even the inheritance of the congregation of Jacob.

5 And he was king in Jeshurun, when the heads of the people and the tribes of Israel were gathered together.

from Sinai, and the gospel from Seir (which they would have to be the same with Galilee, which our Saviour much frequented), and the Alcoran from Mount Paran;" which they fancy is a mountain not far from Mecca (see Dr. Pocock upon Greg. Abulfaraj, p. 183, and Guadagnolus Resp. pro Relig. Christiana). But the last words of this verse, for them, are sufficient to confute these conceits; for they plainly show that the whole verse speaks of the people of Israel.

He came with ten thousands of saints.] Or, as our Mr. Mede thinks it should be translated, "with his holy ten thousands," or "myriads;" that is, attended with an innumerable company of angels, who waited on him at the giving of the law. See Ps. lxxviii. 7; Dan. vii. 10, of which Enoch, perhaps, prophesied in part; Jude 14, 15. And from hence it may be thought, that notion of the Jewish doctors, followed by St. Stephen and St. Paul, that the law was given by angels, had its beginning (Mede, book ii. p. 437); that is, they attended upon God, as his ministers, when he himself gave the law.

From his right hand.] With which we are wont to deliver things to other persons.

Went a fiery law for them.] For the law of Moses was given out of the midst of fire, and therefore called a fire of law, as the words are in the Hebrew (Exod. xix. 16, 18; Deut. iv. 11, 12, v. 22—25). The cabalists (as Reuchlin observes) fancy that God wrote the law in a globe of fire, and sent it to them. But the Jerusalem Targum is more sober, which thus expounds it, "He stretched his right hand out of the midst of flames of fire, and gave the law unto his people." And Onkelos still better, "The law written with his right hand he gave us out of the midst of fire." Or, as Campeg. Vitringa would have this latter part of the verse translated, "On his right hand a fire, and out of the fire a law for them." The meaning being, that God came to Mount Sinai with that fire; for, in Scripture, to be on the right hand of any one, is to accompany him (lib. ii. Observ. Sac. cap. 4).

By the conclusion of this verse it is apparent, that the former part of it belongs entirely to God's mercy unto the children of Israel, upon whom he bestowed his law, in most illustrious tokens of his presence. Which makes it highly probable, that his "rising up from Seir upon them, and shining from Mount Paran," belongs to the same matter; that is, the cloud wherein he descended on Sinai, with a vast host of angels, extended itself so far, as to cover the neighbouring mountains of Seir and Paran. Though the meaning may be, as I have shown, that he continued his presence with them after they went from Sinai, through all their journeys in the wilderness of Seir and Paran, till they came to the place where they now were.

Ver. 3. Yea, he loved the people:] All this was the effect of his love and kindness to the people of Israel, whom he owned for his son, and his first-born (Exod. iv. 22), and therefore in a tender manner brought them out of Egypt (Exod. xix. 4), that he might instruct them in his laws.

All his saints are in thy hand.] Whereby he made them a holy nation (as it there follows in Exod. xix. 5), whom he took into his special care and most gracious protection, as this phrase signifies in many places (Numb. iv. 23, 33). And Onkelos refers it to the mighty power whereby he brought them out of Egypt; but it may have respect to God's preservation and support of them, when he gave the law in such a terrible manner, that Moses himself quaked, and yet none of them received any harm. As for the change of the person from his to thy, it is very frequent in this language, particularly in Dan. ix. 4.

And they sat down at thy feet;] The first word (which we translate sat down) being nowhere else found but here and Isa. i. 5, where it plainly hath another sense, hath occasioned various interpretations of this sentence. But most agree in this of Sol. Jarchi, that as scholars sat at the feet of their master round about him, while he taught them their lesson, so the people encompassed the mount where God was, and heard his law, which he thence delivered. But it is a question whether there was such a custom of scholars in those days; and the people did not sit, but stood at the foot of the mount (Exod. xx. 18). Therefore Onkelos understands this of their sitting down, or pitching their tents, where the glorious cloud that led them rested (Numb. x. 12, 33).

Every one shall receive of thy words.] This still is commonly referred to the people's receiving the law. But Onkelos thinks it hath respect to their journeys "at the commandment of the Lord" (Numb. x. 13). For so he interprets it, "They went forward according to thy word." And so the Jerusalem Targum expounds these and the foregoing words; "Behold, they were led, and came to the foot of his cloud, and went forward and rested, according to the command of his word." It takes in also the other sense of the word tucchu (as it signifies smiting in Isa. i. 5) in this manner, "Though he inflicted many chastisements upon them, yet they did not cease, nor desist from the doctrine of the law."

Ver. 4. Moses commanded us a law,] He commanded them to observe that law which God had given them, when he was about to depart from them. This he did in this very book (i. 3, v. 1, vi. 1, viii. 1, &c.). He speaks of himself in the third person, which is very usual throughout all this book.

Even the inheritance of the congregation of Jacob.] As a peculiar blessing which God had bestowed on them, and on their posterity, above all other nations in the world (Deut. iv. 8), who, as they had not this law given to them, so they were not bound to observe it; as the Jews themselves concluded from this very place. Nor did they force anybody to embrace this law, when they made a conquest of a neighbouring country, but left them to their liberty, provided they would become proselytes of the gate; that is, forsake idolatry, and keep the common precepts enjoined to all mankind. (See Maimonides interprets the word inheritance thus Schickard, in his Jus Regium, cap. 5, theor. 17, and Grotius, De Jure Belli et Pacis, lib. i. cap. 1, sect. 16).

The author of Eitz-Hachajim, a MS. highly valued by the famous Wagenseil, saith, That when a child began to speak, his father was bound to teach him this verse. In which, instead of נחשת, "hereditary," some of the Jews read נשואת "espoused," as if the law were espoused to the Jewish nation (see Wagenseil on Sota, p. 519, 520).

Ver. 5. And he was king in Jeshurun,] Or, "for he was king," that is, under God, the supreme ruler and governor of Israel; and therefore, in his name, and by his authority, required them to observe these laws. Which plainly shows him to have had the supreme power in all things, both civil and sacred. Which is excellently expressed by our Mr. Thorndike, in his Review of the Rites of the Church, &c., p. 68, 6 ¶ Let Reuben live, and not die; and let not his men be few.

7 ¶ And this is the blessing of Judah: and he said, Hear, LORD, the voice of Judah, and bring him unto his people: let his hands be sufficient for him; and be thou an help to him from his enemies.

where he observes, "That the Israelites, being made a free people by the act of God bringing them out of Egypt, and entitling them to the land of Canaan, upon the covenant of the law, had Moses not only for their prophet and their priest (for by him Aaron and his successors were put into the priesthood, the tabernacle and all belonging to it consecrated), but also for their king, their lawgiver, their judge, and commander-in-chief of their forces, under God, if not rather God by Moses. For we find, that, after Moses's decease, either God by some extraordinary signification of his will and pleasure, stirred up some man in his stead for the time; or, if there was none such, ruled their proceedings himself, by urim and thummim answering their demands, and directing what to do, and what course to follow, in all the public affairs that concerned the state of that people. Whereupon, when they required Samuel to make them a king, he declared it was not Samuel, but himself, whom they had rejected: because they had rejected him whom God had immediately set over them in his own stead, by whose death the power returned to God, as at the beginning."

Concerning the word Jeshurun, see xxxii. 15, and Selden, lib. ii. De Synedr. cap. 2, n. 2.

Were gathered together.] To renew their covenant with God, and to receive his last commands (see xxxi. 1, 2, 9, 10, xxxi. 28, 29).

Ver. 6. Let Reuben live, and not die; and let not his men be few.] In the last clause of this verse, we repeat the word not (which is wanting in the Hebrew) without any necessity: for the words may be thus translated exactly, "let Reuben live, and not die, though his men be few." Which seems to be a confirmation of the prophecy of Jacob (Gen. xlix. 4), "that he should not excel," and yet should live, and not perish; that is, be in some measure a flourishing tribe, though not so numerous as some others (see there). And possibly it may be here suggested, that though they passed armed over Jordan before their brethren to settle them there (according to their engagement, Numb. xxxii. 27; Josh. iv. 12, 13), yet none of them should perish, but both they, and their wives, and children, that stayed behind them, should be all preserved.

Ver. 7. This is the blessing of Judah.] As much as to say, Judah shall be remarkably blessed. For these words ["this is the blessing"] are used of none of the rest of the tribes, either of Reuben, which went before, or the others that follow after. Here is no mention made of Simeon (who was next to Reuben), because that tribe was included in Judah, with whom their possessions were mixed (Josh. xix. 1), and therefore they went together to make expeditions (Judg. i. 3). Judah also is here put before Levi, because it was to be the royal tribe, according to the prophecy of Jacob, which Moses was assured God would fulfil, and therefore prays as follows: "And he said, Hear, Lord, the voice of Judah." Grant his petition when he calls for help against his enemies. So Onkelos paraphrases it, "Hear his prayer when he goes forth to war."

Bring him unto his people.] Return him home in peace unto his people; as the same Onkelos explains it.

8 ¶ And of Levi he said, Let thy Thummim and thy Urim be with thy holy one, whom thou didst prove at Massah, and with whom thou didst strive at the waters of Meribah;

9 Who said unto his father and to his mother, I have not seen him; neither did he acknowledge his brethren, nor knew his own children: for

Let his hands be sufficient for him.] To avenge him of his enemies, as he also explains it.

Be thou an help to him.] Suffer them not to prevail over him, but give him the victory, when he fights with them. So the Jerusalem Targum paraphrases these last two passages; "Let his hands exercise revenge upon his enemies in battles, and do thou support and sustain him against those that hate him." This was notoriously fulfilled in this tribe, which was the most valiant and successful of all other. For in all their wars this tribe was the principal; and the safety of all the rest seems to have depended upon this (see Judg. i. 1, 2, &c., xx. 18). And as these places show that this was the most considerable tribe before they had kings; so after that it was able, together with Benjamin, to maintain its ground against the other ten tribes, and all other opposers.

Ver. 8. Let thy Thummim and thy Urim be with thy holy one.] Continue in this tribe the high dignity of consulting with thee, and receiving directions from thee, by the high-priest, concerning the public safety. Or, as some take it (because thummim is here set before urim, which is not in any other place), make them upright and faithful, as well as understanding and knowing in the discharge of their duty. For though by holy one be principally meant the high-priest, who was in a peculiar manner anointed to be separated to the service of God, especially in this part of it, to approach him with urim and thummim (which gave Aaron the name of the saint of the Lord, Ps. cvi. 16), yet it comprehends all the rest of the priests and Levites in conjunction with him; for they were all separated unto the Lord, having signalized themselves (as we speak) by their early zeal for the Lord, when their brethren apostatized to idolatry. Of which Moses takes notice in the next verse, "Who said unto his father, &c., I have not seen him," &c., regarded, that is, no relation, when they executed the commands of God against the worshippers of the golden calf. See our learned Dr. Spencer, De Leg. Hebr. lib. iii. cap. 7, dissert. 7, where he treats also of these words, as they may be applied to our Lord Christ, the true holy one of God; who is, indeed, a priest for ever, holy, harmless, undefiled, separate from sinners, &c. (Heb. vii. 26).

Whom thou didst prove at Massah.] Or, "whom thou hast thoroughly proved." For the words in the Hebrew are, "Whom in proving thou didst prove;" the ancient interpreters not taking Massah for the name of a place (as we do) but for trying or proving. And so, indeed, the words in the Hebrew seem to import; the particle [beth] before Massah being different from that before Meribah [which is al], though we translate them both alike by the word at. And thus the Jerusalem Targum paraphrases, "Whom thou didst prove, or try, and he stood in the trial;" that is, approved himself perfect or upright, as Onkelos expresses it. This procured that tribe a blessing from the Lord (Exod. xxxii. 26, 29), and brought them into special grace and favour with him, as the word we translate holy one signifies. For it is not kadoth, but chasioth.

Thou didst strive at the waters of Meribah.] Though God did severely chide and reprove Moses and Aaron (who were the heads of this tribe), when they were they have observed thy word, and kept thy covenant.

10 They shall teach Jacob thy judgments, and Israel thy law: they shall put incense before thee, and whole burnt sacrifice upon thine altar.

11 Bless, Lord, his substance, and accept the work of his hands: smite through the loins of them that rise against him, and of them that hate him, that they rise not again.

12 ¶ And of Benjamin he said, The beloved of the Lord shall dwell in safety by him, and the LORD shall cover him all the day long, and he shall dwell between his shoulders.

13 ¶ And of Joseph he said, Blessed of the tried at the waters of strife (Numb. xx. 12, 13), yet they did not forfeit their office by the offence they then committed; and, therefore, Moses prays it might still continue in Aaron's posterity.

Ver. 9. I have not seen him, &c.] This relates unto the impartial execution of judgment by the Levites, upon the worshippers of the golden calf, without respect of persons (Exod. xxxii. 26, &c.): and as some will have it to Phinehas's zeal, mentioned in Numb. xxv. But, that it hath any respect to a more ancient judgment, given in the case of Judah and Thamar (as the Jerusalem Targum fancies), there is no ground to believe (see Selden, lib. ii. De Synedr. cap. 8, n. 2).

For they have observed thy word.] See Exod. xxxii. 28, 29. Abarbanel, and others, make this to be the reason of what follows.

Ver. 10. They shall teach Jacob thy judgments, and Israel thy law:] Because they were so upright, as to take no notice of their dearest relations in judgment; therefore, they were intrusted with this office of teaching the people the statutes of God, that is, deciding all controversies which arose about any thing in the law. So the Jews expound it; and it is agreeable to what we read in the seventeenth chapter of this book (ver. 9, 10), and many other places, as Mr. Selden shows in the place forenamed, p. 372, &c., and our Mr. Thordike, in his Religious Assemblies, ch. 2, where he observes, the teaching here mentioned consisted in declaring the meaning and obligation of the law in matters doubtful; as is apparent from Lev. x. 8—11. For though others might be members of their courts of judgment, yet they consisted chiefly of priests and Levites. As for teaching the people in their religious assemblies, that was not so much the office of the priests and Levites as of the prophets. For though the prophets, and the disciples of the prophets, were commonly priests and Levites (who, being most free from the cares of estates and inheritances, and by their office, in this ceremonial service, came nearest to God of all other men, were most likely to be endued with an extraordinary degree of knowledge, and of the fear of God), yet it is certain, that the charge of teaching the people in their assemblies belonged as well to those prophets who were not priests and Levites as to those that were (see lim, p. 25). And this was one reason, as Maimonides observes, why the tribe of Levi might have no inheritance in the land, that, being free from the trouble of ploughing and sowing, &c., they might wholly attend to the study of the law, and be able to teach Israel God's judgments (More Nevochim, par. iii. cap. 39).

They shall put incense before thee, and whole burnt sacrifice.] This was the peculiar office and honour of the priests alone, to offer incense on the golden altar, and burnt-offerings upon the brazen. The Jerusalem Targum thus paraphrases it, "They shall put incense of precious spice before thee, to pacify thine anger, and offer a most acceptable sacrifice upon thine altar."

Ver. 11. Bless, Lord, his substance.] The word we here translate substance, is translated wealth, viii. 17, 18, which consisted most in cattle (they having no land to till), which he prays God to increase, that they might have sufficient sustenance for themselves and their family. It is a strange fancy of some of the Jews, that whosoever offered incense grew rich, and therefore no priest was suffered to offer incense more than once, that so riches might be derived to them all. Thus they trifle, while their hearts are set on getting money, and not on growing good (see Sheringham on Joma, p. 35, 36, and Mauritius, De Sortitione Hebræorum, cap. 24, sect. 4).

Accept the work of his hand:] All their ministry at the altar where the priests officiated; or about the tabernacle, of which the Levites had the care.

Smite through the loins of them that rise against him.] For they who were enemies to the priests and Levites were enemies to religion, and to all civil government, which was chiefly administered by them, as was before observed (see xvii. 8—12).

Ver. 12. Of Benjamin he said.] He mentions him next to Levi, because the temple, in which the priests officiated, was partly situated in his lot.

The beloved of the Lord.] Or, being beloved of the Lord, as the LXX. interpret it, ἡγαπημένος ὑπὸ Κυρίου.

Shall dwell in safety by him;] i. e. By the Lord; which signifies the stability of his portion, which had Jerusalem the holy city in it, as we read Josh. xviii. 28. For though Mount Zion was in the tribe of Judah, and so the sanctuary was there (Ps. lxxviii. 68), yet the city wherein it stood was not. Nay, the ancients think the altar of burnt-offering was in the tribe of Benjamin, as Kimchi observes upon that place before mentioned in Joshua (see upon Gen. xlix. 27). And there are reasons to make one think, that Zion, in the place forenamed, and in others, is to be taken in a large sense, comprehending Mount Moriah also, (on which the temple was built, 2 Chron. iii. 1), which was in the tribe of Benjamin, and consequently the temple was situated in this tribe.

The Lord shall cover him all the day long.] The glory of the majestical presence of the Lord shall be a shield over him (to defend him) continually; as the Jerusalem Targum expounds it.

He shall dwell between his shoulders.] For the Divine Majesty (saith Onkelos) shall dwell in his country. It being in the temple, and the temple in the tribe of Benjamin, where it stood upon Mount Moriah, as the head of a man upon his shoulders; as Dr. Lightfoot glosses in his Temple Service, p. 145, edit. 1. Or the word we translate here shoulders may signify, as it is translated in other places, sides (Numb. xxxiv. 11), or borders. And nothing is more certain, than that the Divine habitation was in the borders of Benjamin, whose lot touched Judah's at Jerusalem; and was so united to it, that when the rest fell off from Judah, the tribe of Benjamin always adhered to it.

This being the sense which the ancient interpreters give of this verse, and very agreeable to the words, I shall not trouble the reader with any other; but only mention a conceit of Conradus Pellicanus, who, by the beloved of the Lord here understands David, who dwell in safety by Benjamin, though the king of that tribe persecuted him, for God covered and protected him continually from violence, &c. It is strange that a man otherwise judicious, and well acquainted with the Jewish learning, should propound

LORD be his land, for the precious things of heaven, for the dew, and for the deep that coucheth beneath,

14 And for the precious fruits brought forth by the sun, and for the precious things put forth by the moon,

15 And for the chief things of the ancient mountains, and for the precious things of the lasting hills,

16 And for the precious things of the earth and fulness thereof, and for the good will of him that dwelt in the bush: let the blessing come upon the head of Joseph, and upon the top of the head of him that was separated from his brethren.

17 His glory is like the firstling of his bullock, and his horns are like the horns of unicorns: with them he shall push the people together to the

this as the best interpretation he could think of, when there is nothing of a blessing upon Benjamin in it.

Ver. 13. Of Joseph he said,] This tribe follows next, his lot falling near to Benjamin, who lay between Judah and Joseph.

Blessed of the Lord be his land,] He foretells that this tribe should be situated in a most plentiful country, and enriched by the Divine blessing upon it.

For the precious things of heaven,] Sending fruitful showers from heaven.

For the dew,] Together with the evening and morning dews, which are no less refreshing to the earth than rain.

For the deep that coucheth beneath,] He means springs of water which burst out of the bowels of the earth, for the use of man and beast.

Ver. 14. For the precious fruits brought forth by the sun,] Whose kindly heat brings them forth, and makes them grow to maturity.

The precious things put forth by the moon,] For all fruits are plumped by the moon's cool and fattening moisture in the night, which is digested by the sun in the day. Or, this passage may relate to the several sorts of fruit which are produced every month. So Onkelos interprets it, "It produceth also sweet fruits at the beginning of every month." For the word jerachim in the Hebrew, being in the plural number, signifies moons, i. e. months. And so the Jerusalem Targum translates it, in every new moon, which comprehends the whole month.

Ver. 15.] Such as Mount Ephraim, and Samaria, and Bashan, which were exceeding fruitful in grapes and olives, and suchlike excellent fruit; and called ancient and lasting, because they were made together with the earth, in the beginning; and not mounts cast up by the arts of men (see Gen. xlix. 20).

Ver. 16. For the precious things of the earth] This seems to relate to their arable land, which he foretells should bring forth great store of all sorts of corn.

The word megeed, which we translate precious, is repeated five times in these last three verses, signifying that which in its kind is "most excellent and eximious," as that great man Ezekiel Spanhemius observes upon Callimachus's hymn to Diana, ver. 245, where mentioning several instruments of music among the Greeks, whose names came from the Hebrew, he thinks one called μάγadis, (which was ἀρχαῖον ὄργανον, as Athenæus saith, but he could not tell whether a wind or stringed instrument), came from this Hebrew word megeed, for it was not of a Greek original. And in Cant. iv. 13, this word is translated pleasant, as all music is; but that especially which was made by this instrument μάγadis. For Plato, who took it for a stringed instrument, calls it πολυχορδῶταρον, Anacreon saying he had one of twenty strings, as Spanhemius notes upon the hymn in Delum, p. 472.

And fulness thereof,] By the fulness of the earth may be meant, either the plenty or abundance of its fruits, or the ripeness thereof, as Bochartus observes in his Canaan.

For the good will of him that dwelt in the bush:] That is, of God "whose majesty (as Onkelos paraphrases) dwells in the heavens, and was revealed to Moses in the bush" (Exod. iii. 2, 4). That is, the Shechinah there appeared in a most glorious manner, and the Lord told Moses he was there present, whose good-will, which is the fountain of all blessings (for to it they owed their deliverance out of Egypt, which God then promised to Moses out of the bush), he wished might be the peculiar portion of Joseph.

Let the blessing come upon the head of Joseph,] The word blessing is not in the Hebrew, but this being connected with the foregoing words, may be thought a prayer, that the good-will of God, the fountain (as I said) of all blessings, may rest upon Joseph. Or, as Onkelos translates it, "Let all those things (before named) come upon the head of Joseph." And so the Jerusalem Targum expounds it, "Let all these blessings come, and be made perfect upon the head of Joseph."

Upon the top of—him that was separated from his brethren.] That is, saith the same Targum, "upon him that was made ruler over all the land of Egypt, and splendid in the honour given him by his brethren" (see this explained upon Gen. xlix. 26).

Ver. 17. His glory is like the firstling of his bullock,] The ancients thought there was so much majesty in the countenance of a bull, especially of a young bullock in its prime, lifting up its head, that they made it an emblem of kingly power, as Bochartus hath shown out of several good authors in his Hierozoicon, par. i. lib. ii. cap. 29. And accordingly here it signifies, that the tribe of Ephraim should have royal authority established in it. For he doth not compare the person of Joseph to a young bullock, (though he was a goodly man, eminent for his beauty and comely proportions, Gen. xxxix. 6), but the tribes which sprang from him, as appears from the last words of this verse; whose glory he here comparing to that of a young bullock, and its glory consisting in its strength, the power of the tribes of Joseph is hereby denoted; which was so great, that they were the chief support of the kingdom of Israel, which began in Jeroboam, who was king of ten tribes; after whom there followed a long race of kings till the captivity. There may be also some respect in these words unto Joshua the first governor of all the people, who was of the tribe of Ephraim; as of Manasseh were Jair, Jephthah, and Gideon, who were famous men among the judges.

It is remarkable also here, that Joseph is compared to the firstling of a bullock, because Reuben being set aside for his incest, Joseph had the right of primogeniture, in part, translated unto him (1 Chron. v. 1, 2), and, in consequence of it, had a double portion in the land of Canaan.

It is to be noted likewise, that he is said to be like unto the firstling of his bullock, because there were not more goodly bullocks anywhere than in Bashan (Amos iv. 1), which fell to the share of some of the children of Manasseh (Josh. xvii. 5).

There have been some great men, who, from this place and other conjectures, have fancied that Joseph was worshipped in Egypt after his death, under the ends of the earth: and they are the ten thousands of Ephraim, and they are the thousands of Manasseh.

18 ¶ And of Zebulun he said, Rejoice, Zebulun, in thy going out; and, Issachar, in thy tents.

19 They shall call the people unto the mountain; there they shall offer sacrifices of righteousness: for they shall suck of the abundance of the seas, and of treasures hid in the sand.

20 ¶ And of Gad he said, Blessed be he that enlargeth Gad: he dwelleth as a lion, and teareth the arm with the crown of the head.

21 And he provided the first part for himself, form of an ox, by the name of Serapis, which Bochartus hath confuted in the book forenamed, cap. 34. His horns are like the horns of unicorns.] This is a farther description of the power and strength of the house of Joseph; for a horn is everywhere an emblem of mighty power and force, and an unicorn (as we translate the word reem) is a very strong as well as a stately creature. But Bochartus hath alleged a great many things to prove, that reem is a sort of wild goat in Arabia, as big as a deer, and of the same colour, which they now call gazellas (par. i. Hierozoicon, lib. iii. cap. 27). There were some of them sent lately to the French king by the divan of Tripoli, which had black horns, in shape like those of a goat, only they were round and pointed. But the tallness, strength, and swiftness of this creature, together with its fierce untameable nature, hath made Ludolphus (who at first was of Bochart's opinion) to conclude, upon second thoughts, that the reem in Scripture signifies the rhinoceros, as the Vulgar Latin here translates the word. See lib. i. Comment. in Histor. Æthiop. cap. 10, n. 74, which seems not so well to agree with these words of Moses; which suppose the creature here spoken of to have two horns (he using the plural number), with which the two tribes descended from Joseph are very fitly compared. And so David mentions the horns of the reem (Ps. xxii. 22). But whatsoever creature it was, princes and great men were wont to be compared to it, as appears from Isa. xxxiv. 7, where the grandees (as we now speak) of Edom are called unicorns, as in the following words they are compared to bullocks and bulls.

With them he shall push the people] Throw down all that oppose him, particularly the Canaanites. For these (saith the Jerusalem Targum) are the great men of the Amorites, whom Joshua, the son of Nun, slew; who was of the tribe of Ephraim; and the captains which Gideon, the son of Joash, slew, who was of the tribe of Manasseh.

To the ends of the earth.] Of the land of Canaan.

They are the ten thousands of Ephraim, and they are the thousands of Manasseh.] These things shall be performed by the numerous armies of Ephraim and Manasseh. Of these are the benedictions of these two tribes; the younger of which he signifies should be more powerful than the elder, according to the prophecy of Jacob (Gen. xlviii. 19).

Ver. 18. Rejoice, Zebulun, in thy going out.] About their business, as the Jerusalem Targum expounds it, that is, their merchandise; which they exercised upon the sea of Gennesaret, where they were situated, and not far from the Mediterranean; in which he prays they might have such good success, as to fill their hearts with joy. There are those who understand this of their going out to war against their enemies, which is the exposition of Onkelos. And so this phrase is often used, particularly in Gen. xiv. 8; and the valour of this tribe is, upon one occasion, celebrated in Judg. v. 18. But Jacob's prophecy determines us rather to the other sense, Gen. xlix. 13, where he represents this tribe as mariners rather than soldiers. Though it must be acknowledged, that there were great numbers among them in David's time, who were expert warriors (1 Chron. xii. 33), and that the Israelites generally were not addicted to traffic, the sea-coast being possessed by the Philistines and the Canaanites, save only what belonged to this tribe.

Issachar, in thy tents.] The same Jerusalem Targum expounds it, "Rejoice, ye house of Issachar, when ye come into your schools:" for this was a learned tribe, at least in some ages, as appears from 1 Chron. xii. 32. But Jacob's prophecy rather determines us to another sense, which is, that they should grow rich by feeding cattle, and by husbandry: for which their country being very proper, they chose rather that quiet kind of life than merchandise. Though they were near neighbours to Zebulun, and for that reason, as well as because they were brethren by the same mother, are here put both together in one benediction. This seems also best to agree with the phrase of rejoicing in their tents; in which they are said anciently to dwell who fed cattle, Gen. iv. 10. And perhaps the learning that the children of Issachar are said to have had, in 1 Chron. xii. 32, which consisted "in the understanding of the times," was nothing else but their skill in the proper seasons for sowing, and planting, and pruning, &c., to know what Israel ought to do in the management and improvement of their land; which was of great use, especially in that country.

Ver. 19. They shall call the people unto the mountain.] Here Moses predicts the house of God should be set upon a mountain; unto which, he saith, Zebulun (for the latter end of the verse shows he speaks particularly of them) should invite the rest of their tribes, by their forwardness and zeal, to go up to worship God at the three great festivals. So the Jerusalem Targum paraphrases, "Behold, the people of the house of Zebulun shall be ready to go to the mount of the holy house of the Lord." Or, by the people, perhaps, he means the gentiles their neighbours, whom they should endeavour to bring to the service of the true God; which was especially fulfilled when Christ came (Matt. iv. 15, 16).

There they shall offer sacrifices] Liberal sacrifices, out of their honest gains by merchandise.

They shall suck of the abundance of the seas,] Import abundance of various commodities, and grow rich by their traffic.

Of treasures hid in the sand.] This is a farther amplification of the same thing, relating particularly to their importation of gold, and silver, and precious stones, which are digged out of the earth. Some think it hath respect to the rich mines which were in this country; but of that I can find no proof.

Ver. 20. Blessed be he that enlargeth Gad.] That is, blessed be God, who hath allotted to him such a large inheritance; which he afterward also farther enlarged, as we read 1 Chron. v. 18—20.

He dwelleth as a lion.] Lives secure and fearless, though encompassed with enemies, whom the Gadites tore in pieces (as it here follows) if they offered to molest them. For this was a very warlike tribe, as we learn from 1 Chron. xii. 8, and therefore here compared to a lioness (so lubi signifies), which equals a lion, if not exceeds him, in strength and fierceness; as Bochartus hath observed out of good authors in his Hierozoicon, par. i. lib. iii. cap. 50. And so Onkelos here translates it, "He dwelleth as a lioness." And the Jerusalem Targum puts in both after this manner; because there, in a portion of the lawgiver, was he seated; and he came with the heads of the people, he executed the justice of the Lord, and his judgments with Israel.

22 ¶ And of Dan he said, Dan is a lion's whelp: he shall leap from Bashan.

23 ¶ And of Naphtali he said, O Naphtali,

"he remains quiet, as a lion and a lioness; neither is there people or kingdom that shall stand before them."

Teareth the arm with the crown of the head.] Kills the princes with their kings, as Onkelos truly expounds it. For by arms are meant men of strength and power; and by the crown of the head is properly to be understood the chief commander, ruler, or king. And therefore the LXX. also translate, "crown of the head" by Ἀρχοντα, prince, or supreme governor.

Ver. 21. He provided the first part for himself.] He first received his portion in the land which they conquered, as Onkelos expounds it. Which he is said here to provide for himself, because this tribe (with Reuben, and part of Manasseh), desired to be possessed of the country of Sihon, which was accordingly given to them (Numb. xxxii. 1, 2, 33).

Because there, in a portion of the lawgiver.] Which Moses (who was their lawgiver) gave them by God's order; whereas the other nine tribes and a half had theirs given them by Joshua.

Was he seated.] The word in the Hebrew signifies hid, i. e. protected, when, going to the war in Canaan, they left their wives, and children, and cattle, without any defence, but God's providence, according to the promise they made to Moses (Numb. xxxii. 16, 17, &c.). What the Jerusalem Targum, and Onkelos, and several of the rabbins, even Abarbinel himself, here say, of Moses being buried in this tribe (which they make the sense of these words), I think is no more to the purpose, than what the cabalists observe upon this place, that, in the blessing of Gad, the whole alphabet is found, because Moses our master (saith Baal-Hatturim) was buried in his territory, who observed the whole law from aleph to tau, i. e. from the beginning to the end (see Theodorick Hackspan, Cab. Judaica, n. 10).

He came.] He speaks of this as a thing already done, because he certainly foresaw they would perform their engagement.

With the heads of the people.] With the chief commanders of the rest of the tribes of Israel. Or, as the word may be translated more literally, "He came, the heads of the people;" i. e. the Gadites marched in the front before the children of Israel. For so was the agreement between Moses and them, as we read in Numb. xxxii. 17, that they should "go ready-armed before the children of Israel." Of which engagement Joshua put them in mind when they were entering into Canaan (Josh. i. 14), and they stood to it (ver. 16, 17).

He executed the justice of the Lord.] Upon the seven nations of Canaan, whom God commanded them to extirpate.

His judgments with Israel.] Going in the foremost of the Israelites to battle, till the whole country was subdued to them (Numb. xxxii. 21, 22, 29; Josh. xxii. 2—3, &c.).

Ver. 22. Dan is a lion's whelp.] Courageous as a young lion; so Onkelos. Which was most eminently verified in Samson, who was of this tribe; and whom "the Spirit of the Lord began to move in the camp of Dan" (Judg. xiii. 25).

He shall leap from Bashan.] The tribe of Dan had no inheritance near Bashan; but he compares them to satisfied with favour, and full with the blessing of the Lord: possess thou the west and the south.

24 ¶ And of Asher he said, Let Asher be blessed with children; let him be acceptable to his brethren, and let him dip his foot in oil.

25 Thy shoes shall be iron and brass; and as thy days, so shall thy strength be.

the young lions of that place. For lions haunted mountains (Cant. iv. 8), and this mountain in particular was famous for them, and bred very fierce ones; which every one knows leap upon their prey, when they assault it, and fasten their nails and their teeth in it (so Bochart observes many ancient authors describe them, par. i. Hierozoicon, lib. iii. cap. 2, p. 739). And thus did the Danites on a sudden leap from one end of Judah to another, and seized on the city of Laish, near to the fountain of Jordan, calling it by the name of Dan, as we read Judg. xviii. 29.

Ver. 23. O Naphtali, satisfied with favour.] That is, with the favour of God, which is explained in the next words.

Full with the blessing of the Lord.] The word full, as Maimonides observes, signifies that which is most perfect and absolute in its kind (More Nevoch. par. i. cap. 19). Such was the country of Galilee, wherein this tribe had their possession, which was πῶς τε πᾶσα, καὶ εὐβορος, &c., (as Josephus speaks, lib. iii. De Bello Judaico, cap. 4), "fat throughout in all its parts, and very fertile;" planted with all manner of trees, insomuch that it invited him to husbandry, who was averse to labour; and by that means was entirely inhabited, and had no void space in all the country, &c.

Possess thou the west and the south.] The same Josephus makes this tribe to have possessed the east and the north in the upper Galilee (lib. v. Antiq. cap. 1, p. 142), which is directly contrary to what Moses here saith; therefore Bochartus (in his Hierozoicon, par. i. lib. iii. cap. 18), judiciously expounds these words of Moses, not with respect to the whole land of Canaan, but to the Danites before mentioned. For the portion of Naphtali extended from the south of the city called Dan, or Laish, to the sea of Tiberias. And so the three Chaldee paraphrasts expound the Hebrew word yam (which we translate west) by the sea of Tiberias, or Gennesaret, which is the same; for the Hebrews call great lakes by the name of seas. And by this sea is not meant the Mediterranean, but the sea of Galilee, or Tiberias, or Gennesaret; for by all these names it is called, as Mr. Selden observes in his Mare Clausum, p. 21.

Ver. 24. Let Asher be blessed with children.] With a numerous and beautiful issue.

Let him be acceptable to his brethren.] All the rest of the Israelites shall court them, for their goodly aspect; or (as some rather think), he prophesies this tribe should win the favour and affection of others, by their affability and obliging behaviour; for which Jacob predicts they should be famous (Gen. xlv. 14).

Let him dip his foot in oil.] Be planted in a rich soil, full of olive-trees: which should make oil so plentiful, that they might not only wash their faces, but their feet in it. Onkelos translates, "He shall be nourished with the delights of kings."

Ver. 25. Thy shoes shall be iron and brass.] Or, as in the margin, "Under thy feet shall be iron;" which hath made some think these minerals were digged out of Libanus, near to which lay the tribe of Asher; who, according to this exposition, trod upon a soil full of iron and brass. But no author, Bochartus saith, mentions any such thing as the brass of Libanus; and therefore some understand by these expressions, the 26 ¶ There is none like unto the God of Jeshurun, who rideth upon the heavens in thy help, and in his excellency on the sky.

27 The eternal God is thy refuge, and underneath are the everlasting arms: and he shall barbarous people that dwelt in Galilee of the gentiles, who pressed the Asserites, as an iron shoe or fetters do the feet. But the Arabic here by minal, which we translate shoe, understands a bolt or bar: and renders this passage, "Thy bolts shall be iron and brass;" that is, as Onkelos expresses it, "They should be as strong as iron and brass." And so Kimchi, expounding the words of Jonathan (who interprets it, "Thy habitation shall be as strong," &c.), saith the meaning is, "Their country should be as well fenced, as if it had been shut up in brazen or iron walls;" and R. Solomon to the same purpose (see Hieroicoicon, par. ii. lib. vi. cap. 16). But I have observed, that the same Bochartus acknowledges in his Phaleg, that Sarepta (which the Hebrews call Zarephath, 1 Kings xvii. 9), a city of Sidon, had its name from the brass and iron which were here melted; being in great plenty in that country, as the Hebrews gather from this blessing of the tribe of Asher (who were the inhabitants of those places), "Iron and brass are under thy shoe," as he there interprets it (lib. iv. cap. 34). And so a very learned man, long before him, David Chytræus, expounds these words, and adds this observation; Nam Siden et Sarepta, quæ a metallis excoquendis nomen habet, in tribu Asser fuerunt, "For Sidon and Sarepta, which had its name from the melting of metals there, were in the tribe of Asher."

As thy days so shall thy strength be.] The same Chytræus expounds it, "All the time of their life, they should retain the same vigour of body and mind:" Which seems to be the sense of Onkelos, "As the days of thy youth, so shall thy strength be." And the Jerusalem Targum more expressly, "Such as they were in the days of their youth, such they should be in their old age." Or simply, these words signify, that this tribe "should grow stronger and stronger;" which Hottinger seems to have aimed at, when he propounded this exposition in his Smegma Orientale, cap. 7, "As are thy days, so are thy riches and wealth." Masius, quite contrary, upon Josh. xix. 31, interprets these words to signify, that they should have perpetual conflicts with the old inhabitants of the country. All which various interpretations proceed from the uncertain signification of the Hebrew word daba, which we render strength.

Ver. 26. There is none like unto the God of Jeshurun,] And now, having blessed every particular tribe, he concludes with this general demonstration of their happiness, that their God was not like the gods of other nations, but super-eminent in all perfections. And therefore they must needs be blessed (as the same Chytræus explains it), who had him propitious to them, as their father, their keeper, their defender, avenger, and saviour from all their enemies.

Who rideth upon the heavens in thy help.] Who commandeth in the heavens, as well as in the earth; and sends help and succour to thee from thence by thunder, lightning, and hailstones; as we read he did in many places (Ps. xviii. 8, 9, &c., lxxviii. 33—35). "And as he that rides upon a horse, turns him this way, and that way, as he pleaseth (they are the words of Maimonides in his More Nevochim, par. i. cap. 70), so God by his power and pleasure commands the heavens; and is not fixed to them, as the soul of them (which was the foolish opinion of the Zabii), but, as the rider is far more honourable and excellent than the beast on which he sits, and of a quite different species from it; so God is represented by this metaphor (though but in a weak manner), as separate from the heavens, and of a more excellent nature, far transcending them, which are but the instruments he uses, to fulfil his will and pleasure."

28 Israel then shall dwell in safety alone: the fountain of Jacob shall be upon a land of corn and wine; also his heavens shall drop down dew.

ferent species from it; so God is represented by this metaphor (though but in a weak manner), as separate from the heavens, and of a more excellent nature, far transcending them, which are but the instruments he uses, to fulfil his will and pleasure."

In his excellency on the sky.] Or, as it may be translated word for word, and in his magnificence, the clouds. From whence he sends such storms and tempests, as demonstrate his power.

Ver. 27. The eternal God is thy refuge.] Or, "dwelling-place;" to whom they might always betake themselves for safety, and never fail of it (Ps. xc. 1). In the Hebrew the words are, "The eternal God is the habitation," or dwelling-place; from whence the Jews have framed this maxim to preserve all men from having low thoughts of God, as if he was contained in any thing, "God is the place wherein the world dwells, and not the world the place where God dwells." So Maimonides observes in the place above named, out of Bereschith Rabba.

Underneath are the everlasting arms.] To support all those, with an unwearied power and care, who commit themselves unto him.

He shall thrust out the enemy from before thee;] As he had carried them through the wilderness with an unwearied care, so he promises God would expel the Canaanites, and make room for them in their country.

Shall say, Destroy them.] Give the Israelites power, as well as authority, to root them out. For to say here is as much as to do, and therefore signifies "executing their destruction."

Ver. 28. Israel then shall dwell in safety alone.] Live in quiet and peace, separate from all other people: or, the Divine protection shall be sufficient for their security. This Rasi thinks was fulfilled in the days of Solomon (1 Kings iv. 25): but others of them think it still to be fulfilled.

The fountain of Jacob.] That is, his posterity, who flowed from him as a river from a fountain (Isa. xlviii. 1, li. 1). Cocceius thinks these words should be joined to the foregoing in this manner, "Israel shall dwell in safety alone by the fountain of Jacob," that is, by God. But though this may have some countenance from the ancient interpreters (as I shall observe presently), yet most go the other way; there being the like expression in Ps. lxxviii. 26, "Bless the Lord in the congregation, from the fountain of Israel;" or, as it is in the margin, "Ye that be of the fountain of Israel;" i. e. are derived from him as your Father.

Shall be upon a land of corn and wine; also his heavens shall drop down dew.] In a fruitful country, upon which the heavens shall drop down refreshing dews. Onkelos paraphrases the whole thus, "Israel shall dwell securely alone, according to the blessing wherewith Jacob's father blessed them, in a land of corn," &c. And so the Jerusalem Targum (making more express mention of the word fountain), "Israel shall dwell by himself securely, from the fountain of benediction wherewith Jacob blessed them, in a land producing wine and oil; and the heavens above are commanded to send dews and rain upon them."

Ver. 29. Happy art thou, O Israel.] He was not able farther to express their happiness, and therefore breaks out into admiration of it; exciting them thereby to be deeply sensible of it, and affected with it.

29 Happy art thou, O Israel: who is like unto thee, O people saved by the Lord, the shield of thy help, and who is the sword of thy excellency! and thine enemies shall be found liars unto thee; and thou shalt tread upon their high places.

Who is like unto thee,] Who had the Lord for his God, as he said before, ver. 26, &c., and iv. 7, 8.

O people saved by the Lord,] Who have been redeemed by his mighty power. So the Jerusalem Targum, "Whose redemption (I suppose he meant out of Egypt) is from the presence of the Lord." Who had preserved them ever since, and would still protect them, as it here follows.

Thus R. Isaac (in Chissuk Emuna, par. i. cap. 18) saith, signifies the spiritual blessings God bestowed on them. For true felicity (saith he) doth not consist in victory over enemies, and plenty of corn, or suchlike things, of which he had spoken before in the foregoing verse, but in the salvation of the soul, of which no nation in the world was secure but the Jews; which made Moses (saith he) break out into these words, "O happy people saved by the Lord!" As much as to say, Among all people, is there any saved like to thee? This he saith, because Christians were wont to tell them that they fixed their minds wholly on the corporal felicity which their law promised them; which made him look about to find out all that he could draw to a higher sense. And he fixes so much upon these words, that he repeats it again a little after, that the salvation here promised is everlasting. And yet his eyes could not be opened to see that this salvation was to be brought to them by the Messiah: and that our Lord Jesus is he, whose gospel is as full of such promises as their law is of the promises of corn, and wine, and oil.

The shield of thy help,] To defend them from all the assaults of their enemies. He adds this, saith the same R. Isaac, to show that they to whom he promises spiritual blessings are not thereby put out of hope of temporal; for the people that are saved by the Lord have him also for their shield and their sword, as it here follows.

Who is the sword of thy excellency!] To cut their enemies in pieces, so that they should glory and boast in magnificent victories over them. Or, as Onkelos translates it, "From his presence are all the victories of thy valiant men."

Thine enemies shall be found liars unto thee;] Find themselves deceived in all their vain hopes of saving themselves or hurting the Israelites. Or, should be so afraid of them, that with feigned stories they should court their friendship, as the Gibeonites did. Or, more simply, should submit to them, though not heartily, yet out of fear, as this phrase is used, Ps. xviii. 44, lxxvi. 3, and other places.

Thou shalt tread upon their high places.] Upon the necks of their kings, as both Onkelos and the Jerusalem Targum understand it, taking bamoth here for great men, in high stations. And thus Joshua did, as we read Josh. x. 21. But this word commonly signifies either "strong holds," or "places of idolatrous worship;" which neither their great men nor their gods themselves should be able to preserve from ruin.

CHAPTER XXXIV.

1 Moses from mount Nebo vieweth the land. 5 He dieth there. 6 His burial. 7 His age. 8 Thirty days' mourning for him. 9 Joshua succeedeth him. 10 The praise of Moses.

1 AND Moses went up from the plains of Moab unto the mountain of Nebo, to the top of Pisgah, that is over against Jericho. And the Lord shewed him all the land of Gilead, unto Dan,

2 And all Naphtali, and the land of Ephraim,

CHAP. XXXIV.

Ver. 1. Moses went up] Having thus declared his affectionate concern for the happiness of every one of them, he took his leave of the elders and all the people, and went up whither God had commanded him (xxxii. 49, &c.).

From the plains of Moab] In which was their last station before they entered into Canaan, Numb. xxxiii. 48—50, where God delivered several commands to them, Numb. xxxv. 1, xxxvi. 13, and where Moses spake to them what we read in this book, Deut. i. 5.

Unto the mountain of Nebo,] Which was the highest part of the mountain of Abarim, as appears from Numb. xxvii. 12, compared with Deut. xxxii. 49. Near to which there was a city of the same name (Numb. xxxii. 38; Isa. xv. 2).

Top of Pisgah] Which was the very top of the mountain Nebo (see Deut. iii. 27; Numb. xxi. 20).

That is over against Jericho.] A famous city on the other side of Jordan. I see no ground to believe that the people of Israel accompanied him thither (as Josephus tells the story), with so many tears that Moses wept also; and having besought them not to take his departure so heavily, he dismissed them together with the elders, and remained there alone.

The Lord] Or, as Jonathan hath it, "the Word of the Lord," who had accompanied him with his blessed presence through the wilderness.

Shewed him all the land of Gilead, unto Dan,] God had often promised him that he should see the good land promised to their fathers, though not be permitted to enter into it (Numb. xxvi. 12; Deut. iii. 27). And now fulfils his word, and gives him a full prospect of it; bidding him first look northwards, through the whole land of Gilead (which comprehends all that was given to the two tribes and half on this side Jordan, where they now were) to the land of Naphtali, which was in the upper Galilee, beyond the sea of Gennesaret, as far as the utmost northern border, which was then called Laish, and afterwards Dan (Josh. xix. 47; Judg. xviii. 28), and in later times Cesaræa Philippi.

The mention of Dan, which was not the name of this place till after that tribe had conquered Laish in the time of the Judges, shows that this was not written at the same time with the rest of this book, no more than what we read (ver. 5, 6, 10) of his death and burial, &c., (unless we suppose Moses to have given an account of his own death and burial by the spirit of prophecy, which is not probable), but it is most likely by Samuel, who was a prophet, and wrote by Divine authority what he found in the records which were left by Joshua and others who sucand Manasseh, and all the land of Judah, unto the utmost sea,

3 And the south, and the plain of the valley of Jericho, the city of palm trees, unto Zoar.

4 And the Lord said unto him, This is the land which I swear unto Abraham, unto Isaac, and unto Jacob, saying, I will give it unto thy seed: I have caused thee to see it with thine eyes, but thou shalt not go over thither.

5 ¶ So Moses the servant of the Lord died there in the land of Moab, according to the word of the Lord.

ceeded him; who gave an account of Moses' leaving the world, and of all that was done after, till the end of the time of the judges.

Ver. 2. All Naphtali, and the land of Ephraim, and Manasseh.] Having seen the northern parts, he bade him turn his eyes towards the midland country, where Ephraim and Manasseh were situated.

All the land of Judah.] Which lay southerly.

Unto the utmost sea.] By which some understand the Salt Sea, which lay on the south border of the land of Judah (Numb. xxxiv. 3). But then there will be no mention of the western part of Canaan, which lay upon the Mediterranean or Midland Sea, which is hereby meant.

Ver. 3. And the south.] And after he had seen the south, which the tribes of Judah and Simeon inhabited, he bade him take a view of the eastern parts of the country, as it here follows.

The plain of the valley of Jericho.] All the region about Jordan, especially the lovely plain of Jericho; which is very much celebrated by other authors, and lay in the tribe of Benjamin.

The city of palm trees.] Which is often mentioned in Scripture; sometimes without, and sometimes with the name of Jericho (Judg. i. 16, iii. 13; 2 Chron. xxviii. 15), which was so called because a multitude of palm-trees grew about it, as Strabo (as well as Josephus) testifies in his Geograph. lib. xvi. p. 763, where he describes this plain as πεδιον κισσῶν περιχόμενον ὀρεσῶν τινα, &c., as encompassed about with mountains, after the manner of a theatre, abounding with palm-trees and other garden-trees mixed with them, for the space of a hundred stadia. And there was also, he observes, ἡ τοῦ βασιλέως Παράδεισος, "the paradise of balsam;" which is a rare aromatic plant, like to the turpentine-tree, whose juice is of great virtue and value, &c. From which odoriferous plant growing here, some think this city had the name of Jericho, signifying sweet-smelling. So R. Judas, in the Gemara of Beracoth, where he mentions this tree as growing about Jericho, and thence derives its name from the Hebrew word reach, which signifies a sweet smell. This is more probable than the conjecture of D. Chytræus, who imagines Jericho to come from Jerce, which signifies the moon; and in their German language, he thinks, might be called Loneburgh.

Unto Zoar.] Which lay in the entrance of the Salt Sea.

Ver. 4. The Lord said unto him.] After he had showed him the land, the Word of the Lord (as the Jerusalem Targum hath it) spake these words to him which follow. And God having been wont to speak to Moses out of the cloud of glory, Josephus conceives that now he was encompassed with it, and from thence heard this voice; which the Jews fancy was so loud, that the people heard it into the camp. Thus at our Saviour's transfiguration upon the holy mount, a glorious cloud overshadowed him and his three apostles, who heard the voice say to them, "This is my beloved Son," &c. The Samaritans, as Hottinger relates in his Smegma Orientale, cap. 8, p. 456, tell the story thus: that Joshua, Eleazar the priest, and all the elders accompanying him to the mount, fell into such a passion when they were to take their leave, that they could not be parted from him. Whereupon the pillar of fire came down, which separated them from Moses, so that they saw him no more.

This is the land] Gen. xii. 7, xiii. 15, xv. 18, &c. I have caused thee to see it with thine eyes.] Which the Lord strengthened, it is likely, with a greater vigour than usual, that he might take a larger prospect than otherwise he could have done of this country. Or, as some of the Jews understand it, he laid a map of it before his eyes, wherein every part of it was exactly described. But that might have been done in the plains of Moab, without going up into a mountain; therefore the other is more reasonable, that he strengthened his visive faculty with a greater power, to see the whole country in its length and breadth, &c. And therefore some of the rabbins have been so wise as to put both together, as J. Bened. Carpovius observes out of several of them (upon Schickard's Jus Regium, cap. 5, theor. 16, p. 285), who thus speak: "God showed him the whole land, as in a garden plot, forty miles in breadth, and as many in length; and gave his eyes such a power of contemplating the whole land, from the beginning to the end, that he saw hills and dales, what was open and what was enclosed, remote or nigh, at one view."

Thou shalt not go over thither.] This he had often said to him: and now mentions it, that he might die in a comfortable sense that he had been as good as his word to him, and consequently carry this belief along with him into the other world, that he would make good the oath which he swore to their fathers, of bringing them into Canaan, and there fulfil all that he had foretold.

Ver. 5. So Moses the servant of the Lord] So God himself calls him after his death, in the next book, Josh. i. 2, 7, as the most eminent minister of his, that he had hitherto employed in Israel. But the observation of R. Bechai is not well founded, that he is not called "the servant of the Lord" till after he was dead, and then admitted into the nearest familiarity with the Divine Majesty: for though these very words are not used, yet the Lord calls him "my servant Moses," which is the same thing, Numb. xii. 7.

Died there in the land of Moab.] For this country was still so called, because it anciently belonged to the Moabites (see Numb. xxi. 26), from whom Sihon had taken it, as Israel now had taken it from him: so that he really died in the land of Israel.

According to the word of the Lord.] The Jerusalem Targum expounds this very soberly, "According to the sentence of the decree of the Lord;" that is, as the Lord had determined and declared he should, xxxii. 49, 50. And so this phrase is commonly used in this very book, xvii. 6, 10, 11, as well as in other places of the Pentateuch, Numb. ix. 20, xiii. 3, &c., which will warrant this interpretation, that Moses did not die of any disease, nor was worn out with age, but merely because God, the supreme governor of all things, so ordered it. But some of the Jews, not satisfied with this, have far-fetched conceits concerning the death of Moses from these words: for because it is said he died, al pi, "at the mouth (as the words are literally in the Hebrew) of the Lord," Maimonides himself saith, that their wise men think (and he seems of their opinion), that it signifies the Lord drew his soul out of his body with a kiss. And thus died Aaron and Miriam, but none besides them. Of 6 And he buried him in a valley in the land of Moab, over against Beth-peor: but no man knoweth of his sepulchre unto this day.

Aaron indeed it is expressly said, he died at pi, "of the Lord," but it is not said of Miriam; and yet they will have her to have had the same favour; that is, they died, saith he, of too much love, from the pleasure they had in the thoughts of God; which apprehension of God, conjunct with the highest love to him, he thinks is called kissing (Cant. i. 2), "Let him kiss me with the kisses of his mouth" (More Nevochim, par. iii. cap. 51). But this is not the meaning of the phrase, though no doubt Moses departed this life in a most delectable sense and taste of the Divine love, having no unwillingness to die, nor being surprised with death; for he knew the time, and the place, and the manner of it: and as he did not die of any disease (as was said before), or of old age, or by external force, but only by the will and pleasure of God, who took his soul out of his body; so he did not part with it against his will, nor with any fear, but with a placid mind and composed spirit committed himself to God, in whose embraces (as we may speak) he expired: and this it is likely the ancient Jews meant, when they said "his soul departed with a kiss."

As to the time of his death, the Scripture doth not mention the year, the month, and the day; but the Jews commonly place it in the last month of the fortieth year after their coming out of Egypt, called Adar, and the seventh day of that month. Thus they say, in Seder Olam Rabba, cap. 10, and in their calendar which they now follow; and so Patricides in Hottinger's Smegma Orientale, p. 457. But our great primate of Ireland in his Annals observes, that it agrees better with the following history, to place his death in the first day of that month; and Torriellus makes the same computation, that it must be either in the latter end of the eleventh month, or in the beginning of the twelfth.

Ver. 6. He buried him] This refers to the words foregoing; viz. the Lord, who commanded his angels to bury him. So Epiphanius, ἐπιταφίαν αἱ ἄγγελοι, &c. Hæres. ix. p. 28, and see p. 600. Though in the Scripture active words are very often used passively, and the meaning may be only that he was buried, yet there is this to be said for the other sense, that thereupon it is thought, that the contest arose between Michael the archangel and the devil (as St. Chrysostom, Theodoret, Procopius Gazæus, and others take it), who would not have had him buried, but opposed it, that he might administer an occasion to the Jews to commit idolatry; though we never find that the Jews were given to the worship of relics, as our most learned Usher observes in his Annals (see there).

In a valley in the land of Moab, over against Beth-peor.] This valley was in the land of Sihon, king of the Amorites (iv. 46), who had taken it from the Moabites, as I noted before, and was now possessed by the Israelites. And Beth-Peor was a part of the possession of Reuben, (Josh. xiii. 20), which was a place where the temple of Peor anciently stood; from whence it had its name: for this idol is not only called Baal-Peor, but simply Peor (Josh. xxii. 17); and as Beth-Baal is the temple of Baal, so Beth-Peor is the temple of Peor, as I. Ger. Vossius observes, De Orig. et Progr. Idol. lib. ii. cap. 7.

Now by all these circumstances of his burial, it appears how frivolous that opinion of the Jews is, mentioned in Jalkut, out of Siphri, that Moses did not really die, but was translated into heaven, where he stands and ministers before God; which conceit Josephus himself follows, lib. iv. Antiq. cap. 8, where he saith, that he having dismissed the elders, who went with him to Mount Abarim, and then conversing awhile with Eleazar and Joshua, while he embraced them, ἐφόρος αἰφνιδίον ἐπί τῶν αὐτῶν σάρατος, "a cloud on a sudden coming upon him," he was snatched out of their sight into a certain valley: which is not only beside, but contrary to the Scripture, which saith he died, and was buried in the valley. And yet some of the ancient fathers, particularly St. Ambrose and St. Hilary, have followed this opinion, that when Moses is said to die, it doth not signify the separation of his soul from his body, but his translation to a better life. See Sixtus Senensis, in his Bibliotheca, lib. v. Annot. 61, where he observes, this is not only against Scripture, but against the sense of almost all ecclesiastical writers.

No man knoweth of his sepulchre unto this day.] These words "unto this day," show that this passage was not written by Moses, as Josephus and Philo imagine, who say he wrote this by the spirit of prophecy (see ver. 1). The reason why his body was concealed most think to have been, lest in future times it should become an object of their worship. So R. Levi ben Gerson: "Future generations, perhaps, might have made a god of him, because of the fame of his miracles: for do we not see how some of the Israelites erred, in the brazen serpent which Moses made?" And the heresy of the Melchisedekians shows this was no vain fear (as Hermannus Witsius observes, lib. i. Miscell. cap. 17), if Epiphanius may be believed, who saith, that in Arabia Petrea, διὰ τὰ θεοσημεῖα τοῦ νομίμου, &c., "they thought him to be God, because of his wonders he wrought," and worshipped his image. What would they have done, if they had had his very body? which he did not desire to be carried into Canaan, and buried among his ancestors, as Joseph ordered concerning his bones: for he understood, it is likely, the mind of God to be, that, as he should not go over Jordan while he was alive, so his body should not be carried over when he was dead; which R. Chama thinks might have proved dangerous, because in the time of their distress (especially at the captivity of the land) the children of Israel might have been prone to run to his sepulchre, and beg him with tears to pray for them, whose prayers had been so prevalent for them in his lifetime: for such a piece of superstition, it seems, crept in among them in latter ages; of which see Wagenseil upon the Gemara of Sota, cap. 1, sect. 52, annot. 2.

But though no man knew where Moses was buried when this was written, yet some Maronite shepherds, we are told, have pretended lately (1655) to find out his tomb, with this inscription in Hebrew, "Moses, the servant of the Lord." A great stir was made about it, as the same Witsius observes, out of Hornius's Historia Ecclesiastica. But a learned Jew, he saith, so confuted the story, showing it was another Moses whose tomb they found, that the report presently vanished; and the learned Wagenseil makes some probable guesses, that it was the tomb of Moses Maimonides (see Annot. 6, in Gemara Sota, cap. 1, sect. 51). But Bartoloccus, in his late Bibliotheca Rabbinica, tom. iii. p. 928, &c., hath made it very probable, that Hornius was imposed upon by somebody in this narration, there being no such authors known among the Jews as R. Jakum, or Jacomus ben Gad, who, he saith, confuted this tale.

Ver. 7. Was an hundred and twenty years old when he died.] A third part of which time, wanting 8 ¶ And the children of Israel wept for Moses in the plains of Moab thirty days: so the days of weeping and mourning for Moses were ended.

9 ¶ And Joshua the son of Nun was full of the spirit of wisdom; for Moses had laid his hands upon him: and the children of Israel hearkened unto him, and did as the LORD commanded Moses.

10 ¶ And there arose not a prophet since in Israel like unto Moses, whom the LORD knew face to face.

11 In all the signs and the wonders, which one month, he had been employed in the government of Israel, as Josephus observes in the conclusion of his fourth book of Antiquities.

His eye was not dim, nor his natural force abated.] That is, he had all the vigour of youth remaining, there being not so much as a wrinkle in his cheek: so some of the ancients interpret the last clause: others, he had not lost so much as a tooth out of his mouth (see Bochartus, in his Hierozoicon, par. i. lib. ii. cap. 45, p. 506). Both Onkelos and the Jerusalem Targum refer it to the splendour of his countenance, which continued to the last. From hence it was that the heathen, who were not wholly unacquainted with this story, but had not a perfect knowledge of it, imagined that Moses was troubled to die, when he was so vigorous; for Trebellius Pollio, in the life of Claudius, saith, that the most learned mathematicians were wont to say, that no man lived beyond a hundred and twenty years: for though Moses lived a hundred and five-and-twenty years (so he mistakes), being Dei, ut Judæorum libri loquantur, familiaris, “a man familiar with God, as the books of the Jews tell us;” yet he complaining that juvenis interiret, “he died when he was young,” they say he was told by an uncertain God, that no man should ever live longer. This mistake arose from their misinterpretation of those words, Gen. vi. 3, “Yet his days shall be an hundred and twenty years;” for Huetius well observes, that this incertus Deus was the true God, the creator of heaven and earth: whom St. Paul saith they called also the unknown God, Demonstr. Evang. propos. 4, cap. 1, n. 57. And I cannot but add, that this passage out of Trebellius was taken notice of above a hundred years ago, by a learned man I have often mentioned, David Chytræus, to show that these sacred books were not unknown to the heathen, and that they had a reverence for them.

Ver. 8. Israel wept for Moses in the plains of Moab thirty days.] The time of mourning for the dead was longer or shorter, according to the dignity of the person. And the Jews have a tradition which distinguishes between the days of weeping and mourning; the former of which never exceeded a month, which was the time they wept for Moses; the latter never lasted more than a year, as they gathered from the example of the greatest doctor they ever had, R. Judah, who composed the Mishna; for whom they mourned twelve months (see Schickard, in his Jus Regium, cap. 6, theor. 19, and upon Gen. 1. 3, 10; Numb. xx. 29).

So the days of weeping and mourning for Moses were ended.] They lamented him completely thirty days, and no longer. By which it seems, that weeping and mourning (whatsoever difference was between them) were anciently of the same length, though the Jews, in the forenamed tradition, are pleased to make the one last much longer than the other.

Now by this, and what follows in the book of Joshua, we may certainly know the truth of what I said (on ver. 5) concerning the day on which Moses died; for if we add unto these thirty days, which followed immediately upon it, the three days wherein the spies lay hid in the mountain (Josh. ii. 22), and allow three or four days more for their going and coming back, and then add the three days they lay by Jordan before they passed over (Josh. iii. 2), they make just a month and ten days, from the first day of the last month, when I suppose Moses died, unto the day they got safe over Jordan, which was the tenth day of the first month; whereas, if we reckon as the Jews do, that Moses died on the seventh day of the last month, it would have been the seventeenth day of the first month before they got over Jordan. I observe also, that, though the Talmudists generally make him to have died on the seventh day of Adar, yet there have been some who placed it on the first; for the Medrasch Rabbah, telling the story of Haman's casting lots to find the best time to do execution on the Jews, saith he pitched upon the month Adar, because it had been unlucky to the Jews, by the death of their master Moses therein. But he did not consider, saith that Medrasch, that “as Moses died on the first day of this month, so he was born on the same first day.”

Ver. 9. And Joshua the son of Nun was full of the spirit of wisdom;] To take the government upon him, and manage it prudently, as soon as Moses left them; which was necessary to be mentioned, that it might not be thought they wanted a head to conduct them, as their neighbours possibly might imagine, when the news came of Moses's death: for, as the Samaritans tell the story, (in Hottinger's Smegma Orientale, p. 462), when they heard the lamentations which the whole congregation made for Moses, they began to rejoice, and gather their forces together to set upon the Israelites, as wanting a leader: but they soon found themselves mistaken, Joshua having taken the charge of them, and being endued with his spirit.

For Moses had laid his hands upon him;] Whereby he committed to him the supreme authority after his departure, and implored the Spirit of God to qualify him for it; for power to execute any office among the Jews was given by laying on of hands, whereby they were ordained and appointed to it. And this was a rite of prayer also, as many have observed for the obtaining the gifts of the Spirit, which were necessary for the discharge of that office. And, though no words of prayer be mentioned, yet the very “laying on of hands” denotes it, as our learned Dr. Outram observes from this very place, and from 1 Tim. v. 22, lib. i. De Sacrific. cap. 15, n. 8. Of Moses's laying on hands upon Joshua, we read Numb. xxvii. 15, &c. And he was solemnly also, a little before Moses's death, presented unto God, by his own command, xxxi. 14, &c. of this book.

Israel hearkened unto him,] Obeyed him as their supreme governor, according to God's command, delivered to Moses, Numb. xxvii. 20; Deut. xxxi. 23 (see Josh. i. 16, 17, &c.).

Ver. 10. There arose not a prophet since in Israel like unto Moses.] This is a plain demonstration, that the promise God makes by Moses, that he would raise up “a Prophet like to him” (Deut. xviii. 15, 19, &c.), was not fulfilled either in Joshua or in Samuel (who it is likely wrote this chapter, as I said before), and the best of the Jews confess, shall not be fulfilled till Messiah come. Thus the author of Sephir Ikkarim, lib. iii. cap. 20, “It cannot be, but that a prophet shall at last arise like to Moses, or greater the Lord sent him to do in the land of Egypt to Pharaoh, and to all his servants, and to all his land, 12 And in all that mighty hand, and in all the great terror which Moses shewed in the sight of all Israel.

than he; for the king Messiah shall be as great or greater: therefore these words are not to be expounded, as if there should never be such a prophet, but that in all the time of the following prophets, till the cessation of prophecy, none should arise like to Moses. But after that, there shall be one like him, or rather greater than he."

Whom the Lord knew face to face.] Or, as De Dieu thinks it should be translated, "Who knew the Lord face to face." This was one pre-eminence of Moses above all the prophets, that he conversed more familiarly with God than any of them did. See Numb. xii. 8, which place explains this: for "to know him face to face," was to speak familiarly to God, and to hear God speaking in like manner unto him. And so the Jerusalem Targum expounds these words; only instead of the Lord, he saith, "Who knew the Word of the Lord talking with him," and delivering to him most excellent laws, for the good government of his people. In which laws he still lives, they all remaining upon record to this day, when the laws of all the famous lawgivers, whom the gentiles honoured as gods are obliterated: but it must be observed, that in this wherein Moses excelled all the prophets, our blessed Saviour far transcended him: for he was "in the bosom of the Father" (John i. 18), and spake "what he saw and heard," &c. (Josh. iii. 11, 32).

Ver. 11.] The Jerusalem Targum hath it, "Which the Word of the Lord sent him to do in the land of Egypt, to Pharaoh, and to all his servants, and to all his land" (see iv. 34, vi. 22, vii. 19). In these signs and wonders Moses excelled all the prophets, doing more miracles than all that succeeded him, as Maimonides observes, More Nevoch. par. ii. cap. 35. But our blessed Saviour excelled him in this, as well as them; doing more wonders than all the prophets put together had done from the beginning of the world, and far greater also than theirs (John xxi. ult.).

Ver. 12. In all that mighty hand, and in all the great terror which Moses shewed] As the former verse relates to what he did in Egypt, so this hath respect unto their passing through the Red Sea, and to all that befell them in the wilderness, both at the giving of the law, and afterward till this time: so the Jerusalem Targum expounds these words, "In all that strong hand, and in all those great visions, which Moses managed." And Onkelos to the same purpose.

In the sight of all Israel.] In the place forenamed, Maimonides insists much upon this, that Moses wrought all his miracles publicly, the whole congregation being witnesses of them. And so our Saviour commonly wrought his (till they sought to kill him) in their synagogues, at their public feasts, when there was the greatest concourse of the people of Israel: so that in this he was a prophet "like unto Moses," though infinitely superior; which some of the old Jews could not but discern (as I observed upon ch. xviii.), when upon these words of Isa. lii. 13, "He shall be exalted and extolled, and be very high," they thus gloss in Tanchuma, which is an ancient book among them, "This is the king Messiah who shall be exalted above Abraham, extolled above Moses, and be very high above the angels of the ministry." Upon which Conradus Pellicanus thus glosses, and concludes his commentary, as I shall do mine, with these words: "What it is to be above the angels, let the Jews explain; we can understand nothing by it, but the very Word of God, which was in the beginning with God, and was God, by whom all things were made, and without him nothing was made, viz. the Lord God of hosts: to whom in perfect unity, God the Father, Son, and Holy Spirit, be all honour, and glory for ever." Amen.

Thus ends the Pentateuch, which, as our great primate of Ireland computes, contains the history of two thousand five hundred and fifty-two years and a half, from the beginning of the world to the death of Moses.

THE BOOK OF J O S H U A.

This title doth not necessarily signify that this book was written by JOSHUA, as the five foregoing were by Moses, but only that it contains the acts done by Joshua. Yet there want not arguments to prove that Joshua was the author of this book: for though Grotius and many other modern writers, with some of the ancients, think they find reasons in the book itself against this opinion; yet the ancient Talmudists, and several of the later, ascribe it to him, being principally induced thereunto by those words in the last chapter of this book, ver. 26, which I cannot say are an evident proof of it (for those words may relate only to the covenant mentioned in that chapter); but thus they say expressly in Bava-bathra, cap. I, "Joshua wrote his own book, and the last eight verses of the law;" and then concerning the last five verses of this book, they write after this manner in the same place; "Eleazar wrote the twenty-ninth verse, &c. of the twenty-fourth chapter, as Phineas did ver. 33." And there are men of excellent learning who have undertaken to answer all that can be objected unto this (particularly Daniel Huetius, in his Demonstratio Evang. propos. 4). Which objections I shall consider in their proper places, where they seem to arise in this book.

Which the Jews reckon among the first prophets (as they call them), though it contain only a history of what passed till the death of Joshua; which, in all likelihood, he would not neglect to write himself, as Moses did what passed in his time, that every tribe and every family might have an unquestionable title to their inheritance under his own hand, who had by God's order made a division of the land; and that all posterity might see the promises made unto them by Moses were so punctually fulfilled, that there failed not aught of any good thing which the Lord had spoken, but all came to pass, as he observes xxi. 45, and that in a short time: for this book contains the history of the Israelites, from the death of Moses to the death of Joshua; that is, as some compute, for the space of seventeen years, or rather, near twenty-seven (see upon xiv. 10).

CHAPTER I.

1 The Lord appointeth Joshua to succeed Moses. 3 The borders of the promised land. 5, 9 God promiseth to assist Joshua. 8 He giveth him instructions. 10 He prepareth the people to pass over Jordan. 12 Joshua putteth the two tribes and half in mind of their promise to Moses. 16 They promise him fealty.

1 Now after the death of Moses the servant of the LORD it came to pass, that the LORD spake unto Joshua the son of Nun, Moses' minister, saying,

2 Moses my servant is dead; now therefore arise, go over this Jordan, thou, and all this people, unto the land which I do give to them, even to the children of Israel.

3 Every place that the sole of your foot shall tread upon, that have I given unto you, as I said unto Moses.

4 From the wilderness and this Lebanon even unto the great river, the river Euphrates, all the land of the Hittites, and unto the great sea toward the going down of the sun, shall be your coast.

5 There shall not any man be able to stand

As I said unto Moses.] He would not have them doubt of what Moses said from him (Deut. xi. 24), though he were dead.

Ver. 4. From the wilderness.] This was the bounds of the country on the south.

This Lebanon.] Which was the bounds on the north. And Joshua seems now to have been in sight of it; to which the Divine Majesty directed his observation, as the most eminent mountain in those parts of the world.

Even unto the great river—Euphrates.] Which was the eastern bounds, and called by other authors the great river, as I have observed on Deut. i. 7.

All the land of the Hittites.] Who were a very powerful people in the country, dwelling, together with the Amorites, in the mountainous parts of it (Numb. xiii. 29), some of which were of the race of the giants, and are therefore particularly mentioned, to show that the most terrible people should not be able to stand before Joshua; but he should either destroy them, or expel them, and make them flee their country as these Hittites did; of whom we read, and of their kings, 2 Kings vii. 6.

Unto the great sea.] The Mediterranean, which was the western border, as it here follows.

Toward the going down of the sun.] See upon Deut. xi. 24, and in other places.

Ver. 5. Be able to stand before thee.] Deut. vii. 24. As I was with Moses, so I will be with thee:] To subdue all the people of Canaan before him: as he did the Egyptians, the two kings of the Amorites, and the Midianites before Moses; to counsel also, and advise him in all difficulties, as he had done Moses.

I will not fail thee,] See upon Deut. xxxi. 6, 8. On which promise they relied in future times (1 Kings viii. 57).

CHAP. I.

Ver. 1. After the death of Moses.] Thus those books are wont to begin, whose argument relates to the book foregoing. As the book of Judges is in this manner connected with this of Joshua, and the book of Ruth with that of Judges; and the LXX. make such a preface to join the book of Lamentations with the prophecy of Jeremiah.

After the death of Moses.] I suppose immediately after the days of mourning for him were ended (Deut. xxxiv. 8).

The servant of the Lord.] See Deut. xxxiv. 5.

It came to pass, that the Lord spake unto Joshua the son of Nun,] Out of the sanctuary, it is most likely, from whence he had spoken to him a little before Moses's death, and made him a promise of what he orders him now to accomplish (Deut. xxxi. 14, 23), and where Eleazar was appointed long before to ask counsel for him, when there was great occasion (Numb. xxvii. 21).

Moses' minister,] Who had attended upon Moses from the beginning, in his highest employment (Exod. xxiv. 13; Deut. i. 38).

Ver. 2. Moses my servant is dead;] He hath finished his work, and can do me no farther service.

Now therefore arise,] Put an end therefore unto your mourning for him, and go about the business which he hath left thee to perform.

Go over this Jordan,] Within sight of which they lay encamped.

Unto the land which I do give to them,] As he promised when he changed his name from Oshea into Joshua (Numb. xiii. 16; Deut. i. 38, iii. 28).

Ver. 3. Every place.] Within the limits mentioned in the next verse.

before thee all the days of thy life : as I was with Moses, so I will be with thee : I will not fail thee, nor forsake thee.

6 Be strong and of a good courage : for unto this people shalt thou divide for an inheritance the land, which I swear unto thy fathers to give them.

7 Only be thou strong and very courageous, that thou mayest observe to do according to all the law, which Moses my servant commanded thee : turn not from it to the right hand or to the left, that thou mayest prosper whithersoever thou goest.

8 This book of the law shall not depart out of thy mouth ; but thou shalt meditate therein day and night, that thou mayest observe to do according to all that is written therein : for then thou shalt make thy way prosperous, and then thou shalt have good success.

Ver. 6. Be strong] This charge he had given him before the death of Moses (Deut. xxxi. 23), and David gave the same to Solomon (1 Chron. xxviii. 20).

Unto this people shalt thou divide for an inheritance the land] He had promised him, in the place before named, that he "should bring them into the land," &c., and here now adds, that he should settle them in the possession of it, by assigning every one their portion in it; which he did by such a Divine direction as silenced all disputes about it.

Ver. 7. Only be thou strong and very courageous,] It requires the greatest courage and resolution, especially in a governor, to be truly pious and religious, by observing the laws himself, and seeing them observed by others.

Turn not from it to the right hand or to the left,] By adding to it, or taking away from it (Deut. xii. ult.) or, more simply, no way deviate from it; for it is a metaphor from men in a journey, who go straight forward in the plain highway, and turn not aside into by-paths, which lead they know not whither.

That thou mayest prosper] Or do wisely, as it is in the margin; for it is the greatest policy to be truly religious.

Ver. 8. This book of the law] The original of which was preserved in the sanctuary; from whence God now spake to him (Deut. xxxi. 26).

Shall not depart out of thy mouth;] He was to read in it continually, that he might instruct others and be thereby an example to all future governors and kings according to the law (Deut. xvii. 18, 19). By which it is evident, that Joshua had a copy of the law; which was then written and extant in his time.

But thou shalt meditate therein] His other weighty employments were not to hinder him from pondering as well as reading, the law of God; because it was to be his rule in all his private transactions and public administrations.

That thou mayest observe to do] Which was not possible without the serious and attentive consideration before mentioned.

Thou shalt make thy way prosperous, and—have good success.] Or do wisely. Prudence and prosperity go together: but no prudence is comparable to the strict observance of the laws of God, upon which the felicity of kingdoms and states depends.

Ver. 9.] He confirms him in the resolution he had put into him (ver. 6), by two arguments, the Divine vocation, and the Divine presence with him (see Deut.

9 Have not I commanded thee? Be strong and of a good courage; be not afraid, neither be thou dismayed: for the Lord thy God is with thee whithersoever thou goest.

10 ¶ Then Joshua commanded the officers of the people, saying,

11 Pass through the host, and command the people, saying, Prepare you victuals; for within three days ye shall pass over this Jordan, to go in to possess the land, which the Lord your God giveth you to possess it.

12 ¶ And to the Reubenites, and to the Gadites, and to half the tribe of Manasseh, spake Joshua, saying, 13 Remember the word which Moses the servant of the Lord commanded you, saying, The Lord your God hath given you rest, and hath given you this land.

14 Your wives, your little ones, and your

i. 29, 30, xxxi. 6—8). The latter of which the Targum thus expresseth, "For the Word of the Lord thy God shall be for thy help, in every place where thou goest" (see ver. 14).

Ver. 10. Joshua commanded the officers] I have often observed, that as shophetim were judges, who heard causes in their courts, and pronounced sentence; so shoterim were inferior officers belonging to the court, who summoned people to attend, and executed the sentence; for after Moses had mentioned (Deut. i. 15) the chief of their tribes, captains over thousands, and hundreds, and fifties, and tens, he at last mentions these officers among their tribes; who were employed, it appears by this place, in the camp, as well as in the courts of justice.

Ver. 11. Command the people, saying, Prepare you victuals;] They were to make proclamation not only in all the four camps of Israel, but in the several tribes who were under those standards, to provide themselves with such victuals as the country of Sihon and Og, which they had lately conquered, afforded. For being, after three days (iii. 1), to remove very early in the morning, perhaps they might not have had time to gather manna sufficient, and to prepare it before they began their march.

For within three days.] See iii. 1, 2.

Ye shall pass over this Jordan,] Which was not so far from Shittim, where they now lay, but they could see it.

Which the Lord your God giveth you to possess it.] He constantly remembers them of this donation from God; both to strengthen their faith, and to excite their thankfulness. "For they got not the land in possession by their own sword, neither did their arm save them; but his right hand, &c., because he had a favour to them," as the Psalmist speaks, xlv. 3.

Ver. 12.] Here he begins to do according to the command of Moses, as God before directed him, ver. 7, 8. For Moses had given this charge to the Reubenites, &c., when he gave them their possession on this side Jordan, Numb. xxxii. 20, 21, &c., and put them in mind of it again, Deut. iii. 18, &c.

Ver. 13. Remember the word which Moses—commanded you,] It is very observable, how gently and not imperiously Joshua exercises his authority, at his first entrance upon his office. For he only puts them in mind of what Moses required from them, and leaves them to reflect upon the promise they made to him.

The Lord your God hath given you—this land.] That is, actually bestowed upon them a country to settle in.

cattle, shall remain in the land which Moses gave you on this side Jordan; but ye shall pass before your brethren armed, all the mighty men of valour, and help them;

15 Until the Lord have given your brethren rest, as he hath given you, and they also have possessed the land which the Lord your God giveth them: then ye shall return unto the land of your possession, and enjoy it, which Moses the Lord's servant gave you on this side Jordan, toward the sunrising.

16 ¶ And they answered Joshua, saying,

For here their wives, and children, and cattle remained (with a sufficient number of persons to look after them), when they marched into Canaan, as it follows in the next verse.

Ver. 14. Ye shall pass before your brethren armed.] March in the front of them, to show their forwardness to bring them into the same happy condition with themselves.

All the mighty men of valour, and help them.] Such as Joshua picked out; for it is evident they did not all go over, but only forty thousand of them (iv. 13). The rest, though fit for war, were left to defend their wives, children, and flocks, while those mighty men of valour went to help their brethren.

Ver. 15. Until the Lord have given your brethren rest.] A settled possession of the land of Canaan, as they had of the land of the two kings of the Amorites.

They also have possessed the land] He would have them look upon the conquest of the land as certain, because God had made a grant of it to their brethren.

Which Moses—gave you on this side Jordan] According to the agreement which Moses had made with them (Numb. xxxiii. 20—22).

Ver. 16.] It is likely, this was the answer not only of the Reubenites, Gadites, and Manassites, but of all the rest of the tribes; before whom Joshua puts these two tribes and a half in mind of their duty: which they all engage to perform exactly; these words containing a full recognition of Joshua's authority, and their absolute submission to it.

Ver. 17. According as we hearkened unto Moses in all things, so will we hearken unto thee.] Here they acknowledge his authority to be equal to that of Moses,

All that thou commandest us we will do, and whithersoever thou sendest us, we will go.

17 According as we hearkened unto Moses in all things, so will we hearken unto thee: only the Lord thy God be with thee, as he was with Moses.

18 Whosoever he be that doth rebel against thy commandment, and will not hearken unto thy words in all that thou commandest him, he shall be put to death: only be strong and of a good courage.

who was undoubtedly set over them by God, as they now own Joshua to be.

Only the Lord thy God be with thee, as he was with Moses.] These words are not a restriction of their obedience, which did not depend upon his successes, but a solemn prayer to God, of whom they desired no other governor than Joshua, that he would make him as victorious as Moses was over all their enemies. Therefore, some translate the words, not only, but "may the Lord thy God," &c., or, "Since the Lord thy God hath promised to be with thee." The Targum paraphrases these words as he did ver. 9, "Only let the Word of the Lord thy God be thy helper, as he was to Moses."

Ver. 18. Whosoever he be that doth rebel—shall be put to death.] This seems to be the voice of all the people, and of their elders, or a decree made by the elders, as the Jews understand it: who, looking upon Joshua to be a king, as Moses was, extend this to all the kings of Israel in following times. So Guil. Schickard observes out of Maimonides in his Mischpat Hammelech, cap. 4, theor. 14. p. 101. But it should rather be said, that Joshua was a king and a prophet as Moses was; and the law, as Rasi observes, ordered him to be put to death that transgressed the orders of Moses, and of a prophet.

Only be strong] He had the greater reason to be courageous, since they resolved as one man, to stand by him, and never to disobey him. And therefore the word rak, which we translate only, should rather be translated therefore, as it plainly signifies, xiii. 6, where, speaking of the land that remained to be possessed, God promises to drive out the inhabitants, and therefore bids Joshua to divide it to the Israelites for an inheritance.

CHAPTER II.

1 Rahab receiveth and concealeth the two spies sent from Shittim. 8 The covenant between her and them. 23 Their return and relation.

1 AND Joshua the son of Nun sent out of Shittim two men to spy secretly, saying, Go view the land, even Jericho. And they went, and came into an harlot's house, named Rahab, and lodged there.

2 And it was told the king of Jericho, saying,

CHAP. II.

Ver. 1. Joshua—sent] Or had sent, before the directions given to the officers, mentioned in the foregoing chapter, ver. 10, 11, which best agrees with the twenty-second verse of this chapter, and the rest of the story.

Out of Shittim] Which was in the plains of Moab, where Israel now lay (Deut. xxxiv. 1), called Abel-Shittim, Numb. xxxiii. 49.

Two men] Which were sufficient for the business they went about.

To spy secretly] So that none were privy to it among the Israelites but Joshua; who, it is probable, did not send them without an order from God, who intended to dispose things so, that they should bring back to him a great encouragement to his faith.

Saying, Go view the land] Not the whole country of Canaan, but only that part of it which lay about Jericho, as it here follows: whose fortifications they were to observe, and the approaches to it, with the strength that was in it.

They went] Over the fords of Jordan, I suppose, mentioned ver. 7.

Behold, there came men in hither to night of the children of Israel to search out the country.

3 And the king of Jericho sent unto Rahab, saying, Bring forth the men that are come to thee, which are entered into thine house: for they be come to search out all the country.

4 And the woman took the two men, and hid them, and said thus, There came men unto me, but I wist not whence they were:

5 And it came to pass about the time of shutting of the gate, when it was dark, that the men went out: whither the men went I wot not: pursue after them quickly; for ye shall overtake them.

Came into an harlot's house, named Rahab.] Who kept a public house, or an inn, to entertain strangers: by going into which, they thought they would be less suspected of any design. The word zonah, which is commonly translated a harlot, the Chaldee paraphrase renders pundakitha; which is plainly the Greek word παδοζια, signifying she kept a house of public reception. And so St. Chrysostom calls this woman, in his second sermon of repentance, παδοζειτραν: for there is no doubt she kept a public house. But such persons, in those days, made their bodies as public as their houses; and, therefore, she is constantly called Rahab the harlot by the ancients; and even by two apostles, who call her πορνη (Heb. xi. 21; James ii. 25). For so she had been, though now it is probable, converted by the faith which was wrought in her. Which was so eminent, that she was not only admitted into the society of God's people, but married into a noble family of the tribe of Judah, from whom Christ sprung (Matt. i. 5), and is propounded as an example of lively faith unto all Christians (Heb. xi. 31; James ii. 25).

Lodged there.] Took up their lodging in her house, by a divine direction, as appeared afterward.

Ver. 2. It was told the king of Jericho.] Who was not negligent, we may well think, to set a watch to observe who came in and went out of the city.

Behold, there came men in hither to night] In the evening, which was the most proper time to come into the city undiscovered, because then the people, whose business lay out of the city, were generally going home to their own houses.

Of the children of Israel] As they judged by their habit, or language, or aspect.

To search] For they could not think they came for any other end.

Ver. 3.] He sent some officers with a warrant to apprehend them, and to require her to deliver them up into their hands, as enemies of their country.

Ver. 4. The woman took the two men, and hid them,] Or rather had hidden them before the officers came; having heard, it is likely, a rumour that they were discovered, and search would be made for them.

There came men unto me, but I wist not whence they were:] She could not deny that she received such strange guests, but would not own that she knew from what country they came: nor was it her business to make such inquiry, her house being open unto all.

Ver. 5. About the time of shutting of the gate,] The gate of the city next to her house, which was wont to be shut (as they are now in all well-governed cities) at a certain hour.

When it was dark,] And consequently few or none stirring in the street.

Whither the men went I wot not:] She would have them think they went both out of the house and out

6 But she had brought them up to the roof of the house, and hid them with the stalks of flax, which she had laid in order upon the roof.

7 And the men pursued after them the way to Jordan unto the fords: and as soon as they which pursued after them were gone out, they shut the gate.

8 ¶ And before they were laid down, she came up unto them upon the roof;

9 And she said unto the men, I know that the Lord hath given you the land, and that your terror is fallen upon us, and that all the inhabitants of the land faint because of you.

10 For we have heard how the Lord dried of the city; though she knew not which way they went, it being dark.

Pursue after them quickly; for ye shall overtake them.] Yet it was so little a while since they went out, that she would have them believe they could not, if they made haste, but overtake them before they got over Jordan. For if they were Israelites, it might be certainly concluded they went that way. Nobody can say that Rahab did not tell an untruth; but this may be said in her excuse: that it is no wonder if she thought it lawful, if not necessary, so to do, for the saving of the life of innocent men. Since several great philosophers have been of that opinion, and some of the ancient fathers of the church; particularly St. Austin confesses it to be a very difficult question, cap. xv. ad Consentium; and Arius Montanus upon this very place, makes it one's duty to elude those who we think intend to do mischief to others: which he pretends to justify by many examples, in a discourse concerning Men's true and certain Duties. But that is too bold an undertaking; since the fathers before St. Austin, and all the Jews condemn this practice.

Ver. 6. She had brought them up to the roof of the house,] Which was made flat, so that men might lie or walk upon it in those countries (see Deut. xxii. 8).

Had them with the stalks of flax,] Covered them all over with the stalks of flax, which I suppose were newly cut, and laid upon the roof of the house to be dried by the sun, till they were fit to be peeled. Or, as some think, these were stalks of flax cut the year before; and made use of now to show that nobody was gone upon the roof, where she laid them.

Ver. 7. The men pursued after them the way to Jordan unto the fords:] Where Jordan was so shallow that men might wade, or so narrow that they might soon swim over it. There the pursuers lay three days, waiting to catch them in their return.

As soon as they—were gone out, they shut the gate,] Which, being opened to let the pursuers out, was immediately shut again; that if the spies lurked in the city, they might not escape in the dark; and that no other person might enter, who they might possibly think lay watching an opportunity to get in.

Ver. 8. Before they were laid down,] To compose themselves to sleep; which after their journey they might be glad to take anywhere.

She came up unto them] To bring them down, it is likely, to a more commodious lodging.

Ver. 9. I know that the Lord hath given you the land,] Wonder not that I have taken such care of your preservation; for I believe in the Lord as you do, and know that he hath bestowed this country upon you for your possession.

And that your terror is fallen upon us,] She was up the water of the Red sea for you, when ye came out of Egypt; and what ye did unto the two kings of the Amorites, that were on the other side Jordan, Sihon and Og, whom ye utterly destroyed.

11 And as soon as we had heard these things, our hearts did melt, neither did there remain any more courage in any man, because of you: for the LORD your God, he is God in heaven above, and in earth beneath.

12 Now therefore, I pray you, swear unto me by the LORD, since I have shewed you kindness, that ye will also shew kindness unto my father's house, and give me a true token:

13 And that ye will save alive my father, the more confident of their success; because she observed the people of the land were struck with such a dread of them, as not to be able to defend their country against them (see Deut. xi. 25).

Ver. 10. For we have heard how the Lord dried up the water of the Red sea for you,] And there overthrew Pharaoh and his host, after he had smitten him and his country with divers miraculous plagues. The report of which was come to them, as well as their passing through the sea: which, though it was forty years ago, was remembered with astonishment.

What ye did unto the two kings of the Amorites,] This was a thing of fresh memory, and could not but strike them with consternation; these two kings being very potent; and their near neighbours and allies. For they were part of the Amorites, who dwelt in the mountainous parts of this country; as was before observed.

Ver. 11. As soon as we had heard these things,] As Moses prophesied they would (Exod. xv. 14, 15).

Our hearts did melt,] The same phrase in Deut. i. 28, where we translate it discouraged: and so it is here explained in the next words.

Neither did there remain any more courage in any man,] The most valiant among them were utterly disheartened.

For the Lord your God, he is God in heaven above, and in earth beneath,] This is a plain confession of the true God, the creator of heaven and earth; wherein he rules and governs all things according to his pleasure. This is her faith celebrated by the apostle to the Hebrews, which moved her to entertain the spies, and to preserve them with the danger of her own life, if she had been discovered.

Ver. 12. Swear unto me by the Lord,] The Targum hath it, "by the Word of the Lord." An oath was the greatest security that could be desired for the performance of what they promised. For all nations expected grievous punishments would fall upon perjured persons; which they that feared the Lord, the true God, above all men dreaded (see Selden, lib. ii. De Synedr. cap. 11, n. 4).

Since I have shewed you kindness,] As they could not but acknowledge.

Shew kindness unto my father's house, and give me a true token:] She asked two things of them; first, that she and her whole family might be preserved, as she had preserved them; and then, that they would give her such a token, as should not fail her; but upon the sight of it, the Israelites should abstain from doing them any hurt.

Ver. 13. That ye will save alive my father, and my mother, &c.] This is a particular explication of what she meant by "his father's house," in the foregoing verse; and shows that she had no husband, nor children.

and my mother, and my brethren, and my sisters, and all that they have, and deliver our lives from death.

14 And the men answered her, Our life for your's, if ye utter not this our business. And it shall be, when the LORD hath given us the land, that we will deal kindly and truly with thee.

15 Then she let them down by a cord through the window: for her house was upon the town wall, and she dwelt upon the wall.

16 And she said unto them, Get you to the mountain, lest the pursuers meet you; and hide yourselves there three days, until the pursuers be returned: and afterward may ye go your way.

17 And the men said unto her, We will be

All that they have, &c.] All her kindred, as we translate it, vi. 23. Or the children of her brethren and sisters: or, perhaps, all their cattle, that they could bring with them into her house.

Ver. 14. Our life for your's,] They swore to her (it appears from ver. 17) and wished they might perish, if they did not preserve her and her family. For they did not doubt but Joshua would ratify what they promised, though without his authority, for the public good and safety.

If ye utter not] Do not divulge or declare to any one.

This our business,] In the Hebrew, this our word, i. e. this agreement they had made with her. Lest others should shelter themselves under her roof, or use that token they intended to give her; and thereby secure themselves from destruction. In this they showed great prudence and management; taking care that their gratitude might not prove an obstruction to the public justice.

We will deal kindly and truly with thee,] Upon this condition they promise, when they had taken Jericho (for that is here meant by the land, ver. 1), they would keep their word faithfully with her, and be as kind to her as she had been to them.

Ver. 15. She let them down—through the window:] Which in those countries were large, as appears by the story of Jezebel, whom her eunuchs threw down out of a window, 2 Kings ix. 30, 33.

Her house was upon the town wall,] Both the time (which was in the night) and the place were very commodious to contrive their escape; because her house was adjoining to the wall of the city.

She dwelt upon the wall,] I take the meaning to be, that the apartment she reserved for herself was next to the wall, and built upon it; the rest of her house towards the street being kept for strangers. This gave her the fair opportunity, without any noise, to let them down.

Ver. 16. Get you to the mountain, lest the pursuers meet you:] This was prudent advice, not to go towards Jordan presently, but first to one of the mountains, wherewith the plain of Jericho was surrounded, as Josephus tells us (lib. i. De Bello Judaico, cap. 12, 13, and lib. v. cap. 4): and the Scripture itself informs us as much, 2 Kings ii. 15, 16.

Hide yourselves there] In some of the caves, which were frequent in the mountains.

Three days,] For so long she thought the pursuers might stay about Jordan, waiting for their return.

Until the pursuers be returned:] Which she thought probably would be within that time; and perhaps she understood their orders were to stay no longer.

Ver. 17. The men said unto her,] As she was about to let them down; for it was not safe to have this blameless of this thine oath which thou hast made us swear.

18 Behold, when we come into the land, thou shalt bind this line of scarlet thread in the window which thou didst let us down by: and thou shalt bring thy father, and thy mother, and thy brethren, and all thy father's household, home unto thee.

19 And it shall be, that whosoever shall go out of the doors of thy house into the street, his blood shall be upon his head, and we will be guiltless: and whosoever shall be with thee in the house, his blood shall be on our head, if any hand be upon him.

20 And if thou utter this our business, then we will be quit of thine oath which thou hast made us to swear.

discourse together after they were down; which might have been overheard by the watch.

We will be blameless of this thine oath which thou hast made us swear.] The meaning is, that it should not be their fault if their oath was not kept; and therefore they now name the token, upon which the preservation of her family should depend; with some other conditions that were reasonable to be observed. Which they mention, to show how studious they were not to be guilty of violating their oath.

Ver. 18. Bind this line of scarlet thread] It is called a cord before, ver. 15, and no doubt consisted of so many threads twisted together, as made it a line strong enough to hold the weight of a man's body, and not break. But there are those who doubt whether the Hebrew word sheni signify any thing of the colour, but only a twined or twisted cord, funiculum conculpicatum, or contortum; from shanah to double (see Gataker in his Miscellanea, cap. 40).

In the window which thou didst let us down by:] Or rather, "dost let us down by." For she was about to do it, but had not done it, when they had this discourse with her. Some refer this to the window at which she let them out; but it is most natural to refer it to the line. For by that they were let down; and it was to remain in the window, that the Israelites might see it, as the token that that was the house which was to be saved. Procopius Gazæus compares this scarlet line with the blood which Moses ordered to be struck upon the side posts of their doors, which was a token they should be preserved (Exod. xii. 7, 13).

Bring thy father, &c., home unto thee.] That is, all their children; and perhaps near relations, such as uncles, aunts, and cousins; as we seem to understand it, vi. 23. And one cannot but think, that great-grandfathers and grandmothers, if she had any alive, were comprehended in these words.

Ver. 19. Whosoever shall go out of the doors—his blood shall be upon his head,] They would be bound to preserve none but those who kept in the house. Which was but reasonable, for they did not know how to distinguish them from others, if they were in the street.

Whosoever shall be with thee in the house, his blood shall be on our head, if any hand be upon him.] They would as soon die themselves, as let any of those perish. An emblem of our safety and salvation, by continuing constantly in the church in faith and holiness. For her house was a very fit figure of the 21 And she said, According unto your words, so be it. And she sent them away, and they departed: and she bound the scarlet line in the window.

22 And they went, and came unto the mountain, and abode there three days, until the pursuers were returned: and the pursuers sought them throughout all the way, but found them not.

23 ¶ So the two men returned, and descended from the mountain, and passed over, and came to Joshua the son of Nun, and told him all things that befell them:

24 And they said unto Joshua, Truly the LORD hath delivered into our hands all the land; for even all the inhabitants of the country do faint because of us.

church, especially of the gentiles; who, like her, had gone a whoring after idols, but were converted to serve the living God.

Ver. 20.] They repeat the condition mentioned ver. 14, as of great importance (see there).

Ver. 21. According unto your words, so be it.] She agreed to all the conditions they imposed upon her.

She sent them away,] After this mutual agreement, confirmed with an oath.

She bound the scarlet line in the window.] Immediately, as some think; that the spies might know where to look for it hereafter, and that she might have always before her eyes such a comfortable pledge of her safety. It was more prudent also, as Arius Montanus observes, to do it now, than when the Israelites came to besiege the place; for that novelty might have made the people of Jericho suspect some correspondence.

Ver. 22. They went, and came unto the mountain, and abode there three days.] Being furnished, it is likely, with sufficient provision by Rahab. Many think they stayed there but one whole day, and part of other two, which, according to the style of the Scripture, may be called three days: but their only reason for it is to make these three days, and those mentioned in the first chapter, ver. 11, to be the same, which is not probable.

The pursuers sought them throughout all the way, &c.] Which led to the fords of Jordan. This expresses their diligence, though it wanted success; and, perhaps, there were more ways than one that led thither; in all which they placed themselves, or some other persons, to watch for them.

Ver. 23. So the two men returned, and descended from the mountain,] From whence, perhaps, they could see when the pursuers came back; or they had some intelligence of their return; or, as I said before, that they had commission only to search for them three days.

And passed over,] The river Jordan.
And came to Joshua—and told him all things that befell them:] Since they left him. This shows that Joshua sent them so privately, that it was unknown to the people (as I expounded, ver. 1), for they give him alone an account of what had happened unto them (see vi. 17).

Ver. 24.] This was part of what they had learned from Rahab (ver. 9, &c.), who had strengthened their faith by her own.

CHAPTER III.

1 Joshua cometh to Jordan. 2 The officers instruct the people for the passage. 7 The Lord encourageth Joshua.
 9 Joshua encourageth the people. 14 The waters of Jordan are divided.

1 AND Joshua rose early in the morning; and they removed from Shittim, and came to Jordan, he and all the children of Israel, and lodged there before they passed over.

2 And it came to pass after three days, that the officers went through the host;

3 And they commanded the people, saying, When ye see the ark of the covenant of the LORD your God, and the priests the Levites bearing it, then ye shall remove from your place, and go after it.

CHAP. III.

Ver. 1. Joshua rose early in the morning;] The next morning after he had commanded the officers to warn the host to prepare for their removal (ch. i. 10, 11).

They removed from Shittim.] Where they had lain now above two months; for they came hither on the first day of the eleventh month of the fortieth year after they came out of Egypt (see Deut. i. 3).

Came to Jordan.] Which river, as Josephus tells us, was sixty stadia from Shittim; but it is so uncertain what his stadia or furlongs were, that one can only guess how many of our miles threescore of them made. Most think about seven.

Lodged there.] The Hebrew word jalinu doth not necessarily signify that they lodged there only one night, for it often denotes a longer time of abode; and therefore the Vulgar Latin translates it morati sunt, "they stayed there;" viz., three days, as it follows in the next verse.

Ver. 2.] In the end of the three days before mentioned (ch. i. 10, 11), he sent the same officers there mentioned to make a new proclamation; for it seems to me most reasonable to take all this story in the order wherein it is related, only supposing the spies to have been sent before the first proclamation made by the officers (as I observed, ii. 1, the words may be translated). And thus our great primate of Ireland understands it. After Joshua was confirmed in his office (ch. i. ver. 1, 2, &c.), he sent out the spies, and then commanding the people to provide themselves victuals, he marched from Shittim to Jordan; and the third day (after that command to provide themselves victuals) he gave a new command to prepare themselves to pass over Jordan the next day.

Ver. 3. They commanded the people.] By order from Joshua, and in his name and authority.

Saying, When ye see the ark—and the priests the Levites bearing it.] "Hitherto (saith Kimchi upon this place) the Levites (that is, the children of Kohath) carried the ark; but now the priests are appointed to that office, for the greater sanctification or honour of it, and because of the miracle which was to be wrought before it. Our rabbins say that the priests carried it thus three times; now in this place, and when they compassed Jericho, and when Zadok and Abiathar brought it back to Jerusalem, when David fled from Absalom" (2 Sam. xv. 29). Unto which he adds a fourth, when it was brought into the temple which Solomon built; for the Levites were not permitted to go into the sanctuary, much less into the most holy place, into which it was carried by the priests (1 Kings viii. 6).

Vol. I.—118

4 Yet there shall be a space between you and it, about two thousand cubits by measure: come not near unto it, that ye may know the way by which ye must go: for ye have not passed this way heretofore.

5 And Joshua said unto the people, Sanctify yourselves: for to morrow the LORD will do wonders among you.

6 And Joshua spake unto the priests, saying, Take up the ark of the covenant, and pass over before the people. And they took up

Then ye shall remove from your place, and go after it.] By this it appears the ark was carried in the front of them; whereas usually it was ordered to be carried in the middle of their camps, as we read Numb. ii. 17. But at their first removal from Mount Sinai, which was a time extraordinary, it marched before them for three days (Numb. x. 33), and so it did now (and at no other time), when they were to enter into Canaan, for a special reason also, as I shall observe on the next verse. Concerning the phrase "the priests the Levites," see Deut. xvii. 9.

Ver. 4. Yet there shall be a space between you and it, about two thousand cubits] This is a demonstration that it was not usual for the ark to go before the whole army; for if it had, there would have been no need to instruct them at what distance they should keep from it, which would have been constantly observed.

By measure.] It is likely they measured the distance by a line, at which the people were first set; and then walking in equal paces with the priests, kept at the same distance, though perhaps not precisely; for they might chance to move a pace or two faster, or take larger paces; and therefore he saith about two thousand cubits.

That ye may know the way by which ye must go.] There was the very same reason for the ark's going before them now, that there was when they came from Mount Sinai; for then it was "to search out a resting-place for them;" i. e. to show them where they should rest: and now it was to lead them in the way they were to march, unto their long-expected settlement in the promised land. If it had not been for this, it would have been carried in its usual place; but the pillar of the cloud, which hitherto conducted them, having now left them, as R. Solomon observes, this supplied its place, and went before them, as that had been wont to do.

Ye have not passed this way heretofore.] They were to be led in an untrodden path, which the power of God (of whose presence with them the ark was the symbol) made for them.

Ver. 5. Joshua said unto the people.] The night before they went over Jordan, as appears by the latter part of the verse; and perhaps he spake this himself, at the head of every one of their tribes, it being of great importance.

Sanctify yourselves.] Other places tell us what was their usual sanctification (see Exod. xix. 10, 11; Numb. xi. 18). But besides the legal purifications, one cannot but think that he intended they should dispose their minds by holy meditations and prayer to God to receive his benefits, and to be more sensible of them when they were bestowed on them.

the ark of the covenant, and went before the people.

7 ¶ And the LORD said unto Joshua, This day will I begin to magnify thee in the sight of all Israel, that they may know that, as I was with Moses, so I will be with thee.

8 And thou shalt command the priests that bear the ark of the covenant, saying, When ye are come to the brink of the water of Jordan, ye shall stand still in Jordan.

9 ¶ And Joshua said unto the children of Israel, Come hither, and hear the words of the LORD your God.

To-morrow the Lord will do wonders] Which he would have them be in a condition to observe and to lay to heart; and in order thereunto, prepare themselves by serious thoughts of God and of his providence, as well as by washing their bodies, and abstaining from their wives, which were a part of the sanctification here intended.

Ver. 6. Joshua spake] The next morning.

Take up the ark] Upon their shoulders, for so it was to be carried (Numb. vii. 9).

Pass over before the people.] This precept had been unnecessary if they had been wont to carry it before the people.

They took up the ark] After Joshua had spoken what follows, ver. 7, 8, &c. But it is mentioned now to show the readiness of the priests, as well as of the people, to obey the commands of Joshua; whom they looked upon as a prophet, as Moses was, who had power to give extraordinary orders from God. Such were these for the priests to carry the ark, and to march with it before the people, not in the midst of their camps.

Ver. 7. The Lord said unto Joshua,] By an audible voice, I suppose, from the sanctuary, near unto which he now was; the priests being about to take out the ark from thence, to carry it before the people.

This day] The tenth day of the first month, on which the paschal lamb was by the law to be set apart, to be offered four days after (Exod. xii. 3).

Will I begin to magnify thee in the sight of all Israel,] By doing such wonders before them all, as should convince them Joshua was appointed by God to be their supreme governor, who should give them possession of the land of Canaan (see iv. 14).

As I was with Moses so I will be with thee.] See i. 5. From the time of Moses to the days of Saul, God declared by some extraordinary things whom he would have to be the supreme governor of his people, whose authority he established by doing wonders.

Ver. 8. Thou shalt command the priests that bear the ark] Every thing was done by his order, that it might appear he was powerful with God, who wrought those wonders at his word.

When ye are come to the brink—of Jordan,] Jordan then overflowed beyond its banks; therefore they were not to go to the brink of the river, but of the water.

Ye shall stand still] And there stop till the waters above were suspended, and those below run away; and then they went and stood in the midst of the river (ver. 17).

Ver. 9. Come hither,] To the sanctuary, I suppose, where he now was (ver. 7).

Hear the words of the Lord] Which Joshua reported to them from God, who was about to demonstrate himself to be the omnipotent Lord of all creatures, and in a peculiar manner their God, in covenant with them, and full of kindness to them.

10 And Joshua said, Hereby ye shall know that the living God is among you, and that he will without fail drive out from before you the Canaanites, and the Hittites, and the Hivites, and the Perizzites, and the Girgashites, and the Amorites, and the Jebusites.

11 Behold, the ark of the covenant of the LORD of all the earth passeth over before you into Jordan.

12 Now therefore take you twelve men out of the tribes of Israel, out of every tribe a man.

13 And it shall come to pass, as soon as the soles of the feet of the priests that bear the ark

Ver. 10. Hereby ye shall know that the living God is among you,] These are the words of the Lord their God, who is called the living God, in opposition to the idols of the heathen; who could do nothing, much less such miracles as demonstrated the God of Israel to be the eternal Lord of heaven and earth, who giveth life to all things; and he is said to be among them (or in the midst of them) whom he takes into his protection, to defend and preserve them from all evil.

He will without fail drive out from before you] Most certainly make good his promise made to Abraham long ago (Gen. xv. 18, &c.), because he lives for ever to perform his word.

The Canaanites, &c.] Here all the seven nations are mentioned (as they are Deut. vii. 1), though sometimes only six of them are mentioned, the Girgashites being omitted (see Exod. iii. 17).

Ver. 11. The ark of the covenant] So called, because in it were the two tables of the covenant between God and them. It is frequently called "the ark of the testimony" (Exod. xl. 20, 21; Numb. iv. 5, and here in this book, iv. 16).

Of the Lord of all the earth passeth over before you] To take possession of the land of Canaan, which he gave them as Lord of the whole earth, and as particularly engaged by his covenant to bestow upon them. The author of the book Cosiri understands this as if the ark of the covenant was called "the Lord of the whole earth;" because God was so present with it, that where the ark was there were wonders wrought, which ceased in its absence (par. iv. sect. 3). D. Kimchi and Jos. Albo say the same; and I find Andreas Masius following this fancy; because there is an accent after "the ark of the covenant," distinguishing those words from what follows, which (say they) are therefore added by apposition. But Bonferrius hath confuted this very judiciously, observing, that the accent is not of that nature; and therefore the LXX., the Chaldee, the Vulgar Latin, Symmachus, Aquila, the Syriac, and Arabic, translate it as we do, "the ark of the covenant of the Lord of the whole earth" (see Buxtorf, De Arca, cap. 1). And yet, I know not how it came to pass, some have been so bold as to alter our translation in some printed copies which I have met withal, where these words are thus translated, "the ark of the covenant, even the Lord of the whole earth."

Into Jordan.] By which miracle they were confirmed in their belief of his promise, when they saw the waters of Jordan flee before him.

Ver. 12. Take you twelve men] To do what he should command them (iv. 2, &c.).

Out of every tribe a man.] The tribe of Levi was one of the twelve, upon all accounts but only in the dividing of the land: Ephraim and Manasseh being but one, viz., the tribe of Joseph.

Ver. 13. The ark of the Lord,] Here the ark of the covenant is called the ark of Jehovah (not Jehovah), of the LORD, the LORD of all the earth, shall rest in the waters of Jordan, that the waters of Jordan shall be cut off from the waters that come down from above; and they shall stand upon an heap.

14 ¶ And it came to pass, when the people removed from their tents, to pass over Jordan, and the priests bearing the ark of the covenant before the people;

15 And as they that bare the ark were come unto Jordan, and the feet of the priests that bare the ark were dipped in the brim of the water, (for Jordan overfloweth all his banks all the time of harvest,) who is the Lord, or governor and ruler of the whole earth: in which is comprehended the sea, and the rivers, and all waters, which he commandeth as he pleaseth.

Shall rest in the waters.] Dip their feet in the brim of the waters, as it is explained ver. 15.

That the waters of Jordan shall be cut off from the waters that come down from above:)] The waters which now ran in one stream were divided over against the place where the priests trod; so that the lower part of them ran down the channel towards the Dead Sea; and those above not coming down to supply their place, the ground was left dry.

They shall stand upon an heap.] viz. The waters above, towards the head or springs of the river, were made to stand still, as if they were congealed; rising in a heap, piled one upon another, but not running down at all.

Ver. 14.] The priests moved first, and then the people followed them, at such a distance as Joshua prescribed (ver. 3, 4).

Ver. 15. As they that bare the ark were come unto Jordan,] Which had overflowed, as it here follows, beyond the bounds of the channel.

For Jordan overfloweth all his banks all the time of harvest.] This is meant of barley-harvest, which began about the passover, as many have observed, and particularly Hermannus Conringius, in his book De Initio anni Sabbatici (see upon Deut. xvi. 9). And it appears by the next chapter (iv. 19), that it was in the first month, or the month Abib, when the passover was to be kept; and therefore must signify that harvest) see also 1 Chron. xii. 15). This was likewise a time when the river was more likely to overflow than in wheat-harvest; because now the snow began to melt that was in the neighbouring mountains, especially in Lebanon; at the foot of which was the fountain of Jordan. By which the river was always swollen at this time, and thereby the miracle increased. Such overflows of other rivers, greater than this, are observed by authors at certain seasons, with which I shall not trouble the reader.

Ver. 16. The waters which came down from above stood] Stopped, and ran no farther; but were driven back unto those that were coming down.

Rose up upon an heap] Instead of flowing down the channel, were lifted up in the air; and appeared like a mountain, as the Vulgar Latin translates it.

Very far from the city Adam,] At a great distance from a city then called Adam, which lay upon the river.

That is beside Zaretan.] The former was a small

16 That the waters which came down from above stood and rose up upon an heap very far from the city Adam, that is beside Zaretan: and those that came down toward the sea of the plain, even the salt sea, failed, and were cut off: and the people passed over right against Jericho.

17 And the priests that bare the ark of the covenant of the LORD stood firm on dry ground in the midst of Jordan, and all the Israelites passed over on dry ground, until all the people were passed clean over Jordan.

city, and therefore its situation is described by a place of greater note called Zaretan, which lay on one side of it, in the plain of Jordan, as we read 1 Kings vii. 46.

Those that came down toward the sea of the plain, even the salt sea, failed,] Those waters of the river, which were below, towards the salt sea, into which Jordan emptied itself, ran all thither, and so left the channel perfectly dry, that the people might pass over, which they did, directly over against Jericho.

The people passed over right against Jericho.] Having that famous city in their view; from whence, perhaps, the people on the walls might, with amazement, see the Israelites walk through the river on dry ground. It was a great refreshment also to the Israelites after their march, to pitch their tents in so goodly a plain as this before Jericho.

Ver. 17. The priests—stood firm on dry ground] In one and the same place and posture with their faces towards Jericho.

All the Israelites passed over] Keeping, I suppose, the same distance, of two thousand cubits from the ark; for there was room enough on either side to march by it, and not come near it.

Until all the people were passed clean over] Which they could not do in a short time, unless we suppose them to have marched all in abreast, which is not likely. For there was a certain place called, ever after, by the name of Bethabara, to preserve the memory of their passing over there; which is mentioned John i. 28. It made, therefore, the faith and constancy of the priests very remarkable, who remained so long in the middle of the river, till the whole multitude were got over, without fear of that great mountain of waters from above coming tumbling down upon them.

They who look upon this part of the Divine history as improbable, if not incredible, should consider, what a shame it is to have less faith than the heathens: who lest their gods should be thought less powerful than the God of Israel, forged those stories which the Persians tell of Zoroaster's passing over rivers; and the Greeks of Inachus dried up by Neptune: and other suchlike; which Huëtius hath collected in his Quæstiones Alnetanæ, lib. ii. cap. 12, n. 15. Why then do they call in question the power of the true God; who, either by himself, or his angels, could easily stop the course of a river which he himself made; and both make the waters rise up in a heap, as high as he pleased; and also stand so reared up in a firm hardness, as if they had been congealed?

CHAPTER IV.

1 Twelve men are appointed to take twelve stones for a memorial out of Jordan. 9 Twelve other stones are set up in the midst of Jordan. 10, 19 The people pass over. 14 God magnifieth Joshua. 20 The twelve stones are pitched in Gilgal.

1 AND it came to pass, when all the people were clean passed over Jordan, that the Lord spake unto Joshua, saying,

2 Take you twelve men out of the people, out of every tribe a man,

3 And command ye them, saying, Take you hence out of the midst of Jordan, out of the place where the priests' feet stood firm, twelve stones, and ye shall carry them over with you, and leave them in the lodging place, where ye shall lodge this night.

4 Then Joshua called the twelve men, whom he had prepared of the children of Israel, out of every tribe a man :

5 And Joshua said unto them, Pass over before the ark of the Lord your God into the midst of Jordan, and take you up every man of you a stone upon his shoulder, according unto the number of the tribes of the children of Israel :

6 That this may be a sign among you, that when your children ask their fathers in time to come, saying, What mean ye by these stones ?

7 Then ye shall answer them, That the waters of Jordan were cut off before the ark of the covenant of the Lord; when it passed over Jordan, the waters of Jordan were cut off: and these stones shall be for a memorial unto the children of Israel for ever.

8 And the children of Israel did so as Joshua commanded, and took up twelve stones out of the midst of Jordan, as the Lord spake unto Joshua, according to the number of the tribes of the children of Israel, and carried them over with them unto the place where they lodged, and laid them down there.

9 And Joshua set up twelve stones in the midst of Jordan, in the place where the feet of the priests which bare the ark of the covenant stood : and they are there unto this day.

10 ¶ For the priests which bare the ark stood

CHAP. IV.

Ver. 1. The Lord spake unto Joshua,] It is likely he went to return thanks unto God for so wonderful a mercy : and then God spake to him what follows.

Ver. 2.] He bids him now call together the twelve men formerly chosen, iii. 12.

Ver. 3. Command ye them,] I suppose Joshua had some of the elders, or heads of the tribes, that joined with him in this office.

Take you hence out of the midst of Jordan,] Which continued perfectly dry for some space after they were all gone over; that is, till the priests removed from thence.

Out of the place where the priests' feet stood firm, twelve stones,] Some understand this so precisely, as if they were to take them from under the very soles of the priests' feet, which is not probable; but only near to the place where they stood. For the priests did not stir a step from the place where they first stood, and therefore none can tell how they should take these stones from under their feet, and place others in their room (ver. 9), while they remained standing fixed in the same place.

Ye shall carry them over with you,] In the sight of all the people, to make the miracle more known among them all.

Leave them—where ye shall lodge this night,] As a monument of this miraculous work of God; which remained ever after in Gilgal; the place where they lodged that night, ver. 19, 20.

Ver. 4.] Before they passed over Jordan (iii. 12).

Ver. 5. Pass over before the ark of the Lord your God into the midst of Jordan,] This is a Divine order to go back again into the river, to the very place where the priests stood with the ark; by which these twelve men were dispensed withal, to come nearer to the ark than the rest of the congregation.

Take you up every man—a stone upon his shoulder,] Great stones, as big as they could well lift and carry. So the Hebrew word imports, ver. 3.

According unto the number of the tribes] That they might publish in every tribe this evident testimony of the power of God; which laid the bottom of the river dry for so long a time, that they not only all went over on dry ground, but some of them returned again and took up these stones, and laid others in their room (ver. 9).

Ver. 6. That this may be a sign among you,] A token of what God had now done for them.

That when your children ask—What mean ye by these stones?] It was natural for men, in future ages, seeing great stones (in a place, perhaps, where there were no more), and just twelve of them, laid together or one upon another, to ask how they came there, and for what end they were brought thither, and by whom.

Ver. 7. Then ye shall answer them, &c.] This was to give them occasion to report, at large, what God had done for them at their entrance into Canaan; that their posterity might be affected with it, no less than themselves.

These stones shall be for a memorial] To keep in memory this miracle in all ages to come, as long as this nation lasted. All people have been wont to erect monuments of stone to preserve the memory of covenants or victories, or other great things. And though there was no inscription upon these stones, yet the number of them, and the place where they lay, which was not stony, was sufficient to signify some memorable thing; which, upon inquiry, would be made known to those that saw and observed them.

Ver. 8. The children of Israel did so as Joshua commanded,] That is, the twelve men did according to his order, both in taking up the stones and carrying them to the place where they lodged.

Laid them down there,] Which, perhaps, were erected into a kind of pillar, that they might look like a monument of something done thereabout. Or, they were so placed, as to be so many little monuments of God's mercy (see ver. 20).

Ver. 9. Joshua set up twelve stones in the midst of Jordan,] This renders it probable, that the other twelve stones taken out of Jordan were set up in Gilgal, as these, taken out of some of the fields therein the midst of Jordan, until every thing was finished that the Lord commanded Joshua to speak unto the people, according to all that Moses commanded Joshua: and the people hastened and passed over.

11 And it came to pass, when all the people were clean passed over, that the ark of the Lord passed over, and the priests, in the presence of the people.

12 And the children of Reuben, and the children of Gad, and half the tribe of Manasseh, passed over armed before the children of Israel, as Moses spake unto them:

13 About forty thousand prepared for war passed over before the Lord unto battle, to the plains of Jericho.

abouts, were erected in the midst of the river, to testify to all posterity their miraculous passage over it at this place.

They are there unto this day.] From hence, not only such men as Mr. Hobbes, but Masius, and Grotius, and divers others, have argued, that this book was not written by Joshua, but by some person who lived at a great distance from his time, as these words, they fancy, import. But this is a mere fancy; for if Joshua wrote this book in his old age, or, at least, then added his last hand to it (as it is probable he did), he might as well use these words as one that lived a hundred years after. And, at this rate of arguing (as Huetius observes), Moses must not be the author of the book of Deuteronomy (where he speaks in the same style, x. 5, xi. 4), nor St. Matthew the author of the gospel, which he wrote not many years after our Saviour's death; who uses the very same words, xxvii. 8, xxviii. 21 (see Demonstr. Evang. propos. iv. cap. 24).

Ver. 10. For the priests which bare the ark stood in the midst of Jordan.] It is remarkable in this whole relation, that when the priests are mentioned, these words are still added, "that bare the ark," or, "the ark of the covenant" (both in this chapter, ver. 9, 16, 18, and in the foregoing, ver. 13—15, 17), to show that this miracle was not to be ascribed to them, but to the power of the Lord unto whom they ministered.

Until every thing was finished that the Lord commanded.] Concerning the taking up of the twelve stones, and placing others in their room; and all that preceded concerning their passing over the river; which, it is likely, he exhorted them to do cheerfully.

According to all that Moses commanded Joshua.] We do not read that Moses gave any particular directions about the foregoing matters; therefore the meaning is, that Joshua strenuously executed all that God ordered, as Moses had admonished him, Deut. iii. 28, and other places.

The people hastened, and passed over.] This doth not refer to all the people, as if they went a swift pace over the river, out of fear of the waters overwhelming them (as some think), but to such as remained still behind the ark, to attend its motion. Who now seeing all that Joshua commanded was finished, made haste to get over the river, as their brethren had done before them. It is said, indeed (ver. 1), that when all the people were clean passed over, Joshua gave order about the twelve stones: but the meaning is, when the main body of the people were gone over: for it appears by the next verse, that they had not all entirely passed over until now.

Ver. 11. When all the people were clean passed over.] So that none were remaining in the plains of Moab, from whence they came.

14 ¶ On that day the Lord magnified Joshua in the sight of all Israel; and they feared him, as they feared Moses, all the days of his life.

15 And the Lord spake unto Joshua, saying, 16 Command the priests that bear the ark of the testimony, that they come up out of Jordan.

17 Joshua therefore commanded the priests, saying, Come ye up out of Jordan.

18 And it came to pass, when the priests that bare the ark of the covenant of the Lord were come up out of the midst of Jordan, and the soles of the priests' feet were lifted up unto the dry land, that the waters of Jordan returned unto their place, and flowed over all his banks, as they did before.

19 ¶ And the people came up out of Jordan

That the ark of the Lord passed over, and the priests.] They who went first into the river came last out: it being by the power of the Lord, whose ark the priests bare, that the course of the river was stopped, and a way made for all the people to pass over.

In the presence of the people.] Who beheld the water standing still on a heap, while the ark was in the river; but come tumbling down when it was gone. Which demonstrated that it was God's presence with them, to which alone they owed this miraculous mercy.

Ver. 12.] They were the first that passed over (according to their engagement, Numb. xxxiii. 20, 21, 27, of which Joshua had put them in mind, i. 13), ready to encounter any enemy that might have opposed their landing.

Ver. 13. About forty thousand prepared for war.] Or, ready armed (as it is in the margin), and prepared to fight, in case they met with any opposition. It is observable, that in the last muster, made not long ago, of those that were fit for war, in their several tribes, there were above forty thousand in the tribe of Reuben alone; and above fifty thousand in that of Manasseh (Numb. xxvi. 7, 34). And therefore it is likely, Joshua picked out only this number of chosen men; and left all the rest to look after their families and flocks.

Passed over before the Lord unto battle.] Being passed over the river, they stood in battle array before the ark; at the distance, I suppose, of two thousand cubits.

To the plains of Jericho.] Where it might be supposed the people of Jericho would have encamped, to hinder their passage.

Ver. 14. The Lord magnified Joshua.] As he promised, iii. 7.

They feared him.] This wonder gained him the like respect and reverence, that the dividing the Red Sea did to Moses (Exod. xiv. 31).

Ver. 15.] All this business was managed purely by the Divine direction.

Ver. 16.] The midst of which river, where they stood, being the lowest and deepest part of it, they are properly said to come up when they left that station.

Ver. 17.] Where they waited for the Divine order, and did not stir till they received it.

Ver. 18. The dry land.] Where the waters of Jordan, when it overflowed farthermost, were never wont to come.

That the waters of Jordan returned.] The channel was filled again by the descent of the waters. Which for some time had stood heaped up, and could not stir; but now were let loose to keep their ancient course.

Flowed over all his banks.] Which was done, it is on the tenth day of the first month, and encamped in Gilgal, in the east border of Jericho.

20 And those twelve stones, which they took out of Jordan, did Joshua pitch in Gilgal.

21 And he spake unto the children of Israel, saying, When your children shall ask their fathers in time to come, saying, What mean these stones?

22 Then ye shall let your children know, likely, by a gradual descent of the water, and not by the tumbling down of that great heap all at once.

Ver. 19. The people came up out of Jordan on the tenth day of the first month.] In which month they came out of Egypt, upon the fifteenth day of it; so that there wanted just five days of forty years since their coming from thence.

Encamped in Gilgal.] A place very famous in after-times, because of their first encampment here; where they seem to have continued for several years, during the wars of Canaan. Here also they were circumcised (from whence the place had its name, ver. 9), and kept the first passover; the tabernacle and the ark remaining here, as long as the Israelites kept their station in this place. See ix. 6, x. 6, 43, xiv. 6, which was, I suppose, till the war was ended; and they had also begun to divide the land (see xiv. 6). After which the tabernacle was fixed in Shiloh (xviii. 1, xxii. 9, 12); though still Gilgal continued a famous place, as appears from Judg. ii. 1; 1 Sam. xi. 14, 15, xiii. 4, &c.

In the east border of Jericho.] That is, between Jordan which lay behind them, and Jericho which lay before them.

Ver. 20.] We are not told in what form they were pitched; whether they remained single and distinct, or, as Josephus will have it, joined together in the form of an altar. It seems to agree best with the end and intention of them, if we conceive them to have been set down single, but in some order (suppose three in a row), representing, like so many little pillars, the twelve tribes of Israel; who passing over Jordan on dry ground, a man out of each tribe was ordered to bring a stone, and place them here, for a perpetual memorial (ver. 7) of what God had done for them. For stones, every one knows (especially some sorts of them), are of a very durable nature, and therefore used by all nations in the monuments they have made to preserve the memory of persons and things. Inasmuch, that if it be true which Procopius reports (in his second book De Bello Vandalico) concerning the two pillars erected by the Canaanites, who fled into Africa before the face of Joshua, with an inscription signifying their expulsion by him; I conclude it to have been done in imitation of these saying, Israel came over this Jordan on dry land.

23 For the LORD your God dried up the waters of Jordan from before you, until ye were passed over, as the LORD your God did to the Red sea, which he dried up from before us, until we were gone over:

24 That all the people of the earth might know the hand of the LORD, that it is mighty: that ye might fear the LORD your God for ever.

stones, whereby Joshua preserved the memory of the miraculous way which was opened to him for their expulsion.

Ver. 21.] See ver. 6, where he had said this, at the time they took up the stones; and now repeats it, when they pitched them. For then he may be thought to have spoken only to the twelve men; but now to all the twelve tribes.

Ver. 22.] That it might not be left to every man's liberty to give what answer they pleased to their children, when they inquired the meaning of these stones, he sets down the very words they should speak unto them; that they might be sure to be duly instructed in the wonderful mercy of God to their nation.

Ver. 23. The Lord your God dried up the waters.] He would have posterity made sensible it was a Divine benefit bestowed on them by the Divine Power: which alone could stop the course of a river, till a whole nation passed over on dry ground.

As the Lord your God did to the Red sea.] At the same time he would have them take occasion to remember them of another miraculous mercy, like unto this, though superior to it. Which the prophets, in after times, delighted to commemorate together, as appears from Ps. cxiv. 5.

Which he dried up from before us.] What he did for their forefathers he did for them, who reaped the happy fruit of it: just as the saving of Noah and his family in the ark was the saving of all mankind, who sprang from them.

Ver. 24. That all the people—might know the hand of the Lord.] All nations round about, who heard of this, might be made sensible of the power of the God of Israel.

That it is mighty:] Which can do all things.

That ye might fear the Lord your God for ever.] The people of Israel especially (for whom these wonders were wrought), might religiously worship and serve him: for so the fear of God frequently signifies in Scripture; and therefore the LXX. here translate these words, ὡς ἵνα πάντες ἀβραβῆ Κύριον τὸν Θεὸν ὑμῶν, "that ye may worship the Lord your God;" which includes in it all the duty owing to him. And so they translate the last words for ever, ἐν παντί ἕρως, "in every thing that you do."

CHAPTER V.

1 The Canaanites are afraid. 2 Joshua reneweth circumcision. 10 The passover is kept at Gilgal. 12 Manna ceaseth. 13 An Angel appeareth to Joshua.

1 AND it came to pass, when all the kings of the Amorites, which were on the side of Jordan westward, and all the kings of the Canaanites, which were by the sea, heard that the LORD had dried up the waters of Jordan from before the children of Israel, until we were passed over,

CHAP. V.

Ver. 1. When all the kings of the Amorites.] These were the principal inhabitants, and the most valiant in all the country; as hath been formerly noted.

Which were on the side of Jordan westward.] This seems to be added, to show, that, besides the two kings of the Amorites, Sihon and Og, whom they had already subdued on the other side of Jordan, eastward, there were other kings of the same nation on that their heart melted, neither was there spirit in them any more, because of the children of Israel.

2 ¶ At that time the LORD said unto Joshua, Make thee sharp knives, and circumcise again the children of Israel the second time.

3 And Joshua made him sharp knives, and that side of Jordan, where the Israelites now were. And it is not improbable, that these kings commanded the Hittites, Hivites, and Jebusites, as well as the Amorites.

And all the kings of the Canaanites which were by the sea,] i. e. The Mediterranean, where the people properly called Canaanites dwelt; though there were colonies of them spread in other places. The LXX. here call them βασιλεις της Φοινικης, "the kings of Phœnicia;" for upon that sea were the principal cities of the ancient Phœnicians, viz. Tyre and Sidon. But though the people that lived upon the sea-coast were peculiarly called by this name of Phœnicians, yet they were so powerful, that the whole country was called χώρα των Φοινικων, "the country of the Phœnicians;" as the LXX. call the land of Canaan, ver. 12, of this chapter.

Heard that the Lord had dried up the waters of Jordan.] This sounds like the language of Joshua, or of some other person then present, when this wonder was wrought; which astonished those that lived in the remotest parts of the country; who little thought of an invasion on that side (which, it is likely, made them not draw any forces that way), imagining the river, especially when it overflowed all its banks, was a sufficient security unto them on that frontier.

That their heart melted,] They quite lost their courage; which began to fail them before, as we read ch. ii. ver. 11. Or, as the LXX. expound it, "their understanding failed them;" and they were in such a consternation, that none knew what to advise for their safety. In which the providence of God is much to be observed, that, by this means, the Israelites were securely circumcised (as it here follows); whereas, if the people of Canaan had been courageous and watchful, they had taken them at a great advantage, if they had then fallen upon them; as appears by the story of the Shechemites, Gen. xxiv. 25. They had leisure also, without any disturbance, to celebrate the passover (ver. 10).

Ver. 2. At that time the Lord said unto Joshua,] The next day which was the eleventh day of the first month; as our prime Usher and others judge most likely.

Make thee sharp knives,] Or, as it is in the margin of our Bibles, "knives of flint:" which stones were plentiful, it is likely, in the mountains thereabouts. And, after they had marched forty years in the wilderness, it is probable (as Theodoret notes) that they were not provided with such knives as we use, of iron. By the very words also of Joshua it appears he speaks of knives they were now to provide; and not of such as they had already. Nor is it strange such knives should be used, for they were common in the eastern countries, as may be gathered out of the Talmud, in the treatise of the Sabbath; where they say, "in the killing of beasts, they use either a flint-stone (so they interpret the word tzur), or glass, or a quill." From whence Theodoric Hackspan concludes, that if sharp stones sufficed for the killing of beasts, there was no need of any other in circumcision. Who observes also, that the Jews say, they might circumcise with any instrument, made either of stone or glass, but not of a quill; because there was danger it might slit and hurt so tender a part. And at this day they do circumcise in the east with knives circumcised the children of Israel at the hill of the foreskins.

4 And this is the cause why Joshua did circumcise: All the people that came out of Egypt, that were males, even all the men of war, died in the wilderness by the way, after they came out of Egypt.

made of stones, such as Zipporah, it is supposed, used in the circumcision of her son (Exod. iv. 25). See this question debated in Sixtinus Amama's Anti-barbarus, lib. ii. p. 282. Justin Martyr thinks there was some mystery in the use of these knives (see his dialogue with Trypho, p. 341, 342).

Circumcise again the children of Israel the second time.] This doth not signify that they who had been circumcised heretofore, were to be now circumcised again (from whence some have drawn an argument for the repeating of baptism, as St. Austin tells us), but that there had been such a general circumcision heretofore ordered, as there was to be now after a long omission of that rite. And it is probable that it was at Mount Sinai, in the first month of the second year after they came out of Egypt. When they kept a passover on the fourteenth day of that month (Numb. ix. 1—3), and before they kept it, circumcised all that had not been circumcised in Egypt, or since they came out of it. For no uncircumcised person, nor any one who had a son, or a man-servant in his house uncircumcised, was capable to be admitted to it. We do not read, indeed, of the neglect of circumcision in Egypt, or in that year wherein they came out of it; but, considering the great oppression they lay under in that country, and the several distresses they were in after their deliverance, for three months, till they came to Sinai; and the absence of Moses a long time after they came thither; it is very probable this rite was omitted till God called upon them (as he did now) to celebrate the passover; and then they were constrained to take care of it, because otherwise they could not have kept it, (see Selden, lib. ii. De Synedr. cap. 2, n. 1).

Ver. 3. Joshua made him sharp knives, and circumcised the children of Israel.] Ordered every one that wanted it to be circumcised; and, it is probable, not only all those that came over Jordan, but such of the Reubenites, Gadites, and Manassites, as were left on the other side, were circumcised also, and all in one day, that they might be in a condition to eat the passover: nor need it seem strange that it was despatched in such a short time, for they might employ as many hands as they pleased in this work, there being no necessity that a priest or a Levite should do it, but it might be performed by their fathers or mothers, or any other person.

At the hill of the foreskins.] In the Hebrew, at "Gibeah Naaraboth;" which some take to be the name of the place where they were circumcised; but then that place was so called from the foreskins that were there thrown; which were so many, that being laid upon a heap and covered with earth, they made a little hillock, as the Jews conceive (see Pirke Eliezer, cap. 29).

Ver. 4. This is the cause] The reason of this order, and of the execution of it, is here given.

All the people that came out of Egypt,—even all the men of war, died in the wilderness.] That is, all that were then twenty years old, for such only were reputed men of war, and were guilty of the sedition mentioned in Numb. xiv. for which they were doomed to perish in the wilderness.

Ver. 5. Now all the people that came out were circumcised:] Not only those who died for their rebel-

5 Now all the people that came out were circumcised: but all the people that were born in the wilderness by the way as they came forth out of Egypt, them they had not circumcised.

6 For the children of Israel walked forty years in the wilderness, till all the people that were men of war, which came out of Egypt, were consumed, because they obeyed not the voice of the LORD: unto whom the LORD swore that he would not shew them the land, lion, but all the rest under twenty years old were generally circumcised, except some infants, who (as I said upon ver. 2), might have been neglected during their heavy oppression there.

But all the people that were born in the wilderness—then they had not circumcised.] Never since they removed from Mount Sinai, where it is likely there was a general circumcision, as there was now to be before their celebrating the passover, which had not been kept since that time.

Ver. 6.] These words seem to give the reason why they were not circumcised, because they were in a wandering condition, while they remained in the wilderness, and did not know when the cloud would remove from the tabernacle to lead them to another place; which if it had done when children were newly circumcised, their lives might have been endangered by motion, while they were sore. This, a great many think, made Moses dispense with circumcision by God's direction. We do not find him, indeed, consulting God about it; but he was satisfied that God approved of this reason for the omission of it. R. Jose, as Mr. Selden observes, gives this account of the whole business: "The Israelites kept but one passover all the time they were in the wilderness; the reason was, in that year (which was the next to that wherein they came out of Egypt), their tents were pitched in a place where they might safely circumcise the males that had been lately born, lest the neglect of it should hinder the legitimate eating of the passover. But in all the time following, wherein they wandered in the desert, they did not circumcise their children, because of their incommensurable journeys, and the danger of circumcision by the way; so that they could keep no more passovers till they came to Canaan. This is a far better reason than what many of them give, who say circumcision was omitted, because the north wind never blew all the time they were in the wilderness; and wounds are very dangerous when it doth not blow. Whence their medical maxim mentioned in the Talmud: "In cloudy days and when the east wind blows, we neither circumcise nor open a vein" (see Buxtorf. Synagog. Judaica, cap. 4). But if this matter be well considered, we cannot rest satisfied with the foregoing reason; for all the time they were in the wilderness, children were born, and women lay in; and there was greater danger by their motion, while they were in labour, and when they were newly brought to bed, than there was in their children being circumcised, who were sore but for a few days; whereas the others were not fit to go abroad, or to travel, in a great many. For which, and for several other reasons, Fortunatus Seachus thinks this was not the cause why they were not circumcised during their travels in the wilderness; but the true reason was, that they did not look upon the precept of circumcision as obliging them, till they came to settle in the land of Canaan: for in the covenant which Moses made with them at Mount Sinai, there is nothing said about cir-which the LORD swore unto their fathers that he would give us, a land that floweth with milk and honey.

7 And their children, whom he raised up in their stead, them Joshua circumcised: for they were uncircumcised, because they had not circumcised them by the way.

8 And it came to pass, when they had done circumcising all the people, that they abode in their places in the camp, till they were whole.

9 And the LORD said unto Joshua, This day

cumcision, unto which they were bound by the covenant made with Abraham (as our Saviour observes, John vii. 21), and that runs thus: "I will give unto thee, and unto thy seed after thee, the land wherein thou art a stranger, &c. Thou shalt keep my covenant therefore, thou, and thy seed after thee, &c. Every man-child shall be circumcised" Gen. xvii. 8—10 (see Sacror. Elaëochrysm. Myrothec. 2, cap. 54).

Ver. 7. Their children,—Joshua circumcised.] Now that they were come to their rest in the land of promise.

For they were uncircumcised.] For the reason above mentioned: to which this may be added, that several great men (such as Theodoret and St. Jerome among the ancients) think that circumcision, being a note of distinction between the Israelites and other people, there was no need of it in the wilderness, when (as Cedrenus speaks) they were παρὸς ἀλλογίνους χειχωρισμένοι, separated from all strangers by the wilderness itself. Others think, that the mixed multitude of Egyptians, who, moved by the miracles they had seen done in their country, went out of it with the Israelites, and joined themselves to them, were the cause of this omission; for they could not presently incorporate with them by receiving circumcision; and therefore it was suspended, that these Egyptians might not look upon themselves as quite a different people: but longer than till they came to Canaan they would not have it discontinued, when all, Egyptians as well as Israelites, received it, that they might not be upbraided as a people of a different original. And as the omission of it in the desert made the proselytes who came out of Egypt equal with the Israelites, while they stayed there; so, as a most learned friend of mine (Dr. Alix) suggests to me, it showed, that there was no absolute necessity of this rite, and that it could not be of eternal obligation.

Ver. 8. They abode in their places in the camp.] Lay still without motion (which would have hindered the healing of the sore), and had not the least disturbance given them by the people of Canaan.

Till they were whole.] Which they were against the passover; for, reckoning the eleventh day for one, there were four days between their circumcision and the passover, which was not kept till the fourteenth day at even, when the pain was pretty well over, for it was smartest on the third day (see upon Gen. xxxiv. 25).

Ver. 9. This day have I rolled away the reproach of Egypt from off you.] It is commonly thought, that by the reproach of Egypt is meant nothing else but uncircumcision, with which the Israelites always reproached other people, particularly the Egyptians, among whom they had long dwelt, and with whom they were best acquainted. But our learned Dr. Spencer thinks "the reproach of Egypt" is the slavery to which they had been there long subject, but now were fully declared a free people by receiving the mark of the seed of Abraham, and made heirs of the have I rolled away the reproach of Egypt from off you. Wherefore the name of the place is called Gilgal unto this day.

10 ¶ And the children of Israel encamped in Gilgal, and kept the passover on the fourteenth day of the month at even in the plains of Jericho.

11 And they did eat of the old corn of the land on the morrow after the passover, unleavened cakes, and parched corn in the selfsame day.

12 ¶ And the manna ceased on the morrow after they had eaten of the old corn of the land; neither had the children of Israel manna any more: but they did eat of the fruit of the land of Canaan that year.

13 ¶ And it came to pass, when Joshua was by Jericho, that he lifted up his eyes and looked, and, behold, there stood a man over against him with his sword drawn in his hand: and Joshua went unto him, and said unto him, Art thou for us, or for our adversaries?

promised land. This he very often repeats, lib. i. De Leg. Hebr. Ritual. cap. 4, p. 44, 51, 55. And no doubt Joshua now chose, immediately upon their entrance into the land of Canaan, to cause them to be circumcised, not only as a token they peculiarly belonged to him, but to oblige them to be careful to observe all the laws of God; many of which could not, and others were not observed in the wilderness, but were now to be regularly practised, because they held the land of Canaan by this tenure. To this purpose also Theodoret discourses, in his questions upon this book; They were made now lords of the promised land, who were lately slaves in Egypt; for they could not be the legitimate children of Abraham, Isaac, and Jacob, and heirs of the promises made to them, till they were circumcised. Rabbag hath another notion of it; That the Egyptians seeing the Israelites wander so long as they did in the wilderness, reproached and flouted them, as if they were brought thither to be destroyed, and not to possess the land of Canaan; from which reproaches God now delivered them, when he assured them, by enjoining their circumcision, that they should shortly enjoy that country which God promised; but which no uncircumcised person might inherit: but the first is the plainest and most unconstrained sense.

The name of the place is called Gilgal] This was the first original of the name, which this place had ever after; for Galal, in Hebrew, from whence this word comes, signifies to remove, take away, or devolve. And so here the LXX. translate the word gallothi (I have rolled away) by ἀπέλιπον, and the Vulgar Latin by abstuli ("I have taken away"); which makes it strange that Josephus should say (lib. v. Antiq. cap. 1), that this word Gilgal signifies liberty, whom Theodoret follows; as if this place was so called, because now they found themselves perfectly freed from the Egyptians, and from all the troubles they endured in the wilderness.

Unto this day.] These words are alleged by some against Joshua's being the author of this book; to which an answer hath been given, iv. 9.

Ver. 10. Encamped in Gilgal.] Continued their camp there, as they were enjoined, ver. 8.

Kept the passover] Which was the second passover that had been kept since its first institution, the first being observed the second year after their coming out of Egypt at Mount Sinai; after which it had been omitted thirty-nine years, because many of the people were uncircumcised.

On the fourteenth day of the month] According to the command of God (Exod. xii. 6).

In the plains of Jericho.] Where the tabernacle was in the midst of their camp, unto which they brought their lamb, for it could be sacrificed nowhere else (Deut. xvi. 2). And therefore hither the Reubenites, and Gadites, and Manassites, on the other side Jordan, came to offer this sacrifice; which was easier for them, than it was in aftertimes to go up to Jerusalem.

Ver. 11. They did eat of the old corn of the land

Which the people of the country had left in their barns when they fled into Jericho, and other strong holds.

The morrow after the passover.] There is a great dispute among the Jews, whether this were the fifteenth day of the month, which was properly the next day after the passover, or, as others take it, the sixteenth day, which was the solemn Sabbath kept on the first day of unleavened bread (Lev. xxiii. 10, 11), when they were to wave the sheaf of the first-fruits before the Lord. The former are in the right.

Unleavened cakes.] That is, they kept the feast of unleavened bread, which was distinct from the passover, as I observed, Exod. xii. 15, &c.

And parched corn] This was new corn, which was growing that year they entered into Canaan, of which it was not lawful to eat, till they had offered the sheaf before mentioned (Lev. xxiii. 14), and therefore it is made an argument by some, that it was the sixteenth day of this month when this corn was parched.

Ver. 12. Neither had the children of Israel manna any more;] Because they had no need of it (as Kimchi and others interpret it) being supplied by the store of old corn which they found in the land of Canaan, and by what was growing upon the ground.

But they did eat of the fruit of the land of Canaan that year.] After they had offered the sheaf before mentioned (Lev. xxiii. 11). So that manna ceased on the sixteenth or seventeenth day of the first month, having continued with them forty years, wanting about a month. So R. Bechai truly interprets these words (Exod. xvi. 35), not to signify forty years complete, but near forty years; for it began to fall on the fifteenth day of the second month, and ceased on the sixteenth or seventeenth day of the first month of the fortieth year after they came out of Egypt; and therefore, to show that they were not to expound those words, "They did eat manna forty years," in a strict and precise sense, Moses immediately adds, "until they came to a land inhabited;—they did eat manna until they came to the borders of the land of Canaan;" which was exactly fulfilled, Gilgal being on the "borders of the land," where it now ceased; but it continued till that time, though they came "to a land inhabited," when they conquered the kingdoms of Sihon and Og.

Ver. 13. When Joshua was by Jericho.] After he had performed the solemn rites of circumcision and the passover, Joshua went to take a view of Jericho, and to observe, as generals are wont to do, the approaches to it.

That he lifted up his eyes and looked.] These words signify a sudden apparition of a person to him; for so this phrase is used, when something new and unexpected presents itself, as one is intent upon something else (Gen. xviii. 1, Dan. x. 5).

There stood a man over against him] Whom he took to be a man.

14 And he said, Nay; but as captain of the host of the LORD am I now come. And Joshua fell on his face to the earth, and did worship, and said unto him, What saith my lord unto his servant?

[With his sword drawn] He seemed to be a soldier, or rather a great commander, and stood directly opposite to him.

[Joshua went unto him.] Such was his undaunted courage, with which God had inspired him.

[Art thou for us, or for our adversaries?] He demands of him, whether he came to help the Israelites, or the people of Canaan; for whom (it appears by the answer) Joshua suspected he came to fight.

Ver. 14. And he said, Nay; i. e. I am not on the side of your adversaries.

[But as captain (or prince) of the host of the Lord am I now come.] By the "host of the Lord" is here meant the whole body of the people of Israel, whom the Lord himself led forth out of Egypt, as his army (see Exod. xii. 41), and now appeared in this manner, that he might show he would still conduct them, as their chief commander and leader, by whom they should be victorious over their enemies; for though many take this to have been a created angel (Michael, suppose, the chief of them), yet it is evident that Joshua did not think him so to be, for he fell down and worshipped him, as we read in the words following.

[Joshua fell on his face] With the profoundest reverence.

[Did worship.] Which he durst not have given (for God alone is to be adored), nor would an angel have received, without such a check as an angel gave St. John (Rev. xxii. 10), if he had not taken him to be the Divine Word that was to come to fight for them. So the Chaldee paraphrase upon Josh. x. 42. "It was the Word of the Lord that fought for them," according to God's promise, i. 9, 17. This a most learned friend of mine (Dr. Alex.) shows was the judgment of the ancient Jewish church (see his late book on that argument, p. 234), and it is most certain was the judgment of the ancient Christians, particularly of Justin Martyr, Eusebius, and Theodoret (see Valesius in his Annotations upon Eusebius's Ecclesiastical History, lib. i. cap. 2, p. 7). And therefore our great primate of Ireland fears not to say in his Annals, "Jesus Dominus noster, princeps militiæ patris sui, Jesu typico ad

15 And the captain of the LORD's host said unto Joshua, Loose thy shoe from off thy foot; for the place whereon thou standest is holy. And Joshua did so.

Jerichuntem gladio stricto apparens, promittit se populum defensurum;" that is, "Jesus our Lord, the Prince of his Father's host, appearing to him who was a type of him at Jericho, with a drawn sword, promised to be the defender of the people;" where he seems by the "captain of the Lord's host" to understand our Lord, who commands angels themselves; for they are sometimes called "the host of heaven" (1 Kings xxii. 19, Luke ii. 13). And it may very well be thought the meaning here.

[What saith my Lord unto his servant?] Joshua was possessed of such a deep sense of the greatness of this person, that he humbly desires to receive his commands, and he would obey them.

Ver. 15. Loose thy shoe from off thy foot; for the place whereon thou standest is holy.] This is the fullest evidence that can be given of the Divinity of this person that appeared to him; who was so far from reproving him for doing him too much honour, that he commanded him to do much more; for that which he here requires, is the highest acknowledgment of a Divine presence that was used among the eastern nations, as the same Dr. Alex. observes. And considering that these are the very same words which were spoken to Moses, Exod. iii. 2, 3, we learn the reason why God commanded this to Joshua; which was, for the strengthening of his faith, that as now he was placed in Moses's stead, so God would be with him, as he had been with Moses. And thus Joh. à Coch discourses very reasonably upon the Gemara of the Sanhedrin, cap. 6, n. 3. "This angel, who suffered himself to be worshipped, and by whose presence the place where he appeared was sanctified, so that Joshua was commanded to put off his shoes, no doubt was He whom all the angels in heaven worship."

[Joshua did so.] Put off his shoes, in token of reverence to that place; which was holy, while that Divine presence remained there, though not after it was gone: and it continued there for some space of time, to give Joshua advice, and to encourage him to hope for his protection and assistance; as appears from ver. 2, of the next chapter.

CHAPTER VI.

1 Jericho is shut up. 2 God instructeth Joshua how to besiege it. 12 The city is compassed. 17 It must be accursed. 20 The walls fall down. 22 Rahab is saved. 26 The builder of Jericho is cursed.

I Now Jericho was straitly shut up because of the children of Israel: none went out, and none came in.

2 And the LORD said unto Joshua, See, I have given into thine hand Jericho, and the king thereof, and the mighty men of valour.

CHAP. VI.

Ver. 1. Now Jericho was straitly shut up] The Targum understands it as if he spake of the strong fortifications of Jericho, which made it needful Joshua should be encouraged in his enterprise against it. But the words in the Hebrew are literally (as is noted in the margin of our Bibles) "did shut up, and was shut up," which plainly relates to the strict guards which were kept, that none could get into the city, nor get out of it: so it is explained in the next words.

[None went out, and none came in.] They shut up their gates so close, that none could go out to carry intelligence to Joshua; and they were blocked up so close by the Israelites (to which the latter part of the foregoing words may perhaps refer), that none could get in to bring any intelligence or relief to the inhabitants of Jericho.

Ver. 2. The Lord said unto Joshua.] The same person speaks to him (all agree) who is called the "Prince of the Lord's host" in the foregoing chapter; and here is called Jehovah. Which shows he was

3 And ye shall compass the city, all ye men of war, and go round about the city once. Thus shalt thou do six days.

4 And seven priests shall bear before the ark seven trumpets of rams' horns: and the seventh day ye shall compass the city seven times, and the priests shall blow with the trumpets.

5 And it shall come to pass, that when they make a long blast with the ram's horn, and when ye hear the sound of the trumpet, all the people shall shout with a great shout; and the wall of the city shall fall down flat, and the people shall ascend up every man straight before him.

6 ¶ And Joshua the son of Nun called the priests, and said unto them, Take up the ark of the covenant, and let seven priests bear seven trumpets of rams' horns before the ark of the Lord.

7 And he said unto the people, Pass on, and compass the city, and let him that is armed pass on before the ark of the Lord.

8 ¶ And it came to pass, when Joshua had spoken unto the people, that the seven priests bearing the seven trumpets of rams' horns passed on before the Lord, and blew with the trumpets: and the ark of the covenant of the Lord followed them.

9 ¶ And the armed men went before the priests that blew with the trumpets, and the rereward came after the ark, the priests going on, and blowing with the trumpets.

10 And Joshua had commanded the people, not a created angel, but God himself; who alone could promise and perform what follows.

See, I have given into thy hand Jericho, and the king thereof, and the mighty men of valour.] Who were gathered together in this place out of several nations: it being a frontier city, which they made as strong as they were able, and defended by the most valiant men they had in the country (see xxiv. 11). For we are to suppose that they had refused the offers of peace, which God ordered to be first sent unto them (Deut. xx. 10), and, trusting to their forces, took up a desperate resolution not to yield upon any terms.

Ver. 3. Go round about the city once.] At such a distance, I suppose, that they could not reach them from the city, with their arrows or stones slung against them.

Thus shall thou do six days.] Once every of those days, in such order as is described, ver. 6—9. This looked not like making war; but appeared to the besieged, it is probable, as a pastime.

Ver. 4. Seven trumpets of rams' horns.] Such trumpets as they used to blow withal in the year of jubilee (Lev. xxv. 9), for so the phrase is in the Hebrew, "trumpets of Jubel:" and I have observed elsewhere, that rams' horns not being hollow, trumpets could not be made of them.

The seventh day ye shall compass the city seven times.] The seventh day's march differed in two things from the other six: that they compassed it but once on other days, and made not the least noise, but now seven times, and made a great shout at the end of the last circuit. Concerning this number seven, see Drusius upon this place, and upon Lev. iv. 6. Grotius saith of it, in short (upon 2 Chron. xxix. 21), heptas sacris propria; "the number seven is proper to sacred things:" as appears by the seven angels and seven trumpets (Rev. viii. 2).

The priests shall blow.] All the times they marched so often round the city (see Tertullian, lib. ii. adv. Marcion, cap. 21).

Ver. 5. That when they make a long blast.] A loud sound, protracted after a rustic manner, as Bochart interprets it in his Hierozoicon, par. i. lib. ii. cap. 43.

When ye hear the sound of the trumpet.] And were commanded by Joshua to shout (ver. 16).

All the people shall shout with a great shout;.] Such as soldiers use when they make an onset upon a place, or when armies meet to give battle.

The wall of the city shall fall down flat,] Or, fall under it, as it is in the Hebrew; which seems to signify, that the foundations of the wall were subverted, so that it sunk and fell into the ditch, or (as the Jews explain it) sunk into the very ground on which it stood, so as to leave no ruins, as in the common fall of walls; in which they suppose another miracle.

The people shall ascend up every man straight before him.] The whole wall did not fall down, for Rahab's house stood, which was upon the wall (ii. 15). But such wide breaches were made everywhere round about, that the Israelites went straight forward, and found an easy entrance into this city, which the amazed inhabitants had no heart to defend; or, rather, the whole wall sunk into the earth, only Rahab's house was left standing, which made the thing more remarkable. And thus God demonstrated, that it was his wonderful power which overthrew the city, against which they brought no engines nor battering rams, &c., ἀλλὰ μόνη φωνὴ σάλπιγγος κεραιίνης, καὶ εὐχῆ δικαίου, &c., as Epiphanius speaks, Hæres. lxxi. n. 83.

Ver. 6. Take up the ark of the covenant,] This is the second time that the priests are ordered to carry the ark, which belonged to the office of the Kohathites (see iii. 3).

Let seven priests bear seven trumpets.] As the Lord commanded, ver. 7.

Ver. 7.] This explains ver. 3, where he seems to command only "the men of war" to compass the city. But the meaning is, that the whole body of the people should march in this circuit, the men of war going before the ark, and the rest of the people following it, as it is explained ver. 9.

Ver. 8. When Joshua had spoken unto the people,] By the priests, as the LXX. understand it.

The ark of the covenant of the Lord following them.] According to the direction given ver. 6.

Ver. 9. The armed men went before the priests.] Here the order of their march explains the command, ver. 7.

The rereward came after the ark,] That is, the rest of the people who had no arms, old men, women, and children, came in the rear of the ark. Concerning the word measseph (which we translate rereward), see Numb. x. 23. From whence may be gathered that by this rereward is meant the tribe of Dan; as the Targum, Rasi, and Kimchi, understand it; who by the armed men before mentioned, understand the Reubenites, Gadites, and Manassites, who were engaged by Moses to go "armed before the Lord to war," Numb. xxxii. 20, and renewed this engagement to Joshua, i. 12, &c.

The priests going on, and blowing.] The word priests is not in the Hebrew, which made the Vulgar to translate the words in such a manner as if the whole multitude before mentioned made a sound with trumpets, "buccinis omnia concerepabant." But there being no order for any to blow with trumpets but only the priests, our translators have done well to saying, Ye shall not shout, nor make any noise with your voice, neither shall any word proceed out of your mouth, until the day I bid you shout; then shall ye shout.

11 So the ark of the LORD compassed the city, going about it once: and they came into the camp, and lodged in the camp.

12 ¶ And Joshua rose early in the morning, and the priests took up the ark of the LORD.

13 And seven priests bearing seven trumpets of rams' horns before the ark of the LORD went on continually, and blew with the trumpets: and the armed men went before them; but the rearward came after the ark of the LORD, the priests going on, and blowing with the trumpets.

14 And the second day they compassed the supply that word from ver. 4, as they do also ver. 13, where this is again repeated.

Ver. 10. Ye shall not shout, nor make any noise] They were not to talk to one another as they went along, but march in a profound silence, before and after the Lord, waiting on him, to see what he would do for them.

Until the day I bid you shout;] That is, on the seventh day, after they had compassed the city seven times.

Ver. 11. So the ark of the Lord compassed the city, going about it once:] It is uncertain upon what day they began to do this; but it is very probable (as the Jews say in their larger Chronicle) that it was the next day after the seven days of unleavened bread were ended.

And lodged in the camp.] They spent the rest of the day in the camp to refresh themselves, and lay there the following night.

Ver. 12. Joshua rose early] viz. That morning of the first day of compassing the city.

The priests took up the ark] These words, and those that follow in the next verse, give a particular account of what was done the first day, according to that which was said in general, ver. 8, 9.

Ver. 13. Seven priests—went on continually,] Without resting or making any stop, in a continued motion, till they had finished their circuit.

Blew] As soon as they began their motion.

The priests going on, and blowing with their trumpets.] Till they had ended their circuit.

Ver. 14. The second day they compassed the city once,] In the same order before described.

Returned into the camp:] As they had done the first day (ver. 11).

So they did six days.] The remaining four days were spent in the same pompous show, without striking a stroke, or speaking a word, that the subversion of the city might be ascribed wholly to the power of God, which secretly undermined the walls, and threw them down.

Ver. 15. On the seventh day,] The Jewish writers say this was the Sabbath, as Raymundus observes in his Pugio Fidei, and Jos. de Voysin in his Annotations upon him, p. 625. But I shall only mention the words of Kimchi, which are these: "The ark of the Lord compassed the city the first time, on the first day of the week: so our doctors, of pious memory, have delivered, that the seventh day whereon the city was taken was the Sabbath, though they killed and burnt upon that day: for he that commanded the Sabbath to be observed, commanded it now to be profaned for the destruction of Jericho, as he commanded burnt-offerings to be sacrificed on this day:" which is the very instance whereby our blessed city once, and returned into the camp: so they did six days.

15 And it came to pass on the seventh day, that they rose early about the dawning of the day, and compassed the city after the same manner seven times: only on that day they compassed the city seven times.

16 And it came to pass at the seventh time, when the priests blew with the trumpets, Joshua said unto the people, Shout; for the LORD hath given you the city.

17 ¶ And the city shall be accursed, even it, and all that are therein, to the LORD: only Rahab the harlot shall live, she and all that are with her in the house, because she hid the messengers that we sent.

Saviour justifies his doing some works upon the Sabbath-day. And here I cannot but note, that it was Jehovah, according to this explication, who gave this command to compass the city on this day as well as any other. That great Lord who gave the command to keep the Sabbath now dispensed with it: he that spake from Mount Sinai was the person who appeared to Joshua: for, whether this day was the Sabbath or not, it is certain, one of the seven days wherein they were thus employed was the Sabbath, and consequently their resting on that day was dispensed withal, by the same authority that made the law of the Sabbath.

They rose early about the dawning of the day,] All the six days, I suppose, they rose early, as they did upon the first (ver. 12); but upon this day, very early, as soon as they could see, because they had seven times as much work to do as they had upon the other days.

And compassed the city—seven times:] Not with a continued motion, I suppose, but resting awhile (perhaps after each circuit) to refresh themselves; otherwise, by such motion, they might have been dispirited, and unfit to attack Jericho, when the wall of it fell down before them.

Only on that day they compassed the city seven times.] For so the Lord ordered, ver. 4.

Ver. 16. At the seventh time,] As soon as they had ended the seventh circuit.

When the priests blew] Such a long sound as is mentioned ver. 5.

Joshua said unto the people,] By such officers as he had appointed to give the order, when they heard that unusual sound of the trumpet.

Shout;] In assured hope of victory, as it follows in the next words, "for the Lord hath given you the city."

Ver. 17. The city shall be accursed,] All the commands given in this and in the two following verses could not be delivered just before he bade them shout, but they had been given some time before they began to march the seventh time about the city. And if any thing of these matters was repeated now, it was very briefly, by bidding them remember the orders they had received concerning the city and all that was therein.

I have observed elsewhere, that this word cherem (which we translate accursed) signifies sometimes the gift itself, which is devoted to God for his uses (Lev. xxvii. 24), sometimes that which is devoted to perpetual destruction, by the right which God hath to punish capital enmities to him, as here in this place. And thus, Mr. Selden observes, the great Sanhedrin might devote those to destruction who in war did not observe such charges as were given them; of which they find an instance in Judg. xxi. 5 (see him, lib. iv. De Jure Nat. et Gent. cap. 6).

18 And ye, in any wise keep yourselves from the accursed thing, lest ye make yourselves accursed, when ye take of the accursed thing, and make the camp of Israel a curse, and trouble it.

19 But all the silver, and gold, and vessels of brass and iron, are consecrated unto the Lord: they shall come into the treasury of the Lord.

20 So the people shouted when the priests blew with the trumpets: and it came to pass, when the people heard the sound of the trumpet, and the people shouted with a great shout, that the wall fell down flat, so that the people went up into the city, every man straight before him, and they took the city.

21 And they utterly destroyed all that was in the city, both man and woman, young and old, and ox, and sheep, and ass, with the edge of the sword.

22 But Joshua had said unto the two men that had spied out the country, Go into the harlot's house, and bring out thence the woman, and all that she hath, as ye swear unto her.

23 And the young men that were spies went in, and brought out Rahab, and her father, and her mother, and her brethren, and all that she had; and they brought out all her kindred, and left them without the camp of Israel.

24 And they burnt the city with fire, and all that was therein: only the silver, and the gold, and the vessels of brass and of iron, they put into the treasury of the house of the Lord.

Even it, and all that are therein] As the first-fruits of their victories in the land of Canaan. All whose inhabitants God ordered to be exterminated; but thought fit to make such an example of the first that refused to submit, as to raze their very city, and command it never to be built again: for that this was done by a particular order from God, appears from 1 Kings xvi. 34. Thus he commanded even such cities in Israel to be destroyed as should hereafter revolt to idolatry, Deut. xiii. 15—17.

Only Rahab—and all that are with her] Which is explained in the execution of this order, ver. 23.

Because she hid the messengers] Who swore unto her that she should be preserved; and therefore, both in justice and gratitude, Joshua was bound to take care of her; and no doubt had order from God to make good the oath of the spies.

That we sent.] This seems to import that Joshua sent the spies by the advice or consent of the elders; though it may signify no more but that he sent them upon a public account (see ch. ii. 1, 23).

Ver. 18. Keep yourselves from the accursed thing.] Take heed, lest you meddle with any of the spoils which are devoted to God, and appropriate them to your own use.

Lest ye make yourselves accursed.] Bring yourselves under the same sentence of being devoted to destruction.

And make the name of Israel a curse.] And, more than that, expose the whole camp to the same danger. For many times God takes occasion to punish the whole body of a people for their other sins, when some of them only have highly offended him.

Trouble it.] Disturb the course of their victories.

Ver. 19. But all the silver, and gold, &c.] And other metals, I suppose.

Are consecrated unto the Lord.] Except the gold and silver of their images, which were utterly to be destroyed, according to an express command of God, Deut. vii. 25, 26.

They shall come into the treasury of the Lord.] Which was in the tabernacle. To the service of which such things were wholly appropriated, and might not be applied to any other use. But it is very probable, that before such things were put into the treasury, they were purified, by making them go through the fire: according to the law, Numb. xxxi. 22, 23. The Jews think these things were given to God, because the city was taken on the Sabbath.

Ver. 20. So the people shouted] As they had been commanded, ver. 16.

The people shouted] This is repeated, to show that this was all that the people contributed to the expugnation of this city; which they wholly ascribed unto God.

The wall fell down] As the Lord had promised, ver. 5.

So that the people went up into the city.] As it was easy to do when the garrison was in such a consternation at the sudden fall of the wall, without any visible force to throw it down; that in all likelihood they could make little or no resistance.

Ver. 21.] See Deut. xx. 16, 17. Some have observed that there are no camels here mentioned, which were not commonly bred in this country; much less mules, which were not known in the land of Israel till the days of David. As Bochart concludes, from the mention upon several occasions of oxen, sheep, and asses; but never of these creatures till his time. But if there were any other animals in Jericho besides these here named, they were all killed; for that was the law of the cherem. As for their killing of infants and women, see Grotius lib. iii. De Jure Belli et Pacis, cap. 4, sect. 9. And it must also be remembered, that they were a people guilty of such foul idolatry, that it was fit the whole race of them should be destroyed, as Sodom was; where all the children perished, as well as others. And this was a type of the entire destruction of New Babylon, mentioned in the Revelation.

Ver. 22. But Joshua had said unto the two men that had spied out the country.] He had given this order before the falling of the wall; when they began their march on the seventh day, the seventh time, and before they shouted.

Go into the harlot's house.] Which, by the wonderful providence of God over her, was left standing, with part of the wall upon which it was built, when the rest sunk into the ground.

All that she hath.] With her in the house.

As ye swear unto her.] Ch. ii. 14.

Ver. 23. They brought out all her kindred.] By this it appears, that all related to her who took shelter under her roof were preserved from destruction. Such is the great clemency of God, who, for the sake of one excellent woman, spared a great many that had done nothing to deserve his favour.

Left them without the camp] They were brought out of the house, because it was to be burnt with all the rest of the city: which was to be laid desolate without inhabitant. And they were carried without the camp of Israel, because it was holy by the presence of the Lord there: which made it unlawful for them to enter into it till they had abjured their gentle superstition; and by circumcision (and by baptism, as the custom was in after times, if not now) admitted into the body of the Israelites.

Ver. 24. They burnt the city with fire.] By the just judgment of God upon it, for the horrible wickedness

25 And Joshua saved Rahab the harlot alive, and her father's household, and all that she had; and she dwelleth in Israel even unto this day; because she hid the messengers, which Joshua sent to spy out Jericho.

26 ¶ And Joshua adjured them at that time, committed therein (see Grotius, De Jure Belli et Pacis, lib. iii. cap. 12, sect. 2).

Only the silver,—they put into the treasury, &c.] As had been enjoined before they took the city, ver. 19.

Ver. 25. Joshua saved Rahab the harlot alive, &c.] It is likely her father and his household gave credit to what she said; and consequently were converted, as she was, to the true religion, by what they had heard before and now saw with their own eyes, of the wonderful works of God.

She dwelleth in Israel even unto this day.] Was incorporated with the Israelites and made a member of their body; as all her kindred, it is likely, were: at least they became proselytes of the gate (as they called those who renounced idolatry, and worshipped the God of Israel), though they were not circumcised. Concerning this phrase, "unto this day," see before, iv. 9.

Because she hid the messengers,] Which proceeded not merely from her humanity, but was a noble act of courageous faith.

Ver. 26. Joshua adjured them at that time, saying,] He made the elders and heads of their several tribes (I suppose) bind themselves by a solemn oath, and they took the same security of all the people; adding a curse upon themselves and their posterity if any of them broke this oath.

Cursed be the man before the Lord,] This shows that this cherem, whereby he adjudged him and his family to destruction who should rebuild Jericho, was a sentence pronounced by the Lord, and not by Joshua without his order. And so we read expressly in the first book of the Kings, xvi. ult. See concerning this cherem, Mr. Selden, lib. iv. De Jure Nat. et Gent. cap. 7, p. 505.

That riseth up and buildeth this city Jericho.] Whose ruins God would have remain, as a perpetual monument of his power and of his severity. So Maimonides, in his More Nevochim, par. iii. cap. 50. "This anathema (saith he) was pronounced, that the miracle of the subversion of Jericho might be kept in perpetual memory: for whosoever saw the walls sunk saying, Cursed be the man before the Lord, that riseth up and buildeth this city Jericho: he shall lay the foundation thereof in his firstborn, and in his youngest son shall he set up the gates of it.

27 So the Lord was with Joshua; and his fame was noised throughout all the country.

deep into the earth (as he understands it), would clearly discern that it was not the form of a building destroyed by man, but miraculously thrown down by God."

He shall lay the foundation thereof in his firstborn,] That is, in the death of his first-born.

In his youngest son shall he set up the gates of it.] The meaning is, in the progress of the work the rest of his children should die; and when he had finished (which was when he "set up its gates") he should lose the last of them. Which was fulfilled exactly in the days of Ahab, as we read in the place before named (1 Kings xvi. 34). Which, by the way, shows this book of Joshua to have been older than the book of the Kings.

We are not to imagine that this anathema reached any farther than to the builder of Jericho and his family; not to those who should inhabit it after it was rebuilt. For there was a company of prophets who made no scruple to settle here in future times (2 Kings i. 15). And if it had been built in any other place, and not on the ruins of the old city (though they had given it the name of Jericho), one cannot think he that built it would have fallen under this curse. Which either he did not mind, or did not believe, otherwise he would not have adventured to restore this city: unto which he was tempted by its pleasant situation (2 Kings i. 19).

Ver. 27. The Lord was with Joshua,] Thus God made good his promise to him, i. 5, 9, where the Targum, as I observed, bath it, "The Word of the Lord thy God shall be thy helper." And so these words run in that paraphrase, "And the Word of the Lord helped Joshua:" that Divine Person who appeared to him, and encouraged him in this undertaking, ch. v. 13, 14, &c.

His fame was noised throughout all the country.] There was no part of the country which did not hear of their wonderful entrance into it over Jordan, and of the miraculous taking of Jericho, and the execution done there; which made the name of Joshua famous among them, as a captain before whom rivers fled, and the strongest walls fell down flat.

CHAPTER VII.

1 The Israelites are smitten at Ai. 6 Joshua's complaint. 10 God instructeth him what to do. 16 Achan is taken by the lot. 19 His confession. 22 He and all he had are destroyed in the valley of Achor.

1 But the children of Israel committed a trespass in the accursed thing: for Achan, the son of Carmi, the son of Zabdi, the son of Zerah, of the tribe of Judah, took of the accursed thing: and the anger of the Lord was kindled against the children of Israel.

CHAP. VII.

Ver. 1. But the children of Israel] That is, one among them. Which is an usual form of speech in the Holy Scripture, to ascribe that to many indefinitely wherein one alone is concerned; because where men are united in a society, they are all to partake in the good or evil that every of their members doth. Instances of which we find in Gen. viii. 4, xix. 29, xxiii. 6; Judges xii. 7; Matt. xxvi. 8. See Bochart in his Hierozoicon, par. i. lib. ii. cap. 17, p. 212, and a great many more instances he heaps up, par. ii. lib. v. cap. 3, p. 669.

Committed a trespass] Offended God by purloining to his own use some of the spoils which were devoted to destruction, or appropriated to God's treasury, with a curse upon him that meddled with them.

For Achan,] Who is called Achar in 1 Chron. ii. 7, because he having troubled Israel (as the word Achar signifies, ver. 25, of this chapter), it is likely that in after times they turned his name into Achar, instead of Achan.

2 And Joshua sent men from Jericho to Ai, which is beside Beth-aven, on the east side of Beth-el, and spake unto them, saying, Go up and view the country. And the men went up and viewed Ai.

3 And they returned to Joshua, and said unto him, Let not all the people go up; but let about two or three thousand men go up and smite Ai; and make not all the people to labour thither; for they are but few.

4 So there went up thither of the people about three thousand men: and they fled before the men of Ai.

Son of Zabdi,] Who is called Zimri, 1 Chron. ii. 6. Son of Zerah, of the tribe of Judah,] For we find Zerah was the son of Judah, and came with him into Egypt when he was very young; for we read of no children he had (Gen. xlv. 12). And if we suppose him to have begotten Zabdi when he was seventy years old, and allow as many years before Zabdi begat Carmi, and as many before Carmi begat Achan; we may make account (with Bonfrerius) that Achan was now about fifty years old; an age wherein many men begin to be more covetous than they were in their youth.

Took of the accursed thing,] What it was he himself confesses, ver. 21.

The anger of the Lord was kindled] The sin of one member of the body provoked the Divine Majesty to express his displeasure against them all (which they deserved upon other accounts), that they might be awakened to find out, and to punish him who had brought them into great danger.

This preface is made to this chapter, to show whence the ill success they had at Ai proceeded.

Ver. 2. Joshua sent men from Jericho to Ai,] Called Hai in Abraham's time (Gen. xii. 8). Which Joshua, I suppose, had summoned to surrender, according to the precept in Deut. xx. 10, but they had refused. It was a city about three miles distant from Jericho, as the Jews say in Semoth Rabbah; which Masius takes to signify three leagues.

Which is beside Beth-aven,] Whether Beth-aven here signify a city, or a wilderness, is uncertain (see xviii. 12).

On the east side of Beth-el,] A place which was but one league from Ai, as Masius computes, and lay westward of it (Gen. xii. 8), for the war was carried on from the east, where Jericho was, to the western parts of the country. It was called Beth-aven, in future times, by way of reproach, when the golden calves were set up in it; which made it not a "house of God" (as Beth-el signifies), but a "house of iniquity;" i. e. idolatry, which is the import of Beth-aven. But it is plain from hence, that these were two distinct places.

The men went up and viewed Ai,] How it lay, and how it was fortified, &c. And it seems to have been seated in the hilly country and belonged to the Amorites (ver. 7).

Ver. 3.] They thought this number would be sufficient, because, as it follows in the end of the verse, they were but few; and therefore they would not have all Israel put to the trouble of marching thither. In which counsel a good providence of God interposed; for if the flight of three thousand men put the Israelites into such a consternation (as we read, ver. 5, 6), what a condition would they have been in, if all the people had been put to the worse? as they would have been, if they had attacked Ai, while this guilt remained among them.

5 And the men of Ai smote of them about thirty and six men: for they chased them from before the gate even unto Shebarim, and smote them in the going down: wherefore the hearts of the people melted, and became as water.

6 ¶ And Joshua rent his clothes, and fell to the earth upon his face before the ark of the Lord until the eventide, he and the elders of Israel, and put dust upon their heads.

7 And Joshua said, Alas, O Lord God, wherefore hast thou at all brought this people over Jordan, to deliver us into the hand of the Amorites, to destroy us? would to God we had

Ver. 4.] Who seeing so small a number, came out and engaged the Israelites; whose courage quite failed them, so that they seem not to have struck a stroke, but immediately ran away. For God had left them; to whom they owed all their valour and victories.

Ver. 5. The men of Ai smote of them about thirty and six men,] Of the hindmost of them, it is most likely, who could not run away so fast as the rest.

Chased them from before the gate] Of the city Ai. Unto Shebarim,] A place, I suppose, between Ai and Jericho; which the Targum thinks had its name from the rout of the Israelites there.

Smote them in the going down,] Till they came to the plains of Jericho. For Ai standing on a hill, there was a descent from thence thither.

The hearts of the people melted,] As wax doth before the fire (Ps. lxxiii. 2), or as ice before the sun.

Became as water,] Weak and wavering, in uncertain resolutions, not knowing what to do.

Ver. 6. Joshua rent his clothes,] As the manner was when they were full of grief, upon occasion of any great calamity, or the commission of any great crime. Which custom was very ancient (Gen. xxxvii. 34, xlv. 13), and continued in the times of the prophets, who make it a crime that men did not rend their clothes when grievous sins were committed.

Fell to the earth] To make his supplication to God for mercy.

Before the ark] Not in the sanctuary, but with his face towards it. In imitation of which, the precursor in the Jewish synagogue, at this day, falls down before the chest, wherein they keep the book of the law, when he takes it out to read; as Buxtorf observes in his Synag. Judaica. And on solemn fast-days, as the Mischna tells, such prostrations were usual.

Until the eventide,] Continued all day in fasting and prayer to God.

He and the elders] Who rent their clothes, I suppose, as he had done; and then presented themselves in this mournful manner before God to implore his mercy.

Put dust upon their heads,] This was still a higher expression of great grief, and of a deep sense of their unworthiness to be relieved. Which was very usual in this nation (1 Sam. iv. 12; 2 Sam. i. 2, &c.), and was imitated by the gentiles; as we see in the example of the Ninevites (Jonah iii. 6), and of Achilles, who bewailed the death of Patroclus by throwing dust on his head, and lying down in the dust, as Homer describes it in Iliad  $\Sigma$ . ver. 23, 24.

Ver. 7. Alas, O Lord God,] A form of speech dolefully bewailing their forlorn condition: which did not misbecome so great a captain as Joshua was; for the most generous spirits have the most tender sense of humanity, as Arius Montanus excellently discourses upon this place.

been content, and dwelt on the other side Jordan!

8 O Lord, what shall I say, when Israel turneth their backs before their enemies!

9 For the Canaanites and all the inhabitants of the land shall hear of it, and shall environ us round, and cut off our name from the earth: and what wilt thou do unto thy great name?

10 ¶ And the LORD said unto Joshua, Get thee up; wherefore liest thou thus upon thy face?

11 Israel hath sinned, and they have also transgressed my covenant which I commanded them: for they have even taken of the accursed thing, and have also stolen, and dissembled also, and they have put it even among their own stuff.

12 Therefore the children of Israel could not stand before their enemies, but turned their backs before their enemies, because they were accursed: neither will I be with you any more, except ye destroy the accursed from among you.

13 Up, sanctify the people, and say, Sanctify yourselves against to morrow: for thus saith the LORD God of Israel, There is an accursed thing in the midst of thee, O Israel: thou canst not stand before thine enemies, until ye take away the accursed thing from among you.

14 In the morning therefore ye shall be

Wherefore hast thou at all brought this people over Jordan, to deliver us into the hands of the Amorites, to destroy us?] This is not a sinful expostulation with God (for Joshua is not reprehended for it, but graciously instructed), but only a confession of his ignorance, why God should do such wonders for them as he had done, and now let them fall into the hands of those enemies whom they had conquered on the other side of Jordan. And it is as if he had said, I am confounded in my thoughts, being unable to understand why, &c., and consequently, he humbly desired to be informed in the reason of this change of his providence.

Would to God we had been content, and dwelt on the other side Jordan!] As far as he could apprehend, they had better have rested satisfied with what they had in possession, than be thus defeated in their attempt to acquire more.

Ver. 8. O Lord, what shall I say.] What course shall I take? or how shall I answer the reproaches of our insulting enemies!

When Israel turneth their backs before their enemies!] What hope is there of conquering them or preserving ourselves?

Ver. 9. For the Canaanites and all the inhabitants of the land shall hear of it.] They that are at the greatest distance, by the sea-side, will hear the report of our defeat, which will soon be spread over the whole country.

Shall environ us round.] Be encouraged thereby to gather all the forces together and surround us.

Cut off our name] Utterly destroy us.

What wilt thou do unto thy great name?] And which was worse, God would lose the glory of all the miracles he had wrought, and be thought unable to accomplish what he had begun to do for his people. This argument Moses had formerly pressed (Exod. xxxii. 12; Numb. xiv. 16; Deut. ix. 28), and God himself, in the song which he bade Moses teach the people, makes use of it (Deut. xxxii. 26, 27).

Ver. 10.] These words are not a reproof, but a gracious answer to his prayers; for when a person who supplicates a prince is commanded to rise up from his knees, it is a token of acceptance.

Ver. 11. Israel hath sinned.] See ver. 1.

They have also transgressed my covenant] They had promised obedience to all God's commands (Exod. xxiv. 7), and assured Joshua they would do whatsoever he bade them (i. 16—18). And this was a late command delivered by him from God, that they should not meddle with any thing devoted to God, with a solemn curse.

They have even taken of the accursed thing.] That which belongs to me, ver. 1.

Have also stolen, and dissembled also.] Not only purloined that which God reserved to himself, but denied it after the fact was done. For I suppose Joshua, after the destruction of Jericho, had made inquiry, whether the silver and gold, &c., were brought into the treasury, and whether they had destroyed all other things, as God commanded; and they all answered, that they had.

They have put it even among their own stuff.] To conceal it from discovery: or, it is an expression of his impudent transgression of God's command, in converting it immediately to his own private use. For in this verse the crime is aggravated in a gradual manner, in that Achan had not only sinned, but against the covenant they had solemnly made with him; and that in a matter of great importance, in which he had lately laid his injunctions upon them: having not only taken to himself what belonged to God, but done it by way of stealth, as if he could not see it; and likewise denied the doing of it; and persisting in the sin, by mixing what he had stolen with his own proper goods.

Ver. 12. Because they were accursed.] By having a man among them who was fallen under the curse of God.

Neither will I be with you any more, except ye destroy the accursed from among you.] These words show that only one man among them was accursed, though they all suffered for it; and were to continue to suffer, till he was destroyed. For now that they knew that there had been such a crime committed among them, they had been as guilty as Achan if they had not punished it.

Ver. 13. Up.] He was not still lying on the ground, for God had bid him rise before, and he, I suppose, had obeyed him: but this is a word whereby he quickens him to make all the speed he could, to do as he now directed him.

Sanctify the people.] Call upon them to sanctify themselves; as it here follows.

Sanctify yourselves] As they did when they were to meet the Lord at Mount Sinai (Exod. xix. 10, &c.), and as they were lately commanded to do when he led them over Jordan (iii. 5). For now they were to appear before his majesty, that an inquisition might be made who he was that had been guilty of this foul crime.

To morrow.] For he would not have the guilt remain any longer upon them.

There is an accursed thing in the midst of thee, O Israel.] He speaks in this style both to awaken them to sanctify themselves, and also to appear before the Lord next morning.

Until ye take away the accursed thing from among you.] Both the person that had violated the anathema, and the thing he had purloined.

Ver. 14. Ye shall be brought] Before the Lord.

According to your tribes.] Some principal persons of every tribe, representing the rest, were set before the Lord.

brought according to your tribes: and it shall be, that the tribe which the Lord taketh shall come according to the families thereof; and the family which the Lord shall take shall come by households; and the household which the Lord shall take shall come man by man.

15 And it shall be, that he that is taken with the accursed thing shall be burnt with fire, he and all that he hath: because he hath transgressed the covenant of the Lord, and because he hath wrought folly in Israel.

16 ¶ So Joshua rose up early in the morning, and brought Israel by their tribes; and the tribe of Judah was taken:

17 And he brought the family of Judah; and he took the family of the Zarahites: and he brought the family of the Zarahites man by man; and Zabdi was taken:

It shall be, that the tribe which the Lord taketh, &c.] There is no difficulty in these words, but only to understand how this inquisition was made, and the author of the fact discovered: which is not here expressed, there being no words to signify how the Lord took one tribe, and family, and household, and person, from the rest. The Jews (who are never at a loss in these matters) tell us, that when they stood before the sanctuary, the high-priest was in it with the urim and thummim; wherein were twelve stones, with the name of the children of Israel engraven in them. And when that tribe, suppose, to which the guilty person belonged, was called, that stone in which was the name of that tribe changed colour; and so it did when the family, and the household, and the person, were called. But this is a mere fancy, of the stones shining, or becoming dusky; by which, I have shown elsewhere, answers could not be given to inquiries by urim and thummim. And what others of them say is not much better: for instance, Kimchi, who tells us some are of opinion, that they being made to pass before the ark, the guilty could not stir a foot (see several other conceits in Buxtorf's Historia Urim et Thummim, p. 304, &c.).

But the plainest account of this matter is this, that they were discovered by casting of lots, in the presence of God; which was an usual way in aftertimes of discovering noxious persons (1 Sam. xiv. 41, 42; Jonah i. 7). So Josephus, lib. v. cap. 1, and Ralbag, Ver. 15. He that is taken with the accursed thing shall be burnt.] After they had stoned him to death with stones (ver. 25).

He and all that he hath.] His children, and his cattle; his tent, and all his goods; as it is explained ver. 24.

Because he hath transgressed.] See ver. 11.

He hath wrought folly.] Committed a very heinous sin.

Ver. 16. So Joshua rose up early.] It is probable he acquainted nobody with these orders; but made all the haste he could to put them in execution: for if they had been known abroad, Achan's guilt might have made him flee from so terrible a sentence.

The tribe of Judah was taken:] Who, if we may believe the Jews, immediately stood to their arms, and would not lay them down, till they saw the man apprehended and punished who had done this thing.

Ver. 17. He brought the family of Judah:] Every family of that tribe, till that of the Zarahites was taken.

Zarahites man by man:] That is, every head of their several households, as he was directed, ver. 14.

18 And he brought his household man by man; and Achan, the son of Carmi, the son of Zabdi, the son of Zerah, of the tribe of Judah, was taken.

19 And Joshua said unto Achan, My son, give, I pray thee, glory to the Lord God of Israel, and make confession unto him; and tell me now what thou hast done; hide it not from me.

20 And Achan answered Joshua, and said, Indeed I have sinned against the Lord God of Israel, and thus and thus have I done:

21 When I saw among the spoils a goodly Babylonish garment, and two hundred shekels of silver, and a wedge of gold of fifty shekels weight, then I coveted them, and took them; and, behold, they are hid in the earth in the midst of my tent, and the silver under it.

Zabdi was taken:] That is, the lot fell upon his household.

Ver. 18.] Here the Samaritan Chronicle tells the very same story with the Talmudists, that the stone in the breastplate of the high-priest, in which was engraven the name of Judah, was darkened when Achan was named (see Hottinger's Smegma Orientale, cap. 8, p. 505).

Ver. 19. My son.] All great minds are full of tenderness and compassion; and nothing more unbecomes a prince than violent passion: which Joshua was so far from expressing on this occasion, that he speaks to him with the greatest mildness imaginable.

Give—glory to the Lord God.] The Samaritan Chronicle, before named, paraphrases this not amiss, "Lift up thine eyes to the King of heaven and earth, and acknowledge that nothing can be hid from him; who knows the greatest secrets."

Make confession unto him; and tell me now what thou hast done:] Openly confess thy guilt; and relate to me what it is, that thou hast converted to thine own use.

Hide it not from me.] Who thou seest have God at hand, to discover that which none of us know but thyself.

Ver. 20. Indeed I have sinned.] Which the Samaritan Chronicle thus expresses: "I acknowledge that I have grievously sinned before God, who knows all secret and hidden things; for I have prevaricated against the covenant of God, and against his ambassador."

Thus and thus have I done:] Committed this sin, with such circumstances as here follow.

Ver. 21. When I saw among the spoils.] He doth not say in what place; but the forenamed Chronicle saith, it was as he went into one of their temples.

A goodly Babylonish garment.] There are a great many opinions about this garment; which Bochartus most probably judges to have been a various garment, as the LXX. translate it; that is, of divers colours, wherein were several figures either woven or wrought with a needle: for which sort of work Babylon was famous, insomuch that they were called Painted garments; which made a most glorious show, and therefore was very inviting to the eye of Achan: who was tempted by its lustre, to reserve one of these garments for his own use, or to sell; for they were of an immense price. See him in his Phaleg, lib. i. cap. 6, where he hath a long dissertation about this garment.

Two hundred shekels of silver.] Which is as much as a hundred German dollars, as Masius observes.

22 ¶ So Joshua sent messengers, and they ran unto the tent; and, behold, it was hid in his tent, and the silver under it.

23 And they took them out of the midst of the tent, and brought them unto Joshua, and unto all the children of Israel, and laid them out before the Lord.

24 And Joshua, and all Israel with him, took Achan the son of Zerah, and the silver, and the garment, and the wedge of gold, and his sons,

A wedge of gold] In the Hebrew a tongue: for it had that shape.

Of fifty shekels weight.] This may be understood two ways; either that it was worth so many shekels in value, that is, fifty dollars; or, that it weighed as much as fifty shekels, that is, three hundred dollars. The last sense Masius thinks most probable.

Then I coveted them, and took them.] To his own use; when he should have brought them into God's treasury (James i. 15).

They are hid in the earth in the midst of my tent.] Till he could have time to dispose of them to his best advantage.

The silver under it.] The silver was immediately under the Babylonish garment, and the gold under that: for both silver and gold are here meant, though one only mentioned.

Ver. 22. So Joshua sent messengers.] Least any one should remove them, and render the fact dubious; and that the children of Israel might be speedily executed.

It was hid in his tent, and the silver under it.] They found the Babylonish garment (as was said before) hid in the earth, and the silver and gold under it. The LXX. indeed, understand it, as if the gold and Babylonish garment were uppermost, and the silver under them: for so they translate these words both here and in the foregoing verse, τὸ ἀργύριον ὑποκάτω αὐτῶν, "the silver under them." The wedge of gold, perhaps, was wrapped in the Babylonish garment; and so the silver might be said to lie either under it, or under them.

Ver. 23. They took them out] Where he told them he had buried these things.

Brought them unto Joshua, and unto all the children of Israel.] For they were all assembled at the tabernacle, waiting to see the issue of this matter.

Laid them out before the Lord.] That the fact might be manifest, and the Lord acknowledged to be omniscient.

Ver. 24. And Joshua, and all Israel with him.] By an universal consent.

Took Achan the son of Zerah.] He was Zerah's great-grandchild.

The silver, and the garment, and the wedge of gold.] Which God would not have put into his treasury, after they had been thus perverted to a private use.

His sons, and his daughters.] This seems very hard, that they should be executed in such a terrible manner, as here follows, for their father's fault. But the Jews in Pirke Eliezer say, they were punished because they were privy to their father's stealth, and concealed it. Others think this was a necessary severity in the beginning of a new empire, and of a plentiful fortune, upon which they now entered; that they might not wantonly abuse it. But there are those who think this is but a seeming difficulty; Achan alone being stoned (as we read in the next verse, "all Israel stoned him with stones"), and his children brought forth to be spectators of it. And when it is said, in the conclusion of the next verse, "they and his daughters, and his oxen, and his asses, and his sheep, and his tent, and all that he had: and they brought them unto the valley of Achor.

25 And Joshua said, Why hast thou troubled us? the Lord shall trouble thee this day. And all Israel stoned him with stones, and burned them with fire, after they had stoned them with stones.

26 And they raised over him a great heap of stoned them with stones," it relates to his oxen, and asses, and sheep, which were stoned with him (see Guil. Vorstius, in his annotations upon Pirke Eliezer, p. 224).

All that he had.] This was done, to represent to the people the heinousness of this offence; and to strike such a terror into them, that they should not dare to commit the like.

They brought them unto the valley of Achor.] Which had its name from him, ver. 26 (see there).

Ver. 25. Joshua said.] He was the sole judge, as the Jews think, in this matter. And whereas, by the law, none might be condemned out of the mouth of one witness, nor was any judge to sit alone without assistance (according to their doctors), nor any man's testimony to be admitted against himself (because, in a mad fit, he might undo himself), yet their king had this singular prerogative, that he might try a man alone by himself, and condemn him out of the mouth of one witness, nay, from his own confession; as Joshua did here (who was their king or supreme governor) in Achan's case; and as David did afterward in the case of the Amalekites, 2 Sam. i. 15 (see G. Schickard, in his Jus Regium, cap. 4, theor. 14). But Joshua is impertinently alleged as a proof of this extraordinary power; for it was God who convicted Achan, and pronounced this sentence; which Joshua only put in execution.

The Lord shall trouble thee this day.] The doctors in the Jerusalem Talmud, in the treatise Sanhedrin, cap. 6, fancy there is a peculiar emphasis in these words, this day. As if he had said, "In this day thou shalt be troubled, but thou shalt not be troubled in the world to come." For they think that he having given glory to God, by confessing his sin, had all his punishment here.

All agree Joshua alludes to his name; the word Achar signifying to trouble or disturb. Or rather, his name was changed from Achan unto Achar, because of this disturbance which he gave to all Israel.

All Israel stoned him] Which was a punishment of great crimes, as I have observed elsewhere. See Lev. xx. 9, 11—13, &c. as I remember. This is said to be done by all Israel; because they were all present, and consenting to it.

Burned them with fire.] Burnt their dead carcasses. Why they were both stoned and also burnt, Eliezer in his Pirke, and Vorstius upon him, gives a reason in the place above named.

Ver. 26. They raised over him a great heap of stones] As a monument of his sin, and of God's judgment upon him. Thus they did with Absalom, 2 Sam. xviii. 17. And houses or cities which were destroyed, are said to be turned into a heap (Isa. xxv. 2), or heaps (Jer. ix. 11), as a token of their utter ruin.

The Lord turned from the fierceness of his anger.] Was reconciled to his people, after they had executed his sentence against him, that provoked his anger. So the Samaritan Chronicle: "Thus the anger of God was removed from the children of Israel, and he was pleased with what they had done" (see Deut. xiii. 17).

stones unto this day. So the LORD turned from the fierceness of his anger. Wherefore the name of that place was called, The valley of Achor, unto this day.

The name of that place] Where he was stoned and burnt.

Was called, The valley of Achor,] From that time all the people called this place by that name, in memory of this execution done upon Achar: so he was also called ever after this. For though his name was Achan, yet from henceforward they called him Achar the troubler of Israel. And so he is here called in the Syriac version, and by Josephus, Athanasius, Basil, and others mentioned by Bochartus; as Ezra himself also calls him, 1 Chron. ii. 7. See Hierozoicon par. i. lib. ii. cap. 31, in the latter end.

CHAPTER VIII.

1 God encourageth Joshua. 3 The stratagem whereby Ai was taken. 29 The king thereof is hanged. 30 Joshua buildeth an altar, 32 writeth the law on stones, 33 propoundeth blessings and cursings.

1 AND the LORD said unto Joshua, Fear not, neither be thou dismayed: take all the people of war with thee, and arise, go up to Ai: see, I have given into thy hand the king of Ai, and his people, and his city, and his land:

2 And thou shalt do to Ai and her king as thou didst unto Jericho and her king: only the spoil thereof, and the cattle thereof, shall ye take for a prey unto yourselves: lay thee an ambush for the city behind it.

3 ¶ So Joshua arose, and all the people of war, to go up against Ai: and Joshua chose out thirty thousand mighty men of valour, and sent them away by night.

4 And he commanded them, saying, Behold, ye shall lie in wait against the city, even behind the city: go not very far from the city, but be ye all ready:

5 And I, and all the people that are with me, will approach unto the city: and it shall come to pass, when they come out against us, as at the first, that we will flee before them,

6 (For they will come out after us) till we have drawn them from the city; for they will say, They flee before us, as at the first: therefore we will flee before them.

7 Then ye shall rise up from the ambush, and seize upon the city: for the LORD your God will deliver it into your hand.

8 And it shall be, when ye have taken the

CHAP. VIII.

Ver. 1. The Lord said unto Joshua,] Who, it is likely, now consulted God about their progress in this war: which he had not done before (vii. 2), being sufficiently authorized by what God had often said to him, and by their success against Jericho: but this late defeat, before Ai, might make him think it necessary to take advice of the Divine Majesty, before he attempted any thing farther.

Fear not,] Because of the late ill success; of which he now knew the cause; which was removed.

Take all the people of war with thee,] This order may seem strange, since the people themselves thought two or three thousand were sufficient, if God were with them. But God would have them all to share in the spoil of Ai; that they who had obeyed him in abstaining from laying their hands on any thing in Jericho, might be now rewarded for it, by the prey of this city; as it follows in the next verse.

Go up to Ai:] Which it appears by this was in the hill country.

I have given into thy hand the king of Ai,] He bids him be confident of a complete victory, as if he had already won it.

Ver. 2. Thou shalt do to Ai—as thou didst unto Jericho] Only with such difference as follows in the next words.

Only the spoil thereof, and the cattle thereof, shall ye take for a prey unto yourselves:] None of the silver or gold, or any thing else, was separated to God's use, nor ordered to be destroyed; but they were to enjoy it all entirely themselves.

Lay thee an ambush—behind it,] On the west of it; for they were now in Gilgal, which lay eastward.

Ver. 3. So Joshua arose, and all the people of war,] In obedience to the Divine direction (ver. 1).

Sent them away by night,] When they were less liable to be observed.

Ver. 4. Ye shall lie in wait against the city,] Like a great general, he assigns their post to every part of the army.

Go not very far from the city,] Lie as close to it as you can, without being discovered.

But be ye all ready:] To seize upon the city, when all the people were drawn out of it.

Ver. 5. And I, and all the people—will approach] As if they intended to assault it.

When they come out against us, as at the first,] Which he rationally presumed they would, being flushed with such good success.

That we will flee before them,] Counterfeit a flight, as soon as they appeared.

Ver. 6. (For they will come out after us)] Pursue them, with all their force.

Therefore we will flee before them,] He gives the reason of their flight, without striking of a stroke (as we now speak), that all the people might be enticed out of the city, in pursuit of them, as he concluded they would be; because now there was a greater number of the Israelites than before; which would require their whole power to deal withal.

Ver. 7. Then ye shall rise up from the ambush,] Upon the signal given, mentioned ver. 18.

The Lord your God will deliver it into your hand,] He would not have them fear to enter the city: which he assured them God would put into their possession.

Ver. 8. That ye shall set the city on fire:] The gate where they entered, or some of the skirts of the city, as a token they were possessed of it. For they were to take the spoil of the city before they burnt it (ver. 28).

According to the commandment of the Lord shall ye do,] And not transgress, as Achan did.

See, I have commanded you,] Acquainted them with the will of God; in the observance of which they might be confident of success.

Ver. 9. They went to lie in ambush,] He selected city, that ye shall set the city on fire: according to the commandment of the LORD shall ye do. See, I have commanded you.

9 ¶ Joshua therefore sent them forth: and they went to lie in ambush, and abode between Beth-el and Ai, on the west side of Ai: but Joshua lodged that night among the people.

10 And Joshua rose up early in the morning, and numbered the people, and went up, he and the elders of Israel, before the people to Ai.

11 And all the people, even the people of war that were with him, went up, and drew nigh, and came before the city, and pitched on the north side of Ai: now there was a valley between them and Ai.

12 And he took about five thousand men, and set them to lie in ambush between Beth-el and Ai, on the west side of the city.

13 And when they had set the people, even these thirty thousand men out of the rest of the army; and when it was dark they went upon the forenamed design.

[Joshua lodged that night among the people.] The forenamed detachment (as we now speak), was commanded by some great officer, in whom Joshua confided; but he himself lay all night in the body of the army; that he might be ready in the morning to give the necessary orders.

Ver. 10. Numbered the people.] He first gave orders to the officers (for he could not do it himself alone) to see that none of the people were wanting.

He and the elders of Israel.] And when he commanded them to march, he was attended by the elders of Israel, leading them on towards Ai. But it is uncertain who are here meant by the "elders of Israel." Some think, the chief commanders in the army; but they are never called elders, much less the elders of Israel. But the rulers and judges are called by this name, who, I suppose, waited upon Joshua as a council of war: being men authorized by God to assist the supreme governor (Numb. xi. 16. 24, 25).

Ver. 11. All the people, even the people of war that were with him, went up, and drew nigh.] The distance between Gilgal and Ai being but three leagues, it is likely, the people being mustered early in the morning, they got thither before noon. Those words, "even the men of war that were with him," seem to be opposed to the thirty thousand, whom he had sent before to lie in ambush (ver. 3).

Pitched on the north side of Ai.] Here the main body of the army lay, behind the hills, it is likely, so that they were not discovered till the evening, or the next day.

There was a valley between them and Ai.] Where they of Ai, I suppose, drew up; when they resolved to engage them.

Ver. 12. Between Beth-el and Ai.] Which places were but a league distant one from the other (see vii. 2).

On the west side.] Where the former detachment was ordered to lie, ver. 4. But these seem to have been a distinct party from them, and sent, it is likely, for another purpose; to intercept all those that might think to save themselves, by flying through by-ways, which they were to guard. There are those, indeed, who think that there were but thirty thousand men in all employed in this expedition against Ai; and out of them these five thousand men were sent to lie in ambush, that they might, in convenient time, set fire to the city (see Masius). But this is so directly contrary to God's command, to "take all the people of war with him, ver. 1. and to what is said, ver. 3. 11. that I cannot think it to be true. One had better say, this party was added to strengthen the thirty thousand men in their undertaking.

Ver. 13. When they had set the people.] That is, when things were thus disposed about the evening.

Joshua went—into the midst of the valley.] To pray to God, it is likely, for a blessing upon their enterprise.

Ver. 14. When the king of Ai saw it.] That is, was informed of their investing the city on the north side of it; which, it is likely, was in the evening, or late that night.

That they hasted.] He called a council, and they speedily resolved to dislodge the Israelites.

The men of the city went out—he and all his people.] The meaning is, all that could fight went out, and their king at the head of them.

At a time appointed.] They had agreed all to issue out at several gates (it is likely) at a certain hour.

Before the plain;] He means, perhaps, the valley which lay between Ai and the camp of Israel; before which they drew up their army to engage the Israelites.

But he wist not that there were liers in ambush.] The king had no intelligence of that strong party, which Joshua had sent to lie behind the city; they keeping, I suppose, their gates shut (as they did at Jericho, that none could get in or go out, vi. 1), and suspecting no danger from the western coast where they lay, but only from the east, whence they knew the Israelites were to march.

Ver. 15. Joshua and all Israel made as if they were beaten.] At the first onset, Joshua himself turned his back, and all the rest of his army; as if they durst not stand before them.

And fled by the way of the wilderness.] Which lay between Jericho and Ai.

Ver. 16. All the people.] Who were able to fight.

Were called together to pursue after them.] I suppose some of the men of war might be left in the city till they saw the Israelites fly, and then they were all called out (as ver. 14. is to be understood) together with those of Beth-el, who were come to their assistance; being near neighbours, and both under the same king.

They pursued after Joshua, and were drawn away from the city. They were so eager in their pursuit, that they were drawn to a greater distance from Ai than they would have been, if they had considered the danger of leaving it naked.

Beth-el, that went not out after Israel : and they left the city open, and pursued after Israel.

18 And the Lord said unto Joshua, Stretch out the spear that is in thy hand toward Ai ; for I will give it into thine hand. And Joshua stretched out the spear that he had in his hand toward the city.

19 And the ambush arose quickly out of their place, and they ran as soon as he had stretched out his hand : and they entered into the city, and took it, and hasted and set the city on fire.

20 And when the men of Ai looked behind them, they saw, and, behold, the smoke of the city ascended up to heaven, and they had no power to flee this way or that way : and the people that fled to the wilderness turned back upon the pursuers.

Ver. 17. There was not a man left in Ai] None that were able to fight.

Or Beth-el,] For they of Beth-el, it appears by these words, were come to the assistance of Ai, before any of the army of Israel arrived : for afterward they could not, because the ambush lay between Beth-el and Ai (ver. 9).

They left the city open, and pursued after Israel.] There was not so much as a man left to guard the gates ; but all were engaged in the pursuit.

Ver. 18. The Lord said unto Joshua,] God secretly suggested to him, that now was the time for the ambush to fall upon the city ; when their army was drawn so far from it, that they could not return soon enough to relieve it.

Stretch out the spear—toward Ai ;] He bids him face about (as we now speak) and stop the flight of the Israelites. It is much disputed what the Hebrew word chidon signifies ; which the Vulgar Latin translates a shield. But Bochartus hath taken a great deal of pains to show, that it everywhere signifies in Scripture a spear (as we translate it), or a lance, or some kind of such-like offensive weapon ; especially in this place, he thinks, there can be no doubt of it ; for it was a weapon he had in his hand, and was to stretch forth towards the city ; that it might be a signal to those in ambush to rise and enter the city ; and to those who fled to make a stand, and encounter the enemy. To which purpose, nothing could be more proper than a spear, with a flag, it is highly probable, at the end of it (like to our ensigns), which made it more visible (see Hieroz. par. i. lib. ii. cap. 8. p. 135, &c.) The LXX. here translate it γαισων, which Suidas says signifies a kind of weapon, οιον δογατος, “ like to a spear.” See the same most learned author, in his Canaan, lib. i. cap. 42. p. 744.

I will give it into thine hand.] As he promised ver. 1.

Joshua stretched out the spear—toward the city,] That all Israel might see it ; as they did the rod of Moses, when they fought against Amalek.

Ver. 19. The ambush arose quickly out of their place,] Being admonished by some Divine suggestion (as Masius thinks) as well as by the signal, that now was the time to execute their design.

They ran as soon as he had stretched out his hand ;] Which they might see from some of the hills, at the back of which they lay. But why they should watch for this sign, or understand what it meant, unless Joshua had received this order, and told it them before they went, cannot be conceived.

They entered into the city, and took it,] For there was nobody to oppose them.

21 And when Joshua and all Israel saw that the ambush had taken the city, and that the smoke of the city ascended, then they turned again, and slew the men of Ai.

22 And the other issued out of the city against them ; so they were in the midst of Israel, some on this side, and some on that side : and they smote them, so that they let none of them remain or escape.

23 And the king of Ai they took alive, and brought him to Joshua.

24 And it came to pass, when Israel had made an end of slaying all the inhabitants of Ai in the field, in the wilderness wherein they chased them, and when they were all fallen on the edge of the sword, until they were consumed, that all the Israelites returned unto Ai, and smote it with the edge of the sword.

And hasted and set the city on fire.] In one place ; which, it is likely, was on the north side of the city ; that both the Israelites and the people of Ai might see the smoke. This the Lord had strictly commanded (see ver. 8), which made them make such haste, as soon as they had possessed themselves of the city, to set fire to it.

Ver. 20. When the men of Ai looked behind them,] I suppose there was a great shout made by all the Israelites, when they saw the smoke ascend ; which made the men of Ai look about them.

They saw, and, behold, the smoke of the city ascended] The firing of any out-houses, or barns, was sufficient to make such a smoke ; for it is certain the city was not yet burnt (see ver. 28).

They had no power to flee this way or that way ;) Either they were so dismayed, that they stood stock-still (as we speak), or found themselves so environed, that they could no way escape. For on the north and east sides, the great army came upon them ; and on the west the ambush issued forth against them ; and the other five thousand men blocked up their way on the south : which could not but very much amaze and perplex their minds ; and the more, to see all their vain-glorious hopes vanished, which their king no doubt had entertained, of stopping the progress of the Israelites, and being the deliverer of his country.

The people—turned back upon the pursuers.] Ver. 15. They counterfeited a flight no longer, but now boldly looked their enemies in the face.

Ver. 21. When Joshua and all Israel saw] By this it is plain the whole body of the men were here ; and not only three thousand of them, as some suppose (see ver. 12).

That the smoke of the city ascended,] Whereby they understood it was taken.

They turned again, and slew the men of Ai.] After they had made a stand awhile, and rallied, they fell upon the men of Ai, and made a great slaughter of them.

Ver. 22.] By this stratagem they were all entirely cut off.

Ver. 23.] Perhaps they were ordered so to do, that he might be made a public spectacle of the Divine vengeance.

Ver. 24. Had made an end of slaying all the inhabitants of Ai] That is, the men of war.

In the wilderness wherein they chased them,] By this it appears, that they fled before the Israelites as soon as they turned upon them, having no heart to fight them (ver. 20).

25 And so it was, that all that fell that day, both of men and women, were twelve thousand, even all the men of Ai.

26 For Joshua drew not his hand back, wherewith he stretched out the spear, until he had utterly destroyed all the inhabitants of Ai.

27 Only the cattle and the spoil of that city Israel took for a prey unto themselves, according unto the word of the LORD which he commanded Joshua.

28 And Joshua burnt Ai, and made it an heap for ever, even a desolation unto this day.

29 And the king of Ai he hanged on a tree until eventide: and as soon as the sun was down, Joshua commanded that they should take his carcase down from the tree, and cast it at the entering of the gate of the city, and raise thereon a great heap of stones, that remaineth unto this day.

30 ¶ Then Joshua built an altar unto the LORD God of Israel in mount Ebal, 31 As Moses the servant of the LORD commanded the children of Israel, as it is written in the book of the law of Moses, an altar of whole stones, over which no man hath lift up any iron: and they offered thereon burnt offerings unto the LORD, and sacrificed peace offerings.

32 ¶ And he wrote there upon the stones a copy of the law of Moses, which he wrote in the presence of the children of Israel.

33 And all Israel, and their elders, and officers, and their judges, stood on this side the ark and

[When they were all fallen on the edge of the sword,] This is repeated to express a complete victory.

[All the Israelites returned unto Ai,] From whence they counterfeited a fight.

[And smote it] All the people that were left in it, as every one was that was not able to go to war.

Ver. 25. All that fell—were twelve thousand,] By which it appears this was no great city; and that they who were sent to view the country had reason to think a small party sufficient to subdue it (vii. 2, 3). For the men of Beth-el seem to be included also in this number, being mixed with those of Ai, from whom the Israelites could not distinguish them.

Even all the men of Ai,] The inhabitants of the city (as it follows in the next verse), and the territory about it, great and small, men and women.

Ver. 26. But kept his arm extended with the spear in it, as Moses' rod was lifted up during the fight with Amalek. Or, the meaning may be, that he himself charged them, and continued to fight as long as there was a man left.

Ver. 27. Only the cattle and the spoil] i. e. Their silver and gold, and household stuff, &c.

Israel took for a prey unto themselves,] Who was so far from reserving any of these things to himself, that he made an express grant of them to the Israelites (ver. 2).

Ver. 28. Joshua burnt Ai,] After they had gotten all the spoil of it, which had been lost if it had been burnt before by the liars in ambush (see ver. 8. 19).

Made it an heap] Laid it waste, so that it was known only by its ruins for a long time after, as it was at the time when this was written (see ver. 11. 26).

Ver. 29. The king of Ai he hanged on a tree] Being the head of a very wicked people, who was fit to be made a public spectacle of God's displeasure. Lipsius, in his book De Cruce, lib. i. cap. 11, produces this as an ancient instance of crucifying notorious malefactors. But that is a great mistake, crucifixion being no Jewish, but a Roman punishment. Nor were crucified persons hanged and strangled, as the king of Ai and Haman were, but fastened alive to a cross, with nails stuck into their hands and feet. The LXX. indeed here expound it, "he was hanged," ἐν ξύλων δένδρον, wherein they seem to have respect to the figure of the cross; but there is no such thing in the Hebrew (see Numb. xxv. 4).

As soon as the sun was down, Joshua commanded that they should take his carcase down] For so God had commanded, Deut. xxi. 22, 24 (see there).

Cast it at the entering of the gate] Where he was wont to sit in judgment: and, in all probability, had exercised a great deal of injustice and cruelty.

Raise thereon a great heap of stones,] As they did upon Achan, vii. 26. and for the same end, to be a monument of his being hanged near to this place.

Ver. 30. Joshua built an altar—in Mount Ebal,] If this mount lay between Ai and Beth-el (as Gerardus Mercator endeavours to prove by many arguments), then this altar, we may well think, was built immediately after the taking of Ai, as soon as they came into possession of this mount: for they looked upon themselves, no doubt, as obliged to fulfil the command of God, given them by Moses, as soon as it was possible. But the Scripture plainly describes this Mount Ebal as near Shechem, for there was only a valley between Ebal and Gerizim, from whence Jotham spake to the men of Shechem (Judg. ix. 7), which was a great way distant from Ai. And therefore we must suppose that which is here related not to have been done till they had the country about Shechem.

Ver. 31. As Moses—commanded] Deut. xi. 29, 30. xxvii. 2, &c. See in those places.

As it is written in the book of the law] The altar was built according to the directions given by God in a foregoing law of his, Exod. xx. 25, and repeated in Deut. xxvii. 5, 6 (see there).

They offered thereon burnt offerings] For now they renewed their covenant with God the third time, as I observed upon that chapter in Deuteronomy, ver. 10.

Ver. 32.] It is a great question what it was he wrote upon these stones. Some fancy all the five books of Moses; others only the book of Deuteronomy; which is more likely than the other; but too long for these stones to contain, or for him to write, "in the presence of all Israel." Others, therefore, think only the ten commandments, or a compendium of the law of Moses; or, perhaps, the blessings and cursings: but Fortunatus Scaechus, with some probability, conjectures, that he only wrote the words of the covenant, by which the children of Israel acknowledged they held the land of Canaan of God, as their great Lord; upon condition they observed his laws, to which they and their posterity were obliged. And this he principally grounds upon those words (Deut. xxvii. 3), "Thou shalt write upon them all the words of this law." Where the Hebrew word hazoth (this) he thinks hath a particular respect to what he is speaking of: viz. their going over Jordan to possess the land which God gave them, upon condition they observed his statutes (see Sacror. Elæochrysm. Myrothec. lib. ii. cap. 57. p. 570, &c. and my notes upon Deuteronomy, xxvii. 3).

Ver. 33. Stood on this side the ark, and on that side] With their faces towards the ark.

Before the priests the Levites,] Who were to pronounce the blessings and cursings prescribed by the law (see Deut. xxvii. 24).

on that side before the priests the Levites, which bare the ark of the covenant of the Lord, as well the stranger, as he that was born among them; half of them over against mount Gerizim, and half of them over against mount Ebal; as Moses the servant of the Lord had commanded before, that they should bless the people of Israel.

34 And afterward he read all the words of the

As well the stranger, as he that was born among them;] For the law made no distinction between them (Lev. xix. 34).

As Moses—had commanded before,] In Deut. xxvii. 12, 13 (see there).

That they should bless the people] There were cursings as well as blessings pronounced: but the intent of cursing was, that they might avoid those sins against which they were denounced; and thereby obtain a blessing.

Ver. 34.] viz. In Deut. xxvii. ver. 15—17, &c. The word afterward is not to be neglected, which imports, that after the building of the altar, and the offering sacrifices thereon, and writing the law on the stones, and disposing the people in their place about the ark, then he read the law to them. Which was likely to be heard with the greater attention when they were law, the blessings and cursings, according to all that is written in the book of the law.

35 There was not a word of all that Moses commanded, which Joshua read not before all the congregation of Israel, with the women, and the little ones, and the strangers that were conversant among them.

thus prepared to receive it, and had solemnly worshipped God and owned his authority.

Ver. 35. Not a word of all that Moses commanded, which Joshua read not] viz. All that Moses directed in Deut. xxvii. or, as others will have it, the whole book of Deuteronomy, wherein these blessings and cursings are contained (see Deut. xxxi. 13).

The strangers] By the strangers here mentioned (and in ver. 33), are to be understood such as were proselytes to their religion: and had undertaken to observe this law, as well as themselves; and therefore were to be made acquainted with it. And that they might be moved to have the greater regard to it, Joshua himself, their chief governor, read it to them. So some of the Jews understand it; after the priests had read the blessings and cursings, then Joshua read all the commanding and forbidding precepts in the law.

CHAPTER IX.

1 The kings combine against Israel. 3 The Gibeonites by craft obtain a league. 16 For which they are condemned to perpetual bondage.

1 AND it came to pass, when all the kings which were on this side Jordan, in the hills, and in the valleys, and in all the coasts of the great sea over against Lebanon, the Hittite, and the Amorite, the Canaanite, the Perizzite, the Hivite, and the Jebusite, heard thereof;

2 That they gathered themselves together, to fight with Joshua and with Israel, with one accord.

3 ¶ And when the inhabitants of Gibeon heard what Joshua had done unto Jericho and to Ai,

4 They did work wilyly, and went and made as if they had been ambassadors, and took old sacks upon their asses, and wine bottles, old, and rent, and bound up;

5 And old shoes and clouted upon their feet, and old garments upon them; and all the bread of their provision was dry and mouldy.

CHAP. IX.

Ver. 1. The great sea] By the great sea, is meant the Mediterranean; where those people, peculiarly called Canaanites, dwelt, as hath been observed. And the Amorites seem to have been the principal inhabitants of the hilly country, in the south of Judea (see on Deut. i. 7. 19, 20).

Over against Lebanon,] The LXX. and the Vulgar understand this, as if he spake of those that dwelt near Lebanon.

The Hittite, &c.] Thus they are reckoned up in Deut. xx. 17, where the Girgashites are omitted, as they are here (see an account of it in my notes upon that place: and on ch. xvi. of this book, ver. 10).

Heard thereof;] Of the taking of Jericho and Ai: for what is said, in the words immediately foregoing, concerning the Israelites meeting at Mount Ebal, is not inserted as a thing wherein these nations were concerned.

Ver. 2. They gathered themselves together, to fight with Joshua] They entered into a confederacy to oppose Joshua's farther progress in the conquest of their country. But they did not gather themselves to battle, till they heard what Gibeon had done.

With one accord.] The whole country were unanimous in that resolution; and thereupon rejected the summons which Joshua had sent them to surrender themselves and their cities to him.

Ver. 3. And when the inhabitants of Gibeon] Or, "But when," &c. Gibeon was a city in the mountainous country; for we read afterward of a high place at Gibeon.

Heard what Joshua had done unto Jericho and to Ai,] They being Hivites (ver. 7), had at the first rejected the offers of peace which Joshua sent them, as the rest of their nation (ver. 1) had done. But hearing that Joshua had taken Jericho and Ai, and destroyed all their inhabitants, they repented of that resolution; and consulted how they might, by some means or other, make their peace with the Israelites.

Ver. 4. They did work wilyly,] It being too late to surrender their city to Joshua upon such terms, as he is supposed to have offered (for there was no mercy to be shown them, after they had stood out against the three proclamations, which the Jews say were made to them), they contrived how to put a fallacy upon the Israelites, and by craft and cunning procure their favour (see my annotations on Deut. xx. 10, 11).

Went] They chose some from among them, who went in the name of the rest, towards the camp of Israel.

Made as if they had been ambassadors,] Pretending that they were sent upon an embassy to them, from a far country; as they affirmed, ver. 6.

Took old sacks] Wherein was their provision.

6 And they went to Joshua unto the camp at Gilgal, and said unto him, and to the men of Israel, We be come from a far country: now therefore make ye a league with us.

7 And the men of Israel said unto the Hivites, Peradventure ye dwell among us; and how shall we make a league with you?

8 And they said unto Joshua, We are thy servants. And Joshua said unto them, Who are ye? and from whence come ye?

9 And they said unto him from a very far country thy servants are come because of the name of the Lord thy God: for we have heard the fame of him, and all that he did in Egypt,

10 And all that he did to the two kings of the Amorites, that were beyond Jordan, to Sihon king of Heshbon, and to Og king of Bashan, which was at Ashtaroth.

11 Wherefore our elders and all the inhabitants of our country spake to us, saying, Take victuals with you for the journey, and go to meet them, and say unto them, We are your servants: therefore now make ye a league with us.

12 This our bread we took hot for our pro-

Wine bottles,—and bound up;] Where they were rent.

Ver. 5. Old shoes and clouted upon their feet,] As if they had been worn out, and patched up, with long travel.

Old garments upon them, &c.] It is observed by Arius Montanus, that nothing is said of the decay of their wine: which they pretended, it is likely, to have drunk all up, in so long a journey. For it was not so easy to procure sour wine, as mouldy bread.

Ver. 6. They went to Joshua—and to the men of Israel,] They addressed themselves to him, as the head of the people; and he had his council about him: who, in all probability, are here called “the men of Israel.” Though some conceive, that they had laid hold of every one they met withal, and besought them to admit them to their friendship.

We be come from a far country:] To sue to you for your friendship.

Make ye a league with us,] As they might do with those that accepted the offers of peace, which they sent them (Deut. xx. 11), and therefore much more with those who came to seek to be at peace with them: and were not inhabitants of the land of Canaan, but came from a far country; which they gave as a reason, why they should make a league with them. And, indeed, they had been to blame, if they had denied their petition: as the Romans were, who, when they were grown great, refused to receive a remote nation into their protection (as Appian tells us), who by their ambassadors submitted themselves to their power, because they did not see they were likely to get any thing by them. Which Bodinus (in his book against Malestretus De Caritate Rerum) censures as a base action, and injurious to Almighty God. “As if (saith he) the majesty of ruling and administering justice, especially to miserable and ill-instructed people, were not the greatest gift of God; and the highest honour of which a man is capable in this world.”

Ver. 7. The men of Israel] This shows that “the men of Israel” before mentioned were not ordinary persons, but such as had authority to treat with ambassadors.

Unto the Hivites,] Unto those who came from Gibeon, who were really Hivites, as is expressly said, xi. 19.

Peradventure ye dwell among us;] Are some of the people of this land; which we are commanded to root out.

How shall we make a league with you?] Then it is utterly unlawful for us to do what you desire: for God hath often forbidden it (Exod. xxiii. 32, 33. xxxiv. 12—16. Dent. vii. 2, 3, &c. and other places).

Ver. 8. They said unto Joshua,] With whom alone they had a desire to treat.

We are thy servants,] This doth not signify that they were ready to yield themselves to be tributaries to the Israelites, or accept of any terms that should be imposed on them: but are only expressions of great humility and civility; acknowledging the Israelites to be superior in power and strength, and therefore desiring their protection in their liberties. Thus Abraham addressed himself to the travellers, whom he entertained as greater persons than himself (Gen. xviii. 3, 4). And Jacob calls himself and his household the servants of Esau (Gen. xxx. 20). And thus Batricides understood their language here; who says the king of Gibeon wrote a letter to Joshua, wherein he desired security from him; and presented him with great gifts, as Hotinger observes in his Smegma Orientale, cap. 8. p. 507.

Who are ye? and from whence come ye?] They being backward to name the country from whence they were sent, it begat a reasonable suspicion in Joshua that they were some of the people of Canaan.

Ver. 9. From a very far country] They still avoid giving a particular account of their country, but answer in general terms; in which commonly lies deceit.

Because of the name of the Lord thy God:] To divert him from pressing them to give a more satisfactory answer, they pretend religion had invited them to take this long journey: which they knew would procure them a favourable audience.

For we have heard the fame of him, &c.] Of his miraculous works, particularly those which he did to deliver them from the Egyptian slavery; which, as it is evident, were come to their knowledge: so it is very reasonable to believe such wonderful things were the motives that made them seek for the Israelites’ friendship; they being wrought upon, as Rahab was, to embrace their religion.

Ver. 10.] They say not a word of the drying up of Jordan, and of the taking of Jericho and Ai: but prudently conceal their knowledge of those things, because they would have it supposed the tidings of those wonders could not yet be arrived at a country so far off as they pretended theirs to be.

Ver. 11. Wherefore our elders] The principal persons in their country: who were the rulers and governors of it.

And all the inhabitants] With the unanimous consent of all the people.

Take victuals with you for the journey,] Made choice of us for this embassy; and ordered us to provide ourselves with necessaries for so long a journey.

Go to meet them,] To prevent the Israelites from entertaining any hostile intentions against them.

We are your servants] The Samaritan Chronicle saith, they had orders to tell Joshua that they would embrace the Jewish religion; and refuse nothing, great or small, that he should desire of them. And indeed one would think, by what they said before, that they had a sense of the God of Israel as superior to all other gods: and consequently were disposed to become worshippers of him. For which reason he was pleased to dispose things so, that by their wiles vision out of our houses on the day we came forth to go unto you; but now, behold, it is dry, and it is mouldy :

13 And these bottles of wine, which we filled, were new; and, behold, they be rent: and these our garments and our shoes are become old by reason of the very long journey.

14 And the men took of their victuals, and asked not counsel at the mouth of the Lord.

15 And Joshua made peace with them, and made a league with them, to let them live: and the princes of the congregation sware unto them.

16 ¶ And it came to pass at the end of three they should compass their end, and be entertained into the friendship of the Israelites.

Ver. 12. This our bread we took hot for our provision] When it was newly come out of the oven.

But now, behold, it is dry, and it is mouldy.] This they say to demonstrate that they came from a country far distant from Canaan. Which, though it was not true, yet there are those (particularly Puffendorf) who think it was not culpable, not properly a lie; being a device to save their lives. For who will reprehend a person (saith he), who by a fiction preserves himself from being killed by an enemy? especially in such a case as this, wherein the Israelites suffered no damage by their craft? for what less doth he sustain who is hindered from shedding another man's blood, but hath it in his power to despoil him of all he hath, and bring him into perpetual servitude, so disarmed and weakened that he can never rise up against him? Thus he. Which is a doctrine that ought not to be allowed.

Ver. 13.] They use thus many words, to divert him from making any farther inquiry what the name of their country was (lest some among the Israelites, who had many strangers in their camp, should have been able to disprove them), and mention only the long time they had spent in their journey, that he might be moved to be kind unto those who had taken so much pains to beg the favour of the Israelites.

Ver. 14. And the men] That is, the persons mentioned ver. 7., who were the οἱ ἀρχαῖτες (as the LXX. here say), the princes or rulers of Israel.

Took of their victuals,] Not to eat them, but to inspect and examine them, whether their provision was so dry and mouldy as they pretended. For the word we translate victuals, is the very same with that we before translate provision (ver. 5). Which shows he doth not speak of victuals now prepared, but which they brought along with them. Some, indeed, think the meaning is, that they entered into a league with the Gibeonites, by tasting their victuals. But as this must suppose that they had made a feast for the entertainment of these princes, and invited them to it (which is altogether unlikely), so the making a league with them follows after this in the next verse, and therefore was not made by taking of their victuals.

And asked not counsel at the mouth of the Lord.] These words may seem to favour the sense now mentioned; that by eating with them (which was a token of friendship) they had performed part of the ceremony which belonged to the making of leagues, without consulting the Divine Majesty about it, but hastily believing an improbable story (see Gen. xxvi. 30, 31. xxxi. 44, 45). But the meaning of these words may be no more than this; that they depended wholly upon their own judgment, and that founded on such slight examination of the truth, as only taking their victuals into their hands and inspecting them, when God was near at hand to give them advice if they days after they had made a league with them, that they heard that they were their neighbours, and that they dwelt among them.

17 And the children of Israel journeyed, and came unto their cities on the third day. Now their cities were Gibeon, and Chephirah, and Beeroth, and Kirjath-jearim.

18 And the children of Israel smote them not, because the princes of the congregation had sworn unto them by the Lord God of Israel. And all the congregation murmured against the princes.

19 But all the princes said unto all the con-would have consulted him; and it is probable would have allowed them to make a league with the Gibeonites on such conditions as he directed.

Ver. 15. Joshua made peace with them,] Following the opinion of the princes; who took them to be what they pretended.

Made a league with them, to let them live.] Not merely to spare their lives (which, supposing them to belong to a far country, they had no warrant to take away), but to let them continue in the enjoyment of all they had. For to live, in Scripture, signifies to be happy; and therefore he promised not to hurt, but to protect them in their rights and liberties.

Sware unto them.] Ratified the league by a solemn oath: the violation of which in future times was severely punished (2 Sam. xxii. 6).

Ver. 16.] Speedy news being sent by the pretended ambassadors to Gibeon of their good success (as we may well think), there were great rejoicings made there, as Arius Montanus supposes. The report of which came to the Israelites three days after the league was concluded.

Ver. 17. The children of Israel journeyed,] Not the whole body of the people, but a party was sent to understand the truth.

Came unto their cities on the third day.] On the third day after they began their march thither.

Now their cities were Gibeon, &c.] The capital city was Gibeon (called a royal city, x. 2), upon which the other three were dependants. The first three of which fell afterwards to the tribe of Benjamin (xviii. 25, 26), as the last was in the tribe of Judah (xv. 60).

Ver. 18. The children of Israel smote them not,] Though they were not such as they supposed, but Canaanites, who were under the curse of God; yet they did not destroy them, for the reason following.

Because the princes of the congregation had sworn unto them] Some think their oath did not bind them, because it was made upon a false supposition, that the Gibeonites were no part of the seven nations of Canaan. But if this were true, as it is not (see Grotius, De Jure Belli et Pacis, lib. ii. cap. 13, sect. 4), the princes judged right, that it had been very scandalous, and would have highly dishonoured the name of God, by whom they had sworn, if they had broken their oath. By the keeping of which, the reverence which the Gibeonites had already to the Divine Majesty was very much increased; whereas it had been vile in all people's eyes, if the Israelites had not expressed this great regard unto it.

And all the congregation murmured] Or, "But all the congregation murmured," &c., because they were hereby deprived of the spoil of those cities.

Ver. 19. But all the princes said] Their unanimity in this opinion was of great moment to quiet the people's discontent.

We have sworn unto them by the Lord God of Israel:] Especially since they had engaged themselves, gregation, We have sworn unto them by the Lord God of Israel: now therefore we may not touch them.

20 This we will do to them; we will even let them live, lest wrath be upon us, because of the oath which we swear unto them.

21 And the princes said unto them, Let them live; but let them be hewers of wood and drawers of water unto all the congregation; as the princes had promised them.

22 ¶ And Joshua called for them, and he spake unto them, saying, Wherefore have ye beguiled us, saying, We are very far from you; when ye dwell among us?

23 Now therefore ye are cursed, and there shall none of you be freed from being bondmen, and hewers of wood and drawers of water for the house of my God.

24 And they answered Joshua, and said, Because it was certainly told thy servants, how that the Lord thy God commanded his servant Moses to give you all the land, and to destroy all the inhabitants of the land from before you, therefore we were sore afraid of our lives because of you, and have done this thing.

25 And now, behold, we are in thine hand: as it seemeth good and right unto thee to do unto us, do.

26 And so did he unto them, and delivered them out of the hand of the children of Israel, that they slew them not.

by a solemn oath, to their great and glorious Lord, who fought for them, and gave them all their victories (ver. 13, 14). For so the Targum here expounds these words, "We have sworn by the Word of the Lord God of Israel."

We may not touch them.] That is, do them any hurt; which we cannot do without breaking our oath, and forfeiting his favour.

Ver. 20. We will even let them live.] As they had covenanted, ver. 15.

Lest wrath be upon us, because of the oath] Lest God be very angry with us for breaking our oath. Which Joshua, as St. Ambrose observes, religiously observed, Ne, dum alienam perfidiam arguit, suam fidam solveret, "that he might not be guilty of so shameful a thing as to break his faith, whilst he reproved their peridiousness" (Lib. iii. De Officiis, cap. 10).

Ver. 21. The princes said] But they added this.

Let them live;] Though we let them live, because we must be as good as our word, which is the meaning of the last words of this verse (which must be joined with these), "as the princes had promised them."

But let them be hewers of wood and drawers of water] Yet they shall not be equal to us in all privileges, but we will make them in some sort serviceable to us; in such employments as will save us a great deal of labour.

Unto all the congregation;] They were not to be hewers of wood, and drawers of water, for every private person, but for the benefit of the whole congregation of Israel, who were bound to find wood and water for the service of God at the tabernacle. Which burden it was now resolved should be laid upon the Gibeonites; and thereby the children of Israel eased of it, ver. 23, where they are said to be made "hewers of wood and drawers of water for the house of the Lord." This was no breach of their oath, for they did not make them absolutely slaves; but only a sacred kind of servants (as Josephus calls them), being employed about the house of God, which was in itself honourable, and not base and contemptible. Some think they were afterward called Nethinim, which signifies persons given to God for his service: of whom we read in 1 Chron. ix. 2. Ezra viii. 20, and other places.

Ver. 22. Joshua called for them,] For the ambassadors with whom he had made a league.

Wherefore have ye beguiled us, &c.] Imposed upon our belief by a false story.

Ver. 23. Now therefore ye are cursed,] Notwithstanding our oath, you must not quite escape that curse of God which hath long lain upon all the people of Canaan, part of which you are. For a servile state of any sort, to which they were reduced, was no small punishment (called here a curse), and so much the more grievous, because it was to be perpetual.

There shall none of you be freed from being bondmen,] None of them were to continue freemen, but have a servitude imposed upon them: not, indeed, such a one as made them entire slaves, but only condemned them to the laborious employment which here follows.

And hewers of wood and drawers of water] This is the limitation of their servitude; which did not extend to all things, but only to these and such like (it is probable); to hew stones, for instance, for the reparation of the temple after it was built, and to carry them to those who were employed in that work. Grotius hath well expressed their condition, Additi sunt personali cuidam servituti, "they were addicted to certain personal servitude;" whereas if they had dealt plainly and openly with the Israelites, they might have been admitted only to pay a certain tribute (lib. ii. De Jure Belli et Pacis, cap. 13. sect. 4. n. 3).

Ver. 24.] They first give an answer unto Joshua's demand, Wherefore have ye beguiled us? Which was done to save themselves, if they could, by any shift, from that destruction which they believed God had decreed against all the inhabitants of their land; and they did not know how to evade it, but by this artifice; which, since it arose from some degree of faith, God suffered to take effect, that they might remain for ever among the Israelites, as an unquestionable witness of their miraculous conquest of the land of Canaan.

Ver. 25.] Here they humbly submit to the doom he had passed upon them, or to any other imposition he should think fit to load them withal.

Ver. 26.] But Joshua would take no farther advantage of their submission, but contented himself with this burden alone; which, by a public decree, he laid upon them. It appears by this, that some gentiles had more goodness in them than many of the children of Israel; who would have destroyed these well-disposed people (if Joshua had not hindered) who were better believers, being struck with a greater fear of God's threatenings than themselves.

Ver. 27. Joshua made them that day hewers of wood and drawers of water] He passed this sentence into a law; that, from henceforth, they should be subject to this servitude; in which they served God faithfully even to the times of Nehemiah: who tells us great numbers of the Nethinims (who many great men make no doubt were of the posterity of these Gibeonites) returned from Babylon to rebuild Jerusalem and the temple (Neh. vii. 46, &c. 73).

27 And Joshua made them that day hewers of wood and drawers of water for the congregation,

For the congregation,—even unto this day,] They served the congregation (who otherwise must themselves have done it) by serving the altar with wood and with water. Which, that they might do regularly, it is probable, they were dispersed throughout all the coasts of Israel, where the priests and Levites were settled, and came and served with them in their courses, and (as Conradus Pellicanus thinks) were maintained out of the public stock, and the profits of the altar. For they did not keep possession of their cities, but surrendered them to the tribe of Benjamin and for the altar of the LORD, even unto this day, in the place which he should choose.

and Judah, to whose lot they fell; as we read in the following part of this book. Concerning these words, “unto this day,” see iv. 9.

In the place which he should choose,] Which was now at Gilgal; afterward at Shiloh; and some time in Gibeon itself; which was a city given to the priests (Josh. xxi. 17); and, as Maimonides saith (in his treatise of the Building of the Temple), after Shiloh was destroyed, the tabernacle was placed in Nob, and then in Gibeon: in which two places it continued fifty and seven years.

CHAPTER X.

1 Five kings war against Gibeon. 6 Joshua rescueth it. 10 God fighteth against them with hailstones. 12 The sun and moon stand still at the word of Joshua. 16 The five kings are mured in a cave. 21 They are brought forth, 24 scornfully used, 26 and hanged. 28 Seven kings more are conquered. 43 Joshua returneth to Gilgal.

1 Now it came to pass, when Adoni-zedec king of Jerusalem had heard how Joshua had taken Ai, and had utterly destroyed it; as he had done to Jericho and her king, so he had done to Ai and her king; and how the inhabitants of Gibeon had made peace with Israel, and were among them;

2 That they feared greatly, because Gibeon was a great city, as one of the royal cities, and because it was greater than Ai, and all the men thereof were mighty.

3 Wherefore Adoni-zedec king of Jerusalem sent unto Hoham king of Hebron, and unto Piram king of Jarmuth, and unto Japhia king of Lachish, and unto Debir king of Eglon, saying,

4 Come up unto me, and help me, that we may smite Gibeon: for it hath made peace with Joshua and with the children of Israel.

5 Therefore the five kings of the Amorites, the king of Jerusalem, the king of Hebron, the king of Jarmuth, the king of Lachish, the king of Eglon, gathered themselves together, and went

CHAP. X.

Ver 1. When Adoni-zedec king of Jerusalem] Who seems to have been the most potent prince in Canaan, and carried in his name an honourable title, which had been anciently given to the kings of this place; who had been famous for doing justice. For, it is probable, that ever since Melchizedek, who was king of Salem (the same with Jerusalem), and truly king of righteousness, as his name signified, they affected this title, though they did not always answer their character: for this Adonizedek (whose name imports the law of righteousness) had none of the virtues that were in Melchizedek.

King of Jerusalem] It is probably thought that this city held the name of Salem, which it had in Abraham's time, till the Israelites came into the land of Canaan; and then they called it Jerusalem, when they first took possession of it. Which they did not so fully, but that still the Jebusites dwelt there with the children of Benjamin (see Judg. i. 8. 21), who were so weak, that the Jebusites, in time, recovered it wholly to themselves, and expelled the Benjamites; see Judg. xix. 10, where it is called Jebus, though the other name is also acknowledged; because the Israelites call it Jerusalem, while the Jebusites, having prevailed, called it Jebus.

Heard how Joshua had taken Ai,] By which means the Israelites were come nearer to him, than when they took Jericho.

And had utterly destroyed it,] And therefore it highly concerned him to provide, the best he could, for his own safety.

How—Gibeon had made peace with Israel,] Especially, since one of the prime cities of the country had submitted to the Israelites.

And were among them;] Joined in society with them, or come (as we now speak) into their interest.

Ver. 2. That they feared greatly,] All his people thought themselves in great danger; they as well as their king having heard of the terrible execution Joshua had made at Jericho and Ai.

Because Gibeon was a great city,] Having others depending on it.

As one of the royal cities,] The Vulgar Latin takes no notice of the particle caph (as); but saith it was a royal city. And, indeed, that particle doth not always denote likeness, but only the truth of the thing spoken of; as in Hosea iv. 4. and many other places of the New Testament, as well as the Old (John i. 14. Phil. ii. 7). But I think here it should be expressed, as we do in our translation; because Gibeon was not a royal city, that is, had no king in it that we read of; but was, notwithstanding, equal to those cities that had kings, being governed by elders (ix. 11), who were persons of very great authority.

It was greater than Ai,] More populous.

All the men thereof were mighty,] The inhabitants were esteemed men of great valour; which made their revolt to the Israelites the more considerable.

Ver. 3. All these cities afterward belonged to the tribe of Judah; as appears from the following part of this book.

Ver. 4. Help me,] He was the most active in the war, and seems to have been of greatest power; calling the other kings only as auxiliaries to him.

That we may smite Gibeon,] He thought to discourage others from yielding, by making this city an example of their vengeance.

For it hath made peace with Joshua] Forsaken the interest of their country, and gone over to our enemies.

up, they and all their hosts, and encamped before Gibeon, and made war against it.

6 ¶ And the men of Gibeon sent unto Joshua to the camp to Gilgal, saying, Slack not thy hand from thy servants; come up to us quickly, and save us, and help us: for all the kings of the Amorites that dwell in the mountains are gathered together against us.

7 So Joshua ascended from Gilgal, he, and all the people of war with him, and all the mighty men of valour.

8 ¶ And the LORD said unto Joshua, Fear them not: for I have delivered them into thine hand; there shall not a man of them stand before thee.

Ver. 5. Therefore the five kings of the Amorites, the king of Jerusalem, &c.] It is certain that Hebron belonged to the Hittites; as Jerusalem did to the Jebusites. But the Amorites being the most powerful people in Canaan (as appears from Gen. xv. 16), had, it seems, brought them under their power, and set kings of their own nation over them. Whence it is, that the Gibeonites, who were originally Hivites (ix, 17), are said to be of the "remnant of the Amorites" (2 Sam. xxi. 2), because they were fallen under their power, when Joshua conquered their country.

Gathered themselves] Had a general meeting, and sent out a summons to all their people, who were fit for war, to rendezvous (as we speak) at the place they appointed.

Went up,] Though they lived in the high country, yet Jerusalem was still higher; where they seem to have all met, according to Adonizedek's desire, ver. 4.

Encamped before Gibeon,] Laid siege to it.

Made war against it,] Began to assault it.

Ver. 6. The men of Gibeon sent unto Joshua] Or, had sent, as soon as they heard of their march towards them.

Slack not thy hand from thy servants,] They doubted not of his succour, because they were his servants who had put themselves under his protection; but begged it might be speedy, for fear they should be overpowered by such numerous forces as were coming against them.

Come up to us quickly, and save us,] They did not hope to be preserved without his help; nor unless it arrived quickly.

Ver. 7.] These last words are the explication of the former, as if he had said, "All the people of war, even all the mighty men of valour." For it is not likely he took along with him all the fighting men (some of which were necessary to guard the camp at Gilgal), but only the choicest of them; on whose valour he could most rely, and who could march most swiftly to the relief of their confederates.

Ver. 8. The Lord said unto Joshua,] Before he stirred a foot, he consulted the Divine Majesty about this expedition; who encouraged him to undertake it.

Fear them not: for I have delivered them into thine hand;] He promised him an entire victory; which emboldened him to fall upon them undauntedly.

Ver. 9.] Accordingly, Joshua made all the haste he could towards them, marching all night, that he might surprise them in their quarters (as I suppose he did) before they could draw out their army against him.

Ver. 10. The Lord discomfited them before Israel,] The suddenness of the attack, no doubt, put them into great confusion. And besides, God struck a terror into them, which made them seek for safety by flight, rather than fighting.

9 Joshua therefore came unto them suddenly, and went up from Gilgal all night.

10 And the LORD discomfited them before Israel, and slew them with a great slaughter at Gibeon, and chased them along the way that goeth up to Beth-horon, and smote them to Azekah, and unto Makkedah.

11 And it came to pass, as they fled from before Israel, and were in the going down to Beth-horon, that the LORD cast down great stones from heaven upon them unto Azekah, and they died: they were more which died with hailstones than they whom the children of Israel slew with the sword.

12 ¶ Then spake Joshua to the LORD in the

Slew them with a great slaughter at Gibeon,] Near to the city, as the particle beth signifies in many places; particularly in the second chapter of this book, where Rahab's house is said to be upon the wall (we translate it, near or adjoining to the wall), and v. 13. where Joshua is said to be bejericho, near to that city, for he was not in it when the Captain of the Lord's host appeared to him (see Bochart's Hierozoicon, par. i. lib. ii. cap. 50).

Chased them—to Beth-horon,] To the place which was called by this name, when this book was written; for there was no such place now; it being built after they were settled in Canaan by Sherah, daughter or grand-daughter of Ephraim; as we read in 1 Chron. vii. 24.

Smote them to Azekah, and unto Makkedah.] Two cities afterward in the tribe of Judah (xv. 35. 41). For, in the great confusion wherein they were, by the hailstones falling upon them (as it here follows), they fled backward and forward, as we speak, sometimes this way, sometimes the quite contrary (for Beth-horon lay northerly, and these other towns in the south), according as the hailstones, by the shifting of the wind, flew in their faces.

Ver. 11. Beth-horon,] Which was seated on the side of a hill; and seems to have taken its name from this wonderful storm here mentioned: for Beth-horon signifies as much, as the house or place of fury or anger.

The Lord cast down great stones from heaven upon them] The LXX. call them λίθους χαλάζης, "hailstones of a vast bigness;" which some think were accompanied with thunder and lightning. And thus the ancient heathen say, that Hercules was assisted in his war against Albion, &c. (see Vossius, lib. i. De Orig. et Progressu Idolol. cap. 26). And that raining of stones is not a fable, but a real truth, see him also, lib. iii. cap. 12. Plutarch also, in the life of Timoleon, relates how a terrible storm, in the face of the Carthaginian army, gave him a great victory over them, with a very few forces which he had to encounter them. They that desire to see more to this purpose may look into Huetius' Questiones Alnetanæ, lib. ii. cap. 12. sect. 12.

Unto Azekah,] This storm meeting them at Beth-horon drove them back to Azekah, as I observed on the foregoing verse.

They died.] They upon whom the hailstones fell were killed by them.

They were more which died with hailstones, &c.] For they could not flee from the stones which came from heaven, as they did from the sword of Israel.

Ver. 12. Then spake Joshua to the Lord] This song, as the Hebrews call it (see Masius).

In the day when the Lord delivered up the Amorites] It is not certain at what time of the day he spake day when the LORD delivered up the Amorites before the children of Israel, and he said in the sight of Israel, Sun, stand thou still upon Gibeon: and thou, Moon, in the valley of Ajalon.

13 And the sun stood still, and the moon stayed, until the people had avenged themselves what follows. Many think, when the sun was declining; others, rather in the morning. For he marched all night to surprise them, and in all probability fell upon them by break of day; and having routed and chased them for some hours, and killed great numbers of them, and seen others fall by the hailstones, concluded he should destroy them all, if he had but time enough before night came to favour their escape. Which made him pray that he might have light to continue his pursuit, and gain a complete victory over them.

In the sight of Israel.] It is a frivolous observation of Maimonides, that, because it is not said "in the sight of all Israel" (before whom Moses did his miracles), Joshua was inferior to him, even when God wrought this stupendous miracle at his request: for all Israel did not hear him speak these words, but only some few; as many, perhaps, as were with Elijah at Mount Carmel, when he brought fire down from heaven to consume his sacrifice. But there is no question that Israel signifies all the army; who heard, or were told what he said.

Sun, stand thou still upon Gibeon.] He desired it might stand immovable, in that part of the heavens where he saw it now shining upon Gibeon.

Thou, Moon, in the valley of Ajalon.] There were more Ajalons than one; and it is not certain which it is he means: but it is most likely that in the tribe of Dan (xix. 42. Judg. i. 35), which was farthest from Gibeon; for we must suppose these two places to have been at some distance, otherwise Joshua could not have seen the sun and the moon both appear at the same time; as it is probable they were both now in his eye, when he spake these words. It is not fit to enter into such questions as these; in what sign the sun now was, and whether the moon was in her increase or decrease, &c. They that can make, and are disposed to such inquiries, may consult Bonfrerius.

Ver. 13. The sun stood still, and the moon stayed.] Thus Callimachus represents the sun as stopping the wheels of his chariot, to behold a chorus of nymphs; which so highly pleased him, that it made him prolong the day (ver. 181, 182, of his hymn to Diana):

Ἦλθε παρ' Ἡλίου καὶ ἰὸν χορὸν, ἀλλὰ θεῖται
Δίφρον ἐπιστήσας, τὰ δὲ φαῖα μηχανούσας.

Where Ezek. Spanhemius excellently notes, that what the poets only fancied might be, was really done in the days of Joshua; and wishes Grotius had not followed some of the Jews, who make this only a poetical phrase to express a long summer's day: for the prophet Habakkuk represents it otherwise, and so do many of the Talmudic doctors. They that can consult Huetius also, in his Alnetanæ Questiones (lib. ii. cap. 12. sect. 27), will find enough to shame those who disbelieve this history: when they read a great number of stories among the heathen, which show they thought it within the power of their gods to do such things. And, among other memorable things, he doth not forget the ancient tradition of the Egyptians, related by Herodotus (in his Euterpe, cap. 142), concerning the stupendous alteration of the course of the sun. And our Dr. Jackson hath observed, that the heathen people of those times did note this miraupon their enemies. Is not this written in the book of Jasher? So the sun stood still in the midst of heaven, and hasted not to go down about a whole day.

14 And there was no day like that before it or after it, that the LORD hearkened unto the voice of a man: for the LORD fought for Israel.

culous event, and deliver the tradition of it to their posterity; who, as men are wont to do, endeavour to assign some cause of it. And the poets in ages following ascribe it (with some additions) unto that unnatural murder which Atrous committed: at which the heavens blushed, and the sun stood still. For this bloody fact, if Statius mistake not, was in the time of the Theban war; and that is placed, by good chronologers, about the time of Joshua's conquest of Canaan. (see book i. upon the Creed, ch. 15). But in this he was deceived, for Atrous lived in the days of the Judges.

Until the people had avenged themselves.] Till they had gained a complete victory, and utterly destroyed their enemies.

Is not this written in the book of Jasher?] The Targum expounds it, "in the book of the law:" as if the meaning was, that there God had foretold what wonders he would do for his people. But from the marginal translation (which is, "the book of the upright, or of righteous men") others take it for a book where was recorded the wonderful things done by or for the religious heroes. And there are some probable arguments that it was written in verse, to fix these things in the memory of the people. Grotius is of this opinion: for we find mention of it nowhere else but only in 2 Sam. i. 18, and there it is mentioned upon account of a song made upon the death of Saul and Jonathan by king David, who caused it to be recorded in this book. Which was not accounted sacred (being written by several hands and in several ages), and so not preserved with such care as this and the other canonical books were. As for their opinion who think this book contained the ancient annals of the Jews more largely than they are recorded in this and the following books, it hath no ground at all; but is invented merely to frame an argument from thence, that Joshua was not the author of this book; but that it was collected in aftertimes, out of this great Chronicle; by somebody who made an abridgment of it. But Du Pin hath well observed, that it is not said here the wars of Joshua were related in the book of Jasher; but only that mention is made therein of the miracle by which the moon stood still.

So the sun stood still.] There is no more mention of the moon; for it was the light of the sun that made the day.

In the midst of heaven.] This doth not necessarily signify that it stood still precisely in the meridian point; but that it appeared visibly to every body, fixed in the same place where it was, when Joshua spake the foregoing words, to which he was moved, no doubt, by a Divine inspiration.

About a whole day.] It may be simply translated, "a whole day:" the particle caph, as I observed before, signifying oftentimes nothing of similitude, but the very thing itself. Therefore I look upon Maimonides' explication as ungrounded; who by kajom thamin ("as a whole day") understands only as the longest day in summer (More Nevochim, par. xi. cap. 35). Which was a poor business, it being now summer-time, when this miracle was wrought: and, as Lyra thinks, in the month of June.

Ver. 14. There was no day like that before it or after it, that the Lord hearkened unto the voice of man.] That is, did at his desire (or rather command) such a 15 ¶ And Joshua returned, and all Israel with him, unto the camp at Gilgal.

16 But these five kings fled, and hid themselves in a cave at Makkedah.

17 And it was told Joshua, saying, The five kings are found hid in a cave at Makkedah.

18 And Joshua said, Roll great stones upon the mouth of the cave, and set men by it for to keep them :

19 And stay ye not, but pursue after your enemies, and smite the hindmost of them ; suffer them not to enter into their cities : for the LORD your God hath delivered them into your hand.

20 And it came to pass, when Joshua and the children of Israel had made an end of slaying them with a very great slaughter, till they were consumed, that the rest which remained of them entered into fenced cities.

21 And all the people returned to the camp to Joshua at Makkedah in peace : none moved his tongue against any of the children of Israel.

22 Then said Joshua, Open the mouth of the cave, and bring out those five kings unto me out of the cave.

23 And they did so, and brought forth those five kings unto him out of the cave, the king of Jerusalem, the king of Hebron, the king of Jarmuth, the king of Lachish, and the king of Eg-lon.

24 And it came to pass, when they brought stupendous thing as this. Whereby he gave an evident demonstration, that he who did such wonders in Egypt, and at the Red Sea, and the river Jordan, had an absolute power not only over the elements (as we call them) and all inferior creatures, but over the heavenly bodies, the sun, moon, and stars, whom the heathen worshipped. They have strange love to cavilling, who would hence have it thought this book was not written by Joshua: when, if he wrote it in his old age, there were many days passed since this prodigy, as Huetius well observes in his Demonstr. Evang. p. 186. See various opinions about the length of this day in Sixtinus Amama's Antibarbarus Bibli-cus, lib. iii. p. 381, &c.

For the Lord fought for Israel.] By throwing stones from heaven upon their enemies; and giving the Israelites strength to pursue them; and stopping the sun's course, that they might not want light for their pursuit; and preserving them from the stones which fell upon their enemies, and not upon them, though mingled with them in the fight.

Ver. 15. Joshua returned,—unto the camp at Gilgal.] The LXX. in the common copies wholly omit this verse; because Joshua did not return to Gilgal, till he had done what follows. and then he speaks of his return, in the same words and syllables, ver. 43, but it is in the edition of Hervaeus, 1540, as my most learned friend Dr. Alix informs me; and the meaning of it here, therefore, is no more than this; that he was about to return till he heard where the five kings were; and that many of the enemies were still remaining.

Ver. 16. But these five kings] Mentioned ver. 3.

Fled.] Escaped the sword of the Israelites by flight; being provided, perhaps, with swift beasts for that purpose; and taking some by-ways, separate from their scattered forces, so that the hailstones did not fall upon them.

Hid themselves in a cave] Which they knew to have secret lurking-places in it; where they could not be easily discovered.

At Makkedah.] In the confines of that city. Which not being yet taken, Joshua could not command great stones to be rolled upon the mouth of the cave, if it had been in the city itself.

Ver. 17.] It is likely Joshua had given a particular charge about them; and they made no inquiry what was become of them, till it was discovered, that they were in this place.

Ver. 18. Roll great stones] To hinder their coming out.

Set men by it] He ordered a guard also, to see that none removed the stones.

Ver. 19. Stay ye not, but pursue after your enemies.] They that brought this intelligence, were, it is likely, some officers in the army; whom he would not have to stop their pursuit of the scattered Canaanites, by looking after these kings; but leave it to others to take care to keep them safe shut up in the cave.

Smite the hindmost.] He means all that they could overtake in their flight.

Suffer them not to enter into their cities.] And hinder the rest from retreating into their own cities; by which means they would not remain in a body together; but dispersed here and there, where they could save themselves.

God hath delivered them into your hand.] Given you an opportunity to complete their destruction.

Ver. 20. When Joshua and the children of Israel] i. e. The children of Israel, by the command and direction of Joshua, who sent out strong parties to pursue them; but he himself seems to have gone to lay siege to Makkedah.

Till they were consumed.] Till there was none of them to be seen in a body together.

The rest—entered into fenced cities.] Those few that escaped got into such fortified cities as they could reach.

Ver. 21. All the people] Who had been sent out, and engaged in pursuit of the enemy.

Returned to the camp to Joshua at Makkedah] Where, no doubt, he had ordered a general rendezvous, as we now speak, of the whole army that had been employed in this war.

In peace.] The LXX. translate it εἰρῆς, "sound and safe," and the Vulgar, sani et integro numero: "sound and without the loss of a man." Which is to be understood of that detachment sent to pursue them (ver. 19), who came all safe to the camp, and not a man of them lost, or so much as wounded.

None moved his tongue] There was not so much as a dog that barked at them. For that word dog is to be supplied (as Bochartus thinks), according to what we read, Exod. xi. 7 (see Hierozoicon, par. i. lib. ii. cap. 55). It is an expression of the great tranquillity wherein they were, and of an entire victory, there being not so much as a dog left to disturb them.

Ver. 22.] The wisdom of Joshua is here observed by Arius Montanus, who would not do this execution till all the people were returned to the camp to be witnesses of it. And he might have added, that he executed them before he assaulted Makkedah, that the inhabitants of that city might see there was no hope of any succour from those kings who had been very powerful.

Ver. 23.] They are named in the same order as in ver. 3, according to their rank and quality; for next to the king of Jerusalem, who was the chief; the king of Hebron seems to have been of greatest note; and so of the rest. The same Montanus thinks it probable, that as they brought them forth and set them before Joshua, they said, This is the king of Jerusalem; and then, This is the king of Hebron, &c.

out those kings unto Joshua, that Joshua called for all the men of Israel, and said unto the captains of the men of war which went with him, Come near, put your feet upon the necks of these kings. And they came near, and put their feet upon the necks of them.

25 And Joshua said unto them, Fear not, nor be dismayed, be strong and of good courage: for thus shall the Lord do to all your enemies against whom ye fight.

26 And afterward Joshua smote them, and slew them, and hanged them on five trees: and they were hanging upon the trees until the evening.

27 And it came to pass at the time of the going down of the sun, that Joshua commanded, and they took them down off the trees, and cast them into the cave wherein they had been hid, and laid great stones in the cave's mouth, which remain until this very day.

Ver. 24. All the men of Israel,] That is, all the men of war.

Captains of the men of war] That is, the great officers of the army.

Put your feet upon the necks of these kings.] Who lay bound, I suppose, prostrate upon the ground.

They came near, and put their feet upon the necks of them.] Not out of insolence and pride; but in token that these kings and their countries were brought in absolute subjection to them; and that God had fulfilled his promise (Deut. xxxiii. ult.).

Ver. 25. Fear not, nor be dismayed.] The same that Moses had said to them all long ago, Deut. i. 21. 29, and God had lately said to Joshua, i. 6, 7, 9, and might be said with greater reason now, when they saw their greatest enemies lie prostrate under their feet.

Thus shall the Lord do to all your enemies] To all the inhabitants of Canaan.

Ver. 26. Afterward Joshua smote them.] After they had trampled upon them he ordered them to be killed.

Hanged them on five trees.] As a mark of infamy, whereby a terror was struck into all others.

They were hanging upon the trees until the evening.] Exposed to this contempt all that long day; which God made on purpose that they might do all the great things before mentioned, and what follows, before the night came upon them. Then their bodies were taken down, not in honour to them, but in honour to the land of Israel, where God now dwelt. So Aben Ezra.

Ver. 27.] He had given this order as soon as they were hanged, according to the law of Moses, by which he acted before Ai (viii. 29). And with their bodies he cast all the instruments of their punishment (the trees, and whatsoever fastened them unto them) into the cave, as Maimonides saith, and the Samaritan Chronicle here particularly observes.

Ver. 28. That day Joshua took Makkedah,] The same day the king of it was hanged; and it seems to be probable it was on that long day (as I said before) which God made that they might complete their conquest of these kings; and when they had done, take this city also. Our great primate of Ireland indeed, by that day, understands the same day that he set down before the city; which he thinks was some time after what is before related.

The king thereof he utterly destroyed,] He was 28 ¶ And that day Joshua took Makkedah, and smote it with the edge of the sword, and the king thereof he utterly destroyed, them, and all the souls that were therein; he let none remain: and he did to the king of Makkedah as he did unto the king of Jericho.

29 Then Joshua passed from Makkedah, and all Israel with him, unto Libnah, and fought against Libnah:

30 And the Lord delivered it also, and the king thereof, into the hand of Israel; and he smote it with the edge of the sword, and all the souls that were therein; he let none remain in it; but did unto the king thereof as he did unto the king of Jericho.

31 ¶ And Joshua passed from Libnah, and all Israel with him, unto Lachish, and encamped against it, and fought against it:

32 And the Lord delivered Lachish into the hand of Israel, which took it on the second day, slain among the rest, and not taken alive as the king of Ai was.

All the souls that were therein;] All the fighting men, together with the women and children; because they had refused the offers of peace, sent them from Joshua, before he invaded their land.

He let none remain;] But saved the cattle, which they took, with their goods, for a prey.

As he did unto the king of Jericho.] What he did to the king of Jericho is not recorded; but by what is said of other kings, it is probable that he hanged him up after he was found dead.

Ver. 29. Then Joshua passed from Makkedah,] This only signifies what was their next expedition; for it is likely they refreshed themselves awhile before they left this place.

All Israel with him,] All that he brought along with him to the relief of Gibeon (see ver. 7).

Unto Libnah,] A city which fell to the share of the tribe of Judah, in the division of the land (xv. 42), and was one of the cities given to the priests (xxi. 13. 1 Chron. vi. 57).

Fought against Libnah;] Laid siege to it, and planted their batteries against it.

Ver. 30. The Lord delivered it also,] They made an easy conquest of it, because God gave it up into their hand.

He smote it, &c.] The same words whereby the destruction of Makkedah is described, ver. 28. For both these cities favoured the five kings before mentioned, and therefore (as Conradus Pellicanus thinks) were destroyed utterly, not only by the command of God, but by the right of war. But the command of God, was the only ground, as it is expressed, ver. 40.

Ver. 31. Joshua passed from Libnah,—unto Lachish,] Another city which fell to the tribe of Judah (xv. 39), and was not far from Libnah.

Encamped against it,] This, it seems, was a stronger city than either of the former; for there is no mention of an encampment against them before they began their assault.

Ver. 32. The Lord delivered Lachish] He doth not add, "and the king thereof," as he doth of Makkedah and Libnah, (ver. 28. 30), because he was one of the five kings which he had lately hanged, and they had not, it is likely, set a new one on his throne (ver. 23).

Which took it on the second day,] After they began the siege; or, the second day after the taking of Makkedah and Libnah. The former is most likely, and smote it with the edge of the sword, and all the souls that were therein, according to all that he had done to Libnah.

33 ¶ Then Horam king of Gezer came up to help Lachish; and Joshua smote him and his people, until he had left him none remaining.

34 ¶ And from Lachish Joshua passed unto Eglon, and all Israel with him; and they encamped against it, and fought against it:

35 And they took it on that day, and smote it with the edge of the sword, and all the souls that were therein he utterly destroyed that day, according to all that he had done to Lachish.

36 And Joshua went up from Eglon, and all Israel with him, unto Hebron; and they fought against it:

37 And they took it, and smote it with the edge of the sword, and the king thereof, and all the cities thereof, and all the souls that were therein; he left none remaining, according to all that he had done to Eglon; but destroyed it utterly, and all the souls that were therein.

38 ¶ And Joshua returned, and all Israel with him, to Debir; and fought against it:

39 And he took it, and the king thereof, and all the cities thereof; and they smote them with the edge of the sword, and utterly destroyed all the souls that were therein; he left none remaining: as he had done to Hebron, so he did to Debir, and to the king thereof; as he had done also to Libnah, and to her king.

40 ¶ So Joshua smote all the country of the hills, and of the south, and of the vale, and of the springs, and all their kings: he left none remaining, but utterly destroyed all that breathed, as the LORD God of Israel commanded.

41 And Joshua smote them from Kadesh-barnea even unto Gaza, and all the country of Goshen, even unto Gibeon.

because their encampment against it signifies they spent some time before it.

Smote it with the edge of the sword, &c.] These words, and the following, are the very same with what he said before of the two forenamed cities; only he doth not add, "he let none remain," which is to be supposed.

Ver. 33. Then Horam king of Gezer] This was a city afterward in the tribe of Ephraim (xvi. 10), belonging to the Levites (xxi. 21), and not far from Gibeon, as may be guessed from 1 Chron. xiv. 16.

Joshua smote him and his people,] If he destroyed his city at this time, he returned to Lachish. And it is probable, he sent forth a detachment to fight Horam and his army; who having routed them, destroyed also their city, and then went on with the siege of Lachish.

Ver. 34. Joshua passed unto Eglon,] Which also belonged afterward to Judah (xv. 39), and seems to have been as considerable as Lachish; for it follows, that "they encamped against it, and fought against it," as they had done against the other. Their king was one of the five who were killed and hanged before (ver. 23).

Ver. 35. They took it on that day,] The same day they set down before it; for none came to their relief, as Horam did to help Lachish, which may be one reason that city was not taken till the second day (ver. 32).

Smote it] The same he had said of the forenamed cities; only he saith, he "utterly destroyed all" that were therein on the same day, which is the same with those words, "he let none remain."

Ver. 36.] This was also a city of Judah (as every one knows, xv. 54), and was seated in the mountainous country, as the former were in the plain, which is the reason he is said to go up to it from Eglon.

Ver. 37. And the king] Their king was one of the five whom Joshua had lately killed and hanged. But it seems, they had set up a new one, being a city of great note, which had other cities depending on it, as it follows in the next words.

All the cities thereof,] It was not only one of the royal cities, which had other cities subject to it (as Gibeon had, which was a kind of royal city) but of very great power. For these words import, as if there were many cities under its jurisdiction.

All the souls that were therein;] In this conquest, Caleb was very instrumental, and signalized himself (as we now speak) by driving out the three sons of Anak (xv. 13, 14), who were slain there (Judg. i. 10). Thus we must understand this history; or else say, as some do, either that Joshua only took the city and destroyed it, but could not take the citadel or strong fort, on the top of the mountain (which doth not seem to be exactly true, for we read in the next chapter, ver. 21, 22, that he cut off the Anakims from the mountains, &c.), or that, after he had destroyed it, as is here related, the Anakims came from Gaza, and other cities of the Philistines, whither they now fled, and peopled it again, but were expelled again by Caleb, as some understand, xiv. 12. (see Judg. i. 10).

Ver. 38.] He had not been there before, but having gone as far south and west as he thought fit, (even as far as Gaza, which was in the western coast, ver. 41), he turned his course towards the camp at Gilgal, which was now north-east from him and in his way thither took Debir, which also was a city of Judah (xv. 49), and one of the cities of the priests (xxi. 15. 1 Chron. vi. 58), called also Kiriath-Sepher, and Kiriath-Sanna.

Ver. 39.] It was a great city (we may gather from hence, like to Hebron), in the conquest of which Othniel the brother of Caleb did great service, and therefore it was given to him, as we read, xv. 15—17, and Judg. i. 11.

Ver. 40. Joshua smote all the country of the hills, &c.] He forbears to name all the cities he took, and, in short, saith he subdued the whole country that lay south and west (as it is explained in the next verse), of whatsoever sort it was; both the hilly and the low country: for they that describe countries are wont to have respect to two things; the condition and quality of the soil, and then the situation: the first of these he expresses in this verse, and the other in the next. For here he describes it as partly hilly and dry, and partly plain and full of springs.

Utterly destroyed all that breathed,] Which must be restrained to mankind; for they kept their cattle as a prey to themselves.

As the Lord God of Israel commanded.] This is added as a justification of the Israelites, from all imputation of cruelty or severity; for they only executed a Divine sentence against this people for their abominable wickedness (Lev. xviii. 24, 25, &c.) wherewith the Israelites would have been in danger to be infected, if they had not been extirpated.

Ver. 41. Joshua smote them from Kadesh-barnea]

42 And all these kings and their land did Joshua take at one time, because the Lord God of Israel fought for Israel.

Which was in the south of Canaan, as appears from Numb. xxxiv. 4, and chap. xv. of this book, ver. 3, where it is mentioned as belonging to the tribe of Judah.

Even unto Gaza,] A city of the Philistines, in the west part of Canaan, toward the south.

All the country of Goshen,] There was a city in the tribe of Judah of this name, which lay in the mountains, as Hebron did, in the southern part of the country (xv. 51). From which city, the region thereabouts was called the country of Goshen: which had excellent pasture-ground in it, and was well watered (like that country in Egypt of the same name), and thence was called Goshen, as Conradus Pellicanus conjectures; because the Hebrew word geshem signifies large showers, which make the earth fruitful.

Even unto Gibeon,] Which was in the more northerly part of the country. And therefore, as before he gave an account of his conquest from the south to the west; so here of his conquest from the south to the north.

Ver. 42. At one time,] In one expedition.

Because the Lord God of Israel fought for Israel,] Which made their conquest easy and speedy. The Targum hath it, "The Lord God of Israel, by his Word, fought for Israel." That is, by him who appeared to Joshua as the captain of the Lord's host, ver. 13, 14.

Ver. 43.] To refresh themselves with the company of their wives and children; and to make those who were left to defend them partakers of their booty; but especially to return solemn thanks to God for their victories at his house, which was now settled at Gilgal.

Our great primate of Ireland thinks, that this war with the five kings that came against Gibeon, &c. concluded this famous year. In the first part of which Moses took the kingdoms of Sihon and Og on the other side Jordan; and in the latter part of it Joshua conquered a great part of the land of Canaan; and in the middle of it the manna ceased, and they ate of the fruit of the country. So that in the autumn of this year they began to sow, and consequently, from this time, they began to number their sabbatical years (see him in his Annals, A. M. 2554). But another great man (Dr. Alix) admonishes me, that this is against the opinion of the ancient Jews, who suppose that the first year of the semitah was the fourteenth after their entrance into Canaan: for the land must have been divided before it was cultivated; and so the sabbath of the land must be seven years after the division.

CHAPTER XI.

1 Divers kings overcome at the waters of Merom. 10 Hazor is taken and burnt. 16 All the country taken by Joshua. 21 The Anakims cut off.

1 AND it came to pass, when Jabin king of Hazor had heard those things, that he sent to Jobab king of Madon, and to the king of Shimron, and to the king of Achshaph,

2 And to the kings that were on the north of the mountains, and of the plains south of Chinneroth, and in the valley, and in the borders of Dor on the west,

CHAP. XI.

Ver. 1. When Jabin king of Hazor] This city was the metropolis of the northerly part of Canaan (ver. 10), and fell to the share of the tribe of Naphtali in the division of the land (xix. 36). Jabin was the name of the king of the Canaanites in this part of the country in future times, and reigned in this very city (Judg. iv. 2).

Heard those things,] Of the conquest Joshua had made of so many kings, and their kingdoms, in the south and the west part of the land.

That he sent to Jobab king of Madon,] This is the name of a place we read of nowhere else, but was subject, no doubt, unto Hazor, as the rest were.

To the king of Shimron,] A place afterward in the tribe of Zebulun, near to the country of Naphtali (xix. 15).

To the king of Achshaph,] In the tribe of Asher (xix. 25). These two last places Arius Montanus thinks were more remote from Hazor than Madon, and lay towards the south near Mount Tabor, being the only southern people that remained after the five kings were destroyed. But towards the north, and the east, and the west, there were many still left, whom Jabin now gathered together.

Ver. 2. The north of the mountains,] Or, mountainous country, near Lebanon; for that was in the north part of Canaan.

Of the plains south of Chinneroth,] In the flat country, which lay south of the lake called afterward Gennesaret, now Chinneroth (see Numb. xxxiv. 11).

In the valley,] Some conjecture he means that pleasant valley between Mount Hermon and Mount Gilboa, called the valley of Jezreel.

Dor] A city, with a country belonging to it, in the tribe of Manasseh (xvii. 11).

On the west,] Upon the midland sea. Where Josephus mentions (in his second book against Appion) a city called Dora, near Mount Carmel (see Bochartus in his Canaan, lib. i. cap. 41. p. 752).

Ver. 3. To the Canaanite] The people peculiarly so called.

On the east and on the west,] It hath been noted before, that some of this people lived on the east near Jordan; and others of them on the west, near the midland sea (see Numb. xiii. 29).

The Amorite, and the Hittite, and the Perizzite,] There were other Amorites scattered up and down the country, besides those who were subject to the five kings mentioned in the foregoing chapter, ver. 5, who were all now assembled together by Jabin, with the rest of the Hittites and Perizzites (who were in several parts of the country), that they might make as powerful an army as could be raised.

The Jebusite in the mountains,] About Jerusalem, where they kept a strong hold till the time of David; the Perizzite, and the Jebusite in the mountains, and to the Hivite under Hermon in the land of Mizpeh.

4 And they went out, and they and all their hosts with them, much people, even as the sand that is upon the sea shore in multitude, with horses and chariots very many.

5 And when all these kings were met together, they came and pitched together at the waters of Merom, to fight against Israel.

as the Perizzites lived in other mountainous and woody countries, as Bochart observes.

To the Hivite under Hermon] This was a mountain in the north-east part of the country, where some Hivites were settled, as others were about Gibeon. That Hermon was easterly, appears from Ps. lxxxix. 12, whence it is that the Hivites are called Kadmonites, that is, easterlings (Gen. xv. 19) as Bochart hath observed in his Phaleg. lib. iv. cap. 36, and in his Canaan, lib. i. cap. 19.

In the land of Mizpeh.] There were several cities of this name; one in the tribe of Judah (xv. 38), another belonging to Benjamin (xviii. 26), and two more beyond Jordan in the land of Gilead; one in the tribe of Gad, the other in the tribe of Manasseh, or very near it; which gave name to the country about it, and seems to be here intended.

Ver. 4. They went out.] The kings of all these people.

Much people, even as the sand that is upon the sea shore in multitude.] A vast army, which could not easily be numbered; or, which covered the place where they were encamped, as sand doth the seashore; so that nothing could be seen but armed men, horses, and chariots, &c. It is a proverbial speech in Scripture for vast numbers of men, or great quantities of corn; or exceeding much knowledge and wisdom, as every one knows.

With horses and chariots very many.] This made them the more formidable, because the Israelites were all footmen: who might easily be beaten by a strong body of horse; especially when they had chariots also, which carried men in them (see upon Deut. xx. 1), and they had greater numbers also of them, as these words intimate. Josephus makes their chariots alone to have been twenty thousand. The land of Canaan, indeed, did not breed horses (as I have often observed), but they might easily procure them out of Egypt, and they trusted much to this kind of forces, wherein the Egyptians excelled most people (see Deut. xvii. 16).

Ver. 5. When all these kings were met together.] In some place which the king of Hazor appointed for a general rendezvous. For though this multitude were of different nations, yet they all now combined against the Israelites. But it was a great providence of God, that as all this country was not united under one head, but divided into several petty kingdoms; so they did not all enter into a confederacy at the first against Joshua, but fought severally; only five of their kings joining together. Though now they seem to have seen their error; and therefore all that remained, joined, as one man, to oppose Joshua's further proceeding.

They came and pitched together at the waters of Merom.] They marched to these waters, and there formed a camp, to prepare, and set themselves in order, to give Israel battle. These waters, all agree, were that lake which Josephus calls Σαμαχωνιδα, from the abundance of fishes that were in it: for Sanachon, or Semechon, in the Arabic language, signifies a fish

6 ¶ And the LORD said unto Joshua, Be not afraid because of them: for to-morrow about this time will I deliver them up all slain before Israel: thou shalt hough their horses, and burn their chariots with fire.

7 So Joshua came, and all the people of war with him, against them by the waters of Merom suddenly; and they fell upon them.

8 And the Lord delivered them into the hand of Israel, who smote them, and chased them unto

(as Bochart observes in his Hierozoicon, par. i. lib. i. cap. 6), and Joshua here calls the "waters of Merom;" that is, the upper waters; for this lake was near the fountain of Jordan, which ran through the lake of Tiberias, and fell into the lake Asphaltites, or the Dead Sea. With respect to which waters, these were called the upper, they being lower. And here they pitched rather than any other place, being under the jurisdiction of Jabin, who had called them together: for Hazor, where he reigned, was situate upon this lake, as Josephus tells us, lib. v. Antiq. cap. 6.

Ver. 6. The Lord said unto Joshua.] Who went, it is probable (as he had done formerly, x. 8), to consult the Divine Majesty, how he should manage himself upon this great occasion.

Be not afraid because of them.] Some collect from hence (even Josephus himself,) that Joshua was possessed with some fear, when he heard of such a numerous army, and so well appointed, coming against him. But I do not think it at all probable, that after so many late assurances and signal demonstrations, as God had given him of his presence with him in this war, he should be capable of this passion (see the first chapter of this book, ver. 2, 3, 6, 7, 9. iii. 7, 9, 10. v. 13—15. x. 8). Therefore these words were spoken to him, that he might animate the people, whose hearts were apt to fail them, when they saw such terrible enemies.

To-morrow about this time] It is not certain what this time was; but it is likely in the morning after he had marched all night (as he did against the five kings, x. 9), that he might fall upon them unexpectedly.

Will I deliver them up all slain before Israel.] The LXX. translate it τεροποιήσους, "put to flight." Which agrees with what follows; for it is certain they were not all slain, but many of them fled, and the Israelites pursued them: and therefore other copies of the LXX. have it τετροπήσους, "wounded;" so broken and shattered, that they were all in effect dead men.

Hough their horses.] Cut their hamstrings, and thereby render them unfit for future service.

Burn their chariots] That they might be no more used; no, not by the Israelites themselves.

Ver. 7. Joshua came—against them] He did not wait for their motion; but attacked them as they lay in their quarters; for that is signified by the next word.

Suddenly] When they thought not of an enemy near them; but were consulting, perhaps, how to manage the war against the Israelites.

They fell upon them.] When they were unprovided to make such resistance as they would have done, if they had been ready to receive them.

Ver. 8. The Lord delivered them into the hand of Israel, who smote them.] Routed and killed a great many of them.

Chased them unto great Zidon.] This, it seems, was a large city, and of great note in these days (for there great Zidon, and unto Misrephod-maim, and unto the valley of Mizpeh eastward; and they smote them, until they left them none remaining.

9 And Joshua did unto them as the LORD bade him: he houghed their horses, and burnt their chariots with fire.

10 ¶ And Joshua at that time turned back, and took Hazor, and smote the king thereof with the sword: for Hazor beforetime was the head of all those kingdoms.

11 And they smote all the souls that were therein with the edge of the sword, utterly destroying them: there was not any left to breathe: and he burnt Hazor with fire.

12 And all the cities of those kings, and all the kings of them, did Joshua take, and smote them with the edge of the sword, and he utterly destroyed them, as Moses the servant of the LORD commanded.

13 But as for the cities that stood still in their strength, Israel burned none of them, save Hazor only; that did Joshua burn.

14 And all the spoil of these cities, and the cattle, the children of Israel took for a prey unto themselves; but every man they smote with the edge of the sword, until they had destroyed them, neither left they any to breathe.

15 ¶ As the LORD commanded Moses his servant, so did Moses command Joshua, and so did Joshua; he left nothing undone of all that the LORD commanded Moses.

was no Zidon the less), built by the eldest son of Canaan (as Josephus thinks), from whom it had its name (see Gen. x. 15). It lay in the north-west part of Canaan, upon the sea.

Unto Misrephod-maim.] It is thought by some that this was a place where there were hot waters, which I shall not examine, but only note it as a probable conjecture, from xiii. 6, that it was a place in the country of Zidon where they made salt.

Unto the valley of Mizpeh eastward.] See ver. 3. This signifies, that, in their confusion, some of them fled westward to Zidon and Misrephod-maim, and others eastward towards Mizpeh.

Smote them, until they left them none remaining.] As they divided themselves, and fled several ways; so did the Israelites send out several parties, both to the west and to the east, who pursued them so close, that they left not a man of them escape.

Ver. 9.] We do not read, as Kimchi notes upon this place, of any horses or chariots which the five kings, mentioned in the foregoing chapter, brought into the field; because they were only to besiege Gibeon, and hoped to take it presently by an assault, in which there was no use of horses and chariots; which they did not want, no more than these kings, who abounded in them, and placed their principal confidence in their horsemen and chariots. Which was the reason God commanded them to hough their horses; that is, to cut their nerves and sinews in their hams, which Josephus translates ἀρρίστους ποιεῖν, "to make them useless and unprofitable:" for God would not have his people place their safety and security in this, but in himself alone, as good people always did (Ps. xx. 7). Accordingly, when David had conquered Hadadzezar, and taken from him a great number of horses and chariots, he disabled all the horses, after this example of Joshua (as if God intended by him to teach all future rulers of his people what to do), reserving only as many as would serve for a hundred chariots (2 Sam. viii. 4). And Schickardus observes, out of the Jewish authors, that they were wont thus to enervate all the horses they found in the king's stables after his death, that they might not be of use to his successor (see his Mischpat Hammelech, cap. 6. Theor. 19, and Bochart's Hierozoicon, par. i. lib. ii. cap. 11).

Ver. 10. Joshua at that time.] Before he thought of returning to his camp, at Gilgal.

Turned back.] From pursuing those that fled towards the western coast.

Took Hazor.] Which was in the eastern part of the country, upon the lake before mentioned.

Smote the king thereof.] This was one reason, it is likely, why he made haste to invest Hazor; because the king thereof, who was the chief author of this war, had escaped out of the battle, and thought to defend himself there.

For Hazor beforetime was the head of all those kingdoms.] Not of all the kingdoms of Canaan; but of all those mentioned in the beginning of this chapter. Which was another reason why he fell upon it at this time: that by taking the most considerable city of this part of Canaan, all the rest might be disheartened to hold out against him.

Ver. 11. There was not any left.] See x. 40.

He burnt Hazor.] Which the Canaanites afterward rebuilt, and possessed it for some time; another king of the same name reigning in it (Judg. iv. 2). For the kings of this city were called Jabin in many successions, as the Egyptian kings were called Pharaoh, and the kings of the Philistines Ahimelech, &c.

Ver. 12. The cities—and all the kings of them, did Joshua take.] viz. Those mentioned ver. 2, 3, whom Jabin drew into confederacy with him; and perhaps were his dependants.

Utterly destroyed them.] That is, all their inhabitants.

As Moses—commanded.] Deut. vii. 2, and many other places.

Ver. 13. As for the cities that stood still in their strength.] The Hebrew words all thillam (which we translate "in their strength"), literally signify upon their heap, as is noted in the margin of our Bibles; that is, were seated in an eminent place, and therefore of greater strength than those that stood in the plain. Thus Bochart interprets it in his Canaan, lib. i. cap. 29, from whence he thinks came the names of Thelassar (2 Kings xix. 12), and of Thelabib (Ezek. iii. 15.) And thus I observe the prophet Jeremiah speaks, xxx. 18, Jerusalem shall be built on her own heap, or high hill. But the meaning may be, according to our translation, the cities whose walls were not battered down in the taking of them.

Israel burned none of them.] Because they intended to dwell in them; and would not be at the charge and pains of building new walls for their safety.

Save Hazor only.] Because it was the capital city and began this war against them: which being laid desolate by the Israelites, without inhabitant, the Canaanites took their opportunity to rebuild it, and settle themselves there again.

Ver. 14. All the spoil—the children of Israel took.] As the LORD allowed them to do at Ai (viii. 2).

But every man they smote, &c.] Because God had often commanded these nations should be rooted out for their abominable wickedness; lest the Israelites should be drawn in to imitate them in their filthy lewdness, as I observed from Lev. xviii. 24—26, &c. See also xx. 22, 23, &c.

Ver. 15. As the Lord commanded Moses.] See Exod. xxxiv. 11, 12, &c.

16 So Joshua took all that land, the hills, and all the south country, and all the land of Goshen, and the valley, and the plain, and the mountain of Israel, and the valley of the same;

17 Even from the mount Halak, that goeth up to Seir, even unto Baal-gad in the valley of Lebanon under mount Hermon: and all their kings he took, and smote them, and slew them.

18 Joshua made war a long time with all those kings.

19 There was not a city that made peace with the children of Israel, save the Hivites the inhabitants of Gibeon: all other they took in battle.

So did Moses command Joshua,] See Numb. xxvi. 19. Deut. xxxi. 7.

He left nothing undone of all that the Lord commanded Moses.] Which is a demonstration that Moses left in writing what we read the Lord commanded in the foregoing books, and that they were not written (as some pretend) in later times: for then it would have been impossible for Joshua to have executed every thing that he commanded, unless he had had the book of the law before him for his direction. But so desirous are some men to weaken the authority of these holy books, that from hence they argue this book of Joshua could not be written by himself, but some other; because he gives himself this high commendation. So the author of Theolog. Polit. who by the same reason might have rejected St. Paul's Epistles as none of his, and Cæsar's Commentaries; for both of them relate their own virtues, and the noble things they did.

Ver. 16. Joshua took all that land,] Belonging to the kings before mentioned.

The hills, &c.] This is a description of his whole conquest, as appears from x. 40.

The mountain of Israel,] It is very uncertain what place this was, but many think it probable to be Beth-el: where God appeared to Jacob, as he went to Padan-Aram, and promised to give him this land (Gen. xxviii. 12, 13), and where he dwelt, by God's direction, after he came from Padan-Aram, and God appeared again to him there, and made him the same promise, and changed his name from Jacob to Israel (Gen. xxxv. 1. 9, 10, &c.).

The valley of the same,] Belonging to the same mountain. But Conradus Pellicanus thinks the singular number is put for the plural, and thus explains the whole verse: The land of Israel was partly in the hill-country, partly in the south towards Egypt, partly in the plain near the great sea, and the sea of Sodom, and the spring of Jordan, near Tabor, in Galilee. And moreover, the mountains of Israel were the two Carmels, Hermon, Gilead, Lebanus, those about Jerusalem, and many other.

Ver. 17. Even from the mount Halak,] Or the stony mountain, as Bochart interprets it, lib. i. Canaan, cap. 5.

That goeth up to Seir,] Which was the bounds of the country of Edom.

Even unto Baal-gad.] As in the foregoing words he expresses the bounds of Joshua's conquest southward, so hither they reached northward. And this seems to be a description of the length of the country which he took from the king of Hazor, and all those that joined with him, as Archbishop Usher understands it.

All their kings he took, and smote them.] So that none appeared to make head against him.

Ver. 18. ] But those kings were so many, and made such great opposition, that he spent six years (as the 20 For it was of the LORD to harden their hearts, that they should come against Israel in battle, that he might destroy them utterly, and that they might have no favour, but that he might destroy them, as the LORD commanded Moses.

21 ¶ And at that time came Joshua, and cut off the Anakims from the mountains, from Hebron, from Debir, from Anab, and from all the mountains of Judah, and from all the mountains of Israel: Joshua destroyed them utterly with their cities.

22 There was none of the Anakims left in the forenamed great person computes) in this war before he could finish it.

Ver. 19. There was not a city that made peace with the children of Israel.] This is the reason the war continued so long, because there was but one city that surrendered on such terms as had been offered them; but all the rest obstinately refused to yield unto Joshua.

Save only the Hivites] See viii. 3. Who, if they had truly discovered who they were (which out of fear they concealed), and begged peace, they might have obtained it on such conditions as were proposed to all.

All other they took in battle,] By force of arms.

Ver. 20. For it was of the Lord to harden their hearts, that they should come against Israel.] Being a people obstinately wicked, God ordered things so in his providence, that they were emboldened (notwithstanding the wonders they had certainly heard were done for Israel) to fight with them. By which it appears the Gibeonites were a better sort of people, who considered what God had done in favour of the Israelites.

That they might have no favour,] Which they might have found, if they had not been so fool-hardy (as we speak), as to imagine they could withstand those before whom the river Jordan fled, and the walls of Jericho fell down flat.

As the Lord commanded Moses.] In many places, particularly in Deut. vii. 2. xx. 16, 17.

Ver. 21. At that time] That is, in the war before mentioned, and perhaps in the conclusion of it; after he had left none to oppose him in other places, but only in those mountainous countries which were of difficult access.

Came Joshua,] Either from the camp at Gilgal, or from destroying the kings and their countries, of which he had been speaking in this chapter.

Cut off the Anakims] Who were a distinct people (Arius Montanus thinks) from the Canaanites; of a fierce, cruel, and tyrannical disposition, who oppressed all their neighbours.

From the mountains,] Where they had settled, and it is likely, strongly fortified themselves; which moved Joshua to let them alone till he had finished his other conquests. Concerning these Anakims, see Numb. xiii. 22, 23.

From Hebron,] Called also Kiriath-Arba, the city of Arba, who was a great man among the Anakims (see Bochartus, in his Canaan, lib. i. cap. 1. p. 363).

Debiri,] Also Kiriath-Sepher, as I noted before.

Anab,] This, as well as the two forenamed cities, fell to the tribe of Judah (xv. 50).

All the mountains of Judah,] All the mountainous country which afterward fell by lot to that tribe.

All the mountains of Israel:] All the mountainous country which was in the rest of the tribes of Israel, where these people, it is likely, fled for safety.

Joshua destroyed them utterly with their cities land of the children of Israel: only in Gaza, in Gath, and in Ashdod, there remained.

23 So Joshua took the whole land, according to all that the Lord said unto Moses; and

Which it seems they had in those mountainous countries of Israel; besides Hebron, Debir, and Anab, in the tribe of Judah.

Ver. 22. There was none of the Anakims left in the land] He rooted them out of the whole country which the Israelites conquered.

Only in Gaza, in Gath, and in Ashdod, there remained.] Three cities of the Philistines; unto which either some of them escaped, and there took shelter, or they had been there from ancient time, and the Israelites could not yet expel them. For they did not possess themselves of the country of the Philistines till the time of David: when we find some of these giants still there; particularly in Gath. But that there were any of them at Ascalon, the famous Bochart shows to be an error in the place before mentioned (lib. i. Canaan, cap. 1).

Ver. 23. So Joshua took the whole land,] Which either the Canaanites or the Anakims possessed; that is, subdued it so that none rose up against him, though many places were not yet in the possession of the Israelites (see xiii. 1, 2, &c.). For which were many reasons; one of which was, because the Israelites were not yet so many as to be able to people the whole country, and keep the beasts of the field from multiplying upon them (Exod. xxiii. 29): and two more reasons are added, Judg. iii. 1, 4.

That the Lord said unto Moses;] Deut. xxxi. 7, 8. Gave it for an inheritance unto Israel] Deut. iii. 28. According to their divisions] Numb. xxvi. 53. xxxiii. 54.

The land rested from war.] None of the lords of the Philistines, or any other, adventured to give any disturbance to the Israelites in their possessions; but they enjoyed them quietly: and thereby had liberty to make a division of the country; which God ordered them to go about, ch. xiii.

Now began the seventh year from the time the Israelites first ploughed and sowed in the land; and therefore was the first sabbatical year that they observed after Joshua had brought them to their rest in the land of promise. An emblem (as our great primate of Ireland observes, of that eternal sabbatism, or rest, unto which the true Jesus will bring his people (Heb. iv. 8, 9). And from this they were to reckon unto their jubilee, mentioned Lev. xxv. 8. 13. But that was not from their entrance into Canaan, but from the seventh year after the division of the land, as I observed before upon the last verse of the tenth chapter.

CHAPTER XII.

1 The two kings whose countries Moses took and disposed of. 7 The one and thirty kings on the other side Jordan which Joshua smote.

1 Now these are the kings of the land, which the children of Israel smote, and possessed their land on the other side Jordan toward the rising of the sun, from the river Arnon unto mount Hermon, and all the plain on the east:

2 Sihon king of the Amorites, who dwelt in Heshbon, and ruled from Aroer, which is upon the bank of the river Arnon, and from the middle of the river, and from half Gilead, even unto the river Jabbok, which is the border of the children of Ammon;

3 And from the plain to the sea of Chinneroth on the east, and unto the sea of the plain, even the salt sea on the east, the way to Beth-jeshimoth; and from the south, under Ashdoth-pisgah:

4 ¶ And the coast of Og king of Bashan, which was of the remnant of the giants, that dwelt at Ashtaroth and Edrei,

CHAP. XII.

Ver. 1. Now these are the kings of the land,] Before he gives an account of the division of the land, he thinks fit to lay before every one's eyes, as in a table, the land they had conquered: which was to be divided.

On the other side Jordan toward the rising of the sun,] There they began their conquests, before they passed over Jordan.

From the river Arnon unto Mount Hermon,] So the bounds of this conquest are described by Moses, Deut. iii. 8. iv. 48 (see there).

All the plain on the east;] That is, on the east of Jordan (see Deut. i. 1), called the plain of Moab, Deut. xxxiv. 1.

Ver. 2. Sihon king of the Amorites,] He was the first king whose land they conquered and possessed (see Numb. xxi.).

Ruled from Aroer,] See Numb. xxi. 24. From the middle of the river,] In which stood the city called Aroer. For Ar never was in the hands of Sihon; but his kingdom was bounded by it, on that side (see Deut. ii. 36. iii. 16).

From half Gilead,] In the Hebrew, "and half of Gilead;" there being nothing to answer to the word from: which being left out, the sense is plain, that half of the country of Gilead belonged to Sihon, as the other half did to Og (ver. 5).

Unto the river Jabbok,] Thus his country is constantly described: particularly in Numb. xxi. 24. Deut. iii. 16.

Ver. 3. From the plain, &c.] There is nothing answering to the word from in the Hebrew; which may most clearly be translated and the plain: and so the LXX. only retaining the word araba, which we translate plain. This was another part of Sihon's country, a great plain, which lay eastward of the sea of Chinneroth, and the salt sea; by which it was bounded on the west.

The way to Beth-jeshimoth;] Which, by the next words, is thought to have lain towards the south.

From the south, under Ashdoth-pisgah;] The meaning seems to be, that on the south it was bounded by Ashdoth-pisgah (see Deut. iii. 17). I do not touch these things, leaving them to a very learned friend and brother of mine, who hath most accurately considered every part and place of this country.

Ver. 4. The coast of Og king of Bashan,] The next

5 And reigned in mount Hermon, and in Salcah, and in all Bashan, unto the border of the Geshurites and the Maachathites, and half Gilead, the border of Sihon king of Heshbon.

6 Then did Moses the servant of the LORD and the children of Israel smite: and Moses the servant of the LORD gave it for a possession unto the Reubenites, and the Gadites, and the half tribe of Manasseh.

7 ¶ And these are the kings of the country which Joshua and the children of Israel smote on this side Jordan on the west, from Baal-gad in the valley of Lebanon even unto the mount Halak, that goeth up to Seir; which Joshua gave unto the tribes of Israel for a possession according to their divisions;

8 In the mountains, and in the valleys, and in the plains, and in the springs, and in the wilderness, and in the south country; the Hittites, the Amorites, and the Canaanites, the Perizzites, the Hivites, and the Jebusites:

9 ¶ The king of Jericho, one; the king of Ai, which is beside Beth-el, one;

10 The king of Jerusalem, one; the king of Hebron, one;

11 The king of Jarmuth, one; the king of Lachish, one;

12 The king of Eglon, one; the king of Gezer, one;

13 The king of Debir, one; the king of Geder, one;

14 The king of Hormah, one; the king of Arad, one;

15 The king of Libnah, one; the king of Adullam, one;

16 The king of Makkedah, one; the king of Beth-el, one;

17 The king of Tappuah, one; the king of Hopher, one; conquest they made was of the kingdom of Og, who was of the remnant of the giants (see Deut. iii. 11).

That dwelt at Ashtaroth and at Edrei,] See Deut. i. 4. Some would gather from this place, and from xiii. 12, that he had two royal seats, one at Ashtaroth another at Edrei; and he lived sometimes in the one, and sometimes in the other.

Ver. 5. Reigned in mount Hermon,] At the bottom of which some other people lived, who were conquered by Joshua (xi. 17).

In Salcah,] This was one of his cities in that part of his kingdom which was next to Hermon, as some conjecture from xiii. 12. But others think it was in the southern part of this country, possessed afterward by the Gadites; which they gather from 1 Chron. v. 11, 12, 16.

All Bashan, unto the border, &c.] See an account of this, and of all that follows in this verse, Deut. iii. 13, 14.

Ver. 6. Them did Moses—smite.] These two kings were conquered by Moses before they came into Canaan (Numb. xxi.).

Moses the servant of the Lord gave it for a possession unto the Reubenites, &c.] See Numb. xxxii. and Deut. iii. 12, xiii. 8. He gave Moses the title of “the servant of the Lord” twice in this verse, to make them sensible that this war against the two kings before named was made by Divine authority; and that their land was afterward given to the Reubenites, &c. by the same authority.

Ver. 7. These are the kings] They that follow in the rest of the chapter.

Of the country which Joshua—smote on this side Jordan.] In the late wars, before mentioned in this book. On the west,] Westward of Jordan.

From Baal-gad—even unto the mount Halak,] This was the northern and southern bounds of the country of these kings (see xi. 17).

Which Joshua gave unto the tribes] Unto the rest of the tribes, who had not their share on the other side Jordan (xi. 23).

Ver. 8. In the mountains, and in the valleys, and in the plains,] This is a description of the condition of the country; in which valleys and plains differ only in this, that the former were such as lay between mountains, and the latter, the flat country, which was remote from mountains.

In the springs,] Which commonly were at the foot of mountains.

In the wilderness, and in the south country;] These are joined together, because their wildernesses were southerly, in the hottest and driest part of the land: whereby we are not to understand countries without people; but that were thinly peopled, in comparison with other parts of the land. For we read of houses and towns in the wilderness, 1 Kings ix. 18. xi. 34.

The Hittites, &c.] This may relate either to the kings, or the countries, forementioned.

Ver. 9. King of Jericho, one;] He is first mentioned, because first conquered.

King of Ai,] He was the next.

Which is beside Beth-el, one;] The people of which place came to assist the king of Ai; and were conquered at the same time (viii. 17).

Ver. 10. King of Jerusalem, one;] Who was the next that opposed Joshua, and therefore next mentioned (x. 1).

King of Hebron, one;] He, and the next three, the kings of Jarmuth, Lachish, and Eglon (ver. 11, 12), joined with the king of Jerusalem and were vanquished at the same time.

Ver. 12. King of Gezer, one;] He came out to help Lachish, and was smitten at the same time (x. 33).

Ver. 13. King of Debir, one;] Mentioned x. 38.

King of Geder, one;] We read not of him before; but we find several towns in the tribe of Judah of the same or neighbouring name, viz. Gederah, and Gederoth, and Gedrothaim, and Geder (xv. 36. 41. 56. 2 Chron. xxviii. 18). All which, as Bochartus observes, have their name a sepimento, “from the fence that was about them” (lib. i. Canaan, cap. 36).

Ver. 14. King of Hormah, one; the king of Arad, one;] We have no mention of these kings before; but we know that Hormah was a city in the tribe of Judah (xv. 30. Judges i. 17. 1 Sam. xxx. 30), and afterward given to Simeon (Josh. xix. 4). Arad also was a place in the tribe of Judah, as appears by the story in Judg. i. 16.

Ver. 15. King of Libnah, one;] Mentioned before (x. 29).

King of Adullam, one;] This was a city in the same tribe of Judah (xv. 35. 1 Sam. xxii. 1).

Ver. 16. King of Makkedah, one;] See x. 26.

King of Beth-el, one;] We read not of any king here before; but it seems there was one depending upon Ai (viii. 17).

Ver. 17. King of Tappuah, one;] There were two cities of this name; one in the tribe of Judah, (xv. 34), the other in the tribe of Ephraim (xvii. 8). It is 18 The king of Aphek, one; the king of Lasharon, one;

19 The king of Madon, one; the king of Hazor, one;

20 The king of Shimron-meron, one; the king of Achshaph, one;

21 The king of Taanach, one; the king of Megiddo, one;

22 The king of Kedesh, one; the king of Jokneam of Carmel, one;

23 The king of Dor in the coast of Dor, one; the king of the nations of Gilgal, one;

24 The king of Tirzah, one: all the kings thirty and one.

probable the latter is here meant; because the king of it is mentioned next to the king of Beth-el, which was in the confines of Benjamin and Ephraim. And immediately follows the king of Hopher; which was a place not far off, in the tribe of Zebulun.

King of Hopher, one;] We read of the land of Hopher, in 1 Kings iv. 10. Which St. Jerome saith was in the tribe of Zebulun, near Sephorim, or Diocesarea.

Ver. 18. King of Aphek;] There were two Apheks in this country which Joshua conquered, one in the tribe of Judah (xiii. 53. 1 Sam. ix. i. xxix. 1), another in the tribe of Asher (Josh. xix. 53). Which of them is here intended, cannot certainly be determined.

King of Lasharon, one;] This place is never named any where else in Scripture. But I take it for Saron (as the Vulgar Latin here doth, leaving out the first syllable), which was a city near Lydda, as we learn from Acts ix. 35. And the country about it was very pleasant and fruitful (Isa. xxxiii. 9. xxxv. 2). There was another Saron also on the other side of Jordan, in the east, in the country of the Gadites (1 Chron. v. 16), of which some think the prophet Isaiah speaks, lxx. 10.

Ver. 19. King of Madon, one; the king of Hazor, one;] Both of these are mentioned before, as conquered by Joshua (xi. 1).

Ver. 20. King of Shimron-meron, one; the king of Achshaph, one;] These two are mentioned in the same place (xi. 1). And Shimron was in the tribe of Zebulun; and Achshaph in the tribe of Asher (xix. 15. 25). The former hath the addition of Meron to it in this place, to distinguish it from some other Shimron; which some think was in the tribe of Ephraim, called Shomeron, or Samaria.

Ver. 21. King of Taanach, one;] A city given to the tribe of Manasseh (xvii. 11), and in the confines of the tribe of Zebulun. It belonged to the Levites (xxi. 25); but the old inhabitants were not expelled out of it (Judg. i. 27).

King of Megiddo, one;] This city fell to the same tribe, as we read in the same place; and was near the river Kishon; as may be gathered from Judg. v. 19. The Canaanites were not driven out of this city (Judg. i. 27).

Ver. 22. King of Kedesh, one;] There were two cities called Kedesh, or Kadish; one in the tribe of Judah (xv. 23), the other in the tribe of Naphtali (xix. 37), the latter is here meant; for it was a fenced city, as we read there; but the other was of no note.

King of Jokneam of Carmel, one;] A city in the tribe of Zebulun, at the bottom of Mount Carmel, near the river Belus (xix. 11), and one of the cities of the Levites (xxi. 34). It had its name from its delightful situation, as Bochart conjectures, lib. i. Canaan, cap. 28.

Ver. 23. King of Dor—one;] A city in the lot of the tribe of Manasseh (xvii. 11), which had a large territory belonging to it, called after its name: for it was a royal city, and one of the most ancient in Phœnicia, as Bochart observes. So strong, also, that the Israelites could not get possession of it (or could not keep out the ancient inhabitants), when it fell to the portion of Manasseh (Judg. i. 27). Nor could Antiochus Sidetes, in future times, take it, though he laid siege to it with a very great army (lib. i. Canaan, cap. 41).

King of the nations of Gilgal, one;] This Gilgal is not the place where Joshua encamped when he came over Jordan; for there was no city there, nor any king of that country, but the king of Jericho. That place also had its name from the circumcision of the Israelites there (ver. 9). We have no mention indeed of any other Gilgal in Scripture; but St. Jerome says, in his time, there was a place called Gelgel, about six miles from Antipatris, which was near the sea, not far from Joppa. Hither, it is likely, merchants from several countries resorted; and thence the chief ruler there was called the king of the nations of Gilgal. Some finding mention of Galilee of the nations, fancy that it is the place here meant. But that name, for some part of Galilee, was not known in the days of Joshua; being occasioned by Solomon's giving Hiram twenty towns in this country (1 Kings ix. 11). So the same St. Jerome.

Ver. 24. King of Tirzah, one;] It is not certain in what part of the country this city was; but it is very probable in the lot of the tribe of Ephraim. For Jeroboam (who was of this tribe) and his successors, made it the royal seat until the building of Samaria (1 Kings xiv. 17. xvi. 23, 24).

All the kings thirty and one.] Some cannot believe that in so small a country there were so many kings. But they should consider, that these kings were only petty princes, or lords of cities, which had a few villages depending on them, the inhabitants of which were their tenants. This appears by ver. 9. where we read of the king of Beth-el; which was so small a place, that he and the king of Ai, joined together, had but twelve thousand subjects (viii. 25). For kingdoms, like all other things, were anciently very small in their beginnings. See upon Gen. xiv. 1. and Grotius upon the first verse of this chapter, and Masius upon the seventh. Unto which may be added, that Cæsar, in his fifth book of his Commentaries, speaks of four kings here in the county of Kent alone: how many then were there in all Britain! for it appears by Tacitus, that the Silures and the Brigantes had their own kings also. And Cæsar informs us, that in France there were as many kings as princes; and so it was in Spain, as Livy writes. And Vopiscus, in the life of the emperor Probus, relates, that when he was in Germany, reguli novem ex diversis gentibus, &c. “nine petty kings came from divers nations, and threw themselves at his feet;” as he himself wrote to the senate of Rome, in a letter which is there recorded. In which he call them novem reges, “nine kings.”

CHAP. XIII.

Ver. 1. Now Joshua was old and stricken in years;] To what age he was advanced we cannot certainly know; because we do not know how old he was when they came out of Egypt. Some think three and forty; and then he was fourscore and three when they came into Canaan: and now, it may be gathered by probable conjectures, wanted not much of a hundred.

There remaineth yet very much land to be possessed.] Which, in his declining age, he could not hope to live to conquer; and therefore he would have him go about another business (ver. 7).

Ver. 2. That yet remaineth:] To be subdued hereafter.

The borders of the Philistines,] Who lay in the south-west part of Canaan, near the sea.

All Geshuri,] Which was a city, and a country in the north-east, not far from Hermon, belonging to the lot of the tribe of Manassch (see Deut. iii. 14).

Ver. 3. From Sihor, which is before Egypt,] He describes more largely the borders of the Philistines, whose country extended along the sea-coast, south and north, from Sihor, which was a little stream from one of the branches of the Nile, whereby Palestine was bounded on that side (see Gen. xv. 18. and Vossius De Orig. et Progr. Idolol. lib. ii. cap. 74).

Even unto the borders of Ekron northward,] A famous city among the Philistines, where Baal-zebub was worshipped, called in the New Testament "the prince of the devils" (or demons), because he was the principal god of the people of Palestine. This city was given to the tribe of Judah at first (xv. 45), afterward to the tribe of Dan (xix.), though neither of them could get possession of it.

Which is counted to the Canaanite:] For the Philistines were not original inhabitants of this country, which belonged to the offspring of Canaan, the youngest son of Ham; whereas the Philistines were descended from Misraim, his second son; who expelled the Avites out of this country; as we read, Deut. ii. 23. and see my annotations on Gen. x. 14. 19.

Five lords of the Philistines;] Which country was under the government of five lords, as they are constantly called in Scripture; in the Hebrew, seraim, or seranaim; which seems to be an ancient Phœnician word (the same with sarim) for a ruler of a province, or city. The LXX. call them Σάρραται, and the Vulgar Latin, reguli, "petty princes." But they are never called melakim, i. e. kings, in Scripture, as the rest of the princes of Canaan are. Which inclines me to think that their government was not so absolute, as that of the rest of the kings of Canaan. Only we read in future times, that Achish was king of Gath; having, it seems, in David's days, made himself more absolute than the former lords of that place.

The Gazathites, &c.] These people had their names from the five principal cities in this country, where they inhabited; which are commonly known.

Also the Avites,] These were a people mixed with them, being a remnant (as I said before) of the ancient inhabitants of this country. But there was no distinct lord of them; there being but five in all; and so many without one over these. Some have confounded them with the Hivites; but their name is quite different in the Hebrew, and so is their country. For the Hivites lived in Hermon in the north; and these here in the west. From whence, though they were driven by the Capthorites (Deut. ii. 23), yet some of them, it seems, remained; as several of the Canaanites did, when the Israelites dispossessed them of their country. See Bochartus, in his Phaleg. lib. iv. cap. 36. who thinks they were not the offspring of Canaan; but it is manifest they inhabited part of the country belonging to him: for Sidon was the first-born of Canaan, who was settled on that coast; and the border of the Canaanites is said to be from thence unto Gaza (Gen. x. 19).

Ver. 4. From the south,] Of the Philistines' country.

All the land of the Canaanites,] All that tract of land which belonged to the people properly called Canaanites; who lived upon the sea-coast.

And Mearah,] We find no mention of this place elsewhere: some translate it, a cove.

That is beside the Sidonians,] Who were in the northern point of that sea-coast.

Unto Aphek,] See xii. 18, where I observed there were two cities of this name; but it is most reasonable here to understand that in the tribe of Ashur; whose king though Joshua had slain, he had not taken his country.

Amorites,] Who were in these parts: for they being a mighty people had dispersed themselves, not only in the east, and in the south, but in these northern regions.

Ver. 5. Gibletes,] A people inhabiting a city called Gebal, and the country about it, near to Tyre and Sidon; as appears from Ezek. xxvii. 9. and in 1 Kings v. 18. they are mentioned as stone-cutters, sent by Hiram king of Tyre to king Solomon (see also Ps. lxxxiii. 7).

All Lebanon, toward the sun-rising,] They extended their conquests thus far (xi. 17) but could not subdue the eastern part of this country.

From Baal-gad—unto the entering into Hamath,] Concerning Baal-gad, see xi. 17. and concerning "the entering into Hamath," Numb. xxxiv. 8.

donians, them will I drive out from before the children of Israel: only divide thou it by lot unto the Israelites for an inheritance, as I have commanded thee.

7 Now therefore divide this land for an inheritance unto the nine tribes, and the half tribe of Manasseh.

8 With whom the Reubenites and the Gadites have received their inheritance, which Moses gave them, beyond Jordan eastward, even as Moses the servant of the Lord gave them;

9 From Aroer, that is upon the bank of the river Arnon, and the city that is in the midst of the river, and all the plain of Medeba unto Dibon;

10 And all the cities of Sihon king of the Amorites, which reigned in Heshbon, unto the border of the children of Ammon;

11 And Gilead, and the border of the Geshurites and Maachathites, and all mount Hermon, and all Bashan unto Salcah;

12 All the kingdom of Og in Bashan, which reigned in Ashtaroth and in Edrei, who remained of the remnant of the giants: for these did Moses smite, and cast them out.

13 Nevertheless the children of Israel expelled not the Geshurites, nor the Maachathites: but the Geshurites and the Maachathites dwell among the Israelites unto this day.

14 Only unto the tribe of Levi he gave none inheritance; the sacrifices of the Lord God of Israel made by fire are their inheritance, as he said unto them.

15 ¶ And Moses gave unto the tribe of the children of Reuben inheritance according to their families.

Ver. 6. Hill country] In the northern parts of the land. From Lebanon] This shows what hilly country he speaks of.

Unto Misrephoth-maim,] A place before mentioned, xi. 8, where, as I observed, some render it hot waters, or baths: for sharaph signifies to burn, and maim its waters. And I may add, there are those that think they were lime-kilns, others glass-furnaces; but most likely salt-pits.

All the Sidonians,] Who were near to the inhabitants of Libanus, westward upon the sea.

Them will I drive out,] If they persisted constant in his worship and service. Which they did not; and therefore we never read that the Sidonians were conquered by the Israelites: and the people of Lebanon were only made tributaries in the days of David and Solomon.

Only] Or rather therefore, as the word rak sometimes signifies (see ch. i. ult.).

Divide thou it by lot—for an inheritance,] Though they be not yet driven out, yet, since I have promised to expel them, assign all the forementioned countries to the children of Israel by lot, as the inheritance I have bestowed upon them. Which gave them a strong assurance they should have all this land; both because God had given it to them for an inheritance, and ordered to be divided by lot.

As I have commanded thee,] Or, as I now command thee, and give thee authority to do.

Ver. 7.] Both that which was conquered, and that which remained unconquered, was to be divided, that every tribe might know what belonged to them, by God's gift; and be encouraged to attempt the conquest of it when they were able; and be preserved from entering into any covenant or society with those who kept their inheritance from them; and likewise hinder the unconquered people from joining their forces together to recover their country; the Israelites inhabiting the cities and fields that lay between them.

Ver. 8. With whom] That is, with the other half of the tribe before mentioned.

The Reubenites, &c.] See Numb. xxxii. 33, &c. Even as Moses—gave them;] Which he did by order from God; and therefore they were not to be disturbed in their possession (Deut. iii. 18).

Here the words of God to Joshua (ver. 1) end; and in the next verse the writer of this book begins to describe the country which God ordered to be given to the forenamed two tribes and a half, that there might be no future dispute about this division; but it might be held as good as that which was made by lot among the rest of the tribes.

Ver. 9. From Aroer,] See xii. 2. and Deut. iii. 16.

All the plain of Medeba unto Dibon;] These are two cities which the Amorites took from the Moabites (as we read Numb. xxi. 30), and the Israelites took from them when they conquered Sihon their king. The former of them was in the portion of the Reubenites; the other of the Gadites: and when the ten tribes were carried captive, they returned into the possession of the Moabites again. For Isaiah speaks of them as belonging to Moab, xv. 2. and so doth Jeremiah, xlvi. 22. The plain of Medeba seems to be the same with the plain of Moab.

Ver. 10.] See Numb. xxi. 24, 25. &c.

Ver. 11. Geshurites and Maachathites,] Geshur and Maacha were two cities near Mount Hermon, in the extreme bounds of this country northward, whose inhabitants the Israelites could not drive out (ver. 13), and yet their land was divided among them.

All mount Hermon,] See all this verse explained, xii. 5. I shall only add, that Maacha was in the tribe of Manasseh, and is the city which Ptolemy calls Epiceros. Which name the Chaldee paraphrast uses both here and xii. 4, 5. and Deut. iii. 14. instead of Maacha, as Bochart observes, lib. ii. Phaleg. cap. 6.

Ver. 12. Og in Bashan,] See xii. 4. and Deut. iii. 11.

These did Moses smite,] These Rephaim (which we translate giants) were perfectly conquered, and rooted out by Moses. They were smitten in Abraham's time, by Chedorlaomer (Gen. xiv. 5), but recovered strength so much, that their country, when Moses conquered it, was called "the land of giants," Deut. iii. 13.

Ver. 13. Expelled not the Geshurites,] See ver. 2.

Dwell among the Israelites until this day.] For Joshua growing old (ver. 1) made no further conquest, but left this people unsubdued, as Moses also had done.

Ver. 14. Only unto the tribe of Levi he gave no inheritance;] For the tithes of the whole country were instead of their portion in land (Deut. xviii. 2). And this is set down here by Joshua, as formerly by Moses, to show that they had as indisputable a right to the tithes as their brethren had to the land.

The sacrifices—made by fire, are their inheritance,] That is, the inheritance of the priests; for the whole tribe of Levi had nothing to do with them. See Numb. xviii. where the portion of the priests and of the Levites is exactly set down; and see ver. 33. of this chapter, and xiv. 3. xviii. 7.

As he said unto them.] See Numb. xviii. 20, 21. where this is distinctly said, both with respect to the priests and to the Levites.

16 And their coast was from Arzer, that is on the bank of the river Arnon, and the city that is in the midst of the river, and all the plain by Medeba;

17 Hesbion, and all her cities that are in the plain; Dibon, and Bamoth-baal, and Beth-basimeth.

18 And Jahaza, and Kedemoth, and Mephaath.

19 And Kirjathaim, and Sibmah, and Zarephathair in the mount of the valley.

20 And Beth-peor, and Ashdod-pisgah, and Beth-jeshimoth.

21 And all the cities of the plain, and all the kingdom of Sihon king of the Amorites, which reigned in Hesbion, whom Moses smote with the princes of Midian, Evi, and Rekem, and Zur, and Hur, and Reba, whose wives were daughters of Sihon, dwelling in the country.

22 * Balazam also the son of Beor, the soothsayer, did the children of Israel slay with the sword among them that were slain by them.

23 And the border of the children of Reuben was Jordan, and the border thereof. Thus was the inheritance of the children of Reuben after their families, the cities and the villages thereof.

24 And Moses gave inheritance unto the tribe of Gad, even unto the children of Gad according to their families.

25 And their coast was Jazer, and all the cities of Gilead, and half the land of the children of Ammon, unto Arzer that is before Rabbah;

Ver. 15.] Having said in general what Moses gave to the two tribes and a half, he proceeds to set down in particular what share each of them had in this country: that so they might no more quarrel among themselves about their portion, than the nine tribes and a half quarrel with them all. And, first, he mentions what part of the land was given to Reuben; which was divided into as many portions as they had families.

Ver. 16.] See ver. 9. Arzer itself was in the tribe of Gad (Numb. xxxiii. 24), into which the portion of the Reubenites reached.

Ver. 17.] Hesbion, and all her cities that are in the plain.] He means the plain before mentioned, ver. 9. Dibon.] It is said plainly, in Numb. xxxiii. 24, that it belonged to the Gadites: for it was, as Masius well judges, in the confines of both tribes; and so was inhabited by both. Which is to be said also of Hesbion, here ascribed to the Reubenites; but in xlii. 29, is said to be a city of the Levites in the tribe of Gad. And so we read also in 1 Chron. vi. ult. And this is still more evident: for Hesbion, which in this verse is reckoned to the Reubenites, in the twenty-sixth verse of this very chapter, is said to be given to the tribe of Gad; which is a demonstration they had it between them.

Bamoth-baal and Beth-basimeth.] We read of Bamoth not far from this country, Numb. xxi. 19, but nowhere else of Bamoth-baal; which it is probable, was some high place where Baal was worshipped: for we read of high places in this country, Numb. xlii. 26. We find mention of Beth-basimeth in many places, particularly Numb. xxxiii. 26, where it is said to be given to this tribe. And the addition of Beth to it, signifies there was some house, that is, temple of Baal, in this place.

Ver. 18. Jahaza.] Here they fought with Sihon (see Numb. xlii. 23).

Kedemoth.] From whence Moses sent friendly messages to Sihon, to desire a peaceable passage through his country (Deut. iii. 26).

Mephaath.] This, with the two foregoing, were Levitical cities in the tribe of Reuben (xlii. 26, 27, 1 Chron. vi. 73, 79).

Ver. 19. Kirjathaim, and Sibmah.] These two are mentioned in Numb. xxxiii. 27, 28, as given to the Reubenites.

Zarephathair.] We do not read of this city anywhere else.

In the mount of the valley.] In the mount which overlooked the great plain before mentioned; which may be supposed to be one of the mountains of Abrahim, where this city, and perhaps the two former, were seated.

Ver. 20. Beth-peor.] It seems to have had its name from the first idol which was there worshipped by the Moabites (Numb. xxi. 2, 5, see Deut. xxxii. 6). Ashdod-pisgah and Beth-jeshimoth.] See iii. 2.

Ver. 21. In the cities of the plain.] As well as those mentioned in the mountain which overlooked it (ver. 19).

And all the kingdom of Sihon.] That is, all the first-mentioned places belonging to the kingdom of Sihon. But they had not all his kingdom given them: for it was situated between them and the Gadites, as appears from ver. 27.

Whom Moses smote with the princes of Midian.] Not in the war with Sihon, mentioned Numb. xlii, but in another war after that, undertaken by a particular command of God (Numb. xxxii.).

Evi and Rekem, &c.] Who are mentioned as killed in that war (Numb. xxxii. 9).

Which were dukes of Sihon.] This is the reason why they are here mentioned, because, though they lived in Midian, yet they were tributaries to Sihon; and it is likely, assisted him in his war with Israel, in which, though they then escaped, yet afterward they were slain by them.

Dwelling in the country.] It is uncertain whether he meant that Sihon had given them some place in his country to dwell in (that they might be ready on all occasions to assist him with their forces, or that they were seized in the country of Midian; whereas some of that people were unskilled, and moved from place to place, like to the ancient Nomades. However it was, they were such great men in Midian, that they are called kings, Numb. xxxii. 8, as here they are called princes; but much inferior to Sihon, whom they served only as great commanders under him. So our translators, I suppose, understood it, which made them render the Hebrew word melechi by the English word dukes; which we elsewhere translate nobles, in Ps. lxxxiii. 12.

Ver. 22. Balazam—the soothsayer.] He had been a prophet, but degenerated into a soothsayer, or diviner (see Numb. xlii. 3—7), and became a prophet again for the sake of Israel.

Did the children of Israel slay.] It is hard to give an account why he is here mentioned; unless we suppose him to have been an adviser of Sihon, and those dukes that joined with him to undertake the war; as it is certain he was of the Midianites to draw in the Israelites to commit idolatry (Numb. xxi. 17).

Ver. 23.] This river was the bounds of their country westward.

Ver. 24.] As he had done to the Reubenites, ver. 15 (see there).

Ver. 25. Jazer.] See Numb. xlii. 32, and xxxiii. 35.

26 And from Heshbon unto Ramath-mizpeh, and Betonim; and from Mahanaim unto the border of Debir;

27 And in the valley, Beth-aram, and Beth-nimrah, and Succoth, and Zaphon, the rest of the kingdom of Sihon king of Heshbon, Jordan and his border, even unto the edge of the sea of Chinnereth on the other side Jordan eastward.

28 This is the inheritance of the children of Gad after their families, the cities, and their villages.

29 ¶ And Moses gave inheritance unto the half tribe of Manasseh: and this was the possession of the half tribe of the children of Manasseh by their families.

30 And their coast was from Mahanaim, all Bashan, all the kingdom of Og king of Bashan, and all the towns of Jair, which are in Bashan, threescore cities:

31 And half Gilead, and Ashtaroth, and Edrei, cities of the kingdom of Og in Bashan, were pertaining unto the children of Machir the son of Manasseh, even to the one half of the children of Machir by their families.

The cities of Gilead.] That lay next to Jazer: for half of Gilead was given to the children of Manasseh (ver. 31).

Half the land of the children of Ammon,] The children of Israel took nothing from them, but were expressly forbidden to meddle with their country (Deut. ii. 19). He speaks therefore of that part of their country which Sihon had taken from them (as he did part of the Moabites' country, Numb. xxi. 26), and the Israelites, having vanquished Sihon, justly possessed, from Arnon to Jabbok; as Jephthah represents to the Ammonites, when they demanded this land as belonging to them: when the Israelites had enjoyed it near three hundred years (Judg. xi. 13. 22. &c.).

Unto Aroer.] This was the bounds of that country taken from the Ammonites by Sihon, from Aroer unto Jabbok; for Aroer was seated upon Arnon before mentioned (Judg. xi. 13).

That is before Rabbah;] Over against Rabbah, the chief city of the Ammonites' country: which was in the north part of it, as Aroer in the south.

Ver. 26. From Heshbon.] See ver. 17.

Unto Ramath-Mizpeh,] The same with Ramoth-Gilead, of which we read xx. 8, and many other places. It seems to be the same place which is called Mizpeh of Gilead, where Jephthah the Gileadite lived (Judg. xi. 29. 34).

Betonim;] We know no more of this place, than that it was, in all likelihood, a city in the north part of this tribe, as Ramoth-Gilead was; and Heshbon in the south.

From Mahanaim] This was a city built in that place where Jacob saw the camps of angels (Gen. xxxii. 1, 2). It was not far from the river Jabbok, as appears from that chapter, ver. 22. This city was very considerable in after-times; Ish-bosheth, who reigned over Israel after Saul, having his residence here; and David making some stay here when he fled from Absalom (2 Sam. ii. 8. 12. xvii. 27). It was one of the Levitical cities (xxi. 37).

Unto-Debir;] There was another city of this name in the tribe of Judah (xv. 15. 49). But this was (as St. Jerome and Eusebius tell us) a city of the Ammonites upon Jordan.

Ver. 27. Beth-aram, and Beth-nimrah,] Having mentioned the frontier places, he comes to speak of those cities which were in the midst of the country. And these two are mentioned, Numb. xxxii. 36. The latter of which here called Beth-nimrah (Domus Paradisum, as Bochart interprets it), is simply called Nimrah in the third verse of that chapter. And the waters of Nimrim (Isa. xv. 6), seem to have been in the same place; which Moses and Joshua say belonged to the Gadites; but Isaiah and Jeremiah call it a city of the Moabites: who, in the days of those prophets, after the ten tribes were carried captive, recovered those places (see Bochartus in his Hierozoicon, par. i. lib. iii. cap. 7).

Succoth,] Which was the place where Jacob fixed after he had passed over Jabbok, in his return from Padan-aram (Gen. xxxiii. 17).

Zaphon,] A place which St. Jerome saith lay upon the river Jordan.

The rest of the kingdom of Sihon] That is, all but that which was given to the Reubenites.

Jordan and his border,] For instance, the country bordering upon Jordan.

Even unto the edge of the sea of Chinneroth, on the other side Jordan eastward.] To the extreme part of the lake, in after times called Gennesaret; where the river Jordan came out of it on the south-east.

Ver. 28,] Which are not all named, but they were in the region here described.

Ver. 29,] The country which they conquered on the other side Jordan being too large for the Reubenites and Gadites alone, Moses bestowed what follows upon the half tribe of Manasseh; who did not desire it, as far as I can find (see Numb. xxxii. 1, 2), but were thought fit to be joined with the other two tribes, because they were very numerous (Numb. xxvi. 34), and, it is likely, had great store of cattle, as the other had.

Ver. 30. From Mahanaim,] Mentioned before, ver. 26.

All Bashan, all the kingdom of Og] This kingdom consisted of three parts (Deut. iii. 13), half of Gilead, Bashan, and the region of Argob: all which sometimes are comprehended under the name of Bashan, because it was the principal part of his kingdom.

All the towns of Jair, which are in Bashan.] This is an explication of what went before; for these towns were in the forenamed kingdom of Bashan, and not distinct from it. Why they are called "the towns of Jair," Moses gives an account, Numb. xxxii. 41.

Threescore cities,] Which were in the region of Argob, as we read Deut. iii. 4. 14.

Ver. 31. Half Gilead,] The other half that was not given to the Gadites (ver. 25). This is also but an explication of what he said at the first; for Gilead was not distinct from the kingdom of Og king of Bashan; but a part of it.

Ashtaroth, and Edrei,] Royal cities, as is commonly thought, from xii. 4.

Were pertaining unto the children of Machir the son of Manasseh.] All the posterity of Manasseh came from Machir; for he had no other son beside him (Numb. xxxii. 29), unto whose children, that is, to one half of them (as it is explained in the following words), he gave this part of that kingdom (Deut. iii. 15).

Even to the one half of the children of Machir] Among whom Jair and his posterity had the honour to be reckoned, though he was of the tribe of Judah; because he was his grandchild by his daughter, and so instrumental in conquering this country, that he had his inheritance given him here (1 Chron. ii. 21, &c. Numb. xxxiv. 41, 42).

32 These are the countries which Moses did distribute for inheritance in the plains of Moab, on the other side Jordan, by Jericho, eastward.

Ver. 33.] Which countries, with their bounds and limits, are thus particularly described, that every tribe might rest satisfied with God's appointment, and not invade their brethren's territories.

Ver. 33.] This had been noted before in this very 33 But unto the tribe of Levi Moses gave not any inheritance: the LORD God of Israel was their inheritance, as he said unto them.

chapter, ver. 14, and is again noted, xiv. 3, 4, and again, xviii. 7. Which frequent repetition was for the honour of this tribe; and that the people might have the greater regard to them, and care of them.

CHAPTER XIV.

1 The nine tribes and a half are to have their inheritance by lot. 6 Caleb by privilege obtaineth Hebron.

1 AND these are the countries which the children of Israel inherited in the land of Canaan, which Eleazar the priest, and Joshua the son of Nun, and the heads of the fathers of the tribes of the children of Israel, distributed for inheritance to them.

2 By lot was their inheritance, as the LORD commanded by the hand of Moses, for the nine tribes, and for the half tribe.

3 For Moses had given the inheritance of two tribes and an half tribe on the other side Jordan: but unto the Levites he gave none inheritance among them.

CHAP. XIV.

Ver. 1. These are the countries] viz. Those mentioned in the fifteenth, sixteenth, and following chapters; for this chapter is but a kind of preface to the division of the land.

Which the children of Israel inherited in the land of Canaan.] Which was now conquered by Joshua; as that of Sihon and Og had been by Moses.

Which Eleazar, &c. distributed for inheritance to them.] According to the command given by God to Moses, Numb. xxxiv. 17, 18, where the names of the twelve heads of the tribes, or the princes (as they are there called), are set down, ver. 19, 20, &c.

Ver. 2. By lot was their inheritance.] To take away all occasion of controversy, the matter being determined by God.

As the Lord commanded] Numb. xxvi. 55, 56. xxxiii. 54.

For the nine tribes and for the half tribe.] Who were to be provided for in the land of Canaan; as the other, it here follows, had been on the other side Jordan.

Ver. 3. For Moses had given the inheritance of two tribes and an half tribe on the other side Jordan.] This seems to argue a strong faith, which the nine tribes and half had in the promise of God, that they were contented to see their brethren put in actual possession of their inheritance, when they were only in hope of their portion.

But unto the Levites he gave none inheritance] Neither on this side Jordan, nor on the other; as was said before, xiii. 33, and mentioned here again for the reason following.

Ver. 4. For the children of Joseph were two tribes, Manasse and Ephraim.] The privilege of the first-born was transferred from Reuben to Joseph (1 Chron. v. 1, 2), from whose two sons sprung two tribes: so that there were still twelve tribes, without reckoning Levi for one (Gen. xlviii. 5, 6).

Therefore they gave no part unto the Levites] Because the children of Joseph succeeded in their room, 4 For the children of Joseph were two tribes, Manasse and Ephraim: therefore they gave no part unto the Levites in the land, save cities to dwell in, with their suburbs for their cattle and for their substance.

5 As the LORD commanded Moses, so the children of Israel did, and they divided the land.

6 ¶ Then the children of Judah came unto Joshua in Gilgal: and Caleb the son of Jephunneh the Kenezite said unto him, Thou knowest the thing that the LORD said unto Moses the man of God concerning me and thee in Kadesh-barnea.

as the Vulgar Latin translates the foregoing words; that is, to make up the number of twelve tribes.

Save cities to dwell in,] Not for a possession, as Conrad. Pellicanus observes, but only for a habitation: for they could not sell them, as their brethren might their possessions.

With their suburbs] See Numb. xxxv. 2, 3, &c.

Ver. 5. So the children of Israel did,] That is, assigned them cities and suburbs (xxi. 1, 2, &c.).

They divided the land.] That is, when Eleazar, Joshua, and the princes had divided it.

Ver. 6. Then the children of Judah] Before they went to cast lots for the division of the land, some of the children of Judah interposed in the behalf of Caleb; coming along with him, I suppose, as witnesses to the truth of what he alleged.

Came unto Joshua in Gilgal.] Where the tabernacle as yet was; for Joshua had not removed his camp from thence; and, accordingly, here the division of the land began to be made; though it was finished at Shiloh, as we read ch. xviii.

And Caleb the son of Jephunneh the Kenezite said unto him.] This shows that he was the principal person concerned in this address to Joshua; though the rest, perhaps, who came along with him, were not only witnesses to the truth of his pretensions, but came to desire Joshua to begin the division of the land: the tribe of Judah, now that the Reubenites were provided for, being the eldest of those that wanted their portion. Among whom, Caleb was not only a considerable person, but one of those princes who were appointed by God to assist in the division of the land (Numb. xxxiv. 19), and therefore would not be a judge in his own case, but have it settled before by Joshua, the supreme governor of God's people. Why he is called the Kenezite, is not easy to resolve; nor is it certain, whether Caleb or Jephunneh be called the Kenezite. But it comes to the same, whether the one or the other he so called, and the Hebrew words will bear either construction; yet St. Jerome and the LXX. take it to belong to Caleb, some of whose ancestors were called Kenez; which 7 Forty years old was I when Moses the servant of the Lord sent me from Kadesh-barnea to spy out the land; and I brought him word again as it was in mine heart.

8 Nevertheless my brethren that went up with me made the heart of the people melt: but I wholly followed the Lord my God.

9 And Moses swore on that day, saying, Surely the land whereon thy feet have trodden shall be thine inheritance, and thy children's for ever, because thou hast wholly followed the Lord my God.

10 And now, behold, the Lord hath kept me alive, as he said, these forty and five years, even since the Lord spake this word unto Moses, while the children of Israel wandered in the wilderness: and now, lo, I am this day fourscore and five years old.

11 As yet I am as strong this day as I was in the day that Moses sent me: as my strength was then, even so is my strength now, for war, both to go out, and to come in.

12 Now therefore give me this mountain, whereof the Lord spake in that day; for thou hearest in that day how the Anakims were there, and that the cities were great and fenced: if so be the Lord will be with me, then I shall be able to drive them out, as the Lord said.

13 And Joshua blessed him, and gave unto Caleb the son of Jephunneh Hebron for an inheritance.

14 Hebron therefore became the inheritance of was certainly a name very common in their family (see xv. 17, and Judg. i. 13). And there is no improbability in it, that Kenez was the father of Jephunneh, from whence both he and his son were called Kenezites.

Said unto Moses the man of God] He gives him this title, that what he ordered might be thought of greater authority, i. e. a Divine command.

Concerning me and thee in Kadesh-barnea.] Which he was confident that Joshua could not but remember, being concerned in it as well as himself (see Numb. xiv. 21. 30. 38).

Ver. 7. Forty years old was I when Moses—sent me from Kadesh-barnea] He mentions this, partly to show that Moses took care to send persons of some experience, able to make observations, and judge aright; as well as in their full strength of body, able to travel and take pains. Such, it is probable, were all the rest, as well as he; men grown up every way to maturity, both of judgment and bodily vigour.

I brought him word again as it was in mine heart.] Delivered my true opinion freely and sincerely, without either fear or flattery (Numb. xiii. 30).

Ver. 8. My brethren—made the heart of the people melt.] Numb. xiii. 31, 32. xiv. 1, &c. which did not discourage him at all from speaking the truth.

But I wholly followed the Lord] This testimony God himself gave him (Numb. xiv. 24), which he might therefore mention without any breach of modesty, it being the ground of his present petition.

Ver. 9.] See Deut. i. 34—36. This was first pronounced by God himself, and that with an oath, Numb. xiv. 21. 24 (see my notes there). Some think "his treading on it with his feet" was his taking possession, and being admitted the owner of that land; according to the present notion of civil lawyers, who will have possessio to be as much as pedis positio. But this is only a modern conceit.

Ver. 10. The Lord hath kept me alive, as he said, these forty and five years.] Thus far he had fulfilled his words, in preserving him alive till the country was conquered, wherein he promised him a certain portion; so that he wanted only actual possession of it.

While the children of Israel wandered in the wilderness.] Which was thirty and eight years.

I am this day fourscore and five years old.] It seems then that seven years were passed since they came into Canaan, before they began to divide the land; which was not till a year after the war was ended (see xi. 18). As for the time that followed between the complete division of the land, and the death of Joshua, it is not set down in this book; nor have we words in it, from whence to make a probable conjecture about it, but only those, xxiii. 1. where it is said,

"A long time after God had given them rest, Joshua waxed old," &c. Which shows it is not to be restrained to so short a time as seven, or ten years, but may rather be thought twenty, as Du Pin computes it.

Ver. 11. As yet I am as strong this day] As able, both in body and mind, to undertake, and to despatch any business, as he was forty and five years ago: which was a wonderful blessing of God, and an argument his petition should be granted; because he wanted neither courage nor strength to assault and take the place he desired, if it were still in the Canaanite's hands; or to defend and preserve it, if it were already conquered.

For war, both to go out, and to come in.] This is a repetition of what he affirmed; as is usual when a thing is certain and undoubted. Concerning this phrase, "go out and come in," see Numb. xxvii. 17. And this shows the force and efficacy of God's promise, confirmed by an oath; which (as Dr. Jackson well observes) was as remarkable in preserving his life and strength, as in bringing mortality on others, who he swore should not enter into Canaan.

Ver. 12. Give me this mountain.] The mountainous country where Hebron lay (xi. 21), which was the place promised to him, as I observed upon Numb. xiv. 24.

Thou hearest in that day] The LXX. and the Vulgar Latin refer this to what goes before, and make the sentence to be, as if he had said, "in thy hearing," God promised this country to me.

How the Anakims were there, and that the cities were great] The Vulgar makes the sense to be, "Where the Anakims are," &c. (see Numb. xiii. 23. 33, 33). He mentions cities in the plural number; for we read of two other, beside Hebron, which they possessed (xi. 21).

If so be the Lord will be with me,] These are not words of doubting; but a pious acknowledgment that nothing could be successfully enterprised, without God's gracious assistance; of which, no question, he was very confident. The Targum hath it, "If so be the Word of the Lord will be my helper:" which is the constant language of that paraphrast in all this book upon such occasions (see i. 9. 17. vi. 27. x. 42. and xxiii. 3. 10).

Then I shall be able to drive them out.] Which, whether it was done now or before, when Joshua conquered the country, is a dispute (see x. 37).

Ver. 13. Joshua blessed him,] Acknowledged his deserts, and besought God to prosper him in his undertaking, and gave his consent that he should have this country: for then God is said to bless a man, when he bestows his benefits upon him; and we do not bless others to purpose, unless we do what they desire. Accordingly it here follows.

Caleb the son of Jephnnneh the Kenezite unto this day, because that he wholly followed the LORD God of Israel.

Gave unto Caleb—Hebron for an inheritance.] That is, the country about it: for Hebron itself was a city of the priests, xxi. 11. 13. where it is expressly said, ver. 12. the fields and the villages of it were given to Caleb.

Ver. 14.] God rewarded his fidelity by this singular gift, which he bestowed upon him before the land was divided by lot.

Ver. 15. The name of Hebron before was Kirjath-arba;] See upon Gen. xxiii. 2.

Which Arba was a great man among the Anakims.] Of great authority as well as strength. So the word gadol is used, Gen. xxiv. 35. and so we call men at this day, who are of great power, by the name of mag-nates. He was the father of Anak (xv. 13. and xxi. 11), who either built this city, or fortified it, or made it his royal seat (being a kind of prince among them), and perhaps was here buried; which made it be called his city (see upon Numb. xiii. 33).

15 And the name of Hebron before was Kirjath-arba; which Arba was a great man among the Anakims. And the land had rest from war.

The land had rest from war.] Which gave them liberty to divide the land. This was said before (xi. ult.), and now repeated, perhaps to show that what is here reported concerning Caleb was done some time ago, at the end of the war; and now mentioned to show, that he held this portion of land by a Divine donation, before the country was divided by lot.

CHAPTER XV.

1 The borders of the lot of Judah. 13 Caleb's portion and conquest. 16 Othniel, for his valour, hath Achsah, Caleb's daughter, to wife. 18 She obtaineth a blessing of her father. 21 The cities of Judah. 63 The Jebusites not conquered.

1 This then was the lot of the tribe of the children of Judah by their families; even to the border of Edom the wilderness of Zin southward was the uttermost part of the south coast.

2 And their south border was from the shore of the salt sea, from the bay that looketh southward :

3 And it went out to the south side to

Maaleh-acrabbim, and passed along to Zin, and ascended up on the south side unto Kadesh-barnea, and passed along to Hezron, and went up to Adar, and fetched a compass to Karkaa :

4 From thence it passed toward Azmon, and went out unto the river of Egypt; and the goings out of that coast were at the sea: this shall be your south coast.

CHAP. XV.

Ver. 1. This then was the lot—of Judah] The first lot that came up was for the tribe of Judah; in honour of it, and that the prophecy of Jacob might be fulfilled concerning his pre-eminence among his brethren. The manner of drawing these lots, see upon Numb. xxvi. 55, 56, which it is apparent could not be done without a precedent survey of the whole country. A description of which being laid before Joshua, he, and Eleazar, and the princes, divided it into nine shares and a half, as equal as they could; considering not merely the quantity of ground, but the quality also, and goodness of the soil. This survey is not mentioned here; but it is afterward, ver. 4. and therefore it is to be supposed when they began to divide the land.

By their families;] The lot was only of so much land (bound as follows) for the whole tribe. Unto every family of which a portion was assigned by Joshua, and the rest, who were appointed to see that none were neglected, and that they had every one a just proportion. Therefore the lot for each tribe was not so unalterably fixed and determined, but that it might be enlarged or diminished; by taking from that tribe which had too much, and giving it to that which had too little (see xix. 9).

Even to the border of Edom, &c.] See Numb. xxxiv. 2. Edom lay upon the wilderness of Zin; and the lot of Judah extended as far as that, which was the south part of the land. And, indeed, the tribe of Judah (as Conr. Pellicanus observes) had half of the south part of the whole land of Canaan for their portion; as the tribes of Joseph (Ephraim and Manasseh) had the north part; with whom the rest of the tribes were intermixed, viz. Simeon, Benjamin, and Dan, with the tribe of Judah; and Issachar, Zebulun, Asher, and Naphtali, with the portion of Joseph.

Ver. 2. From the shore of the salt sea.] The foregoing verse was a short description of the length of Judah's country: now he describes the bounds of it on all quarters; and here saith, that the Salt, or Dead, sea, was the bounds of it on the south-east. For so it was, as here follows.

From the bay that looketh southward;] In the Hebrew, from the tongue; which signifies either a creek, or a promontory, as some understand it, pointing to the south-east (see Numb. xxxiv. 3).

Ver. 3. To the south side to Maaleh-acrabbim.] There was a mountain so called, from the multitude of scorpions that were there. It lay at the end of this lake (Numb. xxxiv. 4). From whence the country of Aerabateh had its name, as Bochart thinks (see Hieroz. par. ii. lib. v. cap. 29), which lay near the country of Edom (1 Macc. v. 3).

To Zin, and ascended up on the south side unto Kadesh-barnea.] This is the very description of the southern bounds of the promised land, Numb. xxxiv. 4.

To Hezron.] There is nothing said of this place in the book of Numbers; but it appears to have been a city from the twenty-fifth verse of this chapter.

Went up to Adar.] This place is mentioned in the forenamed Numb. xxxiv. 4. and called Hazar-addar. So that Hezron lay between Kadesh-barnea and this town.

Fetched a compass to Karkaa.] This place is not mentioned in Numbers, or any where else; but lay beyond Adar, not in a right line, but bending towards the west.

Ver. 4. Toward Azmon.] This is mentioned in the forenamed place, Numb. xxxiv. 4.

The goings out of that coast were at the sea.] That is, the Mediterranean sea (see Numb. xxxiv. 5).

This shall be your south coast.] From the tongue of the Salt sea to the Mediterranean.

5 And the east border was the salt sea, even unto the end of Jordan. And their border in the north quarter was from the bay of the sea at the uttermost part of Jordan :

6 And the border went up to Beth-hogla, and passed along by the north of Beth-arabah ; and the border went up to the stone of Bohan the son of Reuben :

7 And the border went up toward Debir from the valley of Achor, and so northward, looking toward Gilgal, that is before the going up to Adummim, which is on the south side of the river ; and the border passed toward the waters of En-shemesh, and the goings out thereof were at En-rogel :

8 And the border went up by the valley of the son of Hinnom unto the south side of the Jebusite ; the same is Jerusalem : and the border went up to the top of the mountain that lieth before the valley of Hinnom westward, which is at the end of the valley of the giants northward :

9 And the border was drawn from the top of the hill unto the fountain of the water of Nephthoah, and went out to the cities of mount Ephron ; and the border was drawn to Baalah, which is Kirjath-jearim :

10 And the border compassed from Baalah westward unto mount Seir, and passed along unto the side of mount Jearim, which is Chesalon, on the north side, and went down to Beth-shemesh, and passed on to Timnah :

11 And the border went out unto the side of

Ver. 5. The east border was the salt sea, even unto the end of Jordan.] Having described the southern limits, he sets down the eastern ; which, beginning where the southern did, at the tongue of the Salt sea, reached to the other end of it, where Jordan falls into this sea. So that the whole length of this sea, from one end of it to the other, was the eastern bounds of Judah's country.

Their border in the north quarter was from the bay of the sea at the uppermost part of Jordan.] It had its beginning where the eastern border ended, viz. at the mouth of Jordan, where it runs into the Salt sea.

Ver. 6. To Beth-hogla,] A city in the tribe of Benjamin (xviii. 21).

By the north of Beth-arabah ;] Another city in the same tribe (xviii. 21), though there was one in this tribe of the same name (ver. 61. of this chapter), which some take to be the same city, which lay in the frontier of both tribes.

The border] That is, this northern border.

Went up to the stone of Bohan the son of Reuben.] We find mention made of this stone again in xviii. 17. where he speaks of the bounds of the tribe of Benjamin. It was but lately laid here, since the Israelites came into this country ; but by whom, or of what it was a monument, is not known. It is certain Bohan did not dwell here ; for the Reubenites had their portion on the other side of Jordan : but perhaps he performed some famous exploit in this place, or died and was buried here : being one of those that came over Jordan to assist their brethren in the conquest of Canaan.

Ver. 7. Toward Debir] Which is mentioned in no other place : for it is not the same with that Debir in ver. 15. which was in the south near Hebron, but this in the northern parts.

From the valley of Achor,] Mentioned vii. 24. 26.

So northward, looking toward Gilgal,] Having Gilgal on the north of it. Which is to be understood, not of that Gilgal near Jericho, but of that place called Gelliloth, xviii. 17, which was distant from thence, as appears by what follows.

Before the going up to Adummim,] A place which stood upon a rising ground, which some think was in the tribe of Judah, others of Benjamin.

On the south side of the river :] Or of the brook, which some take to be the brook Cedron.

Toward the waters of En-shemesh, and the goings out thereof were at En-rogel :] This place, it is evident (1 Kings i. 9), was near Jerusalem ; which shows that Gilgal before mentioned was not the place where they were now encamped.

Ver. 8. The border went up] For it was an ascent from the Salt sea to this country ; especially when they came nigh to this place.

By the valley of the son of Hinnom] A famous place on the east side of Jerusalem ; and so delightfully shady, that it invited them to idolatrous worship in this valley, whereby it became infamous (2 Kings xxiii. 10. Jer. vii. 32). Hinnom, in all probability, was some eminent person, in ancient times, who was the owner of this valley : for it is sometimes called the valley "of the children of Hinnom," which shows his posterity were planted here. After it was polluted by idolatry, it became a place where they threw all their filth, and excrements, and dead carcasses, and where there was a continual fire, the Jews say, to burn bones, and such sordid things as were thrown here ; from whence, they think, it became the name for hell-fire.

Of the Jebusite ;] i. e. The city of the Jebusites.

The same is Jerusalem ;] Which is called Jebusi, in the last verse of the eighteenth chapter, and Jebus, Judg. xix. 10. Especially that part of it fortified by the Jebusites, which was called Mount Sion, and lay on the south of Jerusalem.

To the top of the mountain] Which is thought to be Mount Moriah.

That lieth before the valley of Hinnom westward,] It was westward to the valley of Hinnom ; and so had that valley on the east of it.

At the end of the valley of the giants northward ;] Which mountain had on the north part the valley of Rephaim (as the word is in the Hebrew), which was in the tribe of Judah extending itself from Mount Moriah as far as Bethlehem, as Josephus tells us.

Ver. 9. Unto the fountain of the water of Nephthoah,] Where this fountain, or well of water was, cannot be known ; for it is nowhere mentioned but here, and in xviii. 15.

Mount Ephron ;] This place also is unknown ; for it cannot be in the tribe of Ephraim, mentioned 1 Chron. xiii. 19.

To Baalah, which is Kirjath-jearim :] Called ver. 60, and xviii. 14, Kirjath-Baal ; there being, it is likely, a temple of Baal in this place, whose name the Israelites changed into Kirjath-jearim ; which signifies urbs sylvorum, because of the goodly trees hereabouts, which made it the fitter for idolatrous uses.

Ver. 10. Compassed from Baalah westward] Not in a direct line, but bending towards the west.

Unto Mount Seir,] Not that mount belonging to the Edomites, but another of that name.

Unto the side of mount Jearim, which is Chesalon, on the north side,] This was a woody country, as appears from the name of this mountain, and from Mount Seir also ; which signifies as much as hairy.

To Beth-Shemesh,] A known place in the tribe of Judah, and a city of the priests (xxi. 16).

Ekron northward: and the border was drawn to Shieron, and passed along to mount Baalah, and went out unto Jabneel; and the goings out of the border were at the sea.

12 And the west border was to the great sea, and the coast thereof. This is the coast of the children of Judah round about according to their families.

13 ¶ And unto Caleb the son of Jephunneh he gave a part among the children of Judah, according to the commandment of the Lord to Joshua, even the city of Arba the father of Anak, which city is Hebron.

To Timnah.] Another city in the same tribe (ver. 17), but afterward given to the tribe of Dan (xix. 43).

Ver. 11. Unto the side of Ekron northward.] This city belonged to the Philistines; but fell to the lot of Judah, as did also Ashdod and Gaza, ver. 45—47. But afterward Ekron was given to the Danites, as the forenamed place tells us, xix. 43.

Drawn to Shieron, and passed along to Mount Baalah, and went out unto Jabneel.] It cannot now be known where these three places were; only it appears by what follows, that they were not far from the coast of the Philistines.

The goings out of the border were at the sea.] That is, the northern border ended at the Mediterranean Sea; where there was a city called Jamnia; which some think the same with Jabneel.

Ver. 12. To the great sea, and the coast thereof.] All along that coast of the Mediterranean, unto the river of Egypt, where the west border met with the southern (ver. 4).

This is the coast of the children of Judah round about.] That is, thus their lot was bounded on all sides, in the first draught of it. Which being afterward found too large, it was contracted into a narrower compass, that more room might be made for the tribe of Simeon, who had part of this lot given them; as some other places were added out of it, to the tribes of Benjamin and Dan; as will appear afterward.

Ver. 13. Unto Caleb—he gave a part among the children of Judah.] Or rather, he (that is, Joshua) had given him a part in this country, which by lot fell to the tribe of Judah. See the foregoing chapter, xiv. 6, 7, &c. where we read how Caleb petitioned for it, and founded his petition on a grant made to him of it, long ago, by God himself.

According to the commandment of the Lord to Joshua.] God promised it by Moses; and it appears from these words, that Joshua had an order from God to make it good.

Even the city of Arba the father of Anak, which city is Hebron.] See xiv. 15. This is here again particularly remembered, and an addition made to it, for this reason; that Joshua having described the bounds of the country of Judah, and intended to set down the particular cities which were included in it, and distributed among them (as he had just before said, ver. 12), “according to their families;” it might be remembered, that there were two cities, or rather the territories about them, given to two families, antecedent to this distribution made by him, Eleazar, and the princes. Which being a matter fit to remain for ever upon record, and to be known to all posterity, he inserts it here at large, in this description of the portion of Judah; of which, it is likely, every family of that tribe had a map in their houses; that they knowing their limits might both preserve them, and keep within them.

Ver. 14. Caleb drove thence] Not by his own power

14 And Caleb drove thence the three sons of Anak, Sheshai, and Ahiman, and Talmi, the children of Anak.

15 And he went up thence to the inhabitants of Debir: and the name of Debir before was Kirjath-sepher.

16 ¶ And Caleb said, He that smiteth Kirjath-sepher, and taketh it, to him will I give Achsah my daughter to wife.

17 And Othniel the son of Kenaz, the brother of Caleb, took it: and he gave him Achsah his daughter to wife.

18 And it came to pass, as she came unto him, alone, but by the confederate army of the tribe of Judah and Simeon (Judg. i. 3, 9, &c.), in which, it is probable, he had a principal command; and led on that party which assaulted this city (see x. 36, 37. xi. 21).

The three sons of Anak, Sheshai, and Ahiman, and Talmi.] Whom he had seen five and forty years ago, and was not at all affrighted at them (see Numb. xiii. 22, and Judg. i. 10, &c.).

Ver. 15. The inhabitants of Debir.] See x. 38, 39.

The name of Debir before was Kirjath-sepher.] See Judg. i. 11, 12. It is called also Kirjath-Sanna, ver. 49, of this chapter; which hath the same signification: for sunna (as Bochart observes, lib. ii. Canaan, cap. 17), in the Arabic language, is learning, or the law. The Chaldee there calls it Kirjath-arche; which he translates urbis archivorum, “the city where the ancient records of these nations were kept.” All which shows the conjecture of some very learned men is not improbable, who think this city in those times was the seat of learning, as Athens was among the Greeks in future ages: insomuch, that Grotius takes this city to be the same with that which Xenophon calls Φοινίκιον γυμνάσιον, “the school of the Phœnicians.” But, as the word γυμνάσιον in Xenophon’s days did not signify a school of learning, but a place designed for exercises of the body; so we do not read of any famous place in that country, to which men resorted in his time for study.

Ver. 16. Caleb said,] Made proclamation, I suppose, throughout the army, which he led against Debir.

He that smiteth Kirjath-sepher, and taketh it,] Assaults this fortress, and possesseth himself of it.

To him will I give Achsah my daughter to wife.] With this place, I suppose, for her dowry.

Ver. 17. Othniel—the brother of Caleb, took it.] He was stirred up by the Spirit of God, it is probable (as he was when he was made judge of Israel, Judg. iii. 9, 10), to attack this place with an extraordinary courage, in which the providence of God appeared (as Caleb hoped it would) in bestowing his daughter upon a worthy person, and keeping the inheritance in his own tribe.

He gave him Achsah his daughter to wife.] Some think this was not lawful, because he was her uncle: but this is a mistake, for Othniel was not Caleb’s brother, but Kenaz, who was Othniel’s father. For Caleb is constantly called the son of Jephunneh, and Othniel the son of Kenaz. Therefore they had not the same father, but were very near of kin; which is all the word brother signifies in many places.

Ver. 18. As she came unto him,] As she was brought from her father’s house to her husband’s; according to the accustomed manner (see Selden, in his Uxor. Hebr. lib. ii. cap. 11).

That she moved him to ask of her father a field:] Desired her husband, unto whom she thought her father at this time would deny nothing, to bestow a that she moved him to ask of her father a field : and she lighted off her ass ; and Caleb said unto her, What wouldest thou ?

19 Who answered, Give me a blessing ; for thou hast given me a south land ; give me also springs of water. And he gave her the upper springs, and the nether springs.

20 This is the inheritance of the tribe of the children of Judah according to their families.

21 And the uttermost cities of the tribe of the children of Judah toward the coast of Edom southward were Kabzeel, and Eder, and Jagur,

22 And Kinah, and Dimonah, and Adadah,

23 And Kedesh, and Hazor, and Ithnan,

24 Ziph, and Telem, and Bealoth,

25 And Hazor, Hadattah, and Kerioth, and Hezron, which is Hazor, 26 Amam, and Shema, and Moladah,

27 And Hazar-gaddah, and Heshmon, and Beth-palet,

28 And Hazar-shual, and Beer-sheba, and Bizjothajal,

29 Baalah, and Iim, and Azem,

30 And Etlolad, and Chesil, and Hormah,

31 And Ziklag, and Madmannah, and Sansannah,

32 And Lebaoth, and Shilhim, and Ain, and Rimmon : all the cities are twenty and nine, with their villages :

33 And in the valley, Eshtaol, and Zoreah, and Ashuah,

34 And Zanoah, and En-gannim, Tappuah, and Enam,

35 Jarmuth, and Adullam, Socoh, and Azekah,

36 And Sharaim, and Adithaim, and Gederah, and Gederothaim ; fourteen cities with their villages :

37 Zenan, and Hadashah, and Migdal-gad,

38 And Dilean, and Mizpeh, and Joktheel, field upon her. Or, perhaps, she moved him to give her leave to ask it of her father ; as she did, either by his permission, or by his desire ; who might tell her, it was more proper for her to ask it than himself.

She lighted off her ass ;] Upon which they rode then in those countries ; having no horses, nor mules, till aftertimes. And her lighting down was in reverence to her father ; unto whom she addressed herself in an humble posture.

Caleb said unto her, What wouldest thou ?] He seems to have prevented her request ; knowing, by her posture, she had something to desire of him. But Ludov. De Dieu takes it quite otherwise ; that when she came to her husband's house, she did not alight from her ass but continued still sitting upon it. Which her father observing, and asking her the reason, why she did not come down and go to her husband ; she told him, she had first a thing to beg of him. And thus both the LXX. and the Vulgar translate it, as if she did not alight, but sighed and cried, εξ τοῦ ἄου, from the ass on which she sat.

Ver. 19. Give me a blessing ;] Bestow a gift upon me, as the word blessing is used, Gen. xxxiii. 11, or make my happiness complete.

For thou hast given me a south land ;] A dry country ; being both mountainous and towards the south ; that is, towards the deserts of Arabia, from whence very hot and scorching winds were wont to blow.

Give me also springs of water.] A field hard by, wherein were springs of water : for it was not merely the springs she begged, but the ground in which they were ; as appears from the foregoing verse, where she moved her husband to ask a field.

He gave her the upper—and the nether springs.] Whereby that dry ground might be watered and made fruitful. He seems to have given her more than she desired ; not only those springs that were in the mountain, but those which were below also. That so neither the rising ground, nor the plain, might want water ; as Arius Montanus expounds it.

Ver. 20.] Now follows an account of the cities within the lot of this tribe ; which were assigned to their several families, after Hebron, which was the principal of them (for here David reigned over the tribe of Judah alone seven years), was given to Caleb. Which the Jews generally think he did not get into his possession till after the death of Joshua ; as is related in the book of Judges (see there, i. 11—13, &c.).

Ver. 21. The uttermost cities—of Judah] Those that were in the confines ; for he doth not seem to number all that were in the heart of the country. So the Jews think, though the truth is, as will appear in the following part of the chapter, he only begins with the outmost cities, but afterward proceeds to those that were in the midst of the country.

Toward the coast of Edom southward] He begins with those that lay on the south side of the country ; which was the border he first described, ver. 1, 2.

Kabzeel,] Where that valiant person Benajah was born, who smote two lion-like men of Moab (1 Chron. xi. 22).

Eder,] Which Eusebius calls Ἐδραί. But he hath no more to say of it ; nor of Jagur, and the rest that follow, but that they were in the tribe of Judah ; nor shall I go about to inquire further after every particular city mentioned ; the number of which is summed up ver. 32.

Ver. 32. All the cities are twenty and nine, with their villages ;] If the foregoing places be told, there are no less than thirty and eight of them. But there were only twenty and nine of them (as some solve the difficulty), that could be called cities ; the other being only villages. Or, the meaning is (as the Jews generally think) that twenty and nine only belonged to the tribe of Judah ; the rest being afterward given to the tribe of Simeon, as we find in the nineteenth chapter ; where nine of these very cities here mentioned are said to be in that tribe, viz. Beer-sheba, Moladah, Hazar-shual, Baalah, Azem, Hormah, Ziklag, Ain, and Rimmon : which nine, with the twenty and nine here set down as the sum total make just thirty and eight. And this seems to be the truer account, because the villages of other cities are mentioned ver. 36 and 41, and yet none of them set down by name, as is supposed in the first interpretation of these words.

Ver. 33. In the valley,] Or in the plain below the mountains : but which way I shall not examine ; because the geography of this country will be done, I hope, by a better hand.

Ver. 36. Fourteen cities] There are fifteen in all, if we take the last two for distinct cities. But in all probability there might be one, called indifferently Gederah, or (as we translate it in the margin) Gederothaim. Perhaps there might be a double city, the old and the new ; or Gederothaim was an appendix to Gederah, as the borough of Southwark is to the city of London.

Ver. 37. Zenan, and Hadashah, &c.] I suppose

Japhleti, unto the coast of Beth-horon the nether, and to Gezer: and the goings out thereof are at the sea.

4 So the children of Joseph, Manasseh and Ephraim, took their inheritance.

5 ¶ And the border of the children of Ephraim according to their families was thus: even the border of their inheritance on the east side was Ataroth-addar, unto Beth-horon the upper;

6 And the border went out toward the sea to Michmethah on the north side; and the border went about eastward unto Taanath-shiloh, and passed by it on the east to Janohah;

7 And it went down from Janohah to Ataroth, a neighbouring city to Joppa, Azotus, and Jamnia (see his annot. upon lib. xvi. Strabonis, p. 261, 262).

The goings out thereof are at the sea.] The Vulgar hath it, "at the great sea;" which is certainly here meant; this being a short description of the lot of this tribe from Jordan on the east to the Mediterranean on the west.

Ver. 4.] According to the following measures. Which give a more particular account of what is before said in general.

Ver. 4. The border of the children of Ephraim] And first, he shows what was given to Ephraim, reserving the description of Manasseh's portion to the next chapter.

On the east side] The north-east. For he describes, though grossly, only the breadth of this lot from south to north.

Was Ataroth-addar, unto Beth-horon the upper;] The first of those was in the south, and the latter in the north.

Ver. 6. Toward the sea] From Beth-horon the upper this northern border went on one side westward towards the Mediterranean.

To Michmethah on the north side;] And on the other side eastward towards Jordan. This is very obscurely expressed; but it appears, from what follows, it must be thus interpreted.

About eastward unto Taanath-shiloh;] Still proceeded further eastward unto this place; the name of which only is now known.

Passed by it on the east to Janohah;] Another place easterly, of which we are now ignorant. For there are no records left to make us understand whereabouts in the east it was situated; which was perfectly understood when this country was inhabited by the Ephraimites.

Ver. 7. It went down from Janohah—and came to Jericho;] Not to the very city, for that belonged to Benjamin; but to the country adjoining.

Went out at Jordan;] Which was the eastern bounds of this country.

Ver. 8. From Tappuah westward unto the river Kanah;] He returns to describe the length of it from east to west; if the river or brook Kanah be the same with the brook Cherith, mentioned 1 Kings xvii. 3. And so not only Adricomius understands it, but that great man Bochartus: who observes, it was called the brook Cherith, from the Hebrew word cara, which signifies to eat or feed, because here God commanded the ravens to feed Elijah; and it was called Kanah, from the multitude of reeds which grew there (and so the Vulgar here translates it, the valley of reeds), in which it may be supposed Elijah lay hid (Hierozoic. par. ii. lib. ii. cap. 14). But there is so much to be objected against this situation of the brook Kanah, that I must leave it in suspense whether it were in the east, or in the west; and confess with Conradus Pellicanus that as none of the Hebrews or Latins have and to Naarath, and came to Jericho, and went out at Jordan.

8 The border went out from Tappuah westward unto the river Kanah; and the goings out thereof were at the sea. This is the inheritance of the tribe of the children of Ephraim by their families.

9 And the separate cities for the children of Ephraim were among the inheritance of the children of Manasseh, all the cities with their villages.

10 And they drave not out the Canaanites that dwelt in Gezer: but the Canaanites dwell among the Ephraimites unto this day, and serve under tribute.

given a satisfactory account of these last four verses, so I do not pretend to it.

At the sea.] Where sea alone is mentioned, it is commonly understood to signify the Mediterranean; which quite overthrows the opinion, which makes Kanah the same with Cherith. But the Vulgar here took it for the Salt sea (adding the word salissimum) which favours the forenamed opinion.

This is the inheritance of—Ephraim] A gross description of it.

Ver. 9.] What these separate cities were cannot now be known, because we have not a particular account given of all the cities of this tribe (as we had of Judah), but only of those which were the limits of their country. But they seem to have been some cities in the tribe of Manasseh, which were inhabited by the children of Ephraim, though the territories about them belonged to the Manassites, and were occupied by them (see xvii. 8, 9).

Ver. 10. They drave not out the Canaanites that dwell in Gezer: but the Canaanites dwell among the Ephraimites] The inhabitants of Gezer were properly Canaanites; who dwelt upon the sea coast, where Gezer was situated (see ver. 3). This is mentioned also Judg. i. 29.

Serve under tribute.] They so far subdued them, as to make them tributaries: and, some fancy, imposed on them the precepts of the sons of Noah. But they ought to have destroyed them, and were forbidden to make peace with them upon any conditions (see Judg. ii. 1—3). Unless Grotius' conjecture be true, that the inhabitants of Gezer submitted and accepted the terms of peace, which Joshua was bound to offer them, before he began the war as the Gergashites, he thinks, also did; who remained even in our Saviour's time: for they delivered up themselves at the first summons to surrender; which is the reason, he imagines, that they are omitted in the enumeration of their enemies, both in xi. 1, and in Deut. xx. 17 (see his annot. on his thirteenth chapter of the second book De Jure Belli et Pacis, sect. 4).

This city, and the people of it, were destroyed in Solomon's time by Pharaoh, king of Egypt: who made a present of it to his daughter, Solomon's wife; who thereupon rebuilt it (1 Kings ix. 16, 17). Till then the Canaanites lived in it; from whence Spinoza would have it concluded, that this book was not written by Joshua, because we find the same thing recorded in the book of Judges (i. 29), which is of a later date. But this is a very frivolous cavil; for, as Huetius well observes, if an historian should have said in the life of Tiberius the Germans were not destroyed, the same might, in like manner, have been said in the life of Vespasian; and just so, when Joshua saith the Gezerites were not cut off by the Ephraimites, it did not hinder him that wrote in the following age from saying the same; because they still remained in the possession of their ancient habitation.

CHAPTER XVII.

1 The lot of Manasseh. 7 His coast. 12 The Canaanites not driven out. 14 The children of Joseph obtain another lot.

1 THERE was also a lot for the tribe of Manasseh; for he was the firstborn of Joseph; to wit, for Machir the firstborn of Manasseh, the father of Gilead: because he was a man of war, therefore he had Gilead and Bashan.

2 There was also a lot for the rest of the children of Manasseh by their families; for the children of Abiezer, and for the children of Helek, and for the children of Asriel, and for the children of Shechem, and for the children of Hopher, and for the children of Shemida: these were the male children of Manasseh the son of Joseph by their families.

3 ¶ But Zelophehad, the son of Hopher, the son of Gilead, the son of Machir, the son of Manasseh, had no sons, but daughters: and these are the names of his daughters, Mahlah, and Noah, Hoglah, Milcah, and Tirzah.

4 And they came near before Eleazar the priest, and before Joshua the son of Nun, and before the princes, saying, The Lord commanded Moses to give us an inheritance among our brethren. Therefore according to the commandment of the Lord he gave them an inheritance among the brethren of their father.

5 And there fell ten portions to Manasseh, beside the land of Gilead and Bashan, which were on the other side Jordan;

6 Because the daughters of Manasseh had an inheritance among his sons: and the rest of Manasseh's sons had the land of Gilead.

7 ¶ And the coast of Manasseh was from Asher to Michmethah, that lieth before Shechem; and the border went along the right hand unto the inhabitants of En-tappuah.

8 Now Manasseh had the land of Tappuah:

CHAP. XVII.

Ver. 1. There was also a lot for—Manasseh;] That half of it which had no portion on the other side Jordan.

For he was the firstborn of Joseph;] I cannot make any sense of this; and therefore think the participle ki should be translated though, not for. And then the meaning is plain enough, that the lot of Manasseh came up after that of Ephraim (not before it), though he was the first-born of Joseph; for Jacob had preferred Ephraim before him (Gen. xlviii. 19, 20).

For Machir the firstborn of Manasseh;] And his only son, from whom sprang such a multitude, that there was no room for them all on the other side Jordan; but part of them were to be disposed of here.

Father of Gilead:] Numb. xxvi. 29.

Because he was a man of war;] This is generally thought to relate to Machir; who had done some famous exploits in the skirmishes they had with some neighbouring people while they were in Egypt (see I Chron. vii. 21, 22), for he was not alive to fight when they came to Canaan.

He had Gilead and Bashan.] A share in this country; for some of it was given to the Reubenites and Gadites, xiii. 25, but the Gileadites were also planted here (ver. 31); for, inheriting the valour of their progenitor, they were fit to defend this frontier country.

Ver. 2. There was also a lot for the rest of the children of Manasseh] A great part of the Manassites being disposed of before they passed over Jordan, now follows the lot which fell to the rest, whose several families he names.

For the children of Abiezer, &c.] These six families descended from Gilead, as we read Numb. xxvi. 30, &c. Where the first of them, who is here called Abiezer, is there called Jeezer.

These were the male children of Manasseh] He uses the expression of male children to introduce what follows concerning the females. And they are called "the children of Manasseh," because they inherited in his right; being families descended from him (see Selden, De Successionibus, cap. 22.)

Ver. 3. But Zelophehad, &c.] Here he recites their pedigree from the son of Joseph.

Had no sons, but daughters:] And so could not make a family in Manasseh; and consequently have no share in the land.

Mahlah, and Noah;] See Numb. xxvi. 33.

Ver. 4. They came near before Eleazar the priest, &c.] To whom God had committed the care of dividing the several lots (xiv. 1 Numb. xxxiv. 17, 18.)

Saying;] See Numb. xxvii. 6, 7.

According to the commandment of the Lord he gave them an inheritance] Or, an inheritance was given them according to this commandment of God to Moses, by Eleazar and Joshua, and the rest who were appointed to divide the land. For after the lot had determined what land every tribe should have, Eleazar, Joshua, and the princes, considered how many families there were in the tribe, and how large they were; and accordingly divided it among them. So Numb. xxvi. 55, 56, imports.

Ver. 5. There fell ten portions to Manasseh;] For there were six portions given to six sons: but the portion of Hopher, the last of them, being divided into five parts among his five daughters, there were ten portions in all (see Selden, De Succession. cap. 23). Which ten portions being assigned to so many families, Eleazar, Joshua, and the princes were not concerned any further in dividing these ten portions into lesser among several households; but that, I suppose, they agreed among themselves.

Beside the land of Gilead and Bashan;] Mentioned before, ver. 1.

Ver. 6. Because the daughters of Manasseh] That is, of Zelophehad, descended from Manasseh.

Had an inheritance among his sons:] Being considered as heirs to their father.

The rest of Manasseh's sons] Which were not of the six families before mentioned.

Had the land of Gilead.] On the other side Jordan, as hath been often said; and is again repeated, to prevent all contentions that might arise about their portions.

Ver. 7. The coast of Manasseh was from Asher to Michmethah,] This was the south border, which went from a city called Asher, to another called Michmethah; which was over against a city in the tribe of Ephraim, called Shechem.

but Tappuah on the border of Manasseh belonged to the children of Ephraim;

9 And the coast descended unto the river Kanah, southward of the river: these cities of Ephraim are among the cities of Manasseh: the coast of Manasseh also was on the north side of the river, and the outgoings of it were at the sea:

10 Southward it was Ephraim's, and northward it was Manasseh's, and the sea is his border; and they met together in Asher on the north, and in Issachar on the east.

11 ¶ And Manasseh had in Issachar and in Asher Beth-shean and her towns, and Ibleam and her towns, and the inhabitants of Dor and her towns, and the inhabitants of En-dor and her towns, and the inhabitants of Taanach and her towns, and the inhabitants of Megiddo and her towns, even three countries.

12 Yet the children of Manasseh could not drive out the inhabitants of those cities; but the Canaanites would dwell in that land.

13 Yet it came to pass, when the children of Israel were waxen strong, that they put the Canaanites to tribute; but did not utterly drive them out.

14 And the children of Joseph spake unto Joshua, saying, Why hast thou given me but one lot and one portion to inherit, seeing I am a great people, forasmuch as the LORD hath blessed me hitherto?

15 And Joshua answered them, If thou be a great people, then get thee up to the wood country, and cut down for thyself there in the land of

On the right hand unto the inhabitants of En-tappuah.] And so to those that lived in the land of Tappuah, leaving Tappuah itself on the right hand.

Ver. 8. Manasseh had the land of Tappuah.] All the territory adjoining to this city belonged to the tribe of Manasseh.

But Tappuah on the border of Manasseh belonged to —Ephraim:] But the city itself, which lay on the confines of their country, was one of those separated cities spoken of in the foregoing chapter (ver. 9), in which the children of Ephraim dwelt.

Ver. 9. The coast descended unto the river Kanah,] Concerning this place, see ver. 8, of the foregoing chapter.

These cities of Ephraim are among the cities of Manasseh:] That is, the cities on the coast before mentioned were inhabited by the Ephraimites, as well as Tappuah; though they were in the tribe of Manasseh. For these two tribes were nearer of kin than any other; and so greater friendship was intended to be established between them.

The coast of Manasseh also was on the north side of the river.] By the coast of Manasseh, is meant the cities inhabited by the Manassites; which were all on the north side of this river. As all those on the south side of it, though belonging to the Manassites, were inhabited by the children of Ephraim.

The outgoings of it were at the sea:] The coast mentioned in the beginning of the verse, ended at the Mediterranean Sea.

Ver. 10. Southward it was Ephraim's, and northward it was Manasseh's.] These words express how these two tribes lay, with respect to each other; Ephraim on the south, and Manasseh on the north: and both bounded on the west by the Mediterranean.

They met together in Asher on the north, and in Issachar on the east.] Though on the south the tribe of Manasseh was wholly joined to the tribe of Ephraim, yet on the north-west, towards the great sea, it had the tribe of Asher on the confines of it; and on the east (towards Jordan and the sea of Tiberias) the tribe of Issachar. So Conradus Pellicanus rightly explains these words. For both the tribes of Ephraim and Manasseh could not touch these other tribes.

Ver. 11. Manasseh had in Issachar and in Asher] As Ephraim had some towns in the tribe of Manasseh so Manasseh had some in the tribes of Issachar and Asher, unto whom, in the north-west, and the east, they were near neighbours.

Beth-shean and her towns,] This was a place not far from the sea of Tiberias before mentioned, and near Jordan.

Ibleam and her towns,] It appears by 2 Kings ix.

27, that it was not far from Megiddo, mentioned in the latter end of this verse.

The inhabitants of Dor and her towns,] Concerning Dor, see xi. 2, whose inhabitants, (as also those of the other cities following) are here mentioned; because, it seems they possessed the people (whom they ought to have destroyed), as well as their cities and towns, making them their slaves.

En-dor] The city whither Saul went to consult with the witch. It was not far from Mount Tabor; which was in the confines of the tribe of Issachar.

Taanach] This city lay not far from the other; and was one of those given to the Levites (xxi. 25).

Megiddo] This was near the former, not far from the brook Kishon (Judg. v. 19).

Even three countries.] Or rather, three parts of these countries before mentioned.

Ver. 12. Yet the children of Manasseh could not drive out the inhabitants of those cities:] Through want of faith in God, and of zeal to perform his commands; which made them slack in their attempts to expel the inhabitants of this country.

But the Canaanites would dwell in that land.] Finding themselves strong enough to maintain it, against such feeble endeavours as they used to conquer it.

Ver. 13. When the children of Israel were waxen strong, that they put the Canaanites to tribute:] When they were more numerous and expert in war, not only the Manassites, but they of other tribes also, brought the Canaanites to be tributaries to them.

But did not utterly drive them out.] In which they grievously offended against God's command (Deut. xx. 16—18).

Ver. 14. The children of Joseph spake unto Joshua,] Both they of Ephraim, and they of Manasseh (ver. 17).

Saying, Why hast thou given me but one lot and one portion] They were discontented with their lot, which they thought too straight for them; because they were so very numerous, that the country which was assigned them was little enough for one of them.

The Lord hath blessed me hitherto?] Multiplied them exceedingly, as appears from Numb. xxvi. 34, 37.

Ver. 15. If thou be a great people,] Though he was their flesh and blood, yet Joshua would not humour them; but returns their argument upon them, that since they were so great a people, they should do as here follows.

Then get thee up to the wood country,] Which was in the highlands (ver. 18), which was full of trees; for Aba, as Bochart observes, signifies very thick woods (lib. ii. Canaan, cap. 9).

Cut down for thyself there] Make it habitable. In the land of the Perizzites] Who were a rough the Perizzites and of the giants, if mount Ephraim be too narrow for thee.

16 And the children of Joseph said, The hill is not enough for us : and all the Canaanites that dwell in the land of the valley have chariots of iron, both they who are of Beth-shean and her towns, and they who are of the valley of Jezreel.

17 And Joshua spake unto the house of Jouncivilized people, living in these mountainous forests, as Bochart gathers from this place; and thinks they had their name from thence. Because they did not live in cities and towns, but in those Pagi that were in the woods; which the Hebrews call Pherazoth; from whence the Pagani, the people who lived in those places, where called Pherazim : lib. iv. Phaleg. cap. 36.

[Of the giants,] There were some of the Rephaim (as the Hebrew word is) still remaining here; or it was a place where they had been wont to dwell.

[If mount Ephraim be too narrow for thee.] If that noble mount which was given them for their portion, with the rest of the land before mentioned (which is included in the name of Mount Ephraim, the principal part being put for the whole) did not afford them room enough, he exhorts them to enlarge their bounds, by taking in those woodlands before mentioned.

Ver. 16. The hill is not enough for us.] They still insisted, that if they could get possession of the woody mountain, and destroy all the inhabitants, and cut down all the trees, it would not be sufficient to contain them.

All the Canaanites—of the valley] But if it would, they further allege, they had no hope to conquer it; because, before they could come at it, they must encounter those that lived in the valley below it, who were too strong for them.

Have chariots of iron.] Before which they were not able to stand : for he doth not mean chariots made of iron, but armed with iron; which the ancients called currus falcati, in Greek δρεκαιοφόρος, having a kind of scythes of two cubits fastened to long axle-trees on both wheels; which being driven swiftly through a body of men, made great slaughter, mowing them down like grass or corn. Xenophon gives a description of them in his Cyropædia, lib. vi. and Quintus Curtius, lib. iv. cap. 9. Vegetius also, De Re Mili-

seph, even to Ephraim and to Manasseh, saying; Thou art a great people, and hast great power; thou shalt not have one lot only :

18 But the mountain shall be thine; for it is a wood, and thou shalt cut it down : and the outgoings of it shall be thine : for thou shalt drive out the Canaanites, though they have iron chariots, and though they be strong.

tari, lib. iii. cap. 24. Bonfrerius hath heaped up abundance on this subject; and so hath Joh. Conradus Dietericus in his Antiq. Biblicæ, p. 329, &c. where he observes Xenophon imagined Cyrus to have been the inventor of these chariots; which had been in use among the Canaanites eight hundred years before.

Both they who are of Beth-shean and Jezreel.] Which cities, it seems, lay near to this mountain, unto which Joshua directed them, and both of them possessed by the Canaanites.

Ver. 17. Joshua spake unto the house of Joseph.] He was not moved, by their objections, from his resolution; but told them,

Thou art a great people, and hast great power.] That, by their own confession, they were very numerous, and consequently of great power.

Thou shalt not have one lot only.] And therefore need not be straitened in their habitation; which they said was not sufficient for one tribe.

Ver. 18. The mountain shall be thine.] For they should have the mountain added to their portion; which he could not enlarge any other way, it being settled by a Divine decree.

For it is a wood, and thou shalt cut it down.] Or, though it be a wood, yet they could cut it down, and grub it up; and then it would afford a commodious habitation.

The outgoings of it shall be thine.] They should have the product of it: or, all the country below in the valley (ver. 16) should be theirs also.

Thou shalt drive out the Canaanites, &c.] He answers all their objections (ver. 16) with an assurance that they should be able, with God's help, to dispossess the present inhabitants, notwithstanding their great force and power: for so God had commanded them to believe, and not to be afraid of their chariots, which now seemed so terrible to them (see Deut. xx. 1).

CHAPTER XVIII.

1 The tabernacle is set up at Shiloh. 2 The remainder of the land is described, and divided into seven parts. 10 Joshua divideth it by lot. 11 The lot and border of Benjamin. 21 Their cities.

1 AND the whole congregation of the children of Israel assembled together at Shiloh, and set up the tabernacle of the congregation there. And the land was subdued before them.

CHAP. XVIII.

Ver. 1. The whole congregation] All their elders and heads of their tribes, who represented the people of Israel; and are sometimes meant by the "whole congregation," as Corn. Bertram hath showed in many instances, particularly in 1 Chron. xiii. 1, 2, &c. (see L. De Repub. Judaica, in the latter end of cap. 6. and cap. 11). But here it may well signify the whole body of the people, who accompanied the ark to settle it in a new place.

Assembled together at Shiloh.] A place in the tribe of Ephraim, not far from Jerusalem: and, as the great primate of Ireland thinks, the same with Salem. But I do not find any ground for that opinion.

Set up the tabernacle of the congregation there.] Which had hitherto remained in Gilgal: but now, by God's order, no doubt (for he was to choose the place of his own residence, Deut. xii. 5. 11. 14, &c.), was removed thither; together with the camp of Israel, which tarried so long in Gilgal, merely because the tabernacle was there. If it be inquired, what token God gave of his choice of this place, Mr. Mede answers (discourse xlv. book i.), perhaps it was by giving some extraordinary token of his approbation, by accepting their sacrifices; or, it may be, they

2 And there remained among the children of Israel seven tribes, which had not yet received their inheritance.

3 And Joshua said unto the children of Israel, How long are ye slack to go to possess the land, which the LORD God of your fathers hath given you?

4 Give out from among you three men for each tribe: and I will send them, and they shall rise, and go through the land, and describe it according to the inheritance of them; and they shall come again to me.

5 And they shall divide it into seven parts:

consulted him in this case by the oracle of urim and thummim. For when he made choice of Mount Sion, an angel bade the prophet Gad tell David he should set up an altar in the thrashing-floor of Ornan; and there God answered him by fire, &c. (see 1 Chron. xxi. 18, 26). Now the reason of its being translated to Shiloh, it is likely, was because it would have been too far, after the division of the land, for all the tribes of Israel to go to Gilgal, to perform all that the law required to be done at the tabernacle. Which was now indispensably to be performed, though while they lived in the wilderness they did not live by these rules (Deut. xii. 8—10), and, perhaps, while they continued unsettled in Canaan could not exactly observe them. This place also was very convenient for all the tribes to resort unto; and likewise very safe, being guarded by the two powerful tribes of Judah and Ephraim. And it was, as I said, in the lot of the latter; for it was fit it should be where Joshua was; who, being of this tribe, lived among them. Here it is thought the tabernacle continued for the space of three hundred and fifty years, till the days of Samuel; but our primate before mentioned reckons no more than three hundred and twenty-eight years.

The land was subdued] Or rather, for the land was subdued, &c. that is, continued quiet, without any opposition from the old inhabitants, since the conquest mentioned, xi. 23.

Ver. 2.] For whom no lot had been drawn at Gilgal. The reason of which was, perhaps, because the last mentioned tribes, of the house of Joseph, were not satisfied with the division which was begun to be made there. And therefore Joshua stopped his proceedings till he had made a new survey of the whole country. In order to which, God commanded him to remove hither; from whence, being in the middle of the country, they might do it more easily; and also give the children of Joseph greater content, by settling God's house among them.

Ver. 3. Joshua said unto the children of Israel,] Unto the congregation before mentioned, ver. 1.

How long are ye slack to go to possess the land,] He doth not blame them for not taking possession of the land which was conquered, without God's direction, by a lot (for that was expressly commanded), but for their being so slow to consider of, and propound some means of making such an equal division, as they desired; that they might take possession of the land, where their lot should fall.

Ver. 4. Give out from among you three men for each tribe:] He therefore himself propounds a method for their satisfaction; and such a one as they could not dislike, viz. that they should choose three men (for he would not appoint them, but only give them orders what to do) out of each of the seven remaining tribes that were not provided for; or rather, out of the nine tribes and a half; that they who had already received their portion, might be willing to resign up some part of it, if they found, upon the survey, there was not sufficient left for their brethren.

Judah shall abide in their coast on the south; and the house of Joseph shall abide in their coasts on the north.

6 Ye shall therefore describe the land into seven parts, and bring the description hither to me, that I may cast lots for you here before the LORD our God.

7 But the Levites have no part among you; for the priesthood of the LORD is their inheritance; and Gad, and Reuben, and half the tribe of Manasseh, have received their inheritance beyond Jordan on the east, which Moses the servant of the LORD gave them.

I will send them,] Give them orders to go immediately through the whole country; both that which was divided, and that which was not.

Describe it] Set down not only the dimensions of it, but its condition and quality, whether barren or fruitful, mountainous or plain, &c.

According to the inheritance of them;] Making so many parts in the description, as there remain tribes that want their inheritance. Thus the next verse teaches us to explain it.

They shall come again to me.] Make their report to him, when they had done, that he might judge of it.

Ver. 5. They shall divide it into seven parts:] Of equal extent, with a just respect, as Josephus observes, not merely to the quantity of ground, but the goodness of the soil. But there was no respect to the greater or lesser number of persons in each tribe; for then these men had given each tribe their portion, and there had been no need of a lot. Their business was to divide the country into seven equal portions, and leave God to appoint which portion should fall to each tribe: who would have no reason to complain, when the division was made by themselves.

Judah shall abide in their coast on the south, and the house of Joseph—on the north.] But the lot of Judah, which was southerly, and the lot of Ephraim and Manasseh, which, with respect to the former, was northerly, were not to be altered. But these tribes were to remain undisturbed in their possessions, unless it should be found that they had more than they needed, and others had less. For this was the very reason of making a new and more exact survey of the country, than had been made before the first division, that there might be an allotment made more to every one's satisfaction, when they had a more perfect account of all the land. Accordingly, it is evident, that the tribe of Judah (by common consent, no doubt) parted with some of their portion to the Simeonites, and the Danites, whose lot appeared to be too scanty (xix. 29, 41).

Ver. 6. Bring the description] When the men who were appointed to measure the country, had divided it into seven parts, he orders that the description thus divided should be laid before him.

That I may cast lots for you here before the Lord] Whereby their possessions were settled and established by a Divine authority. For the lots being drawn before the sanctuary, God was desired to declare what portion every tribe should have. Accordingly, it was their duty to look upon it as a sacred appointment, and to be contented with it; for it was done at the very door of the tabernacle, as we read, xix. ult.

Ver. 7. But the Levites have no part among you;] He declared, what had been often said before, that in 8 ¶ And the men arose, and went away: and Joshua charged them that went to describe the land, saying, Go and walk through the land, and describe it, and come again to me, that I may here cast lots for you before the Lord in Shiloh.

9 And the men went and passed through the land, and described it by cities into seven parts in a book, and came again to Joshua to the host at Shiloh.

10 ¶ And Joshua cast lots for them in Shiloh before the Lord: and there Joshua divided the land unto the children of Israel according to their divisions.

11 ¶ And the lot of the tribe of the children of Benjamin came up according to their families:

and the coast of their lot came forth between the children of Judah and the children of Joseph.

12 And their border on the north side was from Jordan; and the border went up to the side of Jericho on the north side, and went up through the mountains westward; and the goings out thereof were at the wilderness of Beth-aven.

13 And the border went over from thence toward Luz, to the side of Luz, which is Beth-el, southward; and the border descended to Ataroth-adar, near the hill that lieth on the south side of the nether Beth-horon.

14 And the border was drawn thence, and compassed the corner of the sea southward, from the hill that lieth before Beth-horon southward; and the goings out thereof were at Kirjath-baal, this division of the land, the priests and Levites were to have no share; God having otherwise provided for them (see xiii. 14. 32. xiv. 3).

Gad, and Reuben, and half the tribe of Manassah, have received their inheritance beyond Jordan, &c.] And, as for the rest, no care was to be taken of them in this division; because Moses had provided for them before they came over Jordan.

Ver. 8. The men arose, and went away.] Being chosen by their brethren (as Joshua directed, ver. 4), to act in their name.

Joshua charged them, &c.] Before they went, Joshua gave them a charge to do the business they went about with care and fidelity; using their best diligence to be truly and fully informed: and at their return, give him an account, that he might put an end to all disputes, by desiring God to assign every tribe their portion.

That I may here cast lots for you before the Lord in Shiloh.] These words sound as if he gave this charge to them in the presence of God, before the sanctuary, that they might be excited to execute his orders with greater diligence.

Ver. 9. The men went and passed through the land,] Through the whole country which they had conquered.

Described it by cities] Set down the name of every city, and its villages, and the territory about it, with its situation. For so, I suppose, Joshua charged them.

Into seven parts in a book,] In which were seven maps, as we now call them; which made a chorographical description of all the cities, towns, mountains, plains, woods, and all other conditions of the soil.

Came again to Joshua to the host at Shiloh.] For the tabernacle being removed hither, the camp followed it, as I observed, ver. 1. And here it remained till the land was divided among the seven tribes. Which could not be done in a short time; for Josephus saith they were seven months in taking this survey, and making the forenamed description.

Ver. 10. Joshua] With the assistance of Eleazar and the princes (xiv. 1).

Cast lots for them in Shiloh] As he told them he would, ver. 6. The manner of it, see upon Numb. xxvi. 55. 56.

There Joshua divided the land—according to their divisions.] That is, according to the divisions made by the surveyors; which were so just and equal, that all consented the lot should determine what part should belong to them.

Ver. 11. The lot of the tribe of—Benjamin came up] The providence of God so ordered it, that his children should have the first lot of these seven, next to the tribe of Joseph, they two being the only sons of Rachel, Jacob's beloved wife.

According to their families:] To be divided according to their families.

Their lot came forth between the children of Judah] Who lay on the south of them.

And the children of Joseph.] For the Ephraimites lay on the north of them. And it is observable, that in the blessing of Moses, Benjamin is placed between Judah and Joseph (Levi having no inheritance among them), which prophecy of Moses by this lot was exactly fulfilled concerning him (Deut. xxxiii. 12).

Ver. 12. Their border on the north side was from Jordan, &c.] Just thus the south border of Ephraim proceeded from Jordan by Jericho, which was in the tribe of Benjamin (see xvi. 1. 7).

Through the mountains westward:] Through the mountainous country, which lay on the north of Jericho, it went up to the western part of the country.

At the wilderness of Beth-aven.] A place near Beth-el, which in aftertimes (when they committed foul idolatry there) was called Beth-aven, a house or place of iniquity (Hosea iv. 15. x. 8).

Ver. 13. To the side of Luz, which is Beth-el, southward:] On the south side of that city (see xvi. 2). The Jews think there were two Beth-els; one here named in the confines of Benjamin and Joseph, where Jacob had the vision of the ladder reaching up to heaven, and the other Beth-el near to Ai (viii. 6. 17).

Ataroth-adar,] Called in the place forenamed (xvi. 2), Archi-Ataroth.

Nether Beth-horon.] A city in the tribe of Ephraim (xvi. 3), called "the nether," because there was a higher hard by it in the mountain adjoining. Though others will have the two Beth-horons to have been at a great distance; one in the mountains of Ephraim, the other in the valley near Jordan.

Ver. 14. The border was drawn thence,] In a line bending westward, as appears by what follows in the end of the verse; which tells us the western border began from Beth-horon the nether.

Compassed the corner of the sea southward, from the hill that lieth before Beth-horon] I cannot give any account of this border, according to our translation: for, it is certain, it did not compass any corner of the Mediterranean (and no other sea can be here meant), nor came near unto it. Therefore, by peath, which we translate corner, must be understood the side of the sea. As if he had said, It ran along in a parallel line to the sea. So the Vulgar hath it, over against the sea; and the LXX. to the same purpose. And the word southward is joined by the Vulgar, not to the sea, but to the next words, "southward from the hill that lieth before Beth-horon."

Southward:] That is, the hill was to the south of Beth-horon, as we read in the verse before.

which is Kirjath-jearim, a city of the children of Judah : this was the west quarter.

15 And the south quarter was from the end of Kirjath-jearim, and the border went out on the west, and went out to the well of waters of Nephtoaah :

16 And the border came down to the end of the mountain that lieth before the valley of the son of Hinnom, and which is in the valley of the giants on the north, and descended to the valley of Hinnom, to the side of Jebusi on the south, and descended to En-rogel,

17 And was drawn from the north, and went forth to En-shemesh, and went forth toward Geliath, which is over against the going up of Adummim, and descended to the stone of Bohan the son of Reuben,

18 And passed along toward the side over against Arabah northward, and went down unto Arabah :

[Kirjath-Baal,] See xv. 60.

[This was the west quarter.] Here the peath before mentioned (for it is the same word we before translate corner), the west side, or quarter, ended : for that is meant by its goings out.

[Ver. 15. The south quarter] The same word again in the Hebrew, viz. peath.

[Was from the end of Kirjath-jearim, and the border went out on the west,] Did not go directly south, but bordered something towards the sea, till it came to "the well of waters of Nephtoaah," as this verse concludes (see xv. 9). By considering of which, and the foregoing and following verses, it will be unnecessary to say much of this south border of Benjamin, it being the same with the north border of Judah. For the very same places are named here that are there, and in the same order ; with this difference only, that in describing this border, he proceeds from the west towards the east ; but in describing that of Judah from the east towards the west. So that Kirjath-jearim is there the north limits of Judah, as it is here the south limits of Benjamin.

[Ver. 16. Valley of the son of Hinnom,] See xv. 7.

[Descended to En-rogel,] See xv. 7.

[Ver. 17. Geliath,] See there ; where this place is called Gilgal.

[Adummim,] See there, and ver. 6.

[Ver. 18. Unto Arabah,] Called Beth-Arabah, xv. 6. and so the LXX. have it here in this verse.

[Ver. 19. To the side of Beth-hoglah northward,] Leaving Beth-hoglah on the north of it (see xv. 6).

[At the north bay of the salt sea] Its utmost progress was to the tongue or bay of the Salt sea, which is on the north part of it.

[South end of Jordan,] Where Jordan ends towards the south ; being swallowed up by the Salt sea.

[This was the south coast.] That is, hither it reached, and here it ended.

[Ver. 20. Jordan was the border of it on the east side,] Till, near Jericho, it met with the bounds of the tribe of Ephraim and Manasseh.

[By the coasts thereof round about,] That is, a description of its bounds on all sides.

[According to their families,] Which was divided among as many families as were in that tribe.

[Ver. 21. Jericho,] Having given a description of the bounds of the country, he sets down the principal cities in it. The first of which was well known, viz. Jericho ; the territory of which remained, though the city itself was destroyed. And perhaps there were 19 And the border passed along to the side of Beth-hoglah northward : and the outgoings of the border were at the north bay of the salt sea at the south end of Jordan : this was the south coast.

20 And Jordan was the border of it on the east side. This was the inheritance of the children of Benjamin, by the coasts thereof round about, according to their families.

21 Now the cities of the tribe of the children of Benjamin according to their families were Jericho, and Beth-hoglah, and the valley of Keziz,

22 And Beth-arabah, and Zemaraim, and Beth-el,

23 And Arim, and Parah, and Ophrah,

24 And Chephar-haammonai, and Ophni, and Gaba ; twelve cities with their villages :

25 Gibeon, and Ramah, and Beeroth,

26 And Mizpeh, and Chephirah, and Mozah,

27 And Rekem, and Irpeel, and Taralah, some houses there, though without walls or gates ; which seem to be the only things which Joshua commanded should not be built (vi. 26).

[Beth-hoglah,] A city near to Jericho ; not far from the river Jordan.

[Valley of Keziz,] Rather, Emer-Keziz ; for he speaks of a city, not of a valley. Or, it may be interpreted, Keziz in the valley ; that is, in the plain of Jericho.

[Ver. 22. Beth-arabah,] This city is reckoned to Judah (xvi. 61), being, it seems, in the confines of both tribes. It stood also in the plain of Jericho, signifying as much as domus campestris, "a habitation in the fields : " for there were large fields about it, as Bochartus supposes ; from whence a place in Assyria, for this reason, was called Oraba, as he shows, lib. iv. Phaleg, cap. 21.

[Zemaraim,] A city, it is probable, built by Zemari, the tenth son of Canaan (Gen. x. 13). There was a mountain also called by this name, from this city, it is likely. For though it is said to be in Mount Ephraim, 2 Chron. xiii. 14, it might also, in part, belong to Benjamin, as Betharaba and the next cities did belong to two tribes.

[Beth-el,] A city in the confines of the tribe of Ephraim and of Benjamin, which seems to have belonged to both.

[Ver. 23. Arim, and Parah, and Ophrah,] We know no more of these cities but their names.

[Ver. 24. Chephar-haammonai, and Ophni,] These also are unknown cities.

[Gaba,] This is often named in Scripture, and called Gibeah, being that place where the foul fact was committed which almost ruined this tribe (Judg. xix). And is called Gibeah of Saul, because it was his native country, where he made his residence after he was king (1 Sam. x. 26). And it was one of the cities of the priests (Josh. xxi. 17).

[Twelve cities,] Which seem to have been in the eastern part of that country.

[Ver. 25,] The first of these is well-known from the story of its ancient inhabitants, related in the ninth chapter of this book. It was also a city of the priests (xxi. 17), and seated on a hill, as its very name imports. Ramah also was an eminent city on the north side of Jerusalem, as Bethlehem was on the south. So that Jerusalem was in the road from the one to the other ; as appears from the man that went from Beth-lehem-Judah to Ramah (Judg. xix. 2. 11. 13).

Beeroth also is notorious upon this account, that it

28 And Zelah, Eleph, and Jebusi, which is Jerusalem, Gibeah, and Kirjath; fourteen cities was one of the cities which cunningly joined with Gibeon to deceive Joshua and procure a peace with them (ix. 17).

Ver. 26. Mizpeh,] There were several cities of this name, as I have noted before (xv. 38.) And this was in the confines of the tribe of Judah; so that it seems to have belonged to both of them and to Benjamin, as several others did.

Chepirah,] Another of the cities depending upon Gibeon (ix. 17).

Mozah,] An unknown city.

Ver. 27. Rekem,] This is a city mentioned both by Eusebius and St. Jerome; but they do not say where it was, nor so much as name the next two, Irpeel and Taralah.

Ver. 28. Zelah, Eleph,] Two cities, of which no more than the names are remaining. Eusebius and St. Jerome mention the former as in the tribe of Benjamin, but say no more.

Jebusi, which is Jerusalem,] See xv. 63, where it is reckoned to the tribe of Judah; for both that tribe and Benjamin had an interest in it. The old city belonged to the tribe of Benjamin; unto which an addition being made, it belonged to Judah (as some make account); that is, the north part, with Mount Moriah, was in the portion of Benjamin; but the south part, wherein Mount Sion was, belonged to Judah.

Gibeah,] This was a distinct city from Gaba (ver. 24), and I suppose near to Jerusalem.

Kirjath,] The very name imports a city; which, Eusebius and St. Jerome say, was under the metropolis of Gibeah before mentioned. Πόλις ἐπὶ Μητρόπολιν Γαβθαῖα.

Fourteen cities] Which were in the western part of this tribe.

This is the inheritance of—Benjamin] Which was one of the smallest, with respect to the quantity of ground which they possessed; but the soil was the richest of all other tribes, as Josephus informs us.

According to their families.] All the families of the Benjamites were disposed of into these great cities, and the territories belonging to them; in which, it is probable, there were lesser cities, not here named. For we find two cities of the priests in this tribe which are not among these here set down, viz. Anathoth and Almon (xix. 18).

CHAPTER XIX.

1 The lot of Simeon, 10 of Zebulun, 17 of Issachar, 24 of Asher, 32 of Naphtali, 40 of Dan. 49 The children of Israel give an inheritance to Joshua.

1 AND the second lot came forth to Simeon, even for the tribe of the children of Simeon according to their families: and their inheritance was within the inheritance of the children of Judah.

2 And they had in their inheritance Beer-sheba, Sheba, and Moladah,

3 And Hazar-shual, and Balah, and Azem,

4 And Eltolad, and Bethul, and Hormah,

5 And Ziklag, and Beth-marcaboth, and Hazar-susah,

6 And Beth-lebaoth, and Sharuhem; thirteen cities and their villages:

CHAP. XIX.

Ver. 1. The second lot came forth to Simeon,] Both the LXX. and the Vulgar leave out the latter part of these words, as if they were superfluous; and only say, "the second lot came forth to Simeon." But I suppose the words following in the Hebrew are intended to show, that though their inheritance was within that of the tribe of Judah (as the next word tells us), yet those cities were not all that were given to this tribe, but they had another share by lot that fell to them: and God disposed it so, that the very next lot to Benjamin came up for them: Simeon being the eldest son of Jacob that was unprovided.

According to their families.] Which was divided by Eleazar, Joshua, and the princes, among their several families.

Their inheritance was within the inheritance of the tribe of Judah.] So we will translate it; for though the word in the Hebrew be betoch (in the midst) of the inheritance of Judah; yet it signifies no more than within. For the lot of Simeon did not lie in the very heart (as we speak), but in the skirts, of the country of Judah: from whose northern and western border some part was cut off, and given to the Simeonites; for the reason mentioned ver. 9.

Ver. 2. Beer-sheba, Sheba,] Or, rather, Beer-sheba, which is Sheba: for they were one and the same place; sometimes called at length Beer-sheba, and sometimes contracted into Sheba; nothing being more common than to cut off the beginning of the names of towns and places, as Bochartus hath shown in many instances, in his Paleg. lib. ii. cap. 24, which he repeats in his Hieroicoicon, par. i. lib. ii. cap. 15. And certainly it is so here; for otherwise it would not have been said (ver. 6), there were thirteen cities in all, but fourteen; for there are so many if Sheba be distinct from Beer-sheba. Which was the last city in the south belonging to the land of Israel. From whence the common saying, from Dan to Beer-sheba, to express the whole length of the country; from Dan in the north to Beer-sheba in the south.

Moladah,] This is mentioned before, in the account we had of the lot of Judah (xv. 26).

Ver. 3. Hazar-shual,] A place where there was abundance of foxes.

Balah,] The same that is mentioned in the south of Judah (xv. 29).

Azem,] It signifies in Hebrew, great strength. We read of it nowhere else but in this place, and 1 Chron. iv. 29, where it is called Ezem.

Ver. 4. Eltolad,] called there Tolad; the first syllable being cut off, as I said ver. 2, it often is.

Bethul,] Called there Bethuel. Which some will have to be the same with Bethulia, where Judith dwelt; because she was of the tribe of Simeon. But that is a mistake; for this was in the south of Judah, and that a city in Galilee.

Hormah,] Which is mentioned in the same place, 1 Chron. iv. 30, and was one of the cities to whom David sent part of the spoil he took from the Amalekites (1 Sam. xxx. 30).

Ver. 5. Ziklag,] A neighbouring city, as appears from both the aforementioned places.

Beth-marcaboth, and Hazar-susah,] It is a very

7 Ain, Remmon, and Ether, and Ashan; four cities and their villages:

8 And all the villages that were round about these cities to Baalath-beer, Ramath of the south. This is the inheritance of the tribe of the children of Simeon according to their families.

9 Out of the portion of the children of Judah was the inheritance of the children of Simeon: for the part of the children of Judah was too much for them: therefore the children of Simeon had their inheritance within the inheritance of them.

10 ¶ And the third lot came up for the child-probable conjecture of Bochartus, that these were two of the cities where Solomon kept his chariots and horses (1 Kings x. 26). For the former of these signifies the house of chariots: and the other, the village of horses. For it is called Hazar-susim, in the plural number, 1 Chron. iv. 31 (see Hierozoicon, par. i. lib. 2. cap. 9).

Ver. 6. Beth-lebaoth, and Sharuhin;] They seem to be the same cities, called in aftertimes Beth-birei, and Shaaraim (1 Chron. iv. 31).

Thirteen cities and their villages.] See ver. 1.

Ver. 7. Ain, Remmon, and Ether, and Ashan;] One of these towns is otherwise called in 1 Chron. iv. 32. viz. Etam, not Ether; and a fifth is added. Which shows all the cities and towns belonging to Simeon are not here mentioned, no more than all those belonging to Benjamin; as I observed on ver. 28, of the foregoing chapter. Ashan also is thought by Bochart (in the place forenamed), to be the same with Chor-Ashan in 1 Sam. xxx. 30, by cutting off the first syllable.

Four cities and their villages.] Which are mentioned separate from the rest; either because they were in another part of the country, or because they were not properly cities, but only chatsirim (large villages), as they are expressly called 1 Chron. iv. 32, that is, towns which were without walls. Here, indeed, they are called cities; but that must be understood largely, to make it agree with the Chronicles, for towns of more than ordinary bigness.

Ver. 8. All the villages that were round about these cities] Here the word chatsirim (villages) is opposed to cities; and signifies all the towns, great and small, that lay about all the cities before mentioned.

To Baalath-beer, Ramath] This is the name but of one city, called simply Baal in 1 Chron. iv. 33, and is that city in the tribe of Judah, mentioned xv. ver. 24, or ver. 29. As far as which city the bounds of the tribe of Simeon reached. Some think this is the city which Solomon built, i. e. repaired, and made larger and stronger (1 Kings ix. 18).

Of the south.] This doth not relate to the situation of the city before mentioned; but of the inheritance of this tribe, which was on the south of Judah.

Ver. 9. Out of the portion of—Judah was the inheritance of—Simeon.] For which reason the bounds of this tribe on all sides are not described as of the foregoing; because that was sufficiently done in the description of the possession of Judah; out of which the inheritance of this tribe was taken.

For the part of the children of Judah was too much for them.] They who were sent to make a new survey of the whole land, found that the former surveyors had not measured it exactly; but left one division too big in proportion to the rest, which fell to the tribe of Judah: who had now, therefore, a large slice cut from them, because they had too much and others too little.

ren of Zebulun according to their families: and the border of their inheritance was unto Sarid:

11 And their border went up toward the sea, and Maralah, and reached to Dabbasheth, and reached to the river that is before Jokneam;

12 And turned from Sarid eastward toward the sunrising unto the border of Chisloth-tabor, and then goeth out to Daberath, and goeth up to Japhia,

13 And from thence passeth on along on the east to Gittah-hepher, to Attah-kazin, and goeth out to Remmon-methoar to Neah;

14 And the border compasseth it on the north

The children of Simeon had their inheritance within the inheritance of them.] Within that lot, which was at first given to the tribe of Judah: yet not absolutely given, but so that if it appeared there was not sufficient for the rest of their brethren, and they had more than enough, that error should be corrected by taking something from them and giving it to another tribe, as it was now in this new allotment.

Ver. 10. Third lot came up for—Zebulun] He was not the next brother; for Issachar was born before him. But he is mentioned before Issachar, both in the blessing of Jacob, Gen. xlix. 13, and of Moses, Deut. xxxiii. 18.

Unto Sarid. No more is said of this place by Eusebius, but that it was ὄριον Ζαβουλων, "the bound or limit of Zebulun;" and St. Jerome saith the same. And, by what follows, it seems to have been the south-west border.

Ver. 11. Toward the sea,] That is, the Mediterranean, which was in the west.

Maralah, and reached to Dabbasheth,] These were cities in the western borders, as appears by the following words.

The river that is before Jokneam.] See xii. 22.

Ver. 12. Turned from Sarid eastward] This is a description of the south border; which went from Sarid in the west unto Jordan in the east.

Chisloth-tabor,] A city near Mount Tabor in the tribe of Issachar, ver. 18. For as, on the west, the Zebulunites were contiguous to the tribe of Manasseh; so, towards the east, they were to the tribe of Issachar.

Daberath,] A city also in the tribe of Issachar (xxi. 28).

Japhia,] It is uncertain where this city was, though some think it to be the strong city which Josephus calls Japha (lib. ii. De Bello Jud. cap. 25), and places it in Galilee near Jotapata.

Ver. 13. Passeth on along on the east to Gittah-hepher,] This seems to be a description of the eastern border. We read of the land of Hopher, 1 Kings iv. 10, which was near the sea of Galilee. There this city was, in which Jonah the prophet was born (2 Kings xiv. 25).

Attah-kazin,] This city, it is likely, was upon the same sea of Galilee, called Gennesaret; which the Vulgar calls Thacasin.

Goeth out to Remmon-methoar to Neah;] Here the eastern border ended (for that is meant by the phrase goeth out), at the sea of Gennesaret. So Josephus expressly affirms (see Gen. xlix. 13).

Ver. 14. Compasseth it on the north side of Hannathon.] Here begins the description of the northern border; which, from the last named place, went in a bending line towards Hannathon; a city, it is supposed, in this tribe.

Outgoings thereof are in the valley of Jiphthah-el.] Here the northern border ended. But we know no side to Hannathon: and the outgoings thereof are in the valley of Jiphthah-el:

15 And Kattath, and Nahallal, and Shimron, and Idalah, and Beth-lehem: twelve cities with their villages.

16 This is the inheritance of the children of Zebulun according to their families, these cities with their villages.

17 ¶ And the fourth lot came out to Issachar, for the children of Issachar according to their families.

18 And their border was toward Jezreel, and Chesulloth, and Shunem.

19 And Ithphraim, and Shihon, and Anaharath,

20 And Rabbith, and Kishion, and Abez,

21 And Remeth, and En-gannim, and En-haddah, and Beth-pazzez;

22 And the coast reached to Tabor, and Shahazimah, and Beth-shemesh; and the outgoings of their border were at Jordan: sixteen cities with their villages.

23 This is the inheritance of the tribe of the children of Issachar according to their families, the cities and their villages.

24 ¶ And the fifth lot came out for the tribe of the children of Asher according to their families.

25 And their border was Helkath, and Hali, and Breten, and Achshaph, 26 And Alammelech, and Amad, and Misheal; and reacheth to Carmel westward, and to Shihor-libnath;

27 And turneth toward the sunrising to Beth-dagon, and reacheth to Zebulun, and to the valmore of this valley of Jiphthah-el, than that it was in the tribe of Asher, in the confines of this tribe (ver. 27).

Ver. 15. Kattath, &c.] It is not certain whether these cities belonged to Zebulun, or are set down as places upon which this tribe bordered. Of the first two I can give no account; but we read of Shimron as a principal city, which had a king in it conquered by Joshua (see xii. 20.) And Idalah is mentioned by St. Jerome (De locis Hebraicis), and called Jadela: as if it were compounded of jad (which signifies a place, Deut. xxv. 12), and ela (a goddess), being the place where Venus was worshipped, as Bochartus conjectures, lib. i. Canaan, cap. 3. As for Beth-lehem, we are not to take it for the place where our Saviour was born; which is called Bethlehem-Judah, to distinguish it from this, which was far from it.

Twelve cities] Here are more cities than twelve; therefore some of them are mentioned only as the boundaries of this country. There is no doubt but those mentioned ver. 13, were in this tribe; and many think those five here mentioned in this were so also. Jokneam likewise belonged to it; but which were the rest to make up the number twelve cannot be determined.

Ver. 16.] That is, these were the bounds of it; but all the cities belonging to it are not here set down: for we read of two, Kartah and Dimnah (xxi. 34, 35), which are not here named. And, indeed, twelve cities do not seem sufficient for sixty thousand men (Numb. xxvi. 27); therefore they were only the principal; and all, perhaps, that the measurers of the land had noted in their book.

Ver. 17.] Thus far there is some kind of order observed in these lots: Issachar being brother to Zebulun by the same mother.

Ver. 18. Jezreel.] This was one of the royal seats of the kings of Israel in aftertimes (1 Kings xxi. 1), which Eusebius and St. Jerome place in the tribe of Manasseh; but ought to be accounted belonging to this tribe, as the next place is agreed to be. There was another in the tribe of Judah (xv. 56).

Chesulloth.] Mentioned ver. 12, which both the forementioned authors place in the tribe of Issachar, under the name of Acheseloth.

Shunem.] Where that noble lady lived who entertained Elisha at her house (2 Kings iv. 8, 12). And where Abishag, the wife of David, in his old age, was born, 1 Kings i. 3).

Ver. 19. Hopphraim, and Shihon, and Anaharath.] He doth not describe the borders on all sides of this tribe; but only sets down some principal cities; for it lying between Manasseh and Zebulun, the situation of it was sufficiently known. And they do but guess, who say these six cities named in the foregoing verso and in this were in the southern border.

Ver. 20.] These three cities, and the next two that follow, ver. 21, they will have to constitute the western border.

Ver. 21. Remeth, and En-gannim.] Here, as I said, they imagine the western border ended.

En-haddah, and Beth-pazzez.] These two, and the three next, ver. 22, they will have to be the northern border.

Ver. 22. The coast reacheth to Tabor.] That is, this northern border; for Mount Tabor was in the north; and this city was hard by it, and received its name from the mount, or gave its name to it.

Shahazimah, and Beth-shemesh.] Here ended the northern border. There was another Beth-shemesh in the tribe of Naphtali (ver. 38), and another in the tribe of Judah (xxi. 16).

Their border were at Jordan.] This makes it probable the former account of its other borders is not true; because it leaves no city for the eastern border near Jordan, nor any for the middle of the country.

Sixteen cities] This shows that Tabor was a city; otherwise there would be but fifteen.

Ver. 23.] These were their principal cities; but it is likely there were others: for we read of two not here mentioned, xxi. 28, 29. Dabareh and Jarnuth; yet there are those who think Jarnuth is but another name for Remeth, here mentioned, ver. 21. which to me doth not seem probable.

Ver. 24. No reason can be given for this order; unless it be, that God was pleased to place this tribe, being descended from the handmaid of Leah, not far from Zebulun, one of Leah's sons. As for Gad, the elder brother of Asher, he was provided for before, on the other side of Jordan.

Ver. 25.] We know no more of the first three of these cities than their names. But the last of them was very considerable; mention being made of the king of Achshaph, xi. 1. xii. 20. The first of them also we find was a Levitical city (xxi. 31), called Hukok, in 1 Chron. vi. 75. It appears, likewise, by the mention of Carmel in the next verse, unto which this border reached, that these cities lay in the west near the Mediterranean Sea.

Ver. 26. Alammelech, and Amad, and Misheal; and reacheth to Carmel westward.] Or, by the sea, not far from Ptolemais; to distinguish it from the other Carmel, in the tribe of Judah, near Hebron (see xv. 53). Here the great prophet Elijah sometimes dwelt, and confuted the Baalites by a stupendous miracle. But ley of Jiphthah-el toward the north side of Beth-emek, and Neiel, and goeth out to Cabul on the left hand.

28 And Hebron, and Rehob, and Hammon, and Kanah, even unto great Zidon;

29 And then the coast turneth to Ramah, and to the strong city Tyre; and the coast turneth to Hosah; and the outgoings thereof are at the sea from the coast to Achzib:

we are as ignorant of the three cities mentioned in this verse, as we are of the other in the foregoing.

To Shihor-libnath;] Whether this was a city (some fancy Ptolemais), or a promontory, or a muddy river (for there are those different opinions about it), I cannot determine.

Ver. 27. Turneth toward the sunrise] It turned from the sea towards the east; and so northward, bending towards the west again. For there are no borders or sides of this tribe described: but from the south part of the sea it turned eastward, and then northward, in the form of a bow, towards the north part of the same sea, where Zidon was (ver. 28).

To Beth-dagon,] There was a place of this name mentioned before in the tribe of Judah, xv. 41. where it is thought there was a famous temple of Dagon, the god of the Philistines.

To Zebulun, and to the valley of Jiphthah-el] And so touched upon the north border of the tribe of Zebulun; in which the valley of Jiphthah-el lay (see ver. 14).

Toward the north side of Beth-emek and Neiel,] Where these were, is not known. Only Eusebius and St. Jerome say, Beth-emek lay in a valley, or low place in this tribe; as the word seems to import.

To Cabul on the left hand,] On the north side (called the left hand) of this city, which lay in the tribe of Asher, this border ended. Some have been so frivolous as from hence to argue, that this book was written long after Joshua's time; because the land of Cabul (1 Kings ix. 13) was not known till the days of Solomon, when Hiram gave this name to the land, which Solomon presented him withal. As if there were no difference between the land and the city of Cabul: when one of them was a little region, containing twenty towns, and the other a small place in the confines of Ptolemais; both of them in the tribe of Asher. They are plainly distinguished by Josephus, who calls one of them ἡ γῆν Χαβαλῶν, "the land of Cabul;" and the other κώμην, "the village of Cahul;" as Huetius hath observed, propos. iv. Demonstr. Evang. p. 186.

Ver. 28. Hebron,] Called Elbon by the LXX. and by the Vulgar Abran: to distinguish it, I suppose, from that Hebron in the land of Judah.

Rehob,] There were two cities of this name in this tribe (see ver. 30). One of them was a Levitical city (xxi. 31), and the Canaanites kept possession either of that or the other (Judg. i. 31).

Hammon,] There was a Levitical city of this name in the tribe of Naphtali (1 Chron. vi. 76), called Hammothdor in xxi. 32. of this book.

Kanah,] There were two cities of this name; one in the upper Galilee, which was Kanah the greater; and the other in the lower Galilee, called Kanah the less. He speaks here of the greater, which was near to Sidon. The lesser was that wherein our Saviour turned water into wine, and of which Nathanael and the Syrophenician woman were.

Great Zidon;] See before concerning this city, xi. 8.

Ver. 29. Ramah,] Another city on the northern part of the Mediterranean sea.

30 Ummah also, and Aphek, and Rehob: twenty and two cities with their villages.

31 This is the inheritance of the tribe of the children of Asher according to their families, these cities with their villages.

32 The sixth lot came out to the children of Naphtali, even for the children of Naphtali according to their families.

33 And their coast was from Heleph, from

To the strong city Tyre;] This translation is questionable: for we never read one word of the city Tyre (unless it be here) until the days of David; though we often read of Sidon in the books of Moses; even in the prophecy of Jacob. And, as Bochartus observes, Homer himself, who speaks frequently of Sidon and the Sidonians, never names Tyre (lib. iv. Phaleg. cap. 35). Therefore, it is highly probable, some other place is meant by Tzor (as our margin notes the word is in the Hebrew), which was a fenced city, as we render the word here translated strong (ver. 35). And there were several cities, perhaps, called by this name of Tzor or Tyre, besides that famous one in future times; particularly Palætyrus; as much as to say old Tyre. And it is no improbable conjecture of Campegius Vitrings, that into these two places, Sidon and Tzor, many of the people of Canaan fled, to secure themselves when Joshua invaded them: for Tzor signifies not only a rock, but any strong fortified place; from whence it is possible the Latin word turris, and then our English tower is derived. Certain it is, that these two were famous cities, ἰνδοβοί λαμπροί, as Strabo calls them, lib. xvi. where he saith they were so anciently, and not only in his time; insomuch, that it was uncertain which was the metropolis of the Phœnicians. But it is certain he speaks of the New Tyre, which was built in an island; but the old one was on the continent (see his Observationes Sacræ, lib. i. cap. 1).

Turneth to Hosah;] Declined a little towards a city of this name.

The outgoings thereof are at the sea, from the coast of Achzib;] It ended at the country which belonged to Achzib; for so hebel (which we here translate coast) signifies. In proper speaking it signifies a cord, whereby ground was measured; and thence was used to signify the portion of ground itself, which was measured by that cord or line. Thus we read of Hebel Argob, the region of Argob, Deut. iii. 13. and Hebel Hajam, the region of the sea, Zeph. ii. 5. Achzib, according to St. Jerome, is that place, which, by Pliny and others, was called in aftertimes Ecdippa.

Ver. 30. Ummah also, and Aphek and Rehob;] It is probable these were three cities in the heart of the country of Asher.

Twenty and two cities] There are more than this number here mentioned, though we do not reckon Carmel nor Jiphthah-el, one of which was a mountain, the other a valley. Therefore some of them were only the boundaries of this tribe, but did not belong to their possession.

Ver. 31.] That is, these were the most eminent cities, though it be probable there were some other. For we read of one called Abdon, xxi. 30. not here mentioned.

Ver. 32.] Here the younger son of Bilbah, the handmaid of Rachel, is preferred before the elder, who was Dan (Gen. xxx. 6. 8), as Zebulun was before Issachar. Such was the method of Divine Providence in that nation, to show them that they ought not to value themselves too highly, as they were prone to do, upon their external privileges.

Ver. 33. Their coast was from Heleph, &c.] He doth

Allon to Zaannim, and Adami, Nekeb, and Jabneel, unto Lakum: and the outgoings thereof were at Jordan:

34 And then the coast turneth westward to Aznoth-tabor, and goeth out from thence to Hukkok, and reacheth to Zebulun on the south side, and reacheth to Asher on the west side, and to Judah upon Jordan toward the sunriseing.

35 And the fenced cities are Ziddim, Zer, and Hammath, Rakkath, and Chinnereth, 36 And Adamah, and Ramah, and Hazor,

37 And Kedesh, and Edrei, and En-hazor,

38 And Iron, and Migdal-el, Horem, and Beth-anath, and Beth-shemesh; nineteen cities with their villages.

39 This is the inheritance of the tribe of the children of Naphtali according to their families, the cities and their villages.

40 ¶ And the seventh lot came out for the tribe of the children of Dan according to their families.

41 And the coast of their inheritance was Zorah, and Eshtaol, and Ir-shemesh.

42 And Shaalabbin, and Ajalon, and Jethlah, not say what coast this was; but by what follows, it appears to be the northern border where these cities were situated, near Lebanon and Sidon, and the rest of the northern part of Asher's country: for Naphtali comprehended the upper Galilee.

The outgoings thereof were at Jordan.] This border ended at this river; and at the very fountain of it, which was at the foot of Libanus.

Ver. 34. Turneth westward to Aznoth-tabor,—to Hukkok,] The southern border began at the former of these cities; and ended at the latter.

To Zebulun on the south side,] Touched on the confines of the tribe of Zebulun; so that the north side of Zebulun was the south side of Naphtali.

To Asher on the west side,] This is a short account of their western border, which went as far as to the borders of the tribe of Asher.

To Judah upon Jordan toward the sunriseing.] It was not near Judah, there being several tribes between them. Therefore the meaning is, this tribe had communication with that of Judah by the river Jordan. So the word upon in our translation must be interpreted (though there be no preposition at all in the Hebrew before Jordan), which river afforded them convenience of carrying merchandises to Judah, or bringing them from thence. And thus some think the prophecy of Moses was fulfilled (Deut. xxxiii. 23). Possess thou the west and the south. Which doth not signify that they had any land in the south; but that they trafficked with it, by the means of Jordan.

Ver. 35. The fenced cities are Ziddim, &c.] These were northern cities, it appears by that mentioned in the midst, Hammath, or Hamath, which was the utmost bounds of the land of Israel northward (see Numb. xiii. 21. xxxiv. 8. 1 Kings viii. 65). It seems to have had its name from the youngest son of Canaan, who, it is likely, built it, as his eldest son did Sidon (Gen. x. 18). It continued a famous city a long time; for in the days of David, we read how the king of it cunningly made his peace with him by a great present (2 Sam. vii. 9, &c.).

Rakkath,] Which follows that, is, in the opinion of some of the Jews, the same with Tiberias. So the author of the book De Cippis Hebraicis, set forth by Hottinger. Whence the Talmudists, as he observes, say, Rakkath is Zipporia; which was called Rakkath, because it was seated upon a bank of a river. It was also called Mesia, and at last Tiberias; though other Jewish authors make Rakkath different from that city.

Chinnereth,] A place upon this sea of Tiberias; in which there were fine gardens, and a kind of paradise. Whence it was called Geneser; as much as to say, the gardens of princes (Gannoth-Sarim). And it had the name of Chinnereth, from its sweetness and pleasures, as the Jews say (Cod. Megill.); “Kinnereth is Ginsar. And why is it called Chinnereth? because its fruits are as sweet to the taste, as the sound of a harp is to the ear” (see Hottinger in his annot. on the forenamed book, p. 36).

As for the first two cities, Ziddim and Zer, I can say nothing of them.

Ver. 36.] We may guess where these cities were by the last of them, Hazor, to which they were neighbours (see concerning it, xi. 1).

Ver. 37.] The first of these was a Levitical city (xxi. 32), in which that famous captain, Barak, was born, Judges iv. 6. where it is called Kodesh-Naphtali, to distinguish it from those of that name in other tribes. Of the other two tribes we know nothing.

Ver. 38. Iron, &c. and Beth-shemesh;] Every one knows there was another Beth-shemesh in the tribe of Judah; and that this city and Beth-anath the children of Naphtali could not conquer (Judg. i. 23). But we know no more of them, nor of the rest; save only that Eusebius says, there was a large village, called Migdal-el, between Dora and Ptolemais.

Nineteen cities with their villages.] Six of which were fenced cities, certainly belonging to this tribe; and there are as many more mentioned as make up twenty-three. Some of which therefore must be accounted as bordering cities; or only large villages, and not properly cities.

Ver. 39.] This must be understood (as in the account of the forementioned tribes) of the principal cities; for there were more besides these, as appears from xxi. 32, where Hammoth-dar and Kartan are numbered among the Levitical cities in this tribe, which are not mentioned here.

Ver. 40. Seventh lot came out for—Dan.] They were the only remaining tribe that was to be provided for.

Ver. 41.] He doth not describe their lot by its borders; but mentions the cities that were in it. Some of which at first were given to Judah; out of whose share, it being too large, some cities were taken for the Danites, as others were for the Simeonites. And it is certain the first two of these fell to Judah, in the first division of the land (xv. 33). Both very eminent places, for the birth, and burial, and mighty motions of Samson; for at Zorah he was born (Judg. xiii. 2), between Zorah and Eshtaol he was buried (Judg. xvi. ult.), and here the Spirit of God began to move him, at certain times (xiii. 25). It is probable, also, that Ir-shemesh was in the tribe of Judah at the first; it being of the same signification with Beth-shemesh for one signifies the city of the sun; the other, the house, or place of the sun.

Ver. 42. Shaalabbin,] Which the Amorites kept in their possession, Judg. i. 35, where by a small change of letters, it is called Shaalbin; and in some copies of the LXX. translated ἐν ᾧ καὶ αἱ ἀλώμεναι, and in others ἐν ὄραβιν. And in our present LXX. both these are retained. For a fox in the Arabian language is called thalab, and in the Phœnician (which is half Arabic) shalab; as Bochartus observes in his Hierozotic. par. i. lib. iii. cap. 13. and in his Canaan, lib. i. cap. 34. p. 684.

Ajalon,] Another city which the Amorites kept,

43 And Elon, and Thimnathah, and Ekron,
44 And Eltekeh, and Gibbethon, and Baalath,
45 And Jehud, and Bene-berak, and Gath-rimmon,

46 And Me-jarkon, and Rakkon, with the border before Japho.

47 And the coast of the children of Dan went out too little for them: therefore the children of Dan went up to fight against Leshem, and took it, and smote it with the edge of the sword, and possessed it, and dwelt therein, and called Leshem, Dan, after the name of Dan their father.

from them, as we find in the same place, Judg. i. 35. And was one of the Levitical cities (xxi. 23,) and that famous place mentioned x. 13.

[Jethlah.] We know no more than that it was a city in this tribe.

Ver. 43.] It is certain that the last of these three cities was at first given to Judah (xv. 45). But Thimnathah was not the same with Timnath in the same tribe (xv. 10. 57), but quite different from it; as Gibbethon, I observed in the foregoing chapter, was from Geba, for Samson went down to this city Timnath (Judg. xiv. 5), which shows it was in a valley; whereas Judah went up to Timnath to shear his sheep (Gen. xxxviii. 11. 13), which shows it was upon a hill. Concerning Elon I can say nothing, unless it be the same with Holon in the tribe of Judah (xv. 51.)

Ver. 44.] Some think that the first of these is the same with that city in the tribe of Judah, called Eltekon, xv. 59, and the last the same with that called there Baalah, ver. 29. As for Gibbethon, the Danites seem not to have got possession of it, or to have lost it again; for it was in the hands of the Philistines after the days of David (1 Kings xv. 27. xvi. 15), and yet appointed one of the Levitical cities (Josh. xvi. 21. 23).

Ver. 45.] Where Jehud was I find not; but Bapaxai is mentioned by Eusebius as a village near Azotus (or Ashdod) and St. Jerome saith in his time was called Bernea. Which may incline us to his opinion, that Geth-rimmon was no other than the city of Gath so often mentioned in Scripture as one of the principal cities of the Philistines. It is reckoned among the Levitical cities xxi. 21, as Gibbethon was ver. 44, though in the hands of the Philistines.

Ver. 46. Me-jarkon and Rakkon.] It is not certain where these places were, but very likely near to the place next mentioned.

[With the border before Japho.] This place was afterward called Joppa, being the principal port town in all Judea (mentioned by Pompon. Mela, Strabo, and Pliny), and continues so to this day, retaining the name of Japha, which in Hebrew signifies fair or beautiful. It is not certain that it was a part of the tribe of Dan, though Eusebius calls it a sea-town of the lot of Dan; for these words may signify no more but that their portion comprehended the border which lay before this place.

Ver. 47. The coast of the children of Dan went out too little for them.] These words, too little, are not in the Hebrew, where there is nothing answering to them. But the words run thus, "the coast of the children of Dan went out from them;" that is, they were dispossessed of it in some parts by their powerful neighbours the Amorites, who forced them into the mountains, and would not let them dwell in the valley (Judg. i. 34). This put them to such straits, that they were constrained to enlarge their border some other way, which they did by the means following. I shall only further note, that this is no strange phrase; for in the year of 48 This is the inheritance of the tribe of the children of Dan according to their families, these cities with their villages.

49 ¶ When they had made an end of dividing the land for inheritance by their coasts, the children of Israel gave an inheritance to Joshua the son of Nun among them:

50 According to the word of the Lord they gave him the city which he asked, even Timnath-serah in mount Ephraim: and he built the city, and dwelt therein.

51 These are the inheritances, which Eleazar jubilee lands are said to go out, when they returned to their first owners, from the present possessors (Lev. xxv. 28. 30. 31. 33).

[Leshem.] A city not far from Jordan, called Laish, in the book of Judges, before it was taken by the Danites. In aftertimes, when it fell into the hands of the Romans, it was called Pancaus; and made the metropolis of Iurea and Trachonitis. And from Philip, also, son of Herod the Great, who very much enlarged and adorned it, it was called Cæsarea Philippi, in honour of Tiberius Cæsar.

[Smote it—and dwelt therein.] Were not disturbed in their possession.

[Called Leshem, Dan.] Thus conquerors were wont to change the names of places which they subdued. This was done after Joshua's death; and is related more largely in the book of Judges, ch. xviii. where there is an account of the whole expedition. From whence some argue this book was not written by Joshua; whereas no more can be inferred from it than this, that, in aftertimes, Ezra, or some other, thought good to put in this verse here, to complete the account of the Danites' possessions. But any one may see, as Huetius observes, that if this verse were taken away, all that is said of this tribe coheres perfectly; and there is no breach at all in the context of the foregoing with the following verse after this. Which is an argument, that this short account of their taking Leshem were not the words of the writer of this book, but inserted afterward by some other person. For if they were taken away, this relation of the Danites' lot would be more like the account of the lot of all the rest.

Ver. 48.] The number of them is not set down, as in the foregoing tribes; of which it is to no purpose to inquire the reason.

Ver. 49. When they had made an end of dividing the land] That is, after every tribe had their portion assigned to them.

[Gave an inheritance to Joshua] We cannot but observe the wonderful modesty of this great man, who received his portion last of all; and then, not by lot, but by their gift; who were already possessed of the whole land.

Ver. 50. According to the word of the Lord they gave him the city which he asked.] God, indeed, had ordered that he should have a portion, and that he should choose it; but he was content to stay for it till every body else was served. We do not expressly read of this command; but many things were said and done which are not recorded. And he being as faithful and upright as Caleb (and, besides, chosen to be the captain of God's people), we cannot but think, that when God ordered what Caleb should have, he gave the same direction about Joshua. And so much is implied in those words of Caleb himself, when he demanded his portion of Joshua (xiv. 6). "Thou knowest the thing the Lord said unto Moses the man of God concerning me and thee in Kadesh-barnea" the priest, and Joshua the son of Nun, and the heads of the fathers of the tribes of the children of Israel, divided for an inheritance by lot in Shiloh before the LORD, at the door of the tabernacle of the congregation. So they made an end of dividing the country.

Even Timnath-serah] He did not choose the best place in all the country, but a convenient place in his own tribe; which was seated on the north side of a hill called Gaash; as we read in the latter end of this book.

He built the city, and dwelt therein.] Repaired it, I suppose (for in all likelihood there was a city there before), and made a convenient habitation for his family and kindred. But we read nothing of them; for as he did not affect to make himself king of Canaan, so he contented himself with a little, and made no large provision for his posterity. We have no mention made of his sons or daughters; but (as Conrad. Pellicanus speaks) all the Israelites were his children.

Ver. 51. These are the inheritances, &c.] It is usual after so long an account, to recapitulate in what they had done, and by what authority; which he doth in this verse.

So they made an end of dividing the country.] Every tribe had the place of their scitment appointed to their satisfaction; so that there was no further division made of the land.

CHAPTER XX.

1 God commandeth, 7 and the children of Israel appoint the six cities of refuge.

1 THE LORD also spake unto Joshua, saying,
2 Speak to the children of Israel, saying, Appoint out for you cities of refuge, whereof I spake unto you by the hand of Moses:

3 That the slayer that killeth any person unawares and unwittingly may flee thither: and they shall be your refuge from the avenger of blood.

4 And when he that doth flee unto one of those cities shall stand at the entering of the gate of the city, and shall declare his cause in the ears of the elders of that city, they shall take him into the city unto them, and give him a place, that he may dwell among them.

5 And if the avenger of blood pursue after him, then they shall not deliver the slayer up into his hand; because he smote his neighbour unwittingly and hated him not beforetime.

6 And he shall dwell in that city, until he stand before the congregation for judgment, and until the death of the high priest that shall be in those days: then shall the slayer return, and come unto his own city, and unto his own house, unto the city from whence he fled.

7 ¶ And they appointed Kedesh in Galilee in mount Naphtali, and Shechem in mount Ephraim, and Kirjath-arba, which is Hebron, in the mountain of Judah.

CHAP. XX.

Ver. 1. The Lord—spake unto Joshua.] From the tabernacle, at the door of which he, and Eleazar, and the princes had been making a division of the land; and as the last verse of the foregoing chapter tells us.

Ver. 2. Appoint out for you cities of refuge.] This was the proper time for it; when they were all met together to receive their several portions of land, after an exact survey of the country.

Whereof I spake unto you] In Numb. xxxv. 9—11, &c. where he treats of them at large; and repeats it again, Deut. xix. 1, 2, &c.

Ver. 3. That the slayer that killeth any person unawares—may flee thither.] Such places, every body knows, there were among the heathen; but commonly they were their temples, and their altars, as many have observed; particularly Joh. Gentius lately in his book De Victimis Humanis, par. iii. cap. 21. p.
483, &c. But there were also some cities that had this privilege, as Dilherrus (who thinks herein the gentiles imitated the Jews) observes out of Tacitus, lib. iii. Annal. where he saith the principal cities of Greece contented before Tiberius about this matter, De Jure Asylorum (see Dissert. De Cacozelia Gentilium, cap. 3).

They shall be your refuge] Protect such persons from him who studied to avenge the blood of the slain. Concerning whom, see Numb. xxxv. 12.

Ver. 4. Shall stand at the entering] Desiring to be admitted and protected there.

Shall declare his cause in the ears of the elders] That is, the judges, who sat at the gate before mentioned (Deut. xvi. 18).

They shall take him into the city] Being satisfied he was such a person as he pretended.

Give him a place.] Assign a convenient habitation for him; these cities being appointed by God for that purpose, and given unto those who inhabited them on this condition, that they should entertain such persons when they fled to them.

Ver. 5. If the avenger of blood pursue after him.] Desiring he might be delivered up into his hands.

Then they shall not deliver the slayer up] But defend him from his assaults.

Because he smote his neighbour unwittingly.] It was a casual slaughter, without any design of doing him hurt, as far as appeared to them. If the avenger pursued the slayer so closely, that they had not time to examine the matter at the gate of the city, they were not to let him stand there; but take him in (and afterward hear his cause and judge it), lest the avenger should kill him before he was admitted into their city.

Ver. 6. Until he stand before the congregation for judgment.] The avenger might bring him before another tribunal, to be tried whether he killed the man by chance or not (see Numb. xxxv. 24, 25).

Until the death of the high priest] If that court found him not guilty of wilful murder, he was restored to the city of refuge; but confined to live there till the death of the high priest (see in the same place).

Then shall the slayer return.] See Numb. xxxv. 28.

Ver. 7.] It is commonly observed, that as these three cities were seated on high and eminent places, that they might be seen afar off; so they were at such a distance from each other, that all the country might more easily have the benefit of one or other of them.

8 And on the other side Jordan by Jericho eastward, they assigned Bezer in the wilderness upon the plain out of the tribe of Reuben, and Ramoth in Gilead out of the tribe of Gad, and Golan in Bashan out of the tribe of Manasseh.

9 These were the cities appointed for all the children of Israel, and for the stranger that sojourneth among them, that whosoever killeth any person at unawares might flee thither, and not die by the hand of the avenger of blood, until he stood before the congregation.

For Kedesh was in the north, and Hebron in the south; and Shechem between both. Thus they fulfilled the command of God, Deut. xix. 8.

Ver. 8. On the other side Jordan by Jericho eastward,] On the east of Jericho, in the land of the two tribes and half; which was almost as long as the land of Canaan, though not so broad.

They assigned Bezer—and Ramoth in Gilead—and Golan in Bashan] These cities were assigned by Moses before he died (Deut. iv. 43), but had not the privilege till now. And it is observable, that if Bezer stood in a flat country, the other two, Ramoth and Golan, were in the high.

Ver. 9. These were the cities appointed for all the children of Israel, and for the stranger] For the safety of all sorts of persons, as is manifest from Numb. xxxv. 15.

That whosoever killeth any person at unawares might flee thither,] It is observable that all these cities belonged to the Levites; who, by their authority, might defend the man from unjust usage; and by their wisdom, direct the elders to judge aright concerning his cause; and also give him good instructions while he lived among them, until the death of the high-priest.

CHAPTER XXI.

1 Eight and forty cities given by lot, out of the other tribes, unto the Levites. 43 God gave the land and rest unto the Israelites, according to his promise.

1 THEN came near the heads of the fathers of the Levites unto Eleazar the priest, and unto Joshua the son of Nun, and unto the heads of the fathers of the tribes of the children of Israel;

2 And they spake unto them at Shiloh in the land of Canaan, saying, The LORD commanded by the hand of Moses to give us cities to dwell in, with the suburbs thereof for our cattle.

3 And the children of Israel gave unto the Levites out of their inheritance, at the commandment of the LORD, these cities and their suburbs.

4 And the lot came out for the families of the Kohathites: and the children of Aaron the priest, which were of the Levites, had by lot out of the tribe of Judah, and out of the tribe of Simeon, and out of the tribe of Benjamin, thirteen cities.

5 And the rest of the children of Kohath had by lot out of the families of the tribe of Ephraim, and out of the tribe of Dan, and out of the half tribe of Manasseh, ten cities.

6 And the children of Gershon had by lot out of the families of the tribe of Issachar, and out of the tribe of Asher, and out of the tribe of Naphtali, and out of the half tribe of Manasseh in Bashan, thirteen cities.

7 The children of Merari by their families had

CHAP. XXI.

Ver. 1. Then came near] After the cities of refuge were settled.

The heads of the fathers of the Levites] So the princes of the several tribes (who divided the land, together with Joshua and Eleazar) are called, xiv. 1, and in the conclusion of this verse. And, therefore, the chief persons descended from Kohath, Gershon, and Merari (who were the fathers of the Levites), are here meant by the "heads of the fathers" of that tribe.

Unto Eleazar—and unto the heads of the fathers of the tribes] Appointed by God to see the land divided, called the princes of the tribes, Numb. xxxiv. 18.

Ver. 2.] This command is registered in Numb. xxxv. 2, &c., and is set down before the mention of cities of refuge (which are commanded in the following part of the chapter), though, it seems, that command was executed before this.

Ver. 3.] Not only Joshua, Eleazar, and the princes, but all the people of Israel acknowledged this obligation, which God had laid upon them; and accordingly these words import, that the people separated so many cities as he commanded by Moses (which were to be forty and eight, Numb. xxxv. 7), for the habitation of the Levites. Which cities are here named, and distributed among them in this chapter.

Ver. 4. The lot came out for the families of the Kohathites,] After the cities were set out, which should belong to them, then they were divided by lot among the several families of the Levites; as the whole land was among the tribes. And the first lot came out for the noblest family in the tribe of Levi; for Moses and Aaron were descended from Kohath.

The children of Aaron the priest,] The family of Aaron being priests were the principal among the Levites; and therefore were first and very honourably provided for.

Had by lot out of the tribe of Judah, &c.] It was by a special providence, that the share which fell to the priests was in those tribes that were nearest to the city; which God intended should be the fixed place of his worship and service in future times; that the priests might be ready to give their attendance there, without much trouble.

Ver. 5. The children of Kohath] All his descendants were not priests, but Aaron and his family alone; the rest were bare Levites.

Ephraim,—Dan,—Manasseh] These three tribes were nearest to the three forementioned; so that the Kohathites were not far separated one from another.

Ver. 6.] Among the sons of Levi, Gershon is mentioned as the eldest, Exod. vi. 16, Numb. iii. 17, but the lot came up first to the children of Kohath, the priests being descended from him.

out of the tribe of Reuben, and out of the tribe of Gad, and out of the tribe of Zebulun, twelve cities.

8 And the children of Israel gave by lot unto the Levites these cities with their suburbs, as the Lord commanded by the hand of Moses.

9 ¶ And they gave out of the tribe of the children of Judah, and out of the tribe of the children of Simeon, these cities which are here mentioned by name.

10 Which the children of Aaron, being of the families of the Kohathites, who were of the children of Levi, had: for their's was the first lot.

11 And they gave them the city of Arba the father of Anak, which city is Hebron, in the hill country of Judah, with the suburbs thereof round about it.

12 But the fields of the city, and the villages thereof, gave they to Caleb the son of Jephunneh for his possession.

13 ¶ Thus they gave to the children of Aaron the priest Hebron with her suburbs, to be a city of refuge for the slayer; and Libnah with her suburbs,

14 And Jattir with her suburbs, and Eshtemoa with her suburbs,

15 And Holon with her suburbs, and Debir with her suburbs,

16 And Ain with her suburbs, and Juttah with her suburbs, and Beth-sheanish with her suburbs; nine cities out of those two tribes.

17 And out of the tribe of Benjamin, Gibeon with her suburbs, Geba with her suburbs, 18 Anathoth with her suburbs, and Almon with her suburbs; four cities.

19 All the cities of the children of Aaron, the priests, were thirteen cities with their suburbs.

20 ¶ And the families of the children of Kohath, the Levites which remained of the children of Kohath, even they had the cities of their lot out of the tribe of Ephraim.

21 For they gave them Shechem with her suburbs in mount Ephraim, to be a city of refuge for the slayer; and Gezer with her suburbs, 22 And Kibzaim with her suburbs, and Beth-horon with her suburbs; four cities.

23 And out of the tribe of Dan, Eltekeh, with her suburbs, Gibbethon with her suburbs, 24 Aijalon with her suburbs, Gathrimmon with her suburbs; four cities.

25 And out of the half tribe of Manasseh,

Ver. 7.] This is only a general account of the tribes in which their several lots fell, and of the number of cities bestowed on their several families.

Ver. 8. The children of Israel gave by lot unto the Levites] The children of Israel, as I said before, gave them; and the lot divided them.

As the Lord commanded—Moses.] Who ordered both how many cities they should have, and how large the suburbs of them should be (see Numh. xxxiv. 3, 4).

Ver. 9.] Here now follows a particular account of the names of those cities, which were said before in general to have been given out of these two tribes. Which are put together, because the lot of Simeon was taken out of the lot of Judah.

Ver. 10. The Kohathites,] One of the families of the Kohathites, and the eldest of them; for they descended from Amram, the eldest son of Kohath (Exod. vi. 18. Numb. iii. 19).

Their's was the first lot.] They had the honour to be first provided for, as was said before, ver. 4.

Ver. 11. And they] That is, Eleazar, Joshua, and the princes.

Hebron.] See of this city, xiv. 15. xv. 13.

Ver. 12.] The priests had only the city and suburbs, which were their possession, as much as the fields and villages were Caleb's, on whom they were bestowed before (xiv. 13, &c.).

Ver. 13. They gave to the children of Aaron the priest Hebron—to be a city of refuge] It was given them with this condition, that they who slew a man unawares should be entertained here, and have a place given to them to live securely among them (xx. 4).

Libnah with her suburbs.] This is to be understood to belong to them no otherwise than Hebron did, unto which they had no right beyond the city and suburbs; and, therefore, the fields and the villages of Libnah they had nothing to do withal; and the same is to be noted of all the following cities of the priests.

Ver. 14.] These are mentioned as belonging to Judah, xv. 48. 50.

Ver. 15. Holon] Called Helin, 1 Chron. vi. 56.

Debir with her suburbs,] See xv. 15.

Ver. 16. Ain] A city in the tribe of Simeon (xix. 17), but taken out of Judah (xv. 32).

Juttah] See xv. 55.

Beth-sheanish] Unto which city the providence of God directed the kine, which drew the cart wherein the Philistines put the ark when they sent it home, there being a great many priests in it, to receive it with due care and reverence (1 Sam. vi. 13, 13).

Nine cities out of those two tribes.] For the tribe of Judah was very large; and the command of God was, that "from them which had many cities they should give many" (Numb. xxxv. 8).

Ver. 17. Benjamin, Gibeon—Geba] See xviii. 24, 25.

Ver. 18. Anathoth] The city of the prophet Jeremiah, who was a priest (Jer. i. 1).

Almon] Called Alemeth, in 1 Chron. vi. 60. For there were greater alterations than this made, by length of time, in the names of places.

Four cities.] Which were a great many out of so small a tribe; but the soil of it, as I observed before, was very rich.

Ver. 19. Thirteen cities] As was said, ver. 4.

Ver. 20. The Levites which remained of the children of Kohath,] Who were mere Levites and not priests.

Even they had the cities of their lot out of—Ephraim.] Part of them were planted there, and part of them in two other tribes, as it follows, ver. 23, &c.

Ver. 21. They gave them Shechem] See xx. 7.

Gezer] See xvi. 3. 10.

Ver. 22. Kibzaim] Which is called Jokmeam in 1 Chron. vi. 68.

Beth-horon] We read of both the Beth-horons in the description of this tribe, the upper and the nether, xvi. 3. 5. the first of which seems to be here meant.

Ver. 23, 24.] The four cities mentioned in these two verses we find before in this tribe, xix. 42. 44, 45.

Ver. 25. Half tribe of Manasseh,] That half of it which was settled in Canaan.

Tannach] See xvii. 11.

Gath-rimmon] In 1 Chron. vi. 70, these two cities are called Aner and Bileam; so much were names changed in a long tract of time. Or, they being dis-

Tanach with her suburbs, and Gath-rimmon with her suburbs; two cities.

26 All the cities were ten with their suburbs for the families of the children of Kohath that remained.

27 ¶ And unto the children of Gershon, of the families of the Levites, out of the other half tribe of Manasseh they gave Golan in Bashan with her suburbs, to be a city of refuge for the slayer; and Beesh-terah with her suburbs; two cities.

28 And out of the tribe of Issachar, Kishon with her suburbs, Dabareh with her suburbs, 29 Jarmuth with her suburbs, En-gannim with her suburbs; four cities.

30 And out of the tribe of Asher, Mishal with her suburbs, Abdon with her suburbs, 31 Helkath with her suburbs, and Rehob with her suburbs; four cities.

32 And out of the tribe of Naphtali, Kedesh in Galilee with her suburbs, to be a city of refuge for the slayer; and Hammoth-dor with her suburbs, and Kartan with her suburbs; three cities.

33 All the cities of the Gershonites according to their families were thirteen cities with their suburbs.

34 ¶ And unto the families of the children of Merari, the rest of the Levites, out of the tribe of Zebulun, Jokneam with her suburbs, and Kartah with her suburbs, 35 Dimnah with her suburbs, Nahalal with her suburbs; four cities.

36 And out of the tribe of Reuben, Bezer with her suburbs, and Jahazah with her suburbs, 37 Kedemoth with her suburbs, and Mephaath with her suburbs; four cities.

38 And out of the tribe of Gad, Ramoth in Gilead with her suburbs, to be a city of refuge for the slayer; and Mahanaim with her suburbs, 39 Heshbon with her suburbs, Jazer with her suburbs; four cities in all.

40 So all the cities for the children of Merari by their families, which were remaining of the families of the Levites, were by their lot twelve cities.

41 All the cities of the Levites within the possession of the children of Israel were forty and eight cities with their suburbs.

possessed of the two cities here mentioned, by the invasions of their enemies (who perhaps demolished them), these two others were given in lieu of them.

Two cities.] Which was a just proportion to the other whole tribes, who gave four.

Ver. 26. For the families of the children of Kohath] Who were not of the children of Aaron, the priests (ver. 5).

Ver. 27. Gershon, of the families of the Levites, out of the other half tribe of Manasseh] Which had their inheritance on the other side of Jordan.

Golan in Bashan] See xx. 8. From whence the neighbouring country was Gaulonitis.

Beesh-terah] Called Ashtaroth in 1 Chron. vi. 71, by a very light change, only leaving out the first letter.

Two cities.] The same number that was given out of the other half of this tribe (ver. 25).

Ver. 28. Kishon] See xix. 20. Called Kadesh, 1 Chron. vi. 72.

Dabareh] Not mentioned before in this book, but in 1 Chron. vi. 72.

Ver. 29. Jarmuth] Called Ramoth, 1 Chron. vi. 73.

En-gannim] See ch. xix. 21, called Anem, 1 Chron. vi. 73.

Ver. 30. Mishal] Called Misheal, xix. 26, and Mashal, 1 Chron. vi. 74.

Abdon] Mentioned in that place in the Chronicles; but not in the nineteenth chapter of this book (see ver. 31, of that chapter).

Ver. 31. Helkath] See xix. 25. Called Hukok, 1 Chron. vi. 75.

Rehob] Mentioned there, and Josh. xix. 28.

Ver. 32. Kadesh in Galilee] See xx. 7.

Hammoth-dor] Called simply Hammath, xix. 35, and Hammon, 1 Chron. vi. 76.

Kartan] Called Kirjathaim in 1 Chron. vi. 76.

Three cities.] This being a smaller territory, it seems, than the rest of the tribes forementioned, who gave four.

Ver. 33.] As was said before, ver. 6.

Ver. 34. Merari, the rest of the Levites.] The remaining families of the Levites; for there were three heads of them; Gershon, Kohath, and Merari.

Out of the tribe of Zebulun, Jokneam—and Kartah] Of the former, see xix. 11, and of the latter, ver. 16.

Ver. 35. Dimnah—Nahalal] See xix. 15, 16.

Four cities.] There are but two mentioned, 1 Chron. vi. 77, with quite different names; the other two, it seems, being lost before that time.

Ver. 36. Bezer] Which was one of the cities of refuge (xx. 8) though not here mentioned, as the rest are in the foregoing part of this chapter; and in ver. 38.

Jahazah] These, and the two cities in the following verse, Kedemoth and Mephaath, are mentioned as cities in this tribe, xiii. 18. And so they are in 1 Chron. vi. 78, 79, as Levitical cities.

Ver. 37. Kedemoth] Some have urged against the integrity of the Hebrew text, that this and the foregoing verse are not to be found in some ancient copies of the Bible; and, indeed, the Masorites acknowledge as much. But it is evident that they are found in copies of very great antiquity; and the context shows, that they ought to be here; as Bishop Walton observes in his Considration Considered, ch. 6. sect. 14. And Hottinger also (who answers this cavil more largely) observes, that they are in a most accurate MS. of the Duke of Rohan's, written 1495 (see his Thesaurus Philolog. lib. i. cap. ii. quæst. 4. p. 181, &c.). The Masorites, who take notice of this omission, acknowledge, in the margin of this verse, that it was to be found in several copies.

Ver. 38. Ramoth in Gilead] See xx. 8.

Mahanaim] This city was made by Abner the royal sect for Ish-bosheth, Βασιλειον ἐποίησε, as Josephus speaks, lib. vii. Antiq. cap. 1.

Ver. 39.] These, with the foregoing, are mentioned 1 Chron. vi. 80, 81.

Ver. 40.] As was said in general before, ver. 7.

Ver. 41.] So God ordered by Moses, Numb. xxxv. 7. And it is a demonstration that Moses was divinely inspired to make such an appointment; before they knew whether, without straitening the other tribes, they could afford so many cities to the Levites. For when Joshua and Caleb went up to search the land (with the rest, mentioned Numb. xiii.) they could have no opportunity to take the dimensions of the country; whereby Moses might know there would be room enough to allow the Levites so large a proportion as this; but he was directed to it by a Divine foreknowledge.

Ver. 42. These cities—with their suburbs round about them: viz. Two thousand cubits on every side, round the city, as is ordered Numb. xxxv. 5. Which must be owned to be a great proportion for this tribe; which was the smallest of them all. But God would have an ample provision made for his ministers; and they had none of the land belonging to these cities, as was before observed, but only room for themselves, and for their cattle.

Thus were all these cities.] Disposed and settled according to the Divine commandment. Six of which were cities of refuge; and the other forty-two had the same privileges, if the inhabitants pleased, and at the cost of those that fled thither for safety (see upon Numb. xxxv. 6).

Ver. 43. The Lord gave unto Israel all the land which he sware to give] He gave them a right to the whole country (which was distributed among them, as he appointed, by a lot which he ordered and directed), and he gave them the actual possession and enjoyment of the greatest part of it; and he gave them power to subdue the rest (if they continued obedient to him) as soon as it was convenient. Which was exactly according to his promise and oath made to them; for they not being numerous enough to people the whole country, at their first coming into it, he never intended to expel all the old inhabitants at once, but by degrees; as we read expressly, Exod. xxxiii. 29, 30.

They possessed it,] Went every man to his lot, and peopled the country, as far as at present they were able.

Ver. 44. The Lord gave them rest.] None molested them in their possessions; but they ploughed, and sowed, and reaped, &c. without any disturbance.

There stood not a man of all their enemies before them;] For whoever had opposed them, were overthrown and destroyed by them: and, as it follows,

The Lord delivered all their enemies into their hand.] Which is not to be understood, as if all the people of Canaan were absolutely under their power; but that, as long as Joshua lived, not a man appeared to fight with them, but was delivered up unto them.

Ver. 45. All came to pass.] Which they themselves (he tells them afterward, xxiii. 14), knew very well, and could not but confess. But it must be understood according to the explication of ver. 43. For the time of fulfilling some part of his promise was not come; and the completing of what was begun depended upon their obedience to him. “But (as Conradus Pellicanus here admonishes) we are taught by this the truth of the Divine promises; and it ought to establish the belief of the faithful, that it do not fluctuate; though the promises of God seem to us to be fulfilled very slowly.

CHAPTER XXII.

1 The two tribes and half with a blessing are sent home. 9 They build the altar of testimony in their journey.
11 The Israelites are offended thereat. 21 They give them good satisfaction.

1 THEN Joshua called the Reubenites, and the Gadites, and the half tribe of Manasseh,

2 And said unto them, Ye have kept all that Moses the servant of the LORD commanded you, and have obeyed my voice in all that I commanded you:

3 Ye have not left your brethren these many days unto this day, but have kept the charge of the commandment of the LORD your God.

CHAP. XXII.

Ver. 1.] Who came as auxiliaries to their brethren when they passed over Jordan; as they had engaged to do, when they received their inheritance on the other side of it (i. 12—14, &c.).

Ver. 2.] Numb. xxxii. 20, &c. Deut. iii. 18, &c. In this and the following verses, he commends them for their obedience unto God and unto him; and for their fidelity to their promises; and their constancy and patience in their piety to God, and love to their brethren.

Ver. 3. Ye have not left your brethren these many days] Seven years (some think as many more) they had continued in their service; as long as the war lasted with the Canaanites; yea, till they had seen their brethren settled in the lots fallen to them.

4 And now the LORD your God hath given rest unto your brethren, as he promised them: therefore now return ye, and get you unto your tents, and unto the land of your possession, which Moses the servant of the LORD gave you on the other side Jordan.

5 But take diligent heed to do the commandment and the law, which Moses the servant of the LORD charged you, to love the LORD your

But have kept the charge] During which time they never refused what was expected from them for the help of their brethren (see xi. 18. xiv. 10). This was a great proof of their patient obedience, in staying so long from their wives and children.

Ver. 4. Now the Lord your God hath given rest unto your brethren,] Which he had done for them before, i. 13.

Tents,] So he calls their houses, because this was the common word used for a long time in the wilderness, to signify a habitation.

Unto the land of your possession,] It was but reasonable and just that they should go and enjoy what God had given them, now their brethren were in a quiet possession of their portion; and that their fidelity in performing their promise, should be rewarded with the like, in dismissing them, when they

God, and to walk in all his ways, and to keep his commandments, and to cleave unto him, and to serve him with all your heart and with all your soul.

6 So Joshua blessed them, and sent them away: and they went unto their tents.

7 ¶ Now to the one half of the tribe of Manasseh Moses had given possession in Bashan: but unto the other half thereof gave Joshua among their brethren on this side Jordan westward. And when Joshua sent them away also unto their tents, then he blessed them,

8 And he spake unto them, saying, Return with much riches unto your tents, and with very much cattle, with silver, and with gold, and with brass, and with iron, and with very much raiment: divide the spoil of your enemies with your brethren.

9 ¶ And the children of Reuben and the children of Gad and the half tribe of Manasseh returned, and departed from the children of Israel out of Shiloh, which is in the land of Canaan, to go unto the country of Gilead, to the land of their possession, whereof they were possessed, according to the word of the Lord by the hand of Moses.

10 ¶ And when they came unto the borders of Jordan, that are in the land of Canaan, the had done their business. For they engaged to serve no longer, than till they had driven the Canaanites out of their country (Numb. xxxii. 21).

Ver. 5. Take diligent heed to do the commandment and the law.] That is, to observe all his precepts (as they had done this of aiding their brethren), and for that end, preserve in mind all that God had done for them (see Deut. iv. 9).

To love the Lord your God, &c.] Especially to worship the Lord alone with sincere affection; which Moses inculcated above all things, before he left them (Deut. vi. 5. 13. 14. x. 12. xi. 13. 22. xx. 9. xxx. 6. 20).

Ver. 6. So Joshua blessed them, and sent them away:] He not only praised and commended them; but dismissed them with a solemn prayer to God for his blessing upon them. And he seems first to have dismissed with his blessing the Reubenites and Gadites; and then to have blessed the Manassites by themselves.

They went unto their tents.] In order to pack up their goods, and make themselves ready for their departure.

Ver. 7. To the one half of the tribe of Manasseh, &c.] This is repeated to show why he mentioned only half the tribe of Manasseh, ver. 1, and to introduce what follows.

When Joshua sent them away] As he had done the Reubenites and Gadites.

Then he blessed them.] This seems to signify that he gave a peculiar blessing to the Manassites; that is, rewarded their services, by some present which he made them: for so the word blessing (I observed before) sometimes signifies (2 Kings v. 15). And he did this the rather, because the Manassites were near of kin to the children of Ephraim (of which tribe he himself was), and were now to be separated from the rest of their brethren in Canaan.

Ver. 8. He spake unto them.] This speech seems to be directed to the Reubenites and Gadites, as well as to the Manassites; though they had a peculiar concern in it.

Return with much riches unto your tents, &c.] As much as to say, Part with your brethren contentedly and well-pleased; laden with the spoils which you have got in the wars against the people of Canaan. For they had their share in the prey, as well as the other seven tribes and a half; and carried it away to their own country.

Divide the spoil of your enemies with your brethren.] He orders them, when they came home, to let those that stayed on the other side Jordan, to defend their wives, children, and cattle, to have a share in the spoil which they had gotten. For this was thought an equal thing by God himself in the war they had with the Midianites, before they came over Jordan; when twelve thousand went out to fight; who had one half of the spoil; the other half being divided among all the congregation that stayed at home (Numb. xxxi. 27). And it is very reasonable to think, that now the same proportion was observed; the forty thousand who went to help their brethren in the war, having one half of the spoil; and their brethren who stayed to guard their possession, the other half: so that the warriors had the far greater share, as there was reason; because they had hazarded their lives in the enterprise. But in David's time it was made a law, that they who went to fight, and they that stayed to guard the stuff, should have an equal share in the prey (1 Sam. xxx. 24, 25. see Gen. xiv. 17).

Ver. 9.] This shows that he gave them all his blessing in Shiloh, where the sanctuary was; and sent them from thence, under the Divine protection, to their own country: which is here called the country of Gilead, because that was an eminent part of their country, divided between the children of Gad and Manasseh; and here comprehends all the rest of the land where the Reubenites lived.

Ver. 10. When they came unto the borders of Jordan.] Or, "they came" (for the word when is not in the Hebrew) unto the banks of that river.

In the land of Canaan.] This seems to import that they built the altar, mentioned in the end of the verse, before they went over Jordan, in the land of Canaan. Which is not at all likely; for it would not have answered their intention: which was to show, that Jordan did not make such a separation between them and their brethren, but that they were one people with those in Canaan; where the altar of God was in Shiloh. Therefore I take this to be a short manner of speech; signifying that they came to the borders of Jordan in the land of Canaan; and passed over into their own country on the other side of the river. And so the Hebrew word gelilath (which we translate borders) seems to signify, a certain place near Jordan, to which they came. The Vulgar Latin translate it heaps; the LXX. in the Vatican copy, retains the word Γαλαδ (or Γαλαδς, as other copies more truly have it), taking it for some noted place, which was near to their passage over Jordan.

Built there an altar by Jordan.] The word there hath made it thought that they built this altar in the land of Canaan before mentioned; but the particle sham relates to time as well as place, and may be translated then as well as there. Examples of which there are in Judg. v. 21. Prov. viii. 27. compared with ver. 30. Eccles. iii. 17. and most plainly, Isa. xlvi. 16. And thus it is to be here interpreted, that, before they went any farther, they stayed by Jordan till they had built this altar on the borders of their own country: for so the next verse teaches us to expound it, and will admit of no other sense; where it is said, they had "built an altar over against the land of Canaan."

A great altar to see to.] Which made a great show children of Reuben and the children of Gad and the half tribe of Manasseh built there an altar by Jordan, a great altar to see to.

11 ¶ And the children of Israel heard say, Behold, the children of Reuben and the children of Gad and the half tribe of Manasseh have built an altar over against the land of Canaan, in the borders of Jordan, at the passage of the children of Israel.

12 And when the children of Israel heard of it, the whole congregation of the children of Israel gathered themselves together at Shiloh, to go up to war against them.

13 And the children of Israel sent unto the children of Reuben, and to the children of Gad, and to the half tribe of Manasseh, into the land of Gilcad, Phinehas the son of Eleazar the priest, 14 And with him ten princes, of each chief house a prince throughout all the tribes of Israel; and each one was an head of the house of their fathers among the thousands of Israel.

15 ¶ And they came unto the children of Reuben, and to the children of Gad, and to the half tribe of Manasseh, unto the land of Gilead, and they spake with them, saying,

16 Thus saith the whole congregation of the LORD, What trespass is this that ye have committed against the God of Israel, to turn away this day from following the LORD, in that ye have builded you an altar, that ye might rebel this day against the LORD?

17 Is the iniquity of Peor too little for us, from which we are not cleansed until this day, although there was a plague in the congregation of the LORD, being very high and conspicuous, that it might be seen afar off. For being built, not by a private person, but by the whole body of a great people, they thought they could not make it too stately and magnificent. And herein it differed so much from the altar made by Moses, that they thought, perhaps, it would administer the less occasion to their brethren to suspect it was intended for sacrifice.

Ver. 11. The children of Israel] That were in the land of Canaan. This is an instance of such a short manner of speech as I take that in the foregoing verse to be; which must be made out by some such supplement as is there mentioned. For the Reubenites, Gadites, &c. were the children of Israel, as well as those settled in the land of Canaan.

Heard say,] This is an argument the altar was not built on their side of Jordan; for then they would have seen what they were doing, and hindered the building; whereas they heard nothing of it till it was built.*

Have built an altar] By a common consent.

Over against the land of Canaan,—at the passage of the children of Israel,] Either there where they now passed over Jordan, or where they all passed over when they entered Canaan, or at the usual place where every body was wont to pass over, that they might take the more notice of it. And here also were the gileath before mentioned, like those on the other side, which seem to have been great banks east up to keep Jordan from overflowing too far.

Ver. 12. Whole congregation] Not all the people of the land, but their elders and heads of their tribes, who in the foregoing books are often called by the name of colledath ("all the congregation"). See Numb. xxvii. 2. xxxii. 2. and ch. xviii. of this book, ver. 1.

Gathered themselves together] It seems they had been separated, being gone to settle in their several cities.

To go up to war against them,] To consult about it. For they imagined them to be apostates from their religion, which, as it required them to worship the Lord alone, and no other god, so at no other place but that which he himself had chosen. Where he allowed but one altar, as there was but one God (see Deut. xii. 5, 6, 11, 13, 18, 26, 27, xiii. 12, &c.). That altar also, where he commanded sacrifices to be offered, was to be but three cubits high (Exod. xxvii. 1), so that they went not up to it by steps (Exod. xx. 26); whereas this was a high altar, like those among the heathens, who loved to sacrifice on high places (i. e. mountains), and also upon high and lofty altars, which advanced their sacrifices nearer heaven. And this, perhaps, was one thing that incensed the congregation now assembled, and made them think their brethren were lapsed to idolatry; either intending to worship other gods, or the God of Israel in an unlawful place and manner.

Ver. 13. The children of Israel sent unto the children of Reuben, &c.] Their zeal did not so transport them, but that they prudently considered it was fit to be rightly informed of the matter of fact; and if any thing was amiss, to endeavour to set it right by counsel and argument, before they betook themselves to arms: in order to which they sent the embassy here mentioned.

Phinehas] A person of very eminent authority among them, and more likely to be received with due regard (Numb. xxxi. 6).

Ver. 14. With him ten princes, of each chief house a prince] Which were nine and a half; so that a prince was chosen out of the half tribe of Manasseh, as well as out of the other nine.

Each one was an head of the house of their fathers] That is, they were chiliarchs, as the LXX. call them, and the chief among such rulers of thousands in the several tribes (Exod. xviii. 21).

Ver. 15. They came unto the children of Reuben, &c.] Who, hearing of their coming, held a congregation, it is likely, of the chief persons among them, to receive their message.

Unto the land of Gilead,] So he calls here, and ver. 13, the country of the two tribes and half; by the name of an eminent part of it, which is put for the whole, as I observed upon ver. 9.

They spake with them,] Made the following speech in the assembly of the two tribes and half, by the mouth of Phinehas.

Ver. 16. Thus saith the whole congregation] The representatives of the whole people of Israel, in whose name this embassy was sent.

What trespass is this that ye have committed] They were not able to express the heinousness of it.

To turn away this day] So soon after they had seen his wonderful works, and received such a charge from Joshua as he gave them at their departure from Canaan (ver. 5).

In that ye have builded you an altar,] Which they supposed was for a sacrifice.

That ye might rebel this day] Which was direct opposition to his express command, immediately after he gave them the law from Mount Sinai (Exod. xx. 24. And see the places before named upon ver. 12).

Ver. 17. Is the iniquity of Peor too little for us,

18 But that ye must turn away this day from following the LORD? and it will be, seeing ye rebel to day against the LORD, that to morrow he will be wroth with the whole congregation of Israel.

19 Notwithstanding, if the land of your possession be unclean, then pass ye over unto the land of the possession of the LORD, wherein the LORD's tabernacle dwelleth, and take possession among us: but rebel not against the LORD, nor rebel against us, in building you an altar beside the altar of the LORD our God.

20 Did not Achan the son of Zerah commit a trespass in the accursed thing, and wrath fell on all the congregation of Israel? and that man perished not alone in his iniquity.

from which we are not cleansed] He instances in this, being himself an actor in the punishment of it, though it deserved still greater punishment. For that is the meaning of "we are not cleansed;" have not sufficiently suffered for that sin; there being some remaining (he feared) that were infected with those idolatrous inclinations, whom God might justly cut off.

Although there was a plague] Which destroyed twenty and four thousand (see Numb. xxv. 9).

Ver. 18. But that ye must turn away this day from following the Lord?] Commit more sins of that nature. For whether they intended to worship other gods, or to worship the God of Israel in a manner he did not allow, it was, in his esteem, idolatry.

It will be, seeing ye rebel to day] It must be acknowledged that they were a little too hasty in concluding their brethren to be rebels, before they had asked them for what purpose they had erected this altar, which should properly have been the first question; but their pious fear, lest God should be offended, made them immediately fall into this vehement expostulation.

That to morrow] That is, quickly, or speedily.

He will be wroth] With you for committing this sin, and with us for not punishing it.

Ver. 19. Notwithstanding,] Or rather, "and now," as the LXX. translate the Hebrew participle veac.

If the land of your possession be unclean,] They imagined the Reubenites, and Gadites, and Manassites, might take their land to be less holy for want of an altar, and such a token of the Divine presence as there was in the tabernacle. This appears to be the sense by what follows: which our Mr. Mede carries something further, in his observations concerning the appropriation of some place for the worship of God: which so universally prevailed from the beginning, that it was believed in those elder times, that those countries and territories wherein no place was set apart for God's worship were unhallowed and unclean. This he thinks may be rightly gathered from these words (see book ii. upon Eccles. v. 1. p. 433).

Then pass ye over—and take possession among us,] This expresses a wonderful zeal for God and the common good, wherewith they were at present possessed; which made them desire rather to give up some of their own land to them, than have them fall from their religion.

But rebel not against the Lord, nor rebel against us,] They desire them not to break the common bond that tied them to each other, as well as unto God, which was the same religion.

In building you an altar] Which was, in effect, to forsake the Lord.

21 ¶ Then the children of Reuben and the children of Gad and the half tribe of Manasseh answered, and said unto the heads of the thousands of Israel,

22 The LORD God of gods, the LORD God of gods, he knoweth, and Israel he shall know; if it be in rebellion, or if in transgression against the LORD, (save us not this day,)

23 That we have built us an altar to turn from following the LORD, or if to offer thereon burnt offering or meat offering, or if to offer peace offerings thereon, let the LORD himself require it;

24 And if we have not rather done it for fear of this thing, saying, In time to come your children might speak unto our children, saying,

Ver. 20. Did not Achan the son of Zerah] Descended from Zerah (vii 17, 18).

Commit a trespass] This was a fresher instance than that of Baal-Peor (ver. 17).

And wrath fell on all the congregation] See vii. 1, 2, &c. In this he explains what he said ver. 18, that the whole congregation was in danger to fall under the Divine displeasure by their apostasy.

Ver. 21.] Some of the heads of their tribes made the following reply, in the name of all the rest.

Ver. 22. The Lord God of gods, the Lord God of gods,] In the Hebrew, "the God of gods, the Lord; the God of gods, the Lord." Where there are three names of God, Elohim, and Jehovah; signifying that they owned no other God but him whom their forefathers worshipped, by what name soever he was called; that God, who is infinitely above all creatures, the fountain of all other beings; and they double the expression of their devotion to him, that they might signify their earnestness and vehemency to purge themselves from the crime objected to them.

Some of the ancient Jews thought a great mystery is contained in these words: for the Midrash Tillim upon the fiftieth Psalm (quoted by Mart. a Raymund in his Pugio Fidei, par. iii. distinct. 1. cap. 4.) thus discourses: "What did they see that they mention these words twice, 'El, Elohim, Jehovah; El, Elohim, Jehovah?' They said, 'God, God, Jehovah,' the first time, because by these the world was created; and they said 'God, God, Jehovah,' the second time, because by these the law was given." Where he plainly insinuates a plurality of persons, saying, behen (by these) the world was created, &c. and refers to the first words of Genesis, where it is said Elohim created in the beginning the heaven and the earth. No wonder then that Christians have been of the same opinion, and thought these three names denoted the Father, Son, and Holy Ghost; as the author of the old Nitzacon (three hundred years before that of R. Lippman's) acknowledges, p. 59. Unto which he gives no answer, but only this, That these three belong to one God; which we also acknowledge.

He knoweth,] They appeal to Him who searcheth the hearts of men, and their most secret designs.

Israel he shall know;] By seeing their constancy in the religion of their ancestors.

If it be in rebellion,—(save us not this day,)] They turn their speech on a sudden (as is usual in great passion) unto God himself, desiring they may not live, but be immediately destroyed by him, if they intended either to throw off his worship and service, or to worship him in any other way than according to his appointment.

Ver. 23.] That is, they desire God to punish it (for

What have ye to do with the LORD God of Israel?

25 For the LORD hath made Jordan a border between us and you, ye children of Reuben and children of Gad; ye have no part in the LORD: so shall your children make our children cease from fearing the LORD.

26 Therefore we said, Let us now prepare to build us an altar, not for burnt offering, nor for sacrifice:

27 But that it may be a witness between us, and you, and our generations after us, that we might do the service of the LORD before him with our burnt offerings, and with our sacrifices, and with our peace offerings; that your children may not say to our children in time to come, Ye have no part in the LORD.

28 Therefore said we, that it shall be, when they should so say to us or to our generations in time to come, that we may say again, Behold the pattern of the altar of the LORD, which our fathers made, not for burnt offerings, nor for sacrifices; but it is a witness between us and you.

29 God forbid that we should rebel against the LORD, and turn this day from following the LORD, to build an altar for burnt offerings, for meat offerings, or for sacrifices, beside the altar of the LORD our God that is before his tabernacle.

30 ¶ And when Phinehas the priest, and the princes of the congregation and heads of the thousands of Israel which were with him, heard the words that the children of Reuben and the children of Gad and the children of Manasseh spake, it pleased them.

31 And Phinehas the son of Eleazar the priest said unto the children of Reuben, and to the children of Gad, and to the children of Manasseh, This day we perceive that the LORD is among us, because ye have not committed this trespass against the LORD: now ye have delivered the children of Israel out of the hand of the LORD.

32 ¶ And Phinehas the son of Eleazar the priest, and the princes, returned from the child-so that phrase require it signifies, Deut. xviii. 19), if they intended to offer any sort of sacrifice whatsoever upon this altar; which they acknowledge had been to turn from their religion.

Ver. 24. For fear of this thing,] The Hebrew word deaga (which we translate fear) signifies such anxiety in their mind as gave them much trouble, till they thought of this way to give themselves ease.

Saying, In time to come your children might speak unto our children, saying, What have ye to do with the Lord God of Israel?] They were afraid a time might come when they should be looked upon as aliens, who had no right to come to the tabernacle and the altar to offer sacrifice there. The Targum hath it, "What have ye to do with the Word of the Lord God of Israel?"

Ver. 25. The Lord hath made Jordan a border between us and you,] Divided us from you by the river Jordan.

Ye have no part in the Lord: so shall your children make our children cease from fearing the Lord.] Make them lose their religion (which is called the fear of God), by pretending they are none of the Lord's people. It was not likely, one would think, such a thing should happen; but they did not know what length of time, and their distance from them, might do, to make them forget their relation unto them, and unto God; their country being no part of the land of promise, as Canaan was. Here again the Targum hath it; "Ye have no part in the Word of the Lord."

Ver. 26.] They again disclaim that, before they give the true reason of what they had done.

Ver. 27. That it may be a witness between us, and you,] For it had been an ancient way of preserving the remembrance of things, by raising such structures to testify to them, Gen. xxx. 48, and used afterward by Joshua himself, xxxiv. 27.

That we might do the service of the Lord before him with our burnt offerings, &c.] Have the privilege to come and worship God at the tabernacle, by offering such sacrifices as the rest of the Israelites did.

Ye have no part in the Lord.] That they might not be thrust away from the altar when they brought their sacrifices, under a pretence that they were none of God's people, because they did not live in the land which he promised to their fathers. Here the Targum uses the same language again, "No part in the Word of the Lord."

Ver. 28. When they shall so say to us—that we may say again,] Have a reply ready, if such a thing as we fear should happen.

Behold the pattern of the altar of the Lord,] Which they could not have exactly imitated, if they had not been acquainted with it, and worshipped God there with their brethren.

Not for burnt offerings, nor for sacrifices,] They thought this could not be too often repeated, that they might not be misunderstood.

But it is a witness between us and you,] A public testimony that we ought not to be excluded from the worship of God among you, being of the same communion with you.

Ver. 29.] They utterly renounce all such intentions as they were suspected to have; protesting again most solemnly they meant not to rebel against the Word of the Lord, as the Targum again expresses it.

Ver. 30.] They not only acquiesced in their answer, but were very glad to hear it.

Ver. 31. Phinehas—said unto the children of Reuben,] He spake to them in the name of all his company.

This day we perceive that the Lord is among us,] He thankfully acknowledges the gracious presence of God with them, in preserving the Reubenites, &c. from so great a sin, as they feared they had committed; and all the people of Israel from such heavy judgments as it would have deserved.

Now ye have delivered the children of Israel out of the hand of the Lord,] Who would have punished them for this schism, if they had been guilty of it, and not censured for it. This whole verse runs thus in the Targum: "This day we perceive that the Shechinah (or Divine Majesty) is among us, because ye have not committed this trespass against the Word of the Lord; whereby you have delivered the children of Israel out of the hand of the Word of the Lord."

Ver. 32. Phinehas—and the princes, returned from the children of Reuben, and—Gad, out of the land of Gilead,] Under Reuben and Gad the half tribe of Manasseh is included, both here and ver. 25, 32, 33, as under the land of Gilead is included the whole ren of Reuben, and from the children of Gad, out of the land of Gilead, unto the land of Canaan, to the children of Israel, and brought them word again.

33 And the thing pleased the children of Israel; and the children of Israel blessed God, and country of these tribes. The LXX. thought good to add here (and in all those verses) expressly, "and the half tribe of Manasseh;" though not in the Hebrew.

And brought them word again.] Informed them how they found things among their brethren.

Ver. 33. The thing pleased the children of Israel;] They were satisfied in the account they gave them; and approved of what their brethren had done.

Blessed God,] As Phinehas had done, that their brethren had not offended the Divine Majesty as they suspected.

Did not intend to go up against them in battle,] Laid aside that intention (which was in their mind, ver. 12), and pursued it no further.

To destroy the land.] For so they thought they were bound to do by the command, Deut. xiii. 12, &c. which extended to a whole country, as well as a city.

Ver. 34. Called the altar Ed:] That is, "a witness;" for the reason following.

It shall be a witness between us that the Lord is God.] That we own no other God but Jehovah, and him only will we worship, as he hath commanded. So the LXX. ὅτι Κύριος ὁ Θεὸς αὐτῶν ἴσται, "that the Lord is their God."

In all this whole relation from ver. 10, to the end of the chapter, there being no mention of Joshua, did not intend to go up against them in battle, to destroy the land wherein the children of Reuben and Gad dwelt.

34 And the children of Reuben and the children of Gad called the altar Ed: for it shall be a witness between us that the LORD is God.

who is not once named, either as sending these ambassadors or receiving the report which they brought back, some have thence entertained a conceit, that Joshua was dead before this happened; and consequently, that he could not be the author of this book. But it is manifest such persons have a great desire to weaken the authority of these holy books, or else they would not draw such consequences from such frivolous observations. For it is evident that all this came to pass not long after Joshua had dismissed these tribes, with good counsel, and with his blessing: for they returning immediately after this to their own country, went no further than Jordan before they erected this altar; upon which these great persons went to expostulate with them, and heard their apology, and came back and reported it. All this is told in one continued and coherent history (as it were with one breath), without the least signification of any considerable time that passed between one part of it and the other. And the LXX. were so well satisfied of this, that they took the answer of the Reubenites, Gadites, and Manassites, to have been brought to Joshua; for they say he imposed the name of Ed upon the altar. So their words are in the Vatican edition, which is most common among us, καὶ ἐπισημασεν ὁ Ἰησοῦς τὸν βωμὸν, &c.

CHAPTER XXIII.

1 Joshua's exhortation before his death, 3 by former benefits, 5 by promises, 11 and by threatenings.

1 AND it came to pass a long time after that the LORD had given rest unto Israel from all their enemies round about, that Joshua waxed old and stricken in age.

2 And Joshua called for all Israel, and for their elders, and for their heads, and for their judges, and for their officers, and said unto them, I am old and stricken in age.

3 And ye have seen all that the LORD your God hath done unto all these nations because of you; for the LORD your God is he that hath fought for you.

4 Behold, I have divided unto you by lot these nations that remain, to be an inheritance for your tribes, from Jordan, with all the nations that I have cut off, even unto the great sea westward.

CHAP. XXIII.

Ver. 1. A long time after] Some take it to have been fourteen years after their conquest of the country (xi. 23), and seven years after the division of it (see xiv. 10).

Joshua waxed old] This was said of him before the land was divided (xiii. 1), and a portion thereof given unto him: where he built a city; which took up so much time, that probably he was now in the last year of his life.

Ver. 2. Called for all Israel,] Sent out a summons to them to come to him at Timnath-serah, where he lived, as the Jews will have it; but rather to Shiloh, where they might appear before God, as well as before him, and have the greater regard to his words.

For their elders,] The word and is not in the Hebrew text, and therefore these words are an explication of what he means by all Israel: not all the people (who could not, without great inconvenience, come thither, and could not all hear him if they did), but their elders; that is, the great Sanhedrin, as they were called in future times; and for their heads, that is of their tribes and families; and for their judges, who were settled in all the lesser cities; and for their officers, who attended upon the judges to execute their sentence.

I am old] He would make them sensible that this might be the last time he should be able to speak to them, which might move them to give greater attention unto what he said.

Ver. 3. Ye have seen] Or rather, "behold, ye have seen;" for so the particle ve (which we translate and) sometimes signifies: Gen. xxiv. 31. "Behold, I have prepared the house," &c.

Because of you;] For your sake; that he might make room for you in their country, by expelling them out of it.

The Lord your God is he that hath fought for you.] See ch. i. 9. xi. 8. 10. 42. xi. 6. The Targum here saith, (as in x. 42), "The Lord your God, his Word fought for you" (see xiv. 12).

5 And the LORD your God, he shall expel them from before you, and drive them from out of your sight; and ye shall possess their land, as the LORD your God hath promised unto you.

6 Be ye therefore very courageous to keep and to do all that is written in the book of the law of Moses, that ye turn not aside therefrom to the right hand or to the left;

7 That ye come not among these nations, these that remain among you; neither make mention of the name of their gods, nor cause to swear by them, neither serve them, nor bow yourselves unto them:

8 But cleave unto the LORD your God, as ye have done unto this day.

9 For the LORD hath driven out from before you great nations and strong: but as for you, no man hath been able to stand before you unto this day.

Ver. 4.] The meaning is, he had divided among them the whole land of Canaan, from Jordan in the east to the Mediterranean in the west; as well that part of the land which remained still unconquered, as that out of which they had expelled the ancient inhabitants.

Ver. 5.] This relates unto those who remained unsubdued (mentioned in the beginning of the foregoing verse), whom they should undoubtedly conquer and possess their country, if they adhered to God in faithful obedience, as he exhorts them in the following part of this chapter.

Ver. 6. To keep and to do] Or (as it may be translated), “by observing and doing.”

All that is written in the book of the law of Moses,] Which was the condition upon which God promised to continue them in the possession of this land. By this it is evident, that the book of the law of Moses was extant in those days, and that the people read it.

That ye turn not aside] See upon Dent. v. 32.

Ver. 7. That ye come not among these nations,] Have no familiarity with them, especially by marriage.

Neither make mention of the name of their gods,] With any sort of respect to them (see Exod. xxiii. 13. and Dent. xii. 3).

Nor cause to swear by them,] Not make a gentile swear by the name of his god; which was utterly unlawful, as Selden observes out of Maimonides in Avoda Zara (see lib. ii. De Jure Nat. et Gent. cap. 13). For this was to suppose they had knowledge of men's thoughts, and power to punish those that forswore themselves. And the forbidding this was also to secure them from making leagues and covenants with the gentiles which they would not look upon as binding without an oath.

Neither serve them,] By offering sacrifices, or praying, or making vows to them, though never so secretly.

Nor bow yourselves unto them:] As all inward reverence, so all outward respect likewise was forbidden to be paid to them, especially open and public seats of worship. Interpreters here observe a gradation, from familiarity with them to the most gross idolatry, in which their friendship with these people concluded.

Ver. 8.] A remarkable instance of which they had all lately given, when the nine tribes and a half were so unanimously resolved to punish idolatry, with the extirpation of those that were guilty of it (xxii. 33),

10 One man of you shall chase a thousand: for the LORD your God, he it is that fighteth for you, as he hath promised you.

11 Take good heed therefore unto yourselves, that ye love the LORD your God.

12 Else if ye do in any wise go back, and cleave unto the remnant of these nations, even these that remain among you, and shall make marriages with them, and go in unto them, and they to you:

13 Know for a certainty that the LORD your God will no more drive out any of these nations from before you; but they shall be snares and traps unto you, and scourges in your sides, and thorns in your eyes, until ye perish from off this good land which the LORD your God hath given you.

14 And, behold, this day I am going the way of all the earth: and ye know in all your hearts and the other also most zealously disclaimed all inclinations to it (ver. 22. 29).

Ver. 9. Hath driven out from before you great nations and strong:] The seven nations of Canaan, who dwelt in strong cities, and brought mighty armies against them, with horses and chariots, and were some of them gigantic persons (xi. 4. 22).

No man hath been able to stand before you] None that gave them battle; though from some of their strong cities they had not yet driven them (see xxi. 41).

Ver. 10. One man of you shall chase a thousand:] He gives them hope of a good success for the future, as they had hitherto (Lev. xxvi. 8).

For the LORD your God, he it is that fighteth for you,] But he would not have them ascribe it to their own courage, but to the Divine power (Dent. xxxii. 30). Here again the Targum hath it, “the Word of the Lord,” &c. as ver. 3.

Ver. 11.] It highly, therefore, concerned them to keep close to the worship and service of God alone, with sincere love to him; since all their happiness depended upon his favour to them; for that this is meant by loving God, appears from the following verse; and Dent. vi. 4, 5, x. 12, xi. 22.

Ver. 12. Else if ye do in any wise go back,] From God, and fall to idolatry.

And cleave unto the remnant of these nations,] Embrace their errors, as the Vulgar translates it; which they might easily do by making friendship with them, as the phrase properly signifies.

Shall make marriages with them,] Which was the effect of their familiarity with them.

And go in unto them,] The same thing that was said before in other words, which only signify the consummation of marriage; which was strictly forbidden them, Exod. xxiii. 32. xxxiv. 12. 15, 16. Dent. vii. 3.

Ver. 13. The LORD your God will no more drive out any of these nations] As he had hitherto done, and promised still to do, if they would be obedient (ver. 8, 9). The Targum saith, “The Word of the Lord will no more drive,” &c.

But they shall be snares and traps unto you,] Remain in the land to inveigle and seduce them into further impiety (see Exod. xxxiv. 12. Dent. vii. 4. 16).

Scourges in your sides,] Bring sore chastisements upon them; for this alludes to the lashes that were given offenders upon their sides (Ecclus. xxx. 12. xlii. 5).

Thorns in your eyes,] Most grievously afflict them (see Numb. xxxiii. 55).

and in all your souls, that not one thing hath failed of all the good things which the LORD your God spake concerning you; all are come to pass unto you, and not one thing hath failed thereof.

15 Therefore it shall come to pass, that as all good things are come upon you, which the LORD your God promised you; so shall the LORD bring upon you all evil things, until he have destroyed

Until ye perish from off this good land] For, with the love and favour of God, they forfeited also their inheritance which he had bestowed on them.

Ver. 14. I am going the way of all the earth:] Shall die shortly, as all men must one time or other; therefore hearken to the words of a dying man.

Ye know in all your hearts] Are all fully convinced. Not one thing hath failed, &c.] See upon xxi. 45. And God was as good as his word ever after, as Solomon acknowledges, 1 Kings viii. 56.

Ver. 15. So shall the Lord] When he ceased to be their God.

Bring upon you all evil things,] According to what you from off this good land which the LORD your God hath given you.

16 When ye have transgressed the covenant of the LORD your God, which he commanded you, and have gone and served other gods, and bowed yourselves to them; then shall the anger of the LORD be kindled against you, and ye shall perish quickly from off the good land which he hath given unto you.

Moses had predicted at large, Lev. xxvi. and Deut. xxviii. In my annotations upon which last chapter, I have demonstrated, that not one thing hath failed of all the threatenings there mentioned, but all literally fulfilled to a tittle: for God's faithfulness is no less visible in fulfilling his threatenings than his promises.

Ver. 16. And have gone and served other gods,] This was the principal thing in the covenant, that they should have no other gods but him alone; as I have observed from a great number of places in the book of Deuteronomy.

Ye shall perish quickly] See Deut. xxviii. 20.

CHAPTER XXIV.

1 Joshua assembleth the tribes at Shechem. 2 A brief history of God's benefits from Terah. 14 He reneweth the covenant between them and God. 26 A stone the witness of the covenant. 29 Joshua's age, death, and burial. 32 Joseph's bones are buried. 33 Eleazar dieth.

1 AND Joshua gathered all the tribes of Israel to Shechem, and called for the elders of Israel, and for their heads, and for their judges, and for their officers; and they presented themselves before God.

2 And Joshua said unto all the people, Thus

CHAP. XXIV.

Ver. 1. Joshua gathered all the tribes] It is likely that Joshua, living longer than he expected when he made the foregoing speech to them, called the people together once more, to give them good advice before he died; as Moses made a great many speeches to them (I observed upon the book of Deuteronomy) before his departure from them: or, perhaps, it was the usual custom of Joshua to take occasion often to call them together, and put them in mind of their duty. And these two exhortations, which he made to them in the latter end of his life, he thought fit to record.

Tv Shechem,] Some will have this place to be the same with Shiloh, called here Shechem, because it was in the country of Shechem, and not far from it. The LXX. also call it  $\Sigma\eta\chi\acute{\omega}\varsigma$ , both here and ver. 25. It is plain also, by the latter end of the verse, that they assembled there where God dwelt, which was in Shiloh: yet all this is not sufficient to make us think they were not summoned to the city called Shechem: for there is no good reason for calling Shiloh by this name, it being (as St. Jerome saith) ten miles from Shechem: and all other copies of the LXX. but the Vatican, having  $\Sigma\upsilon\chi\acute{\iota}\mu$ , not  $\Sigma\eta\chi\acute{\omega}\varsigma$ . And as for their appearing before God at this place, I shall give an account of it at the end of this verse; and now only say, that it is likely Joshua, who was the supreme governor of God's people, being old and infirm, caused the ark, for this time, to be brought to Shechem, being near to him, that he might renew the covenant with the people in that place where Abraham first settled, when he came into the land of Canaan, and where he built an altar, and God established his covenant with him (Gen. xii. 6, 7), and where the patriarchs were buried (Acts vii. 15, 16), and where he was about to lay the bones of Joseph (ver. 32. of this chapter), and where the Israelites, at their first entrance into Canaan, renewed their covenant with God (Josh. viii. 30, &c.). For Ebal and Gerizim were hard by Shechem.

Called for the elders, &c.] The same persons mentioned xxiii. 2. Which places give us a distinct account of the persons concerned in the government of the Israelites; as Const. L'Empereur observes, in his annotations upon Bertram De Repub. Judaica, p. 362. 395, 396.

They presented themselves before God.] At his tabernacle; which was, as I said, for the present brought hither. For it is plain, as Cornel. Bertram observes (L. De Republ. Judaica, cap. 15, p. 249), the kings or chief rulers of Israel had a power to carry the ark from the place of its constant residence when there was a great occasion for it (1 Sam. iv. 3, 4. 2 Sam. xv. 24). And now, at this great assembly of the whole nation by their representatives, there was a just reason for its being brought hither (seeing Joshua could not conveniently, by reason of his great old age, go to Shiloh), that it might be a more solemn meeting, being held in the presence of God. Mr. Mede hath another notion of this matter; for he thinks that there was a proseucha, or praying-place, erected by the Israelites (at least by the Ephraimites, in whose lot Shechem was) after they had subdued the country, that they might resort hither to call upon God, when they were not able to go as far as the tabernacle. Many such places he makes account there were; of which see more on ver. 26.

Ver. 2. Joshua said unto all the people,] That were there present, viz. the elders, heads, judges, and officers, mentioned in the foregoing verse; who were to report his words to all the people.

Thus saith the Lord God] This is an argument that Joshua spake all that follows by a Divine impulse; for said the Lord God of Israel, Your fathers dwelt on the other side of the flood in old time, even Terah, the father of Abraham, and the father of Nachor; and they served other gods.

3 And I took your father Abraham from the other side of the flood, and led him throughout all the land of Canaan, and multiplied his seed, and gave him Isaac.

4 And I gave unto Isaac Jacob and Esau; and I gave unto Esau mount Seir, to possess it; but Jacob and his children went down into Egypt.

5 I sent Moses also and Aaron, and I plagued Egypt, according to that which I did among them: and afterward I brought you out.

6 And I brought your fathers out of Egypt:

he begins his speech in the solemn form used by the prophets (thus saith the Lord) and introduces God himself speaking in his own person. From whence it may be inferred he was a prophet, as well as the ruler of God's people.

Your fathers dwell on the other side of the flood] That is, of the river Euphrates.

In old time,] A long time before they came from Ur of the Chaldees into Haran (Gen. xi. 28. 31).

Terah, the father of Abraham, and—Nachor.] These were Terah's two eldest sons (Gen. xi. 26.).

They served other gods.] All agree that Terah was an idolater living in that country, from whence, as many think, idolatry first came (Gen. xxxi. 19). The Jews, in Schalsch. Hakkabala, say he was a priest: see Hottinger in his Synagoga Orientale, cap. 8. p. 290. Others of them say, he was a statue, who made images of several materials, λέγων τοις τοις εἶναι θεοῖς, "saying, These were gods;" as Suidas speaks, who, together with Epiphanius, is of the opinion (see Bochartus, in his Phaleg. lib. ii. cap. 5). Abraham himself also, most agree, was bred up in the same idolatry; though some few deny it; as Hottinger observes in the same place; where he alleges the words of Maimonides, who saith, He was converted to the worship of the Creator of all, in the forty-eighth year of his age; and that his father Terah also repented, and worshipped the true and only God (see upon Gen. xi. 31).

Ver. 3. I took your father Abraham from the other side of the flood,] From that idolatrous country where he was born and educated. Which is mentioned as a singular obligation upon the Israelites to adhere unto God, who singled out the father of their families, so many ages ago, to be his worshipper. This Maimonides, having occasion to mention these words of Joshua, represents in very pathetic expressions: "How great is the benefit (saith he) that we receive by these precepts, which have freed us from such a grand error in which our father was educated, and converted us to the true belief of God? by teaching us that he created all things, and that he is to be worshipped, and loved, and feared, and he only; and that there is no great labour required to do his will, but only the love and fear of him, in which two all his worship is perfected," &c. (More Nevochim, par. iii. cap. 29).

Led him] From Charran, after his father's death.

Throughout all the land of Canaan,] Till he came to Shechem (where the Israelites now were assembled), and so to Beth-el; and so on still towards the south of the land of Canaan (Gen. xii. 6. 8. 9).

Gave him Isaac.] In order to the fulfilling of his promise (Gen. xv. 5), he bestowed a son upon him, when he was a hundred years old (Gen. xxi. 1, 2, &c.).

and ye came unto the sea; and the Egyptians pursued after your fathers with chariots and horsemen unto the Red sea.

7 And when they cried unto the Lord, he put darkness between you and the Egyptians, and brought the sea upon them, and covered them; and your eyes have seen what I have done in Egypt: and ye dwelt in the wilderness a long season.

8 And I brought you into the land of the Amorites, which dwell on the other side Jordan; and they fought with you: and I gave them into your hand, that ye might possess their land; and I destroyed them from before you.

9 Then Balak the son of Zippor, king of

Ver. 4. I gave unto Isaac Jacob and Esau.] Who had a very numerous issue (Gen. xxv. 24, &c.).

I gave unto Esau mount Seir,] He and his brother being grown so rich, and their cattle so increased, that there was not room for them both in the land of Canaan, so they sojourned (Gen. xxxvi. 6—8).

Jacob and his children went down into Egypt.] Though Esau left the land of Canaan entirely to him, yet the time was not come when God intended to plant his posterity in it; but they were forced to go down into Egypt, where they suffered a cruel bondage (Gen. xvi. 6. Exod. i. 11, &c.). So the LXX. explain it.

Ver. 5. I sent Moses also and Aaron,] And when they were multiplied exceedingly (Exod. i. 7. 14. 20), these two great persons were sent to deliver them from that bondage (Exod. iii. 10. iv. 14).

I plagued Egypt,] Smote it with those signs (as the LXX. explain it) which are related in that book of Exodus.

Afterward I brought you out.] By those wonderful plagues they were, at last, constrained to let the Israelites depart, as they desired (Exod. xii. 31, &c.).

Ver. 6. I brought your fathers out of Egypt: and you came unto the sea;] When he had brought them out (as is related, Exod. xii. 40) they were led by God through the way of the wilderness of the Red Sea (Exod. xiii. 18), by which they encamped, and were in very great straits (xiv. 9).

The Egyptians pursued after your fathers] Imagining them to be in such difficulties, that they could not escape out of their hand (Exod. xiv. 3).

Ver. 7. He put darkness between you and the Egyptians.] So that when they had overtaken them, they could not see where they were (Exod. xiv. 10. 19, 20).

Brought the sea upon them,] Inasmuch that they marched after them into the sea, where they were overwhelmed (Exod. xiv. 27, 28).

Your eyes have seen what I have done in Egypt:] Or, upon the Egyptians. He appeals to them for the truth of this, who had seen them lie dead upon the sea-shore (Exod. xiv. 30, 31). For their elders, to whom he now speaks (ver. 1), were all then there: and now not only men of great dignity, but (many of them at least) of great age.

Ye dwell in the wilderness a long season.] Forty years, Numb. xiv. 33. where he gave them a law, and fed them miraculously, &c.

Ver. 8. I brought you into the land of the Amorites,] Towards the latter end of that time (Numb. xxi. 20, 21).

They fought with you, &c.] See there, ver. 23, 24, 33, &c.

Ver. 9. Then Balak—arose and warred against

Moab, arose and warred against Israel, and sent and called Balaam the son of Beor to curse you :

10 But I would not hearken unto Balaam; therefore he blessed you still : so I delivered you out of his hand.

11 And ye went over Jordan, and came unto Jericho : and the men of Jericho fought against you, the Amorites, and the Perizzites, and the Canaanites, and the Hittites, and the Girgashites, the Hivites, and the Jebusites ; and I delivered them into your hand.

12 And I sent the hornet before you, which drave them out from before you, even the two kings of the Amorites ; but not with thy sword nor with thy bow.

13 And I have given you a land for which ye did not labour, and cities which ye built not, and ye dwell in them ; of the vineyards and oliveyards which ye planted not do ye eat.

14 ¶ Now therefore fear the Lord, and serve him in sincerity and in truth : and put away the gods which your fathers served on the other side of the flood, and in Egypt ; and serve ye the Lord.

15 And if it seem evil unto you to serve the Lord, choose you this day whom ye will serve ;

Israel,] He did not actually draw out his forces, and fall upon them, but he prepared them and made them ready, with an intention to drive them from his coast, if Balaam could have disabled them by his curses; which sufficiently appears from Numb. xxii. 11. David Camius therefore notes pertinently, "the design or contrivance is reputed the work itself."

Sent and called Balaam] See Numb. xxii. 5, 6, &c.

Ver. 10. But I would not hearken unto Balaam;] Who had a great inclination to do what Balak desired; and one would think by this, begged of God to give him leave to use his arts to do the Israelites mischief: and when this was denied him, yet obtaining license to go to the king of Moab, he went with these intentions, and with hope he might prevail with God to suffer him to prosecute his design (Numb. xxii. 32).

Therefore he blessed you still.] He all along pronounced nothing but blessings on them instead of curses, notwithstanding all the attempts that were made to the contrary, Numb. xxiii. and xxiv. Which was to be ascribed to the overruling power of God, who hindered him from hurting them.

Ver. 11. Ye went over Jordan,] Having vanquished the two kings of the Amorites on the other side of it, and got quit of all other enemies (the Moabites and Midianites), God in a wonderful manner brought them into Canaan, by drying up the river Jordan to give them a passage over it.

Came unto Jericho.] Which was the first place they besieged, being the nearest city to Jordan.

The men of Jericho fought against you,] We do not read of any sallies they made upon the Israelites; but they, shutting their gates, to defend the city against them, it is likely, flung stones from their wall upon them.

The Amorites, &c.] After which, it appears by this book, that they fought with all the seven nations of Canaan; who engaged them in several bodies, and at several times: which was done so lately, that there was no need he should repeat all the particulars mentioned in the tenth, eleventh, and twelfth chapters. But by the division of their land among the Israelites, it was very well known to them, that (as this verse concludes) "God had delivered them into their hands." It is observable, that the Girgashites are here particularly mentioned, as fighting against Israel with the rest of the seven nations; which makes Grotius' observation doubtful, of their surrender at Joshua's first summons (see xvi. 10), but if that be not true, it is manifest some of them remained unsubdued, and had a settlement in Canaan in our Saviour's days: when we read of the country of the Gergesens, the inhabitants of which were not Jews, as appears by their breeding swine (see Constant. L'Empereur in his annotations on Bava-kama, p. 180).

Ver. 12. I sent the hornet before you, which drave them out] This may signify, either that before the Israelites came into those parts, God sent hornets, which so infested them, that many of them were forced to leave their country, and flee into other places; or, that when they came to give them battle, these hornets made such assaults upon them, as facilitated the victory. This God promised in Exod. xxiii. 27, 28. Deut. vii. 20, and here Joshua remembers how true he was to his word. The Book of Wisdom calls them προδρομοι, the forerunners of God's host; and Kimchi saith, they flew in the eyes of the Canaanites, and made them so blind, that they could not see to fight.

Even the two kings of the Amorites;] Sihon and Og, whose country was first infested with them; and afterward the kings of Canaan, and their people, felt their fury: for this is a short expression, like that which I observed xxii. 10.

But not with thy sword, nor with thy bow.] These swarms of hornets, it seems, did greater execution than the armies of the Israelites. We do not read of their assaulting the Canaanites in any of the battles that Joshua fought with them; for he did not think fit to mention it particularly in the foregoing account of his victory, but now in general, when he was to sum up all the mercies of God to them.

Ver. 13. I have given you a land for which ye did not labour] As Joshua had observed before (xi. 13).

Of the vineyards—which ye planted not do ye eat.] According to his promise, Deut. vi. 10, 11.

Ver. 14. Fear the Lord.] The fear of God commonly signifies his worship and service, unto which he exhorts them in the following words: which seem to relate to all outward acts of worship; as this to the inward reverence they owed to him in their minds as the only God.

Serve him in sincerity and in truth.] Worship no other God together with him, nor mix any idolatrous rites with those prescribed by him; but serve him constantly and purely according to his law which is the truth (Ps. cxix. 142).

Put away the gods which your fathers served] See ver. 2. This intimates, that there were now some idolaters among them, though secretly in private, and not openly; for they had lately expressed so unanimously such a zeal against any appearance of idolatry, that one cannot think there was any known worshipper of other gods now in the nation.

In Egypt;] Where they began to be corrupted in their religion, as is often suggested by the prophet Ezekiel, xx. 6—8. 18. xxiii. 3. 8. 19. 21. 27.

Serve ye the Lord.] He repeats it again, as a thing of the greatest moment, that they should worship the Lord alone.

Ver. 15. If it seem evil unto you to serve the Lord, choose you this day whom ye will serve;] He could not think they would turn atheists, and have no God at all; and he was unwilling to suppose that they would prefer any other god to him, who had obliged them by such benefits as are before mentioned: which whether the gods which your fathers served that were on the other side of the flood, or the gods of the Amorites, in whose land ye dwell: but as for me and my house, we will serve the LORD.

16 And the people answered and said, God forbid that we should forsake the LORD, to serve other gods;

17 For the LORD our God, he it is that brought us up and our fathers out of the land of Egypt, from the house of bondage, and which did those great signs in our sight, and preserved us in all the way wherein we went, and among all the people through whom we passed;

18 And the LORD drave out from before us all the people, even the Amorites which dwelt in the land: therefore will we also serve the LORD; for he is our God.

19 And Joshua said unto the people, Ye cannot serve the LORD: for he is an holy God; he is a jealous God; he will not forgive your transgressions nor your sins.

20 If ye forsake the LORD, and serve strange gods, then he will turn and do you hurt, and consume you, after that he hath done you good.

21 And the people said unto Joshua, Nay; but we will serve the LORD.

22 And Joshua said unto the people, Ye are witnesses against yourselves that ye have chosen you the LORD, to serve him. And they said, We are witnesses.

23 Now therefore put away, said he, the he expresses in his rhetorical form of speech; which is as much as if he had said, If you like not the Lord's service, tell me whom ye will serve? Where do you hope to find a God comparable to him?

Whether the gods which your fathers served] That had some colour for it, because of its antiquity; but was condemned by Abraham their father, who forsook that religion, and was blessed for it by God, with the inheritance he had now given them in the land of Canaan.

Or the gods of the Amorites,] That was so absurd, as to need no confutation; for those gods could not defend their servants that worshipped them.

But as for me and my house, we will serve the Lord.] He declares his firm resolution (let them take what course they pleased), together with his whole family (as far as he could oblige them), to worship the Lord alone.

Ver. 16. The people answered] All the elders and others there present, and all those to whom they reported that Joshua had said, made this answer.

God forbid that we should forsake the Lord,] The Hebrew word chailu (which we translate God forbid) imports a great abhorrence and abomination of that which is mentioned with it.

To serve other gods;] Which they now looked upon as the greatest madness.

Ver. 17.] They gave such powerful reasons why they should serve none but the Lord alone; that if they had always preserved them as fresh in their minds as they were now, they could never have gone after other gods.

Ver. 18. All the people,] That is, of Canaan.

Even the Amorites] In the Hebrew, "and the Amorites;" that is, together with the two kings of the Amorites, whom they had driven before out of the land on the other side of Jordan.

Therefore will we also serve the Lord;] Follow the example of Joshua, their leader (ver. 15).

For he is our God.] As they were convinced by their wonderful deliverance out of Egypt; all the great signs he wrought there, and after they came from thence; and the care he took of them in the wilderness, and all other places; and now by their late victories over most potent enemies, whom he had driven out of their country, and put the Israelites in possession of it.

Ver. 19. Ye cannot serve the Lord;] This is far from signifying an utter impossibility of it (for that would have contradicted his exhortation, ver. 14), but that they were so very prone to idolatry, that they would not be able to persevere steadfast in their resolution, unless they took care constantly to reflect upon, and lay to heart, what they had now acknowledged (ver. 17, 18), which he was afraid they would not do.

For he is an holy God; he is a jealous God;] Who, having no equal (that is meant by holy), will endure no rival; and therefore they who communicated the worship proper to him, unto any other besides him, or with him, were deemed to deny his incomparable sanctity, and said in Scripture to profane his holy name, as Mr. Mede observes (see book i. disc. 2). It is a just remark which Mr. Alix here makes, in his excellent book of the Judgment of the Jewish Church against the Unitarians, ch. ix. that here is a plain idea of a plurality of persons in the Godhead, the words in the Hebrew being, "he is the holy Gods;" like that Eccles. xii. 1, "Remember thy Creators." And, indeed, this is a place anciently noted by the Christian doctors (whom the Jews call heretics), who asked R. Samlai, as the Jews themselves tell us, what he had to answer unto these words. Ye cannot serve the Lord, Ki Elohim Kedoshim Hu, "because he is the holy Gods?" Who had nothing to reply, but that Joshua doth not say, "They are the holy Gods" but "He is the holy Gods." Which is the very same that we affirm, that he is Three in one. This is in Beresehith Rabba, mentioned by Raymond in his Pugio Fidei, and by J. Wagenseil, in his confutation of Lipman's Carmen Memoriale, p. 129.

He will not forgive your transgressions] But make those who assume any other deity unto fellowship with him in worship, feel how he resents such dishonour done to his Divine Majesty.

Ver. 20. If ye—serve strange gods,] Either the gods of the Amorites, before mentioned, or those that their fathers anciently served.

Then he will turn and do you hurt,] Alter the course of his providence towards you, and send as many curses upon you, as he hath done blessings; according to the prediction of Moses in Deut. xxviii. 63.

Ver. 21.] They desire him to entertain a better opinion of them; for they persist in their well-grounded resolution (ver. 16—18).

Ver. 22. Ye are witnesses against yourselves that ye have chosen you the Lord, to serve him.] This solemn profession, which they had thus deliberately and publicly made, he tells them, would testify against them, and condemn them, if they proved false to God.

We are witnesses.] Here they renew that choice of God for their king, which their forefathers made when they came out of Egypt (in the nineteenth and twenty-fourth chapters of Exodus), and acknowledged they should be self-condemned if they did not make it good.

Ver. 23. Put away—the strange gods that are among you,] See ver. 14. This is an argument that he strange gods which are among you, and incline your heart unto the LORD God of Israel.

24 And the people said unto Joshua, The LORD our God will we serve, and his voice will we obey.

25 So Joshua made a covenant with the people that day, and set them a statute and an ordinance in Shechem.

26 ¶ And Joshua wrote these words in the book of the law of God, and took a great stone, and set it up there under an oak, that was by the sanctuary of the LORD.

27 And Joshua said unto all the people, Behold, this stone shall be a witness unto us; for it hath heard all the words of the LORD which he spake unto us: it shall be therefore a witness unto you, lest ye deny your God.

was a prophet, as I said upon ver. 2, that he saw their inward disposition, and the secret affection they had to idols. For though there was no public idol worshipped, yet he knew, by the spirit of prophecy, that they had their penates (as the Romans called them), "household gods;" or, rather, gods which they worshipped secretly in their closets, as our Dr. Spencer observes, lib. iii. dissert. 1. cap. 3. These being the very same words which Jacob used to his household when he suspected them of the same crime, though there was no open idolatry practised among them (Gen. xxxv. 2).

[Incline your heart unto the Lord] Settle your affection upon the Lord alone, who your profess is your sovereign, to whom the whole nation hath infinite obligations (ver. 16—18.)

Ver. 24.] They repeat their professed resolution a third time, which made it more binding; and a stronger witness against them, if they forsook the Lord.

Ver. 25. So Joshua made a covenant with the people that day.] Engaged them to make good this solemn profession, by renewing the covenant they had formerly entered into, both in the time of Moses, and in his time: wherein they promised to worship him alone, and be obedient to him; and he promised to do for them as he had formerly done; that is, be their constant protector and benefactor. There are those who think this covenant was now established by sacrifice, as it was when they came out of Egypt (Exod. xxiv. 4, 5), and when they came into Canaan (Josh. viii. 31.). But, as there is no mention of an altar, or any offering, so it is not likely that Joshua would offer any sacrifice but in the place which God had chosen, which was Shiloh: for though we suppose the sanctuary to have been brought hither for a little time, yet it was not the settled place of the Divine residence.

[Set them a statute and an ordinance] It is commonly interpreted, that he propounded to them in brief the precepts of the law; which are the conditions of the covenant: but it may be expounded, that he enacted this covenant to have the force of a statute and ordinance, or judgment, as it is in the Hebrew.

[In Shechem.] So that it was called hereafter the covenant or statute in Shechem, where they all made repeated professions of love to God.

Ver. 26. Joshua wrote these words] From whence, as I observed in the preface, the Talmudists gather Joshua to have been the author of this book. As if these words signified, that he, after the example of Moses, committed to writing all that we read in this book, and added it at the end of the five books written by Moses, as it is now annexed to them. But it must be confessed, that one cannot certainly infer more from these words than that he wrote the words of the foregoing covenant; and this he did, as it here follows, in the very book of the law of God, that it might be preserved in everlasting remembrance.

[In the book of the law of God.] Which was laid up by Moses' order, in the side of the ark (Deut. xxxi. 24—26). From whence he took it, and wrote in it all that had passed between him and the people, that they might look upon this as a sacred transaction, as indeed it was, and most carefully observe it: and perhaps he wrote it also in that copy of the law of God, which the princes had for the use of every tribe (see upon Deut. xxxi. 9).

[Took a great stone, and set it up there] As a monument of the covenant now made. Which was an ancient way of preserving the memory of things past, as appears by what Jacob did, Gen. xxviii. 18, and they themselves had lately done, iv. 3. 20, 21, &c. Upon this stone, it is probable, there was an inscription, signifying what it meant.

[Under an oak, that was by the sanctuary of the Lord.] This is one argument Mr. Mede uses (in the place I mentioned upon ver. 1), to prove that the sanctuary, properly so called, cannot be here meant, because it was unlawful to plant any trees near it (Deut. xvi. 21, 22), and therefore he understands hereby a proseucha, or praying-place, which, in memory of Jacob, was here at Shechem. And he doth plainly show, there were both such places, and also synagogues, in several parts of the country; the former being in the fields, open on the top; the latter in cities, covered as our houses are. And I may add, that we do read of sanctuaries, in the plural number, that were among them in aftertimes (Amos vii. 9). Yet it must be acknowledged, that the argument he uses from the place I mentioned in Deuteronomy is not cogent: for though they be prohibited there to plant a grove of any trees near God's altar, after the manner of the gentiles, this did not make it unlawful to set up the sanctuary under a tree that had been planted before; especially when it was done only for a short time, and not to make it the settled place for its constant abode.

But there are those who avoid this seeming difficulty, by referring these words, "in the sanctuary of the Lord" (as they may be translated), not to the oak, but to the words going before, "the book of the law of God," which was in the sanctuary. And thus, it is certain, words are sometimes to be connected, not with those immediately preceding, but with those which are more remote. A notable instance of which we have in Gen. xiii. 10, where those words in the end of the verse, "As thou comest unto Zoar," cannot be joined to "the land of Egypt," just before mentioned but to the "plain of Jordan," in the very beginning of the verse.

Ver. 27. This stone shall be a witness unto us.] As Laban said concerning the heap of stones which he and Jacob raised (Gen. xxxi. 48. 51, 52).

[For it hath heard all the words of the Lord which he spake unto us.] All those speeches which had been delivered by Joshua in the name of God (ver. 2, 3, &c.), and all that the Israelites had answered to him: that is, the covenant between God and them; which being renewed before this stone, it is said, by an elegant figure, to have heard what was spoken; because it would remain to testify and declare to all posterity the engagements that lay upon them. Thus the prophet calls to all creatures, "Hear, O heaven," &c.

[It shall be therefore a witness unto you.] To accuse them; as much as if it had heard what they said, and could speak against them.

28 So Joshua let the people depart, every man unto his inheritance.

29 ¶ And it came to pass after these things, that Joshua the son of Nun, the servant of the Lord, died, being an hundred and ten years old.

30 And they buried him in the border of his inheritance in Timnath-serah, which is in mount Ephraim, on the north side of the hill of Gaash.

31 And Israel served the Lord all the days of Joshua, and all the days of the elders that over-lived Joshua, and which had known all the works of the Lord, that he had done for Israel.

32 ¶ And the bones of Joseph, which the children of Israel brought up out of Egypt, buried they in Shechem, in a parcel of ground which Jacob bought of the sons of Hamor the father of Shechem for an hundred pieces of silver: any it became the inheritance of the children of Joseph.

Ver. 28.] And the sanctuary of the Lord returned to its settled place, which was Shiloh.

Ver. 29. After these things,] Not long after, in all probability.

Joshua—the servant of the Lord, died,] Leaving this honourable character behind him, which Moses also had, that he had served the Lord faithfully.

Being an hundred and ten years old.] Of the same age with Joseph. How many of these years he spent in Canaan, as the chief ruler of God's people, men's opinions are very widely different: for some say he lived twenty and eight years after they came over Jordan (which is the opinion of the Jews in Seder Olam); though others will not allow so much as the odd eight years, but say it was only seven. There is a middle opinion maintained by others, that he was their governor seventeen years (see Bonfrerius).

Ver. 30. Timnath-serah,] Called in Judg. ii. 9. Timnath-heres: because of the image of the sun engraven on his sepulchre, in memory of that famous day, when the sun stood still till he had completed his victory (ch. x). So several of the Jewish authors say, particularly he who wrote the book put out by Hottinger, under the title of Cippi Hebraici, p. 32, where he saith, his father Nun was buried here and Caleb the son of Jephunneh (see also his Smegma Orientale, cap. 8. p. 523). And thus Tally saith, a sphere and a cylinder were put upon the tomb of Archimedes.

On the north side of the hill of Gaash.] So called, as the Jews fable, because it trembled and quaked, at the burial of Joshua, whose death the people did not enough bewail. Which fancy, it is likely, came into their head, because there is no mention here of any days of mourning for him, as there were for Aaron and Moses. In which St. Jerome and other of the fathers think there is a mystery; viz. that under the law when the kingdom of heaven was not yet opened, they had reason to mourn and weep for the death of their friends; but under the gospel, wherein is revealed by the Lord Jesus (of whom Joshua was a figure) the wonderful love of God to men, &c. there is no reason for mourning and lamentation, but rather for rejoicing.

Of this hill, see Const. L'Empereur upon Benjamin's Itinerarium, who calls Montpellier by this name of Har-Gaash, the trembling hill, p. 142, 143.

Ver. 31. Israel served the Lord all the days of Joshua,] No idolatry appeared among them publicly while he lived (whatsoever private superstition might be practised, ver. 14, 23), for all that wicked generation which came out of Egypt (except the younger sort) were consumed in the wilderness, before Joshua took the conduct of them. And God kept them there so many years, as wasted them also, for this reason among others, that they might forget the idolatrous custom of Egypt, unto which it early appeared by their making the golden calf, they were strongly inclined. Thus St. Chrysostom discourses (lib. i. advers. Vitæ Monast. vituper.): God, saith he, that the children of Israel might unlearn the evil customs of Egypt, brought them καταμύσας ἐπὶ τῆς ἔρημίας, "to lead a solitary life in the wilderness," forming their minds, as in a monastery, far from those who had corrupted them. And he destroyed thro all the elder sort, that none might enter into Palestine, but they who had not seen the superstitious impieties of the Egyptians, καὶ μηδένα διδάσκατον ἔξεν τῆς ροσότητος πορνείας, "and that they might have no master left among them to teach them such kind of wickedness."

All the days of the elders that over-lived Joshua,] These elders had been chosen by Moses, who knew them to be men of great piety; that had not only seen, but observed and kept in mind all God's wonderful works; and would put others in mind of them and teach them to serve and obey the Lord.

From this place the Jews labour to establish all their oral traditions; which Moses, say they, delivered to Joshua, and he to these elders, and they to the prophets, and they to others (see Maimonides in Seder Zeraim, set forth by our most learned Dr. Pococke p. 34), for which there is no foundation.

Ver. 32. The bones of Joseph,] It is a needless pains which the Jews bestow in reconciling this place with Exodus xiii. 19, where it is said, "Moses took the bones of Joseph with him." For there is no contradiction between these two places, the children of Israel doing what Moses required them to do; who could not carry them away himself, but saw them brought out of Egypt. Yet thus they gravely discourse about this matter, in the Talmud (tit. Sota. cap. 1. sect. 47); "when any one begins a thing but doth not bring it to perfection, and another comes and finishes it, the Scripture speaks of him who completes it, as if he alone had done it."

Buried they in Shechem,] Which was one reason, perhaps, for gathering the great assembly above mentioned, that they might the more solemnly deposit the bones of this great man, in that portion of land which his father Jacob had given him; see Gen. xlviii. 22, where it seems they thought it most agreeable to lay him, rather than in the cave of Macphelah. It may be reasonably thought, also, that the bodies of the rest of the sons of Jacob, from whom the twelve tribes descended, were brought into Canaan, to be there interred, as Josephus relates from ancient tradition, lib. ii. Antiq. cap. 4. And St. Stephen confirms it, Acts vii. 16. For though Joseph excelled them all in dignity, and gave this special charge about his body, yet, no doubt, every tribe had as great a regard to the head of it, and would be inclined to do the same for their fathers that Joseph desired for himself. But whether they buried them in the sepulchre at Macphelah, or in some eminent place in their own tribe, as Joseph was, there is none that gives us any account.

In a parcel of ground which Jacob bought of the sons of Hamor] See Gen. xxxiii. 18, 19. This shows they did not bury him in the city of Shechem, but in a field near it, which was his own ground: for so the ancient manner was, not to bury in cities and towns, but in the adjacent fields or gardens.

33 And Eleazar the son of Aaron died; and they buried him in a hill that pertained to Phinehas his son, which was given him in mount Ephraim.

It became the inheritance of the children of Joseph.] Of the Ephraimites, who gave Shechem to the Levites for a city of refuge (xxi. 20, 21).

Ver. 33. Eleazar—died;] Who imitated Joshua (if we may believe the Samaritan Chronicle), in calling all the elders and princes of the tribes to him before he died, charging them strictly to obey all the commands of God. After which he put off his sacred garments, and clothed his son Phinehas with them. This is so far from being improbable, that it is likely all the elders did the same, as far as their authority could reach; being very desirous their posterity might continue firm and steadfast in the worship of God alone.

They buried him in a hill that pertained to Phinehas his son,] In the Hebrew the words are, "in the hill of Phinehas; that is, a hill called by his name. It being the manner, as I have noted elsewhere, to call places by the name of their eldest son.

Which was given him in mount Ephraim.] It is a question to whom this hill was given: most probable to Eleazar, who, being the high-priest at the time of the division of the land, they thought fit to give him a peculiar portion, distinct from all the cities of the priests; none of which were in the tribe of Ephraim, but all in the tribes of Judah, Benjamin, and Simeon, as we read xxi. 9. 17. 19. And they gave it Eleazar in this country, that he might be near to the tabernacle (which was in Shiloh), and near to Joshua, to be ready on all occasions to advise him, and consult the oracle for him. But against this there lies a great objection, that no Levite or priest was to have any portion in the division of the land: and therefore it is the most received opinion among the Jews, that either Eleazar or Phinehas had this inheritance in the right of his wife. So the Gemara Babylonica on Bava Bathra, and a great many others, mentioned by Mr. Selden, in his book De Successionibus ad Leges Hebr. cap. 18, where he observes another example of this martial succession, as he calls it; that is, the husband succeeding his wife in her estate after her death, in 1 Chron. ii. 21, where the twenty-three cities which Jair possessed, Kimchi saith he had by his wife.

These last five verses, it is evident, were not written by Joshua: but this is no argument he did not write this book; no more than that Moses did not write the Pentateuch, because there is the like account given of his death and burial in the conclusion of it, by some other author (see Dent. xxxiv. 1). The Talmudists, I observed, say in Bava Bathra, that Joshua wrote his own book, and the last eight verses of the Pentateuch. And they say in the same place (cap. 1), as to what is written here, ver. 29, it was done by Eleazar; and what is said, ver. 33, it was written by Phinehas; or rather, these five verses, from 29 to the end, were written by Samuel: who, being a prophet, was moved and directed by God to continue the history of this people from the death of Joshua to his own time.

The Student and Lover of Literature at Home, who has hitherto been compelled to wade through volumes of Reviews for a single article, may now become possessed of every article worth reading, for little more than the cost of the annual subscription.

The following is extracted from a very able article on Mr. Macaulay, by Mr. E. P. Whipple:

"Literature of the last thirty years, without perceiving the prominent station occupied by critics, reviewers and essayists. Criticism in the old days of Monthly Reviews and Gentlemen's Magazines, was quite as a humble occupation, and was chiefly monopolized by the 'barren rascals' of letters, who scribbled, stunted and starved in attics and cellars; but it has since been almost exalted into a creative art, and numbers among its professors some of the most accomplished writers of the age. Denuis, Rhymer, Winstanley, Theophilus Cüber, Griffiths, and other 'eminent hands,' as well as the nameless contributors to defunct periodicals and deceased pamphlets, have departed, body and soul, and left not a wreck behind; and their places have been supplied by such men as Coleridge, Carlyle, Macaulay, Lamb, Hazlitt, Jeffrey, Wilson, Gifford, Mackintosh, Sydney Smith, Hallam, Campbell, Talfourd and Brougham. Indeed every celebrated writer of the present century, without it is believed, a solitary exception, has dabbled or excelled in criticism. It has been the road to fame and profit, and has commanded both applause and guineas, when the unfortunate objects of it have been blessed with neither. Many of the strongest minds of the age will leave no other record behind them, than critical essays and popular speeches. To those who have made criticism a business, it has led to success in other professions. The Edinburgh Review, which took the lead in the establishment of the new order of things, was projected in a low station by two briefless barristers and a titleless parson; the former are now lords, and the latter is a snug prebendary, rejoicing in the reputation of being the finest wit and smartest divine of the age. That celebrated journal made reviewing more respectable than authorship. It was started at a time when the degeneration of literature demanded a radical reform, and a sharp vein of criticism. Its contributors were men who possessed talents and information, and so far held a slight advantage over most of those they reviewed, who did not happen to possess either. Grub Street quarterly quaked to its foundations, as the northern comet shot its portentous glare into the dark alleys, where bathos and puerility buzzed and lived. The citizens of Brussels, on the night previous to Waterloo, were hardly more terror-struck than the vast array of fated authors who, every three months, waited the appearance of the baleful luminary, and, starting at every sound which betokened its arrival,

"Whispered with white lips, the foe! it comes! it comes!"

"In the early and palmy days of the Review, when reviewers were wits and writers were hacks, the shore of the great ocean of books was 'heaped with the damned like pebbles.' Like an 'eagle in a dove-cote,' it fluttered the leaves of the Minerva press, and stifled the weak notes of imbecile elegance, and the dull croak of insipid vulgarity, learned ignorance, and pompous humility. The descent of Attila on the Roman Empire was not a more awful visitation to the Italians, than the 'fell swoon' of the Edinburgh Review on the degenerate denizens of Grub Street and Paternoster Row. It carried ruin and devastation wherever it went, and in most cases it carried those severe but providential dispensations to the right places, and made have consistent both with political and poetic justice. The Edinburgh Reviewers were found not to be of the old school of critics. They were not contented with the humble task of chronicling the appearance of books, and meekly condensing their weak contents for the edification of lazy heads; but when they deigned to read and analyze the work they judged, they sought rather for opportunities to display their own wit and knowledge than to flatter the vanity of the author, or to increase his readers. Many of their most splendid articles were essays rather than reviews. The writer, whose work afforded the name of the subject, was summarily disposed of in a quiet sneer, a terse sarcasm, or a faint panegyric, and the remainder of the article hardly recognized his existence. It is to these purely original contributions, written by men of the first order of talent, that the Review owes most of its reputation."

The North American Review remarks:
"We have intimated our high opinion of the value of the essays and disquisitions with which the British Periodical Literature is now so amply filled. An eminent publishing house in Philadelphia has very wisely undertaken to reprint these, and to give them a general circulation in the United States."

A remittance of FIVE DOLLARS will pay for the ESSAYS of MACAULAY, ALISON SYDNEY SMITH, and PROFESSOR WILSON, full bound in cloth and gilt.

There probably never was a series of articles communicated to a periodical, which can challenge comparison with those of Macaulay, for artistic merit. They are characterized by many of the qualities of heart and mind which stamp the productions of an Edinburgh reviewer; but in the combination of various excellences they far excel the finest efforts of the class. As nimble and as concise in wit as Sydney Smith; an eye quick to seize all those delicate refinements of language and happy turns of expression, which charm us in Jeffrey; displaying much of the imperious scorn, passionate strength and swelling diction of Brougham; as brilliant and as acute in critical dissection as Hazlitt, without the unsoundness of mind which distinguishes the finest compositions of that remarkable man; at times evincing a critical judgment which would not disgrace the stern gravity of Hallam, and a range of thought and knowledge which remind us of Mackintosh.—Macaulay seems to be the abstract and epitome of the whole journal,—seems the utmost that an Edinburgh reviewer "can come to." He delights every one—high or low, intelligent or ignorant. His spice is of so keen a flavour that it tickles the coarsest palate. He has the unhesitating suffrages of men of taste, and the plaudits of the million. The man who has a common knowledge of the English language, and the scholar who has mastered its refinements, seem equally sensible to the charm of his diction. No matter how unpromising the subject on which he writes may appear to the common eye, in his hands it is made pleasing. Statistics, history, biography, political economy, all suffer a transformation into "something rich and strange." Prosaists are made to love poetry, tory politicians to sympathize with Hampden and Milton, and novel-readers to obtain some idea of Bacon and his philosophy. The wonderful clearness, point, and vigour of his style, send his thoughts right into every brain. Indeed, a person who is utterly insensible to the witchery of Macaulay's diction, must be either a Yahoo or a beattified intelligence.

CRITICAL WRITINGS OF FRANCIS

JEFFREY, in one 8vo volume, with a Portrait.

"It is a book not to be read only, but studied. It is a vast repertory, or rather a system or institute, embracing the whole circle of letters—if we except the exact sciences—and contains within itself, not in a desultory form, but in a well-ordered scheme, more or less original, bold and fearless speculation and just reasoning on all kinds and varieties of subjects, than are to be found in any English writer with whom we are acquainted within the present or the last generation. . . . His choice of words is unbounded, and his felicity of expression, to the most impalpable shade of discrimination, almost miraculous. Playful, lively, and full of illustration, no subject is so dull or so dry that he cannot invest it with interest, and none so trifling that it cannot acquire dignity and elegance from his pencil. Independently, however, of mere style, and apart from the great variety of subjects embraced by his pen, the distinguishing feature of his writings, and that in which he excels his contemporary reviewers, is the deep vein of practical thought which runs throughout them all."—North British Review

CRITICAL WRITINGS OF T. NOON

TALFOURD and JAMES STEPHEN, in one volume, 8vo.

"His (Talfourd's) critical writings manifest in every page a sincere, earnest, and sympathizing love of intellectual excellence and moral beauty. The kindness of temper and tenderness of sentiment with which they are animated are continually suggesting pleasant thoughts of the author."—North American Review.

THE CRITICAL WRITINGS OF SIR

WALTER SCOTT, complete in one volume, 8vo, with a Portrait.

We have spent a whole day in the society of his mighty spirit, and felt no sensation of weariness; we read till midnight, and reluctantly laid the volumes aside in obedience to our pained and heavy eyelids. We were ill, but illness could not keep us away from the Magician; for on the following morning we were up with the—no, not the lark, but the milk-man, and again intent upon these treasures of instruction and delight. We can master your ordinary two volume American novel in three hours, by a stop-watch; but here we have only got through with these Miscellanies after three days' constant reading! Some of the papers we had read before; but what of that? They were none the less charming,—we should as soon think of getting wearied with the sight of 'a river, winding at its own sweet will.' MODERN FRENCH ESSAYISTS.

CAREY & HART will shortly publish the Modern French Essayists, consisting of the Critical and Historical writings of the most distinguished French authors of modern times.

THE HISTORICAL ESSAYS,

Published under the title of "Ten Years' Historical Studies, and Narratives of the Merovingian Era, or Scenes of the Sixth Century," by M. Augustin Thierry, author of "The Conquest of England by the Normans." Complete in one volume. Price $1.

"But those who wish to appreciate Thierry's powers must judge him, not by the 'Conquete,' but by his recent 'Récits de Temps Merovingiens,' in which we have a narrative uniting Walter Scott's liveliness of detail and dramatic effect, with the observance of historical truth."—London Quarterly Review.

"The 'Narrative of the Merovingian Era' is the production of the mature and practised hand of its author. It is essentially a work of art, though important ideas relative to the science of history are implied in it. As a portraiture of the sixth century, it is unequalled: it joins the picturesqueness, animation and exciting interest of a novel by Scott, to the minute fidelity of exhaustive erudition."—British and Foreign Review.

"This edition is an exact reprint of the London edition, and contains all the Saxon language, the type of which was cast expressly for it. The French edition, of which a considerable number have been imported into this country, does not contain a single word of Saxon.—Boston Morning Post.

POETS AND POETRY OF EUROPE, with Biographical Notices and Translations, from the earliest period to the present time, by Henry W. Longfellow. In one large 8vo volume, 800 pages, illustrated.

This volume contains Biographical and Critical Notices of more than sixty writers, who have written in the present century; and besides liberal selections from Byron, Scott, Wordsworth, Shelley, Keats, Coleridge, Campbell, and others well known in America, contains the most admirable productions of Wilson, Lander, Barry Cornwall, Tennyson, Milnes, Hood, Barrett, and all the younger poets now attracting attention in England, and as yet unpublished in this country. With a great deal that is familiar, it undoubtedly embraces as much that is new to the great mass of readers as any book of the season.

POETS AND POETRY OF AMERICA,

By Rufus W. Griswold. Sixth edition. In one volume, 8vo, with Portraits of Dana, Bryant, Sprague, Halleck, and Longfellow, and many other beautiful Illustrations. Price $3.

Of the POETS AND POETRY OF AMERICA it is scarcely necessary for the publishers to speak, as it has already passed into a Sixth Edition—Of the POETS AND POETRY OF ENGLAND just issued, they may be allowed to state that it contains selections from the works of many delightful Poets but little known in this country, but who only require to be known to be admired. The VOLUME by Mr. LONGFELLOW will probably be the most interesting of the series, as it contains translations from all the distinguished Poets of TEN different countries, with a complete history of their literature from the earliest times.

PATRICK, LOWTH AND WHITBY'S

COMMENTARIES. Now ready, Numbers 40 and 41, Price 25 cents each, of THE HOLY BIBLE, with Bishop Patrick's Commentary on the Historical, and Paraphrase of the Poetical Books of the Old Testament. Bishop Lowth on the Prophets. Arnold on the Apocryph. Whiby on the Gospels and Epistles, and Lowman on the Revelation.

In the previous editions of this work, the Annotations were printed without the Text, thus rendering it a mere book of reference for the study; in this edition the text is placed at the head of each page, thus adapting it for general use both in the Family and Closet.

The work is well printed from new type on good paper, and is in every respect equal if not superior to the English edition, and will be completed in sixty numbers, at twenty-five cents each.

To those who may be unacquainted with the excellencies of this Commentary and Paraphrase, it may be necessary to state that

BISHOP PATRICK, whose commentary includes from Genesis to the Song of Solomon, is esteemed among theological writers, one of the most acute and sensible, and therefore useful illustrators of the Old Testament. "In his Exposition," says Dr. Wotton, in his Thoughts concerning the Study of Divinity, "there is great learning, and great variety, and what will save the reading of many volumes."

DR. LOWTH, the father of the well-known Bishop of London, completed the Old Testament, is esteemed among the most judicious Commentators on the Prophets. Few men were more deeply versed in critical learning, there being scarcely any author, Greek or Latin, profane or ecclesiastical, that Dr. Lowth hath not read, constantly accompanying his reading with critical and philosophical remarks; he adheres strictly to the literal meaning of the inspired writer, and there is not a great appearance of criticism, but the original texts and all critical notices are studied by this most learned divine. Bishop Watson pronounced Lowth's to be the best commentary on the Prophets in the English language.

ARNOLD ON THE APOCRYPHA.—The Apocryphal Books of the Old Testament, though not a part of the inspired writings, contain much historical information, and are useful for illustrating the idiom of the New Testament. Arnold's is a Critical Commentary on such books of the Apocrypha as are appointed to be read in churches. The work was originally published at different times, and is deservedly held in high estimation. Archbishop Cranmer, in the Preface to his Bible, says, "that men may read them (the Books of the Apocrypha) to the edifying of the people, but not to confirm and strengthen the doctrines of the church."

DR. WHITBY ON THE GOSPELS AND EPISTLES.—The Commentary on the New Testament is by Dr. Whitby, who, in the course of his work, exhibits labour and research worthy of the subject. Few men have brought a larger portion of sagacity, and a larger measure of appropriate learning, on the interpretation of Scripture. His knowledge of the Bible itself was thorough and complete, and his acquaintance with the writings of the fathers and of modern interpreters was profound. On a difficult text or expression, the reader will seldom consult him in vain. Dr. Adam Clarke, in the learned Preface to his Commentary, says, "The best comment on the New Testament, taken in all points of view, is certainly that of Whitby. He has done all that should be done; he is learned, argumentative, and thoroughly orthodox."

LOWMAN ON THE REVELATION.—Bishop Tomline includes this work in his List of Books for Clergymen and Biblical Students. Dr. Doddridge has said of it, that he "has received more satisfaction from it, with respect to many difficulties, than he ever found elsewhere, or expected to find at all." Lowman's scheme of the Seven Seals is also approved by the late Rev. David Simpson, in his Key to the Prophecies.

☞ The reader will thus see, from the authorities cited in this brief view, that the learned writings of Patrick, Lowth, Arnold, Whitby and Lowman, form a perfect and invaluable series of English Commentaries on the Old and New Testaments, and on the books of the Apocrypha.

THE WORKS OF LORD BACON,

With a Memoir, and a Translation of his Latin Writings, by Basil Montagu, Esq., in three volumes, 8vo. Price reduced to $7.50.

The American edition of the works of Lord Bacon now offered to the public, is reprinted from the most approved English edition, that of Basil Montagu, Esq., which has recently issued from the celebrated press of Pickering, (the modern Aldus,) in seventeen octavo volumes. It contains the complete works of the illustrious philosopher, those in Latin being translated into English. In order to reduce the publication cheap, and therefore attainable by all our public and social libraries, as well as by those general readers who study economy, the seventeen octavo volumes have been comprised in three volumes, imperial octavo.

THE AMERICAN FARMER'S ENCYCLOPEDIA, AND DICTIONARY OF RURAL AFFAIRS, embracing all the recent discoveries in Agricultural Chemistry. By Cuthbert W. Johnson. Enlarged, improved, and adapted to the United States, by Governor Emerson. This invaluable work is now completed in one splendid royal octavo volume, of upwards of 1150 closely printed pages, with seventeen beautifully executed Plates of Cattle, Agricultural Implements, Varieties of Grasses, Destructive Insects, &c., and numerous Wood-cuts. Price, well bound in leather, only $4.00.

"For the product, manner of cultivation, and value of these, I refer you to the Journals already mentioned, as well as to a work recently published, which I take pleasure in recommending as a School Book and suitable premium to be given by Agricultural Societies—THE FARMER'S ENCYCLOPEDIA, by Cuthbert W. Johnson, adapted to the United States by Governor Emerson—a work with which, on examination, I am so well impressed as to consider it entitled to an easily accessible place in the library of every enlightened agriculturist. In that work it is stated that an acre of cranberries, in full bearing, will produce 200 bushels, and the price is seldom less than $1.50 per bushel, and sometimes double that."—Extract from an address delivered by J. S. Skinner, Esq.
